HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 20, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

RIGHT HON. W. L. MACKENZIE KING

FELICITATIONS ON HOLDING OF OFFICE OF PRIME MINISTER LONGER THAN ANY OTHER PRIME MINISTER OF A BRITISH COUNTRY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there are a few words which I should like to say to the house. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has today reached another milestone in his remarkable career, and I am sure that the house would wish to give some recognition to the occasion.

It is no small achievement to have held the high office of prime minister, not only longer than any former prime minister of Canada, but also longer than anyone has held the office of prime minister in any country of the British empire.

What the Prime Minister has attained is a world record as the elected leader of a free nation. That such an achievement has been possible is of course a proof of his rare and impressive personal qualities. But it is also an indication of the stability of our people and of the completeness with which they have adapted British institutions to Canadian conditions.

My remarks, I need hardly say, are in no sense intended as a party manifestation. I would hope that my sentiments would be shared by all members of the house. But speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister's political supporters in the house, and I think I can also speak for his political supporters throughout the country, I count it a privilege to extend to him on this occasion our sincere congratulations.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, there are indeed occasions when all partisanship can be laid to one side, and I think the present is an occasion on which we can all join in recognition of the very high distinction that has come to the right hon. the Prime Minister in the fact that he has held office as prime minister longer than any other prime minister in any of the British dominions or in the dear old motherland itself.

I understand that today the right hon. gentleman exceeds the long tenure of office of Sir Robert Walpole, whose portrait hangs among those of other famous men in the corridor leading to the restaurant on the sixth floor.

In my childhood we used to read a good deal about Sir Robert Walpole, and we were struck by the fact that he had held office for so long a time.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I feel very humble. My leader (Mr. Bracken) just a moment ago sent word asking me to speak after the right hon. the Minister of Justice. The Prime Minister and I have something in common, not shared by any others in this house. Our mothers were warm friends as girls in Toronto, and many a time I heard my own mother speak of the right hon. gentleman. It is therefore with great pleasure that I rise to voice the sentiments of this side of the house, in the official opposition, in congratulating the Prime Minister on the high distinction he has brought to Canada, in placing this country at the head of all other parts of the empire, including the old land itself, in his length of tenure of office as prime minister.

Personally I hope the Prime Minister will live for many years yet, and if he does retire, as he has intimated he will, I hope that in his days in private life he will be afforded the opportunity to write that which this country needs so much, his own memoirs; because, apart altogether from politics, those memoirs will cover a wide field and a long period, and will include those who went before the right hon. gentleman.

I felicitate the Prime Minister and wish him long life and good health.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation join in felicitation of the Prime Minister on this occasion. It is indeed a remarkable achievement to have been prime minister of this great country for approximately twenty-one years. It is just over two hundred years since Sir Robert Walpole relinquished the reins of office, having been in reality and in very truth the first prime minister of any country now included in this great commonwealth of nations which share a common democratic heritage and common parliamentary institutions.

The Prime Minister has made a great contribution to the growing up, if I may put it that way, of this country; to the achievement of its maturity as a nation. Since the time he came into office at the end of the first world war, succeeding Sir Robert Borden, who had insisted on Canada signing the treaty of Versailles in its own right, he has witnessed and aided the growth of that nationhood of which we are all proud. While we remember Walpole as the first Prime Minister of Britain, the present Prime Minister of Canada will perhaps be remembered for many things, but one of them will be that, during his long term of office, Canada in very truth obtained recognition throughout the world as a sovereign nation.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It affords the members of the Social Credit group, Mr. Speaker, great pleasure to be able to join with the other members of the house in congratulating the Prime Minister on this day. We congratulate him on his achievements as Prime Minister. He has been called upon to stand at the head of affairs in this nation while we have been passing through trying times. What is yet ahead, no one can tell. He may yet be called upon to render great service to this nation. In case he should be, we wish him health, strength and good spirits, that he may be able to discharge any other responsibilities he may be called upon to assume.

(Translation):

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will seem fitting, I am sure, that a French-speaking voice should join with those we have just heard in extending to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a tribute of admiration, affection, gratitude and warm wishes on this day when his term of office as leader of one of the Commonwealth states equals that of the prime minister who, before him, had headed one of these states longer than anyone else.

It is a fact worth recording because it illustrates not only the continuity of our prime minister's services but also the ease with which we adapt ourselves to the parliamentary system modelled on the long experience of Westminster:

The fathers of confederation gave us a constitution basically similar to that of the United Kingdom and, though our parliament has not yet existed a full 81 years, already one of its leaders has served as prime minister as long as any other in the several centuries since the foundation of the institution upon which our own is patterned.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

We have indeed cause to rejoice over such a fact just as we have cause to rejoice over the opportunity we are given today of extending our congratulations to the one who, more than anyone else in our nation, has contributed with such constancy in investing our parliament with the stamp of dignity, of stability, and with such substantial pledges for the future.

(Text):

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): As a former head of the city of Toronto, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a word of tribute to what has already been so well said by the others who have spoken today.

I think I have known the Prime Minister longer than almost any other person here in the house. I have always had a great deal of admiration and respect for him. I knew his father, who was a beloved professor in the law school when I attended it. I knew his mother, his father and all his family. I have always had a high regard for him personally, because of his kindness of heart to all his friends. I will say this about him. He has given a long life of able and brilliant service to our country. I am one of those in the house who has never allowed religion or politics to mix up with friendship.

I will always remember what his distinguished parents have done for this country. His grandfather was the first mayor of our city, in 1834. I was in Toronto the other day, and I may say that a large tablet is erected there marking his grandfather's grave. One of my last acts as head of the city was, I think, in December 1921. I remember his brother, who was a great member of the medical profession. His body arrived at the Union station, and as head of the city I accompanied it for burial. I have always remembered the kindness of heart of the Prime Minister.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): It is refreshing, Mr. Speaker, to hear such speeches as these on an occasion like this. Mr. King has been my only leader for a long time, and perhaps he will be my only one; I do not know about that. He has been my leader most of the time, to the extent that my conscience permitted me to follow him.

There is one thing that I find quite unusual, and it lies in the calling to mind of the length of time a man has been in office; the time has seemed to be so short. Mr. King is still so youthful looking that it is hard to believe he has been here longer than Walpole—who has been dead for a long time—was prime minister of Britain. I do not think it is fair to compare a living man who is in good health with a dead one. It is unjust to do that. But it can be said that everybody meant well.

The cabinet ministers spoke well. My good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) made a moving speech. So did the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church); the leader of the C.C.F. party, and the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) acting as leader of the Social Credit party, also spoke very well. I regret that we have not enough celebrations of this kind. We had one for Mr. King on the occasion of his birthday, and at the time of the unveiling of his picture in the House of Commons. On another occasion, when he left for a trip outside of Canada, we wished him godspeed; and on his return he was welcomed. But I think there should be celebrations like that for every member of the House of Commons. We have a gracious member amongst us, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum). Why do we not join together in order to hold a celebration in her honour?

The spirit of the House of Commons is better today than it usually is. Why? Because politics have been forgotten for a time. That is a good thing. We are here together. We are in the same boat. I notice once more that Mr. King has some very good friends amongst his critics. Those who flatter him are not always his true friends. They may expect something, but he is too great a man to pay attention to flattery. I am sure that at times he appreciates criticism much more than flattery, because he must surely give the one who may criticize, the benefit of the doubt.

Now, sir, in the hope that you and all my colleagues will be honoured in turn on fine occasions like this, I offer my congratulations and good wishes to Mr. King, as this is a good precedent for other celebrations of the same kind to honour each one of our colleagues in turn.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I at once extend my good wishes to every hon. member of this house, and my warmest thanks for the generous expressions of good will to which I have listened this afternoon. I do not think I need say that it would be much easier and pleasanter for me to be extending congratulations to hon. members in different parts of the house than to be attempting to acknowledge the kind words that have been extended to me. Nevertheless these occasions do come along. They have been coming much too rapidly of late; time has been flying by much too quickly. To have been able to retain over many years the confidence and good will of those closest to one in public life is in itself something for which one should indeed be more than grateful. I should like hon. members to know that for their confidence, over so long period of time, I am indeed deeply grateful.

I thank very warmly my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) for what they have so kindly said on behalf of the members of the government, and the members of the party with which I have been associated during the greater part of my life. They need no words of acknowledgment, but rather would I express gratitude to them for what their lives and the lives of those on whose behalf they have spoken, have meant to mine; what the loyalty, the industry and the ability of those by whom, over the years, I have been surrounded in council has meant so far as my life is concerned in bringing this day to pass.

I thank most warmly all members of the Liberal party, those in this house and those outside it, who have given me their support, for having made possible the years of office it has been my privilege to enjoy.

Need I say, Mr. Speaker, that it has touched me not a little that words from hon. gentlemen of the official opposition should have come from two hon. members who have been not only close personal friends over many years, but who also have had close associations with those who have been nearest and dearest to me in my life. It has been, perhaps, a part of my misfortune that so much of my time in public life has been lived more or less alone. But that has only served to cause me to realize more deeply, than perhaps I otherwise would have, how much I owe in what there may have been by way of accomplishment to those whose example and whose lives have meant more than all else to mine. I thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for his close friendship, and for his reference to the friendship of our mothers, before either of us was born. I also thank the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who has had close associations with members of our family in the past, for having spoken so generously of what that association has meant.

I need not say how deeply I appreciate the kindly sentiments expressed by my friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and those of my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who has spoken on behalf of the leader of the Social Credit party. To both

I am deeply indebted for what they have so kindly said, and to their followers for the cordial manner in which they have responded to their expressions of good will. In passing, I should like to say to the hon. member for Lethbridge how much I regret the absence from the house through illness of the leader of the Social Credit party. I hope the hon. gentleman will express to his leader my good wishes, and my hope that he may speedily return to this house in health and strength.

To my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I also feel indebted for what he, too, has said. I appreciate the friendship I have shared with him, as I do the loyalty and friendship I have had in such full measure from all hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. Speaker, I had been told that something might be said this afternoon to which I would be expected to reply. Not being too sure, feeling as I have during the past few days, that I might not omit what I most wished to say, I wrote out a word or two this morning which with the permission of the house I should like to read. It expresses what I feel most deeply about this particular moment, in relation to our parliament. I hope hon. members will believe that I speak in an impersonal way in seeking to convey what I feel to be the significance of this occasion.

It is well, I think, we should all have in mind just what has occasioned today's congratulations. To do so, at all events, will make it a little easier for me fittingly to acknowledge what others have found it possible to say. It will make clear, too, that it is to others I owe whatever merit there may be in the long years of office I have been privileged to enjoy. This is what I have written.

It is with a record—a sort of long distance record—in the matter of the time of holding high office in the state that our thoughts and our words are concerned for a moment this afternoon. If records are to be related to countries, then I am indeed happy that it has been my good fortune to be the one to win a record—an unequalled record, I am proud to say—which redounds to the credit of Canada.

What pleases me in equal measure is that a record achieved in our country, and in Canada's parliament, under our system of free, representative, responsible government, should be of great significance to the world today in the struggle we are witnessing between totalitarianism and democracy. The struggle today in many lands, and indeed it has become a world struggle, is again the age-long one between freedom and tyranny, between democracy and totalitarianism. Today's record makes clear that to gain and to retain power in a free country, to help shape the policies of its government, it is not necessary that the head of a political party or of an administration should be either a superman or a dictator.

It has been well said that the symbol of democracy is the secret ballot; that the symbol of totalitarianism is the secret police. The record of which mention is being made today is attributable to the protection afforded the majority, by the secret ballot. Nowhere about this record is there the sinister shadow of a secret police. It signifies the opportunities which democracies afford to a man of average industry, intelligence and integrity, who is prepared to give his time to public service. It speaks volumes for what, in a democracy, is possible for the individual.

Now let me return to the spoken word. I need not say how grateful I am to have been spared in health and strength to enjoy an honour I had never sought, and to the possibility of which, until obliged to do so by the all too rapid passing of time, I had never so much as given a thought.

I am particularly proud to possess this honour at the instance of the people of Canada. I cannot say how grateful I am to my fellow citizens who have given me their confidence over so long a period of time. Nor can I say how much I owe to the loyalty and ability of those of my party who surround me today, and to those who through my years of office—totalling twenty-one years within two months from today—have given me such unfailing and devoted support. I have, too, very much in mind how much I owe to the officials and other members of our public service, and to the many friends without whose help over the years I could not have begun to meet the least of the obligations of my present position.

It is with mixed feelings indeed that I express my gratitude for the many evidences of good will of which I have been the recipient today, from within and without these halls of parliament, from many other parts of our country, and from friends in countries other than our own. I should find much greater satisfaction in the occasion were its emphasis upon years of office to which I might still look forward in this period of transition in the world's history, rather than so exclusively upon years that have flown by so quickly and are gone forever.

To me personally, however, this day is one of thankfulness. I am particularly thankful that I have been spared to participate during so many years in the public life of our country, and to see the high place Canada has come to hold in the regard of other nations. I am thankful, too, that having been in office for so long a time, I have so many—I might almost say "any"—friends left. This is the more surprising, and may I add the more pleasing, in that I have had, of recent years, so little opportunity to see anything at all of many of my fellow members, or to share with them, inside or outside these halls of parliament, the personal and social contacts which are so all-important and so enjoyable.

May I say in conclusion that I rejoice above all at the opportunity public life has afforded me to render some service to my fellowmen. This service I trust through years to come may be helpful to many.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Third report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Mutch.

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Hallé be substituted for that of Mr. Baker on the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MITCHELL—PRESS REPORTS WITH RESPECT TO GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I tabled orders and made a statement in the house to the effect that the interest rate on payments on government annuity contracts had been reduced from four to three per cent. I stated on that occasion:

These matters have effect as of the 19th day of April, 1948, but do not change existing contracts.

I notice in this morning's Globe and Mail of Toronto that, with respect to this matter, and referring to what I said, it states:

It would, he pointed out, affect contracts already in force.

This is entirely the opposite of what I did say; and I trust the Globe and Mail will make a correction for the benefit of its readers who have been purchasers of government annuities.

I am sorry also to have to refer to a report on this matter appearing in today's Montreal Gazette. This states that the change in interest rates was forced by the representations of private business. That is not correct. I have not to my recollection met any of the business interests referred to in this matter—and I have been in the ministry for more than six and a half years.

The change was made, as I have stated, to bring the rate in line with that paid on government securities. The Gazette also reports alleged claims of private business that the government annuities scheme has been subsidized out of tax funds to the extent of $4,500,000 a year. This is a gross inaccuracy. The average annual mortality losses to the government in the past five years has been $400,000. The government pays the cost of administration of the annuities act. The average annual cost for the last five years was $437,000.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DEFENCE BOARD

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have to announce the establishment of the industrial defence board, made today, and I now table a copy of P.C. 1739 creating the board, also a copy of P.C. 1740 giving the names of the chairman, vice-chairman, and members of the board representing industry.

As set out in the terms of reference, the primary purpose of the board is—

To advise the government of Canada and the Minister of National Defence on all matters relating to the industrial war potential of Canada.

The members of the board representing industry are all men who gave notable service in connection with industrial organization during the second world war. One of the objects of our setting up the board is to ensure that the experience they gained will not be lost and will be the basis for future developments.

Their names are Messrs. H. J. Carmichael, C.M.G., Chairman; J. Edouard Simard, Vice-Chairman; G. R. Donald, O.B.E.; William Knoll; J. G. Notman; Clarence Wallace and William A. Wecker.

In addition the members of the board will include the chairman of the defence research board; the president of Canadian Arsenals Limited; the three principal supply officers of the armed forces of Canada; the deputy minister of national defence and the deputy minister of trade and commerce.

In a letter to Mr. Carmichael this morning I set out some of the matters which I thought should be given immediate attention. I table a copy of this letter. These matters include:

Examination of the various agencies concerned in planning and initiating procurement and production of war equipment in Canada so as to recommend a division of responsibilities which will ensure that these responsibilities are effectively met without overlapping.

Consideration of requirements in the light of plans and possible programs of the armed forces and the assessment of the capacity to make available the materials, manpower and manufacturing facilities that may be required, with special recommendations regarding materials, industry or plants which are regarded as essential and for which some special provision should be made.

To assist in the work of organization, I have designated Colonel W. G. Denny, O.B.E., as acting executive secretary. Colonel Denny has held positions in connection with ordnance work during the war in Europe, as well as at home and in the United States.

It will be seen that one of the major jobs of the board will be to ensure effective co-operation between the armed forces and the various agencies operating in this field. I refer particularly to the newly organized Canadian Ordnance Association, representing industry.

In the last war Canada became a great arsenal of democracy. Should an emergency ever arise again our expectation is that this board will assist us in being prepared to ensure that Canada will play its full and necessary part in the preservation of freedom and in the defence of our country.

MINISTERIAL POWERS

REFERENCE TO DECISION OF MR. JUSTICE ANGERS IN NARCOTICS CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and offer it also for the edification of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), in regard to a judgment handed down by Mr. Justice Angers. I would ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in view of the finding of the judge in this case that discretionary encroachment by certain ministers and deputy ministers will, if not curtailed, result in this country's being ruled by a dictatorial government, he will alter the order he made.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not give me notice of the question, and it is three years since I had anything to do with the case to which he has referred. I have a fairly clear recollection of it, however, and on the basis of that recollection I should like to answer the hon. member's question and set him right about some of the assumptions he apparently has as the basis of his question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I quoted from the judgment.

Mr. CLAXTON: This case concerns a veteran, Paul Belleau, who suffered a disability resulting from tuberculosis contracted at the end of the first great war. As a veteran he received treatment from the department of pensions and national health for a long period. I think he first came before the narcotics division of that department some time in the nineteen twenties, and some time in the nineteen thirties it was found that he was receiving, through prescriptions from his own physicians, thirty grains of morphine per day which I am advised made him the largest known single user of the 4,000 known addicts in Canada at that time.

The narcotics division of the department of pensions and national health was headed by Colonel Sharman, a man having a widely known reputation throughout the world for having made a great contribution in that field. Being entrusted by the then Minister of Pensions and National Health with the responsibility of the administration of the narcotics act he caused inquiries to be made to see why this huge quantity of morphine was being prescribed for this man. In consequence, over a long period of time, I think stretching up to fifteen years, there were discussions between this man and his doctors and those representing the department as to what could be done. As I say, there is no case of any doctor being allowed to prescribe such a dosage for an addict, at least so far as my information goes.

The officers of the department co-operated with this man's own doctors in working out a plan for his treatment and cure by a reduction of the dosage. On a number of occasions the doctors of the department, or those appointed to represent the department, saw the man's own doctors to work out the details. However, it was found on repeated occasions that the man would not co-operate, and still his doctor and those representing him wanted to obtain these huge doses.

In these circumstances and in consequence of events which took place long before I came into the Department of National Health and Welfare, but for which I am glad to assume responsibility, it was decided on the advice of no less than six or seven doctors, most of whom I saw myself, and after I had examined the record repeatedly, that the requests made by this man through his own physician shall not be met and that the ten grains per day which he was then receiving and which is a very heavy amount, should not be increased, with the authority of the department. If it were increased it would be confirming the fact that this man was being given morphine by government permission just because he was an addict and for no other reasons.

In those circumstances I refused to authorize that this morphine be given to this addict. When I say "this morphine" I am referring to the colossal dosage. But the officers of the department did co-operate with his own doctor, and I think the dosage was gradually reduced to something in the nature of four grains, which when I last heard of the case he was still receiving. That was done on the advice of his own doctors and in accordance with the terms of the narcotics act and the regulations passed under it.

Then with regard to the question raised in the judgment, the hon. member has surely read the plaintiff's assertions and the claims referred to, possibly in the press and possibly in the judgment. The case did not come to trial on the facts. It was tried on what we in Quebec call a demurrer, a point of law, to see whether there was any case in law to go before the court. The court held that on that point of law the action must be dismissed. The facts have never been brought before the court except in so far as they are asserted in the plaintiff's claim.

The facts are substantially as stated by myself from my memory. Having been entrusted with the responsibility for the administration of the narcotics act, and having regard to the dangerous character of the drugs administered and the possibility of any drugs given in large quantities being used improperly, I believe hon. members would feel that any discretion reposing in the minister who administered that act had been exercised properly on this occasion.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN CAR PLANT AT AMHERST, N.S.—QUESTION AS TO SUPPLY OF SCRAP MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. McIlraith)? I am not by-passing the minister, but I have been dealing with the parliamentary assistant in connection with this matter. My question arises from a telegram received from the director of the steelworkers union. Has the parliamentary assistant or the minister been advised that the Canadian Car plant at Amherst, Nova Scotia, may close permanently because of their inability to secure scrap material? Secondly, can he advise the house why only 165 tons of scrap have been delivered out of the 500 tons promised that plant in February?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): With the permission of the inquirer I refuse to be by-passed. The steel controller was not advised of any shortage of raw material at Amherst until after the plant had been closed down. Inquiries were then made as to why production was not coming from Amherst. We were then advised of a shortage of re-lay rails, which is the raw material for the plant.

Instructions were given that the first 500 tons of re-layers produced at Belleville were to be allocated to the Amherst plant and also that the first 500 tons of re-layers accumulated at Moncton were to be delivered to Amherst. I might say that the Belleville re-layers ordinarily go to Burlington Steel Company but they are diverted to Amherst for the present.

Recent inquiries to the company indicate that while the plant has been closed extensive repairs have been made, and the management state that they have every intention of resuming operations. They report to us that they will in future be able to operate on a more continuous basis than has been the history of the plant previously.

Mr. GILLIS: The plant is actually closed for repairs and not for lack of material?

Mr. HOWE: The fact that no complaint reached the steel controller about lack of raw materials until after the plant had closed down would indicate to me that the plant was probably closed for repairs, or perhaps rebuilding.

Mr. GILLIS: The company is kidding the employees.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GENEVA AGREEMENT—RESOLUTION UNDER GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The first item on the order paper under government notices of motion has to do with schedule V to the general agreement of tariffs and trade. When the order paper is cleared of that item we have just one more under the same heading. In the meantime this item has been on the order paper for four and a half months. I think the Minister of Finance should inform the house why this order, which bears date December 5, is still on the order paper under government notices of motion, and how long it will remain there.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say just when it will be brought forward. I had not contemplated bringing it forward in any case until after the Geneva agreements, which are now before the banking and commerce committee, had proceeded further than they have so far done.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

INQUIRY AS TO UNITED STATES SUBSIDIARIES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of our foreign exchange situation, can the minister tell the house what amounts of Canadian dollars are being converted into United States dollars by subsidiaries of United States corporations to meet their obligations in the United States?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): That question, Mr. Speaker, I suggest is one which should be placed on the order paper, as it requires the obtaining of figures. My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of it, and I have asked that the figures be prepared and hope to give him an answer tomorrow, but I cannot today.

NAILS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker. On April 9 the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said that the production of nails was increasing month by month, but the Globe and Mail this morning in its Ottawa Briefs says:

Nail production in February dropped to 5,670 tons—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order: I understood the hon. member was going to put a question.

Mr. FRASER: I am just going to put the question, Mr. Speaker, but will complete the quotation:

—compared with 6,854 the previous month.

I would ask the minister why there is a drop of 1,184 tons in the production of nails in February of this year as compared with January, and what is the prospect of the production being increased. We cannot have houses built for veterans if nail production is dropping.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): One reason for production in February being less than in January is that there are fewer working days in February.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friends, if they will watch production in a 31-day month as against a 28-day month, will see that that is a fact.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There were twenty-nine days in February this year.

Mr. HOWE: I know, but the short month is the principal reason for the drop in production. The production of nails is limited by the amount of rod that can be supplied from the steel companies. We are stepping up rod production as fast as we can consistent with other demands. Generally speaking there has been a very sharp increase in the output of nails, and generally speaking there is no great shortage of nails in this country, even though it has been found impossible to keep all hardware stores supplied with nails. That is the plain fact. The apparent shortage is a matter of distribution. I know of no project in the country that is being seriously held up for the lack of nails.

Mr. FRASER: I do not agree with the minister's statement that fewer working days in February accounted for the drop in production.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister yet in a position to answer the question I asked him yesterday, of which I reminded him by notice this morning?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend's question was as to whether health legislation would be introduced at the present session. The question has been under consideration by the cabinet off and on at different times since the beginning of the session. When legislation will be introduced will depend on the progress we make with other legislation now before the house.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, there is a gathering in the city of Ottawa of most distinguished gentlemen from across Canada and may I suggest that the members of the government, if they are sincere in their requests for forgiveness for the gross mismanagement of the country's affairs, might go down there and join that party.

SUPPLY

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASES ORDERED BY TRANSPORT BOARD—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL—SUBAMENDMENT, MR. BRACKEN

The house resumed from Thursday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bracken.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned last Thursday evening I was pointing out some of the reasons why the railway companies found it necessary to seek an increase in freight rates in this country. One of the reasons I gave was the overcapitalization of at least the Canadian National Railways, and I cited some very good authority to substantiate my statement. I have one more piece of evidence to offer to the house in further substantiation of my statement, and that is the news report in this morning's papers that the president of the Canadian National Railways said that the Canadian National is paying $44,000,000 in interest charges every year, which is three times the amount of interest charges that the Canadian Pacific has to meet. That in itself is a potent reason why the railways should be revalued, particularly the Canadian National Railways, and written down to their actual cost. Then, as I said before, if there is a debt still due to the bondholders which is properly theirs, let it be serviced and paid by all the people of Canada, not by just some sections of this country.

I also pointed out that one of the results of the judgment of the board of transport commissioners was to increase freight rates not simply by 21 per cent but by over 100 per cent on many small shipments because of the board's ruling that the railways could charge a 75 cents minimum on all less than carload lot shipments of less than 100 pounds. I also pointed out that because of that fact many private concerns in this country were taking advantage of the increase in freight rates to add, for their own profit and benefit, the increased rates to the price of their goods, thus making the order in effect retroactive even though the judgment by no means gave any authority of that kind.

Now I want to give another reason why I think the railways of this country felt called upon to ask for an increase in freight rates, and it is this. There is entirely too much influence on the Canadian freight rate structure by the railroads in the country to the south of us, by our friends of the United States. I think in this as well as in many other matters there is entirely too much influence by Washington and allied interests down there on our whole Canadian economy. These two particular faults that I have mentioned may be laid at the door of all past governments that Canada has had. They do not necessarily have to be laid at the door of the government which is at present in power, although this government must take its full share of the blame. There are others to blame also.

There is one reason, however, why this government should undoubtedly be censured right now for what has taken place. Nowhere in the judgment do I find it stipulated that any single part of the 21 per cent increase in rates was earmarked for an increase in the wages or salaries of workers. When therefore my friends opposite accuse us of trying to prevent the railway workers from getting an increase in wages, they are simply shedding crocodile tears and using specious arguments. Had there been one word in the judgment indicating that a part of the increase was to be used for the purpose I have mentioned, it might have been easier for us to feel kindly, at least to the extent that such an increase was to be given to the workers.

The third reason why it is asked for is something which is directly attributable to this government, and that is the failure of the government to listen to the advice of this party since 1945 when we demanded the continuance of price controls in Canada into the days of peace at the level that had obtained in the days of war. The government refused to follow that course. Three years ago we found they were beginning to release controls, aided and abetted by their common law wife in this house, the Progressive Conservative party, which supports them on all measures of this kind, in the interest and to the profit of their own particular friends throughout the country. The releasing of the controls began at that time, and its continuance up to the present day has been the greatest single factor causing the board of transport commissioners to justify the increase granted.

Had these controls not been released, I am convinced that what has happened would not have happened, or at least it would not have been necessary even from the point of view of the railways.

I am going to suggest that even at this late date, twelve days after the rate went into effect, the government should still reconsider its position and immediately disallow this increase in freight rates. I have much evidence to support my contention, and it should be convincing to the government.

I have here a letter from the Edmonton chamber of commerce. It is a long letter and I will not read it all, but I wish to put on the record one paragraph which sets out their position clearly. It is dated April 13, 1948, and reads in part:

> The chamber has been advocating, and still advocates, the appointment of a commission of the prestige and influence of the Rowell-Sirois commission, because the chamber feels the question of freight rates is the single most important matter facing the Canadian economy at the present time.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They were reflecting on the transport board?

Mr. BENTLEY: They say in this letter that they are not, and neither am I. I am reflecting on the government, which my hon. and independent friend the member for Comox-Alberni supports on nearly every occasion.

Mr. COLDWELL: And this one.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, shame.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Just enjoy yourself.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have made no reflection on the board. It is not very often that I support chambers of commerce, but in this matter the whole west, and I am speaking as a member from the west, no matter what the political, economic or social views of the people there may be, is in agreement that this increase was unnecessary and unfair. The people there ask, as I do, that a complete investigation be made into the whole matter. I have quoted that paragraph because I believe that a letter from a chamber of commerce has infinitely more effect on my Liberal and Tory friends than letters from any other source that I can think of—even an ecclesiastical source—because that is their greatest god.

I say therefore that the disallowance should be effective right now, even though twelve days have passed since the freight increase went into effect. Even though a good many months have gone by since the release of controls, I say that the government—and this, I assure you, is not coming from any communist source—should immediately reimpose price controls as they have been asked to do so many times by members in this part of the house and by people in many parts of the counrty.

I suggest also, as the chamber of commerce does, a complete investigation into the whole capital structure of the railways until we find out exactly what they are worth intrinsically and what they should charge as capital and fixed charges. With the overcapitalization as it is—and this is backed up by the authorities I have given—who, I ask, can look at a railway statement and determine, for example, whether their depreciation reserves are the proper ones, until we know what the capital figures of these companies actually are? Who can tell whether any of the percentages of their earnings indicate their proper earnings when no one knows exactly what the institutions are worth?

For that reason, and in the interests of and fairness to the country, I believe the government should accept the three recommendations I have mentioned.

May I make one more reference to the Edmonton chamber of commerce. They say that they feel the question of freight rates is "the single most important matter facing the Canadian economy at the present time." I will not say I fully agree with the importance they attach to it as the greatest single factor in the national life of Canada, but it is a great factor and quite in line with the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this party, when he said that it would cause a strain on Canadian relationships if this freight increase went into effect.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) went further and said the strain would be so great that it was possible it would cause a great rift in our Canadian national unity. The chamber of commerce apparently is rather of the same view. I suggest therefore that the words spoken by hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Lethbridge were not idle words. They sprang from the thoughts and the information which we find among the people in the country, who distrust actions of this kind.

If, as I said before, it is necessary for Canada to subsidize railways to some extent, then they should be written down to their proper capitalization, and the extra debt that is to be serviced should be paid back by all the people of Canada, including the two central provinces. It would strengthen the bonds of Canadian unity if such action were taken.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Although I had something to say on the subject of freight rates after the Easter recess, in view of the fact that two want of confidence motions have since been brought before the house, and having regard to the speeches that have been made, I feel it incumbent upon me this afternoon to say something further.

I was a little amused at the remark of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) when he talked about the common law marriage between Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. BENTLEY: It is legal out in British Columbia, I admit.

Mr. REID: If it is a common law marriage, the offspring must be the members of that party to which the hon. gentleman belongs.

Mr. KNOWLES: What has the hon. member been doing?

Mr. REID: That is only by the way.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh!

Mr. REID: If the hon. member keeps interrupting I will wait until he stops. I did not interrupt him.

Mr. BENTLEY: Have fun.

Mr. REID: If one cannot be a gentleman, he should at least act like one.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. REID: First of all, I want to make a comment on the want of confidence motion introduced by the leader of the C.C.F. It is like a great many more of the theories propounded by that group. One has only to read the motion to realize that what I am about to say is correct. He says it may be a want of confidence motion, that it may defeat the government, and that if it does, the people of Canada should decide. Will any member of parliament tell me if there is any one particular subject which the people of Canada can decide? One can just imagine a general election on the freight rates issue.

Mr. PROBE: It would be just too bad for you if you had it.

Mr. REID: It is an issue which would principally affect the people of British Columbia, who would speak about it, and perhaps the people of the prairies. But when you came to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which have over sixty per cent of the population of Canada, I greatly doubt if freight rates would be an issue at all. How then could the people of Canada settle it? I cannot see the people in Ontario and Quebec voting for the development of British Columbia and the prairies if it meant the moving of the industries from those provinces out to the west. Therefore, in my opinion, what is suggested by the leader of the C.C.F. would not work at all. It is just a lot of theory. It would never work out in practice, because every member of parliament knows that no one can tell exactly what one issue elects or defeats a member. There are so many issues involved in an election that no person can say that this, that or the next thing either elected or defeated him. So I say there is nothing to the contention that the people of Canada would decide the issue. I submit that they would do no such thing.

I am frank to admit that the general freight rates issue—that is, the charges for freight between various provinces and for various distances—is a matter which is somewhat complicated for the House of Commons to decide. Any reasonable-minded member will readily admit that. But I well remember what happened when I brought the plain issue of grain rates before the house. For five years, standing over there in the opposition, I tried to get some redress with regard to grain rates—which was just one issue—from the prairie provinces to British Columbia. I well remember the treatment I received. I was told plainly on every occasion: "Why do you bring this subject into the house?" I was told that by the Conservative government then in office. I was told to take it to the board of transport commissioners. They said, "Do not bring it up here." I was not arguing the general freight rates structure at all. I was arguing one issue and one issue only namely grain rates. I well remember how the vote went when I was voted down. Even the members from British Columbia on the Conservative side actually stood up in their places and voted against me in the year 1935, the vote on that occasion being 45 to 64.

May I also point out this to hon. members. All the decreases which have taken place since 1920 have taken place under a Liberal administration. The one increase, the great 40 per cent increase, took place under a Conservative administration in 1920. I doubt if many members in the central provinces, including even the minister who mentions the mountain differential, is cognizant of the fact that there is no such thing as a mountain differential so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. The mountain differential was instituted after the building of the Canadian Pacific into British Columbia.

If one looks into the history of it, he will find that actually a Conservative administration was defeated in the year the railway began operations. Sir John A. Macdonald's administration was accused in the House of Commons of certain wrongdoing. An election was held and his administration was defeated. Then Sir Alexander Mackenzie came into office. The rates were set after the Canadian Pacific Railway reached the coast. That railway, by the way, chose the longest route to the Pacific coast. I am told that it was chosen on the instructions of Great Britain who at that time wanted the railway to be as far back from the United States border as it was possible to get it. So the C.P.R. chose what was then, and is now, called the Kicking Horse pass route, with a grade through the mountains of 2·5 per cent.

Realizing that the company had some difficulties in building that railway, the government of that day gave them 50,000,000 acres of land and also, I believe, $100 million in cash. The people of British Columbia, who were assured of equal treatment if they joined confederation, thought that the 50,000,000 acres of land and the $100 million would pay for any difficulties the railway might have in going to the coast through the mountains. But the C.P.R. started out in dictatorial manner and they were at that time the lords of creation because they were alone. Therefore the people in the province of British Columbia set out to have a competitor, and commenced the construction of a railway, called the Canadian Northern, from the coast to the prairies. That railway came through what is known as the Yellowhead pass. The grade on that railway is the lowest in the entire dominion, being 0·7 per cent. There is no grade on any other line, right from New Westminster and Vancouver to the prairies, that is as low as that of the Canadian National. I think it is not generally understood by many people, no matter how often we have told them, that there is no mountain differential in so far as grade is concerned. It exists only in the matter of rates.

But what happened? Just when we had the competitor railway built and ready to begin operations, the dominion government at one fell swoop took in the Canadian Northern Railway under the Railway Act. So the rates on the Canadian Northern became subject to the dominion Railway Act of that day, and the railway freight rates of those days were those of the C.P.R. From that day to this we have been paying the exorbitant rates charged by the C.P.R. Ever since then the C.P.R. have dominated, right through the piece.

[Mr. Reid.]

I made a statement in this house in 1931, and I was greatly surprised to see that the statement was never mentioned in the press. When I introduced my motion in the house in 1931, I was interviewed by a high official of the C.P.R., who almost threatened me if I did not withdraw the motion. I made the charge in the House of Commons, but although I looked in the papers afterwards, I found no mention whatsoever of my having been intimidated by the C.P.R. official. From that day to this I have noticed that on almost every occasion when I and other members have mentioned anything derogatory to or in criticism of the C.P.R., many of the leading papers have been silent on the subject.

I will go further than that. I ask hon. members to look back in the records of the press when a train wreck has occurred, either on the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National. They will find that when the wreck is on the Canadian National, it is blazoned across the page in big letters, but when a wreck takes place on the C.P.R., it is in small print, and one must look for it. I do not know why that is. I merely mention that to hon. members in order to support the contention I have made that, in so far as the railways in this country are concerned, the entire situation has been and is being dominated to quite an extent by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

When I fought the freight rates on grain at that time—and I am not going into that question this afternoon—I pointed out such instances as this. They were carrying grain, as I think they still do, 2,239 miles from the west to Montreal for 53 cents per hundred pounds. From Calgary to Vancouver, 642 miles, the cost was 41½ cents per hundred pounds. There was no comparison at all. Bear in mind we are the only province in which grain has been designated in two ways. If the grain is going abroad from the prairies it is carried at something like 21½ cents per hundred pounds. If the grain is to be consumed within the province, at that time they were charging 41½ cents, but after importuning the government for four or five years the railways reduced the rate to 30 cents per hundred pounds.

I well remember those days, when I produced the figures and papers in the house showing that we in British Columbia could buy in 1934 Canadian grain in China and bring it back to the Pacific coast for less than we could buy it on the prairies and haul it to British Columbia at the 41½ cent rate. It was startling. All through the years we have been endeavouring to secure the removal of this differential, but without result.

When the minister spoke on Tuesday, April 13, he mentioned that counsel for British Columbia and the other provinces had plainly stated that the recent application before the board was not for the removal of the differential. That is perfectly true; but if he had read the complete statement he would have seen that counsel said what British Columbia was complaining about was the 21 per cent increase on top of the present freight rates into that province; and that is the chief ground of our complaint. Anyone who has sat in the railway committee and listened to the financial statement of the Canadian National Railways being discussed; anyone who has heard, as we were told in the house the other day, that the deficit is expected to be well over $15,000,000, cannot help but be struck by the enormity of the problem. But except for a statement in respect to the capitalization of the C.N.R. I have not heard any member of that committee, no matter on which side of the house he sits, suggest to the railways how they can earn profits which will enable them to carry on, with the present high cost of materials and wages and the falling passenger traffic. It is a situation that has to be faced, and I am frank in saying that I for one have at present no permanent solution to offer at the moment. But I am going to offer one or two suggestions of which I trust the minister will take note.

With the surplus in the treasury we will have this year, I think the government might very well cut out the tax of 15 per cent on transportation. Perhaps that would not amount to a great deal, but I think it would mean between six and seven million dollars a year to the two railways. In my opinion there is no reason now for the transportation tax to continue to be imposed, because it was put into effect as a war measure and in my view is not required now.

In his speech the minister said there had been no appeals to the board of transport commissioners since 1927. That is perfectly true with respect to general freight rates, but there is a reason for that. British Columbia has spent huge sums of money and put forth every possible effort before the board to have the discrimination removed, all to no avail. As one who has appeared before the board of transport commissioners fighting the grain and freight rates question, I know one is immediately confronted with the statement that you are not introducing any new argument into the argument, and that therefore the judgments given in the past must stand. Realizing this, British Columbia has been slow to bring forward any further appeal to the board of transport commissioners since 1927, not only because such an appeal entails great expense, but also because they are sure to be met with the argument, "Well, we have heard all that; the judgment has been given in 1927, and we cannot go back on it." I know that is what I was met with when I appeared before the board; that is what I was told. The board simply said, "We have heard all that evidence. Nothing new has been introduced; therefore we are standing by the judgment given in previous days."

I think it only fair to point out to hon. members that the railway into British Columbia was built at less cost than were many portions of railway in Quebec, the prairies and Ontario. It has been shown in evidence that construction costs were less, and pusher-mile expenditures are less. As a matter of fact I am told it sometimes takes three pusher engines to bring an ordinary freight into Fort William. The Canadian National can haul up to three times more, from Vancouver and New Westminster to Edmonton, than the Canadian Pacific, with the same class or type of locomotive; but while all this evidence was placed before the board—and I use the word "evidence" advisedly—it was of no avail.

I say to the minister that in view of the present situation; in view of the fact that there are areas and districts in Canada suffering an undue burden; in view of the fact also that we in British Columbia will have to pay more than people in the other provinces because our present rates are higher and the increase of 21 per cent therefore means a greater increase to us, we are asking that something be done once and for all to remove the gross injustice and the extra load we have been carrying as compared with the other provinces. I suggest to the minister that he designate at least three if not four areas in Canada, recognizing that there are long stretches with very little population where the cost to the railways must be higher because they do not pick up any freight, and that these areas be equalized so far as rates are concerned, with the country as a whole paying the difference.

After all it is a national affair, a national responsibility. As has been pointed out, we in British Columbia came into confederation with the understanding that with respect to railways and rates we would receive equal treatment with the other provinces. That has not been carried out.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may have misunderstood the hon. member, but did he say that in this equalization the railways should pay the difference? I have heard it suggested that in those unpopulated stretches the country should pay the difference, and I am in favour of that.

Mr. REID: No, I am not in favour of the railways paying it. I say the nation should pay it. If I said it should be paid by the railways I want to correct that statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what you did say.

Mr. REID: I am very glad my hon. friend drew the matter to my attention. The country should pay the difference, because it is a national affair and not a provincial or local matter.

In conclusion let me ask the minister if, when he speaks again, he will give the assurance to the house that the request of the government that the board investigate and examine discrimination in freight rates be not only a request but a directive so to do.

It may surprise many members to know that in the Railway Act discrimination is allowed. If one looks through the judgments of the board of transport commissioners he will find all the way through that they do allow discrimination. But when it comes to the matter of unjust discrimination, that of course is their responsibility. Anyone who makes an appeal to the board will find great difficulty in proving to the board that a discrimination is unjust.

What makes me somewhat perturbed with the minister's direction to the board is this, as it is found at page 48 of the judgment:

> Mere mileage comparisons do not afford criteria of discrimination; but all facts material must be given weight.

In other words under the body of regulations which have developed under the Railway Act, mileage is not the rigid yardstick of discrimination. Discrimination, in the sense in which it is forbidden by the Railway Act, is a matter of fact to be determined by the board. It will be found by anyone who will take the trouble to read the judgments that, contrary to popular belief, discrimination is allowed by the board of transport commissioners; this is done under the Railway Act.

What we have claimed and what we maintain is that the discrimination against British Columbia is unjust, and that no evidence can be or has ever been produced to show that it costs more to haul a pound or a ton of freight to British Columbia than to haul it to any other part of Canada. As a matter of fact when counsel for the Canadian Pacific was asked what it cost to haul any article, he admitted in evidence that no expert could tell just how much it cost to haul an article over any given distance of the railway.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. CASE: Is the hon. member arguing against the increase in rates, or for equalization?

Mr. REID: I am arguing at the present time that the increase of 21 per cent has placed a heavier load on the people of British Columbia than upon those of any other province. That is my argument today. I am asking and pleading with the minister that he give a directive to the board of transport commissioners—not merely a request to look into the matter of the different rates and of discrimination but to give them a directive to remove and to equalize rates, payable if need be from the treasury to the railways, and to make up any deficits incurred by them in that way.

I close with that request to the minister—to my mind a reasonable one. I could have taken more time to discuss the different rates, but I realize much has already been placed on the record, and realize also that the House of Commons is not always the best place in which to discuss the numerous differences in rates. When I discussed the matter during the years I was in opposition I did so with only one thought in mind, and that had to do with grain rates from the prairie provinces. British Columbia is the only province having a differential in grain going west. Grain going east carries only one rate, whereas on grain going west it is designated either as export or domestic. If it is domestic we pay fifty per cent more as freight than do the people abroad.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak mainly with respect to one aspect of the question before us. Therefore my remarks on the general situation will be brief; for, after all, the broad picture has been well covered throughout the course of the debate.

As the hon. member who has just taken his seat pointed out, what members from the west and from the maritime provinces object to is that the discrimination already in effect has been heightened and aggravated by the 21 per cent order. It has been pointed out from all sides of the house that this has an inflationary effect on the cost of living, and that it also increases the inequalities which already exist among the different sections of the country.

I must say I felt one of the most ridiculous statements made thus far in the debate was that made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) when on April 14, as reported at page 2964 of Hansard, he said:

> I stand here as a dominion member, not acting for my own constituency; I am acting in as fair a manner as I can for the whole of Canada.

Taken by itself, that sounds like a high principled statement. But when it is applied to the fact that we have this inequality as between different sections of Canada, for a member to stand in his place and say that he is condoning—

Mr. SINNOTT: Read on farther.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I had the time I would, but it would make it look worse. The hon. member knows that what he has done is simply to accept the decision of the government to condone the aggravation of discriminations and inequalities already existing.

I join with members from seven provinces of Canada, both east and west, in expressing the view that we are not seeking to stir up conflict between different sections of Canada. What we are asking is that inequalities which are the cause of potential conflict be removed. A few days ago when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was asked on the orders of the day a question about the implementing of the oats and barley provision in another act, he replied that the governments of two provinces had expressed their opposition to these provisions, and made the assumption that those governments therefore spoke for the people of those two provinces. I doubt that; but I suggest to the government that, if that principle is to be applied, then surely the time to apply it is now, when the premiers and the governments of seven provinces have expressed their views with respect to this matter. As others have done, I call the attention of the government to the fact that Liberal newspapers in various parts of Canada, strongly supporting the government, have criticized the government mercilessly for its action on this matter. I hope that even yet the government will change its position and pay heed to the requests of the premiers of the seven provinces for action which will lead to more unity in this country.

When I rose to my feet I indicated that in the main I wished to direct my remarks to only one phase of the matter. I refer to railway wage rates. Let me say at the outset that I decry as strongly as I can the way in which the wage question has been mixed into this freight rates issue. Let me state clearly that I recognize, as everyone must, that the wages the railways can pay must have a relationship to the revenues of those railways. But that does not justify mixing up the present request of the employees for increased wages with this particular way of getting more revenue for the railways, namely by an over-all 21 per cent increase. As my colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), has already pointed out, the tears that have been shed in this house with respect to the workers and their request for increased wages strike us as being crocodile tears indeed.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Mosher did that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all, but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) certainly indulged in crocodile tears the other day. I submit that when some of us have called upon that same minister to do something about the pension rights of Canadian National employees he has found excuses for taking no action along that line.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman knows full well that the question of pensions for the employees of the Canadian National Railways is one which is governed by the administration of the railway and not by the minister. The hon. member should not make the statement which he has just made and which creates the inference that it is one for the minister to decide.

An hon. MEMBER: He is full of that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister recently found it possible to deal with that matter on the floor of this house and to defend the action of the government and say that it was his view that he should not take any action to seek an increase in the pensions of Canadian National employees in view of the fact that his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), had taken that view with respect to superannuated civil servants.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member had better read the speech.

Mr. KNOWLES: I certainly did read it; I read it again in preparation for these remarks. Similarly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has indicated solicitude on his part for the railroad workers, but I would remind the house of the struggle we have had through the years to try to get the Minister of Labour to take proper action in connection with the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think the record will show who did the most for the railroad workers as far as parties go.

Mr. KNOWLES: The record certainly shows that in 1945 the Minister of Labour appointed an investigator to find out whether a royal commission should be appointed to look into this matter. When that investigator reported back in precise language that a royal commission should be appointed the Minister of Labour refused to carry out that recommendation. So I submit that the tears which have been shed in the house over the workers on these railways are indeed crocodile tears.

As to this whole question of the relationship, which I contend does not exist, between the present demands of the workers for increased wages and the demand of the companies for increased freight rates, I should like to quote from documents that I have before me at the present time. I have here a copy of a brief submitted on behalf of a long list of railway employee organizations to the conciliation board in support of their request for an increase of thirty-five cents an hour in the basic rates of pay. The document which I have in my hand was submitted by employee organizations mainly connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I also have a brief submitted by the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees whose members are employed by the Canadian National Railways.

I feel that these employees made out a strong case for these increases. They made a good case with respect to the employees in the so-called upper brackets by comparing their wages with the wages received by employees in other similar lines of endeavour, but they made an even stronger case by pointing out that there are thousands of employees on the railroads who are not in the upper brackets. In particular I would refer to the information to be found on pages 42 and 43 of this brief where reference is made to the large number of labourers and freight handlers getting as low as seventy-six cents a hour and, in some cases, only sixty-seven cents an hour.

Many of these employees have been in the service of their company for a long time, and at the same time they see advertisements by other plants for unskilled employment at rates of 87½ cents, 95 cents an hour and so on. The details are set out in the brief. The point I am making at this moment is that I support wholeheartedly the contention of the railway employees that an increase is coming to them and should be granted without delay. In my view they made an excellent case when they appeared before the conciliation board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wonder if we could have some order in this debate? The hon. gentleman is now discussing a matter which in my opinion, and with deference to you, sir, is outside the scope of this debate. He did start to discuss a matter which I think was in order, but he is now going into the railway wage rates and making attacks on the Canadian National Railways because of the wages they pay certain of their employees. I am not objecting to that if the hon. member wants to do it, but this is not the place to do it. This is a debate on a specific question, and I submit to you, sir, with deference that the hon. member should direct his remarks to the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that it was the minister himself who brought into this debate the question of wage rates. I feel that I have just as much right to answer him as he had to bring up the question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not going to allow the hon. gentleman to get away with a statement like that. Today he has been putting on Hansard several statements which are erroneous. Any remarks which I made did not deal with specific cases such as the hon. gentleman has referred to; they dealt with the general case. I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to say that I did otherwise, but if he does I shall take issue with him.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to know the facts which I am putting on the record which the minister regards as being erroneous. I have quoted from a brief presented to the conciliation board by the railway employee organizations. However I had finished with that point when the minister interrupted and I was moving on to another point with which he may also take issue.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let us get on with the debate if you do not mind.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apparently what I am saying is hitting the minister.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is drawing a red herring across the trail.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us get on with the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the Minister of Transport is the last one to talk about a red herring in this debate, especially after the performance in which he indulged the other day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If you would listen to your own leader over the radio you would see what red herrings are being drawn across the trail.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I turn to another phase of this question? I submit that this matter will be in order, although the Minister of Transport may not like it. The railway employee organizations took up fifteen pages of the brief to which I have referred in order to point out that their request for increased wages must not be regarded as being contingent upon increased freight rates. They made out that case along the lines I indicated a few moments ago. They admit that the companies have to have sufficient revenue to meet their costs, but they contend that such wage increases as they demand should not depend upon another question altogether, such as the economic structure of transportation costs in this country. May I quote a sentence or two from this brief in order to sum up the position that they take in connection with this matter? I quote from pages 57 and 58 as follows:

The employees do not think that compliance with their request should be contingent on the railways getting increased freight rates. Their position in this particular is the same as it was before the national war labour board in the Canadian Pacific et al wage case of 1946, which received the support of the board. Again we refer you to the board's "Reasons for decision," the references therein to the "enormous increases" in the company's earnings over the 1939-1945 period, its considerable increase in total assets and reserves, the improvement in the liquid position of the company, its reduction in funded indebtedness and fixed charges; the board's view that it was not required to estimate the future earnings of the companies involved in the case, and finally, ". . . we hold that the companies, respondents in this case, are able financially to pay."

Those sentences are taken from near the end of about fifteen pages in the brief presented by the employees' organization, in which they contend that their request for wage increases had no reference to the demand for freight rate increases and must not be made contingent upon them in any way. In this the companies appear to have agreed, for in the statement of the railways presented to the conciliation board with reference to the same matter, there are on pages 78 and 79 some four or five paragraphs, 209, 210, 211 and 212, which deal with this same matter, and in which the companies made it clear that, even if they were to get the freight rate increase which they were seeking, not one cent of it would be available for wage increases. Let me read a sentence or two from the statement of the railways to which I have referred. At page 79 they say:

The fact is here emphasized that the current application was intended only to afford relief from added costs of operation arising out of wage and price increases which had taken place up to the time the application was made in October, 1946. This application—

That is the application for a freight rate increase.

—could not be based on speculation as to possible further increases in costs—

I ask hon. members to note this:

—and any relief which may be granted—

That is by way of a freight rate increase.

—will not be available to meet such possible future costs, but only those which had already been imposed on the railways at the time of the application.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have it from both sides to the wage issue—the employees contending that their wage increases should not be contingent on any freight rate increase, and the companies saying that so far as they are concerned, even if they were to get the freight rate increase, which in part has now been granted to them, not one cent of it would be available to the employees for increased wages. In the light of that, I submit that this whole business of the wage demands of the employees, which as I have already pointed out are eminently justified, should not have been related to this freight rate question. I make it clear again that I am not denying for a moment that the companies must have sufficient revenues to meet their costs, including their wage costs; but, as other speakers have pointed out throughout this debate, to admit that the companies need increased revenue does not require that you condone this unequal and discriminatory way of giving them that increased revenue. Actually some of us are not convinced, and I think my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) made this point effectively the other night, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company do need the increase for which they asked.

I note in the annual statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the year 1947 that their principal complaint to their shareholders is not that their net earnings, in absolute terms, were too low. Their net earnings for 1947 were $22,892,189, which was a higher figure than in a good many earlier years. Their only complaint is that their net earnings, in their view, bore too low a ratio to their gross earnings, that ratio being only 7·2 per cent.

In connection with this company's net earnings, may I point out that on the basis of 1947 earnings the company declared for payment total dividends amounting to $21,307,682. This information is found at page 7 of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's annual report. Also from that report and likewise from sessional paper 125A, of April 12, 1948, information can be had as to where the stocks of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are held. The preference stock is divided as follows: only ·51 per cent is held in Canada, but 99·49 per cent is held outside Canada. Of the ordinary stock, 13·58 per cent is held in Canada and 86·42 per cent outside Canada.

I may say in passing that during the war there was a considerable movement in the ordinary stock of the company away from the United Kingdom to the United States, with the result that at the end of the war the amount of the ordinary stock of the company held in Canada and in the United Kingdom had been considerably reduced and the amount held in the United States had been considerably increased. The result of this distribution of the stock as between Canada and other countries means that the $21,307,682 paid out in dividends from 1947 earnings went this way: $2,297,895 was paid within Canada, and against that figure has to be set the fact that $19,009,787 was paid to shareholders outside Canada.

We are not convinced, in the face of that, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company really need the increased revenues which they seek in order to pay the just wage demands of their employees. If increased revenues are needed by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National to meet these wage demands, which I insist every member of this house should support, those revenues should be found in other ways, by making a charge on the consolidated revenue fund and by carrying out some of the suggestions that have been made by speakers on all sides of the house aiming at, not increasing the difficulties and inequalities in the freight rate structure, but removing them with the hope of achieving national unity and a much more balanced economy for all our people.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the very vigour of this debate must have forcefully brought to the attention of the government the necessity for making a vigorous effort to try to heal this ancient wound which has caused so much unhappiness all across Canada. I am particularly pleased that the members of this house who come from the two great central provinces have spoken and acted in a generous manner. I think that should indicate to the government that, should legislation be brought into the house which would have the tendency of equalizing the present discriminations, it would have the support of hon. members from the two large central provinces.

I feel, too, that there is some justification for the feeling among hon. members from the maritimes and the western provinces that this 21 per cent increase all across the board, increasing as it does the discriminations already in existence, could possibly have been handled in a more equitable manner. However I have the feeling that the present situation will not last for very long, although I expect it will last after the vote tonight.

As to the necessity for and the justification of these freight rate increases, it would appear to me that in all fairness we should consider the prices of the two great products that we ship from British Columbia, lumber and fish. In 1939 the price of lumber was $20 a thousand and it is now $60. In 1939 salmon was worth $4 a case and it is now worth $12. It would seem to me therefore only reasonable and fair that the freight charges on these products should bear some relationship to the vastly increased values of these products, and I do not think the people of British Columbia in these particular industries would wish to have the workers in the railroad industry sharing the burden of low wages and being taken advantage of in this respect.

I was grateful that during the war the Panama canal route was still kept in effect by the board of transport commissioners, although actually there were no ships available to carry freight via water from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast. We have always enjoyed these advantages in British Columbia of having a competitive rate through the Panama canal.

In British Columbia we have been brought up since childhood to feel that we have been unjustly dealt with. I well remember hearing as a child of the exploits of the late Senator McGeer in presenting the case of our province to the board of transport commissioners. I have a feeling that probably we shall get somewhere on this equalization question; but, as regards the suggestion that the imposition of the increases be deferred for thirty days in order to allow the provincial premiers to come here and make representations, I submit that, while on the surface that seems plausible, it does not appear to me to be possible that results will be obtained. The provincial premiers are not experts on freight rates, nor are they familiar with all the ramifications of the freight rate structure, and I do not think that coming here and spending two or three days presenting the case to the cabinet would justify the cabinet in setting aside the judicial decision of an expert board who have been considering the question for eighteen months.

The cabinet are able men; but, after all, freight rates are a most complicated question, and it would be too much to expect that the cabinet should set aside a decision of this kind made by so responsible a body. I am actually surprised to hear hon. gentlemen in this house talking, as we have heard recently, about human rights and fundamental freedoms, and nevertheless suggesting that the cabinet should set aside the findings of the board of transport commissioners in this matter.

The amendment of the C.C.F., proposing non-confidence in the government, was obviously conceived in great haste and I think it is being repented at leisure. I am sure it must have been a most difficult decision for the C.C.F. party to make. Here they are trying to serve two masters, as it were—

Mr. MacINNIS: Aren't you doing the same thing?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): —the farmers on the prairies and the workers on the railways.

Mr. MacINNIS: Which group are you supporting?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I have great interest in the welfare of both groups—

Mr. MacINNIS: So have we.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): —but there are hon. gentlemen of the cloth on the other side—my hon. friends have a number of them —and these hon. gentlemen should have told them that one of the oldest precepts in human relationships is that a man cannot serve two masters. I do not know whether they consider in this case it is two servants instead of two masters. That is quite possible. It must have been a difficult decision for them to make among themselves, as to which one they would repudiate, because, after all, some of them come from rural ridings, while a great number of them come from urban centres.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would not the Liberal party, which my hon. friend supports, be in the same predicament?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let him make his speech.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The farmers of Saskatchewan, where they have a trial C.C.F. government, would be very much concerned by the attitude of my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: What kind of government do you feel Saskatchewan should have?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Saskatchewan may feel justified in taking a chance on an experiment, but I would not take that chance myself. Out there the people are used to the vagaries of the weather, and one bad government out there might not be very much worse than a bad hailstorm.

Mr. BRYCE: You are sitting on the fence. You have not the courage to take either side.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind hon. members that the question before the house at the moment is freight rates and not the governments of the provinces.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can just imagine the C.C.F. sitting around the caucus room up there wondering what the decision should be, like Belshazzar when he saw the writing on the wall.

Mr. MacINNIS: How did he feel?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): In this particular case there was no writing on the wall. Probably it was the long shadow of the pick handle, to use a phrase I often hear from my genial friend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald). They must have wondered if they had not better be careful, lest they should have to go back to the outside life, being no longer members of parliament after another election.

Mrs. STRUM: Speak for yourself.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am sure $6,000 a year is much more difficult to earn in outside occupations out there where you have to use both your head and your hands. I do not expect the C.C.F. to be practical and to give heed to practical suggestions, but I think the Progressive Conservatives over there are sound, hard-headed businessmen and one can appeal to them. They are more interested in results than they are in any transitory political coup that might come from the subamendment they have moved. I am sure the Progressive Conservative subamendment has been motivated by a desire to do a service to the people of Canada, and on this assumption I would make a proposal to them. The government has promised to make a full investigation into these freight rates differentials in Canada. Do they not think that by some happy chance, about a year from now, probably before a general election, the board of transport commissioners might bring down a favourable finding in regard to these freight rates? I think it would be a wonderful time to do so.

I myself am not interested in the political factors.

An hon. MEMBER: Just in the election.

Mr. MacINNIS: You will be all right whichever side wins.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am interested in an equalization of freight rates in Canada. I know my hon. friend is not interested in anything but the political angle, but I say to him, "Don't assume that every member of the House of Commons feels as you do." That would be a most unfortunate attitude to take.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is an assumption we should both bear in mind if we can.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): If we could keep this government in power a year—I do not think my hon. friends want to defeat them tonight—

An hon. MEMBER: We will vote against them.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think it would be well if some of my hon. friends went to the hockey game tonight. They would not have to vote. In a year's time, we may have every reason to expect the board of transport commissioners to bring in a favourable decision on the appeal which the government is asking them to consider now.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I am conscious that most of the things that can be said on freight rates in this house have already been said. It is my business, then, more or less to subscribe to those things that have been said by the members of my party. The last speaker had something to say about our support of labour and of farmers. He said, What would you do if you had to support both sides in this particular issue? As one who represents an area both rural and urban, I am one of those in the happy position of having to serve two masters, and I hope to serve them well. I see nothing incompatible, by the way, in so doing.

I want to say one or two things in the general argument. In the first place, I am not convinced that the railroads have made a telling argument that would convince people that they are for the moment in need of any extra money. When we are discussing wages, I might say that I think it would be quite possible for both these companies to pay adequate wages for at least two years without having any additional revenue.

I could give the house some of the point of view of the west, and of the press in the west, particularly that press which supports the government in power, as the press mostly does. I have a clipping or two here. I do not know whether or not I shall use them. I might use a heading or two. Here is one heading:

C.P.R. added $21,000,000 to its reserves, reduced funded debt.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Shame.

Mr. KNIGHT: The first paragraph reads:

A $21,000,000 increase in reserves and a $10,000,000 drop in funded debt are shown in the general balance sheet of the Canadian Pacific railway for the year ended December 31, 1946.

[Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni).]

And so forth. Another paragraph reads in part:

Increases are shown in holdings of government bonds and in inventory of material and supplies.

And so it goes. Another paragraph reads:

Funded debt is shown as having been reduced from $93,669,000 in 1945 to $83,565,000 as at December 31 last.

That is at December 31, 1946. And so the story goes in general.

Then there is the Canadian National Railways. We know, of course, what is the matter with it. It is that business of its capital structure, an investigation into which is long overdue and, following investigation, something in the way of a remedy. I do not think the nationally owned road should be perpetually kept in the kitchen as a Cinderella to the richer sister, the Canadian Pacific railway, where it can be constantly used as an argument why the C.P.R. shareholders should have more and fatter dividends.

I have already said that there has been some concern about the wage scale. I think my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has adequately dealt with that. He has shown, and quoted from a statement which shows it, that the railroads had no intention of using any of the increase in rates which is now being sought for the purpose of increasing wages. If I were convinced, of course, that the wage scale would suffer through lack of revenue, I would be in favour of the railways having more money. But if I were in favour of the railroads having more money, I would favour their having it through equalization of rates and the bringing up of freight rates in the places where they are low, rather than through the imposition of an increase in freight rates where freight rates are at present high. The way to do this is not by a horizontal raise, such as has now been granted. Everyone knows that if discrimination existed with the rates as they were a couple of weeks ago, that discrimination has been increased by the increase across the board.

I think what this all adds up to is that it is one of the three great things which constitute a method by which western wealth is transferred into central Canada coffers. One of them is tariffs; another is profits upon western businesses which have their central offices in central Canada, where that wealth is taxed and used for the benefit of those central provinces. This addition to the freight rates is the third thing.

I think no one in this house has denied the fact of discrimination. I do not think I shall argue that point. Everybody knows it exists. I hope my friend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) is correct when he says he hopes—and I do not know where he gets his information—that this thing will be levelled out.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): A government source.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I suggest that that promise is one by which the government purchased the acquiescence of our rebellious friends on the other side and whipped them back into line.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where are these rebellious friends on the other side?

Mr. KNIGHT: Oh, they are not rebellious any more.

Mr. MICHAUD: They never were.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am suggesting that the reason they are not rebellious any more is that they have been promised the very thing which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has just suggested. I hope that is true. If so, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will have done a considerable service to this country in bringing the matter before this country and before this house in a way that it will have to be voted on at the present time.

There is one thing that I am glad about in this discussion, and that is that the increased discrimination and the increased freight rates will bring extra attention to the cheaper haul through Churchill and the Hudson bay route. If there was a need before of the cheaper rates of the Hudson bay route and the shorter haul, there will be a greater need now. I draw that to the attention of the minister. It was with a great deal of satisfaction that I noticed the other day that the ocean rate to Churchill had been cut; that is to say, contract ocean freight rates from British ports to Churchill will now be the same as those applying on the Britain to Montreal route. That will be a source of tremendous satisfaction to the people in my district.

Here and now I should like to pay tribute to those men who, for years and years, have devoted their time, energy and, in some cases, their money, to the bringing about of that very end. Particular credit should perhaps go to the Hudson bay route association and to its secretary, a man who now unfortunately is somewhat broken in health, but who has worked hard and long to produce what has now come about. I hope to see trade extended through the Hudson bay route and the port of Churchill. I have reason to believe it will be extended through the very imposition of these extra rates. This ill wind may blow some good in that direction.

Much has been said here about the freight rates in Ontario and Quebec being favourable, on account of road and water competition. I think this matter of competition by road is something that the railroads must ultimately face. They are facing it now but they are not solving it; they are giving way before it. So we have the discrimination of which we complain. I say that the way to solve that problem is not to have your road haulage in competition with your railroads but to have it supplemental to your rail transportation. I would point out to my Conservative friends on my right that, in the only place in the world I know of where a Conservative government still exists—outside of Ontario—and that is in my native Northern Ireland, in spite of the fact that a Conservative government is in power, there is a perfect example of socialization of the means of transportation. A few years ago their railroads were faced with bankruptcy. The rails were getting rusty on top for want of use. That government did not stick out its Tory chest and say, We refuse to have anything to do with nationalization; that is socialism. On the contrary, they got down to business and put their truckage, their road transportation, and their railroad system on an equal and combined basis. You can now interchange a ticket on the railroad for a ticket on the bus as easily as you can interchange an Ottawa streetcar ticket for a bus ticket. All transport in that country is handled by the government agency; and that is under a Tory government, which apparently is not as Tory as it sounds.

That is a problem which will have to be faced in this country, I think; because everyone who has any sense knows that where you have good roads, a large population and mobility for trucks, the railways cannot possibly compete, because the truck can pull up to the back door of a warehouse and go anywhere, which the train cannot do. The only way the railway has a chance of competing with road transport is over the long haul such as we have, for instance, in northern Ontario.

I might add a word or two about my own city to show how the increase in freight rates affects it and the district it serves. Our geographical position makes us a wholesaling city, from which goods are sent to all the towns contiguous to it. This freight rate increase is a considerable blow to us. Of course it will bring about an increase in the cost of living. Some people say that in its ultimate impact upon the consumer this 21 per cent will amount to perhaps 50 per cent after goods go through the hands of the various people who must handle them. Of course I do not mean an increase of 50 per cent in the cost of living, but 50 per cent in that cost to the extent that it is effected by freight rates.

It is a source of satisfaction to the western farmer that grain rates are not affected, but the other day in the house I made a discovery which may mean that things are not quite as good as they seem. The rumour is that the railways are holding that increases can be made in connection with back hauls and out-of-line hauls, while the rates for regular hauls remain the same. As I understood it, the whole grain freight rate structure on the prairies was to be left unchanged, and surely back hauls and out-of-line hauls are part of that structure. As such I believe they are outside the scope of this order and should remain untouched.

I blame the government for its ready and cheerful acceptance, and its immediate imposition, of this award by the board of transport commissioners. I blame the government for its refusal to intervene. When Premier Douglas and the premiers of the other provinces who oppose this increase applied to the dominion government in a proper and civil manner to have the heavy increase withheld until such time as they had an opportunity to present their case, they were justified in doing so, and I do not think the dominion government was justified in the refusal in which it persisted. I have a clipping here from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix giving the comment of Premier Douglas on this refusal:

> There could be no possible harm in withholding the imposition of the new rates until the provinces had an opportunity to exercise their right of appeal.

I think that is a reasonable statement. The government is interested in the political repercussions. No one could tell me a few days ago that this freight rate question had not become a matter of major political importance. The minister is usually so astute I did not see how he could be so naive, when he made that categorical refusal of government intervention, as to think for a moment he could get away with it; because, while to some extent it is a statistical and financial problem, this business of freight rates, particularly when it comes to inequalities and injustices, is a human matter, a social matter, a matter which in itself is intrinsically political, and political it has turned out to be.

In that connection I might give another western opinion, this time from a newspaper which usually follows what I might describe, in the vernacular, as the government line. That is an expression I do not like, but I cannot think of a better one at the moment. I am quoting from an editorial which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 9:

> The federal government has promptly implemented the unfortunate decision of the board of transport commissioners—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Probably I should read a reference from Beauchesne, third edition, on reading from newspapers or articles emanating from outside the house. I refer to citation 265:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I would ask hon. members to govern themselves accordingly in their remarks.

Mr. KNIGHT: With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this comment has to do with the government, not with the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: From the opening words I understood that it referred to the debate now taking place in this house.

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall not quote further from it, but will simply say on my own that I think the government committed a major political blunder. I take it that statement would be in order, whether or not hon. members agree.

Perhaps the government will do something. I have suggested previously that the government has now some reason for doing something. There was a tremendous rebellion within the government's own ranks. That rebellion was more vocal when no vote on the issue was expected, but I noticed that when the leader of the C.C.F. party brought the matter into the open so that there would have to be a vote, the rebellion rather died down. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni said a person could not serve two masters and, since I believe this matter is political and since the hon. member for Comox-Alberni talked politics himself for ten or fifteen minutes, I do not see why I should not be able to relate politics to this subject. It was suggested here that the government, that is to say the nation, might subsidize the freight haul across northern Ontario. In that connection I wish to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker)—or is he still the hon. member for Rosthern?—who is making speeches up and down Saskatchewan. The heading is: "Saskatchewan Liberal chieftain advocates nation defray costs of shipping goods over barren western Ontario." He says that is the Liberal policy in connection with freight rates. Am I permitted to read this item, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. KNOWLES: He is a member of the house.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. member for Rosthern is a member of the House of Commons, but here he is expounding Liberal policy, and I think it has a distinct bearing on what we are talking about:

Mr. Tucker contended it therefore followed that it was a national responsibility and not the responsibility of the west to defray the high costs of shipping across this barren territory.

Then listen to this:

Mr. Tucker declared absorption by the federal government of the costs of maintaining railway service across the barren western Ontario area would provide the railways with sufficient revenue to lower freight rates in the west to the level prevailing in the east . . .

That is the Liberal freight policy, says the hon. member for Rosthern. I should like to ask the minister if that is dominion Liberal freight policy, and if he intends to do anything about it. Talk about serving two masters: the hon. member for Rosthern appears to have the unfortunate facility of being in the wrong place at the right time. When matters of tremendous importance in the province were going to take place in the provincial legislature in Saskatchewan, he was offered a seat there, but he could not consider it, being needed in Ottawa.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is now discussing the freight rates question; he is discussing the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

Mr. KNIGHT: It is freight rates I am coming to. I am saying what he would do about freight rates; what he said he would do about it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was referring to what the hon. member for Rosthern had said about freight rates. But when he is discussing the hon. member for Rosthern, then I must call him out of order.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. member for Rosthern said out in Saskatchewan what he would do about freight rates if he were here. Where is he? When matters vital to my province are happening here in Ottawa, the hon. member for Rosthern is not in Ottawa; he is out electioneering in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member for Saskatoon City not to discuss the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. KNIGHT: We will leave the hon. member for Rosthern alone, and turn to more important matters.

Mr. GARDINER: He will take care of them, anyway.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is coming in now?

Mr. KNIGHT: I believe I have made my position clear in the matter of freight rates. This is an important question for the city of Saskatoon, not only to the businessmen who are operating in a wholesale capacity. It is also important to every man, woman and child in that particular part of the country. I sincerely hope the government will see fit to see to it that the railroads from now on are run in a more equitable and just manner.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the recommendation of the board of transport commissioners was received with some misgiving by those sections of the country in which freight rates are already considered to be too high. For a great many years the maritime provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia have felt that freight rates in those areas were out of line, when compared with those of the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

I do not at this time intend to cover any of the ground already covered respecting the difference in freight rates in the areas mentioned. What I should like to do is to go over a little bit of railroad history in Canada, and then try to indicate the policy which should be followed at this time.

For many years it has been a known fact that the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways has been out of line, when compared with the actual assets of the company. For instance, the Grand Trunk Pacific, which was one of the privately owned railroads which, with its branch lines was taken under the national system, cost a total of $197,139,391. The public subscribed nearly $128 million, or 65 per cent of the entire cost. Of the total capitalization, 88 per cent was in bonds and only 12 per cent in stock. This, of course, meant that there was a heavy load of fixed charges, amounting annually to more than $8,500,000, or $2,855 per mile. This is more than three times the fixed charges of the Canadian Pacific.

The Canadian Northern, another line taken over by the Canadian National, received large grants from the federal government and from provincial governments when it operated as a private concern. The accounts of the road show it received a total of $298 million. The Acworth commission, which dealt with the financial position of the Canadian Northern, stated that the maximum value of its property was only $370 million. In addition to investment bonds there was an outstanding funded debt of $83,000,000, while the outstanding liabilities were in excess of the total value of the property. The other privately owned roads which became part of the national system were in no better position financially.

In that connection I should like to quote from an article written by Sir Joseph Flavelle in 1932, when he dealt with this matter before the royal commission on transportation. These are the recommendations he made as reported at page 1599 of the commission's report:

(a) That the cost of building the Intercolonial and Transcontinental railways should be written off at once.

(b) That the advances made to the railways before taken over and the deficits which would be inevitable for some years, should be met by the issue to the government of common stock on which no interest would be charged or dividends paid until the company was in a position to earn profits after payment of interest on fixed charges assumed and on the subsequent capital expenditures that would be necessary.

Then again we find that Sir Henry Thornton, one time president of the Canadian National Railways, gave evidence before the royal commission on transportation, and is reported in this way at page 50 of the report of that commission:

To what is the condition of the C.N.R. system due. It seems to me it is due first to the inherited mistakes, if one may call them such, of previous proprietors; secondly, to capital expenditures necessitated to meet public demands to continue the development of the country to make up for deferred capital expenditures in years gone by and to create an efficient transportation machine; thirdly, the competition from subsidized water transport and the highways, and fourthly the freight rate situation. All of these are of course augmented by the present state of depression through which we are passing and the problem is largely one as to how long the depression is going to last.

And listen to this:

I think I would be safe in saying as I intimated some little time ago, that the depression may be the reason which has provoked this investigation, but the investigation might just as well have been made years and years ago. The depression is a thing which simply aggravated an already existing condition. I may mention that because so many people confuse the depression with conditions which really have fundamentally existed for a long time.

Those were the words of a former president of the Canadian National Railways. The commission's report of 1932 outlined the procedure which should be taken more or less to correct the difficult railway situation in Canada at that time. I say the time is now ripe for the government to take action to deal with our complex railway problem.

Again we find that at page 30 of the report the commission recommended that the capitalization of the Canadian National railway system be drastically written down; and then they went on to say that they did not believe that in 1932 the time was opportune to write down its capitalization. I believe if those same people were approached today they would concede that the time is now ripe to deal with the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways.

Most of the bonds were held in Great Britain and other European countries in 1932. But today, because of war purchases, large amounts of those bonds have been repatriated. In fact, in the railway committee of two years ago we were told that only a very small portion of the bonds of the Canadian National Railways were held abroad. Because of the changed situation which has been brought about on account of the war, I think the time has now arrived when the government should take action and cut down the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways to a figure where it will be able to compete and provide transportation at cost.

I should like to say something about the 21 per cent increase in freight rates. I submit that the government should not have agreed to this increase going into effect. The better way to have dealt with the situation would have been to bear the losses of the railroads out of the consolidated revenue fund and hope that within one, two, three or four years the situation would so improve that it would not be necessary to increase rates.

The same problem came up some years ago. In 1918 the Canadian railroads applied to the government for increases in freight rates which were granted. About the same time the railroad employees asked for increases in wages. The increases in wages amounted to $77,000,000, while the increased freight rates received by the railroads amounted to $43,000,000. The railroads applied again for an increase in their freight rates and, after some deliberation, it was granted. Later on, in 1920, a further increase in freight rates was asked, and in this connection I should like to quote from the debate which took place in the House of Commons at that time because I think it indicates the position the government should have taken at this time. The position taken at that time by the government was summed up in parliament by the then minister of railways as follows:

Shall Canadian freight rates be increased generally for the particular purpose of enabling the Canadian National system to meet its operating expenses and fixed charges, or would it be better to go on with the present rates, giving dealers no additional excuse for increasing the cost of living, and trusting to increase in business, the economies it should be possible to effect by co-ordination, and the return of normal conditions, to gradually reduce these deficits until the day when the revenue will prove sufficient to pay for operation and, later, also to take care of fixed charges? Should this latter suggestion prevail, it would require to be thoroughly understood that the minister of railways must come down next year with a deficit, and the next year with a deficit, and so on for a few years until we shall have turned the corner. The railway companies applied to the commission for an increase in rates, and after a prolonged controversy an increase was granted, calculated to be sufficient to keep the Canadian Pacific railway at least in a healthy financial condition, with the hope that as a result the other great railway system may be benefited in a corresponding degree.

I submit that, because of the increase in the cost of living which is likely to occur on account of this substantial increase in freight rates, the government ought to meet the operating charges of the railroads out of the consolidated revenue fund without increasing the freight rates. It has been denied that this increase in freight rates will have any effect upon the volume of traffic carried by the railroads, but I think there is great danger that this will happen. There is danger that competition from the Panama canal will considerably reduce the volume of traffic and the effect of this competition will be increased by these increased freight rates. Some reference was made to competition from the Panama canal before the royal commission which investigated transportation in 1932, because of the increased rates which were granted in 1918 and 1920. Professor W. T. Jackson, professor of transportation, University of Toronto, gave evidence before the commission and said at that time:

During the period from 1923 to 1928, the grain movement from Fort William to Port Arthur increased by six per cent, while that from Vancouver to Prince Rupert increased by 47 per cent in the same period. From 1921 to 1928 the movement from the Atlantic seaboard increased by 47 per cent, while that from the Pacific increased by 995 per cent in the seven-year period.

It will be seen that this represents a considerable loss of traffic to the railroads. I do not think it is beyond the bounds of possibility that the railroads will lose traffic because of the recent increase of 21 per cent. Other things will have to be considered. Ocean shipping is more efficient today than it was twenty years ago. Ocean-going ships are faster and it is possible for them to make trips more quickly than it was twenty years ago. In view of all this, I think the government should take into consideration the possibility of maintaining freight rates as they were. If they have to pay additional losses out of the consolidated revenue fund it will be better to do that than greatly to increase the cost of living in this country by granting this increase in freight rates.

I believe the time has come when we must admit that we have a transportation problem in Canada. If the government is to take action on it, there is no time like the present. I submit that the sooner action is taken on this problem, the sooner we shall develop a national transportation system that will work to the benefit, not only of one or two sections of the country but of the country as a whole.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, there was considerable that I intended to say on this question, but because of the lateness of the hour I shall try to finish before six o'clock. One of the outstanding features of this debate has been the way in which the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), has changed in a few days from a statesman of a fairly high order to a real menace to society. When he moved the adjournment of the house on April 5 to discuss this matter of freight rates he was lauded by members on both sides of the house and, I think, by all political parties. For instance, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), speaking immediately after the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, had this to say, as reported on page 2625 of Hansard:

I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and while I agree with everything he said, I would point out that, as a result of this decision, no province has been harder hit than British Columbia.

I have not been present during the whole of this debate, but I think British Columbia was just as hard hit on April 13 as it was on April 5, but nothing has been said by the hon. member for New Westminster. However I appreciate that a Liberal caucus was held in the meantime and rumour has it that there was some fairly pointed talk by the leader of the party. Then the senior member for Halifax

(Mr. Isnor), representing the other end of the country, had this to say, as reported on page 2639 of Hansard:

I hope that the motion which was introduced today by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the remarks of the various hon. members, who have presented their views from various angles, will have some effect on the board of transport commissioners. If not, I hope and I believe that it will have some effect on the government in making them realize that this action is not one which is well received in other than the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

It would seem that the senior member for Halifax has changed his mind between April 5 and April 13. I turn over a few pages and I find that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) had something fine to say about the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as reported at page 2652 of Hansard:

I wish to compliment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on his speech this afternoon. I believe that he spoke on behalf of all of us, and in my opinion in all the years I have been in this house I never heard him make a better speech. I am glad to say that he kept partisan politics entirely out of it. I am sure that he spoke for every member from the maritimes and certainly for every member from British Columbia, irrespective of party.

If that was the situation as regards freight rates on April 5, and nothing has happened in the meantime to change the effect of the order of the transport commission on freight rates in British Columbia or the maritime provinces, what is it that has caused this great change of mind? The cause of this great change has been what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) has been trying to put over on this group.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You did not like his speech, did you?

Mr. MacINNIS: I liked it all right, if you could call it a speech, but that is a matter of opinion. He said that C.C.F. members were afraid they might have to go back to the use of the pick. I would tell him that the members in this group are taking exactly the same stand as they took on April 5, and the members who are afraid to go back to the use of the pick are the members opposite who have changed their tune in the meantime.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned, quite fairly, I think, that the lumber and fish produced on the Pacific coast is now sold at a much higher price than previously and it should reasonably carry its fair share of increased freight rates. I want to draw attention to another important commodity which we produce in British Columbia and which is not in the favourable position of lumber or fish; because of market conditions it cannot absorb increased freight rates. I refer to fruit. Grain shipments are exempted from the freight rate increases, and if these increases are to be continued in effect, I think something similar should be done for the fruit industry which, even before this freight rate increase, was facing a serious situation, and the new freight rate increase may mean the difference between carrying on or going out of business for the fruit growers. I have before me a copy of a telegram sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), dated April 10, 1948, signed by J. R. J. Stirling, president of the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association. I want to put this telegram on the record, and I hope that the petition in it will be supported by all the members from British Columbia to whom the fruit industry is of such immense importance. The telegram reads:

Confronted with problem of marketing estimated tree fruit crops largest in the area's history, with rising production costs and curtailed offshore exports, fruit growers of British Columbia are deeply concerned detrimental effect 21 per cent freight increase and non-removal long-standing discriminatory differentials. In light of prospective marketing outlook freight increase will take from this industry an additional million dollars in distributive transportation costs. Therefore this association urgently requests suspension new rates pending completion government's announced investigation.

Here you have an important industry which, even before this freight rate increase, was faced with a most difficult situation, and which, if something is not done to alter the new rates, will have to decide whether to carry on or go out of business altogether.

The railways in Canada are essential to the very life of this country, more so than any other form of transportation, and in order that the railways may operate efficiently I am not only agreed but firmly convinced that they must have adequate revenues. But I am also convinced that that revenue should be raised without discrimination between one section of the country and another. The Minister of Transport, speaking in the house a week ago, referred to the personnel of the transport department and said they were experienced and experts. I agree with that; but in view of the fact that it is accepted by everyone that there is discrimination and that the discrimination has existed for many, many years, I would say that the experts in the transport department are experts in discrimination.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is a very unfair statement for an hon. member to make who pretends to be so fair in his statements in this house.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is an unfair statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what I said.

Mr. MacINNIS: I ask the minister, if his experts know so much about the freight rate structure, and know there has been discrimination, which, indeed, has never been denied, why has the discrimination not been removed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman would only accept the policy of the government, which is to give an opportunity to the provinces to make application to have the discrimination or the inequalities disappear, then perhaps he will get an answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is a beautiful answer—if I will wait for some time perhaps I may get an answer! Perhaps I won't. But even if I do, the answer may not be satisfactory. The discrimination may still continue, and that will simply prove my point, that they are experts in discrimination.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Which is still an unfair statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not an unfair statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is.

On motion of Mr. Bryce the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

PROPOSED REPEAL OF PROVISION PROHIBITING MANUFACTURE, IMPORTATION AND SALE OF BUTTER SUBSTITUTES

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill of which I am moving second reading is a very short and simple one, providing only for the deletion of that clause in the Dairy Industry Act which prohibits the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or other butter substitutes in Canada.

This bill is identical with one which Senator Euler has before the senate and which he has twice previously introduced there. I think I should pay tribute to the valiant work he has already done in this matter.

My own connection with margarine is a simple one. In the last war I served for some time with a squadron in Libya. In our food ration we got either New Zealand butter or British oleomargarine, and unless we saw the tins in which they came we did not know which we were eating—same taste, same colour, same texture.

Last September a group of irate housewives in the industrial portion of my riding complained to me about the shortage of butter. Butter at that time was controlled in price but very short in supply and they asked why there was no margarine to alleviate this shortage. I explained about the ban in the Dairy Industry Act, and how Senator Euler had tried in vain to have it repealed. They thereupon asked me to sponsor a similar bill in the House of Commons. I agreed, and I am now fulfilling that promise.

The origin of oleomargarine dates back to the 1860's. France at that time was afflicted as Canada is today—butter scarce and high in price. In the hope of correcting this condition, Napoleon III offered a prize to the scientist who could develop a cheap synthetic butter, which prize was won by Megez-Mouriez in 1869. He attempted to duplicate the milk secretory process of the cow, using beef fat as a base. In this he failed, but he developed instead a process for making animal fats as soluble, digestible and palatable as the fats in butter, and so developed not synthetic butter but a butter substitute which he named oleomargarine.

The production of this product began immediately in France and shortly afterwards in North America. Almost immediately the dairy industry of the entire continent marshalled their forces against the first real competitor they had ever had, but this is the most significant point about the entire battle which has raged since that time. They did not try to drive this competitor from the field in the honourable way that business has always used, by making their own product better and cheaper. They chose instead a cheap and shoddy way. They turned to legislative bodies for laws banning or hampering and hindering their competitor.

In America, however, the United States supreme court in 1886 ruled that such ban on the manufacture of a legitimate article of commerce was illegal, and so in the United States they had to confine themselves to restrictive legislation, to direct taxation by the federal government and nuisance taxes by the state governments.

Here in Canada, however, the dairy lobby was more successful, for in 1886 it secured a total ban on margarine. A bill was introduced by a private member, and it is interesting to recall that almost all legislation connected with margarine has been initiated by private members. It was a private member, Mr. Taylor of South Leeds, who introduced a bill in the House of Commons to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada. Once he got his bill into the house on second reading, however, he found the temper of members so hostile to oleomargarine that he joyfully amended his own bill, changing the word "regulate" into the phrase, "prohibit the importation, manufacture or sale of oleomargarine or butter substitutes in Canada." The bill carried, and that provision has been in effect in Canada since that time with a lapse of six years after the first war.

Of the greatest significance, however, is the reason given for this action at that time, a reason clearly outlined in the preamble of the bill and also in the subsequent debate in the House of Commons. It was charged that oleomargarine was an impure product which was fraudulently sold as butter. There were probably some pretty good grounds for that allegation at that time. Oleomargarine was an inferior product poorly produced by the packing houses out of inferior oleo fats. The whole packing industry at that time was disgraceful by modern standards and there was no government food inspection. Therefore parliament was probably right, and within its rights, in banning oleomargarine on the ground that it was an impure food fraudulently sold as butter.

However, great improvement was soon made in the manufacture of oleomargarine, and shortly after oleomargarine was accepted everywhere throughout the world, except in Canada, as a pure and wholesome food. Even Canada came round in 1917 when, because of a grave shortage of butter in the dominion, the government of the day authorized by order in council a temporary suspension of the ban in the Dairy Industry Act. This was clear recognition that margarine was then a pure, wholesome food.

During the next six years Canadians manufactured, sold and ate 52,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine without any ill effects. But the dairy forces were not content. Each year they marshalled their forces and brought increasing political pressure to bear upon parliament, and finally in 1923 the ban was reimposed.

To those members who are concerned only with the political implications of oleomargarine, the vote at that time, as recorded in Hansard, is quite interesting. Not a single member of the house who voted against oleomargarine on that occasion is still in this chamber; on the other hand, at least four of the members who spoke and voted for margarine are still gracing the chamber: the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). There were, of course, numerous absentees on that occasion, as no doubt there will be on this.

Mr. PROBE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in parliament at that time. What is his record with respect to the vote on that occasion?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Prime Minister is quite able to speak for himself. Actually he was paired at that time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Hon. members may laugh. Pairs on that occasion did not declare how they would have voted; but the Prime Minister showed clearly how he felt, as any student of Hansard can find out, because in June, 1923, he moved a motion in the House of Commons unique in Canadian parliamentary history. He though leader of the government, moved that a private resolution, standing eleventh on the order paper, favouring oleomargarine be given precedence over all government business the next day, in order to bring it to a vote. He therefore clearly showed his interest in oleomargarine.

To get back to the constitutionality of the ban, great progress was made after the first war in the further improvement of margarine. Experiments had shown that while margarine was the food equivalent of butter, as far as energy and digestibility went, nevertheless children who were fed on butter did grow faster than children fed on oleomargarine. The discovery of vitamins explained the reason for this, and shortly afterwards the development of a process of artificially fortifying food with vitamins brought about the desired result.

Modern margarine is fortified with at least 15,000 units of vitamin A per pound, which is more than the average for good summer butter and greatly in excess of the vitamin content of winter butter. Today, therefore, we find that everyone recognizes that oleomargarine is a pure wholesome food, nutritionally the equivalent of butter. Do not take my word for it. The British and United States governments in official papers, and the British and American medical associations in official journals, so declare. Even better, so far as Canadians are concerned, is the authority of the Canadian Medical Association, who in their official journal, the Canadian Medical Journal, in August, 1947, had an editorial eulogizing oleomargarine, and concluding with this sentence:

From the economic and nutritional aspects, good margarine is superior to butter.

However I will offer one other authority we should all respect, the government of Canada. That government has a Department of National Health and Welfare whose special duty it is to watch over the health of the Canadian people. They put out many good publications, one of the best being "Canadian Nutritional Notes," published especially for the benefit of dieticians in Canada, especially those in hospitals and schools.

In the December, 1947, issue of this splendid publication there appears an excellent article entitled "The Place of Fat in Nutrition." Let me read one paragraph from it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Any reference to the minister.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Let me read:

So far as is known at present good margarine is a complete nutritional substitute for butter in an ordinary diet. Margarine is made from a variety of vegetable fats and oils, and may have added animal fats. As a source of energy margarine and butter are equal for equal fat content. Margarine may be coloured by the same dye as is used for colouring butter. A good margarine contains 16·5 per cent skim milk for flavour and texture, plus minute amounts of glycerin derivative to prevent spattering in frying, and some lecithin to prevent burning and sticking to the pan.

On the back of this excellent booklet appears the familiar signature of Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder how he thrives.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There may be some financial critics of the government, like the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), who will denounce as a scandalous waste of public money the publishing of a bulletin extolling a food which Canadian dieticians cannot buy. I take a broader view. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with his usual perspicacity, is merely anticipating the passage of this bill, and getting proper material into the hands of the public well in advance. If such is the case, I respectfully suggest to him that he start his missionary work much closer to home and give a copy of this excellent bulletin to his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who was reported in the press last month as having told the people of the west that he thought the introduction of margarine would be detrimental to the health of the Canadian people.

Mr. GARDINER: But not on the ground that it was not a good food.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That was the statement in the report. Therefore I submit that this booklet proves beyond question that margarine today is a pure and wholesome food which can stand on its own merits, and therefore the grounds for the original ban have vanished.

The federal government, under the British North America Act, has the power, under customs, to ban or to put heavy duties on the importation of any foreign goods. But nowhere in our constitution is there given any right to the federal government to ban the manufacture and sale within the country of a perfectly proper article of commerce. This I may say was the view of a great Liberal, W. S. Fielding, the great Haligonian, in the 1923 debate. If any authority has that right, then the provinces may have it as a property and civil right. Therefore I submit to the house as my first point that the present ban on margarine, as far as the ban on the manufacture and sale is concerned, is clearly unconstitutional.

My second argument is an economic argument. The present ban on the manufacture and sale of margarine establishes the butter industry as an ironclad monopoly in this country. The butter industry, of course, hotly deny that. They say that, far from being a monopoly, hundreds of creameries and dairies across the country are all busy producing butter, competing with each other and never getting together to fix prices or restrict production. That may be so. Most monopolies and cartels result when manufacturers who could flood the country with their production get together and restrict production and fix prices.

There is, however, no need for the butter industry to do that. The annual production of butter in Canada, as we well know today, is insufficient to meet domestic needs. More than that, the parliament of Canada, by its legislation, has removed from the field the only competitor which could take up the slack and compete in price. Therefore today we find that there is an automatic fixing of the price of butter in this country, which is set by the cost of production of the least efficient producer, the backwoods farmer on the marginal farm who makes his extra cream into dairy butter. As a consequence, the more efficient producers of the country enjoy a gratifying price. However, the real tragedy of this policy is that it results in abnormally high prices to the consumer, with no real benefit to the primary producer, because in winter when the price is high, his cost of production is high.

The speculators who buy surplus butter cheap in summer, store it and sell it at an exorbitant price in winter are the ones who are making money out of butter under the present system. The scandalous evidence of eleven and a half cents a pound profit revealed by the prices committee is shocking support of that contention. I think even more revealing was the callous comment of both the president of Canada Packers and the president of the National Dairy Council, to the effect that there was no point in their organizations taking less profits and reducing the price because butter is in such short supply that their competitors could get the high price anyway.

An hon. MEMBER: Shameful.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, it is shameful. Therefore we have need today of price control on butter. If it were not for that price control, I am quite sure that butter would be close to a dollar a pound.

As a matter of history and as a matter of interest, I looked back over Canadian and British history to see if ever before there had been such a ban on the production of goods within a country. I had to go a long way back. I had to go back to Britain at the turn of the seventeenth century, when the first cotton goods, calicos as they were known then, began to be imported from India. The wool and linen trades immediately raised their hands in holy horror; and, strangely enough, they similarly rushed to parliament in order to have their competitor banned. In 1701 a law was passed banning the importation of calicos. But that was not good enough. They went farther than that, and in 1721, the first year of the Walpole ministry, they banned the importation, manufacture, sale or even the use of cotton goods, in order to leave the field secure for the woollen and linen trades.

The University of Manchester series on cotton, which is in the library, has a most interesting account of the debates at that time. There was no Hansard then, but the arguments used by the proponents of wool and linen have a strangely familiar ring today. They said, of course, that the honest British workingman did not want to be clothed in cheap foreign cottons. They said he wanted to wear good British woollens and good Irish linens. The fact that he could not afford to buy them was immaterial. They said, next, that wool and linen were the cornerstone of British agriculture, and that the competition of these cheap cottons would ruin the British economy.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Their arguments were, of course, shown to be false, and mounting public opinion in the end forced, first of all, a relaxation of the ban in 1736, and in 1760 a complete repeal of that ban. Sixteen years later, Adam Smith, in a lecture to the University of Edinburgh, had this to say about this particular legislation. He called it "a mean and malignant expedient to dam the natural channel of free trade", and he said at that time that its failure was inevitable. I think Adam Smith would have used far stronger language than he did had he thought that 200 years later the parliament of Canada, which apparently has learned nothing from history, would still be resorting to this mean and malignant expedient.

The most striking argument is, of course, the social one. Quite bluntly, there are today in Canada many groups of people who cannot afford to buy butter at seventy-three cents a pound. I am thinking of old age pensioners, war pensioners, people on superannuation and large families with low incomes. But all those people need the soluble fats and vitamins which are found in both butter and margarine. There is another great group in the middle class who can afford to have some butter but not all the butter they need for a balanced diet. To these people the dairy industry of Canada says, in effect: "If you cannot buy butter, you can do without. It is far better for this nation that you should want than that you should have margarine."

This ban is an imposition which is not borne by the whole consuming public in Canada. It is borne only by one group of it, the poor and those in the low income groups. As such it should be regarded by anyone with any social conscience as morally reprehensible. It shows, for example, that we are less humane than that autocrat Napoleon III who at least tried to do something to alleviate the effect of the butter shortage on his poor and his depressed.

A year ago our great sister dominion, South Africa, faced the same problem and embarked on a program of government assistance to margarine. There is an excellent account of this in "Farming in South Africa", an official publication of the department of agriculture of the Union of South Africa, which can be secured from the Department of Agriculture library. In the January issue, which I also commend to the reading of the Minister of Agriculture, there is an interesting article on why South Africa, under conditions similar to our own, with a butter shortage over the year and little domestic supply at the moment of edible oils, turned to margarine. This government report concludes with one paragraph which I think I should put on record. Speaking of margarine, it says:

Its manufacture has been and is still opposed by the dairy interests. These interests do not appear to realize that the national well-being of a people must come before sectional gains. At present there is not enough butter to meet the purchasing power of the nation, let alone its nutritional needs. Even if butter production is expanded to supply the needs of those who can afford it there will always be a very large group of people whose wages will be so low, in relation to the price of butter, that they could not afford it at any price. The manufacture of margarine is intended to fill the present gap between the production of and the demand for butter, and to supply the nutritional needs of the poorly paid groups in order to improve their health and working capacity.

What a splendid stand for our sister dominion to have taken.

Within the last year another aspect has become apparent in the margarine situation, an international aspect brought about by two things, the Geneva trade agreements and the suggested entry of Newfoundland into confederation. The Geneva trade agreements have been rightly heralded, by the democratic world at least, as a tremendous advance in international understanding and a breaking down of the barriers between nations to encourage world commerce and so stimulate world recovery; and none of the nations has so great a stake in this program as Canada, which is so dependent upon world markets. This great agreement was only reached, of course, through important concessions being made by each of the participating nations. One of those conditions is contained in article XI of the general agreement, which provides that there shall be no ban on the importation of any product of any of the signatory nations.

The Canadian experts who were at Geneva appeared before the senate committee last year and said that Canada had fought very hard against this condition because of our margarine situation, but that in the end we had given up and so were pledged to abide by that clause. Further evidence along that line was given in a statement by the leader of the government in the senate last year, which is found at page 34 of senate Hansard, where he said in part:

Under article XI of the general agreement we are bound to remove our ban on the import of oleomargarine. The product is not specifically mentioned, but we have bound ourselves to abstain from prohibitions of that nature.

Almost immediately following this declaration we were informed by a government press release, and I quote

. . . there is nothing in the Geneva agreement, nor is there apt to be anything in the Havana modification, to prevent us putting duties and taxes on the margarine as high as may be felt proper to leave the dairy industry completely undisturbed.

If parliament should follow such a course; if we should agree in principle to the spirit of the agreements and then immediately turn around and by a cynical evasion impose tariffs which are in effect the ban which was just removed, then I say we as a nation are guilty of the most arrant hypocrisy. Further I say that if every other nation takes similar evasive methods to escape the concessions they made, then the Geneva trade agreements will not be worth the paper they are written on. They will be even more worthless, I would say, than our own signature if it is our intention to evade the spirit of the concessions by some technicality. If we intend to abide by these agreements, then I say the only sort of tariff we can in honour place on the importation of margarine is one no higher than that we imposed when margarine was last imported into this country.

The Newfoundland proposals have an equally shocking implication. This sister country, with climate and geography much like our own, had another problem in common with us. They found their butter production was insufficient to meet domestic needs; but they did not stick their heads in the sand like an ostrich. They embarked, after mature considerations, upon the manufacture of margarine, using mainly their own domestic oils; and margarine now sells for roughly half the price of butter there. When they inquired about the conditions under which they might enter confederation, naturally they were most anxious to preserve this right and insisted upon it. The Dominion of Canada, in its turn, agreed; with this provision, however, that margarine manufactured in Newfoundland could not cross the provincial boundaries. This amazing condition strikes at the very economic heart of the pact of confederation. Paragraph 121 of the British North America Act reads:

All articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

The fathers of confederation intended Canada to be one economic unit, not nine Balkan states with customs houses lining every provincial boundary. This provision, therefore, strikes at the very heart of the economic foundation of confederation. It can be achieved only by an amendment to section 121 of the British North America Act. This is an amazing thing. Apparently it is almost impossible to secure amendments to the British North America Act for which the great bulk of the Canadian people long, such as an amendment which will permit contributory old age pensions, an amendment which will permit national health insurance, or an amendment which will permit national control of labour legislation; but apparently no difficulty is anticipated in securing an amendment to the British North America Act which, though shaking confederation, will please the dairy industry.

If such an amendment is obtained it will have to be one of two kinds. Either it will have specifically to mention margarine and the boundaries of Newfoundland, in which case we shall debase our national constitution by the mention of one trivial article of commerce which is singled out for discriminatory treatment, or it will have to be a general amendment permitting other provinces to impose bans. So shortly we may have Ontario banning British Columbia apples, British Columbia banning Alberta coal, Nova Scotia banning Prince Edward Island potatoes, thus breaking down the economic heart of confederation. Such however, is the power of the butter industry in this country.

Now getting away from the principles behind this ban, or rather the lack of principles behind it, let me turn now and look at the various groups involved. Who are against margarine? Just one group: the dairy interests of Canada; and for just one reason: they feel that the sale of margarine will affect their pocketbooks. One reason, a purely selfish one, is behind this ban. They, of course, expand this reason into a much bigger sphere. They say it is more than that. They say the sale of margarine would depress the sale and price of butter. They say butter is the cornerstone of our dairy industry, so that it will depress the dairy industry. Then they say the dairy industry is the cornerstone of our agriculture, so that it will depress agriculture; and agriculture is the cornerstone of Canadian industry, so the eventual result of the lifting of the ban on margarine will be a national depression.

Mr. CASE: That is right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend across the way is quite familiar with ballads and poetry. I say that is exactly the same type of logic which traced the loss of a great battle back to the loss of a horseshoe nail. The same argument, of course, was used by the proponents of the cotton law of the eighteenth century, except that then it was wool and linen which were the cornerstone of British industry. It was used again by the champions of the corn laws in the nineteenth century, though this time grain was the cornerstone. Both predicted national ruin unless those bans were maintained.

History shows how false were their assertions; and history today shows that the assertion of the butter industry that this must ruin Canada is equally false. The history of every other country in the world shows that the introduction of margarine has not debased the dairy industry or agriculture as a whole but has helped the dairy industry. Both countries with butter for export, like New Zealand, Holland or Denmark, and those which like Canada are in short supply, such as Newfoundland, the United Kingdom, the United States, Norway and South Africa, have found this to be so, for all today, with margarine, have healthy dairy industries.

The thing about this that interests me very much is the fact that for years we have witnessed crocodile tears on the part of the dairy industry about the money they lost on butter. They were always losing money on butter. If butter was such a money loser one would think the dairy industry would welcome a chance to get rid of this loss leader by the importation and manufacture of margarine, letting margarine take that loss and leaving the dairy industry free to go into the more lucrative field of the production of milk, ice-cream and cheese.

What is the truth of the matter? The truth is that the sale of oleomargarine in Canada would have very very little effect upon butter sales or butter prices. In the United States, for example, butter sells at about a dollar a pound and margarine at from thirty-five to forty-five cents a pound. The great sale of oleomargarine is to people who today are either not buying butter because they cannot afford it or not buying all the butter they would like.

More than that, the manufacture of oleomargarine is naturally complementary to butter making, since it uses the skim milk which is a by-product of butter. More than that, the dairy industry gains from the oleomargarine manufacture, because there is more oil cake which comes as a by-product of the increased production of vegetable oils which will be necessary. The records of Canada also show that, because between 1917 and 1923, when we had oleomargarine, butter production and consumption in Canada gained each year.

I turn then to their second defence, the argument of protection. I shall deal with that at the close of my speech.

The next argument which we hear so often repeated is that we could not have any oleomargarine anyway because of the international control of edible oils. It is true that edible oil production is controlled today by an international committee, which is expected to expire this year. However, South Africa embarked upon the manufacture of oleomargarine last year under exactly similar circumstances. Our domestic production of vegetable oils can be greatly increased. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) has offered to develop this phase in his speech, and I hope too that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler) will tell the house of his own profitable experience last year in one of the prairie provinces in the growing of oil crops.

There are, too, animal fats—beef fats, hog fats—and the production on the coasts of fish, seal and whale oils to swell the supply. This entire argument can, however, be dismissed as pure sophistry, for if the dairy industry sincerely believed that the removal of the ban would bring no oleomargarine on the market, they would not bother fighting for the retention of this ban.

I turn now to those who are for margarine. First and foremost is, of course, the group corresponding to the dairy interests, those who for their own personal and perhaps selfish reasons would like to engage in the importation and manufacturing of oleomargarine and the primary producers who would sell them the vegetable, animal and fish oils for that manufacture. They say—and their stand is a personal one—that nevertheless they should have the same right to engage in their legitimate industry as has the dairy industry to engage in butter making.

There is a second group, however, a very large group to whom more attention should be paid, who are for oleomargarine. I refer to the very large group of consumers in Canada, those today who cannot find butter to buy, those today who cannot buy all the butter they need, those today who cannot afford to buy butter at seventy-three cents a pound. Their interest, too, might be described as being personal or selfish; although I do not think the word "selfish" could be applied to mothers who are anxious because they cannot supply enough butter for their children.

These are the groups most affected by the present ban on oleomargarine. They are the ones who most want to have it removed. A Canadian women's magazine, Chatelaine, conducted a poll across Canada and found that 80 per cent of the housewives were for the sale of oleomargarine, although many said they would not use it themselves. Sixteen per cent were opposed. In that sixteen per cent were, of course, included wives of butter makers, and also those people who, through ignorance or stupidity, think the removal of the ban would force them to eat oleomargarine.

There is, however, another group in the country, a third group, a powerful group of national bodies and institutions who have no direct or selfish motives, but who feel on moral and social and economic grounds that the present ban should be removed.

First and foremost is the daily press, the greatest organ of public opinion in any free country. From Halifax to Victoria the daily newspapers in every city have thundered against this legislation. In editorials they have described it as evil, iniquitous legislation, a blot on our statute books, and have urged its removal. In all Canada I have seen not a single daily newspaper in its editorial columns champion the retention of the ban. Next to the daily newspapers are the national magazines of Canada: Maclean's, Chatelaine, National and New Liberty. These, too, have castigated this type of legislation.

Then come the great national bodies such as the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Hospitals Association, the Canadian Dietetic Association and the Canadian Welfare Association, comprising all the welfare agencies in Canada. This last named is the most informed on the plight of low-income families. In their fine brief to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) they have pointed out that, in a sample poll in the city of Hamilton, they have found that 55 per cent of the families with net incomes of $2,000 a year or less, had to cut their butter purchases because of high prices.

Across the country are hundreds of smaller public bodies such as city councils—and I have in mind the city of Ottawa—labour councils, women's councils and veterans organizations; yes, and to their credit, some farmers' institutions, which have added their voice. I know of two in British Columbia, namely the Howe Sound Farmers' Institute and the Okanagan Centre Institute.

This great volume of public opinion demand the repeal of this ban. Where are the great national public bodies who, without selfish interest, have advocated the retention of the present ban on oleomargarine? There is none; no, not one.

In conclusion, I wish to conclude by pointing out some of the political implications of oleomargarine. It is said, of course, that margarine is political dynamite, that no political party dare touch it for fear of incurring the hostility of the dairy interests. One rural member told me that, although he had received twenty letters for oleomargarine to every one against, that one against felt more intensely than the other twenty combined. He has, of course, what is called an open mind in the matter. These, however, are matters of political expediency, and great political parties should base their actions on high principles, not on vote-catching expedients.

Let me therefore turn to an examination of the principles of each of the major parties in the house in relation to this ban; and, if I do so unfairly, I shall welcome correction. Let me, first of all, take the Conservative party. One of the great historical principles and practices of that party has been the principle of protection, a perfectly honourable political philosophy which, at various times in our history, has won great support in this country. Its basis is the fact that infant industries in a young country do need a measure of aid so that they can compete with well-established industries in older countries, such aid being given by duties on the importation of products from foreign lands or by an outright ban. The purpose of such a policy is, however, not to stifle industry within the country. Its purpose was to encourage every type of industry within the country.

Thus while the Conservative party, believing in protection, might endorse the ban on the importation of foreign oleomargarine or might support a duty on foreign margarine, it would do so as a measure of encouragement to the manufacture of margarine and butter within the country. I never have understood the Conservative policy of protection to extend to stamping out competitive industry within the country. There is only one place where I have ever heard that practice called protection, and that was in Chicago twenty years ago. Al Capone and his gang used to supply that type of "protection" to businessmen; for a high fee they rub out any rival business in any area by simply eliminating that competition by intimidation and violence. And that is the type of protection which this legislation affords the butter industry.

Mr. CASE: Leave Al Capone out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will tell the hon. member for Grey North, who is a Progressive Conservative that I am right in this view, as shown by Hansard of 1923, where the leaders of the Conservative party of that day the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the Hon. R. J. Manion, who was later a leader, made splendid speeches in this strain and voted for margarine, as did the Conservative party by a 19-13 vote.

I turn next to the C.C.F. party. It is conceivable, to me at least, that in the planned and regimented state they hope one day to govern, their master planning board might order that only one of a variety of similar products should be produced, for economy of production. If such a choice were made, the product chosen would surely be that which, measuring up to the required standards, would be the cheapest and easiest to produce, so that there would be a saving in labour to the producer and a saving in money to the consumer. If that were the case, then certainly margarine would be the obvious choice over butter. The C.C.F. have always held themselves out to be the implacable foes of private monopoly. That should certainly include the butter monopoly. They have always shown real concern over the plight of the poor and those with low incomes, so I cannot see how they can condone such a monopoly which leaves butter short in supply, high in price to the consumer and permits great companies to make exorbitant profits.

I turn now to the Social Credit party. I must confess, as on previous occasions, that I have never been able quite to grasp their financial theories. But this I do know about them. No party in this house has been more vigorous in its championing of private enterprise, meaning by that free competition between business, each striving to produce the best and cheapest product. That being so, they can scarcely condone the stamping out of one industry in this country to provide an unrestricted field for another.

They believe in an economy of abundance as against an economy of scarcity. No one can deny that our present butter economy is one of scarcity. Butter is in short supply and high in price, a condition which can be cured only by the economy of an abundance of margarine.

I now turn to my own party, the Liberal party.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is going to be good.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If there is one party in this house which, as a matter of principle, should fight against this ban, it is the Liberal party. That is because of the reasons embedded in our very origin as a political force. One hundred and fifty years ago there were only two British political parties, the Tories and the Whigs. They differed only in one particular. The one party thought that power should be vested in the king, while the other thought that power should be vested in their own privileged hands.

On the scene began to appear the first reformers and radicals, men who were appalled by the glaring economic inequalities, men who were fighting for social justice, slowly gathering to their ranks progressive thinkers from both the old parties. Their first triumph came in 1832 with the Reform Bill, which brought the voice of the middle class to the councils of the nation. With this accretion of strength they moved on to the great fight against the corn laws led by John Bright and Richard Cobden, men who, in the Biblical phrase, were the glory of their time.

The corn laws had been enacted as a supposed aid to agriculture, imposing an exorbitant tax on the importation of foreign grain. The British farmer could not supply the domestic needs and, as a consequence, he received an extremely high price for his grain, which resulted in raising the price of bread beyond the reach of the workingman. The great Tory and Whig landowners defended this policy by saying it had to be done in order to preserve the national economy, even though millions starved.

Bright led the battle against the corn laws with the great cry that the future British economy depended, not on restriction of trade but on the greatest freedom of trade, not on the starvation of the working people but on cheap food for the common people. He convinced the farmers themselves that they were not gaining by this policy, that the high prices they got were robbed from them by the great landowners and that only misery resulted.

Victory came with the repeal of the corn laws in 1846 and with that victory came a consolidation of Bright's followers into the Liberal party. That was the foundation of the Liberal party. If there are any in this house today who think the Liberal party should not support the fight against this ban, let them think what John Bright would say if he were a member of this house; John Bright, the father of the Liberal party, John Bright who, by his lifelong devotion to high principles and by his moral courage, swung millions into the ranks of the Liberal party, the John Bright who today after one hundred years is still the brightest and clearest star in all the Liberal firmament.

If he were here today he would stand up and denounce this ban with the same fiery denunciations which he used in his fight against the corn laws. The extraordinary thing about it all is that he could use the same speeches which he used against the corn laws, with which he swayed Britain, changing scarcely a word. Liberalism today needs more than high principles; it needs deeds and actions motivated by those principles. Here is an opportunity for such action. Every Liberal who gets up and votes against this ban is, I contend, reaffirming the faith of his fathers.

If there are Liberals who will stand up here and speak and vote for the retention of this special privilege, they too are reaffirming the faith of their fathers, their very distant forefathers who were members of the long dead Whig party, the last political party which believed, not in freedom of trade but in restriction, not in the general good but in special privileges for their friends, not in the plight of the masses but in the special advantages sought by their own classes.

In summation, I submit that the present ban is unconstitutional in law, economically unsound, socially indefensible, morally reprehensible and in opposition to the political principles of every party in this house. It is a ban conceived in a mean and selfish spirit and, like most evil things, it has spawned an ugly brood which we see around us today—exorbitant profits being made on butter by speculators while the poor go without, a butter black market, butter sold at exorbitant prices or as a premium to force the sale of unwanted goods, bad butter sold as No. 1 butter. And there is a hint that two yet uglier progeny are still to come—the deliberate and cynical evasion in spirit of the Geneva agreements and the violation of the pact of confederation; all these things to be borne so that, in the words of a minister of the crown, "the dairy industry may be left undisturbed."

However, this Augean stable needs no Hercules to clean it. All that is necessary is the votes of members of this free parliament to whose high principles and good judgment I now commend this bill.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, as a Liberal member I rise to put on the record a few remarks in opposition to this bill. First I should like to refer to a declaration made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) a few moments ago, that the ban on oleomargarine was put on to protect a selfish group in this nation. I wish to protest against such a statement about the farmers of this country. The farmers of this country do not put money in their own pockets. They put money in the pockets of the people of the cities and food in their mouths.

Since the origin of colonization and agriculture in the different countries of the world, nature has provided for a specific production in each of them. The climatic and geographic conditions, as well as the nature of the soil, have always had a direct influence on the kind of products to be grown.

Rice, tea, coffee and olives would not grow under our Canadian climate. Nobody would encourage the cultivation of bananas, oranges, grapefruits or nuts of any kind in the northern part of the American continent. Our people would not believe their eyes if they suddenly saw hippopotami, elephants, rhinoceroses, giant snakes and monkeys, lions and tigers or other animals of the African jungle, invading our nice St. Lawrence valley, and driving away our peaceful milch cows.

The first settlers of this land and their successors devoted their lives to organizing the dairy industry in Canada. The first milch cows were imported here in 1606. This first experiment did not succeed, but in 1636 other herds of cattle were brought in, and this time cattle raising was definitely established.

At the beginning, herds were so small that they supplied milk only for their owners. But further importations and breeding have been developed to such an extent that in 1946 there were nearly 4,000,000 milch cows in Canada, of which over 1,000,000 were in the province of Quebec.

In 1946 milch cows produced in Canada 16,937,028,000 pounds of milk, which have been used as follows: 325,591,000 pounds of butter; 148,060,000 pounds of cheese; 362,005,000 pounds of concentrated milk; 15,783,000 pounds of ice cream and 4,547,637,000 pounds consumed in its natural state as milk and cream.

Without taking into consideration what is consumed by the farmers, the cash income thus resulting from sales at home and abroad totalled, for the same year, $285,604,000.

Our green and rich pasture growing meadows, valleys and prairies are naturally appropriate for the raising of milch cows which supply milk and meat to the people. Each year part of the livestock is slaughtered for the butcher trade and replaced by better grade cattle, thus improving the quality of cattle. This industry can be largely developed. The raising of cattle and the production of milk can be increased by at least one-third. If we consider that about 15,000,000 acres of new land can be tilled and that more than 10,000 old abandoned farms could be exploited, we may easily arrive at the conclusion that an increase of one-third is not an exaggeration. Is it not easy to believe that with the cultivation of old and new farms, the improvement of the soil and of the cattle, and with new scientific methods of farming we may secure for this country such a surplus of livestock and milk products either for home consumption or for export sales?

Having in mind the amount of money invested in livestock, in buildings and in equipment of all sorts for the maintenance of cattle, and for the production of milk, butter, cheese and evaporated or concentrated milk, we realize that the economy of Canada is intimately linked with the dairy industry and that any policy tending to facilitate the importation or fabrication of oleomargarine would seriously impair our economic structure.

Representing a farming constituency, I am aware of the sacrifices made by our people in modernizing their dairy industry, by improving the quality of their herds of cattle and establishing well equipped butter and cheese factories, many of them managed and operated by co-operatives. Any attempt to bring in an artificial product would surely disrupt the stability of the farming industry in our country, in our province and particularly in our region.

In this post-war period of reconstruction, I do not think artificial methods of production should supersede natural ones. During the war, artificial means were resorted to for supplying the needs of the armed forces and civilians in the devastated areas. Synthetic food has been manufactured to meet a deficiency of natural food. But this was done in extraordinary circumstances, for the supply of people in need, not for those who can have a sufficient production for their maintenance.

In our province, the nature of the soil, the climatic conditions, the farming organization and the necessity of complying with national and international demands, oblige our farmers to stick to the animal industry.

Let us suppose that a synthetic pill could be made to replace bread. What would happen to wheat? Would the wheat growers who contribute so much to our external trade discontinue or decrease their production? Would they grow cotton-seed, soya beans, corn and peanuts instead of wheat? Mr. Speaker, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, before you call it nine o'clock, could I ask my hon. friend a question? Would the hon. member tell me the source of the figures and statistics he quoted?

Mr. MARQUIS: They are from the Department of Agriculture and the Canada Year Book.

Mr. HEON: Would you repeat, please?

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Marquis the debate was adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having been exhausted the house will revert to the business before it at six o'clock.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

EXTENSION OF 1942 ACT TO UNEMPLOYED PERSONS NOT APPLICANTS FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 202, to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Projects the minister may undertake.

Mr. McKAY: The explanatory note says that the amendment will permit training for employment to be provided to unemployed persons in suitable cases. What is meant by "suitable cases"? Is age a factor, and, if so, what age would the minister consider the maximum at which training would not be considered wise?

Mr. MITCHELL: I could not catch my hon. friend's question very well on account of the noise in the chamber, but I think he spoke of age and suitability. The age is sixteen. The suitability is arrived at in each case by the provincial and dominion authorities in co-operation.

Mr. CASE: While no objection can be taken to the desire to train and equip men to meet the problems of life, I should like to make sure that there is no coercion or direction or regimentation intended by any part of this bill but that the men will have the right to decide for themselves whether or not to pursue a certain course. If so, I think it is all to the good. I am constantly trying to fortify myself in the determination not to be a party to the acceptance of any socialist regimentation or planned economy. Will the minister say that there is nothing compulsory in the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is voluntary.

Mr. McKAY: In the last part of the clause it is indicated apparently that persons not insured under the act will be eligible for training for employment. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a correct statement.

Mr. McKAY: Where is the line drawn? How may persons qualify, and who determines the right of the individual to take the training course? A good many people come under the scheme, as we are aware.

Mr. MITCHELL: Over 3,000,000 workers in Canada come within the jurisdiction of unemployment insurance. I gave that figure last night. They must, however, have been gainfully employed, and selection is made by the provinces in co-operation with the dominion authorities.

Mr. McKAY: That is one of the qualifications. They must have been gainfully employed before they qualify.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Does this require provincial participation, as in the case of other forms of vocational training?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. It is all predicated on provincial participation on the basis of a fifty-fifty contribution by the dominion and the provinces, with the exception of the training of soldiers, which is carried 100 per cent by the dominion in training and apprenticeship training.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible, with this amendment, to give training to veterans of the first war, by way of rehabilitation? As pointed out to the Minister of Veterans Affairs the other evening, there is no provision at the present time in the veterans legislation for the rehabilitation of veterans of the first war. Many of these men are now about fifty, and I am informed by officials in Vancouver that they would benefit greatly by receiving training. Will the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act as amended be broad enough to cover these men?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces.

Mr. GREEN: Are the two dominion departments working together with regard to these men—the Department of Labour and the Department of Veterans Affairs? I suggest to both ministers that there is a great deal of work to be done there.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. We work closely with the provinces. The Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Labour co-operate. We have drawn upon our experience over a period of many years, in war training, in the training of mechanics for the army, the navy and the air force, and the purpose has been to avoid duplication by using the experience of our department gained over the years.

Mr. GREEN: There would be no benefits payable to men taking training?

Mr. MITCHELL: The usual allowance is paid civilian trainees.

Mr. GREEN: The usual allowance is paid?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Suppose a particular field is overcrowded and unemployment ensues, is this intended to train men in some other art or skill?

Mr. MITCHELL: We try to train men for employment that is available. It is not much use training a person if you know beforehand that when he has completed the course there will be no employment opportunities for him.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Let us take one trade by way of illustration. Suppose you had an overabundance of bricklayers. I am not suggesting for a moment that it is so; this is merely an illustration. Suppose, however, there is no possibility of men getting work in that trade; rather than have them idle, the purpose of the bill is to train these people for some other art or skill. Is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct.

Mr. KNIGHT: Last year there was drawn to my attention the case of a girl who had never worked in the sense of being employed away from home, though she did work at home where she helped. She made application for entrance into a course, and there was some doubt at that time whether she could be admitted in view of the fact that she had never been gainfully employed. Will the minister comment on that case in the light of the proposed legislation?

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been agreed that where girls work in their homes they should receive training. A girl may stay at home until she is twenty or twenty-five; I will not go any farther than that. I see my hon. friends smiling.

Mr. CASE: The question we are considering is the fitting of unemployed persons for gainful employment. Suggestions have been made—I do not know how true they are—that people who are unemployed and are not specially equipped to earn their living have entered into courses of this kind; yet after they have only partly completed their course the fund, or whatever provision is made for such persons, is exhausted and they cannot complete the course. If an unemployed person decided that he would like to go in for some particular vocation, and you are prepared to fit him for gainful employment, will the provisions of the act ensure such a person going through and not being cut off midway in his course?

Mr. MITCHELL: Provision is made for such persons to complete the course.

Mr. CASE: Thank you.

On the title.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to put certain figures on the record. If there is no objection I can put them on Hansard. One set deals with assistance under the money expended by the dominion and the provinces and the other deals with the number of schools and buildings in the different provinces. These are the figures:

Vocational Schools' Agreement Dominion Capital Allotments

Province	Buildings	Equipment
Prince Edward Island	$ 61,500	$ 20,500
Nova Scotia	378,225	126,075
New Brunswick	324,750	108,250
Quebec	2,354,550	784,850
Ontario	2,273,625	757,875
Manitoba	492,000	164,000
Saskatchewan	643,650	214,550
Alberta	525,150	175,050
British Columbia	446,550	148,850
	$7,500,000	$2,500,000

Vocational Schools Assistance Agreement

Financial assistance given to provincial and municipal vocational schools.

Total 257.

Prince Edward Island	1
Nova Scotia	3
New Brunswick	31
Quebec	55
Ontario	42
Manitoba	3
Saskatchewan	50

Assistance for 107 new vocational school buildings as follows:

Prince Edward Island	1
Nova Scotia	3
New Brunswick	8
Quebec	28
Ontario	11
Manitoba	15
Saskatchewan	29
British Columbia	6

Estimated total payments for new vocational schools up to 1952, dominion $7,780,000, provincial $9,160,000, municipal $13,000,000.

Estimated total payments for capital equipment up to 1952, dominion $2,280,000, provincial $2,600,000, municipal $2,000,000.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Are those the figures for the past year?

Mr. PROBE: Can the minister indicate whether those figures are broken down on the sharing of administration costs with the provinces, or can he give an explanation as to what is done about sharing the cost of administration in respect of training?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is no administration cost in connection with buildings.

Mr. PROBE: I am talking about training. Who pays the administration cost of the training programs? Is that cost divided between the provinces and the dominion?

Mr. MITCHELL: We do not pay administration costs. They pay the costs.

Mr. PROBE: And they do not bill the dominion for a portion?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Have all the provinces indicated that they propose to participate in the extension of the vocational training program?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: I have not been able to obtain a copy of the annual report of the Canadian vocational training section for 1946-47, but I notice from the report of 1945-46 that, in spite of allocation by the dominion of certain sums of money, several of the provinces have not participated by any means to the extent of the allotment made to them. Is there anything in the nature of an allotment in connection with this program?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. The plan naturally did not go into high gear under war conditions. The provinces have taken up their allotments since, in the last twelve months. Those figures will be on the record.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTRIBUTIONS, PROCEDURE, OFFENCES AND PENALTIES

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say, Mr. Speaker, that we over here in this group are quite prepared to allow this bill to be given second reading now, if there is no debate on it. But we would appreciate it if, as soon as we go into committee, the minister would be good enough to move that we rise and report progress. After all, we have had the bill for only a couple of hours, and it is a rather important one.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MITCHELL: I move that the committee now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

Progress reported.

RAILWAY GRADE CROSSING FUND

INCREASE IN AMOUNT TO BE APPROPRIATED FOR NINE YEARS FROM APRIL, 1948

The house resumed from Monday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 201, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Appropriation for highway crossings.

Mr. CASE: I have not a copy of the bill before me. I do not know where it is. Before I would be prepared to accept section 1, I want to ask the minister if this bill has anything to do with the debate that has been in progress for some time in the House of Commons.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has not.

Mr. CASE: That is fine. Thank you.

Mr. CHURCH: I understood that this Bill No. 201 was not to come up tonight, and I left my papers in my office. But I want to point this out to the minister regarding Bill No. 201, to amend the Railway Act. The minister proposes to spend half a million dollars this year. According to the return which he brought down in the house in answer to questions I asked away back last February—and as I say, I have not my papers here—a small amount was spent. These grade crossings are taking a great toll of life in this country at the present time. For the minister to propose such a small amount, only half a million dollars, for all the level crossings in this country is inadequate. It amounts to almost nothing. Ontario did not get anything.

I am sorry I have not the return here, because I was told that the bill was not coming up tonight. I am not objecting to its coming up. I want to say this. We have some of the most dangerous crossings in Canada in our city of Toronto. There is one at Jones avenue in ward I. The railway commission went there and looked into that dangerous crossing, near Riverdale collegiate and some other schools. There was nearly a calamity there. What did they do with the money? After the city started the work and the railway commission had ordered it, they took it away out in the county of York; they built the crossing at Victoria avenue, away out in the county of York.

I want to point out to the minister that a small sum of money like that is inadequate; it will do almost nothing to alleviate the great dangers caused by these various crossings in Canada. A number of people have been killed at these crossings. There should be an amendment to the criminal code to provide a penalty for people who do not stop, look and listen before going over a crossing. There should be a fine.

What have we got? The province of Ontario contributes to railways a large sum of money from the taxes. I wish I had my papers here but I have not. However, a return was brought down, and it showed an amount that is not worth a snap of the fingers when it comes to saving life at these dangerous crossings.

In our city we are assessed one-third of the cost of the Toronto viaduct, although the city had no liability because the municipal roads were through there long before the railway came. But we were assessed something like a third of the cost of it. It was a $40,000,000 work and the city paid one-third of it. We got grade separation which cost the Toronto taxpayers several millions.

This is a very small sum of money, half a million dollars, to be voted for the thousands of grade crossings in this country. When you consider the toll of life at these level crossings, it is an appalling thing. Who orders these grade works? Application has to be made to the board of transport commissioners before an order can be made. Then you have a long inquiry, and all that kind of thing. I venture to say very little will be done about the matter this year.

I should like to hear from the minister as to to the program in view under this Bill No. 201, and how much of this half million dollars will be voted to the various provinces to cope with this great danger. We have several very dangerous crossings in our city but not a cent has been spent on them. Five or six mills on the dollar are paid by the taxpayers of Toronto for purely federal burdens, but we get nothing at all in return; and this is only part of it. It is in Ontario that these railways make a great deal of their money, but we do not get anything back. I should like the minister to say how much has been spent since the start of the war on this grade separation work, by provinces. This amount used to be $200,000; now it is raised to $500,000, but that is nothing at all. We might as well strike out the vote altogether as attempt to solve this problem of grade crossings throughout Canada by the voting of a half million dollars.

In view of the heavy loss of life, it seems to me too bad that we cannot do something to remedy the situation. I should like the minister to tell us what is the policy of the government in connection with the removal of these death traps of grade crossings, and how many were covered in his survey. Then I think he should tell us where the money is to be spent. I believe the committee is entitled to hear something about it. What is the policy of the government; what has been spent, and where?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has asked how much will be voted to the various provinces out of the sums we are discussing this evening. That will depend upon the applications made by public bodies, municipalities and others in the various provinces. The board of transport commissioners does not approve projects by provinces as such, though it is a fact that over the years the provinces have received proportionate amounts from the grade crossing fund.

I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that this is not the only money voted for grade crossing elimination. Many votes have been directed from time to time toward the elimination of grade crossings. The hon. gentleman has asked how much has been spent since the beginning of the war. Unfortunately I have not that figure, but I have the figure as to expenditures for protection at highway crossings since the fund was established in 1909 to the end of January, 1947. During that period of time some $43,975,000 has been spent, of which $11,837,000 was voted out of the grade crossing fund, $15,507,000 was paid by the provinces and municipalities, and $16,431,000 by the railways. The expenditure by provinces was as follows:

Ontario	$5,901,000
British Columbia	774,000
Alberta	393,000
Saskatchewan	639,000
Manitoba	346,000
Quebec	2,737,000
New Brunswick	300,000
Prince Edward Island	22,000

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a word in support of the contention of the hon. member for Broadview that the government should consider making a larger contribution to this fund in order that faster progress may be made in the elimination of grade crossings.

However, my purpose in rising at this moment is to ask the minister whether any provision has yet been made for the elimination of the grade crossings on Talbot avenue between Winnipeg and Transcona. The minister and I have had correspondence concerning this request, which I presented to the minister on behalf of the Elmwood home and school association of Winnipeg, which is particularly interested in the matter. I would point out that this is a busy thoroughfare, connecting as it does the city of Winnipeg with the rather large railway centre of Transcona; and the people in the area concerned are hoping that it will not be too long until this grade crossing is eliminated. In fact there are two grade crossings, one on the Molson cut-off and the other on the East Selkirk branch of the Canadian Pacific railway.

In the course of my correspondence with the minister he indicated that some estimate had been made as to the cost of doing this job, and in his letter of October 3, 1947, he said that in appropriate cases contributions could be made from this fund by the board of transport commissioners up to forty per cent of the actual cost of construction but not exceeding the amount of $100,000 for any one project.

As a supplementary question I should like to ask the minister whether those two provisions, the forty per cent regulation and the $100,000 limit, still stand. My main question is, of course, whether or not consideration is being given to the elimination of the grade crossings to which I have referred.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In reference to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, the answer is yes; namely, that in any project brought to the attention of the board by way of application, the board cannot order to be paid out of the grade crossing fund more than forty per cent of the cost, and in any event the contribution shall not exceed $100,000 for any one project.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that in the act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is in the act. The board may afterward distribute or apportion the remainder of the cost between the applicant and the defendant. For instance, if the applicant is a rural municipality, or as in this case the city of Winnipeg, having regard to all the circumstances the board may apportion the remainder of the cost between the applicant and the railway company.

In the particular case to which the hon. gentleman refers I am not aware that an application has come forward to the board. Unless it does, the board cannot deal with it. I do not remember in detail the letter the hon. gentleman mentions, though I recall having had correspondence with him. In that correspondence I presume I pointed out to him the sections of the Railway Act concerning an application, but if I did not perhaps I should have said to him that unless an application is made to the board there is no power to decide upon its merits.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister whether the board of its own motion, or the minister's department of its own motion, surveys the situation and lines up crossings such as these I have mentioned, which might come up for consideration? If so, can he tell me whether this one is on the list?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The department can indicate to an applicant or to a member who is interested in a particular grade crossing separation that the member or applicant should make an application to the board, but unless the application comes squarely before the board the minister or his officials have no authority to determine that a grade crossing shall disappear.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the department no power to make a survey in this matter, and to tell us the result of such a survey?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no machinery in the department for that. Perhaps what the hon. member has in mind may be that some time ago the board of transport commissioners made a survey of projects which might be given consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was made; but there are many projects of that kind, applications for which have been brought to the attention of the board. And when I say "many" I mean it in that sense; there are a substantial number of them. The board, of course, do that on request. I think at the time the request was made by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, so that there would be on the shelf a list of projects of a public nature upon which certain sums of money might be expended when the need arose. But those are not the same in nature as applications made directly to the board, and would not warrant a payment out of the grade crossing fund, unless a specific application had been made in a particular case. So that to deal with my hon. friend's case I would say that if he is interested in it he should indicate to the city of Winnipeg that, through their solicitor, they should make an application to the board.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand the procedure the minister is outlining. Is the survey to which he has made reference public?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is too bad.

Mr. LENNARD: Several sessions ago the hon. member for Calgary West suggested at some length that it should be made compulsory for vehicles to come to a stop at level crossings and that signs, instead of reading, "Look and listen" should read "Stop, look and listen", and that those signs should appear at all level crossings in Canada. This evening the hon. member for Broadview suggested that that people who did not come to a full stop before crossing at a level crossing should pay fines. Would the minister say whether any progress has been made in this direction?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, much thought has been given to that suggestion by the board of transport commissioners, but they have not seen fit to recommend an amendment to the Railway Act in the terms specified by the hon. member.

Mr. CASE: I do not suppose it is the intention of the minister to attempt in any sense to deal with each individual case. What I am particularly interested in is the increase in the amount to be appropriated for the railway grade crossing fund to $500,000 in each year for nine years from April 1, 1948. In a few moments I shall ask my question based upon the statement I have made.

First of all, however, I should like to frame my questions so that the minister could answer at one time. I understand that the appropriation is not necessary for only government railroads; it has to do with all railway lines in Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. CASE: In the second place, I have no particular objection to the proposed subsection which gives a telegraph or telephone company power to expropriate land required in order to comply with an order of the board made under subsection 6. That is to say, the power of expropriation provides that the company may utilize certain lands for purposes of placing their wires underground. I am anticipating the time when the Bell Telephone Company, or other communications systems, would probably have their lines of communication underground. In the first instance, this may be more costly, but their costs of upkeep would be much less. So I would read into this section—and I wish the minister to clarify it—that the lands that a telegraph or telephone company may expropriate would be for this purpose.

We find in the explanation that subsection 6b enables the board, on application of the municipality or land owner, to permit drainage or the laying of pipes through, along, upon, across or under any telegraph or telephone lines. And it states that the amendment to subsection 7 is required by the new subsection 6b.

Perhaps the minister would clarify in my mind the matter of expropriation of land. He might be inclined to comment on the new subsection 6b, and then answer my final question: How does he arrive at the figure of $500,000 a year for each of nine years? Are representations made to him? Does he budget in anticipation, or how does he arrive at that figure?

Mr. CHEVRIER: To deal with the last question first, there has been paid into the railway grade crossing fund under the Railway Act the sum of $200,000 a year for three ten-year periods since 1909.

Mr. CASE: By whom?

Mr. CHEVRIER: By parliament. Parliament voted $200,000 a year for three periods of ten years. That went on from 1909 until 1939, at which time, because of the war, payments were discontinued. Perhaps I should not say that payments were discontinued; the fact is that they expired in 1939 and parliament did not provide any further appropriation during the war years.

Last year, 1947, the provision was for $200,000 for a period of ten years. One of those payments has been made into the grade crossing fund. But because of the large number of applications now before the board, the board has recommended and the government has agreed with the recommendation, that there be an amendment which would provide that an additional sum of $500,000 be paid annually into the grade crossing fund. So that is why we are asking for the increased amount for nine years, instead of $200,000.

Mr. CASE: It does not have anything to do with any particular railroad?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, not the slightest. I wonder if we might permit the other questions to stand until we reach that part of the bill. We have not yet disposed of the first section.

Mr. CHURCH: I call the attention of the minister to an important departure in the bill before us. In a return filed on February 4, the minister gave some information regarding grade separations throughout Canada. The amounts of money spent on grade separations in Canada is listed by provinces at page 857 of Hansard. In his reply to the question, the minister states:

The board of transport commissioners advise as follows:

Contributions were made from the railway grade crossing fund towards the cost of grade separations as follows:

Order No. 69945, dated December 18, 1947. Overhead bridge over Canadian Pacific railway at Pacific avenue, Fort William, Ont., $94,400.

Order No. 69950, dated December 18, 1947. Pedestrian subway under Canadian Pacific railway at McTavish street, Fort William, Ont., $29,600.

Order No. 69418, dated August 29, 1947. Subway under Quebec Central railway at Sharpe's Crossing, city of Thetford Mines, Quebec, $23,200.

Order 69419, dated August 29, 1947. Subway under Quebec Central railway at Johnson's Crossing (Mooney street), city of Thetford Mines, Quebec, $26,560.

Total amount, $173,760.

There was no contribution toward grade separation in the other provinces.

The next section deals with the consent of the municipality. The city of Toronto paid one-third of the cost to build a viaduct across the waterfront at a cost of some $15,000,000 to the city in order to eliminate level crossings. The city paid one-third and each of the two railways paid one-third. I asked the following question re grade crossing votes for 1947 to which the minister replied as follows:

1. What sums of money have been spent on grade crossings in Toronto city during the year 1947, and where?

2. Are any projects in that city proposed for the elimination of the level crossings at (a) Jones avenue; (b) Greenwood; (c) Woodbine avenue?

Mr. Chevrier: The board of transport commissioners for Canada advise as follows:

1. No contributions were made from the railway grade crossing fund towards crossing protection in the city of Toronto during the year 1947.

2. Applications are before the board for grade separations at (a) Jones avenue (b) Greenwood; (c) Woodbine avenue.

The railway grade crossing fund as provided for in section 262 of the Railway Act is not allocated to any specific city or place except as specifically directed under order of the board of transport commissioners from time to time.

That is all the money they spent on grade separation. I should like to point out one important thing. Suppose this space between the desks was a highway. The railway commission come along and pass an order under this new bill, No. 207. A new state of affairs is proposed for ten years, and I think it starts on a very good day, on April 1, 1948, April Fool's day. That is all it is. They propose to assess the municipality for removal of poles and services when a railway wants to change a right of way and the railways want to enter on or change a line. And along comes the railway commission and assesses them for pole removal. I contend that this is illegal under the Railway Act and under the British North America Act. The city streets often were there before the railway came. Only one city has contributed to this before; that is the city of Toronto which contributed $15,000,000 in connection with the waterfront viaduct matter.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company were given a right of way along the Don river from Leaside right to the waterfront for $600 a year. That was many years ago, long before I was in the council. The Railway Act should be revised every ten years. Just now it is a dead law, as we found out the other day.

I raised this same matter in 1917, 1918 and 1919, the last year the Railway Act was consolidated. We were howled down, Sir Adam Beck and I, before the railway committee in 1917. We proposed that if a railroad came in, along, on, over or under a highway they would have to obtain the consent of the municipality before entering thereon. Railways had first to secure municipal consent. Those proposals of ours were inserted in the Railway Act away back in 1917, 1918 and 1919.

What are they doing now? If poles are removed the municipality will be assessed part of the cost. This vote of half-million dollars is only pin-money and more people will be killed if this bill goes through the house. I am surprised that the government, with such large sums of money to squander all over the seven seas, does not vote more money under this act.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister might well take into consideration a more general policy with respect to the grade crossing fund than has been evolved by the government. This looks to me like a continuation of the piecemeal legislation which was brought down year after year prior to 1939. There does not seem to be much improvement. There does not seem to be much imagination used in connection with the thing which concerns the public; that is, railway crossing accidents and safety measures generally.

This measure in essence attempts to bring the act up to date for several years, but I do not think that is good enough. I should like the minister to take into consideration one or two facts. During the war years a return was made, I believe at the instance of the hon. member for Broadview who has just spoken, which showed that there were more people killed in Canada in highway accidents than had been killed during the war. That seemed to me to be a stunning and appalling situation.

Nowadays we have the condition where highways and railroads intercept and in many instances cause danger traps of the worst order and render the safe passage of either the vehicle or train open to question. At times even the provision of every safety measure known is not sufficient to overcome the difficulty that one finds where certain highways intercept railroad lines.

An application has been made in connection with a grade crossing separation at the south end of my constituency near Port Credit, where No. 10 highway and the Canadian National line from Toronto to Hamilton intercept. At that crossing not only do they have a bell and gates, but there is a watchman in attendance. But even with all that protection, the municipality of Port Credit feels, and I think rightly so, that there should be a grade separation. I have no doubt that when the province and the railway and the board of transport commissioners meet the matter will be given full consideration, and I hope that, after a review of the circumstances, something will be done.

I am sure that nearly every hon. member knows of danger traps in his own constituency which sooner or later will mean the loss of lives of innocent people travelling on the highway. We must remember that the Railway Act was passed many years ago. The conditions which governed in those days were quite different and distinct from the conditions which exist now with regard to highway travel. It is difficult for one to conceive that what existed at that time in the way of necessity for legislation could possibly be applicable in the same fashion today.

This is a paltry sum, $500,000 a year. It would not be enough to take care of one major grade separation in each of the provinces in any one year. That gives one food for thought and should cause the government to consider whether there should not be some more effective means of dealing with this highway menace across the dominion. Nothing strikes the public imagination more than the fatalities that take place at these crossings which are so dangerous to life today, and some speedier method ought to be developed of eliminating at least some of the outstandingly dangerous crossings in the dominion.

[Mr. Graydon.]

I was interested in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in connection with the grade separation which he considered essential in his own city of Winnipeg. That may be so. But in answer to what he had to say, I think we may say this much in favour of the board of transport commissioners, that it does not take very much in the way of a resolution from a municipal council or some other public body to be regarded by the board as an application for a grade separation. I have not found in my experience that it is difficult to get the machinery moving for an inspection at least of the grade separation in question, but that does not mean, of course, that in all cases speedy action will be taken by the board.

In conclusion, I would say that the board of its own motion or the government ought to make a survey of the situation at the earliest possible moment with a view to making a dead set against some of the death traps still abroad on our highways where they intersect the railway right of way and which are haunting the motorists of Canada today. I do not think in this parliament we could spend our money to better advantage than in trying to save the lives of some of our best citizens who from time to time are removed from us in just this way. I commend to the minister that he take into early consideration more effective means of trying to eliminate some of the major causes of these fatalities, past, present and future, in the dominion.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not very familiar with this act or with the amendment and I am seeking information. I have had sufficient experience, however, to make me curious and to feel a sense of responsibility in what I am about to ask. First, does this $500,000 which is being appropriated for the fund each year for the next five years have to be all expended in any one year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has not to be expended in any one year. It depends on the number of applications and on the inspections.

Mr. BENTLEY: Anything left over at the end of the year goes back into the fund and a new appropriation is sought.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. BENTLEY: The village of Herbert, now the town of Herbert, some years ago had a grade crossing just east of the town, which was considered a good enough place at the time, but in view of developments it is felt that it should be moved further east or that a new one should be built. Is it possible for the same place to apply again when new conditions arise?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, the municipality can make a further application.

Mr. BENTLEY: It must be the municipality? A small body of citizens affected would not be considered a proper source from which the application should come?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It need not be the municipality necessarily. Anyone interested may make application, but if they do, the application will be served on the municipality, which in the final analysis will have to pay a portion of the cost and which must be given an opportunity of saying whether they are willing or whether they object.

Mr. BENTLEY: In that case 40 per cent of the cost is paid out of the fund and the other 60 per cent is apportioned by the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The other 60 per cent may be paid by the municipality or by the railway, according to the decision of the board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think we have received sufficient information from the minister as to whether this $500,000 is sufficient. I should like to know how much there is now in the grade crossing fund. I should also like to know how many fatalities and accidents there have been at grade crossings in each of the last three or four years. There is more than one class of persons interested in grade crossings. In addition to motor and other vehicular traffic, there are the passengers on the trains, and one class in particular which has not been considered at all is the railway employees. The anxiety of the engineer and fireman on a train approaching a dangerous crossing must be terrific. The train has to follow the rails and cannot avoid an accident by getting out of the way. I think that $500,000 for grade separation is just a drop in the bucket.

I also think a great deal more could be done in protecting the crossings. I do not think nearly enough warning is given. I know there are signs posted up along the highway, but people get used to them and do not bother about them. You sometimes see signs saying, "Slow down to twenty miles an hour". I do not know whether it is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, but I would ask the minister whether we have power to fix the rate of speed at a railway crossing. I do not know whether you can make them stop or not, but it would be a good thing to have something like that. It is tragic to see the loss of life at railway crossings week after week. There is an exodus of motor traffic every week end from the city of Toronto into the country and you continually hear of people being killed at level crossings. I do not know how the minister values life, but it is said that a young person is worth $30,000 to the state, and at that rate it would not take many fatal accidents for the country to lose more than $500,000 in a year.

The minister should give us more facts. I should like to know what precautions are being taken to prevent these fatalities which are taking place week by week. What is being done to educate the public? It is not simply a matter of having grade separations, overhead bridges, and so on, because in a country the size of Canada it is impossible to eliminate all our grade crossings. A lot more could be done than is being done by the railways themselves, and a lot more done in the way of education of the public.

Take the Bell Telephone Company. On the back of their trucks they have this sign, "This vehicle stops at all railroad crossings." I stop at all railroad crossings, but sometimes one is apt to forget. The other day I saw a letter in the paper, in the form of a warning to a man and his girl who had been driving in a motorcar. It was something to this effect: "You were one second away from eternity, but don't think it was only you for whom we were concerned. You ought to thank heaven you were not killed, because you were not watching; but don't think it was only you we were worrying about. We were worrying as much about ourselves as about you." I should like to have more information from the minister regarding the whole subject.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amount in hand in the railway crossing fund, as of February 6, 1948, was $206,523. The speed at which motorcars may travel when approaching a level crossing is governed by the highway traffic act of the province in which the crossing is situated. Fatalities that have taken place in 1947 or in any other year will be found in the annual report of the board I tabled some weeks ago, and the number of devices for protection, such as wigwags and other mechanical contrivances, which are from time to time ordered by the board of transport commissioners, will also be found in the annual report of the board, which is an extensive document.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I wish to know is whether the board of transport commissioners is getting results. What is it doing in co-operation with the provinces? Has it said to the provinces, You ought to do so and so; you ought to have your speed limit reduced, and so on. Are the fatalities increasing or diminishing? That is the point. The minister says there is only $200,000 or thereabouts in the fund at the present time. With all the work that has to be done across the country, that does not seem like anything at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The board, I am informed, is in constant communication in these matters with the public authority having to do with traffic over provincial highways, be it the department of highways in the province or the public body that acts in lieu of that, and the board has received excellent co-operation from these bodies in the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One word further. I think the general public can look after themselves to a certain extent. They should be able to do so. The people for whom I am speaking particularly are those men in charge of trains, and I think everything that can possibly be done to protect them should be done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I may tell the hon gentleman that annually the government receives representations from railway brotherhoods with reference to amendments to the act. I believe that last year the majority of the amendments brought in were at the suggestion of the brotherhoods. The first section of the bill, having to do with the $500,000, is one which has been approved by the brotherhoods over a period of time.

Mr. GREEN: The question I wish to ask the minister has to do also with railway trainmen. What power has the government or the board of transport commissioners to direct the installation of safety devices? As the minister knows, I showed him the other night a letter from a ladies' auxiliary to one of the lodges of the brotherhood of railroad trainmen, pointing out that there had been within the last seven months, in the Kamloops district in the interior of British Columbia, four slides, two clay slides and two rock slides, in which five trainmen were killed and others injured. The auxiliary requested that directions be given for the installation of automatic blocks and also what is known as slide detector devices. That seems a reasonable suggestion, and I should like to know what power there is to direct the installation of safety devices of this type.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The board of transport commissioners has full powers under the act to direct the installation of safety devices upon application made by the public body affected. In the case my hon. friend refers to, he will remember that the hon. member for Kamloops asked a question to which I replied. I indicated the other evening where he would find that reply.

[Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).]

Mr. GREEN: I have it before me now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The board of transport commissioners is giving careful and active consideration to these accidents in the mountain region. With reference to the block system, so far as the Canadian National is concerned, I am able to say that at the moment it has that very question under consideration.

Mr. GREEN: In the area concerned?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The minister at page 2345 of Hansard said:

> The board of transport commissioners have under study the question of safety devices commonly known as "slide detector fences," with a view to ascertaining their practicability and efficiency.

Has that study been completed, or is there some doubt as to whether these slide detector devices are efficient?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The study referred to in my answer has not yet been completed. One of the officers of the board of transport commissioners has been out there and has made a survey and reported to the board, but the board has not yet made a final decision.

Mr. GREEN: If these devices are found to be efficient, will directions be given for their installation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not able to answer that question because I do not know a great deal about the mechanics of the device. I presume that if they were found to be effective, instructions would be given to install them, because, after all, it is a serious matter.

Mr. GREEN: Does the government exercise any power in connection with these safety devices?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. It is a technical matter which is left entirely to the technical men under the board's jurisdiction.

Mr. GREEN: I would suggest that the minister bring to the attention of the board the fact that there is grave concern about these slides having taken place and about the lack of protective devices in the district.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already done so. I am doing so now. The officer who is at the table is the one who made the survey I referred to a moment ago.

Mr. KNIGHT: In line 15 of section 1, I find the expression "to aid actual construction work for the protection", and so on. I should like to have a definition of "actual". I appeal to the minister's instinct for French, which he uses so eloquently along with English.

Mr. CHEVRIER: So does the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNIGHT: He will know what I am getting at when I refer to the word "actual". Would it be going too far to interpret this as work already initiated? I do not think it can be right as I understand it. This work is initiated by way of agreement between the railway company and the municipality concerned.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not always.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would this be work already started? Am I going too far in that interpretation of the word "actual"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let me say that "actual construction work" means work and construction with reference to the elimination of crossings; not approaches or expropriation and so forth, but that work which actually has to do with the elimination of dangerous crossings. When my hon. friend asks how it is initiated, may I say to him that it is by application to the board. The board may decide that the railway will do a portion of the work, and that the municipality will do a portion; or, as my hon. friend had in mind a moment ago, that the railway will do all the work by agreement with the municipality, the municipality reimbursing the railway for its portion of the work.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is perfectly clear.

Mr. KNOWLES: The words, "actual construction work" do not exclude cost of materials.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. I would think the phrase would include the cost of materials.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is good.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the board of transport commissioners any right or authority to bring to the attention of the municipality the fact that a certain railway crossing must be protected?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Recently in western Ontario, as I think the minister remembers, I believe five people—a father and four children—were wiped out at a railway crossing in Norfolk county. If the municipality in which that crossing is located does not itself soon make application for the protection of the crossing, would the board have authority to call the attention of the municipality to that accident and ascertain whether or not they were going to make any move?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, it would.

Mr. McKAY: I may have missed the minister's reply to this question, because I believe somebody asked it. It is a question pertaining to the average government grant toward the construction of these under and over passes. Can the minister give the figure for, say the last ten years, that would indicate the average cost of construction; that is, the contribution which is made toward that average cost of construction?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I could not give anything other than I gave a moment ago, as to the amount of money which has been spent since the grade crossing fund has been in operation.

Mr. McKAY: You also said that the maximum would be $100,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: For any individual project.

Mr. McKAY: I was trying to get at what the average cost has been.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Unfortunately I have not that information.

On section 2—Consent of municipality.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have been waiting to ask a question. The minister cautioned us not to deal with anything that was not in the particular section being dealt with. He tried to limit us in that way. I want to ask something about this matter. It is a well-known fact that on the waterfronts and on the approaches to the larger and smaller urban centres, for some reason or another these lands seem to have passed into the hands of the railways. The more valuable approaches seem to have passed out of the hands of the municipalities. In these days subdivisions are springing up outside reasonable-sized towns and smaller cities. No more lots are left in these municipalities, and people are going outside the city or town limits seeking a block of land on which they can erect a home. Perhaps that trend has been motivated by the fact that the Veterans Land Act courted that type of thing. It was necessary to get outside the towns and cities.

Railways have been built—and I have certain locations in mind—which consist of single-track lines cutting men's farms in the centre. On one side—perhaps on the far side—a subdivision will spring up. Why is it that in the latter part of this bill there is a definite limitation placed on the land owner? It appears that he is limited before he can do anything to safeguard the school children and others who sometimes cross over the single-track lines—or double-track lines in certain places—that I have in mind. People may be coming to the owner and asking him to sell them two or three acres. It is down to a minimum of two acres now under the Veterans Land Act, where the land is under $500 an acre, and three acres where it is over that amount. That provision causes an increase in population in certain of these areas. Does the owner require to go to the municipality in order to develop something that is in the interest of the protection of the children, delivery men and other people who are travelling across the railway on roads that lead to the area?

Why is it that the land owner is mentioned here in connection with drainage only? I have one particular project in mind. It seems to me that if a land owner has some legitimate purpose in mind, he should be allowed to carry it out. I have in mind one instance where the municipality did not give him any encouragement, but the people kept coming and asking him for these three-acre plots of land. Hazards were being created at four or five spots in the way of level crossings. Yet the land owner is not mentioned here. I am wondering why.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This subsection 6b is designed to come to the assistance of the land owners.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is on drainage.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; or a municipality. It has nothing to do with farm crossings. My hon. friend has in mind the question of a farm crossing, where the railway has to take over in a lump some land of the farmer.

Mr. LOCKHART: No; level crossings that result from new developments.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is nothing in this bill that affects that in any way. Subsection 6b has to do with the right of a municipality or a land owner who desires drainage in the area or in the farm of the land owner.

Mr. LOCKHART: Perhaps I have not made myself clear. Does this bill not cover the protection of level crossings that may be going across any railway?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, it does not. The first section has to do with the payment of a certain amount of money into the railway grade crossing fund for that purpose, but the other sections of the bill have nothing to do with the first section. They are further amendments to the act.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. LOCKHART: To a certain extent they are contingent. I think just a moment ago an hon. member asked a question on a matter in which I am greatly interested. I have been told that the average cost of the elimination of level crossings, either by way of overhead or underneath passes about which the hon. member spoke, ran between $30,000 and $50,000. It would seem to me that the minister's officials could quite easily say whether that is a reasonable amount.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is far more than that.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have been told that the very minimum is from $30,000 to $50,000. How can $500,000 adequately take care of this ever-increasing necessity for overhead or underneath traffic? That is the thing I am concerned about.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when I answered a question this evening. I pointed out that the railway grade crossing fund was not the only one from which payments could be made for this purpose. Over the years about $7,500,000 has been paid into the railway grade crossing fund, whereas some $45,000,000 has been spent in the elimination of grade crossings, which would indicate that protection at these dangerous crossings has been obtained from elsewhere.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am sorry I was not here. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is one source only.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AREAS SURVEYED AS SETTLEMENT OR RIVER LOTS—LANDS IN ELIGIBLE AND INELIGIBLE TOWNSHIPS

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. GARDINER: I made a very full statement last evening on the resolution. I could only repeat it now.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): I think it is generally recognized that this act has brought substantial benefits to the farmers of the western provinces. It has been in force since 1939, and in that period of time the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have been the recipients of payments under the scheme during at least eight years. In recent years the payments under the act have been considerable. According to a return tabled in this house on March 18 in reply to a question I asked, the total expenditures under prairie farm assistance were indicated as being some $16,840,000 for the year 1945-46, over $11,000,000 in 1946-47, and $14,908,000 in 1947-48, up to February 24 of this year.

As we know, most of the expenditures were made in Saskatchewan and Alberta, because of repeated crop failures there. Payments in Saskatchewan in 1945-46 were over $12,000,000. In 1946-47 they were over $9,000,000, and in 1947-48 again were over $12,000,000. In Alberta the amounts were somewhat less. In 1945-46 they were slightly over $4,000,000; in 1946-47 they were $1,839,000, and in 1947-48, slightly over $2,000,000.

It must be borne in mind that, while the greatest expenditures under the act were in Saskatchewan, the greatest deductions in order to service the fund to provide the awards also came from that province. There have been contributions to the fund, if I may call it that, by the federal government as well. This has been necessary on several occasions because deductions from wheat deliveries in western Canada, particularly in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, were inadequate in certain years to meet the payments required under the act. While there have been contributions by the federal government, I think it will be quite generally agreed that this has been a much better way of handling a serious drought situation than the relief which was paid some years back.

While the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been of great benefit to the western farmers, nevertheless several objections have been expressed to its administration. I think the minister is reasonably familiar with some of those objections, because we in this corner of the house have stated them on many occasions. The most common objection I have heard in recent times is that the coverage under the act is inadequate. Many farmers who require assistance are left out of the scheme. Large numbers of farmers feel that payments should be made on the basis of the individual farm unit in areas where crop failure is prevalent on account of drought. Too many farmers, because they are so unfortunate as not to live in the declared area of crop failure, fail to receive awards under the act, despite the fact that in many cases they live just over the section or township line from a neighbour who does receive the bonus. In some cases farmers have had complete crop failure, as occurred in my own district; but because they lived in a non-eligible district they received nothing under the act. On the other hand, farmers in eligible districts who had as much as fifteen bushels to the acre received a bonus. To me this seems grossly unfair. There would not seem to be much fairness about an act which operates in this fashion.

There is a further objection in connection with hail damage. The act should be broadened to include payment of the bonus on an individual farm basis. There is no possibility here of placing a premium on poor farming operations by including this type of damage on an individual farm basis.

Then there are many complaints that the present payments are inadequate. Farm operating costs have gone up substantially since the inception of this act. The payments were never large enough and now, with all costs soaring, they are miserably inadequate. In my opinion, the awards under the act in districts with crop failure or low yield should be at least $5 an acre, with a maximum payment of $1,000 per farm unit rather than the present maximum of $500.

Then, because of climatic differences which result in different frequencies of crop failure, I believe the provinces should be zoned. Northern areas are not so subject to drought as the southern areas, and this is particularly true in Saskatchewan. By zoning the provinces into certain risk areas, with lower deductions in low-risk districts and higher deductions in high-risk regions, the burden of crop failure assistance would be placed on a more equitable basis.

I think some consideration should be given to the grading of wheat. This may seem a far cry from prairie farm assistance, but I think it is closely related. I believe that consideration should be given to the grading of wheat on a protein content basis. If this were done the southern districts of the western provinces—and again I refer particularly to southern Saskatchewan—would receive higher grading for their wheat because of the larger protein content and naturally, of course, better prices. This would more than take care of higher deductions necessary in the higher risk area of southern Saskatchewan.

The bonus is woefully inadequate. If wheat yields are less than four bushels to the acre I think we must assume that it is virtually a crop failure. A payment up to a maximum of $500 per farm unit is certainly insufficient in a case of that kind to cover bare living expenses over the winter months; much less to provide anything for the purchase of seed grain in the spring and fuel for spring operations. It has happened before, and it is now happening again that, because of this situation, many farmers are forced to go to the bank and borrow money to put in their crops. If the farmer again faces a crop failure the next year, it is quite conceivable that he will be placed in such a position of accumulative debt that he will be unable to carry on.

I appeal to the minister to consider payments on an individual basis, an increased bonus, and zoning which would place the operation of the act on a much sounder and more equitable basis.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in agreement with much that was said by the last speaker. While it may be said that the amendments in the bill will improve the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, nevertheless they are of a very minor character. The bill falls far short of what is required in order to put the act on an equitable basis.

Since the passage of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in 1939, many amendments have been made to it. And while, generally speaking, I think it may be said that these amendments have all been to the advantage of farmers, nevertheless many undesirable anomalies still remain in the act. The purpose of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is to give assistance to farmers suffering crop failure due largely to climatic conditions. Yet we find, under the operation of the act, that many farmers suffering total crop failure are not able to get any assistance under the act, while at the same time many other farmers with fairly good crops are able to obtain the drought bonus.

I suggest that it should be a comparably simple matter at least to a very large degree to rectify that undesirable situation. For example, we have suggested time and again that the bonus should be paid on the individual farm unit basis. In the past the minister has invariably opposed that suggestion, on three main grounds. First of all, he has opposed it on the ground that it would encourage the cultivation of marginal lands. Secondly, he has suggested that it would be subsidizing in many cases poor farming; and, thirdly, he has suggested that where you have small units of land which fail to become eligible for the bonus the provinces might very well look after such areas.

Since the minister has in the past made it quite clear that the government will not accept the individual farm unit as a satisfactory basis, I should like to quote a resolution passed at the annual convention of the Alberta Social Credit League last November, dealing with this question. I quote as follows:

> Whereas the Prairie Farm Assistance Act provides that the bonus may be paid on a rectangular block of sections of land having an area of not less than nine sections, one side of which lies alongside the boundary of an eligible township; and
> Whereas this deprives farmers of the benefits of the bonus, where their land lies adjacent to an eligible township, but in a block of less than nine sections; and
> Whereas it deprives farmers of the bonus where their land may be adjacent to an eligible block but outside the rectangle:
> Therefore be it resolved that the federal government be asked to amend section 7(b) of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act so that any area of nine contiguous sections or more shall be eligible for the bonus regardless of whether the area is intersected by a township line, where the average yield is less than ten bushels.

I would say that if the government are not prepared to go even that far, then at least we should adopt the principle within the act that no block of sections of land shall be deprived of the benefits of the act purely on the ground that that block of land is separated from another block by a township line.

Let me explain what I mean. As the situation is at the present time the government will not pay a bonus on an area of less than nine sections of land in a rectangular block. The minister has given the excuse that it would encourage the cultivation of marginal land; and apparently there is some force in that argument. I will admit that there is something in his argument. But how can the minister justify refusing to pay the bonus on a block of land because it is too large, or on even part of a block of land because the total block is too large? For instance, let us consider a block of land six miles by six miles—a township. The bonus can be paid on the thirty-six sections of land. On the other hand, if you have a block of land six miles by seven miles, containing forty-two sections, the bonus can be paid only on part of that block. In that case the minister is not in a position to use the argument that it would be encouraging the cultivation of marginal land if it were paid on the whole of the block.

In those circumstances the minister must then fall back on the argument that, where you have a small piece of land outside a township, it should become the responsibility of the provincial government. I would say that if that principle were adopted there would be a tremendous amount of confusion. We would find a great deal of passing the buck, the province saying that a piece of land is the responsibility of the federal government, and the federal government saying that a piece of land is the responsibility of the provincial government.

Secondly, where would a provincial government get the money to pay that bonus? They are not in the fortunate position of being able to get whatever revenues are required, as is the federal government. I think the chief point to remember is that this is a federal act, and it is, therefore, a federal responsibility. I say that because we must remember that the dry areas of the west were largely opened for settlement by the federal government at a time when the natural resources were under their control. In spite of the fact that they were warned time and again by engineers and surveyors back in the 1800's that certain lands were not suitable for settlement, they allowed farmers to come into those areas and settle. Ever since that time we have had many tragic cases where farmers have found it impossible to make a living because of drought.

For instance, I have in mind the constituency of Acadia, which I represent. I do not believe I am exaggerating when I say that 60 per cent of that constituency is in the semi-permanent drought area, and that over 70 per cent of the population of that district have moved out on account of drought.

There is another way in which the government could help the farmers that are under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and it is this. For instance, in the constituency of Acadia back in 1922 a survey was made in connection with what was known as the William Pearce stock watering project, under which a million and a half acres could have been irrigated. Ever since that time the government has encouraged the people to believe that irrigation would be carried out in that area. Then today there is the Red Deer diversion project, the surveys of which have been completed. Agreement with the province has been reached and everything is ready to go ahead. All that is required is for the federal government to let the contracts and start work on the project. Over half a million acres could be irrigated.

Mr. GARDINER: We are getting a long way from this bill, but I want to say that that statement is not correct.

Mr. QUELCH: What statement?

Mr. GARDINER: That all we have to do is to let the contract. We have not yet the arrangements signed up with the provinces.

Mr. QUELCH: Agreement has been reached with the province of Alberta.

Mr. GARDINER: That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. QUELCH: You said the statement was not correct, but at least agreement has been reached with the province of Alberta. They will be only too glad to sign an agreement with the federal government.

Mr. GARDINER: Agreements have not been reached with the provinces and none of them has been signed. They have not been signed because of Manitoba. However I do not want to discuss that question tonight.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that those agreements have nothing to do with the bill we are considering. I suggest that the hon. member discuss the principle of this bill.

Mr. QUELCH: I only mentioned that fact to show that—

Mr. GARDINER: It is not a fact.

Mr. QUELCH: What is not a fact?

Mr. GARDINER: The statement you made is not a fact.

Mr. QUELCH: You are trying to start the argument over again. I am quite prepared to go on with the argument if Mr. Speaker will allow me. I understand that the province has co-operated with the federal government in every way; but, as the minister himself says, the trouble is that an agreement cannot be reached with Manitoba.

Mr. GARDINER: If we are to discuss this question let us discuss it some time when we can answer the questions. Those statements are not correct.

Mr. QUELCH: Then do not interrupt me any more on that score. The only reason I referred to irrigation was that we realized we have a serious drought problem in that area. That drought problem will continue until such time as we have irrigation. The same thing applies to Saskatchewan. It would relieve the government of paying out a lot of money under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am not suggesting for one minute that it would eliminate the need for the act, but at least it would reduce the amount of money that would have to be paid out.

I take it that the real reason for the failure of the government to be willing to pay the bonus on an individual basis is the increased cost to the federal government. I recall back in 1939 when this act was first introduced. At that time the Hon. Charles Dunning stated that if the act had been in operation during the 1920's he believed that it would have been possible to build up a sufficient reserve to carry on during the poor years. I doubt personally whether that would have been so, but I think we can all agree that there is little chance of the act paying its way from now on. So long as the act remains in force, a certain amount of money will have to be paid out every year in addition to what is obtained under the one per cent levy; that is, unless irrigation is proceeded with.

I suggest that if the matter of cost is holding the government back from paying the bonus on an individual basis—and I think it will continue to hold the government back so long as we continue to operate under our present financial system—we should pay the bonus to all farmers who have a crop failure and stop paying it to those farmers who have a fairly good crop. At the present time section 7(a) of the act provides the means by which the bonus need not be paid to a certain number of farmers who have fairly good crops. It provides that, where you have a block of sections or a quarter of a township or more with an average yield of over fourteen bushels per acre, one side of which is alongside an ineligible township, then that block can be taken out of the township and the bonus not paid.

I should like to see that section eliminated from the act. I call it a vicious section. It results in turning one farmer against another and causing a lot of bad feeling within a township. Where you have a township with an average yield of around, say eight bushels per acre, and the bonus has to be paid on that basis, if in part of that township the yield is less than four bushels, those farmers whose yield is less than four bushels start to agitate that a block of nine sections in another part of the township be taken over if the yield is over fourteen bushels in order to raise the amount of bonus paid to them. I have just had a case of that kind which I drew to the attention of the minister.

There is another reason why I dislike that section. In this case it is because of the way in which the section is administered rather than the section itself. I had a case two years ago where a block of nine sections was taken out with an average yield of over fourteen bushels per acre. But in that block of nine sections there were only six sections which had a high yield. They had yields of over twenty bushels per acre. In order to be able to take the nine sections out, it became necessary to include three sections which had had nearly a total crop failure. But by adding those three sections to the six it still left the average yield over fourteen bushels. I protested at the action, and all the officials could say to me was, "Well, if you will recommend it, we will add another three instead of the three we are taking". If I had suggested that I would have immediately become very unpopular with the farmers in the three sections which I had suggested should be included with the six instead of the other three.

I would suggest that when section 7(a) of the act is brought into force it should be applied only to the land that has had a yield of over fourteen bushels per acre. Officials should not be allowed to include in the block any land on which there has been a total crop failure, as I know was done in one case, or any land with an average yield of less than eight bushels per acre. That is why I think section 7(a) should be repealed.

Where it is desired to stop the payment of the bonus, it should be done on an individual basis. Where a section of land has had a crop of over fourteen bushels to the acre the bonus should be stopped on that section. On the other hand, the bonus should be paid on every section of land that has had a crop failure, whether it is in a block of nine sections or not. It is only in that way that we can ensure that the farmer with a crop failure will get paid. It would ensure that whatever money was paid out would be paid to those with crop failures.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any length on this measure, but in the past two years I have received quite a number of representations from farmers in the southern part of my constituency complaining about the operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Hon. members are no doubt aware that the main purpose of this act is to serve the farming districts in the southern part of the prairie provinces. It was designed particularly to meet farming conditions on the prairies.

In that area the yield per acre is comparatively low and the areas in which failures take place are quite large. But as you go north a different situation develops. Better moisture conditions result in a higher yield and the areas in which failure takes place are much smaller. In the Swan river valley and in the Dauphin area we find that failures are comparatively small and occur in small areas; yet the farmers in those districts pay the same rates under P.F.A.A. as are paid in the southern districts. But the benefits they get from the act in the north are limited indeed. I have personally met a number of farmers who have had a crop failure and who have been unable to get benefits under the act, although they had contributed for a period of years. The farmers in the two areas mentioned are anxious to have amendments brought in whereby any failure which takes place in those areas will be subject to benefits under the act. Those benefits should be paid on the individual crop basis. In some districts there may be only one farmer to suffer a farm crop failure in any one year and they would like to see the act amended to provide that the individual farmer would be entitled to benefits under the act.

A number of them have also expressed the feeling that, since failures in the north are comparatively rare, benefits should also be paid for damage by hail and frost. I am not going to state that this could be included as the act now stands, but it is something to which the Department of Agriculture ought to give consideration, since the amount of money which is collected in these areas is far in excess of the money paid out there.

I am inclined to agree with the suggestion that was made a short time ago, that a zoning system should be devised whereby payments could be made to cover a much smaller area than is now the case.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have some extended remarks to make on this amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I agree with the arguments put forward by previous speakers, and I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) when he said that under present conditions the act does not meet the needs for which it was set up. For that reason I feel that definite changes should be made in the act and its scope be enlarged to make it a comprehensive crop insurance scheme which would be available to those engaged in agriculture all across this country, instead of being confined to giving assistance to the western farmers.

This act was introduced in 1939 for two obvious reasons: first, because parliament and the government of the day saw the need for giving some sort of assistance, or I should say crop insurance, to the prairie provinces, where during many years, particularly in the 1930's, there had been a succession of crop failures through no fault on the part of the farmers but on account of weather and other conditions beyond their control.

I feel that the scope of this legislation does not meet the needs of our Canadian farmers. We have seen agricultural income fluctuate from year to year as much as 200 and 300 per cent, and while the act has been of tremendous assistance to our prairie farmers it does not meet the needs of a crop insurance plan. I would draw to the attention of hon. members that from 1938 to 1940 one-half of our farm operators in the prairie provinces received less than $500 per unit; that is, their income including income in kind was less than $500. So it is clear that in the prairie provinces there is a tremendous fluctuation in farm income, and that reflects itself in the standard of living of our people. The result is that in many sections we have what might be called depressed areas, and this fluctuation in farm income means a lower standard of living also for our merchants and businessmen and jeopardizes their business.

What we need is not just assistance to our prairie farmers but a federal over-all policy of crop insurance, comprehensive in scope and integrated with provincial schemes across the country so that our agriculturists will be assured of income in case of a crop loss. Such an over-all policy would have to have regard, first, to the man on the producer end, so that we would have produced in Canada a maximum of agricultural consumer goods. Secondly, it would have to establish a stable income for our agricultural workers comparable with that of workers in well-established urban industries. Thirdly, it should provide for a maximum production for export. The act in its present scope is so narrow that only in case of a disastrous drought do we get any assistance whatever, and that assistance does not in any way provide adequate help for our farmers in maintaining maximum production.

On motion of Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GREEN: What will be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. CHEVRIER: First, we shall resume the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for committee of supply, with the amendment of the leader of the C.C.F. and the subamendment of the leader of the opposition. I should like to remind the house that we have now spent six days on this debate and we hope, with the co-operation of hon. members, to conclude it tomorrow. Next, the second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which we have been discussing tonight; the second reading of Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will they be taken in that order?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not necessarily, but I hope that will be the order. In any event, the first item of business will be resuming the debate on the motion for committee of supply.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 21, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S)—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF APRIL 21

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in connection with which I wish to refer to an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of this morning. Some fifteen hundred people came here from every corner of Canada to hear the speech made last night by the future prime minister of Canada, Mr. John Bracken. Some of us would have liked to listen to that speech last evening. My point of privilege is that some hon. members on this side made a great sacrifice to come here; and the Journal says the official Progressive Conservative opposition found itself heavily outnumbered. In the first place I believe ten of us were here, not three, as this article states; and though there were some sixty members on the government side of the house, certainly we were not outnumbered. That is all there is to that. I would point to Hansard to show the contribution made from this side last night.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. gentleman has stated his question of privilege.

FURTHER FELICITATIONS ON PERIOD OF TIME AS PRIME MINISTER—GIFT OF FLOWERS

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to say a word with respect to the propriety of certain proceedings which took place at the opening of the session yesterday. Some of us were unable to be present because we were performing duties designed to take care of any eventualities that might develop with respect to the successor to the Prime Minister during the next few months. I want to point out, if I may, that the celebration yesterday was somewhat premature, and I rise at this time to correct that error.

Yesterday the Prime Minister and the late Sir Robert Walpole were still running a close tie, and the overtime had not been played. Today, Mr. Speaker, Sir Robert is only a good second and the Prime Minister an undoubted first. As one who has sat across from him for some little time in this parliament I want to say from the depths of my heart that I wish him the best of health and happiness in the years that lie ahead, and that I am pleased indeed that he has won out after the long and vigorous contest he has carried on.

Mr. J. T. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, the flowers which are in front of the Prime Minister are an expression of the feelings of the members of "Little Chicago" who take great pride in having a leader who has exceeded the record of any other prime minister in the British commonwealth of nations. We are proud to serve under him, and we hope his example during the years past will serve us when it comes our turn to lead in future.

As the member for Ottawa East, however, may I say that my constituency has as its most distinguished elector the Prime Minister of Canada, and I want to tell him that we, the people of Ottawa, are grateful to him for what he has done for this city, and trust he will stay with us for a long time to come.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be here yesterday. I had fully expected that the felicitations to the Prime Minister on having achieved his very fine record would come today; but since this opportunity has been afforded I should like to join the others who have spoken, and to extend to the Prime Minister my very sincere felicitations on this occasion, together with my very best wishes for many years of happiness and good health.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Should I be fortunate enough to come into the house tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I hope I may find that this long-distance contest is really over. I do thank my hon. friends who have so kindly supplemented the words so generously expressed yesterday. I feel deeply grateful to them for what they have been so kind as to say.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

STATEMENT AS TO UNITED STATES SUBSIDIARIES IN CANADA

On the order for motions:

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) asked whether I could tell the house

what amounts of Canadian dollars are being converted into United States dollars by subsidiaries of United States corporations to meet their obligations in the United States. I have been able to obtain the information I think the hon. gentleman desires, and it is as follows:

During the first quarter of 1948 the amounts of United States dollars obtained by subsidiaries of United States corporations in order to make payments by way of interest, principal repayments or dividends to their United States parent corporations were as follows:

Interest	$ 300,000
Principal repayments	nil
Dividends
Subsidiaries 100 per cent owned	13,000,000
Subsidiaries owned 50 per cent to 100 per cent	2,800,000

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister the figures for 1947?

Mr. ABBOTT: Those figures are for the first quarter of 1948; I have not the figures for 1947. As I said yesterday, the question is one which should be placed on the order paper, because it requires the obtaining of figures. I have given this information to my hon. friend today, but I do suggest that in future questions of this kind be placed upon the order paper.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many inmates are confined in each of the federal penitentiaries at present?

2. What steps have been taken by the government to implement the recommendations made in the 1938 report of the royal commission to investigate the penal system?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Kingston, Ontario	Male	715
Kingston, Ontario	Female	71
St. Vincent de Paul, P.Q.		1080
Dorchester, N.B.		512
Manitoba		297
British Columbia		448
Saskatchewan		359
Collin's Bay, Ontario		289
Total		3771

2. The steps taken between 1938 and 1947 to implement the recommendations of the royal commission to investigate the penal system of Canada are set forth in detail at pages 48 to 56 of the annual report of the superintendent of penitentiaries for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, which has been tabled in the House of Commons. Since that date the Penitentiary Act, 1939, as amended, has been proclaimed and the commissioner, deputy commissioners and assistant commissioners therein authorized have been appointed, full-time vocational training has been instituted in two penitentiaries, classification officers have been appointed in all penitentiaries, and the procedure for classification of prisoners has been improved, training courses for penitentiary officers have been instituted, and a reorganization of the educational facilities in the penitentiaries is being carried out. A program of construction and renovation of buildings and replacement of machinery and equipment, as authorized in the annual estimates, is being proceeded with.

[Mr. Abbott.]

FILM BOARD—FILMS MADE FOR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Did any departments of the government ask the national film board to produce films for them (a) during 1947; (b) during January, February, March, 1948?

2. If so, what departments had films made and what were titles of these films?

3. Were all these films produced by the national film board or were some films produced by commercial companies?

4. What films were produced by commercial companies?

5. Did any departments request that films be made by commercial companies?

Mr. WINTERS:

5. Yes.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—NARCOTIC DIVISION

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester):

Has the narcotic division of the Department of National Health and Welfare noted any increase in drug addiction during the past three years?

Mr. MARTIN: There is no certain index of the amount of drug addiction at any time in Canada. However, constant and vigilant attention by the enforcement authorities has resulted in an increasing number of convictions under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, as follows: 1945, 147; 1946, 215; 1947, 265.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—REVENUE—POSTAGE RATES

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What was the over-all surplus of the Post Office Department during each of the years 1945, 1946 and 1947?

2. What revenue was derived form the carrying of parcels overseas during each of the above years?

3. What increases have been made in overseas parcel post rates since 1940?

4. Have any steps been taken to reduce postage rates in Canada and to the United States of America?

Fiscal year 1945-46	10,905,913
Fiscal year 1946-47	8,773,574

2. Postage paid on parcels dispatched from Canada to the United Kingdom, other than for overseas forces, was as follows:

1947	3,967,152

3. There has been no increase in parcel post rates to the United Kingdom since 1940. The rates were, however, reduced effective January 1, 1947 as follows:

	Previous rate	New rate
1 lb.	$ .24	$ .25
2 lb.	.42	.40
3 lb.	.60	.55
4 lb.	.78	.70
5 lb.	.96	.85
6 lb.	1.14	1.00
7 lb.	1.32	1.15
8 lb.	1.50	1.30
9 lb.	1.68	1.45
10 lb.	1.86	1.50
10-15 lb.	2.50	2.00
15-20 lb.	3.00	2.50

4. No.

VALDEZ ISLAND, B.C., INDIAN RESERVES—TIMBER CUTTING

Mr. PEARKES:

1. Have any applications been received during the past two years to lease or cut timber on any of the Indian reserves, or portion thereof, on Valdez island, British Columbia?

2. If so, to whom were such leases or permits granted and to whom refused?

Mr. MacKINNON: 1 and 2. No. One existing timber licence granted in 1942 in favour of T. L. Garner of Duncan, British Columbia, covering part of Lyacksun Indian reserve No. 3 on Valdez Island was renewed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRINTING

Mr. PROBE:

1. What was the total amount of printing let by the government of Canada to commercial printing firms in each province of Canada in each of the past five years?

2. What are the names and addresses of firms receiving in excess of $5,000 for government printing in any or each of the past five years, and what amount was paid to each?

3. What value of government printing is it estimated was used in each of the provinces of Canada in each of the past five years?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

ELECTORAL REPRESENTATIONS—DISTRICT OF MACKENZIE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Did persons not residents of the district of Mackenzie and of Yukon territory petition parliament or the government not to add Mackenzie district to Yukon?

2. Did any residents of Mackenzie district or of Yukon territory ask parliament or the government to add Mackenzie district or any part of Mackenzie district to Yukon as an electoral district; if so, who were those residents, to whom were such requests made and when?

3. Will the government at this session or during the life of this parliament and before the next dominion general election, have legislation introduced so as to create the district of Mackenzie an electoral district and give the electoral district of Mackenzie the right to elect a member to represent it in the House of Commons of Canada?

4. Failing that will the government, at the present session of parliament, introduce legislation so amending the Representation Act, as to remove that portion of the district of Mackenzie added to the electoral district of Yukon-Mackenzie river?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

STENEN, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and memoranda in connection with the appointment of postmaster at Stenen, Saskatchewan, since March 16, 1948.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO POWERS OF APPROVED LENDING INSTITUTIONS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and in particular to authorize approved lending institutions to purchase from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages held by the said corporation and to make loans to owners of rental housing projects not exceeding in amount 85 per cent of the estimated cost thereof; to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee an annual return of an amount to be determined by the corporation of rentals from rental housing projects for a period not exceeding thirty years, to make loans to owners of rental housing projects if such loans are not being made available by approved lending institutions; to authorize the governor in council to transfer lands vested in His Majesty to the corporation; and to make provision for the winding-up and dissolution of Wartime Housing Limited and to vest in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation power to provide rental housing out of moneys which may be appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONTRIBUTORY SUPERANNUATION SCHEME— COMPENSATION FOR INJURY SUSTAINED IN COURSE OF DUTY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to make provision inter alia for a contributory superannuation scheme for future members of the force and present members who elect to come thereunder, and also for the granting of compensation to members suffering injury in the course of duty and pensions to widows and children of members losing life in the performance of duty.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OLEOMARGARINE

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SPONSOR MEASURE TO REPEAL PROHIBITION AGAINST MANUFACTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). In view of the importance of this matter, would it not be fair to private members of the house on all sides, and to others, for the minister to take over the question of oleomargarine as a government measure so that it will not become a party matter and members will be free to vote as they like on it. I would ask for a reply, because this is a matter of public importance.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As the question is now before the house, I suggest that the hon. member's request is not in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) has refused to accept it, may I with your permission have the privilege of presenting to the hon. member for Broadview a pound of margarine?

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I see that a pound of oleomargarine has been imported into Canada. I wonder if the department of the Minister of Justice will take action against the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

An hon. MEMBER: Who says it was imported?

Mr. COLDWELL: He said it was.

Mr. FRASER: And it is supposed to be on the banned list. How did it come to be here? I think I should have an answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My hon. friend uses axle grease, which is the same thing.

Mr. FRASER: I am pleased to have the answer from the hon. member for Fraser Valley, because none of the ministers can answer the question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN GREAT LAKES SHIPPERS AND UNIONS—BROCKINGTON-MCNISH REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Judging from the noise, the Conservatives should have continued their convention in the Chateau instead of here in the house.

May I be permitted to ask a question of the Minister of Labour which arises out of a telegram—

Mr. SINCLAIR: "Which I received before coming into the house".

Mr. GILLIS: You fellows must have been dining with the Tories last night, and it has not worn off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: Careful; you know what Tim Buck says.

Mr. GILLIS: Can the minister inform the house if the commission consisting of Leonard W. Brockington and J. D. McNish have rendered a report regarding the dispute between the Canadian seamen's union and the Canadian lake seamen's union as to which organization is the legal bargaining agency for the Colonial Steamships Limited and the Sarnia Steamships Limited? If so, has their report settled the matter; if not, what steps does the minister propose to take to resolve the dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is true that an unsatisfactory situation has developed on the great lakes owing to the fact that a number of companies on the great lakes have entered into contractual relations with the Canadian lake seamen's union, which is a rival union to the previously recognized, and in some instances, certified, Canadian seamen's union. These companies are refusing to hire members of the Canadian seamen's union, as a result of which the union is claiming that the companies have committed a breach of the existing collective bargaining regulations.

My department, over a period of several months, has laboured diligently to conciliate the dispute between the companies and the Canadian seamen's union; but owing to the attitude taken by the companies, we were unsuccessful. The industrial disputes inquiry commission, which I established about two weeks ago in an endeavour to settle the differences between the Canadian seamen's union and the Sarnia and Colonial steamship companies, reported to me within the last few days. This report was released to the press yesterday. No doubt hon. members have had an opportunity to read the reports which appeared in this morning's newspapers. The commission was composed of Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, K.C., of Ottawa and Mr. J. Douglas McNish, K.C., of Toronto.

I may add this further remark, that the Canadian seamen's union has applied to the national labour relations board for leave to prosecute the companies which they claim are violating the law, and the board has given the union permission to do so. Since court action has already been taken by the union in this connection, it would be improper for me to express any view at the present time as to the merits of the case. The report of the industrial disputes inquiry commission, to which I have already referred, set out the facts of the dispute, and I think it may be advisable to table a copy of the report of this commission, which I now do.

FREIGHT RATES

EFFECT OF INCREASES IN RELATION TO HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have not given notice. In view of the recent increase in freight rates, can the minister assure the house that there will be no increase in the freight rates on grain moving over the Hudson Bay railway?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would have to give some thought to the question, because the application of the railways did not include the Hudson Bay railway, as I recall it—although grain is excluded in the decision of the board. However in view of the fact that I was not given notice of the question, I shall have to look into it and give a reply later.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask a supplementary question? Is all grain moving west of Fort William-Port Arthur exempt from this increase in freight rates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The only answer I can give to the hon. member is to refer him to the judgment, where he will find six or seven items excluding grain moving in various directions.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is, off the main line —transactions between farmers involving branch line transportation are subject to the increase in tax; is that right?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If that was the purport of the question, then the answer is yes.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

SUBSIDIES OR SUBVENTIONS TO INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): I should like to ask the Secretary of State why it has taken so long to bring down the return in answer to the question standing in my name and appearing on page 1605 of Hansard.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I could not hear the subject matter of the hon. members' question, but I shall look it up in Hansard and see when the return can be brought down.

SUPPLY

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASES ORDERED BY TRANSPORT BOARD—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL—SUBAMENDMENT, MR. BRACKEN

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bracken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, this debate started two weeks ago, and while it may be annoying to some hon. members who have already spoken to have to listen to more addresses in this debate, on a subject so important as this I should be lax in my duty to the constituents of Selkirk if I did not raise my voice in protest against the new rates which have been put into effect in the western provinces.

I do not wish to go into the freight rates all across the dominion. Perhaps everything I could say has been said already, but before I deal with the situation as it affects Selkirk I should like to quote from the submission made by Manitoba in opposition to the increase in freight rates. I should like to read extracts from the views of some of our prominent citizens. I will quote first from page 91, where Premier Stuart Garson of Manitoba states:

> The prairie provinces already pay a disproportionate share of the cost of railway operation in Canada.
> The prairies' present prosperity is largely based upon the insatiable markets of war, a consecutive series of bumper crops, and a favourable relationship between costs and prices.
> The war markets are gone, bumper crops cannot continue indefinitely, and the relationship between costs and prices is deteriorating.
> The prairies' present prosperity is not as relevant to the railways' application for a freight rate increase, as are the prairies' basic prospects for future income.
> These prospects are not essentially different from what they were after world war I.

I should like to quote also from page 101, on which appears the submission by Mr. Clifford E. Wood on behalf of the Manitoba federation of agriculture and co-operation, as follows:

> Farmers have a special, vital interest in freight rates. Freight rates are an important factor in determining production costs of the things a farmer sells, and enter largely into the price of the goods he must buy. Once rates are set, they tend to remain fixed, particularly in areas where no effective competition exists. Naturally, farmers view with considerable apprehension any attempt to bring about a permanent increase in their fixed costs of production. The proposed tariff changes, if implemented, will increase the cost of every item the farmer has to purchase (except those manufactured in his own locality), and decrease the net revenue from most of the things which he sells.

Then I should like to quote from page 110, which contains a submission by Mr. F. J. Goodman on behalf of the Manitoba dairy association, as follows:

> We submit that if any increase in freight rates is granted it is likely to be effective for many years. Today no one can tell what will happen to prices of the products of the dairy industry. Normally history repeats itself, and looking back to what happened after the last war we can expect a definite lowering of prices even though this may not be as disastrous as when butter fell from 54 cents to 26½ cents in the course of two months in 1921. We feel that it is completely unreasonable to saddle the producer with higher freight charges over an extended period on the basis of what may be very short-lived prosperity.

The last quotation I should like to make is from page 116, which contains the submission by Mr. John B. Brown on behalf of Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited, as follows:

In view of the fact that any increase in freight rates will be of a more or less permanent character, any consideration of the ability of the farmer to bear any increase must be based on an estimate of his position over the next ten or twenty years. It is submitted that the continuation of a combination of good crops and good prices over this period of time is inconceivable.

I want to return now to my own constituency, which is perhaps one of the largest in Canada, having a population of 67,000. It has 439 miles of single railroad line, perhaps more than in any other constituency. For the information of hon. members who have not been there, I may say that these lines run through what is called the interlake country, which is a mixed farming area. By that I mean that it is diversified farming, and we use the railroads a great deal. Four principal branch railway lines run through the constituency, two operated by the Canadian Pacific and two by the Canadian National. One line runs to Gypsumville, a distance of 173 miles. Another runs to Hodgson, a distance of 105 miles. Then there is a line running to Arborg, a distance of 76 miles and another running to Riverton, a distance of 83 miles. These mileages will show hon. members how necessary the railroads are to the community I represent.

I should like to direct attention to the new dressed poultry rates. A heavy volume of poultry moves out of these districts. Many farmers specialize in the raising of turkeys, and if any hon. member pays me a visit this summer I shall be able to show him farms with over 1,000 turkeys. The old dressed poultry rate from Steep Rock to Winnipeg was 89 cents, and the new rate is $1.08, an increase of 19 cents. From Gypsumville the rate was 93 cents, and the new rate is $1.13, an increase of 20 cents; from Hodgson the old rate was 69 cents, and the new rate is 83 cents, an increase of 14 cents; from Arborg the old rate was 53 cents, and the new rate is 64 cents, an increase of 11 cents; from Riverton the old rate was 53 cents, and the new rate is 64 cents, an increase of 11 cents. Yet we are supposed to be subject to an increase of only 21 per cent.

Let us look at the egg situation. As hon. members know, eggs are moved often to ensure freshness, and because of frequent moving are moved in smaller lots. Here is a comparison of the new rates with the old:

15 Doz. Crates

	Old rate Cents	New rate Cents	Increase Cents
Steep Rock	35	55	20
Gypsumville	35	55	20
Hodgson	35	50	15
Arborg	35	50	15
Riverton	35	50	15

30 Doz. Crates

	Old rate Cents	New rate Cents	Increase Cents
Steep Rock	41	75	34
Gypsumville	41	75	34
Hodgson	39	70	31
Arborg	35	70	35
Riverton	35	70	35

The rates on poultry cover only the 21 per cent increase, but it will be noticed that the new rates on eggs represent an increase of from 80 to 100 per cent, all of which is borne by the producer.

The producers are further penalized when shipments are made to the eastern markets. In this connection may I be permitted to quote from the Winnipeg Citizen of April 17 of this year. Under the heading, "Egg producers bear brunt of freight boost," the article says:

Small quantities of eggs shipped independently to city markets will cost the producer considerably more in freight and express charges since the 21 per cent increase in freight rates came into effect, according to information from W. A. Landreth, general manager of Canadian Poultry Sales.

He told the Citizen Friday that the minimum express charge of 15 dozen crates used to be 35 cents but that this had been increased to 75 cents.

"It used to cost approximately 2⅓ cents per dozen to ship eggs in small quantities by express, and this now is 5 cents per dozen," he said.

"In addition, the railroads used to have a minimum freight charge of 50 cents which now has been advanced to 75 cents," continued Mr. Landreth.

In the majority of cases this additional cost would be borne by the producer, he said, adding that he did not think the increased freight and express charges would be reflected in the price per dozen to the consumer.

While the rates on eggs shipped in Manitoba have increased 80 and in some cases 100 per cent, in Ontario and Quebec the rates on eggs in crate lots remain the same for the simple reason that the railways have to meet truck competition. That makes it very unfair to the prairie provinces. I have made inquiries into the rates on the shipment of eggs in Ontario and Quebec and I have ascertained that the rate today is the same as it was before the 21 per cent increase was granted. I repeat that is very unfair to the prairie provinces, because while we have many trucks in Manitoba operating right through the districts which I have mentioned, when the owners of these trucks are issued licences for public service vehicles by the Manitoba public utility board, it is on the condition that railway rates will be maintained. The railways therefore have no competition and charge the full rate.

> Manitoba truckers, through the Manitoba Auto Transportation Association, plan to ask the provincial government for an increase in truck freight rates to bring rates in line with new railway changes.
> The Tribune learned today that the M.A.T.A. will issue a statement on the matter next week.

No matter how many trucks we have, truck competition should never make any difference in the freight rates because the board in Manitoba insists that the trucks must haul freight at railway rates. It will readily be seen that if these present tariffs are maintained we can expect a decline in the production of poultry products. This will have a serious effect on the mixed farming program, which is essential to the future welfare of the agricultural industry in the constituency of Selkirk.

Something should be said about the rates on bread. I have here a telegram from Lundar, Manitoba, dealing with the bread situation. It reads:

> Bread rate Lundar to Gypsumville, old rate 51 cents per hundred, minimum 35 cents, new rate $1.05, minimum 75 cents. Rates to closer points are comparatively high according to new rate.

Here we have a rate which has risen over 100 per cent, and even the minimum rate, which has been raised from 35 cents to 75 cents, represents an increase of over 100 per cent. These figures make the 21 per cent increase, so-called, look ridiculous because the increases amount in some cases to over 100 per cent instead of 21 per cent. This applies not only to the constituency of Selkirk but also to many other parts of the prairie provinces. I have in my possession bills of lading for shipments of bread by express from Melville to Duff, Saskatchewan, and one of these bills shows the old rate to be 35 cents, while the other shows the new rate as 75 cents for the same weight.

Mr. BRYCE: It is a serious business. In addition, livestock producers in the constituency of Selkirk are hard hit by these new rates, which will have the effect of curtailing the production of cattle, sheep and hogs, which have proved in the past to be such a real asset to the interlake country.

Let us look at the livestock rates on a carload of 20,000 pounds minimum from four points in my constituency. Gypsumville, which is 161 miles from Winnipeg, had an old rate of 21½ cents a hundred pounds. The new rate is 26 cents, an increase of $9 per car. Hodgson is 105 miles and had an old rate of 17½ cents. The new rate is 21 cents, a difference of $7 a car Riverton has the same increase, and so has Arborg. Let us look at the 12,000 pound minimum rate and compare it with the rate in the east. I was not able to get the rates on 12,000 pounds, but I took a lower rate. I took 10,000 pounds, which still gives the east an advantage in my argument. As I said, Gypsumville is 161 miles from Winnipeg, our logical market for shipping our cattle. The old rate was 29½ cents; the new rate is 36 cents, an increase of $7.80 a carload. But for the same distance in eastern Canada, in Ontario and Quebec, the old rate was 20 cents; the new rate is 24 cents. There is a difference of 12 cents between our new rate and the new rate in Ontario and Quebec.

Hodgson is 105 miles from Winnipeg. The old rate was 23 cents; the new rate is 28 cents, an increase of $6 a car. The equivalent rate in the two provinces to which I have referred is 15 cents and 18 cents, a difference of 10 cents between the two sections of the country. The old rate for Riverton was 21½ cents; the new rate is 26 cents, a difference of $5.40 a carload. The equivalent rate for eighty-three miles in Quebec or Ontario is 15 cents old and 18 cents new—18 cents as against 26 cents in the west. Arborg is in the same position as Riverton except that the rate in eastern Canada is 17 cents instead of 18 cents. I do not think that that is fair. I do not want to go into the discrimination angle, since I like to live peaceably with everybody; but there must be some way in which this increase can be equally divided instead of having the western farmer carry the load, all because in eastern traffic the trucker can cut in on the railroads. In the east the railroad sets the rate to meet truck competition, while in Manitoba we are bound to maintain the railroad rates.

The freight rate in the movement of livestock to our central market of Winnipeg is not the entire cost to the producer, because a high percentage of this stock is marketed outside Manitoba, most likely in Montreal or Toronto. Therefore the farmer will now not only pay more freight to Winnipeg, but will take less for his livestock to pay this extra charge, because our Winnipeg prices are based on the eastern markets less the freight rates. With the new freight rates the farmer finds himself squeezed between ever-increasing costs and more or less fixed prices. The farmer is now in the position of having to sell many of his products at set prices and of having to buy at very high prices the goods he needs to farm with. For the farmer there have been steady increases in both the cost of production and the cost of living, and now an increase in freight rates is the unkindest cut of all.

Once railway rates go up, they seldom ever come down, and should farm prices decline I am sure farmers will not forget that not many years ago the freight rates on many products ate up the returns and very little was left for the farmer when his statement came back. The discrimination against the west was very bad before the new rates came into force. From the rates I have quoted it can be readily seen that the west is going to be worse off than ever before. I have shown the house by examples that Ontario and Quebec will still have their old rates on many things, while we in Manitoba are now faced with increases up to a hundred per cent.

In the debate it has been argued that if a member is against the freight rate increase he must be against the railroad workers getting an increase in wages. That is not so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask my hon. friend a question? How does he expect the railroad workers, particularly those on the Canadian National, to get an increase without an increase in freight rates?

Mr. COLDWELL: Give them decent capitalization.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like the minister to have the same patience as I have when I am listening to him, and to wait until I have made my argument; then I shall be only too pleased to explain my views on the matter.

I was pointing out that some hon. members have said that to argue against the freight rate increase is to argue against an increase in wages for railroad workers. That is not so. The increased efficiency of the railways, the improvements in railway transportation that have taken place during the last thirty years is progress the railways can well be proud of. An engine thirty years ago travelled only one divisional point, perhaps a hundred miles or a little more. Now it travels at least three divisions. The engines are bigger and better than they ever were before. Box cars were built thirty years ago to handle 60,000 pounds of freight; today the railroads are building freight cars to carry 80,000 pounds, and in many instances the companies are building cars to carry 100,000 pounds. When I came to this country it was a common sight on the prairies to see freight engines rolling along with fifty cars of grain; today we have engines that can handle a hundred cars of grain. The cars are heavier than ever before. Hon. members can see these things in the central provinces. The engines can haul more than they ever did before. There have been tremendous savings in the operation of the railroad. All this development and improvement must have saved money for the railroad companies and some part of the savings should go to the men who operate them, no matter what branch they work in.

I have not the training necessary to analyse the reports of the railroad companies, but from my experience in railroading I know that they are making good profits. Perhaps I should not make that statement, because I have not the ability to analyse a financial statement and show that they are making a profit, but I know they are, and I think it can be proved by men who are capable of analysing a balance sheet—auditors, chartered accountants, and so on—and show that they are making profits.

Having been a machinist in the Transcona shops, and knowing something of the heavy work, and in many cases particular work, performed by railway workers in all trades, I want to support the demands for increased wages. If that means that the railways will have to secure additional revenues, then ways and means to increase those revenues must be found. But that does not justify that 21 per cent increase in freight rates, for that is an unequal and discriminatory way of doing it and will only take away any increases in wages the workers might get. Let us find a proper basis for getting increased revenues, if they are needed, so that the people of Canada will not have to bear the burden unequally, particularly in the west and in the maritimes; and so that the workers can get the wage increases they deserve.

Mr. F. T. STANFIELD (Colchester-Hants): Today I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for having a bad cold; so I shall make my remarks just as brief as I possibly can.

Mr. GRAYDON: They will be good anyway.

Mr. STANFIELD: I realize that this matter of freight rates is a great question across this whole country of ours and that, politically, it is dynamite. It is of great importance to the railways and to the employees of the railways. It is also a great question to us in the maritimes. This increase will make it a little more difficult for all of us down there, especially for us in Nova Scotia which, at the present time, is having a little difficulty with its internal economic position, in changing back completely to a peacetime economy.

We in the maritime provinces know quite well that the railways need more revenue. There is not any question about that. We maintain that the railways must be kept in a strong position, from both an operative and a financial point of view, all the time. However we object to paying more than our just share of the increase in these rates. The people of the maritimes are, I believe, quite prepared to pay a just share of the increase in revenue needed by the railways. If our rates had been increased by 8 or 10 per cent, I believe that would be just as fair an increase as 21 per cent is for the large central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I will endeavour to point that out clearly in a few words later on. I believe it is a fair statement to make that it costs the people of the maritimes $1 to $1.50 in freight rates as compared with fifty cents to sixty cents in central Canada; that is, Ontario and Quebec. I have reference to rates for the same class and volume of freight received by the consignees in the two regions. Therefore an increase of 21 per cent might easily amount to twenty-five or thirty cents to the people in the province I come from, whereas it would amount to an increase of only ten to fifteen cents in central Canada.

I will just give a few illustrations; I will not quote any figures. Hon. members may look them up if they have any doubts about them. In Sackville, New Brunswick, there are two firms making stoves and metal products. It is necessary for those firms to bring in a great deal of their material from Hamilton, Ontario.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member speak a little more loudly, please?

Mr. STANFIELD: I cannot do so, I am sorry to say, on account of my cold.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then will the hon. member face more this way?

Mr. STANFIELD: Yes. If hon. members will compare the freight rates from Hamilton, Ontario to Sackville, New Brunswick, with the freight rates from Hamilton to Montreal, they will be surprised how much difference they will find. And if they compare the freight rates on the return shipments of these stoves and various enamel products which these concerns make, to Ontario and the western part of the country with the rates on shipments from Montreal, they will be still further surprised. I think my statement will be found to be correct, that the two firms at Sackville have to pay at least 200 per cent more than do firms in Montreal.

The case of the sugar refinery in Saint John may also be mentioned. If they want to get into the Montreal market, they must absorb all the cost of the freight between Saint John and Montreal. Otherwise they cannot sell their sugar there. Therefore any large increase like 21 per cent will mean a great deal to that sugar refinery in normal times.

In the minister's home town of Cornwall is Canadian Cottons, which also has two large mills in New Brunswick. I am sure that the freight cost to its two factories in New Brunswick would be 150 per cent more than the cost of freight moving into the Cornwall plant; and in saying that, I mean for the same volume of freight.

It may be said that we should make all these things ourselves in the maritimes and we would be better off. But we just cannot live within ourselves down there, because of our geographic position and for many other reasons. We must bring things in. Therefore the products we bring in come from long distances. Many of the products we have to sell, such as our potatoes, apples, lumber, et cetera, must be shipped long distances. Therefore the freight rates are heavy on the people of the maritime provinces when compared with the freight rates on the short hauls in the central provinces. These comparisons may not be 100 per cent correct, but they are substantially correct. They certainly show how grossly unfair these increases are to these three little provinces down by the sea. They put them at a further disadvantage in the Canadian economy.

It is my understanding that of the estimated $70,000,000 which these increases will bring to the railways, nearly $45,000,000 will come from the four western provinces and the three maritime provinces. This means that they will certainly be absorbing a little more than their just share. The west do not get any increase on their grain. Having received such consideration as that, they should not have too much complaint. But what exception from the increase do we in the maritimes get for our lumber, our fish, our potatoes or apples or any other of our natural products? Not one five-cent piece! It may be said that on our coal we did not get any great increase; but we did not get any special consideration whatsoever on coal rates. The coal rate was increased by twenty-five cents a ton all over Canada, and we got the same consideration as anyone else on coal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member knows that the increase was twenty cents a ton in the maritimes. The railroads, or at least the Canadian National Railways, did not put into effect the twenty-five cent increase. They put into effect the twenty cent increase per ton.

Mr. STANFIELD: All right.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): We were entitled to 20 per cent off the twenty-five cent increase in freight on coal, as I understand it, under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman's line of thought, but I felt that at that point I should say that the increase is twenty cents, not twenty-five cents.

Mr. STANFIELD: These rates only apply to Diamond Junction. The 20 per cent reduction only applies as far as that point and no farther.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was not referring to the Maritime Freight Rates Act but to the fact that the increase of twenty-five cents a ton on coal was not put into effect by the Canadian National Railways. Instead, they made the increase twenty cents.

Mr. STANFIELD: While I am dealing with the matter of coal I may say that the subsidy on Nova Scotia coal from Glace Bay to Montreal is about $1.35 a ton, while the subsidy on coal moving from Alberta to Toronto is about $2.50, so in comparison it will be seen that we do not get any special consideration as far as coal is concerned.

No doubt the other parts of Canada have many just complaints with respect to discrimination, but I want to deal only with the discrimination that is shown against those three little provinces down by the sea in the judgment handed down by the board of transport commissioners. Members of this board, I am sure, are all honourable and capable men, but it does seem to me they must have forgotten or never heard about the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It is only adding insult to injury to ask such a good and kindly people as those in the maritimes to swallow such a dose of medicine as this discriminatory increase in freight rates. It is all very fine to talk about finding some way to rectify these injustices, but once these rates are put into operation, it is another matter to get rid of them. I want to wish the minister every success in his endeavour to remedy this condition.

In closing, may I add that we do not want anything to do with subsidies. We are not asking for charity or a hand-out. All we want is just consideration in the matter of freight rates, with due regard to our geographical position.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Did I understand from the statement made by the minister that the maritime provinces get 20 per cent off the 21 per cent increase in freight rates, or, in other words, that we are entitled to 20 per cent off the increase of twenty-five cents a ton on coal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Maritime Freight Rates Act, as I understand it, is not affected in any way by the judgment of the board of transport commissioners. But in that judgment the board, over and above the 21 per cent increase, granted the railways an increase of twenty-five cents a ton on coal. My information from the officers of the Canadian National Railways is that they are not putting the twenty-five cents a ton increase into effect in the maritime areas, but that they are going to put into effect an increase of twenty cents a ton, or five cents less than is authorized by the board.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is simply applying the 20 per cent reduction to the increase of twenty-five cents. Are we entitled to 20 per cent off the twenty cent increase?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The house is not in committee.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, owing to a certain indisposition occasioned by a rather heavy bout with the 'flu I have not been present in the house for any length of time during the past two weeks, so unfortunately I have missed the major portion of this debate. But I have followed the record fairly closely. It is not my intention at this late stage of the debate to delay the house for any great length of time, nor do I feel capable of a sustained effort, but I should like to say a few words.

I would not presume to think myself capable of dealing with the intricacies of freight rates. I consider that a technical matter to be dealt with by experts, with decisions to be made by a judicial body. However I wish to place before the house the opinions of my constituents concerning this 21 per cent increase, particularly in view of the discrimination British Columbia has suffered throughout the years. When I say "my constituents" I am speaking for those of all parties because, as far as my constituents are concerned, this is not a political question. It is a bread and butter question affecting every man, whether he be a Conservative, a Liberal, a C.C.F'er or whatnot. As a result there is widespread opposition in British Columbia to the recent increase in freight rates.

I said this was not a partisan question. I believe that has been evidenced by the debate which has taken place so far, and by the fact that from the provinces particularly concerned protests have come from every level, governmental, industrial, commercial, farming and so on. So in considering this matter I think we are dealing with a question affecting all the Canadian people, with which all are concerned regardless of political affiliation.

The protests that have been heard in this house have indicated a widespread opinion that British Columbia, the prairie provinces and the maritimes are suffering definite injustice under the present freight rate structure, and I support the position which has been taken by other members from British Columbia who have protested against this increase. I read with interest the excellent speech of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), in which he briefly outlined the history of this situation as far as British Columbia is concerned.

I also read with great interest the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in introducing this debate. I believe later some of the members on the government side of the house complimented the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on his approach to this question. He covered the ground completely and in a non-political way.

I read the comments of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), and rather enjoyed his salty—or coming from the prairies as he does, should I say alkaline—remarks. We must realize that he does not speak from an academic point of view but as a person who has lived and worked with the farmers, who knows what they feel and think and what they have suffered and do suffer under the present freight rate discrimination. I was very much interested in what he had to say with respect to the over-capitalization of the Canadian National, and agree with his remarks in that regard.

I read with rather less delight the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), who, I am sorry, is not in the house at present. I was disappointed in what he had to say. I noted, however, his statement that the lumber industry could well afford to pay these increased freight rates. In making that statement he took a narrow view because he overlooked the fruit industry in British Columbia, which will suffer a severe handicap as a result of these increases on top of the discriminatory rates in effect. I very much enjoyed reading the speech made by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), because, strangely enough, his argument was one that has been presented by many people in my own constituency. In the course of his remarks the hon. member claimed that the board has power to deal with the question of discrimination at all times. I want to refer to that point briefly, because I do not think it has been dealt with again during this debate in the same way. That is the argument being put forward by many organizations in my riding, and it is also being publicized in the press. I should like to deal with that point for a few moments, because I think the argument is sound. First, I am going to quote from page 2929 of Hansard for April 13, but before doing so I should refer to the remarks of the minister at page 2662:

> There has been a tendency in this debate today to confuse two issues, the one which was the increase recommended by the board of transport commissioners and the other which was the equalization of the rates; or, to use the expression mentioned at various times in the debate, a discrimination in the rates across Canada . . .
> The board in this case was dealing with one specific matter, namely an application . . . to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in freight rates.

That is the end of the minister's statement. Then, on the same date the hon. member for Kindersley said:

> With great respect I say to the minister that I think he was wrong, as I shall try to show in a moment. What he said is, of course, substantially what the board of transport commissioners said in their judgment; and in my opinion the board were also wrong. They held that discrimination was not in issue, and skilfully skated around that point.

May I say I agree completely with those remarks. The hon. member continued:

> This afternoon the minister quoted from the decision of the board something which had some application to the argument I am about to make, but I am going to quote another paragraph from the judgment of the chief commissioner as it is found at page 81 of the mimeographed copy:

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the hon. member like to have an explanation now? He says he would like me to reply to that argument.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Does the minister mean at this time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: When I finish speaking.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, now.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Very well.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As was explained at the time, the distinction between the two is that one was dealing with an application to increase rates and the other is to deal with an application to dispose of inequalities. The application to increase freight rates could not possibly equalize the rates, because there was no such application before the board.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I fully appreciate the minister's argument in that respect, but I agree with the hon. member for Kindersley when he said:

> The application was made under section 325 of the Railway Act, which reads:
> "The board may disallow any tariff or any portion thereof which it considers to be unjust or unreasonable or contrary to any of the provisions of this act, and may require the company within a prescribed time to substitute a draft satisfactory to the board in lieu thereof or may prescribe other tolls in lieu of the tolls so disallowed."

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt again? That is so. The board is authorized to proceed under that section. But the board also must proceed in accordance with the terms of the application made before it. And counsel from the hon. member's province, from Alberta and from other provinces as well, clearly stipulated that this was not an application to do away with discrimination. I did not wish unduly to interrupt the hon. member, but I think in fairness that should be pointed out.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I can see the point of the minister's argument. Then the hon. member for Kindersley quoted from section 314 as follows:

> "All tolls shall always under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, in respect of all traffic of the same description and carried in or upon the like kind of cars or conveyances, passing over the same line or route, be charged equally of all persons and at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage, or otherwise."
> Subsection 2 reads:
> "No reduction or advance in any such rates shall be made either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular person or company travelling upon or using the railroads."
> Subsection 4 reads:
> "No toll shall be charged which unjustly discriminates between different localities."

Therefore I still agree with the hon. member for Kindersley that the question of discrimination is one which is before the board at all times.

May I quote briefly from an editorial in the Trail Daily Times? This newspaper does not by any means support my political philosophy, but sometimes I agree with it. I would say this newspaper, in writing this editorial, is reflecting public opinion in that district. In part it says:

> The charge made repeatedly in the course of the debate, and from the government side as well as the opposition,—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. It is not in order for the hon. member to read articles from sources outside the house reflecting upon a debate taking place in the house at the present time.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I bow to Your Honour's ruling. May I say, however, that the editorial supports my contention and also the belief that the question of discrimination should have been dealt with at first. Had that been done, the increased freight rates would have been accepted with much better grace in this country, if found necessary.

I shall not take much more time, but I say that if we had a government which really supported public ownership and which gave the Canadian National Railways the advantage it has in respect of grade and so on, I believe much of this problem would disappear. And that is a belief held by many people in Canada.

As I said before, the recent increase will be a heavy burden upon the fruit industry of British Columbia. I have been an official of the British Columbia fruit growers' association for some years and have attended many annual conventions, so that I know from experience that the matter of freight rates discrimination is a serious issue with fruit growers. Even at the January conference of that association this year the following resolution was passed:

> Be it resolved that this 1948 B.C.F.G.A. annual convention endorse the action taken by the British Columbia government to have the "mountain freight rate" differential removed, and request the provincial government to continue to press for such removal.

That was in January, prior to the 21 per cent increase. Even at that time this organization considered that the fruit industry was suffering an injustice. Then on top of that injustice we have the increase announced by the board of transport commissioners, which increases the discrimination.

I have lived in British Columbia for over forty years. During all that period of time I have heard about the fight against unfair freight rates, the mountain differential, and the like. But to date, nothing has resulted from years of protest. As I understand, from correspondence I have received, I do not think reasonable people are opposed to increases which are shown to be necessary. We realize that increased operating costs have to be met and that increased wages have to be met. We realize that there is a great demand for new rolling stock and for improved roadbeds. I must say, however, that the people I represent are opposed to the present 21 per cent increase being allowed before an equalization of freight rates is given effect. The people in my constituency maintain that the board of transport commissioners went at this matter backwards. They maintain there should have been first an equalization of rates, and then the consideration as to whether an increase in rates was necessary.

While I realize that the board cannot consider these questions from a political point of view, and that they must approach the problem from the economic point of view, I think this government must consider it in political terms, if confederation is to continue to mean anything. If Canadian unity is to be strengthened, and if it is to mean something worthwhile in days to come, then the unfair rates from which the west and British Columbia have suffered must be removed. At this time the people of British Columbia demand that equalization long delayed be given effect.

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): Mr. Speaker, my first observation should bring applause from all sides of the house: it is that I am going to be very brief. I merely wish to make two corrections, with the necessary trimmings. The first of these is that a few days ago there appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian a front page account of the speech delivered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in the House of Commons with respect to the freight rates increase. In this report it was stated that only one member from the province of Prince Edward Island applauded the minister's remarks or joined in the applause during the minister's speech, and that member was the member for Kings. I felt that it was a compliment to me, although the Ottawa reporter meant it otherwise. That report is incorrect, because I was sitting here and watching the other two members, the hon. Liberal member for Queens (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. Liberal member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) and they both joined in the applause, very enthusiastically.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you have to watch them that closely?

Mr. GRANT: I do not have to, but I happened to see them that time.

Mr. FRASER: I hope you see the point.

Mr. GRANT: When the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) interrupts I am reminded of when I was a little boy. We used to have a billygoat which had a very perverted appetite; he used to eat nails.

I want to say that I am not finding fault with the Charlottetown Guardian, as that paper has been fair to me for some years; although it is a Conservative paper it has been quite fair. However, I think they should check on their Ottawa reporter, because this is not the first falsehood he has sent down to Charlottetown.

Next, I should like to correct a statement made by the Tory member for Queens when he was speaking on this matter. He said that he and other members from the maritimes had received scores of letters and telegrams and telephone calls in opposition to the freight rates increase. I took the trouble to speak to the two Liberal members from Prince Edward Island and I find that neither of them received any letters or telephone calls. I have received no letters or telephone calls, but I did receive two telegrams, one from the board of trade in Charlottetown, and another from the federation of agriculture. I asked other members from the maritimes whether they had received any letters and they said they had not. The Tory member for Queens was simply exaggerating—a thing which he always does for political purposes.

The Tory member for Queens stated his belief that the salaries of the railroad employees should be increased, but he denounced the increase in freight rates, which was simply absurd. He did not tell us, as the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) so aptly said, what way they had done it when they were in power. When they were in power they cut the wages of railroad employees about 20 per cent; they increased the rates and they cut down the service. In my own county of Kings they closed down one railroad line altogether, and they cut the service on another line to two freight trains a week, and the Post Office Department had to establish mail routes over those lines. That is the way they did it when they were in power. The old-time Conservatives who were here between 1930 and 1935 do not want to talk about that as much as my Tory friend from Queens, who seems to forget that he was here also.

I have just been reading an editorial in the Charlottetown Patriot written by the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, who is the present editor, and who was one of the members of the Duncan commission. It is entitled, "Freight rates and common sense".

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRANT: I am not reading the editorial; I am quoting from my own notes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Some hon. members have drawn my attention to the fact that the hon. member for Kings is reading from an editorial which is a commentary upon the present proceedings in the house. If that is so, he should not continue to do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is talking politics.

Mr. GRANT: It is the view of the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, the editor of the Patriot, that the Minister of Transport acted properly in not interfering with the judgment handed down by the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would point out that the hon. member should not read that editorial.

Mr. GRANT: I am not reading, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think we should have some understanding in this debate. When an hon. member gets up and makes a statement, whether he takes it from an editorial or whether he takes it from his own mind, as long as he paraphrases he is perfectly within his rights.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The rule is that an hon. member must express his own opinion. It makes no difference when he is expressing the opinion of some person out of the house whether he reads it or paraphrases it; the rule is that he must express only his own opinion and not read a commentary by someone outside the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is not the rule of the house as I understand it. The effect of your ruling would be that if I were to make a statement in which I quoted a former minister or another individual, I would not be within the rule. Surely that is not the interpretation to put upon the rule.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is not the interpretation that I put on the rule. An hon. member may quote another hon. member of the house, but he may not quote people outside this house who are expressing an opinion of what took place in the house.

Mr. GRANT: My opinion is that the views of the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan are right and that the minister acted wisely in directing the board of transport commissioners to make a wide investigation into the inqualities of the freight rates and correct them where necessary.

I have read the amendment and the subamendment. I think the amendment can be summed up in the one word "procrastination", while the subamendment could be summed up in two words, "more procrastination". For these reasons I intend to vote against the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it seems proper that I should say one or two more things before this debate closes, inasmuch as I said some pretty harsh things the other day regarding the minister's decision to permit the railroads to increase their freight rates 21 per cent. I should like to talk over this problem with the minister heart to heart as Canadians who are both interested in the welfare of this nation. I propose to point out to him several things which may have escaped his attention by reason of the exceedingly busy life he leads, but which probably would modify his views as to how to deal with this vexatious problem.

I tried to be perfectly calm the other day and I want to be calm today and moderate in what I say. However, some strong things need to be said because this problem has been exercising Canadians for generations.

The first important thing which needs to be borne in mind in connection with this problem is one which has already been dealt with to a considerable degree and quite thoroughly by a number of other hon. members—discrimination in freight rates. Nevertheless I propose to repeat some of these things once more so that we can all come to understand the nature of the problem which confronts us, for otherwise we might easily make a decision which we thought was for the welfare of Canada but which might result in its destruction.

We have inequitable freight rates between Montreal, Edmonton and Vancouver. I am going to use Alberta as an illustration of the inequities of the freight rate structure, because I am more familiar with that province and it will illustrate the problems which confront the west as a whole. I wish to say to the members from the maritime provinces that although I do not mention the maritime provinces, I am not unaware of their problems. Indeed I believe their problems with respect to freight rates are quite as glaring and onerous as are the problems of the west, and their complaints are for almost exactly the same reason. I am going to use Alberta as an illustration, as I said, and point out some of the things we suffer from.

We have inequitable freight rates, as has been pointed out by several members previously, in the freight haul from Montreal to Alberta and to British Columbia. May I say, before going farther, that I work with the members from British Columbia and I am not wishing to reflect upon British Columbia in what I say in quoting these rates. The problem which confronts them is the same as that which confronts us. These are merely illustrations of glaring absurdities in the freight rate structure.

You can put 100 pounds of barbed wire on the train at Montreal and ship it to Vancouver for seventy-five cents. But if you take that same 100 pounds of barbed wire off at Edmonton you pay $1.98, which is considerably more than twice as much. Those were the rates before the increase was granted. I do not know why it is so hard to get into the heads of some people in Canada how important these discriminations are, and what a bleeding process they constitute on the people of Alberta as they go on year after year and generation after generation.

A similar thing exists in shipping building paper and roofing. It costs $1.25 per hundredweight to haul it from Montreal to Vancouver, and $1.98 to haul it from Montreal to Edmonton; kalsomine, $1 from Montreal to Vancouver, and $1.33½ to Edmonton; lard, $1 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton; nails, $1.50 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton.

Mr. FRASER: Can you get them to ship nails at all?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have trouble that way too.

Paints and varnishes, $1.25 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton; sewing machines, $2.15 to Vancouver, and $3.03½ to Edmonton; shoes, $2 to Vancouver, and $3.03 to Edmonton; soap in 100-pound lots, $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton; twine, $1.30 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton; window glass, $1 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton; agricultural implements, $1.25 to $1.50 to Vancouver, and $1.79 to $1.98 to Edmonton; canned goods, seventy-five cents to Vancouver, and $1.73 to Edmonton; flannelette blankets, $1.75 to Vancouver, and $4.53½ to Edmonton.

The argument ordinarily advanced, as the minister knows, when we quote these figures is that in taking freight out to Vancouver the railways must compete with water traffic. But it does not matter how much competition the railways have to meet by water around by the Panama canal so far as the cost to the individual Albertan is concerned. The items I have mentioned, wire and so forth, we use in fencing and in carrying on our business and agricultural production—practically everything that goes into our daily life—and these rates constitute a drain which is absolutely unjust, unfair and uneconomic from the point of view of Canada and is one to which we should not be subjected. That is the first important point.

The freight rate structure as it exists at the present time has apparently been deliberately designed to prevent internal trade and development among western provinces. One would hardly believe that a group of men of average intelligence holding office in a country which they hoped to see become great would contrive a scheme which would prevent internal trade among the provinces and within the provinces, but that has apparently been done, and done deliberately. Here are some illustrations.

The freight rate on lumber from Mont Laurier, in the province of Quebec, to Glencoe, Ontario, a distance of 643 miles, pays twenty-three cents per 100 pounds. Lumber from Vancouver to Calgary, a distance of 643 miles, exactly the same distance, pays fifty cents per 100 pounds, or more than twice as much. Will someone tell me why anyone in the Dominion of Canada living in Alberta should have to pay twice as much freight on lumber to build his house or even his pigpen as a person living in Ontario has to pay? If the minister has time I should like to see him figure that out.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That has been stated in the debate already. If you have to ship lumber or any other commodity 2,500 miles or 3,000 miles from the source of supply it goes without saying that the cost of the freight over that distance must be far greater than if it has to travel only 1,000 or 1,500 miles.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sorry that the minister temporarily lost contact with what I was saying. I was telling him about the cost of shipping lumber from Mont Laurier, Quebec, to Glencoe, Ontario, a distance of 643 miles, as compared with the cost of shipping lumber over exactly the same distance, 643 miles, from Vancouver to Calgary From Mont Laurier to Glencoe the cost is twenty-three cents, and from Vancouver to Calgary the cost is fifty cents. The lumber is produced right out there in British Columbia and is used in Alberta just as the lumber produced in Quebec is used in Ontario, and we have just as much right to get British Columbia lumber at a reasonable rate as Ontario people have to get Quebec lumber.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I presume the reason for the difference is the competitive rates that exist in one or other of the areas. But if there is in what my hon. friend says an inequity or a discrimination, it is the object of the order in council, by directing the board of transport commissioners to study the question, to do away with that very thing. Why then is he complaining about what we are doing?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That sounds quite plausible, and I want to be considerate of the minister because he has not been in his department long enough to become accustomed to all these things. But the situation I have mentioned has existed in the Dominion of Canada for years and years, at least fifteen or twenty years, and never has anything been done to rectify it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I may be allowed an interjection, what the hon. gentleman says may be quite true, but it is a fact that over a period of more than twenty years no application has ever been made to the board to do away with discrimination or inequities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Once more the minister's inexperience must be his excuse for lack of knowledge about this matter, because in the "Case for Alberta", which was prepared by the present administration in Alberta in 1937, all these details are carefully enumerated, and a strong but respectful and dignified protest was made to the Rowell-Sirois commission. There was no excuse at all for anyone failing to know—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I tell the hon. gentleman that the Rowell-Sirois commission was not charged specifically with this question of discrimination. It was a matter having to do with dominion-provincial relations. The board of transport commissioners is the only body in this country that can study inequalities in freight rates; and what I am saying, and what I have already said, and what is the fact, is that in the last twenty years no application has been made to the board of transport commissioners by any of the provinces to do away with so-called discriminations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Probably the minister is correct on a technicality. If he is I think he will find that the board of transport commissioners will have a busy time in the next few months, because they will have plenty of applications coming from all over the Dominion of Canada.

I would say that the submission to the Rowell-Sirois commission was certainly a public document and was placed in the hands of the dominion government with the object of having that government read it and be governed thereby.

I go forward with some more of the things which are impeding us in the west. You would think that an evil genius had determined that we should have no chance at all to develop out there. Here is a dominion which possesses resources of the most admirable kind, and a people who are prepared to use these resources, but they are hampered at every turn by inequitable regulations such as the ones to which I am referring, and such have been going on for many years. I myself complained on the floor of the house concerning these matters in the days before the war, although I did not say anything after the war broke out, because I felt that we should keep quiet about these things while we fought the war; but now something must be done.

Here are some more difficulties with respect to lumber. The freight rate from Mont Laurier, Quebec, to Windsor, Ontario, 725 miles, is thirty cents a hundred. From Vancouver to Bassano, 720 miles, it is 52½ cents a hundred. From Mont Laurier to Finch, 243 miles, the rate is 17½ cents a hundred. From Edmonton to Cluny, 245 miles, the rate is 27½ cents.

We now come to fruit. It must be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that although we probably cannot ship fruit from British Columbia to Ontario—we probably might not desire to do so—we should be in a position to use British Columbia fruit in Alberta without let or hindrance from the dominion government or any agency thereof. To ship fruit from Hamilton to Vaudreuil, 355 miles, we have to pay sixty-five cents a hundred; that is in eastern Canada. From Okanagan Landing to Calgary, 358 miles, we have to pay $1.04 a hundred; from Hamilton to Isbister, 453 miles, we have to pay 91½ cents, but from Okanagan Landing to Red Deer, Alberta, 453 miles, exactly the same number of miles, we have to pay $1.41 a hundred.

Let me turn to grain and deal with carload rates on domestic grains. In the east we can ship a hundred pounds of grain a hundred miles for 7½ cents. That figure applies to Ontario and Quebec. But on the prairies we have to pay fifteen cents a hundredweight; in British Columbia we have to pay seventeen cents a hundredweight. The argument may be advanced that British Columbia has mountains. No such argument as that can be advanced for the exorbitant rates which obtain in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba where the country is plains. Why in the world should we not be able to ship grain from northern Alberta, where barley and oats can readily be produced, to southern Alberta where we want to feed it? Why cannot we ship the grain as cheaply as over a similar distance in Ontario and Quebec? It simply does not make sense. Grain over long hauls —we have long hauls in the west—from Fort William to Montreal, 995 miles, costs twenty cents a hundredweight, but from Streamstown, Alberta, to Vancouver, 995 miles, the same distance, the cost is forty-nine cents, or more than twice as much. Evidently it was obvious to the men who first drafted the railway freight rates that Alberta and Saskatchewan would ship their grain west to Vancouver and have a market overseas, so they designed a freight rate structure which would prevent that for all time; we have been suffering under that thing ever since, and we are still suffering from it. Why should that be so? If it did not happen by design it was certainly a remarkable coincidence.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, it did not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am certainly glad to hear that, and I hope to see the board of transport commissioners rectify its blunder at an early date.

Certain freight rates from which we are suffering, Mr. Speaker, have the effect of putting a tariff barrier around Ontario industry. What would you think of a Dominion of Canada, where so many people love to talk about Balkanizing the country because we insist on provincial rights; what would you think of a Dominion of Canada, in which the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, acting through the board of transport commissioners over which they politically are strong enough to exercise control; what would you think of their putting up a tariff barrier that keeps Alberta produce out of Ontario? That has actually been done by freight rates—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Ridiculous.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Here is an illustration. Of course it is ridiculous. We are taking the brunt of it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is ridiculous to make the statement that it has been done designedly by the board. My hon. friend should know that the rates in the east are governed not only by the conditions existing on the railways but also by competition on the water and on the highways, and because of the competitive rates the rates in the east are lower. As the hon. gentleman knows, the railway and shipping committee is now sitting and it has its experts there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly so, Mr. Speaker, but that consideration does not explain the inequity I am talking about. Let me give you the details. To ship 400 boxes of Alberta butter, which is dairy produce, partly processed, from Edmonton to Toronto costs $764.82, exclusive of icing charges. To ship the same weight of partly processed Ontario milk product, namely condensed milk, a slightly longer distance, from Aylmer, Ontario, to Edmonton costs $467.46 which, in this case, means that the freight rates have been designed to put Ontario semi-processed milk products on to the Edmonton, Alberta, market and to shut off Alberta products from the Ontario and the Quebec market; there can be no other explanation of it at all. There is no competition there, none at all; there are no water rates competing; there is no truck rate competing. It is just there as a tariff barrier; that is all.

I have not mentioned many others that could be adduced, but here is an example that is glaring. I do not want to accuse the board of transport commissioners of injustice, but the evidence is so strong that a person cannot possibly escape the conclusion.

Then we have rates on freight that impede the industrial development of Alberta. Here is an example of that. You can ship a beef steer from Edmonton to eastern Canada for $1.14 a hundred, but when you kill the steer and put him in a refrigerator car, making it far easier to ship him, taking much less space and removing all need of caring for him so that it should cost less, you ship him the same distance for $1.88. I will repeat that. To ship a living steer costs $1.14 a hundred; to ship the dead steer costs $1.88 a hundred. What does it mean? It can mean only one thing, namely, that Ontario and Quebec have wanted to have the privilege of killing the steers themselves. Let Alberta raise the steers, then ship them to Ontario and Quebec so that they can be killed and processed there and the offal sold in Ontario and Quebec and the work carried on there. That sort of thing is simply inexcusable. I do not believe that can be justified on any grounds whatsoever. There was evidently a deliberate attempt there to prevent processing in Alberta, and the development of an industry. The same thing, I am sure, would apply to Saskatchewan and the various other western provinces.

Here is a picture unsightly to contemplate. Here is no apparent honest effort on the part of the board of transport commissioners to find revenue for the railways, but rather it appears to be a mean, ugly plot to throttle the economies of the western provinces. It looks like a deep-laid scheme to keep those provinces in economic servitude and to exploit them perpetually for the benefit of Ontario and Quebec. Some people will accuse me, or suspect me, of being sectional. That is absolutely untrue. The people of Alberta are just as loyal to the Canadian flag, Canada and the British commonwealth as are the people anywhere.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment and the subamendment which are under consideration, which deal with freight rates.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to do that. There is no sectionalism whatsoever involved. All we want in the west is a square deal; and it is time both the western provinces and the eastern provinces got a square deal. It is time we started to give them that. It looks as though there had been a design on the part of the eastern provinces, Ontario and Quebec, to keep the population of Alberta and the west from increasing, so that they would be unable to gain political power to force the eastern provinces to give them the rights which they are now denied because they do not have the political power. All the members who come from the four western provinces and the three maritime provinces get outvoted by the people from Ontario and Quebec. As long as that is the case we shall have to submit to just anything that Ontario and Quebec choose to give us.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must again remind the hon. member that he is not discussing freight rates, and that he should confine his remarks to the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope Ontario will remember what I have said, anyway, Mr. Speaker. There are several other matters which tend to make these discriminations against the western provinces bear upon us with particular severity. We have inequities of tariff, on which I do not intend to elaborate, but which show that the four western provinces are being—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is apparently paying no attention to the Speaker's remarks. I have pointed out to the hon. member that he must confine his remarks to the amendment and the subamendment which are under consideration. I must ask him to do so. I hope he will not ignore that request.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that you practically emasculate the speech which I have a perfect right to deliver in this house. But you are in a position to make me bow to your ruling, and I intend to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: Everybody else can wander all over the map.

Mr. LOW: There has been plenty of wandering in this debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the subamendment refers to the request of seven provinces. Surely the remarks of the hon. member, whether we associate ourselves with them or not, are related to the inequalities that certain provinces feel are developing in this country.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The amendment to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) refers, deals only with freight rates. The hon. member for Lethbridge was about to discuss tariffs, and I take it for granted it was the customs tariff to which he was referring. I cannot allow any such discussion at this time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all right, Mr. Speaker. We shall go forward and let the bygones be bygones. But the point is that if the western provinces had not been persecuted and tortured by the sort of treatment they have had from the east in the past for these many years, they would not feel so badly about taking a 21 per cent increase. But under the circumstances it is unbearable; it is the last straw. That is the kind of thing that I was trying to convey to the members of the house. But I have plenty of other things to say. I do not need to say this.

I should like to turn now to the question of the inadequacy, from the point of view of the railroads themselves, of granting this 21 per cent increase. It is my judgment that probably the most unwise thing the government could do at the present time, in the interests of the railways themselves, is to grant this 21 per cent increase. I do not intend to go into detail, but I will say this. If the western provinces and the three eastern provinces have the spirit, courage and independence which I believe they have, they will find ways and means of making this a sorry day for the railroads.

Mr. GRANT: Threats.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the first place, if the western provinces accept this increase of 21 per cent on top of all the suffering they have had up to the present time, it will only help to impoverish them. Ultimately, it will be likely to ruin them. To see the possibility of that, all that is necessary is to look at the 1930 experiences. It will then ultimately ruin Ontario and Quebec which depend, in a large measure, on those provinces for markets. If that happens, of what good will it be for the railroads to have high freight rates when they will have no freight to carry?

It will finally ruin the railroads themselves, in my judgment, because the trucks will take over the business, and the business will gradually decline. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) talked about the province of Manitoba refusing to allow the trucks to underbid the railroads. While I am on that point, I should like to give Manitoba a little bit of kindly advice. It is that they had better alter their ways with respect to that kind of thing, and let their trucks compete with the railroads. Otherwise they will suffer in their own economy.

I am not questioning the value and importance of the railroads, by any manner of means. I know the railroads are necessary in Canada, first of all, to bind the Canadian provinces together in the Canadian union; second, to haul wheat and other commodities which could not very well be hauled those long distances by trucks; and finally, as a defence mechanism. In the case of war or other trouble, it is absolutely essential that we have the railroads there. I realize that, and the people of the western provinces realize that as well as anybody does. So we know perfectly well that the railroads must have support.

We know, too, that the railroads are labouring under serious handicaps, and it is well that the members of the house and the people in the country as well as the members of the government should be aware of that fact. There are great reaches of difficult or unproductive territory—mountains and prairies—where there is a scarcity of population, over which the railroads have to travel. We know that. What we cannot see is why it should be taken out of us. We will grant that there are great areas like the one between Ontario and Manitoba. We will grant that there are long reaches of prairies where there are few towns, and the people are scattered. But why should we westerners have to pay the shot just because that situation exists? We will grant that motor transport is cutting into the revenues of the railroads at an alarming rate, and will continue to do so to a more and more serious degree. We will grant that aeroplane transport is being developed in the Dominion of Canada and ultimately that will take the cream off the railroads' business. We will grant that there is water transport competition.

We will grant that there are increasing costs in the conduct of the railroads. We will grant that there are increasing demands on the railroads. For example, as all hon. members know, it is extremely difficult for the railroads to sell their upper berths. Everybody wants a lower berth. That simply increases the costs of the railroads. That is just a little illustration. We will grant that all these things exist. We will remember air-conditioning and all the other things which the railroads have to introduce in order to make themselves better. We will grant that all these increase costs. We know the handicaps which the railroads are under. I am not complaining against the request of the railroads for additional consideration. There is obvious need of financial assistance under the circumstances. I realize that.

But the important question is, where is the money to come from? We do not believe all the money should come from the four western provinces and the three eastern provinces. We do not believe we should get all the money through increased freight rates; and I am quite sure that, in the course of the years, it will be discovered that this is simply not a sound way to get the money.

I would suggest to the government several measures. Why not remove the sales tax on all the materials used by the railways, thereby greatly decreasing their cost of operation? Why not reduce the capitalization of the Canadian National, a suggestion which has been made several times in the house? Why not reduce the bonded indebtedness? Why should the Canadian National be saddled with bonds that some foolish person contracted some twenty-five or thirty years ago, at six per cent interest? Can anyone see any reason why, when we know money should not cost more than three per cent, the government should allow a condition like that to continue? Why not reduce these interest rates?

I would say that if these measures, together with certain others that could be undertaken other than increased freight rates, are not found sufficient, then the cost of maintaining these two great railways, which are a magnificent asset to this country and a basic necessity to the welfare of Canada at this stage of our development, whatever may be the case in the future, should be made up from the consolidated revenue fund and borne by all the people. These two great railways are not only a national asset: they perform a national service to the Dominion of Canada, and consequently we all should pay for them.

May I now say just a word to the provinces? I hope this will not be out of order. After all, I see no reason why a member of parliament should not say a word to the provinces and to the people of the west and the maritimes. Now is the time when you will have to take a stand. Either the provinces and the people with them take a stern stand at the present time and force the government at Ottawa to recognize them and give them justice and the right to live, or they will permit themselves and their people to sink deeper into economic subservience. We have had plenty of experience. We see the temper of the men in power in Ottawa. We see what the board of transport commissioners are determined to do, and what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is determined to do. The question is, is there enough courage and determination in the provinces of Canada and the people of Canada to take a stand in the interests of a great, united and prosperous country?

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the house is anxious to have this vote taken, but I do not think the majority of hon. members here realize what railways mean to people in other parts of Canada. I think I should tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my constituency we are not yet operating our cars. Our roads have been blocked since last December; our trucks are not running. I believe hon. members should realize that the railways are the lifeblood of the western provinces. There we have weather conditions and settlement conditions which do not exist in the east. We have a sparse population, so that we cannot possibly bear the cost of keeping our highways open for truck competition all winter. We do not have the great lakes; we do not have the facilities for transport that are to be found in central Canada. So we must have our railways, and we must support them.

No one would deny that the people who do the work of operating the railways should have a decent living. No one who is familiar with the increase in the cost of living would dispute that wages do not mean what they did a few years ago; and I for one would not say the men who work on the railways do not need an increase in wages. We had some rather unkind remarks permitted by the Speaker in the house yesterday, dealing with the attitude of the C.C.F. in their treatment of labour. It was insinuated that the C.C.F. are trying to serve two masters, because we recognize the contribution that both farmers and railway men make to our economy. I do not consider that serving two masters. It must be remembered that in Saskatchewan we have the best labour laws in Canada, and they were put through by farmers, not by labour men. We realize that we all work, and it is not important whether you work on a farm or on a train; if you work you are entitled to a decent wage.

I want to refer again to the motion, because I think we have come a long way from the amendment which precipitated this debate. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved on April 7 that we should not permit these increases to go into effect. His motion was that certain words be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

> this house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to defer the imposition of the increases in freight rates recently authorized by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada; further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time.

I want to support that motion, because I believe that failure of the government is inimical to the best interests not only of my province but of seven provinces out of nine, and I believe the government should not have allowed those rates to go into effect. I believe the board was right in acting upon the recommendation of the government. It was requested to investigate the increased costs, and the application was for an increase of 30 per cent. The board investigated and granted an increase of 21 per cent. No one should blame the board for that.

I do blame the government, however, for not reading its own reports. I have in my hand a report submitted by Hon. T. C. Davis, who was attorney general of Saskatchewan under a Liberal administration. He submitted this report to the dominion government at the sittings which were held across Canada, and the case could not have been put more clearly. I have lugged this book around in three elections, and I have never found better arguments in defence of my province. In it are stated all the facts that have been repeated time and again in this debate; that in our province we have fought the handicap of geography, the handicap of distance, the fact that we could not benefit by the competition of water transportation, the fact that we had such a tremendous physical volume of commodities to ship. These tremendous volumes of freight resulted in the west contributing twice as much in freight rates as the rest of Canada. According to the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the eastern lines earned $76,000,000 and the western lines $146,000,000 in the same period. We also have the statement in this report that construction costs were very much less in the west; that maintenance costs are very much less, and the statement that we have provided a great impetus to Canadian nationhood.

Again I want to refer the government to its own reports, because I think if you never read anything but government reports you could win an election anywhere in Canada running against the government. Here I have book I of the submission to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, which contains a section under the subtitle "The wheat boom." In this chapter we are told in no uncertain terms that for twenty-five years after confederation Canada stagnated in the depths of a dreadful depression. We were brought out of that depression by the wheat boom and the development of a railway and tariff policy which created the great financial and industrial east; and we are told that in the development of the west we created the basis for our great nation as we find it today.

I do not know why we should go on forcing the west to bear this handicap of geography. I do not agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that it is a diabolical plot. I do not believe someone sat up nights trying to cook up some awful scheme, but I do know we have failed to remedy these things which are basic in our federal system, and I think it is time the government took seriously the submissions of the provinces when these hearings were held across the dominion.

I, for one, think we have achieved a remarkable degree of success in creating a nation out of this wilderness. We have gone contrary to all the factors of history and geography. We have defied the natural stream of trade. We have defied those terrible reaches of unproductive country. I never go west over our railroads but I think of the fathers of confederation as they sat at Quebec and in London and dreamed of the unity which they hoped some day to achieve.

I do not think anyone in his right mind or with his senses could but realize the terrible handicaps, when he considers that in those days to reach British Columbia one had to go around the tip of South America, if he went by water.

Those were dreadful handicaps; and we have been paying in the west ever since. We have not been given the advantage of the national development of this country. So I would urge the minister to see to it that this is taken into consideration, when his board sits.

I realize that these freight rates have gone into effect; that they cannot be altered by a vote of the House of Commons. I realize that the board is now investigating; but I would urge upon the minister that he bring his influence to bear upon the consideration of these natural handicaps, these dreadful geographical factors which have imposed such hardship upon the west. I believe figures were put on record by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), which deal with the cost of shipping a car of livestock east, as compared with the cost to the eastern farmer. However I should like to remind the house again of those figures. The cost for the eastern farmer within four hundred miles of Montreal is $64; the cost for the western farmer is $287.

The government has recognized this handicap in its policy in regard to the eastern movement of coarse grains. In the attempt to have more meat produced, freight has been paid for the eastern farmer. This has been done because it has been realized that he could not possibly compete with a man who grew his own grain for the feeding of livestock. The man who fed only what he could grow on his Ontario farm was not in the same position at all as the man who bought his grain from the west, if he were required to pay the freight. And so the government in this instance has at least made a beginning in equalization by recognizing this long haul north of the great lakes, and paying the freight from Fort William to the point where the farmer buys his feed.

There have been other attempts at equalization. There are certain firms in Canada which have worked out their own equalization, so that if one buys a certain kind of washing machine anywhere in Canada he will pay the standard price, right across the country. I believe that is true of tobacco; and in my opinion it is a useful method for any company to bring into effect. This proves that it can be done and that it is acceptable to the Canadian people. In my opinion that should be the basis for this government's policy. It should recognize that no one should be punished because he happens to live in the west. And in that connection may I say I was impressed by the evidence given by the hon. member for Lethbridge respecting not only the difference in distance, but the difference in rate.

I am sure if hon. members from British Columbia were free to talk now, as they were when the first amendment was moved, they could bring forth many examples. I am sure hon. members from the maritime provinces could also give many examples.

I have been reading what is known as the Jones report. We are all Canadians, and proud of it; and because of that I think we should insist upon the removal of these inequalities and natural handicaps by the government. I hope, in considering this matter, the government will take what I have said into account.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO SUSPEND STANDING ORDER 28 FOR SITTING ON THURSDAY, APRIL 22

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it does not appear likely that a vote can be reached this afternoon on the motion, the amendment and the subamendment, I would move:

That standing order 28 be suspended for the sitting of Thursday, April 22, 1948.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASES ORDERED BY TRANSPORT BOARD—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL —SUBAMENDMENT, MR. BRACKEN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bracken.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time also to take part in the debate on freight rates. I do not think there has been a debate before the house for a long time which has stirred so greatly the interest of so many people in Canada, particularly in the western provinces.

The people of western Canada believe they have been discriminated against for many years in respect of the high freight rates they have to pay. So they look with interest to this debate. And from the letters I receive I can say the people of the west are not greatly concerned whether or not the government falls on this motion, but they are concerned that the 21 per cent increase in freight rates should not be applied.

I was interested to hear the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) say that the C.C.F. group was trying to make this a political issue. I would tell the minister that if he does not want this issue to be a political one, then the best thing the government can do is to agree with the members of the C.C.F. group, and not allow the increase to take effect.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is exactly what you are doing now.

Mr. ARGUE: I am not ashamed of it a bit.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does my hon. friend know—

Mr. ARGUE: Let me finish. The C.C.F. group has said it is opposed to the increase in freight rates. The government has allowed the increase to take place. I say the people of Canada will view that as a political issue, because we find one party on one side definitely, and another party definitely on the other side. Therefore it is a political issue.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does the hon. member say, in effect, that he is dealing with it politically? That is the statement I was making.

Mr. ARGUE: I say this is in fact a political issue, since the government is allowing the 21 per cent increase to take place, whereas the C.C.F. group are opposed to it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then the hon. member should not accuse me of dealing with it politically, if he is doing the same thing himself.

Mr. ARGUE: I am not accusing anyone at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes he was.

Mr. ARGUE: I am amused by that remark.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am amused by what you are saying. I think it is quite funny.

Mr. BENTLEY: Do not butt in all the time.

Mr. ARGUE: What concerns me more than whether the Minister of Transport thinks I have been accusing him of anything is the fact that he says this, as reported at page 2900 of Hansard:

The board through the chief commissioner has delivered a clear and outstanding judgment in this case.

I believe when he makes that statement he is saying that his mind is already made up, that there is not to be any change in the 21 per cent increase. He is saying that the decision of the board of transport commissioners is a good one, and that he is going to support that decision.

I was exceedingly disappointed in the fact that the government was not prepared to stay the increase in freight rates for a reasonable time, namely the period of thirty days as was requested by the seven provinces. Surely the minister will not say that the railway companies are in such financial straits that their failure to receive their increase for one month would force them into bankruptcy.

Not only are the general public of western Canada opposed to this increase in freight rates; the boards of trade and the public press are also opposed. The Winnipeg Free Press has shown quite definitely where it stands on this issue. Some excellent articles have appeared in this publication. This paper is a supporter of the present government, and the fact that it is opposed to an increase in freight rates as applied in this particular instance shows that the government is definitely on the wrong track. In an editorial on April 12 the Winnipeg Free Press pointed out that on March 30 the judgment of the board of transport commissioners was handed down; that on April 3 the railroads announced that the increase would be made effective on April 8, and that seven provinces asked the government for a stay of the rates for a period of thirty days and agreed to meet at Ottawa on April 24. It goes on to state:

So matters rested until Wednesday, last, when Hon. Lionel Chevrier, dominion Minister of Transport, stated in the House of Commons that although petitions of appeal had been received from the seven provincial governments, the dominion government "has decided that it should not interfere with the effective date of the board's order." He qualified this statement with the phrase "without prejudice to any appeal".

I submit that in allowing the increase to go into effect the minister has in effect prejudiced the appeal. He has shown that he is willing to allow the 21 per cent increase to take effect. The editorial continues:

At the same time he tabled a copy of order in council (P.C. 1486) passed on April 7. This order states that the cabinet has before it the petitions of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and the representations of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia and proceeds:

"The committee of the privy council, having given due consideration to the said petitions and representations, are unable to advise that the said order of the board of transport commissioners for Canada be varied in the sense requested"

I do not think that is a statement of fact, because I cannot see how the government could have given due consideration to these representations in connection with a matter which took the board of transport commissioners some fourteen months of sittings across this country before they felt they were in position to hand down a judgment.

The editorial goes on:

Not since the transport board, a quarter century ago, undertook to throw out Crowsnest Pass rates has western Canada been treated so rudely and harshly as by the present Liberal government in this order in council. A more highhanded attitude is inconceivable. The government declares in the order in council that it has given due consideration to the representations of the west. That is not true. The representations have not yet been made and will not be made until April 24 when the premiers of the west reach Ottawa. Why all this rushing on the part of the government? Why is the need for action so desperate that the governments of the west, acting for the public of the west, must be denied a hearing before the increased railway charges are made effective?

[Mr. Argue.]

It is obvious that a freight rate structure should not be raised and lowered at short intervals of time. Freight rates cannot be hoisted 21 per cent on April 8 and lowered a few weeks later without causing great and needless disturbance to business. It follows, therefore, that no dominion government would pass an order on April 17 if it had the slightest intention of reversing the decision say on April 24. And, in honesty, P.C. 1486 holds out no promise whatsoever of a reversal.

And again:

Such action could only result from the dominion government deciding, in advance, that the appeal of the seven provinces was frivolous, without substance and not worth hearing. That is the only inference to be drawn from this most unusual procedure.

The people of western Canada are thoroughly seized of the injustice of the transport board's judgment. Having been turned down by the dominion government without a hearing, with no consideration whatsoever, the people of western Canada will look to their members at Ottawa to protect them against exploitation of this kind.

Certainly the people of western Canada are looking to their members of parliament at this particular time and will view with interest the way the various members vote on the motion before us. On April 13 the Minister of Transport made the following statement, as reported on page 2905 of Hansard:

I have already put on the record, in this house, but I think I should again record, the statement made by counsel for the various provinces, who made it quite clear that they did not desire this investigation to be made one for the removal of the so-called discrimination or inequalities.

I do not think that the quotes which the minister made following that statement bear out the truth of his statement. I believe the key words in his statement are these:

. . . that they did not desire this investigation to be made one for the removal of the so-called discrimination or inequalities.

The quotations to which the minister referred said nothing about the desire of the various provinces. The best that can be said is that some of the provinces were willing to accept what they thought was fair, namely, that the discriminatory feature of the freight rates was not before the board of transport commissioners. I should like to quote from page 58 of Manitoba's submission as follows:

Manitoba submits that a straight horizontal increase on all rates in Canada would be unjust and unreasonable and would place an unfair burden upon those who today pay the heaviest rates, namely, those whose goods must be hauled long distances (in most instances these are heavy goods) i.e., the primary producers of western Canada. We further submit that a uniform horizontal percentage increase applied to all parts of Canada would be particularly unjust to those whose freight bills are already high because of an existing rate structure which charges them rates which are higher than rates for comparable goods and comparable distances in other areas.

Thus the province of Manitoba contended that the present rates should not be increased while the discriminatory effects still prevailed. Counsel for the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. M. A. MacPherson stated:

> Should the need of increased revenues from freight traffic be made out, it will be argued that in no event should any advance be permitted which will increase the present burden on the province of Saskatchewan. The contention that it is a purely financial case and that regional inequalities cannot be considered in this application will not be conceded for a moment.

The submission of the province of Saskatchewan states definitely that the question of discrimination should be considered by the board of transport commissioners at the time they heard the application of the railways for an increase in rates.

The minister said that he felt the board of transport commissioners could not be seized of the inequalities which exist in freight rates. I think the board could have been seized of those inequalities and that it should have taken them into consideration. The minister argued that no organization and no government had made a substantive application to the board since 1927 to have the discriminatory features removed; that because no substantive application had been made, therefore the board did not have before it that particular issue and the provinces could not hope that it would be considered. But Mr. Burchell, one of the counsel for the maritime provinces, is reported in the judgment of the board of transport commissioners, at page 39, as having contended that the board did not have before it the select rates prevailing in the maritime provinces provided under a special act. And the chief commissioner in his report states:

> I must agree with the argument of counsel for the maritimes that the applicants, it may be through inadvertence, did not furnish us with specific evidence, or in any event sufficient evidence, of increased cost of railway operation in Canada over the cost prevailing on July the first, 1927.
> To require the applicant railways to proceed by way of substantive application, as suggested by counsel for the maritimes, would involve much delay in disposing of the most important question before us. This further delay should, I think, be avoided if it can be fairly done.
> The board has, I think, power to investigate and ascertain the facts itself and to make a finding based upon the results of such investigation, and we have proceeded accordingly.

The chief commissioner said that the board of transport commissioners was not required to have before it a substantive application in reference to the select rates in the maritime provinces but that the board had power to investigate and ascertain the facts itself and to make a finding based on the results of such investigation. Therefore I contend that the board had the power to investigate and ascertain the facts as far as discrimination is concerned, and that it has power to do something about that discrimination.

The history of the various decisions that have been made by the board is clear in regard to discrimination. The board's various decisions in the past have been such as to lessen the discrimination. I quote from the submission by Manitoba in opposition to an increase in freight rates, at page 59:

> In the Western Freight Rates Case (1914) it was recognized that there was a disparity between eastern and western rates.
> In the Eastern Rates Case (1916) it was laid down that tolls in eastern Canada and in western Canada should be brought to a parity so far as this could reasonably be done.
> In the Increase in Passenger and Freight Tolls Case (1917), the so-called 15 per cent case, there was a further recognition of the disparity between the east and the west and in that case the western rates were raised 10 per cent only, whereas the general bulk of eastern rates were raised 15 per cent.
> In the 25 per cent Increase Case (1918) one finds an extremely strong declaration of government policy. This was the case where the board was directed to put into effect an increase of 25 per cent in all rates in eastern Canada whereas in western Canada the increase was limited to 25 per cent over the level previous to the 15 per cent case.
> In the 1920 Rate Increase Case, otherwise known as the 40 per cent case, the board granted a 40 per cent increase in eastern tolls and a 35 per cent increase only in western tolls.

Thus the board of transport commissioners in previous decisions has gone a long way in removing the great discrimination that did exist; but in its present decision, instead of lessening the discrimination, it has widened it still further by awarding a 21 per cent increase across the board. That 21 per cent increase will bear heavily upon the people of western Canada. It may be argued that conditions there are such at the present time that the 21 per cent increase can be carried without hardship, but I do not grant that for one moment. The 21 per cent increase in freight rates will lower the standard of living of the people of western Canada and it will be very difficult to bear if prices fall from their present high level.

On motion of Mr. Argue the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Tomorrow we shall resume this debate, and when the house goes into committee of supply it is the intention, as previously announced, to call an item in the Department of Agriculture and one in external affairs, and have them stand, and then resume the debate on the motion of the Minister of Agriculture for the second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, then go into committee of the whole on the Unemployment Insurance Act, and after that take the second reading of the Dominion Elections Act, which, after second reading, is to go to the special committee that has been set up. Then, if there is time, we shall go back into supply to deal with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. On Monday we shall proceed with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 22, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 16

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Last Friday evening, April 16, I made reference to private bills which had been introduced in another place, where their standing committees were set up last December and some bills passed, whereas our committee was not set up until the end of February. For that reason I am told some lawyers thought it well to go to the other place to introduce these measures, and that this was the reason such action was being taken.

I did not wish to reflect upon those in another place, where there are able men of whom many formerly sat with me as colleagues, and all of whom have rendered real service. I have made it a rule to respect the views of others and to have pleasant relationships with all hon. members. Last Friday I said I had no intention of reflecting upon any hon. member here who might have introduced a measure for some legal friend. I have not changed my views as to the usefulness of that other place in times so grave as these, and only desired a better study of all such bills.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Second report of sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ITEMS TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved:

That items 502, 503 and 557 of the main estimates for 1949, approved and reported upon on Thursday, April 22, 1948, by the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these the same items as last year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE

BANKING AND COMMERCE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Probe be substituted for that of Mr. Thatcher on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 205 (from the senate) respecting Canadian Marconi Company.—Mr. Whitman.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

ST. LOUIS DE GONZAGUE, QUE., RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. With reference to the mail service on rural route No. 1, St. Louis de Gonzague, were tenders invited before the expiry of the contract?
2. If so (a) on what date; (b) what are the names of the tenderers and what were the amounts; (c) when were the tenders opened; (d) was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer? If not, for what reason?
3. With reference to the mail service on rural route No. 2, St. Louis de Gonzague, were tenders invited before the expiry of the contract?
4. If so (a) on what date; (b) what are the names of the tenderers and what were the amounts; (c) when were the tenders opened; (d) was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer? If not, for what reason?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Yes.

2. (a) 6th October, 1947, and again 15th January, 1948.

(b) No tenders received on first invitation, 6th October, 1947. Following tenders received on invitation 15th January, 1948: Henri Brais, $1,200; Albeni Brisson, $1,200; James W. Tait, $1,400.

Conditional tender for both St. Louis de Gonzague rural routes Nos. 1 and 2, Albeni Brisson, $2,100.

Tenders were considered high and each tenderer was given an opportunity to reduce, with following result:

Albeni Brisson, $1,100; James W. Tait, $1,198.

Albeni Brisson submitted conditional offer for both routes, $2,000.

(c) Tenders opened 21st November, 1947, and 27th February, 1948.

(d) No contract awarded. Service being performed under temporary arrangement pending final decision.

3. Yes.

4. (a) 6th October, 1947, and 15th January, 1948.

(b) Invitation 6th October, 1947. Henri Brais, $775; Albeni Brisson, $1,535.

Henri Brais raised his tender to $1,050.

Invitation 15th January, 1948: Henri Brais, $1,050; Albeni Brisson, $1,300.

Albeni Brisson submitted conditional tender for routes No. 1 and No. 2 at $2,100.

Tenders were considered high and each tenderer was given an opportunity to reduce, with following result: Henri Brais, $1,050; Albeni Brisson, $1,100.

Albeni Brisson reduced his conditional tender for both routes to $2,000.

(c) 21st November, 1947, and 27th February, 1948.

(d) No contract awarded. Service being performed under temporary arrangement pending final decision.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF BUTTER

Mr. DENIS:

1. How many pounds of butter have been exported each year from 1935 to date?

2. How many pounds have been imported during the same period?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1 and 2.

Calendar year	Exports Lb.	Imports Lb.
1935	7,697,000	148,541
1936	5,128,800	117,281
1937	4,096,600	65,918
1938	3,893,400	5,231,838
1939	12,398,600	5,644
1940	1,337,600	4,001
1941	1,481,800	481,729
1942	1,600,900	592,816
1943	9,408,600	1,154
1944	4,726,700	740
1945	5,598,300	3,495
1946	4,509,400	25,692
1947	3,107,100	5,118,869

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

MINERAL CLAIMS IN YUKON—YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the government that on February 18 last a question asked by me was passed as an order for return; and on March 10 an order for the production of papers was passed. One of these was over two months ago and the other over a month ago. Nothing has been forthcoming since. I should like to have action on both of them.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF ENGINEERS IN LEGISLATION WITH RESPECT TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. What action does the minister propose to take with respect to the request by professional engineers for inclusion in collective bargaining under the industrial relations bill?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that question will be considered by the committee on industrial relations.

Mr. BROWN: May I ask a supplementary question? Has the minister received any representations on behalf of the professional engineers?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the minister another question on the same subject. In view of the representations made by the professional engineers does the government intend to take the initiative and amend the act in order to meet their wishes?

Mr. MITCHELL: If the hon. member will look at the bill which is being circulated, he will see that the government has already taken action in the direction in which he wishes to have it taken.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then the professional engineers have had their wishes met; is that so?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. And I would say this, as a further answer to the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) that the decision was made on the representations of the Engineering Institute of Canada, the dominant organization of engineers in this country.

Mr. FRASER: I would ask the Minister of Labour to clarify what has been said with regard to professional engineers coming under Bill No. 195. Am I to understand that professional engineers will be included in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and be able to have collective bargaining?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is no, as my hon. friend will see if he reads the bill.

Mr. FRASER: I have read the bill, but I misunderstood the minister's answer.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take another look at it.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Labour to clarify the position with respect to professional engineers, which now seems to be completely confused? He said "yes" to me, and I understood he said "no" to the hon. member for Peterborough West.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot probe the depths of my hon. friend's mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not your job; I am probing yours.

Mr. MITCHELL: It would be too difficult a job. I will read the section of the bill if the hon. member wishes me to, but I do not think I can say more than what I said to the hon. member for Peterborough West. You had better talk it over one with the other; I cannot stay here all afternoon.

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked the minister whether or not professional engineers had been included and if this bill was going to meet their wishes, and he said "yes." He has just said "no" to the hon. member for Peterborough West. I suppose we shall have to wait until somebody else is able to clarify this situation.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As one engineer to another, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if it is the intention that this will be done solely by a declaration by the minister, or by the industrial relations committee, which I am advised is to meet twice a week from now on until matters are disposed of, the first of which should be that having to do with the engineers?

Mr. MITCHELL: That will be decided by the government.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

LONG BRANCH AND TORONTO ISLAND—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works, following the question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) a few days ago. The question has to do with floods which have taken place at Long Branch and at Toronto island. In view of the serious trouble which has been experienced by the people in that area, has the minister received any report, or has a report been made by his engineers, as to what the situation is, and can he say what is going to be done?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I can add but little to what I have answered the hon. member for Broadview. Wherever the damage caused by floods is on property belonging to the federal government, or under federal jurisdiction, repairs will be made by the federal government.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister's answer is not quite good enough for me. I have asked him if a report has been made. These people are in very difficult circumstances, and I want to ask the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to ask the minister a question. Under whose jurisdiction does this matter come?—so that we can get busy and give relief to the people living there. Can the minister give me an answer?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Speaking generally, the damage caused by overflow of rivers, creeks or lakes in Canada is under provincial jurisdiction. When the damage is caused to federal property, or to property under federal jurisdiction, we make the repairs and the expenditures. In other instances we expect the provinces and the municipalities to do as we do.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I asked the minister a civil question,

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): My question is this: Is it under his jurisdiction, or some other jurisdiction? I should like to know, so that we can get busy and have something done for these people. Can the minister tell me now if it is under his jurisdiction?

IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO IMPORT KEROSENE OPERATED REFRIGERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, to whom I have sent notice. Having regard to the lack of electricity in the majority of rural areas, and the fact that kerosene refrigerators are the only present adequate answer to rural refrigeration, would the minister consider lifting the ban on the importation of kerosene operated refrigerators?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The hon. member may have given notice of his question, but I have not received it. However, I believe I can answer now. We have considered this question of the importation of kerosene refrigerators, but we have not found that any substantial number was imported last year. It is expensive equipment, costing between $400 and $500. If a quota were allowed I think it would be found that the great majority of them would be purchased by comparatively well-to-do summer residents for their summer cottages.

Taking all the circumstances into consideration we have come to the conclusion that the ban on importation should not be lifted.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a supplementary question? Is the minister aware that most of these refrigerators have gone into places not served with electricity? For example, in my own constituency of Rosetown something like five hundred went in last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course they go to districts which are not served with electricity. But my information is that many of them are purchased by the owners of summer cottages who, of course, find them a great convenience.

STEEL

AVAILABILITY TO BUILDERS OF RAILWAY CARS

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

An hon. MEMBER: Telegram.

Mr. GILLIS: For the benefit of my hon. friend over here, this question is prompted by an S.O.S. from the financial secretary of the steelworkers union at Trenton, Nova Scotia. Will the minister explain to the house why the steel quota to the Eastern Car Company Limited at Trenton, Nova Scotia, was cut by twenty-five per cent?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): My hon. friend must have received a delayed S.O.S., because the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch) was twenty-four hours ahead of him with the question.

For some time past the tonnage of steel plates available to the railway car builders has controlled their rate of operation. Generally speaking they are able to obtain sufficient other steel components to level off the tonnages of plates which have been made available.

[Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).]

Through 1947 the three car builders as a group received an average allocation of 3,000 tons of plates per month. During the first quarter of 1948 this total allocation was increased to 4,000 tons per month, but it was found impossible to continue at this rate, and the total allocation was reduced to 3,250 tons of plate per month for the second quarter, representing approximately eighty per cent of the first quarter allocation.

In order to reallocate the total tonnage of plates available for car building it has been necessary to have the transportation equipment committee, Department of Reconstruction and Supply, call a meeting of representatives from the three car building companies, who have arrived at the most equitable reallocation of available tonnage, having regard to labour in the respective plants.

NAILS

DISTRIBUTION OF RODS FOR MANUFACTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply? Can he inform the house why the application from the Federated Co-operative Association of Saskatchewan for steel rods for the manufacture of nails has been turned down. I apologize to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) for asking this question about nails.

Mr. FRASER: I am pleased that the hon. member has taken up the cause.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): All available rods are being made into nails by nail-making concerns who for years have been customers for the purchase of rods. Where an article is short, new entrants into a field are not encouraged. Obviously it is not fair to take tonnage from old customers to take care of new ones.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought this was a free enterprise system.

WHEAT BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

OATS AND BARLEY—DECISION IN CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD VS. HALLETT AND CAREY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of a judgment in Canadian Wheat Board vs. Hallett and Carey, in which P.C. 1292, which is the order in council dealing with oats and barley, was declared ultra vires. In view of that decision is the minister in position to report what the government intends to do in regard to the control of oats and barley by reason of the fact that the courts have decided that the declaration of a national emergency in the preamble is not conclusive as against the courts?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The decision was made on a point of law.

Mr. HACKETT: On a point of fact.

Mr. HOWE: Not being a lawyer, I am not going to argue with the president of the bar association. I dare say it was a point of fact. The matter has been referred to the Department of Justice and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is dealing with it at this moment.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister state when his department will make it possible for him to advise the house what course the government intends to take with regard to the judgment of Chief Justice Williams to which reference has just been made?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I am afraid I cannot. I have not had an opportunity of discussing that judgment with the officials of the department.

FREIGHT RATES

EFFECT OF INCREASES IN RELATION TO HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) asked if the recent increase in freight rates affected the movement of grain over the Hudson Bay railway. I have inquired of the board of transport commissioners and I am informed that since grain moving from the prairies to Churchill over the Hudson Bay railway is covered by the export rate item in the judgment there will be no increase in export rates covering the movement of grain from the prairies to Churchill.

SUPPLY

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASES ORDERED BY TRANSPORT BOARD—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL—SUBAMENDMENT, MR. BRACKEN

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bracken.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose yesterday afternoon I was dealing with some of the ways in which the 21 per cent increase in freight rates will affect Saskatchewan and western Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that there is so much talk going on that it is impossible to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. ARGUE: I should like to refer again to what has already been placed on the record with respect to the way in which the 21 per cent increase in freight rates will affect the cost of shipping cattle to eastern Canada. The 21 per cent increase in the freight rates will reduce the price of a carload of cattle to the farmer by $50.05 when shipped from Crane Valley to Toronto.

Yesterday I referred to the fact that various decisions of the board of transport commissioners in the past have lessened the inequalities in the freight rates as between western and central Canada, but this latest increase has further widened inequalities that already existed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must ask hon. members to leave the chamber if they want to carry on conversation. I cannot hear what the hon. member is saying, and I think it is most unfair for those who want to talk to do so while he is speaking.

Mr. ARGUE: For example, the cost of shipping 100 pounds of gasoline from Sarnia, Ontario, to a point 50 miles away is eight cents, whereas the freight charges for shipping 100 pounds of gasoline from Regina to a point 50 miles away is 20 cents, the difference between the two rates being 12 cents. The 21 per cent increase in the freight rates will increase the cost of the shipment of gasoline from Sarnia by 1·6 cents but it will increase the cost of the shipment from Regina by 4·2 cents. Instead of having the previous spread of 12 cents between these two shipments, the new rates increase the spread to 14·6 cents. It can thus be seen that the 21 per cent increase in freight rates is further aggravating the inequalities that existed in the past.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) placed a table on the record to show that increased freight charges on certain articles shipped from western Canada to central Canada were not very great. His figures showed that the increased freight rates on a dozen eggs when shipped in a carload lot amounted to just one-tenth of a cent. While that may be true, the fact remains that the minimum charges have been increased by more than 21 per cent. The minimum charge for a shipment of less than 100 pounds has been increased from 50 to 75 cents.

Everyone knows that farmers in western Canada who ship eggs and cream ship them in lots of less than 100 pounds. It now means that there is an increase of 25 cents in the cost of each shipment. This means an increase of 25 cents, or approximately two cents per dozen, in the cost of shipping a 12 dozen crate of eggs. Similarly on a shipment of a crate of 30 dozen eggs the freight cost will be increased by five-sixths of a cent per dozen. So the effect of the freight rate increase will be much more than one-tenth of a cent per dozen, as outlined by the transport minister, and will in fact amount to an increase in freight charges on eggs of from one cent to more than two cents per dozen.

The same thing applies with respect to the shipment of cream. Farmers usually ship cream to the creamery in three-gallon or five-gallon cans. A five-gallon can of cream, testing 35 per cent butter fat, produces approximately 17½ pounds of butter fat, and the increased cost of 25 cents on that can of cream will amount to approximately 1½ cents on a pound of butter fat. The increased cost on a shipment of a three-gallon can of cream will amount to approximately 2½ cents per pound of butter fat. It is not correct, therefore, to say that the only increase in freight costs as they affect butter will amount to one-tenth of a cent when butter is shipped. It will amount to one-tenth of a cent, plus from 1½ to 2½ cents per pound of butter fat, when cream is shipped to the creamery.

The railways when putting their case before the board of transport commissioners pleaded that they were in great financial need and that it was necessary that an increase be granted immediately. But counsel for Saskatchewan pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway was not in financial difficulties, that in its 1946 balance sheet was an item of $77,870,000 which had been accumulated from earnings, and the justification for that accumulation must have been that a situation might arise calling for the use of additional funds during an emergency. Placing its case before the board of transport commissioners in 1946, the C.P.R. estimated that its 1947 net railway earnings would be $14,800,000. But when the balance sheet for 1947 was made public it showed net railway earnings of $22,892,189. Thus the C.P.R. in fact in 1947 made $8,000,000 more than it had estimated when placing its case before the board. It cannot be said therefore that the C.P.R. today is in great financial need and that it needs a 21 per cent increase in freight rates.

The chief commissioner's report sets out the various items for which the Canadian Pacific, according to the commissioner, requires revenue. He gives a figure of $15,235,000 for surplus, $21,000,000 for dividends, and more than $15,000,000 for fixed charges. The chief commissioner said in his judgment: We will give to the C.P.R. sufficient revenue to cover its fixed charges and to pay four per cent on the preferred stock and five per cent on the common stock. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that five per cent is a high rate in view of prevailing interest rates today. The commissioner went on to say: Not only will we guarantee the C.P.R. a high rate of return upon its investments but in addition we will allow it a surplus of $15,235,000. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the board of transport commissioners and the government should not have permitted an increase that takes hard-earned money from the common people of Canada in order that the C.P.R. may pay big dividends and have a surplus of more than $15,000,000 per year.

The financial position of the C.P.R. has improved tremendously over the past number of years. At the end of 1947 its funded debt had been reduced $7,700,000 as compared with 1946. Its reserves in 1947 had increased by approximately $30,000,000 over 1946. Its funded debt in 1937 was $228,000,000, and in 1947, $95,301,000, a reduction in ten years of $153,000,000. The reserves of the C.P.R. in 1937 were $91,000,000 and in 1947, $379,905,000, or an increase in ten years of almost $289,000,000.

I suggest that those figures, Mr. Speaker, prove beyond doubt that the C.P.R. is not in great financial need, and in fact does not need an increase in freight rates.

Over the past years the railways have always made a greater profit on their western than on their eastern lines. Between the years 1936 and 1946 the C.P.R. made a profit on its western lines of more than $248,000,000, while on its eastern lines it made a profit of $126,000,000. That proves, I submit, that the C.P.R., because of higher freight rates in western Canada, made large profits from its western operations as compared with its profits in eastern Canada, and such discrimination cannot be justified to this house.

Over the years governments in this country have taken a very benevolent interest in the C.P.R. Cash subsidies have been paid to the C.P.R. amounting to more than $89,000,000, and land grants have been made to the extent of more than 32,000,000 acres. Over the years the people of Canada have bonused the C.P.R. It is not right, it is not just, it is not reasonable that the government should allow a 21 per cent increase in freight rates which will add to the inequalities which at present exist, and which further subsidizes a railway already highly subsidized by the Canadian people.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members are impatient to see this debate end and the vote taken, and I share that view. It is very difficult at this stage to say anything on this question which has not been said before, but in the very few minutes I shall take I shall endeavour to make certain that what I say is not mere repetition of what has gone before.

It seems to me that many of the speeches made in this debate might have been reserved for arguments on appeal, when an appeal is taken to the proper tribunal from the judgment of the board of transport commissioners. It is easy for us to rise in our places in this house and wax indignant over the fact that railway rates have been increased. That is something which has a very popular appeal; everybody dislikes an increase in freight rates. No one in the prairies, or in that part of the prairies from which I come, is in favour of an increase in freight rates. But the provinces of the west and the maritime provinces and other interested governmental bodies have hired eminent counsel to argue their case before the board of transport commissioners. The board in its wisdom, as they saw it, have given a certain judgment. If they are right, then I say in all honesty that those of us who come from the prairie provinces must be careful about this thing and not let any thoughts enter our minds or into this debate that would be more in the nature of appeal to popular prejudice than appeal to reason and the facts.

If the board of transport commissioners are right, and the railways need this increase, I am satisfied that the people of the prairie provinces, who are eminently fair-minded,—if they felt that it was a question on the one hand of an increase in freight rates and on the other financial chaos for the railways, in spite of the fact that they do not like high freight rates the people would realize in their common sense and judgment that we must have increased freight rates and that they would have to share in the increase as do the other parts of Canada.

It seems to me that many hon. members are not attacking this problem on the proper ground. When this appeal is heard, the western and maritime provinces will have counsel arguing their appeal, and all the arguments that have been made against the freight rate increase can then be made and decided upon in the proper place. Those of us who come from western Canada should be concerning ourselves with this. We must be certain that a proper reference is being made to the board of transport commissioners in respect to the equalization of freight rates. That is what affects us in the western prairie provinces, and that is why I am raising the point today.

I am not sure that the terms of reference protect the prairie provinces. Let me read from P.C. 1487, which is the order in council in question. It reads in part as follows:

> It is therefore advisable that the board of transport commissioners for Canada be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rates structure of railways and railway companies which are under the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rates structure which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities in the various provinces and territories of Canada, so as to permit the freest possible handling of commodities.

What is new about that? The reference has to do with the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, do certain things. If that is the complete reference to the board of transport commissioners on this question, the prairie provinces and the maritime provinces may just as well forget about it, because we shall get no more relief than we got under a similar reference in 1925, which was referred to by the minister in his speech as the decision of the board in 1927.

The third headnote reads as follows:

> The application of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta re alteration in the terminal tariffs, involving elimination of the assumed mileage between Port Arthur and Winnipeg was dismissed upon the ground that the general advantage accruing from the latter feature in the rate structure did not warrant any change being made.

I do not know whether anything in our changed economy has changed that. The same thing applies to the second headnote, which refers to the mountain differential, and also to the headnote which refers to the fact that there is certain discrimination because of water competition. That situation still prevails, Mr. Speaker. What we in the west should be sure of, and what we should ask the government to do beyond any question—because at this time western Canada does not want to be fooled—is to ask that the government make sure that a directive is given to the board of transport commissioners which shows beyond any question that the board of transport commissioners will have power to equalize these rates, whether the discrimination is by reason of water competition or any other competition.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Was the hon. gentleman in the house when the statement was made that the board of transport commissioners had stated that they had full powers, within the meaning of the act, to equalize the rates?

Mr. MILLER: The minister is correct in that, Mr. Speaker, but what I want to make certain is this—

Mr. CASSELMAN: You want to tie them down.

Mr. MILLER: I want it in the terms of reference that the board of transport commissioners shall have power to equalize these rates in spite of water competition and everything else. What I want to see in the west is that we do not have to pay any higher freight rates than any other part of Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question? What purpose would there be in putting in the order in council powers which already exist in the act and which the commissioners say they have?

Mr. MILLER: May I counter that with this question to the minister. If there is no harm in leaving it out, would there be any harm in putting it in? If it were put in, we would be a lot safer and surer. I say this, and I think the minister will agree with me: the board of transport commissioners is little different from a court, and I think it is regarded as a court. Like all other courts, the board is bound to a large extent by precedent. The judgment of 1927, which the minister referred to in his speech the other day, is a precedent which could hang the prairie provinces and the maritime provinces if the board of transport commissioners deemed themselves bound by it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt? I do not want to be interrupting my hon. friend, and I will not do it without his consent. What the hon. gentleman says is true in part only, that the board may feel bound by a former decision, but if the conditions in the country have changed over a period of twenty years, as my hon. friend knows they have, they will have to take into consideration those changed conditions.

Mr. MILLER: That is just what I am afraid of. If we have to hang our hats and our hopes on a decision made from nebulous circumstances and changed economic conditions, I have not much hope for relief in the west. What the government should do unequivocally to give relief to western Canada—and that is what I am talking about at the moment—is either to amend the act, or to make it absolutely certain in its directive in the order in council that the board of transport commissioners shall find out whether there are any inequalities and discriminations, and if there are, remove them regardless of their cause.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is in the order in council.

Mr. MILLER: I do not read it that way, Mr. Speaker. I think it should be amply clear that it is there; because unless the board of transport commissioners are prepared to relieve the west and the maritimes from discrimination, regardless of the causes, the inquiry, whether it takes six months or a year, will be completely useless; it will get us nowhere and we shall obtain no relief.

There is one other point that I want to make, on the same aspect of the matter, and it is this. When the case that is being complained about now by many hon. members was launched over a year ago, as you will recall, on one day in the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and maybe on two or three days—it was in the month of March—a great many speeches were made about the proposed hearing, in opposition to any increased rates and so on. Not a great deal was said by members of the party to which I belong, because we took the attitude that the matter was before the court and therefore we should not discuss it. But finally one of our members, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), made a speech on this particular point. It will be found in Hansard of March 6, 1947, beginning at page 1104. The reference I intend to make is at page 1107.

The reason I am bringing this matter up at the present time is that I am fearful lest this additional inquiry by the board of transport commissioners will drag on for a long time and will come to nothing. The government a year ago—not yesterday, a week ago or a month ago—should have seen that there was discrimination in rates as between the east, the west and the maritimes. The government knew that. I think the government also should have felt sure that the board of transport commissioners would give the railways some increase, in view of the fact they had not had any for a long time, and should have known that such increase would only add to the discrimination between the prairies and the east. Even though they did not have, of their own volition, the acumen to foresee that situation, they were told by the hon. member for Calgary West, in the speech to which I have referred, that there was that discrimination.

The hon. member for Calgary West explained, as few can do so well, the reasons for that discrimination, how it had arisen and how it had grown up over the years. He told the government then in no uncertain terms, and as plainly as he could do it—once on page 1107 and twice on page 1108 of Hansard of 1947—that what was needed was a revision of the whole rate structure so that this discrimination could be removed. As was quite obvious, the minister must have known that the board of transport commissioners, on the particular reference or application that was before them, were not interested in discrimination. As a matter of fact the minister himself, in his speech, pointed that out on two or three occasions, saying that that was not the subject matter of the application before them. I say that the government should have known the situation and should have taken steps a year ago to see that there was an investigation such as they are planning now. They should have arranged to have the investigation started a year ago so that when these rates were increased by the board of transport commissioners, as many people felt they would be, the government would have been in a position to have removed this discrimination against the western provinces, British Columbia and the maritime provinces. It is just another case of being one year too late. The people in the part of the country whence I come will not tolerate another lost year on this particular point.

I know the government does not like too well to accept suggestions from the opposition, but I wish to suggest this to them. The time has come, particularly in these serious days, when the opposition's suggestions should be seriously listened to and considered. When a suggestion as good as that made by the hon. member for Calgary West in his speech of a year ago is not adopted by the government, you can see, Mr. Speaker, the result; you can see the jam the government has got itself into today. All that could have been avoided. There would not have been this discrimination if the government had carried out the suggestion urged upon them at that time by the hon. member for Calgary West in this House of Commons as long ago as March 6, 1947, namely that there be an inquiry into the discrimination with regard to rates and the formulation of an equalization plan.

I think the government should give the opposition credit for making these suggestions. They should concede that His Majesty's Loyal Opposition has the good of the country at heart, just as we are prepared to concede that the government has the good of the country at heart. Unfortunately we find few instances in which we can carry that to the point of a practical demonstration.

There is only one other matter I wish to mention, and it is entirely alien to what I have said so far. I want to bring to the attention of the minister something which likely has already been brought to his attention, because I have no doubt he received the same letter as I did this morning. It is a suggestion which has come from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce regarding freight assistance. I might say that over the years the Winnipeg chamber of commerce has made a close study of Western Canadian conditions, and it has been of great help to the farmers of the west in the investigations the chamber of commerce has made with regard to matters of this kind. I think therefore that the suggestion made by this chamber of commerce, which is one of the largest in western Canada —indeed, one of the largest in Canada—should receive serious consideration from the government. I will read just the last paragraph of the resolution—I do not know whether it is a resolution or a letter, but I quote from it as follows:

> We ask that an equalizing freight assistance subsidy be placed on the shipment of livestock and poultry products to seaboard and eastern consuming centres to enable the western farmer to feed poultry and livestock on a parity with the eastern Canadian feeder.

The reason they make that request, Mr. Speaker, is that western feed grain is subsidized, in that it comes down freight free from the head of the lakes to eastern feeders. The Winnipeg chamber of commerce feels that in fairness to the western Canadian livestock producers we should have similar freight subsidies on the shipment of livestock and livestock products from the west to the eastern market where most of the consumption takes place.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): For fear, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) might take my silence for acquiescence in the changes which have been made in the freight rate structure by himself and his confreres, and which have been inflicted upon the long-suffering prairies and maritimes, I wish to correct any such impression. Personally, and on behalf of the people I represent, I wish to protest these freight rate boosts, and to assure the minister that they are being bitterly assailed everywhere. I have letters and telegrams from the people living in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan which indicate that they are definitely opposed to and dismayed at the changes which have been made. These changes are opposed especially by those of us who live in the western provinces, who seem, by some unfortunate circumstance, to be compelled to pay freight both ways—both on the goods we buy and on the goods we sell. We seem to have been chosen to pay the freight both going and coming.

One of the telegrams I received, from a place called Matchee up in northern Saskatchewan, asks that the permission to make the increase effective be withdrawn at once. It goes on with the further suggestion that either the increase should be withdrawn or the government should go to the country at once and seek approval. I also have a letter on my desk from a co-operative guild in northern Saskatchewan, making a similar protest.

There is another impression I should like to correct. In the course of this debate I have heard it said more than once that no one disagrees with the suggestion that the railways should be allowed to charge higher freight rates. Well, Mr. Speaker, here is one who disagrees with that suggestion. Last week the financial statement of the C.P.R. was published. On all operations of the company the profits amounted to $31,893,942 in 1947, an increase of $6,759,211 over the previous year. Stockholders received $2.04 per share as compared with the $1.53 they got in 1946, an increase of 33⅓ per cent. Of course it is argued that operating costs of all kinds have gone up and will go up; but if the traffic also goes up, if the business increases at the same rate as last year, even at the old charges another considerable increase in net profits would be indicated. If, however, the railways simply have to have more money, it would have been fairly simple to leave the prairie and maritime schedules as they were and raise the rates in eastern Canada to the levels being charged on the prairies. From what we can gather, there would be a substantial increase in the revenues of the railway companies if that were done.

This situation will give another incentive to the western provinces especially to get into industry as speedily as possible and so avoid payment of much of the freight now being charged. We can build more crushing mills to take care of all the flaxseed grown in the west, more woollen mills and factories to manufacture our wool clip, more tanneries, more boot and shoe factories, more pulp and paper mills and a host of other industries to take care of the products of the west. We have plenty of water power for the production of electricity; we have coal deposits galore, and we have oil and gas wells from which power can be developed for any industry that cares to use it.

These are a few points which may have been overlooked by our railway admirers, which could result in a very considerable saving in freight charges. So the increases, which at the moment look to us so unfair and iniquitous, may have some compensation in the long run. However, these plans would take time to mature, and in the meantime we protest.

Now, when we find the rate on a fifteen-dozen crate of eggs increased from 35 cents to 75 cents, an increase of 114 per cent, we are naturally suspicious of what the transport board may do to us in other directions. These points have been mentioned before, but it does no harm to repeat them; at least it shows a certain unanimity in thought in the protest being heard all across the country. Our local newspapers, most of which of course are Liberal, are up in arms and characterize the whole thing as a major political blunder. That does not worry me, of course; but the casual disregard by the government of what is fair and just is what rankles in the minds of tens of thousands of the people in the western provinces.

Discrimination has been mentioned, and arguments have been brought forward to show that the discrimination is not very violent or that it is necessary because of certain competition the railways encounter in the eastern provinces. One of those arguments struck me as being rather poor. I have not the page in Hansard, but the minister will remember having said that owing to the competition of United States lines in eastern Canada it had been found necessary to ease the rates on Canadian railways. Shortly before that we were told that the freight charges on the United States railways had been raised by something in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent, so to me that argument does not seem very sound. If freight charges on the United States railways are so extraordinarily high, how is it that there is such vigorous competition with our Canadian railways? As I say, somehow it does not seem to mesh.

I feel, too, that the government, having appointed the transport board, must be responsible to the country for its actions. I believe we have seen far too many attempts to avoid responsibility by passing important questions over to committees and commissions. Another one now is being suggested, which the minister says may require one or two years to complete its work. It is a sort of Kathleen Mavourneen commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent my position. During the course of the first debate I did say that, but after communicating with the board I said it would probably take not less than six months and perhaps could be completed within a year. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair by quoting me otherwise.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: I quite agree that the minister did say that, but previously he had made the statement, in answer to a question, that in his judgment it would take one year, and later he said perhaps two years. That is what made me think of Kathleen Mavourneen: "It may be for years, and it may be for ever."

Mr. CHEVRIER: But the hon. gentleman has to be fair, and I am asking him to accept the statement I made. If I did give an estimate of one year or more and later corrected it after communicating with the board of transport commissioners, the hon. gentleman will take the last statement I made if he wants to be fair. If he wants to be unfair he will say two or three or four or five years. I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to be unfair.

Mr. KNOWLES: But he is afraid you were right the first time.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: I shall be happy indeed to accept the minister's statement, and hope his second thought on the matter will prove closer to the actual fact than the statement I quoted earlier. I should be very glad indeed if the length of time could be cut down.

I still think the suggestion is good that when this commission is appointed it be entirely independent, perhaps something in the nature of a royal commission, rather than having the same board rehash the evidence and information that has been passed on to it and probably giving us the same thing all over again. I wonder whether our own railway committee could not do something along this line. At any rate I do feel that some body entirely separate from the transport board should be asked to do this work. Incidentally I have a letter which came to my desk today from the Edmonton chamber of commerce, asking for exactly what I am suggesting now. It asks for an independent tribunal to investigate rate structure. It also asks that the increase of 21 per cent be deferred until such investigations are completed.

Finally may I say how much I deplore the action of the government in refusing the request of the seven provinces to delay the operation of the freight rates increase until they have had a chance to discuss it. This I feel was both unreasonable and discourteous, and quite contrary to the oft-repeated desire for more co-operation. Action of this kind aggravates the whole situation, and instead of having greater unity in the land, we are without doubt heading into greater disunity.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house for any great length of time in the discussion of this subject, although it is one of the most important which will come before the House of Commons this year. Certainly it is of great importance to both western and eastern Canada.

I am not taking exception to the findings of the board of transport commissioners in connection with the increase of 21 per cent in the rate. I believe the railroads, without difficulty, established the necessity for some additional revenue. I believe additional revenue was necessary, not only to be able to pay dividends to the stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but so that that company, as well as the nationally owned system, might be placed in a position where they could stand on their own feet, and even make returns sufficient to instil confidence in the minds of the investing public. This would be necessary if later they found it necessary to sell bonds for the improvement of rolling stock. It would be a sad day for Canada if the C.P.R. ever reached the position where the government and the Canadian people had to take it over, to be operated in conjunction with the Canadian National Railways.

Unless they are allowed to earn sufficient money to induce additional capital they cannot keep their rolling stock in a condition which would be competitive with that of United States railways. In my opinion that would be a bad position indeed. The worst factor of all is that they would not be able to perform the services which they should perform, namely, the giving to the Canadian people of as good freight and passenger service as is offered by any other transportation company in or outside of Canada.

I believe it is necessary to maintain this condition, and I believe that in giving relief the board of transport commissioners transferred the burden to the shoulders of the manufacturers and producers of the far east and the far west. Therefore it has now become necessary as soon as possible to address ourselves to the problem of finding an equitable rate structure upon which we can operate.

That is my principal reason for speaking today. I do not rise to justify what has been done; rather I am speaking in an appeal to the minister to see that the board of transport commissioners bring about an equalization of freight rates without delay. If this load must be carried by the Canadian people, it must be carried on an equitable basis, or there will be difficulty. Confederation became an actuality with the building of the railways; I fear that it will go out of existence if we do not have it on a proper basis. I do not believe we can build a second story on this freight rate structure unless we are prepared to go right down to the foundation, begin over again and do it right. I am prepared to give the board of transport commissioners adequate time to do that job, but I do not want to give them one minute more than is necessary.

As I said before, to get the money to keep the railway rolling stock in good condition it was necessary to treat the railways and railway employees well. But what is happening now? The far eastern manufacturers and producers, as well as those in the far west, find that they have this 21 per cent increase piled on top of a rate which already is high. They are driven to the point where they must do business from 350 to 400 miles closer to their own doorstep. In other words there are many manufacturers in the west who have been enjoying business in the midwestern provinces who will not now be able to carry on with that business for any great length of time. Certainly from their point of view there is urgency to have this matter settled as quickly as possible.

I have spoken about manufacturers. I now turn to one of our major industries on the Pacific coast, that of shipbuilding. Steel for their ships will cost the yards another 21 per cent. Those yards will be put out of line with yards in eastern Canada, and particularly those in the central provinces. It is necessary that that industry be protected particularly in respect of the shipment of steel into British Columbia. It may be that we are now in a somewhat better position, because it is possible that with more ships available we shall be able to bring steel in by water. But will that help the railways in their province? They will lose that volume of trade as well as the revenue derived therefrom. So for their own good I think it is necessary that that business be retained.

We do not like to feel that we are being crowded back onto our own doorsteps so far as the development of our industry is concerned. The other day the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) said that we want to be independent, that we want to stand on our own feet. That is true, but we want a place to stand. And the way things are going at the present time we are not being given a place to stand.

We have no outlook for our business, either in the west or in the east unless some adjustments are made. This is true not only of shipbuilding but also of the poultry and egg business. Certainly it is true of the tree fruits industry. I understand that the extra cost to that industry this year will be about a million dollars, and one cannot say what it will be for the lumber industry.

There are two points in connection with freight rates which I do not think require any further argument, adjustment, or meetings of the board. The first of these is the mountain differential. This matter has been argued year after year before board after board, and it has been agreed that the mountain rate should be taken off in nearly every instance. I believe that, without going too far at all, that is one place where the minister could act now, by asking the board to give a ruling without delay—right away. This would give considerable relief.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why could that not be done?

Mr. MAYHEW: The 16 per cent increase in the mountain rate is no longer 16 per cent. It is 16 per cent plus 21 per cent; in other words, it is a jump to about 19¾ per cent. They have taken away pretty nearly all that they gave us in the last adjustment. I think that that can be done without any further argument.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why does the minister not say why it cannot be done?

Mr. MAYHEW: I have no doubt he will when he gets a chance.

Mr. GRAYDON: He has interrupted many other times. I should like to hear him interrupt now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know who interrupts more than you do.

Mr. GRAYDON: Except yourself.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): But more effectively.

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to finish. The other thing I should like to ask the minister to consider, and it is not necessary to argue about it at all—if you are trying to help me you will keep quiet.

Mr. GRAYDON: I could be a lot of help to you if the minister would only co-operate.

Mr. MAYHEW: There is another point that could be settled without the assistance of any committee or commission. I refer to the rates on freight going east and west. When I was home at Easter I had one case brought to my attention. A certain firm buys a commodity in the east and it costs them $2 per hundredweight to land it in Vancouver. Another firm in Vancouver making the same kind of commodity competes with this firm in the east, but in order to get it into the eastern market they had to pay $2.45. Is there any justice in that kind of set-up? I cannot see it at all. The same commodity travels over the same railroad, but in one case it goes east and in the other it goes west. Surely these two things do not require any further consideration.

Personally I cannot see why the people of Ontario and Quebec are not more interested in this matter. Surely they realize what is bound to happen. When you have railroad rates piled too high they become a tariff which makes industry in one locality permanently secure. Who wants such security? At the same time industry in Ontario and Quebec is kept out of certain areas. What will happen?

I am going to tell you that if I were a few years younger and thinking of going into business I would look very carefully at Winnipeg's position, and I certainly would look with longing eyes at the position of Edmonton as a manufacturing centre under the high rate structure we have at the present time. The people of Ontario and Quebec cannot sit idly by and see inequality piled up as between the east and the west. Eventually it will prove to their disadvantage.

It may be thought from what I have said that I should support one of the amendments. I am not going to support the C.C.F. amendment because it means a vote of want of confidence. Who has ever heard of a government being thrown out of office because it supported the action of its own creature? That is what the board of transport commissioners is. It would be something new so far as I am concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: Never do anything new.

Mr. MAYHEW: I would not do it in this instance. I cannot support the want of confidence motion moved by the Conservatives. Perhaps it has some merit from the point of view of what I have been arguing. My hon. friends evidently agree that there is some urgency in connection with this matter, but if this motion of want of confidence is successful it would mean six to seven months before we could even get started.

Mr. GRAYDON: Put out this government and you will get some action.

Mr. MAYHEW: I certainly agree with the last sentence in an article which appeared recently in the Atlantic Monthly, to the effect that Canada was the best governed country on earth. I still think that we have as good a government in Canada as you can find anywhere.

There are many more things I should like to say, but I will not delay the house longer.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is becoming impatient and is anxious to vote on the amendment proposed by the leader of this group, but as I spoke last year on the subject of freight rates when the 30 per cent application was presented to the board of transport commissioners I feel that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not protest on this occasion about the increase recently granted.

I wish to add my voice in further protest against the additional burden which has been placed upon the prairies and the maritime provinces which already provide more than their fair share of the operating revenues of the Canadian railway systems. The argument advanced in favour of the 21 per cent increase in freight rates is the same as that which has been advanced by industry in favour of higher prices for consumer goods, namely, increased operating costs on account of higher prices required for materials and higher wages for employees.

I submit that the argument that more revenue is necessary in order to pay increased wages is an attempt on the part of the railroads to throw the onus on the employees of the railway systems for the recent 21 per cent increase in freight rates. This is unfair, because, during the war and subsequently when the railroads had the highest revenues in their history, they had ample opportunity to improve the lot of their employees. But what happened? The wages of the men barely kept pace with the increased cost of living.

Railway maintenance men, shop men and porters are still underpaid. They have never received wages commensurate with the onerous tasks they perform. The basis of the demand for this 21 per cent increase is not increased wages for employees; it is because greater revenue is required in the case of the Canadian National Railways to service an unwieldy debt, and in the case of the Canadian Pacific Company to meet the demands of the shareholders for more dividends. The government could have prevented this 21 per cent increase had price control been retained.

An hon. MEMBER: Wage control.

Mr. McKAY: We will come to that later.

Railway employees have repeatedly told me—this is in answer to my hon. friend who interjected—that if the government had retained price control they would not now require increased wages. They feel this way about it, that if they do get a slight increase in wages, everything they purchase for themselves and their families will go up in price so much that their wages will fall far short of their needs. They know, and this house knows, that wages never keep pace with mounting living costs. The whole freight rate issue, as I see it, is just another chicken come home to roost. It is one of the fruits of the government's reckless and ill-conceived decontrol policy. Had price control been retained, the price level of materials required by the railways, and the wage level necessary to maintain the standards of living of their employees, could have remained such as to make it quite unnecessary for increased revenue demands by the railways at this time. Certainly the railways would have under those circumstances no argument to substantiate a demand for higher freight rates. The government therefore must take full responsibility for the situation which has led to the 21 per cent increase in freight rates.

To give the railways a blood transfusion of a 21 per cent increase in freight rates when they are in a relatively healthy position is in my opinion quite unjustifiable. I would ask what has happened to the reserves, which, according to "Railways in Canada, 1945", a publication issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, had reached at the end of 1945 the sum of $493 million. What has become of these reserves?

The main opposition to the increase is, however, based upon the fact that it imposes an added burden upon a freight rate structure already discriminatory in effect upon the west and upon the maritimes. It places an intolerable burden on the economy of these regions. It is a severe blow to the economy of the prairies and of the provinces down by the sea. It intensifies the discrimination in freight rates as between the central provinces and the remainder of the dominion. There is not the least doubt that it will have a disruptive effect upon the Canadian economy as a whole. It contributes to inflation and will increase most substantially the cost of living of the people of the prairies and of the maritimes. According to a report in Time magazine of April 12, the new rates will take $70 million out of the pockets of Canadians, particularly in the maritimes and in western Canada. There has already been a noticeable increase in the mark-up of goods in various parts of Canada since this 21 per cent increase. For instance, in Vancouver, automobiles and trucks are now up from $25 to $50. In Halifax steak is up twelve cents a pound and tea up ten cents a pound.

According to an article appearing in the Regina Leader-Post of March 31, a paper that is most friendly to the government, the new rates will boost lumber costs $3 per 1,000 feet, canned goods forty cents a case, farm tractors from $8 to $14 apiece, coal twenty-five cents a ton and fertilizer forty cents a ton or more. In other words, the grocery bill and fuel, clothing and construction costs will be greatly increased. Furthermore, the heavier rates will increase the cost of production for the farmer, since gasoline, farm machinery and other commodities which go into his production costs will all cost more money. This will force the farmer in turn to demand a higher price for his produce in order to make ends meet.

Prairie people, and I am sure maritimers as well, are quite prepared to assume their fair share of transportation costs. I refer to the maritimes deliberately, Mr. Speaker, because I am a maritimer by birth and I have some real reason for bringing this part of the country into any speech on freight rates. I am sure that both the prairies and the maritimes are quite prepared to assume their fair share of transportation costs, but the rates in these regions, even prior to the recent increase of 21 per cent, were higher than in the central provinces. On the prairies, for instance, they were 15 per cent higher. A freight rate in Ontario of $1 becomes $1.15 on the western plains. This is the main reason for the opposition to the flat increase of 21 per cent across the board, recently permitted by the board of transport commissioners and sanctioned by the federal government.

The prairies have always provided top operating revenue for the railways. According to figures released in the equalization of rates case in 1927, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's net earnings in the western region were double those received in its eastern region. The freight rate structure has not been materially altered since that time until the present 21 per cent increase was granted. Therefore the same situation prevailed until 1948. Operations in eastern Canada have been less profitable for the railways because of greater competition, which has been referred to again and again in this house, and because of heavier maintenance charges to which the railways there have been subject. This has made a difference in the net revenue in the two regions. But in the case of the prairies it seems grossly unfair to discriminate against them in this matter just to provide additional revenue for the railways in order to meet the deficits which they may accumulate in the eastern region.

Last year when I spoke on this subject I said:

> There should be no attempt to be unfair to the railways. On the other hand, if an over-all increase in freight rates is discriminatory in effect it may have dangerous consequences.

I still think so, Mr. Speaker. I continue with the quotation:

> The imposition of an unfair and unwieldy freight structure upon any region of Canada can well develop an anti-confederation attitude. This has manifested itself on several occasions, both in the maritimes and in the west. This, of course, is to be avoided. All Canadians must remember that confederation should be based on equality and that economic discrimination against any area in the dominion may create separatist sentiments. I suggest that now is the opportune time to examine the whole freight rate structure so as to remove existing inequalities.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that is what I said last year when the application was being submitted to the board for an increase in freight rates. I continue the quotation:

> Now is the time to set up a royal commission, if you will, to investigate thoroughly all charges of discrimination which have been levelled against the railways by western and other organizations. I submit that, until this whole matter is ironed out to the satisfaction of both the west and the maritimes, no body is in any position to appraise the need for a general increase in railway rates of any kind.

But the increase has been allowed without any attempt being made to remove the discrimination in rates which exists. That was the mistake which was made. Now the minister states, in an afterthought, that the present board of transport commissioners will be instructed to conduct an inquiry into alleged discrimination in the rates schedule. This is not a hopeful augury. The board has now been occupied for more than a year inquiring into the sufficiency of the present rates, and to appoint such a board to go into the whole rate structure will be in effect asking it simply to review its own findings. Surely this should have been done—

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McKAY: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that he made that statement a year ago, I wonder whether the hon. member can explain to us why the western governments not only did not make application to the board to have discrimination and inequalities considered, but stated that they were not prepared to go on with presentation of the case?

Mr. McKAY: In answer to that question, may I say that this government is aware that discrimination does exist. I was coming to that point—

Mr. GARDINER: Agreed.

Mr. McKAY: I was coming to that point in a few minutes. This government, as well as the provinces concerned, is aware of the discrimination, and the board are aware of it because they have had sufficient material before them to prove that there is discrimination. In those circumstances, why has no action been taken without an application? Do they have to wait until they get an application? As a matter of fact, the minister—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask a question?

Mr. McKAY: Just a moment please until I finish. The minister has already said that he has instructed the board to do something about an investigation of discrimination in rates. They are not now waiting for an application. Why were instructions not given before on the matter of freight rate equalization?

Mr. PROBE: There was no chance of a defeat at that time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I answer the hon. gentleman? The hon. gentleman asks how it is that, although the board have full information with reference to discrimination, yet they will not deal with it. My reply to that is that the board have not the full information; they could not possibly have full information until such time as a case for discrimination has been laid before them.

Mr. GARDINER: By the provinces.

Mr. CHEVRIER: By the provinces or by any other public body. The case which was laid before the board fourteen months ago was one for an increase in freight rates, and until such time as one for discrimination or removal of inequalities—has been made and it will take a thorough investigation; I am sure the hon. gentleman will admit that—they cannot deal with inequalities.

Mr. McKAY: I suggest that the minister read the speech of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) on this matter at page 2939 of Hansard. He definitely said then—and I wholeheartedly agree with what he said—that the board have authority to take this action if they feel disposed to do so. If the minister will permit me to continue, Mr.

Speaker, I should like to say that the government has been aware of the discriminatory rates condition for some time, and certainly we have not been remiss in our duty in this corner of the house for we have brought it to the attention of the government on several occasions. Material in the hands of the board also substantiates the fact that such a condition prevails. I am quite certain that the seven provinces concerned in this matter will not be very well satisfied with this afterthought on the part of the minister. The people of the west and the maritimes want action, and they want that action now.

Furthermore, I think the public in the seven provinces concerned will demand that a wholly independent body, untrammeled by past rulings, precedents and judgments, be set up to deal with this urgent matter. The matter of freight rate discrimination should be dealt with in a wholly objective manner. This is a job for a royal commission, and I urge upon the minister to restore public confidence by setting up such a body. I do not feel that much will be gained by the reviewer reviewing its own findings or its own judgments. A royal commission completely independent should be appointed to examine the host of questions affecting public policy in this regard, and to bring in a report to parliament as expeditiously as possible.

I question the competency of the present board to deal with this subject, a board appointed to control railway rates and practices, and I say that, Mr. Speaker, despite what the minister said this afternoon to the effect that the board has power to deal with equalization of rates. If power exists, why has it not been used? This is a very important matter; it is a matter of freight rate differential, and it affects the economy of the country. Furthermore, the subject of freight rate discrimination appears completely outside the sphere of authority of the board on this matter, or it should have been dealt with long ago.

I believe, however, that any commission of inquiry which might be appointed should act and act quickly. There has been a public apathy toward certain of these commissions in the past. There is good reason for it, because they have too often been abortive of results, and public suspicion of them is to some extent well founded. The reports of many royal commissions are gathering dust in the archives of this nation and have been doing so for many years. I suggest, therefore, that a year on such an inquiry is ample time, for if a longer period were taken it would only promote a lack of confidence and intensify the agitation which already exists in both the west and the maritimes against the decision of the board and against the railways as a whole. Such a commission should, in my opinion, be instructed to act with dispatch and to submit a report not later than the next session of parliament. Such a body could examine the effects of the whole freight rate structure upon our whole economic life.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I believe freight rates on essential goods should be held to a minimum. Moreover, there must not be regional discrimination. If periods should occur when operating expenses exceed revenues, the nation as a whole should be responsible for the deficits. All parts of Canada should assume a part of that burden if it should occur. The future welfare of Canada as a nation may well be at stake if rates are to vary in different parts of the country. Moreover, it is time that the dependence of the railways on the west for top operating revenue stopped. Until now the west has carried the major load in providing the railway system with profits. All the west and the maritimes are now asking is that they, as a part of this nation, be accorded a square deal in this urgent matter that affects their economy.

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate to delay the house for more than a few minutes. I feel, however, that I should make just a few remarks on this most important subject. Almost without exception every speaker so far has reiterated the fact that the railways are entitled to additional revenue. Most of the opposition seems to be directed toward the fact that the government did not prevent the order from going into effect at once. The opposition members, more particularly those from the maritimes, have stated time and again that editorial opinion in the maritimes is directed against the increase. I consider it important now that I should point out that an editorial recently appearing in the Charlottetown Patriot, and written by the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, one of the members of the Duncan commission, whose report has been quoted with much approval in this house, is just to the opposite effect. This editorial appeared on April 19, and I shall make one or two brief quotations from it:

> The decision of the board of transport commissioners to allow the railways an increase in freight rates of 21 per cent—

Mr. GRAYDON: This was ruled on yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I continue:

—not 30 per cent as the railways requested, is still causing wide discussion, much of it ill-considered, uninformed and some of it bordering on illogical hysteria in its prophecy of resulting ruin.

Mr. GRAYDON: Once again I say this was ruled on yesterday.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I continue:

Protests against the increase of rates are still loud and at times inaccurate in their implications.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. LESAGE: There is no point of order. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is trying to be smart.

Mr. GRAYDON: No one seems to have recognized the point of order involved. I should think Your Honour would, because it was your ruling yesterday.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I just came into the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that. For that reason, perhaps I had better bring Your Honour up to date. Yesterday the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant) attempted, I think he said, to paraphrase and I take him at his word. I always take his word. But in any event, he said he was going to paraphrase an editorial which was written by Cyrus Macmillan and which, I understand, suited some of my hon. friends on the other side of the house. He was about to read it into the record, but Your Honour refused him that privilege, and I think perhaps properly so. But I do not think this editorial—

Mr. GRANT: I did not read it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just a minute. It would be nice to hear the hon. member, but I should like to go further in my remarks.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems to me that we should not allow this editorial to take flight around from one member to another in order to have it read. I should think what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. I suggest that goose and gander ought to be treated alike.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which is which?

Mr. GRAYDON: I will leave that for the public to decide.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: On the point of order, I wish to refer to Beauchesne, third edition, 1943, notation 262.

Mr. LOW: We are governed by May.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: The notation reads:

The practice of reading extracts from newspapers to support an argument in debate has been followed in the British house since 1840, when Speaker Peel, with the acquiescence of the house, allowed a member to proceed to read passages from a newspaper. In 1856, when a member was called to order for reading an extract from a newspaper, the Speaker stated that on former occasions when he had attempted to enforce this rule, he had been overruled by the house.

And again, notation 263:

Speaker Brand decided on June 3, 1878, and his decision seems to have settled the point, that a member is not out of order in reading a newspaper article on which he proposes to found a motion.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. member intend to found a motion on it?

Mr. GRAYDON: What motion has the hon. member?

Mr. MacNAUGHT: Notation 264 points out that it is out of order to read extracts in a debate under certain conditions, and goes on to enumerate the occasions. I submit that none of those applies to the point in issue, and therefore I insist that I am perfectly in order in reading this extract.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order—

An hon. MEMBER: Another one?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, another one. I wish to state that I should not like to see hon. gentlemen opposite reflect on the decision made by Your Honour yesterday, and I hope they will not persist in doing so. Your Honour ruled clearly on that point.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) has quoted the Speaker's ruling in 1856, and I note the following:

. . . the Speaker stated that on former occasions when he had attempted to enforce this rule, . . .

Therefore the rule must have been in existence; otherwise he could not have attempted to enforce it. But at that time he was overruled by the house. If the house wishes to have read editorials commenting on what is taking place in the house I have no objection. But I think the rule is clear that members may quote an article which is merely a statement of fact; and I now read from Beauchesne, third edition, the latter part of notation 266:

Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order.

If the hon. member for Prince wants to quote an editorial which merely states facts, I would not object. But if it is a commentary on what has taken place in the house, I do not think it is within the rules.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a commentary.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If it is a commentary on what is taking place in the house I do not think it is in order.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I have only this to say, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the citation you have read. It has been properly pointed out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has been decided; the Speaker ruled it out of order.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I am not raising a point of order; I am speaking to the point. The citation refers to "any proceedings in the house." I submit that we are debating something with which the house had nothing to do. It was a decision of the cabinet, and the cabinet is not a committee of the House of Commons. Therefore we are debating something over which the house at that time had no control.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is a proceeding before the house now; there is always a proceeding of some kind before the house. That proceeding is an amendment to the motion to go into supply. During this debate the Speaker has ruled that commentaries, from sources outside the house, on what is taking place in the house at the present time, are not in order; and I think the house should abide by that ruling.

Mr. GARDINER: Just to get the point of order clear, I have not read the editorial—

Mr. GRAYDON: Have you read the rules?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I have; but I submit that the editorial, as I understand it, is not affected by the ruling the Speaker has given. I understand that the editorial contained a comment on the decision of the government to accept the judgment of the railway board. That is not discussing something which is taking place in this house at the present time.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the point brought up by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), may I remind Your Honour that on April 20 the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) sought to read from an editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 9. At that time it was his contention, as the Minister of Agriculture has contended, that the editorial commented, not on what was taking place in this house but on an "unfortunate decision" that had been made by the government. As I look at the rules, it seems to me that there is room for argument on both sides, but the fact is that on two occasions, while you were in the chair, you have stopped first the hon. member for Saskatoon City from reading an editorial in the Star-Phoenix, and the Liberal member for Kings (Mr. Grant) from reading the very editorial the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) now proposes to read. I submit that, however we may interpret the rules, at least Your Honour will have to be consistent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I thought Your Honour had made your ruling, but since you have permitted a discussion in support of the argument advanced by the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to say that on April 15, when I was taking part in this debate, the Speaker of the house rose and referred me to citation 306 of Beauchesne. At the time I was quoting from an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press exactly along the line mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture, but I was ruled out of order. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from reading his editorial, but surely when a ruling is made in this house it should apply to all sides.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If I ruled previously that an hon. member could not refer to what the board had done or to some previous action of the government, that should have been brought to my attention at the time. If the hon. member who had the floor at that time had brought the point to my attention, probably I would not have given the ruling, but I did not understand that he brought it to my attention. I think we shall have to leave it to the discretion of the hon. member for Prince—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not read the editorial, and I do not know whether or not it is a commentary on what is taking place in this house That will not be known until the editorial is read. I will repeat the ruling that if it is a commentary on the present debate I do not think the hon. member should read it; but if it is not such a commentary he may read it, as any other hon. member could. I do not think I should permit further debate on my ruling at this time.

Mr. KNIGHT: On the point of order—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I have given my ruling.

Mr. KNIGHT: On a question of privilege, my name has been mentioned in this connection and I want to put the matter right. Your Honour has just said I should have brought this matter to your attention at the time, and I would point out that I did so at page 3148 of Hansard, in the following words:

With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this comment has to do with the government, not with the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I did not get the import of the hon. gentleman's remark at the time, which I regret. However, as I say my ruling is that commentaries by parties or persons outside the house on what is taking place within the house at the present time are not in order.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I was practically through with the quotation when the point of order was raised. The concluding sentence of the first paragraph is:

In response to these protests the government has taken the most reasonable action.

I wish also to quote one sentence from another editorial appearing in the Sydney Post-Record, a newspaper not noted for its friendliness toward the present government. The first sentence in the third paragraph reads:

In its decision not to interfere with the increase in railway freight rates, the federal government stands on solid ground.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I would refer to one other point. There seems to be much confusion in the maritimes as to the effect of this decision on the benefits accruing under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I am happy to point out that if one looks into the judgment he will find that the benefits under that act have not been interfered with in any way.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate that hon. members want to get through with this debate; but if they had received the letters and resolutions I have received they would feel as I do, that it is my duty to say a few words in support of this amendment. I have boiled down what I should like to have said into a short speech, and I hope I may have the privilege of delivering it now.

It would seem to me that the board of transport commissioners, in allowing a horizontal increase, has not carried out the intention of the Railway Act. Section 31 of that act deals with the matter of equity with respect to tolls and facilities. In effect the section says there shall be equality as to tolls with respect to all classes carried under substantially the same circumstances and conditions, and no toll shall be charged which unjustly discriminates between different localities. The two principal considerations governing the board are, first, as to the reasonableness of the rate, and, second, whether or not there is the feature of unjust discrimination.

Many instances of discrimination and injustice have been cited by hon. members in all parts of the house and belonging to all parties in the house, and I do not intend to take time to go farther into those discriminations. I wish to point out, however, that we have had increases in freight rates in the past. The first increase, following the first world war, came in 1917, when they were increased 15 per cent. The second increase was in 1918, and was 25 per cent, while the third increase came in 1920. The increase in 1920, however, was not horizontal. That is the point I wish to make. The board in the past has made at least one increase where the increase was not horizontal and was different in different parts of Canada. For instance, in eastern Canada the increase was 40 per cent and, in western Canada, 35 per cent, and on the transcontinental rates it was 33½ per cent, subject to certain exemptions.

My contention is that the board knows and has known that there has been discrimination for years. It seems to me that when the board allowed a horizontal increase it took the easy way out. Had the board increased freight rates in a manner similar to that which was done in 1920, allowing an increase of 30 per cent in eastern Canada and 10 per cent in western Canada, there would not have been such a protest made as has been made by the western and maritime provinces. This would, of course, have required more work and more study as to what actual percentages of increase should have been allowed.

Much has been said about the Canadian National Railways and their needs. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) made what I thought was an excellent analysis of the balance sheet of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am not going to deal with the Canadian Pacific this afternoon. The figures which he gave at that time will have to be answered by the government and by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) before this debate is concluded.

In considering the need of the Canadian National Railways I think it is essential that this house take a look at the financial structure of that corporation, and I should like to quote from the judgment of the board of transport commissioners in this regard:

The situation in respect to Canadian National Railways is quite different today to the situation prevailing in 1920 or even in 1926. The railways are now fully integrated into one great railway transportation system which is well and efficiently operated and managed. Furthermore, the Canadian National Railways Capital Revisions Act, 1937 (Canada, chapter 22, 1937), went a long way towards alleviating the financial burden carried by the railway. One of the results of the adjustments which were made by the said act, in the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways in 1937, was to reduce by $35,000,000 the amount of interest payable by the Canadian National to the government of Canada, the proprietors, on moneys advanced by the parliament of Canada to the railways to defray operating deficits incurred prior to 1937.

In 1936 the fixed charges were shown for the Canadian National Railways at $86,995,878; in 1937 they had decreased to $51,597,321, and in 1946, through refinancing during the war, to $46,104,620.

In 1939 the interest on government loans amounted to $916,165, but in 1946 this item had reached the total of $21,322,583. Mr. Vaughan, president of Canadian National Railways, in his statement before the board, on the present application, repeated his suggestion which was previously made to the railways committee of the House of Commons "that at least this amount of $400,000,000 which the government had loaned for the purpose of repatriating securities should be placed on an income bond basis," that is, that the interest on this amount would be paid only if earned. Were this suggestion of Mr. Vaughan approved by parliament, it would go far towards placing the fixed charges of Canadian National on a comparable basis with other roads in Canada and the United States. This is, however, a question for parliament and not one for consideration of the board.

The situation as it stands today is that the Canadian National Railways must earn sufficient net railway operating income to meet fixed charges, which in 1947 amounted to $44,745,000. On the other hand the Canadian Pacific Railway Company only needs $18,000,000 for fixed charges.

The suggestion which Mr. Vaughan made in a statement before the board that the amount of $400,000,000 which the government had lent the railway for the purpose of repatriating securities should be placed on an income bond basis, that is, that the interest on this amount would be paid only if earned, seems to me a matter that the government should take under serious consideration.

In considering interest rates alone, and the difference in interest rates paid by the two companies, I find that in 1947 on capital borrowings bearing interest of 4 per cent or more the Canadian Pacific borrowed $10,700,000 at 4 per cent, while the Canadian National borrowed $128,000,000 at 5 per cent; $48,000,000 at 4¾ per cent; $181,000,000 at 4½ per cent and $46,000,000 at 4 per cent.

If the government would bring about refunding of the Canadian National debt to such a point where it would not be overly burdened, the need for increased freight rates would not be so great.

Speaking before the railway committee of the House of Commons on Monday, April 19, Mr. Vaughan said that the question of lowering the burden of debt the line owes the government was constantly before the finance department; interest payments were entirely too high.

In the railways' application for higher rates they pointed to the great increases in wages paid employees. I believe it was yesterday that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) drew to the attention of the house the wonderful progress which has been made in technological developments. He pointed to the fact that larger engines are hauling larger trains and larger boxcars, and that there are greater numbers of them. In that connection I should like to place a few figures on record. In 1922 there were 165,635 employees of all the railroads in Canada. During that year the railways carried 108,530,518 freight tons, or an average of 655·2 freight tons per employee. In 1946 they had 180,383 employees and carried 179,966,180 freight tons, or an average of 997·7 freight tons per employee. This represents an increase of about 52 per cent in freight tons per employee. I think that is something which has not thus far been brought to the attention of the house.

It has been suggested to me by different Canadian National employees that some discrimination exists against the Canadian National in the matter of handling government business. For instance, on October 11, 1945, 1,700 recruits were moved from Vancouver to Halifax on the Canadian Pacific railway, which required four trains of seventeen cars each. In giving me this information, a Canadian National employee had this to say:

> Here we have the C.N.R. with a better grade, where one engine could handle each train, standing by while the C.P.R. requiring three engines to each train through the mountains, walks off with a rich haul. I cannot resist drawing this to your attention as it is a case of the C.P.R. getting the cream of the transportation business in every instance and our officials sit back apparently helpless because of the pressure from somewhere, I do not know.

In the northern part of my constituency, the Canadian Pacific have running rights over several Canadian National lines. My information, which I got from a source which I believe is reliable, is that the Canadian Pacific pick up loads all along the Canadian National line. I am also informed that mail travelling on the Canadian National destined to the west coast from Saskatoon is unloaded in Edmonton and reloaded on the Canadian Pacific route through Calgary. These are matters which I think should be investigated and, if found to be correct, rectified.

In 1947 estimates of the Post Office Department, I find that the Canadian Pacific received $4,177,775 for mail carried, while the Canadian National received $3,756,489, or $421,286 less than that received by the Canadian Pacific. This means that the Canadian National receive 11 per cent less of moneys paid for carrying mail than did the Canadian Pacific.

I want to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the total mileage of the Canadian National Railways is 23,660 miles, while that of the Canadian Pacific Railway is 20,899 miles, giving to the Canadian National almost 13 per cent more miles than the Canadian Pacific, so that with 13 per cent more mileage than the Canadian Pacific the Canadian National receives 11 per cent less of the moneys paid by the government for carrying mail.

This situation is bad enough, but there is another type of discrimination to which I should like to direct the attention of the government. This is something to which I have drawn attention before. Governments in the past have allowed the Canadian Pacific to run branch lines into districts adjacent to Canadian National lines. We all know that these lines go through districts which vary as to the kind of soil and in other respects. You can go into Saskatchewan and find many places where the Canadian National have built lines into fertile districts which are now tapped by the Canadian Pacific. The latter company is taking freight which I think should justifiably go to our own Canadian National.

The Minister of Transport is young and energetic. I think he should begin to take a greater interest in the Canadian National Railways and to see that this sort of discrimination is done away with.

During the period of the war the railways did very well and there was no talk of an increase in rates. This because they were able to carry on a two-way traffic and lots of it. But many times in the past those of us who come from the west have seen our farm products hauled away in mile-long trains loaded to capacity. We got very little for those products, with the result that we also saw mile-long trains coming back from eastern Canada consisting of empty boxcars. We should see to it that that condition never recurs, because if it does we shall have the railroads asking for another increase in freight rates.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). The minister has complained that many of the speeches made during this debate have been destructive in character, but I think the hon. member for Davenport made some good suggestions. One suggestion was that there should be greater production and the development of backward areas.

In offering a partial solution to this question of freight rates, I would suggest three main points for the government to consider. First, there should be a refinancing of the Canadian National debt structure and a reduction of the interest rate. Second, there should be planning for more traffic by increased production. Third, subsidies should be paid where necessary in connection with lines which are not productive and where the traffic is not sufficient to pay operating costs.

After this action has been taken, the board of transport commissioners, to which I think some new blood should be added, should then carry out the provisions of the Railway Act, which states that there should be equality as to tolls with respect to all traffic carried under substantially similar circumstances and conditions and that no toll shall be charged which unjustly discriminates between different localities.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I shall delay the house for only a few minutes because the case for this group has been placed before the house and the government earlier in the debate. We consider that it was good business to state our case and let it rest. This morning, as well as during the past weeks since this freight rate increase has been in effect, I have received a number of complaints. I should like to bring two of these to the attention of the house.

The first was received from a merchant in a small town near the Saskatchewan border who complains about express rates from Edmonton to his town. On April 3 he received from Edmonton a shipment of two boxes weighing 55 pounds for which he paid 42 cents. On April 10 he received a similar two boxes weighing 54 pounds for which he was billed 81 cents, or practically a 100 per cent increase. We have been given to understand that only a 21 per cent increase was authorized. One week later, on April 17, he received another shipment weighing 52 pounds for which he was billed 80 cents. This party has written me and he wants an explanation which I cannot give him. If the minister can give me an answer I will pass it on to this merchant. He and many others are really peeved about this increase in freight rates which has been granted without having the discriminatory features of the freight rate structure removed.

I received a letter this morning from the Edmonton chamber of commerce. This contains some suggestions which I should like to place on the record. Their letter reads:

> It is the opinion of this chamber that such an inquiry should be conducted by an independent tribunal, in the nature of a royal commission, and this chamber has so advocated for the past year and a half. In so advocating, the chamber does not desire to express lack of confidence in the board of transport commissioners, but desires to point out that what may in some repects be an appeal from the findings of a quasi judicial body should not be referred to the same body. Furthermore, the chamber feels the inquiry should be by well qualified men, versed in the field of commerce and economics who would be unhampered in any way by the statutory restrictions by which the board of transport commissioners has heretofore been hedged about.

The chamber has been advocating, and still advocates, the appointment of a commission of the prestige and influence of the Rowell-Sirois commission because the chamber feels the question of freight rates is the single most important matter facing the Canadian economy at the present time.

Skipping two or three paragraphs, I quote again:

. . . it would seem unfortunate that the findings of any such inquiry should be anticipated by the implementation of the present 21 per cent increase, and the chamber considers it to be in the interests of Canada that the findings of the board of transport commissioners be deferred until the new inquiry has had an opportunity of hearing evidence, fully considering matters and reporting to the government of the day.

In the view of this chamber it would be in the public interest, if necessary, to protect independent railways from operating losses by governmental subsidy while the commission conducts its study.

That is the exact stand which was taken by this group when our position was placed before the house some days ago. I want to endorse these suggestions fully, as does my group, and commend them to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker having read the motion, the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken on the amendment to the amendment and I wish to comment on it very briefly.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is very clear that when the Speaker rises—

Mr. COLDWELL: I rose too.

Mr. GARDINER: —and puts the question and asks if the house is ready for the question, and the house agrees—

Mr. COLDWELL: The house did not agree.

Mr. GARDINER: I was watching very closely what took place. The Speaker started to read the question to the house before the hon. member stood up the first time and, that being the case, I submit that, under the rules of the house, there is no opportunity for any further speaking.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I started to rise when you rose, but as you had risen to your feet I resumed my seat. I rose because I had not spoken to the amendment to the amendment and I wanted to speak on it for a very few minutes. I think, Mr. Speaker, I am within my rights in suggesting to you that I should be accorded that opportunity. I sat down simply because you also were on your feet.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was on his feet, although it is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that you may not have noticed it. My second point of order is this, that Your Honour had not concluded reading the amendment to the amendment before the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was again on his feet. So on both points of order, Your Honour, I feel that the hon. member is in order in speaking.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for just a few moments on the amendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken).

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I insist on a ruling on the point of order I raised. Is it correct or incorrect?

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the Minister of Agriculture is well taken. As hon. members know, according to the rule, when the Speaker has started to put the question no member is allowed to speak. When I rose I asked the house first: Is the house ready for the question? And no member rose. The question before the house was the whole question, the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment, and when I asked if hon. members were ready for the question—

Mr. COLDWELL: Your Honour did not ask that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I asked the house first: Is the house ready for the question? I certainly did, and no member rose. Then I put the question. So I think we should proceed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before Your Honour finally rules, may I refer you to Beauchesne, Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second Edition, citation 260:

A member may not speak on a question after the Speaker or Chairman has collected the voices both of the yeas and nays on that question. A question is said to be "fully put" when the voices have been so collected.

May I also point out, Mr. Speaker, that I always try to be courteous to the Chair, and when I saw you on your feet I knew I should resume my seat, and I did. I had partly risen when you rose, Mr. Speaker, and then I took my seat again when you were on your feet. I believe that the rule which governs in this case is the one I have cited, citation 260, that the question is not "fully put" until the voices of members have been heard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already explained the situation to hon. members and they know very well what is the practice. After the house is ready to divide on the question, it would be of no use to listen to other hon. members. But if a mistake occurred, and it is the wish of the house that the hon. member should be given unanimous consent to proceed, he may proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Other hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is very good of you, Mr. Speaker, to put it in that way, that I may proceed with the unanimous consent of the house, but I do not wish to have the unanimous consent of the house. I am standing on the position that the whole question had not been fully put and that I am within my rights to speak at this stage. I appreciate very much Your Honour's suggestion that I may proceed with the unanimous consent of the house, but I believe I am right in my contention that the question has not been put. Your Honour did not say, for example: The question is on the subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Now, and no voices have yet been heard. Have I the right to speak?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not want any confusion. Hon. members know perfectly well the practice we have always followed in the house. The Speaker rises and asks the house: Is the house ready for the question? It is then open to any member to rise and speak on the amendment or on the amendment to the amendment or on the main motion. I put the question to the house and no member rose, so I started to read the motion. After that, I could take the yeas and nays. I ask hon. members to allow me to proceed.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Bracken) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was paired with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). Had I voted, I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. JEAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Had I voted, I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not vote, Mr. Speaker. I have had a long association with these railways, and I thought I owed it to the integrity of this house and myself to abstain, which I did.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). Had I voted, I would have voted for the subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. BURTON: May I ask you to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I asked if the house was ready for the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and an hon. member of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) rose to speak. So, it being after six o'clock, I have to say, It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, if this question of freight rates were not such a serious one it would indeed be funny, the way the government and its supporters are endeavouring to force such an unjust and unfair ruling onto the greater part of this country. The least a person can say is that it is ironical that the only representative from Saskatchewan in the cabinet—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe it is my duty to call the attention of the hon. member and the house, before we carry on with this debate, to the fact that we have had a long debate on this question. Of course it is the privilege of the house to continue the debate as long as hon. members think it should be continued.

I have been most generous in permitting hon. members not, shall I say, to read their speeches—because that is against the rules of the house—but to consult their notes in the debate. I do not believe, however, that in carrying on with this debate I should permit hon. members to read their speeches. I must advise hon. members, therefore, that from now on I shall be very severe. I will not tolerate any member reading his speech.

Mr. BURTON: On a question of privilege, may I inquire whether Your Honour was implying that I was beginning to read my speech?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to have the respect he should have for the Chair. I have made this statement before the hon. member begins, to call the attention of hon. members to this point so that they will not read their speeches. Moreover I must call the attention of all hon. members to the fact that I will not tolerate any member attempting to indicate that he is not reading his speech by stating that he is just consulting his notes. If hon. members are reading their speeches, I shall not tolerate it.

Mr. BURTON: If this is a speech that is being read, then I would say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I will not tolerate any representations from the hon. member. I did not accuse him of reading his speech; I did not say he was reading it. I just called the attention of hon. members in the house to the fact that I will not tolerate any hon. members reading their speeches. I would ask hon. members not to forget the rules the Speaker has to apply.

Mr. BURTON: I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to be discourteous to the Chair or in any other way to violate the rules of the house. I wish to assure you and all other hon. members that I have not a written speech before me, and that I have very scanty notes which I wish to consult. If necessary, I shall speak even without consulting those notes.

So far as the other matter was concerned, the one with which I was dealing before I was interrupted, I was going to say it is ironical that the only representative in the cabinet from Saskatchewan should make use of the only time he has taken part in the debate to speak in an attempt to prevent my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), from exercising his right to speak to the amendment to the amendment.

In that connection may I also say that the only other member from Saskatchewan on the government side of the house has not taken part in the debate. However he did have quite a bit to say about it out in the west. In that connection I quote from a report in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 3, where he said:

> I think the west will get a fair deal out of the freight rates situation under proper representations.

Then he described the ruling of the board of transport commissioners, and I should like to have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) pay attention to this:

> He described the ruling of the board of transport commissioners as just an advisory ruling.

Farther on comes the gem of the interview, where he says:

> We are best represented by our members at Ottawa. But there are only four of us from the west; two from Alberta and two from Saskatchewan.

Then he said:

> How I could have used the support of fifteen or twenty Liberal members in my talks before the caucus.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if those fifteen or twenty imaginary Liberal members from Saskatchewan would not have been any more vocal in the interests of the people of that province than are the two Liberal members from there at the present time, it would have been just too bad for Saskatchewan.

Then, to think that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should raise the point that he did raise this afternoon, in an endeavour to shut off the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Those of us who have lived in the west, those of us who have helped build up the west, realize that this is not the first time we have been let down by Liberal members from the west. In connection with this question of freight rates, may I say it is such a large subject and one which covers so much ground that, despite the fact that we have spent considerable time in a discussion of it, there is still much that could be said. However, it is not my intention to go into the details of the various angles of this question which affect the people of the constituency I have the honour to represent, which affect the people of Saskatchewan; indeed, the people of the western provinces, as well as the maritimes.

I would say, however, that during the time this debate has been in progress a number of members taking part in the debate have endeavoured from time to time to show that there has existed and still exists discrimination as between the different parts of Canada, so far as freight rates are concerned. A number of times the Minister of Transport and his supporters have endeavoured to brush that aside by saying that the question of discrimination will be referred to the board of transport commissioners for further consideration. In that way he is trying to shove that part of the debate to the side. I would draw to his attention, through you, Mr. Speaker, that last year when members of this group were trying to bring the question of discrimination before the house the Minister of Transport took another view of the matter. I have here before me Hansard of March 6, 1947.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, we have just completed a vote on the amendment to the amendment which had to do with discrimination and inequalities. The amendment now before the house involves only the deferring of increases in rates. As I say, we have already taken a vote of the house on the other question and I think we should go on and discuss the amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the point of order, I fail to follow the Minister of Agriculture. Our amendment states that what has been proposed by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the people of Canada, is discriminatory to some of the people of Canada. Hence I contend that what the hon. gentleman is saying about discrimination in reply to the minister is perfectly within the bounds of this debate.

An hon. MEMBER: That is another foul ball.

Mr. COLDWELL: You have to stifle discussion of that kind. You are afraid of it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are trying to carry the debate ad nauseam.

Mr. BENTLEY: It will nauseate you when you hear it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Indeed it is nauseating.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member who has the floor and the hon. members who have spoken on the point of order know perfectly well that in debate they should not refer to a question which has already been settled by a vote of the house. The amendment now before the house reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to defer the imposition of the increases in freight rates recently authorized by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada; further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time."

I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment now before the house. The amendment upon which the house voted this afternoon reads as follows:

> Regrets the government's failure to secure the removal of inequalities and discriminations in the Canadian railway freight rates structure before the imposition of a horizontal increase of twenty-one per cent—an increase which is bound to intensify the aforesaid inequalities and discriminations.

I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment now before the house. I realize that some hon. members may say the amendment now before the house is close to the spirit of the subamendment upon which a vote was taken this afternoon, but hon. members must admit that if I accepted the amendment to the amendment it was because there was a difference between the amendment to the amendment and the amendment. I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the amendment and not discuss the subamendment upon which a vote was taken this afternoon.

Mr. BURTON: Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall endeavour to the best of my ability to comply with your ruling. It is ironical that the Minister of Agriculture rises to his feet only on a point of order of this nature.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You have said that three times already.

Mr. BURTON: Your Honour has pointed out that the amendment to the amendment which was disposed of this afternoon—I shall not refer to it—was very close to the amendment moved some time ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, so I hope that if I should get close to the line you will take that fact into consideration.

In moving the amendment, we in this group asked the government to delay putting into effect the ruling of the board of transport commissioners because it was inimical to the welfare of the people in certain parts of the country. Consequently, when we deal with that matter we are dealing with a question which we endeavoured to discuss last year. At that time the Minister of Transport raised objections, and raised them successfully I would say, because members in this group were prevented from discussing what was then uppermost in their minds.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On a point of order, the hon. member is quite incorrect—

Mr. COLDWELL: No, he is not.

Mr. CHEVRIER—in the statement he has just made.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let the minister read Hansard of March 6.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I remember what happened since it concerns myself.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the minister to be kind enough to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will gladly do that, Mr. Speaker. The point of order which I make is that when the discussion on freight rates occurred on a previous occasion I took the position that, since the matter was before the board of transport commissioners, it was then sub judice and therefore could not be discussed in this house. Notwithstanding that position, I was overruled in part by Your Honour. Your Honour allowed a general discussion on freight rates, I think in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. When the hon. gentleman states that I objected to the debate and that they were not allowed to debate freight rates, I take issue with his statement and say it is unfounded and incorrect. The house was allowed an opportunity at that time to discuss freight rates.

Mr. COLDWELL: The discriminatory features were objected to.

Mr. BURTON: Were it not, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling of a few moments ago, I would be glad to place on the record the exact words of the Minister of Transport in that connection.

An hon .MEMBER: Do so now.

Mr. KNOWLES: If he did, you can.

Mr. BURTON: Since he has raised a point of order on that, may I ask your permission, sir, to quote from page 1087 of Hansard of March 6, 1947, where the minister is reported as saying:

> But in essence the hon. gentleman is discussing exactly what is before the board of transport commissioners today. He has referred to the discrimination alleged to exist between freight rates in the east and in the west. That is exactly what counsel have been arguing before the board. There can be no difficulty or doubt about that. I hope the hon. gentleman will understand that I do not want to interfere with free speech, but certainly there is no doubt in my own mind that what he is discussing is on all fours with the evidence given before the board.

Then on page 1088 the minister is reported as having said:

> I think I have the right to bring up this point, on the question of order. My hon. friend is quite right when he says the sole application before the board is for an increase in freight rates. But surely my hon. friend knows that those who are asked to appear with respect to that application have the right to reply on other matters, and they have in this reply pleaded this particular matter of the discrimination which may exist as between certain parts of Canada, with respect to both freight rates generally and what are known as regional rates. That matter has been discussed and evidence has been submitted. That is the point I am making, and I add that, in effect, that is what the hon. gentleman is discussing.

That is what the Minister of Transport said last year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Does he not think that in order to be fair he should put on record the decision of the Speaker?

Mr. BURTON: I would gladly do so if His Honour would not object. I would have done so long ago if it had not been for the Minister of Agriculture. At page 1087 of Hansard of March 6, 1947, when the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) was dealing with this question, he was interrupted by His Honour, who said:

> I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to direct his attention to the memorandum I prepared on this matter, which was read by the Deputy Speaker yesterday, and particularly to this paragraph—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. As I recalled to the attention of the house a few moments ago, we had a very long debate on that question, and I believed that it was my duty as the voice of the house to rule that the debate should be relevant to the matter before the house. Now we have an amendment actually before the house and I asked the hon. member a few minutes ago to confine his remarks to the amendment, but since he started his speech, which seems to have been enjoyed very much as shown by the laughter in the house, he has been on the borderline throughout not to say more, in spite of my advice. I have a duty to perform and I must insist upon the hon. member confining his remarks to the amendment before the house. If he does not do so, I shall be obliged to apply the sanction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has done nothing to call upon him the castigation you have just given him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. COLDWELL: I sat down too soon a little earlier.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wish to give the hon. member all the liberty he should have, but it is my duty to ask him to confine his remarks to the amendment before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is quite in order in what he is doing, that there is nothing improper in his behaviour as a member of this house and that the kind of lecture that has been given him is undeserved.

Mr. BURTON: I hope that I and all other members will profit by this incident. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to add a few personal words. Ever since I entered this chamber in 1943, in my conscience before God, I have not said or done anything in this house that was out of order; and even if I did not honour you personally as I do, I should still honour the office you hold and endeavour to conduct myself in an honourable and upright manner in this house.

The amendment moved by my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as I was saying before I was interrupted by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)—and if I may be permitted to say so, our whole difficulty this evening has come from the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—was moved to persuade the government that, for the time being, they should withhold the application of the order of the board of transport commissioners. I could show how this freight rate increase will affect my constituency and the province from which I come, and, going beyond the confines of that province, how it will affect other parts of this dominion, but I shall not weary the house this evening when apparently the members are in such a hurry to do something which I believe they will regret before many years are over.

I received my early education in the southern states, where I was born, in the union to the south of us. In the first part of that education the British form of government was not spoken of in any too glowing terms, but, having come to this country as a young lad and continued my education here, I was very soon impressed by the parliamentary system of government that prevails throughout the British empire. Following the admonitions of my father, I endeavoured to study that system, and the more I studied it, the more firmly I came to the conclusion that we had in this country a form of government that was well adapted to accomplishing everything we desired and that it was one that should be furthered and encouraged.

As one goes on through life, things sometimes occur, and possibly something occurred this evening, to check one's firm belief in something that he admires and loves. But all this while, Mr. Speaker, I have believed and still do believe in our parliamentary system of government, and one of our rights under that system is the right of appeal, even to the foot of the throne, if necessary. The appeal from the board's decision would go before the ministers who are His Majesty's advisers.

On a question such as this which affects the people of this country so vitally, we hear a great deal said about the need for national unity. I plead with the ministers on the treasury benches, who are seemingly determined to have this order go into effect before even the appeal against it can be heard, to withhold the imposition of the order until those provinces which have registered notice of their intention to appeal may be heard. On Saturday the premiers of seven of the nine provinces are to present their case to the government, and I think it would be only fair and proper for this house to defer the vote on the amendment moved by my leader until next week, until that appeal is heard. One way of doing that would be for the members from the west and the maritime provinces to continue this debate, but personally I think there is a much better way. All that this house has to do is to agree to adjourn this debate until some time next week. In the meantime we can go on with our other work. I shall make the proper motion in this respect in a moment. Because of the anxiety that has been shown by hon. members on the Liberal benches for us to get on with the business of the house, I am sure that they will support the motion I am about to make. I think it will be better for all concerned and in the interests of national unity for the government to go on with the other business of the house and give the premiers of the seven provinces an opportunity to present their case. Therefore I hope they will support my motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay):

That this debate be now adjourned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will please say "yea".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against the motion will please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the "nays" have it. Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Burton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): All right, Little Chicago; go to it. The house has just voted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Bottoms up!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members should understand that it is the duty of the Speaker to preserve order, and I would ask them to remain quiet while the hon. member continues his remarks.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): The house has just voted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to ask this question of hon. gentlemen on the Liberal benches. Is this a sample of Liberal democracy?

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has the floor asked us to go ahead with our remarks. That is his privilege, and we cannot be attacked for doing as we were asked.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to observe the privileges which are extended to all hon. members of this house, including freedom of speech, and I ask that this privilege be extended to the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): This house has just voted down a motion to adjourn the debate. Therefore I am going to continue the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): And if the hon. gentlemen on the other side want to keep this up until next Monday morning, I can stand it as long as they can.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: You have only forty minutes.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I can stand for more than forty minutes, and it will not be the first time I have done so. I have not taken part in this debate previously, but I fully intend to exercise my right to do so for the definite reason that I represent the constituency of Kootenay East in British Columbia, a province which has suffered under the freight rates structure as much as if not more than any other province.

(Translation):

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I certainly have the right, before the main motion is discussed, to say that I was paired with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and that had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

(Text):

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer the point of order.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have never posed as an expert on our freight rates structure, and I am not proposing to do so now; but living in the province of British Columbia, as I have for many years, I have always known of the inequality which existed and the fight which has been carried on for many years to remedy that situation. I have always coupled in my mind in connection with that struggle the names of two British Columbians.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Thank you, Little Chicago. You will get your own dose back one of these days, and I will do my share of it. If you do not know what courtesy is, we on this side of the house can teach you.

The gentlemen to whom I refer, who have participated so splendidly in this fight in past years, are the late Senator McGeer and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The late Senator McGeer was untiring in his efforts to obtain a better deal for the province of British Columbia; and I dare to think in my own mind that his interest in this problem went much deeper than the mere legal emolument he may have received for his services. Standing by his side year after year, tilting a brave lance, was the hon. member for New Westminster.

As I said a few moments ago, I am not an expert on this freight rate issue. but I do know something of the harmful effect this 21 per cent increase will have on the lives of the people of my constituency. In the Kootenays we produce huge quantities of goods and commodities: coal, lumber, ores, fruit, dairy produce and wheat. I am sure it would not hurt the house to learn that in my constituency, in the Creston valley area, lives Mrs. Amy Kelsey, who grew in that district wheat which won first prize at the Chicago exhibition and made her the wheat queen of North America.

When I speak of freight rates I am not speaking specifically for those larger producing interests, though naturally they are concerned over this 21 per cent increase. I am thinking particularly of the fruit growers of my constituency, the men who pack from two thousand to six or eight thousand boxes of fruit each season. These are the people who now are being over-burdened with this 21 per cent increase in freight rates; and I want to tell the members of this house that it does not matter whether these growers are Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F. or what have you, every last one of them is opposed to this increase. I believe it has already been pointed out in this debate that this increase will cost the fruit growers of British Columbia, particularly the tree fruit growers, a round million dollars extra in distributive transportation costs.

I have been amused the last few days, believe it or not, at the eagerness with which hon. members on the government benches, who are not here now—and if it was the noisy crowd we can well do without them—have been calling for the vote. They have all been so eager to have the vote: "Question; question!" they yell, every time an opposition member gets up to speak. I would remind them that that eagerness stems from the time the party caucus was held immediately after the moving of the amendment to which we are now speaking. The press all across the country carried headlines, "Government Threatened". Then after getting something of the news which came out of the party caucus, and after hearing various members on the government benches speak their piece, members who might well have been expected to bolt on this issue, the press, after hearing them say that they would vote to sustain the government, began, of course, to change its tune. Then we began to see new headlines: "Government Weathers Storm".

I venture to point out there are times when even the press of this country makes mistakes. And I am not so sure that the government has weathered the storm. My message to the government is this. Just because you may win this vote, do not pat yourselves on the back. This storm is just beginning. Instead of patting yourselves on the back, my advice would be to prepare to meet the deluge—because you will have to meet it if these things go on.

I should like if I may to say a few words about what was said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat this evening. Speaking in the house on Tuesday, April 20, as reported at page 3145 of Hansard, and referring to the C.C.F., he said:

> But there are hon. gentlemen of the cloth on the other side—my hon. friends have a number of them—and these hon. gentlemen should have told them that one of the oldest precepts in human relationships is that a man cannot serve two masters.

The implication being, I take it, that we of the C.C.F. group were trying to serve two masters, and that we were thereby inconsistent. Replying to that statement, may I say that in all my life I have never seen a more flagrant case of inconsistency than that exhibited by certain British Columbia members in connection with this particular issue. They themselves have expressed their feelings keenly. They have expressed the feelings of their province on this particular issue; and then, just to save their party from extinction and from being defeated they created a nice little fence for themselves, and then climbed on it, one after another. If that is not inconsistency, I should like to know what it is.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni ventured into the realm of holy writ when he said: "No man can serve two masters", and so I am going to ask the privilege of reading briefly from holy writ. The hon. member may have learned that in Sunday School as a boy; he may have learned something about it at his mother's knee. I hope he did. But it will not help—

Mr. GRANT: What about freight rates?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): You will get freight rates by and by. But he may not have just remembered all the passage. Therefore I would read it, and tell him that the passage is found in the gospel of Saint Matthew, chapter 6, verse 24, which states:

> No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

When I record my vote in this House of Commons against the 21 per cent increase in freight rates, I do so because I believe that in serving the people of my constituency who will be oppressed by this increase I am serving God. And if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni wants to go the opposite way, I have a perfect right to infer that he wants to serve mammon.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate; but since I have seen that the government did not want the debate adjourned, but wished to see it carried on for the rest of this evening at least, I thought it my duty to take part in it.

Coming from western Canada, where we are particularly interested in the recent increase, because of its effect on our basic industry out there, I felt that as a farmer representative in the house I should have something to say about it. The implementing of this 21 per cent increase without first removing the inimical and unjust freight rates structure is probably the worst feature of the present situation. It leads to discontent and to a feeling of rank injustice in a great many parts of our dominion. This is something which any government in Canada should try to avoid at all costs.

If the government had agreed to the postponement for six months of the implementation of this 21 per cent increase, until the matter had been placed before the board of transport commissioners, and some equalization in the freight rates structure of Canada agreed upon, I do not think there would have been the feeling that there is throughout Canada today with regard to it. I can assure hon. members of the Liberal party that they have not a majority in the country so far as the feeling of discrimination in connection with this matter is concerned. There are many people all across Canada who consider that the 21 per cent increase at this time is unjust. I believe that it is unjust, and that the railways are making a mistake. They spend large sums of money every year to create better relations with the public. I do not think they could have done anything which would have more impressed the public with their genuineness than by having asked that this 21 per cent increase be deferred until there had been an equalization of the freight rates structure. It would have been good business on the part of the railway companies to have made that suggestion, even though the government or the board of transport commissioners were prepared immediately to give the increase.

Many examples have been given of just what this 21 per cent increase means, especially as it affects small shippers. The discrimination is much greater as it applies to people in outlying areas who cannot collect their produce for large shipments. Figures were given here both by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) and the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue) showing this discrimination as between large and small shippers. This is particularly true with respect to eggs and cream. In many cases the increase is not 21 per cent, it is 50 and 100 per cent.

When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) spoke he gave figures to indicate that these increases would mean only a small increase in the prices of butter, tea, coffee and other articles of consumption in Canada, but the figures he gave did not show the whole picture. The increase in the freight on these articles when moving into centres for distribution was not included in his figures. When you consider those increases you will find it amounts to as much as two or three cents more for a pound of butter.

Either the producer or the consumer must pay that increase. If the producer pays it, it means there is less spending power in the hands of the producer. If the consumer pays it, it means a higher cost of living in Canada. I do not think the government should be doing anything today to increase the cost of living. Surely they realize that that is something about which the people are today protesting right across Canada. They also are protesting the inflationary effects of this increase in the freight rates.

This increase of 21 per cent is pyramided two or three times before the article being shipped reaches the final producer or consumer. The minister did not given any examples of what this increase means in connection with prices of binders, tractors, farm machinery and all those things entering into the cost of production. The increase of 21 per cent means an increase of from $30 to $70 in the cost of many implements. That is not a small item at a time when prices have been increased several times during the last year or two.

This increase of 21 per cent in freight rates will be a serious blow to the livestock industry in western Canada. There is not only an increase of 21 per cent in the freight from the local point to Winnipeg; there will be a greater effect through the fact that the Winnipeg market will be lower in relationship to the eastern markets. Over a period of time the Winnipeg market price is based on the eastern price plus freight to eastern Canada. The Winnipeg market is generally that much lower and that increase will mean another general lowering of livestock prices in western Canada. That will be an important thing at a time when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is asking for more bacon and an increased production in our livestock and dairy industries. The government is passing legislation which will discourage that increase in production.

There will also be an increased demand from western Canada that the government absorb the freight on livestock shipped to the eastern markets. The government now pay the freight on coarse grains from the head of the lakes to eastern Canada, with which policy I agree, but if the government are prepared to do that they should be prepared to pay the freight on livestock and dairy products from western Canada to the eastern markets. As I say, this 21 per cent increase will mean more pressure on the government to do that very thing.

If the government pays the freight on coarse grains for the feeding of livestock it is only fair that the livestock producer in western Canada should have the freight paid on the products he ships to the eastern markets.

I should like to point out another example of discrimination not connected with agriculture. The freight rate on a cord of pulpwood shipped from a point ten miles from Hudson Bay Junction to Fort Frances is $2.90, whereas, when the same cord of wood is shipped to Churchill practically the same distance, the rate is $13 a cord or $212 a car. Recently there was a demand for poplar logs to be shipped through Churchill to Great Britain and Europe for the making of matches. When the exporters inquired about freight rates on logs going through Churchill they found this discriminatory freight rate structure, and the result was that it was impossible for them to take advantage of that market.

Where it cost $212 to ship a carload of pulpwood to Churchill it cost only $46.40 to ship the same car to Fort Frances, the same distance. What does the 21 per cent increase amount to in those cases? In the case of the car going to Churchill the increase amounts to $42, whereas in the case of the car going to Fort Frances it amounts to only $10. The increase is four times as large in the one case for a car travelling the same distance.

It is discrimination like that to which people object. It is impossible to develop industry in western Canada, for export markets for some of the things we can produce. Why accentuate that discrimination by a 21 per cent flat increase? It is absolute nonsense to talk of equality and equity when the government are prepared to go ahead and implement that type of increase before equalizing our freight rates. I do not think there would be much objection, and there certainly would not be as much as there has been to the increase if the government had done something to remove these inequities.

I would say that from every point of view delay in implementing the increase was justified. From the point of view of better relationships between the railways and the public, and this is of particular importance to the railways themselves which have to meet competition today by road and air transport, and from the point of view of increasing the already high living costs in Canada, this 21 per cent freight rate increase is entirely unjustified at this time. Its pyramiding effect will increase the cost of living and be the cause of further inflation. I therefore submit that even at this late date the government should defer implementing this increase in freight rates until at least some equalization has been made in our freight rate structure, either by the board of transport commissioners or by some other body set up for that purpose.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate on the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. group on April 7 to the motion for the house to go into committee of supply, particularly in view of the excellent representations that have been made to the government, not necessarily from my own party alone or from any one party, but from all sides of the house. May I say that no plea was more eloquent than those that came from back-benchers from British Columbia and other parts of Canada, asking the government to reconsider implementing the 21 per cent freight rate increase which went into effect on April 5. I do not recall in my short parliamentary career any parallel to the speed with which the Liberals acted on the very day that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved his amendment, asking the government to reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time. On that very day, as if by magic, because I do not suppose, not being familiar with how the governor in council operates, that an order in council can be back-dated, P.C. 1486 was passed. It simply states that the committee of the privy council, having given due consideration to the petitions and representations of the seven provinces of Canada other than Ontario and Quebec, had decided that it could not interfere with the board's order granting a 21 per cent increase in freight rates. It seems an anomaly to me that, under a federal system of government such as we have in Canada, when seven of a nine-member family have expressed their attitude in no uncertain terms and asked for additional time to have their case presented before the government—as a matter of fact they are to meet in Ottawa on Saturday next—the plea of the railway systems should outweigh with the government the expressed needs of the people of seven provinces of this dominion.

When you go back into history and read the story of how the railways came into being you realize that it was an epic of achievement. The credit should go, not to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but to the pioneers in this country who backed their confidence in it with their dollars, by gifts to the company, by loans, by bond guarantees, by tremendous grants of land particularly throughout our prairies and in British Columbia, by tax exemptions, by special concessions from governments, dominion, provincial and municipal, to make the Canadian Pacific railway the tie that bound Canada from coast to coast.

It is fallacious to think of the Canadian Pacific railway in any sense as a privately owned public utility. By some freak of financial strategy, shall we say, though some people might call it business acumen, a group of people banded themselves together as a corporation and extracted concessions from the public domain, with the result that a railway worth originally several tens or, at the most, several hundreds of millions of dollars expanded into a corporation with assets approaching several billions of dollars, all having been derived, not from the sinews of the shareholders of the company, but from the sweat and toil and tears of the people of our own country who worked and spent their money in paying the tolls extracted by the directors of the corporation.

When the railways which now form part of the Canadian National railway system failed following world war I, a charitable government took them over, not in the way that private enterprise usually takes over a bankrupt institution by paying as little as possible for it on the open market, but by providing most generously for the shareholders of the company that apparently could not run its own business successfully. When I think of those five per cent bonds which people in other lands are still holding in perpetuity, Mr. Speaker, not bonds with a date of termination at which time they are cancelled but a debt with which the people of Canada are forever saddled at five per cent interest—the coupon clippers are somewhere in the United States or in England, not even in Canada—then it makes me wonder why our people in the seven provinces, who have joined together in making their objection to the dominion government on behalf of a reconsideration of the freight rate structure, have been as long suffering as they have.

In the report of the board of transport commissioners authorizing or concurring in a 21 per cent freight rate increase, the word "discrimination" often appears. The board admit that there is discrimination in rates as between the central provinces and the remaining portion of the Dominion of Canada. They say that there is evidence of discrimination but there is no evidence of unjust discrimination. One of the most amazing peculiarities of our English language is that of combining a pair of contradictory phrases. To me discrimination seems to be the ultimate. The board of transport commissioners, however, are willing to agree that discrimination exists in our freight rate structure, but they say it has not been shown to their satisfaction that that discrimination is unjust discrimination.

It has been mentioned in this debate that the comparatively sparsely settled sections of Canada, the prairie provinces, have contributed 65 per cent of the net revenues of the Canadian Pacific at a time when the more thickly populated sections of central Canada, with much greater traffic, have been able to contribute only 35 per cent of the net revenues of that railway company. The very fact that on a population basis we contributed from the prairies sixfold the profit to the railway companies that a more richly endowed Ontario and Quebec contributed, it seems to me, speaks for the callous disregard of the sense of public responsibility that a public utility ought to have. We in the west contributed equally if not more than eastern Canada toward the construction of the railway lines that cross this country. Should we go on in perpetuity paying disproportionate transportation costs because of the distance goods have to travel to get to our provinces? Must we go on paying on a mileage basis 15 per cent, as is stated to be the average in the differential between the rate in eastern Canada and that on the prairies, or in many cases running many times that, just because we have not the ballot power, shall I say, to cause the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to adopt a more open-minded view with regard to justice for all parts of this federal union?

It was mentioned in the house today that if in my province of Saskatchewan there were fifteen, eighteen or twenty-one Liberal voices to plead with the caucus of the present government this situation might have been avoided. From the time that I cast my first ballot on the prairies this House of Commons was flooded with Liberal members from Saskatchewan, and from my earliest recollection of the political status of the House of Commons, with the heavy Liberal voting strength contributed by the province of Saskatchewan—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I wish the hon. member would confine his remarks to the question before the house, namely, the increase in freight rates.

Mr. PROBE: I shall try to do that, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that gradually we are getting a little more and more confined all the time if we attempt to make a point. It has been said—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, we are debating a motion to go into supply; therefore each hon. member can bring up anything he likes, it does not matter what, on this motion to go into supply. In other words, this is one time when an hon. member has the privilege of laying his grievances before the house. With all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I do not think your point is well taken.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): What we are dealing with is the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party. That is what is before the house, and I would ask all hon. members to try to confine their remarks to that amendment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member for Regina City has the floor.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I do not think your point is well taken.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member for Regina City has the floor.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat I want to thank the hon. member for St. Paul's for having put in a little plug which I think is very much overdue in this House of Commons.

In concluding what I have to say on the freight rates inequities in this country, may I say that for decades my province sent to this House of Commons members who sat on the benches behind the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). It took us a long time to get our eyes open to the fact that these people would vote for the party before they would vote for the needs of the people whom they represented. We sent the Prime Minister out of our province. He came to Prince Albert to seek a safe seat. He went out of that province, record or no record, because his policies were not those which the prairie breed wanted or could understand. There are two members still in Saskatchewan who support that government.

Mr. GARDINER: There will be many more a little later on.

Mr. PROBE: It will not be long before they will be on their way too and the Minister of Agriculture will be one of the first to go.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I have not spoken in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and it has been going on for a long time; but to me the issue is clear. I have lived in the west a good deal, and I know perfectly well that there is a need for the equalization of freight rates. That instruction has been given to the board of transport commissioners and that equalization will be made just as soon as possible.

The other issue is, to me, also clear. I have been a strong advocate of increased pensions and increased pay for the workers. If these freight rates had not been increased, I would not have been a bit surprised if there had been a strike on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. We talk about serving two masters. I do not know whether there is much difference between doing that and being on the horns of a dilemma. I think we must be fair. These workers on the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and other railroads have a right to consideration. Out of these increased freight rates they will get their share, and it is our duty to see that they do.

There is another thing I should like to say. When we come toward the end of a session, we often hear the criticism that not enough time is being spent on the estimates. I think if we cut down our speeches on freight rates we would have more time to spend on the estimates.

Mr. H. H. HATFIELD (Victoria-Carleton): I do not want to take up much time in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I think it has been carried on long enough. I am quite aware that we must have an increase in freight rates, but I want to see a fair increase. The other day the minister told us that he had a board of transport commissioners who were experts in the handling of freight rates. I want to tell this house that in Canada since July we have had an increase in freight rates of 10 per cent on all shipments to the United States. Before the United States interstate commerce commission authorized that increase, the railways of Canada were allowed to increase their freight rates, on the mileage haul over Canadian territory, by 10 per cent from July on, and by 20 per cent from October on. It costs $207 to carry a carload of potatoes from New Brunswick to Windsor, Ontario; and it costs $378 to carry it to Detroit, Michigan. That is $171 extra for carrying it across the river to Detroit. Does the minister call that fair? I call that discrimination of the worst kind, and I do not think he has many experts in the board of transport commissioners. They allowed the Canadian railways to charge the increase in freight rates that the United States railroads made before the interstate commerce commission even authorized it. I ask the minister: Is that not a fact?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does he know that the increase in the United States amounted to anywhere from 50 per cent to 60 per cent, whereas the increase in this country was 21 per cent only?

Mr. HATFIELD: The first increase in the United States was only 10 per cent. That was made in July.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it now?

Mr. HATFIELD: I do not know what it is now. It has been increasing ever since. It is not 51 per cent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I said it was between 50 and 60 per cent.

Mr. HATFIELD: Do not tell me what it is. I am shipping goods to the United States every day. I know what the freight rates are in the United States. I know what the board of transport commissioners have allowed the railways of Canada to do. They have allowed them to increase the freight rates. What right had they to allow the increase in freight rates on potatoes that originated in Prince Edward Island and were hauled 1,200 to 1,500 miles across Canada to the United States? What right had they to allow an increase of 20 per cent before it was ever authorized? I want to ask the minister that question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will answer the question and tell the hon. gentleman that, with regard to domestic rates, there has been an increase of 21 per cent, which applies to potatoes as well as to any other commodity moving across Canada. If he is talking about international rates—that is, rates from one country to another—they were increased by the interstate commerce commission last year, and the board did likewise. But with reference to domestic rates, the increase is 21 per cent and no more.

Mr. HATFIELD: Your board allowed this increase before the interstate commerce commission ever allowed it or ever gave authorization. The interstate commerce commission did not give any authority to increase freight rates in the United States until October. But your board allowed the Canadian railroads to make an increase in July.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have just one word to say to my hon. friends to my left—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I have unfortunately been engaged as a member of an important committee and have not had the privilege of saying anything on this important matter. I am glad that tonight I have an opportunity of at least appearing in the debate.

Before I begin I want to quote the amendment. I have noticed tonight that there have been a great number of calls to order; and I want to be in order when I begin, anyhow, even though I should never get to be in order again. So I shall read the amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to defer the imposition of the increases in freight rates recently authorized by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada; further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time."

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, in particular to one phrase in this amendment, and that is that the authorized increase is "inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada." I just want to say that I would have to wander quite a long piece before I got outside of what is inimical to the best interests of the people of this country; for when you come to consider the increase in freight rates in act or performance, if you like, which affects practically everything that people touch, handle or have to use in their everyday life, then you have wide latitude indeed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is the hon. gentleman quoting from the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was under the impression he was not. Which amendment is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. COLDWELL: The amendment I moved.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry; I should not have interrupted.

Mr. IRVINE: I was quoting from the amendment which is now before the house. I repeat that, since this amendment calls attention to the fact that the imposition of the 21 per cent increase in freight rates is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada, that in itself opens up a wide field for discussion. If it were not that I am going to catch a train I should like very much tonight to take advantage of the breadth of that amendment and deal with some of the freight rates, not the inequalities but just how the increases will affect the poorer people. I imagine many speakers have already done that, but I should like very much to have done it over again, because I do not think we can tell the story too often.

Let me say at once that the mere increase in freight rates does not concern me, beyond this, that I believe our freight rates should be sufficient to carry the services the railways must give the people of this country. Everyone will admit at once that our railway system is indispensable. It must be made to run efficiently, in the interests of the economic system of the country; but, sir, in my opinion we could do that and still reduce freight rates in the west, because the basis upon which the freight rates have been struck is inequitable, unjustifiably so. I presume the board—it used to be the board of railway commissioners but its new baptismal name is the board of transport commissioners—in hearing the evidence of those opposed to the increase, came to its judgment on the basis of past practices. It appears to me that it never occurred to the board there was anything the matter with freight rates, that the only thing it had in mind was whether the rates were to be higher or lower, on the same basis as in the past.

I think that was a very careless way to consider the matter, but I repeat that I do not think the board is to blame. I think the blame must rest on this government and past governments. I believe those who first set up the board are also to blame. In my opinion the board was brought into being to protect the Canadian Pacific. I do not believe we would have had it at all had we not been forced to take over the bankrupt railways. Those railways were taken over, not because the government of that day loved public ownership or wanted to institute a great national transportation system. They were taken over because they were bankrupt; the country was at war, and the services of the railways were required. Certain plans were made for running them; and one of the things that was to be understood from the beginning, apparently, was that nothing was to interfere with the supremacy of the Canadian Pacific; that if it should be found the Canadian National could haul more goods through the mountains or across the prairies with the same amount of power, or could travel faster and carry passengers to the coast in ten or twelve hours less time than the Canadian Pacific, then that was to be regarded as unfair competition. Therefore one of the duties of this board was to lay down the time schedules for passenger traffic.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that the amendment before the house deals with freight rates, not passenger rates. I think he should confine his remarks to the question of freight rates.

Mr. IRVINE: If you will just give me a moment, sir, I think you will see that I am leading directly to the bull's-eye. If I must reveal my hand ahead of time, I am going to show that if by the actions or restrictions of a certain board the Canadian National is prevented from hauling more freight, because it has a better line, then it will require more money to have that freight carried in some other way and therefore the freight rate must be kept up in order to keep up the profits of the company that cannot haul freight as cheaply as the other line. Therefore I say to you, sir, that I am right within the ambit of the amendment, which states that such action is inimical to the interests of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. gentleman is making some interesting statements, and I should like to ask him a question. In the first place, the railways must have more money; I think that is agreed. How are they to get it? Then I should like to ask the hon. member if he is in favour of the amalgamation of the two railways at the present time. In other words, is he in favour of the socialization of the Canadian Pacific, of having it taken over by the country in order to be able to do this job he is talking about?

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend has opened up an intriguing field by his question, but I am afraid I would be entirely out of order if I were to follow it up.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. gentleman is beating about the bush. It is a very simple question and requires only a very simple answer. He should say yes or no, but he will not.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no doubt my hon. friend wants a very simple answer, but I am not a simpleton and I do not usually give simple answers unless I cannot avoid doing so. In this case I can. I am not going to answer a question of that kind, because it is outside the field of our discussion, and I have no desire to be called to order again by the Speaker.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then the hon. member refuses to answer the question?

Mr. IRVINE: Oh, yes; there is not the slightest doubt about that. I am refusing to answer the question.

Before I was interrupted I was discussing the matter of the function of the board in regulating the supposed competition between the two railways. The fact of the matter is that they regulate it so that there is practically no competition. That leads to the need for higher freight rates.

Perhaps one of the most striking speeches made during this debate was that of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I believe he gave some interesting data, and I would commend what he said to hon. members. I would also refer to the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), who put on Hansard figures which I think it would be difficult for anyone to gainsay. May I sum up in a word or two what he said on this particular point? He went on to show, quoting the actual figures of the Canadian Pacific, that the population of the west was, I believe, a little less than a third of the entire population of the country; and yet, according to those figures, those people pay two-thirds of the revenues of that railway. I would ask the Minister of Transport to put that in his mind, and think about it. Then he will understand why it is that people who represent the west are aroused on a question of this kind. If it is desired to retain unity in this country and to prevent spiteful feeling and anger arising in one part of the country against another part, then this basic injustice must be removed. And we must take the opportunity now afforded to make this matter plain to the minister, to the government and to parliament itself.

The hon. member who spoke immediately preceding me made reference to the workers, that their wages were implicated, and that but for the granting of this increase a strike might have taken place. I hope the hon. member knows better than that. I think it has been made clear by the representatives of both railways, and by the representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in rebuttal that the rates of wages of employees of the railways were not conditional upon the decision of the board with respect to this matter.

Let me say to the hon. member that we are not, by any means, opposing the increasing of wages. I would say for myself that I am not opposing the increase in freight rates as such, because, as I have said, I believe that we can increase freight rates sufficiently to carry the service and to reduce them west of the great lakes, provided that we find an equitable, honest and defensible basis upon which to strike our freight rates.

I am sorry I have to stop at this point, because this has been only an introduction to what I had wanted to say. I hope, however, that what I have said will be noticed by the administration. And since they are so anxious to cultivate free enterprise; since they are so married to the principle of competition, then I am asking that the Canadian National Railways be given their head; that there be no more curbing of those railways, that they be allowed to run freight as cheaply as they can run it, and to carry passengers as quickly and as cheaply as they can do so, and we shall very soon bring down freight rates.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the hon. member still refusing to answer my question? Will the hon. member answer my question now, yes or no?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that the subamendment, which dealt with the removal of inequalities and with discrimination in the Canadian freight rates structure, has been voted upon and disposed of. The house is now considering the amendment, which deals only with the question of deferring the imposition of the increases.

I do not wish to restrict the debate unduly, but it does seem to me that, after I do not know how many days—certainly at least four or five—of debate on this subject, we should now discuss the amendment, and not discuss too many questions which are not relevant to it.

I do not think that at this time a discussion of so-called inequalities and discriminations in the Canadian freight rates structure is in order. The question now is: Should this increase be deferred?

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not the amendment much wider than that? Does not the amendment declare that the putting into effect is inimical to the welfare of the people of Canada?

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I shall read the amendment. It states:

> This house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to defer the imposition of the increases in freight rates recently authorized by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada; further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time.

The subamendment, which was disposed of, referred to the question of inequalities and discrimination. The house has given its decision on that matter.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on the last occasion I spoke in this debate I made out a case, satisfactory at least to myself and to many others, to show that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had not made out a case for itself, on the facts before the board of transport commissioners, for any increase in freight rates. I intend to dilate on that tonight.

Obviously the Canadian Pacific has not made out a case for increased freight rates, and these freight rate increases should not have been given to it. I wish to quote here one of the basic fallacies which I find permeating this judgment of the board of transport commissioners. At page 10 they say:

> As earlier mentioned the present application of the railway association, which was made in October, 1946, was predicated upon declining operating revenues, and increasing operating expenses brought about by higher wage rates and increased costs of materials.

That assumption has been proven to be entirely wrong, and the facts of the matter are clearly before the people of Canada. Let us consider the situation as it exists this year.

The application is predicated upon the decline in operating revenues. Yet we find that the gross revenues for January and February of this year for the Canadian Pacific are something like $49,000,000 as compared with $44,000,000 last year, or an increase of about $5,000,000, or 10·8 per cent. It is true that operating expenses also increased. They were $49,442,000 in 1947, whereas last year they were $45,233,000. But operating expenses increased by only 9·3 per cent. So that we find that last year, whereas the Canadian Pacific in those two months made a loss of $839,000, this year their loss was reduced to $230,000. Obviously there is no case here for having increased freight rates on the basis of declining revenues, when the revenues are obviously increased.

Furthermore, as of April 10, carloadings have increased this year to 421,630 as compared with 410,379 last year. If the government is going to support the judgment of the board on the basis that we can expect declining revenues, then the government will find itself within the year in a most invidious position. Declining revenue suggests that there will be some economic recession. If there is to be economic recession there will be unemployment. Within a year we shall have an election; is the government going to the country on the basis that it expects unemployment? Certainly not. The government will go to the country on the basis of expected full employment. If such is the case, then we can expect that Canadian Pacific revenues will continue to increase.

I should like to return to some figures which I mentioned briefly on the last occasion on which I spoke and which are germane to the debate tonight. An allowance was granted to the Canadian Pacific by the board of transport commissioners for surplus and additions and betterments, totalling some $15,235,000. It is possible that the Canadian Pacific, having been freely awarded this additional surplus, will spend the money to buy better equipment. If they buy equipment they are going to depreciate it, which means that this asset will be charged twice against freight rates, and not just once.

We have the extraordinary position where the board and the government apparently agree that there should be allowed to the Canadian Pacific a total of $21,310,000 for dividends, $15,787,000 for fixed charges and $15,235,000 as an allowance for surplus, or a total of some $52,000,000. That is what the government and the board believe the Canadian Pacific should have to play about with after its expenses have been met. That includes dividends of five per cent to the ordinary shareholders. However, as I argued, out of this allowance for surplus it is possible that the ordinary shareholders may get another five per cent. But the board and the government do not include a total of $22,000,000 of other income which the Canadian Pacific is able to earn from investments. In other words, the position of the government is that they are quite content to see the Canadian Pacific in a position where it can possibly pay out dividends of as high as 20 per cent to its shareholders, while the people of Canada have to pay the shot.

It was brought out in evidence that, since their inception, United States railroads have earned approximately four per cent on their investment. I suggest that that percentage is quite large enough for the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific. If such is the case, then they do not need this great surplus which has been given to them. Among the arguments which were advanced before the board was a fantastic statement by the railway association of Canada that the railroad companies were in a unique and perilous position. I have already dealt with that.

We also had Mr. George Walker, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, stating that that company was in urgent need of financial aid. Then Mr. Liddy of the Canadian Pacific spoke of the company's perilous financial position. Mr. Crump referred to the critical financial position, while Mr. Unwin referred to the disquieting financial position. Again we find those words echoed by the chairman of the board of transport commissioners, and I quote from the judgment as follows:

> A close analysis of the current operating revenues of Canadian railways indicates that lower levels may, perhaps, reasonably be expected.

Of course that is an unmitigated example of soothsaying at its very worst. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the facts of the situation. As I say, the facts are infinitely better than one would suspect from this judgment which has been given to us. On the basis of those facts, I should like the minister to answer some questions which I am going to pose to him. It has been argued that the Canadian Pacific is in a difficult financial position, a perilous financial position and a unique position. I think "unique' is probably the proper word.

Does the minister deny for a moment the increase in operating revenue figures which I have presented to the house? Does he deny that since 1939, according to the Canadian Pacific balance sheet—the whole case for increased freight rates was based on that—the company has retired all its six per cent bonds, all its five per cent bonds and all its four and a half per cent bonds? Does that suggest that this railroad is in a perilous financial position?

Does the minister deny the excellent cash position of the Canadian Pacific in its last balance sheet, which showed cash of some $42,644,000. Does he deny that the Canadian Pacific owns dominion securities totalling $31,667,000? Does that indicate that this railroad is suffering from a critical financial position? If it does not, then why has it been given this quite unmerited increase in freight rates?

Does the minister deny that since 1939 the funded debt of the Canadian Pacific had been decreased by $153 million; that is, from $228 million to $75 million? Does that suggest an urgent need of financial aid? Does the minister deny that the Canadian Pacific has increased its reserves from $92 million to $380 million? Does he deny that its profit and loss balance in its balance sheet has increased from $141 million to $279 million? Does he deny that its working capital has been increased by $48 million over 1939? Do those figures suggest for a moment that the Canadian Pacific is in a perilous financial position, or that it is in a critical financial position?

Does the minister deny that the Canadian Pacific has in its balance sheet stock of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company shown at a book value of $8,412,000, whereas the market value today is in the neighbourhood of $150 million? Does the minister deny that that is an example of hidden reserves in the balance sheet of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Does the minister deny that from 1940 to 1946 the Canadian Pacific made expenditures on railroad property of $123 million? Does he deny that it invested in leased lines, out of funds from its corporate operations, $11,500,000? Does that suggest a disquieting financial position?

Does the minister deny that the Canadian Pacific made capital expenditure on steamships, hotels and communications of some $18,000,000 between 1940 and 1946? Does he deny that it invested in stocks and bonds of controlled and other companies and advanced to subsidiaries some $20,000,000 during those years? Does he deny that it spent out of its funds for organization of the Soo line some $7,000,000? Does the minister deny that it established a steamship replacement fund of $39,000,000 during those years? Is there any sign of a perilous financial position when one considers the reserves which have been created?

Does the minister deny that this company, which is in such straitened circumstances, paid out interest during those years totalling $150,000,000, and that it paid out in income and other taxes $120,000,000? Does the minister deny that this poverty-stricken corporation paid out in dividends over those years $91,000,000, or that it established a deferred maintenance reserve of $25,000,000? Now and again the vernacular is almost vulgar, but sometimes it is quite expressive. I intend to use the vernacular in this case and say that the Canadian Pacific is simply lousy with hidden reserves.

There can be no question about it at all, this company does not need the increase in freight rates which has been granted to it. There can be no question at all about its being able to pay quite easily, without any increase in freight rates, the wages which its employees demand and that it can continue to do so for another two years. There is no reason why this company could not pay out of its accumulated surplus and reserves the pensions which its employees need. But the company has no intention of doing that. All our attention must be concentrated entirely on freight rates. These increased freight rates are absolutely inequitable and unjust and I can see no reason or sense for their having been granted at all.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, there have been so many little arguments back and forth tonight as to the subject matter of what we are speaking on that I do not want to get caught in one of those jams myself. I am a law-abiding citizen. I believe in law and order both in and out of this house, and I try to live by that.

I will read the amendment moved by my leader, which is in two parts.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Dispense.

Mr. BENTLEY: No, I will not dispense. I want to get this on the record so that I shall be sure that I do not stray from it. The first part of the amendment reads:

> this house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to defer the imposition of the increases in freight rates recently authorized by the board of transport commissioners is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada . . .

That is the first part, and I propose, first, to endeavour to prove to the government and their side of the house that that is indeed the fact, that this measure is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada. In endeavouring to produce evidence to prove my point, I shall show how generous the people of Canada have already been to the railway companies, and I hope that my evidence will be convincing enough to conjure up in the government some bowels of compassion for the ordinary everyday working citizen. Then, if I have time, after I have proved that point, I shall deal with the second part of the amendment, which reads:

> further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time.

I shall endeavour to adduce arguments that will be, I hope, reasonably convincing to the government why they should undertake that.

In order to deal with the first part of the amendment and do what I said I would do, that is, show that the people of Canada have already been generous to the railway companies, I am going to quote from the public accounts of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947. In part III, at page 3, appears a "Statement of Assistance given to railways by the Dominion of Canada to March 31, 1947." If hon. members will listen carefully they will see that the people of Canada have already been very generous with both the railroads.

First, let me deal with the Canadian National, and in giving these figures I want to give the house some idea of the history of these railways, not what I have read in books but what I have learned from actual work in the railway and lumber camps in the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific through the mountains to Prince Rupert and the Transcontinental in northern Ontario; and from the point of view of one who has swung an axe or skinned a horse or driven the rivers, I think no one in the House of Commons has a closer knowledge of the building of the railways than I have. When I remember the things that went on, the graft and corruption by the contractors, Foley, Welsh and Stewart and the various subcontractors, it is easy to understand the tremendous capital overhead of the Canadian National, which I have already mentioned in another debate in this house.

When you remember wooden bridges, with 137 to 150 bents being built according to specifications—and I know something about the building of wooden bridges, Mr. Speaker—and then the whole gang of men having to come back within two months and cut down every single bent and eighteen inches off every pile in that bridge and lower every cap and make new guard rails simply because of carelessness in construction or because some lumber company wanted to sell piling that was a little longer than the specifications called for; when you remember that the approaches to many bridges cost many dollars more because of the extra yardage put in to make extra profits for contractors and subcontractors, and when you follow that right through, you begin to have some idea why the road is overcapitalized at the present time. When you go up through northern Ontario, north of Fort William by Sioux Lookout and in all that country where O'Brien, Fowler and McDougall had their contracts, and where trainload after trainload of gravel was dumped into almost bottomless muskeg, until finally it did hit the bottom and then came up and spread out for half a mile on each side, and when you consider that that was done when even in those days there were better ways of engineering, it is not surprising that the people of Canada had to make the gifts they did.

I mention these facts, Mr. Speaker, to prove my contention that the people of Canada have given enough in this way to the bondholders of the railways, and it is time now that the people of Canada got some protection themselves. I contend that the granting of this freight rate increase is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada on these grounds. I could cite instance after instance. I could tell you about hacking ties with a broad axe for eight and nine and ten cents a tie, which were culled by the inspectors, and the culled ties were then put into the right of way for the rails to go on. I could give you instance after instance right down to the bootlegging of rotgut liquor if you want me to. Hon. gentlemen opposite who are grumbling never had a grub-hoe in their hands I suppose, and never used dynamite and could not run a wheelbarrow if it had directions written on the handle. I will try to finish my speech early enough for some of these hon. gentlemen on your right, Mr. Speaker, to get up and speak if they have any objection to what I am saying.

Mr. BRUNELLE: You are holding the book upside down.

Mr. BENTLEY: The hon. gentleman has inverted vision, which is evident from the way he acts. I would say to the hon. gentleman who thinks I am holding the book upside down that if he owned 5,728,192 acres of land, and that was given away to a railroad he would understand what I am talking about. If he owned one acre of land and anyone attempted to take it away from him we would soon hear from him. But 5,728,192 acres were given by the people of Canada to the Canadian National Railways, and a lot more to the Canadian Pacific. Let my hon. friend not forget that I am speaking first of the Canadian National. I am talking first about the poor relation, the little orphan that Canada owns. The favourite railroad, the railroad that runs Canada, the railroad that dictates government policy in transportation, the railroad that governs more in this country than it should govern outside of transportation is the Canadian Pacific, which I shall come to later.

Mr. GRANT: You are not there yet.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am referring to the Canadian National Railways, according to the government's book. I expect they will stand behind their own people, because I know they have many excellent accountants and gentlemen of that kind in their employ; I am sure they would not print figures that they did not have good reason to believe were true, and

I am positive that nobody on the government side, least of all the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) would permit inaccurate figures to be presented to the House of Commons and the public so that the newspapers could spread the news around, and the government would have to apologize later if it were wrong. In this instance the Canadian National Railways were getting 5,728,192 acres of land. Then they had great cash contributions. For instance, up to that time they had cash contributions of $44,179,077.92. I suppose the ninety-two cents were for stamps on the cheques.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There were no stamps on cheques in those days.

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, this takes in all their history, and it is therefore likely that stamps were put on the cheques later on, which accounts for the ninety-two cents.

Mr. BRUNELLE: C.C.F. politics.

Mr. BENTLEY: My hon. friend said something about C.C.F. policy. If the hon. member could even understand the first-grade primer I would send him over some of the junior literature of the C.C.F., hoping that in time he would graduate into the higher classes and do as the attorney general of Saskatchewan suggests people have to do, think their way out of the old parties into the C.C.F. After he has done that and has proved his capabilities, we shall consider accepting him as a member. One of the first things he should learn to do is not to interrupt when better men than himself are speaking.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there were capital and construction expenditures given to the Canadian National Railways amounting to $377,615,604, a nice little chunk of money.

Then there were deficits and operating expenditures paid to them of $498,454,289. The total of these amounts is $920,248,971.

The next column shows amount repaid, transferred or discharged. No figures appear in that column. Therefore they have neither repaid, transferred nor discharged any of that debt.

Mr. BRUNELLE: You have not said anything about freight rates yet.

Mr. BENTLEY: My poor friend over there still cannot understand. I pointed out at the start that I was going to show why the increase in freight rates is inimical to the people of Canada, and to do that I was going to show that the people had already made great contributions; that any more contributions are greater than they should bear, and therefore inimical. That is the argument I am making.

[Mr. Bentley.]

I made that statement at the start. I wish the hon. member over there would sit up and listen.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask one question to keep the record straight? These amounts had to do with the Canadian Northern, had they not, not the Canadian National?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, the Canadian Northern and all the allied companies that went into making up what is known at the present time as the Canadian National. I have not yet reached the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): These were not Canadian Northern figures.

Mr. BENTLEY: No. This is a statement of assistance given up to March 31, 1947; therefore it will include all the railroads that went to make up the present system.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Plus the deficits.

Mr. GARDINER: The Canadian Northern was in the muskegs, too.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, and we allowed the contractors to retire with handsome profits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Old age pensions!

Mr. BENTLEY: Very handsome profits, which we are now in the process of guaranteeing in perpetuity to the heirs, successors and assigns until both the minister and I are pushing up brown-eyed Susans on the prairies.

An hon. MEMBER: The minister will not be out there.

Mr. BENTLEY: However, Mr. Speaker, I want to get to the third column in this book, because this is the amount written off. This is one of the straight gifts of the Canadian people. The amount written off was the whole $44,179,077.92 of cash subsidies, and the total amount of deficits and operating expenditures of $498,454,367. Then there were loans. Loans are assumed to be something that you get back eventually. Unfortunately I have a few small loans like that, that I am not optimistic about, but that is the hope we have when we make a loan. Of course, when we borrow we hope we shall not have to pay the loan back, but if we are private citizens we usually have to, but not if we are a railway. If we are a railway under the government's wing we are pretty sure that we shall be forgiven some of our financial trespasses.

There were loans for capital expenditures and deficits of $733,592,151. There were loans for betterments of and repairs to railway equipment, no doubt getting new brass handles on the diningroom car doors and things like that, of $1,183,592. Then railway equipment purchased and sold to the railway, under a hire-purchase agreement, of $91,872,555. I am omitting all cents here because there is not much sense in this whole matter when we come to look it over.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENTLEY: These are plain gifts of public money without any good reason behind it, and it does not make sense.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit one question? I am very much interested in these figures. These loans were all government operations; in other words, socializing the railways. That is it, is it not?

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with that question, and I could very extensively, but I know Your Honour would not permit me to get outside of the place that I prescribed for myself tonight. I do not want to incur the wrath of Your Honour, because you have always been good to me and I propose to treat you with the respect that you deserve; therefore I cannot answer my hon. friend now.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You cannot.

Mr. BENTLEY: I can answer it, but I will not answer it at the present time; I will put it that way.

There were temporary loans and advances, including loans made in connection with the government's relief program, of $1,391,388,526. The amount repaid, transferred or discharged amounts to $911,940,510, and the amount written off is $263,456,953, a nice little gift paid to bondholders who, generally speaking, in this day and age do nothing to earn any of that at all, and are simply the heirs or successors of the people of the past. There is a considerable amount of that sum outstanding, over a billion dollars.

We then come down to the guarantees, loans guaranteed as to principal and interest by the dominion government, $1,314,515,436, and loans guaranteed as to interest only by the dominion government $216,207,141, or a total of $1,530,722,578, of which amount there was repaid, transferred or discharged, $995,307,235. The balance outstanding amounts to $535,415,342.

Then we have sundry assistance. Usually, when you are secretary of a small concern like an agricultural society, a co-operative association or something of that kind, when you make your financial statement at the end of the year you have a few little expenditures which are shown; maybe $2.75 or even $10.15. You put them in as sundries because they may represent teaspoons that were lost when you had your annual meeting with a banquet or something of that sort. But when you get sundries to the extent of $58,358,242, that is a sizeable piece of coin to give away.

Mr. KNOWLES: Some teaspoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I suppose the remarks made just now by the hon. member who has the floor are for the purpose of proving that we should have an increase in freight rates, although I am not so sure about that.

Mr. BENTLEY: You are correct in that supposition, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to prove that the increase is inimical to the best interests of the people of Canada; and as I stated before, in trying to prove my case I wanted to show that the people of Canada had already been generous enough with the railway companies and the bondholders of the railway companies and that there should be no further call for another $71,000,000 increase; that is the sum which the increased freight rates will amount to, so I am told. That is the point I am trying to make. As I said, by a recital of these tremendous figures I was hoping that I could arouse the compassion of some of my honourable and good-natured looking friends who sit on the treasury benches.

Mr. McCANN: But you failed.

Mr. BRUNELLE: You missed.

Mr. BENTLEY: That was my purpose anyway in doing that.

I now want to come to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It has had most generous treatment. I want to point out that I support the things which were said by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) when he was here. The Canadian Pacific has had entirely too much influence on the operation of the Canadian National all through the picture, both when the Canadian National was privately owned and since it has become a government institution. I think that is a regrettable situation.

When the Canadian Pacific was being built, we know there was difficulty, and we understand that there was a good deal of risk-capital involved. We know they were to go across what at that time were empty, or practically empty, prairies; and no one knew for sure that they would actually be productive. In order to recompense them to some extent—in fact, to recompense them to quite an extent—they were made a gift of 32,848,477 acres of land, according to this statement. With that they were given the mineral rights in a tremendous amount, if not all those acres, some of which mineral rights they have used to convert into tremendous wealth for the Canadian Pacific shareholders. This does not appear in the financial statement of the railroad and is not used, so far as I know, in paying the operating costs. Nevertheless the gift was made to them to recompense them for the risk they were taking in going across that wild country, as it was at that time.

It would appear that the government should accept this argument, that this railway company, having been given all those gifts, from there on should be subject to competition from any other transportation company which may appear on the scene. But instead of that, we have found that, in spite of the gifts to the Canadian National and in spite of the gifts to the Canadian Pacific, both of them now want to gouge the public more and more, instead of getting down to a basis of proving which one can operate most economically and most successfully in the interests of the Canadian people and still take care of their capital costs, pay decent wages and provide proper working conditions for the people who work on them.

Time does not allow me to go much farther with that particular part of my argument.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BENTLEY: I could give a great deal more along that line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am simply trying to get the government to see the point of view that we have, that there is no excuse for their allowing the railways such a gift as that.

Mr. GRANT: You are not going to blame the rest for that.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am trying to prove my point. The hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant) can have his fun with the Tory member for Queens (Mr. McLure) at some other time. I think I have already brought forward some fairly substantial evidence to support my point.

I want now to turn to the second part of the amendment which reads:

> . . . further this house is of the opinion that the government should reconsider this matter and take action to prevent the proposed increases from coming into effect at this time.

There is only one appeal which a person can make to a body of people in authority for something of that kind. One must appeal to their reason and their generosity. I want to remind this government that, aside entirely from partisan political considerations, they have enjoyed—even from those who do not support them politically—loyal support in Canadian policies from the people across this country. Right through the war they did not ask a thing from us that we were not prepared to give. It is true that we exercised our democratic right of opposing them on the platform and in other ways, when we thought they were wrong. But they were the governing body, and when they said that something should be done, we loyally supported them. That goes for the people from Halifax to Vancouver. To people who have been as loyal as that, and who have the nature to continue to be as loyal as that, no matter who governs this country, it seems to me that the government should give consideration with regard to their needs and desires.

Outside of the places where this increase in freight rates will not be effective because of other factors which enter into the matter, a great many Canadian people will suffer seriously in the operation of their businesses, in the maintenance of their homes, and in all the ways whereby the extra freight rate they will have to pay will affect them when they go to buy the goods and services they require in order to carry on. Is there not some little place in the mind of the government where a little sympathy can edge its way in, gradually expand and grow to a nice big, green tree; not a weeping willow but a tree that will provide shade and comfort for the people of Canada along those lines.

As I say, one can produce piles of evidence to support the statement I made that this is inimical to the people of Canada. But I can use only the argument I have just used in order to try to convince the government that they should at this time reconsider this matter and take action to prevent these proposed increases from coming into effect at this time. If they will do that, they will earn the gratitude of many people in this country. If they do not, they will earn something else; and they will certainly get it.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The debate, Mr. Speaker, has taken a serious turn this evening.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members the points I want to make. In the first place, I should like to have had more time to put on record some additional arguments for the necessity of a serious consideration of the judgment handed down by the board of transport commissioners. I know among this group there are members who would like strongly to urge the government to reconsider its refusal to delay the imposition of the new schedules until the seven provincial premiers have had an opportunity to make their recommendations to the government. When the judgment was handed down by the transport board the Premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. T. C. Douglas, made a public statement in which he said the seven premiers would be lodging a petition to the federal government under section 52(1) of the Railway Act, and I say the action we have witnessed is anti-democratic and certainly shows a cynical disregard for the wishes of the provincial premiers. This is a definite slap in the face to these gentlemen who want to come here and lay their case before the government.

Hon. members from this side who have spoken, and many from the other side, have put on record figures showing clearly that the Canadian Pacific has a surplus this year, and that only the possibility of poor business in future years can justify the additional revenue the increase will give them. Neither I nor any other member of this group would protest increased freight rates as such. We say if it can be shown that the railways need the increases then we are ready to agree to them, but we do not want them imposed in addition to the inequalities which already exist under the freight rate tariff. It has been stated that if the railways were not given these new rates and the larger profits it would mean a general strike of railway employees across this country. That is completely ridiculous. I want to read a statement made by the railways to the board of conciliation in the current wage dispute:

> Any relief provided by way of increased rates will not be available for increase of extra costs for the future—such as increased wages—only those up to October, 1946, will be covered.

That should settle that argument.

Getting back to the point I was trying to make, I feel that men who have been elected to parliament do not represent only their particular constituencies but are representatives of the people of Canada, trying to carry out the wishes of those people in order that we may have better relationships, so that our dominion may grow in stature and we may improve the conditions of our people. Last Monday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) told the members of the Tory party that if the debate could not be concluded by six o'clock the government would adjourn it and take up another matter so that the vote would not be taken that evening. If the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had co-operated in the same way with this group there would not have been the necessity of carrying on this debate. However I feel that we have served the people, and my hon. friends opposite who are making so much noise can answer to the people. I believe we have a democratic right to carry on this debate in an effort to see that the decision of the transport board is not allowed to remain in effect. The Premier of Saskatchewan said if these rates were allowed to go into operation they would bring chaos, and that if the decision were reversed later, after representations had been made, a great deal of confusion would result. That is what has happened; and, as I said before, I think the action taken by the government was a slap in the face to the seven provincial premiers who are coming here on April 24 to meet the cabinet. In the past these same premiers have co-operated with the government at interprovincial conferences, and I think they should have been shown a little courtesy.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Since I had an opportunity to discuss this matter in the house a few days ago, I have received from my constituency telegrams and resolutions which indicate that the people of western Canada will not accept the increase in freight rates without protest.

I find that the judgment of the board of transport commissioners sets out that the rates in the standard and special freight tariffs may be increased by 21 per cent. We find the word "may" appearing throughout the judgment, apparently leaving it to the railway companies to decide whether the increase shall be put into effect in some parts of the country and not in others. I have been told of the increase the poultry producers in Saskatchewan have been compelled to pay. Previously I understand that they enjoyed a rate of thirty-five cents for a thirty-dozen crate of eggs, and that this rate has now been increased to seventy-five cents.

I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAYDON: What will be the business tomorrow?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Tomorrow we hope to deal with the motion of the Minister of Agriculture for second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Then we should like to go into committee of the whole on the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then we shall take up the Dominion Elections Act, and any other items on the order paper not yet disposed of. We had hoped to be able to go into supply in the Department of Agriculture, and in the Department of External Affairs on Monday next, but unfortunately that has not been possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister give any indication as to when the freight rates debate will go on?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not at this time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 23, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 22

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, last night as recorded in Hansard at page 3249 I am reported as having said, "You are correct in that supposition, Mr. Speaker". This was in reply to an interjection from Your Honour which I misunderstood. I thought you had said that my remarks at that point were for the purpose of proving that we should not have an increase in freight rates. It was this supposition with which I agreed. The word "not" does not appear in the report of what you said; hence my question of privilege to make it perfectly clear.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Marquis.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) presented the first report of the special joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

VETERANS AFFAIRS: RESIGNATION OF MR. TUCKER—FISHERIES: APPOINTMENT OF MR. REID

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that the hon. member for Rosthern, Mr. Walter Tucker, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, has tendered his resignation as a parliamentary assistant, and that his resignation has been accepted by the government. In making this announcement I should like to say how much my colleagues and I have appreciated the splendid services rendered the government, the house, and particularly the war veterans, by the hon. member for Rosthern during the time he held the position of parliamentary assistant, and with what sincere regret his resignation has been accepted.

I would also inform the house that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, an appointment which I am sure will be received with general approval by hon. members.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister whether there were any special or immediate circumstances which dictated the change in connection with the office of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nothing except what seemed appropriate in the circumstances.

IMMIGRATION

ARRANGEMENTS WITH T.C.A. FOR TRANSPORTATION FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to inform the house that the government has effected an arrangement with Trans-Canada Air Lines for the charter of planes to bring immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada.

This arrangement will provide facilities for the transportation of 10,000 immigrants from the United Kingdom before the end of the present fiscal year. Initial destination on this side will be Montreal and Toronto.

In order to provide for this increased movement by air, existing Canadian immigration staffs in the United Kingdom will be further expanded. Arrangements will be made at the immigration offices to assist prospective immigrants to obtain necessary documentation and travel facilities, and specially trained officers will be available to provide full information about conditions in Canada and to assist the prospective immigrant in preparing for settlement in this country. Priority of passage will be given to persons with assured employment awaiting them in Canada.

Officers of the Labour Department will be stationed in the immigration offices to advise intending immigrants as to prospects for employment, and, when practicable, to arrange definite placement in Canadian jobs prior to the immigrant's departure from the United Kingdom.

The offices of the immigration branch in London are being transferred to more spacious quarters, and a new office is to be opened in Glasgow within the next ten days. A third office will be opened in Liverpool before the 1st of July, and it is hoped that an office can be established in Belfast shortly thereafter.

It has been agreed by Trans-Canada Air Lines that experienced staffs and facilities of that organization will be made available for making the necessary arrangements to schedule the dispatch of immigrants when the necessary medical and civil examinations are completed, thus permitting of every possible facility to aid the immigrant desirous of taking advantage of this mode of travel.

It is considered that the new arrangement with T.C.A., together with considerably increased steamship facilities now available as a result of government action, will go a long way towards overcoming the serious shortage of immigrant transportation from the British isles which previously existed.

In addition to the arrangements which I have just announced in connection with the transportation of immigrants by air from the United Kingdom, I am glad to be able to inform the house that the government has decided to increase from 20,000 to 30,000 the number of displaced persons, not otherwise admissible, who will be allowed to enter this country for permanent residence. As has been previously indicated, the displaced persons who are admitted to Canada under the present program will be counted against any quota that this country may eventually accept as a result of an international agreement designed to solve the displaced persons problem.

It is perhaps worth reminding the house that Canada was not only the first non-European country to take independent action to admit displaced persons who are not otherwise admissible, but that this country has admitted more displaced persons, on the grounds that they were displaced persons, than all other non-European countries combined.

The United States Congress is now giving consideration to the possibility of admitting a considerable number of these people. Up to the present none have been admitted to the United States as displaced persons, although some thousands have been given entry under their national quotas.

The total number of displaced person arrivals in Canada as at the 15th of April was 15,410. This is a record of which I believe we have a right to be proud.

As has been the case from the beginning, the displaced persons who will be admitted to Canada will be very carefully screened by the Canadian teams which have been established in Europe for this purpose.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the acting minister a question arising out of his statement with respect to the immigration plan. How far does the United Kingdom plan go toward carrying out without interruption the highly successful airborne immigration scheme which was originated by Premier George Drew?

Mr. KNOWLES: There would not be an election on, would there?

Mr. GRAYDON: Not so far as you are concerned in Ontario.

Mr. MacKINNON: A number of prospective settlers in Canada from the British isles had bought and paid for passage under the scheme referred to by the hon. member for Peel. It is not possible to bring them to Canada under that scheme now, but our arrangement will bring them to Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has there been any consultation between this government and the Ontario government so that the number of immigrants coming into Ontario will not be substantially decreased?

Mr. KNOWLES: Drew does not come to Ottawa.

Mr. GRAYDON: You do not get any members there either.

Mr. MacKINNON: The scheme to bring these immigrants to Canada is a dominion scheme, and it is in connection with such that I have made my announcement.

Mr. GRAYDON: That means that you have not consulted with the Drew government at all?

Mr. ISNOR: Following the statement made by the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources, I should like to ask if there has been any change in the landing regulations covering immigrants coming to Canada. I understand that the former arrangement was that they would land at Halifax, but now it appears that they are going to be landed at Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: That is still in Canada.

Mr. MacKINNON: I stated that the main points for airborne traffic would be Montreal and Toronto, but I might add that that does not mean that the immigrant must carry on to Montreal or to Toronto or stop at Montreal or Toronto. The scheme is liquid enough to carry these immigrants on to their destination.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a Canadian scheme.

Mr. MacKINNON: It is a Canadian scheme.

Mr. McIVOR: I appreciate the minister's statement that immigration offices will be opened in Belfast. That will certainly improve the standard of immigration from other parts of the British empire.

Mr. ISNOR: When I asked about the change in landing regulations, I was referring to movement by steamship.

Mr. MacKINNON: There has been no change in those arrangements. As a matter of fact we are arranging for increased numbers of immigrants to come by ship.

Mr. ISNOR: To Halifax?

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. HODGSON (Victoria, Ont.): Can the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources tell the house how many immigrants other than displaced persons entered Canada in 1946 or 1947 or since the war?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): As it will be necessary to get the figures, I will take the question as notice, but I would prefer that it be put on the order paper.

Mr. MERRITT: May I ask the minister how much it will cost for passage by air for immigrants under the dominion scheme?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not the figures before me, but I believe that the cost to the immigrant is approximately the same as under previous schemes.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

LONG BRANCH AND TORONTO ISLAND—QUESTION OF JURISDICTION

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): A request has been made by the board of trade of the city of Toronto to all hon. members to come to our city. They will all be coming to my riding and I want to welcome them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Has the hon. member a question to ask in connection with the statement which was just made?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to know whether the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will be there tomorrow so that he will be able to see what damage has been done by floods in that area.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we have not reached the orders of the day.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wonder if I might have an answer from the Minister of Public Works to the question I asked him yesterday with respect to the floods at Long Branch and Toronto Island. Who has jurisdiction in this matter? I would like to know so that we can get something done.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am quite embarrassed to answer the questions put by the hon. member. There seems to be a competition between the two members from Toronto concerning flood damages in their district. Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) gave notice of the following question to come up on Monday:

> Regarding the great damage to the federal Department of Public Works breakwater at Wards to Centre Island, Toronto Island, has the district engineer of the department yet reported on this, and what action is being taken to remedy the damage?

This question will appear on Monday's order paper and I shall try to give a joint answer to it and the question asked by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross).

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If I may ask a supplementary question, it seems to me the Minister of Public Works ought to know something about it already, because I asked him yesterday under whose jurisdiction this matter came. That is all I want to know. We want to get busy and get the thing fixed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

INSPECTION OF PENAL INSTITUTIONS BY GRAND JURY AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 206, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: It was one of the cardinal principles of Magna Carta that the people should have a large share in the administration of criminal justice. These institutions, whether rightly or wrongly, are managed by officers of the crown and nobody can visit them except officers of the crown. The bill would give jurisdiction to the grand jury and to members of parliament to visit them, to examine into complaints made, and make presentments without expense to the country. Another amendment is intended to meet the cases which occasionally arise of urgent requests of relatives of prisoners for permission to visit a dying parent or dependents. A recent case evoked wide sympathy. The last section of the bill provides that no person under nineteen years of age shall be admitted by any warden to or be confined in any penitentiary or other penal institution. Very strong representations have been made in this regard by some of the judges. These youths should be taken care of by the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PISTOLS, MOTOR CARS, LEVEL CROSSINGS AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 207, to amend the criminal code (pistols, motor vehicles, level crossings and the payment of fines).

Mr. COLDWELL: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I have waited until the sixty-ninth day of this session for the government to introduce such a bill. The marginal notes explain the various sections. The purpose of the amendments in sections 1 and 2 of the bill is to make it an offence to point, or use in a hold-up, not only an ordinary firearm but a pistol, or anything in the shape, form or size of a pistol.

The appalling fatal accidents and injuries from highway traffic and level crossings in Canada is mounting steadily and has become a public scandal. Almost every highway is coloured red with the slaughter. Nothing is done to avert these accidents as the mad race for speed goes on. Casualties from such accidents, and from drowning and fires in homes, are almost as numerous as those from the second world war in persons so killed or injured. The amendment would increase the penalty from "a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months" to a term of "not less than six months and not exceeding twelve months", without the option of a fine, and to "seizure and forfeiture" of the driver's car.

Section 4 deals with driving a motor vehicle while under the influence of alcohol or narcotics.

Section 5 deals with hit-and-run drivers, who are responsible for the most cowardly form of murder in Canada.

Section 10 provides that the jury in motor car accidents shall decide the question of fact as to whether the accused is guilty or not guilty on the evidence adduced. On the trial by jury of persons who cause death or serious injury, it is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished. There has been much criticism of many cases of gross negligence having been taken from the jury. The jury are required to take the law to be what the judge says it is, and, owing to the many cases withdrawn by order of the judge, trial by jury in those cases is negatived, and there are so many loopholes that many persons guilty of gross negligence get off. The increased number of accidents requires that the law should be brought up to date to meet the changing conditions, while preserving also the liberty of the subject.

Section 11 deals with the payment of fines by instalments. Many people on relief and out of work, or on part time, cannot pay their fines and have to go to jail—many of them first offenders with families, and some of them returned soldiers—which is another way of imposing imprisonment for debt. The Summary Offenders Act of fifteen years ago in Great Britain allowed time for the payment of fines, and it has closed half the jails in Britain. I would commend this provision to the study of hon. members. Law reform is a dead letter in Canada. We are miles behind Britain in law reform.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. GEORGE'S DAY

BRITAIN'S CONTRIBUTION TO LIBERTY AND CIVILIZATION—THEIR MAJESTIES' 25TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that today, the 23rd of April, is St. George's day. I thought that the leaders of the house might pause and pay tribute to England and to its patron saint, St. George, who slew the dragon.

Britain has stood like the Rock of Ages in these troublesome days, and next to the Christian church has done more for freedom, liberty and civilization than any other agency. We should remember at this hour:

> Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

I suggest that the leaders make some reply and that we sing God Save the King, the national anthem.

In the second place, this week end is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the marriage of Their Gracious Majesties the King and Queen, who were given such a tremendous reception in Canada in 1939, shortly before the second world war. A month ago I asked if some recognition should not be made of this event, and the Prime Minister replied that appropriate action was being considered. I should like to know what is to be done.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISPOSITION OF BUILDINGS AT KIRKFIELD PARK, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether he is yet in a position to state what use or disposition is to be made of the buildings at Kirkfield Park, Manitoba, which were built under the jurisdiction of his department

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Matters relating to this question are now under discussion. A decision has not yet been reached, but will be I hope before long, and then I shall attempt to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AREAS SURVEYED AS SETTLEMENT OR RIVER LOTS—LAND IN ELIGIBLE AND INELIGIBLE TOWNSHIPS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the subject which is under discussion today is a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939. This act came into force after we had a long period of drought on the prairies, and I think for two reasons: first, the parliament of the day had come to recognize that some sort of assistance should be given to the prairie farmers to help them in the years when they had crop failures because of drought, hail, frost, grasshoppers or any other condition beyond their control. It came into force for an additional reason, namely, that farm organizations at that time began to be used to exert pressure on the governments of the day to enact such legislation.

It would be well at this time to examine the features of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, because on many occasions since 1939 amendments have been made to meet the needs for which the act was introduced.

I want to say at the beginning that since 1939 the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been very beneficial to many farmers in the drought areas. Those who have been responsible for the act should be complimented, but in examining the various aspects of it, and its administration, I find that there are still many objectionable features in it. First, the act should apply on an individual basis; second, it should be extended in scope, and third, it should provide greater protection against crop losses. Because of the experience which the government and the farmers have had with the act as it now stands, it is recognized that it is not adequate for the purposes for which it was intended, but I do believe that we have made a beginning on something which will more nearly meet the needs of agriculture in this country.

At the present time we have no national planning for agriculture sufficient to provide stability in that field. It cannot be overemphasized at this time that measures directed to give stability to our agriculturists cannot do that unless we have national policies which will assist in maintaining stability in agriculture.

In passing I think I should mention four real reasons for having a national agricultural policy and what it should embrace. First, we should have an agricultural policy providing for maximum utilization of land; second we should have the principle of ever-normal granary; third a forward price fixing policy, and, finally, a national crop insurance scheme which will provide coverage for all our crops where there is an element of risk. It is recognized by all hon. members that not only our prairie farmers who come within the confines of this act, but also other specific branches of agriculture such as our fruit growers, our vegetable growers and others do need crop protection against losses.

As I said before, the experience of the government in the past should give us a basis on which to work out a larger scheme than is provided in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. What we need is a scientific survey to introduce an insurance scheme which would be national in scope. Such an insurance scheme should be on a federal basis and under federal control assisted financially by the provinces and by the agricultural groups interested in such a plan. Such a plan should include all types of agricultural production which have an element of risk involved in production. The rates to producers should be on an actuarial basis, with federal and provincial governments paying fifty per cent of the premiums, or some other amount determined by a fact-finding commission. Rates of premiums should be regionalized to correspond with specific areas and risks involved. Payment should in no case be higher than financial returns would have been had the crop been harvested and marketed. The method of administration, of course should be under federal control, with proper local federal agencies to carry out such a plan. Under such a plan, specialized production shoud be protected also. I refer to such branches of agriculture as the potato growers of Prince Edward Island, the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley, the tobacco growers of Ontario, and, of course, the wheat growers of the prairies. I am convinced, sir, that such a plan can be worked on a beneficial and economical basis.

I have calculated the administration costs of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and it amounts to approximately 3·7 per cent. I am sure that if the government would see fit to bring in a national crop insurance scheme this percentage could be lessened. It is for this reason I recommend that the government consider the advisability of setting up at once a commission to determine the feasibility of such a plan of crop insurance as I have outlined, or some alternative plan under which such protection could be provided to our producers at minimum cost. Such a plan as I have outlined is, I believe, in the national interests, would benefit the producers and would have a favourable effect on our whole economy.

When we recognize the fluctuations in income of our Canadian agriculturists it will be readily seen that there is need for such a scheme as I have outlined. Let me give an example. The net cash income of agriculture in 1918 was $384,000,000. In 1946 it was $1,742,000,000. The low return for the wheat crop in Saskatchewan in that same period was $38,000,000; the high in 1946, $250,000,000. The fluctuation during that period is 660 per cent. Just as legitimate an argument can be made with respect to other phases of our agricultural economy. I would go farther and say that as an illustration in those later years we have had one-quarter of our working force in agriculture.

During that period that one-quarter of the Canadian labour force has received between 11 and 16 per cent of our national income. I think the time has come when we have to think in terms of the general welfare of the people of this country. If for any reason it should be thought I am asking this government for something unreasonable. I want to say that western agriculture has subsidized all classes of people in this country. I have in my hand a book put out by the Searle Grain Company in which they say that, according to their estimate, in the crop year 1946 the western farmers alone subsidized the Canadian consumer in the case of wheat to the extent of $110,000,000 in round figures; and other instances could be mentioned in which the farmers of the west have subsidized the people of the country as a whole.

[Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).]

As I stated in the beginning, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as constituted at present, and as it will be constituted with the proposed amendments, will be still lacking in many features. In the first place, it still provides an arbitrary basis of administration and payment. In some instances individual farmers receive benefits though their crop yield may be well over fourteen bushels to the acre. In the administration of the P.F.A.A. I have seen farmers in one section, who had good crops, receiving the benefits while because of section 7 (a) of the act other farmers with less than fourteen bushels to the acre, and in some cases with practically no crop at all, received nothing. Therefore I say the basis should be changed so that a farmer having what might be termed a crop loss would be entitled to an award. It is also possible for farmers suffering complete crop failure to receive no payment whatever. That is a situation which I think should be rectified in the proposed amendments. Furthermore these amendments do not take into consideration the fact that farm living costs have increased. So I would suggest to the minister that when we get into committee he bring in further amendments to rectify these three injustices.

Before resuming my seat I want to repeat the three points I think should be dealt with. I strongly urge that the act be amended to provide, first, that the maximum amount payable under the act should be $1,000; second, that payment should be on an individual basis, and third, that the act should be widened in scope to include all agriculture in Canada.

Mr. RENE N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks made the other day and this afternoon on this subject. I am afraid, however, I shall have to depart somewhat from the path that has been followed by those who so far have participated in the debate.

In the first place I think I owe it to my constituents to point out that there is very considerable urgency about the adoption of these amendments. I had hoped this would not evolve into a full scale debate on agriculture as a whole, and I hope we shall be able to pass these amendments very shortly, because I know personally of at least 150 farmers who are awaiting their cheques in order to buy their seed; and at this time of year, as you know, that becomes a very urgent matter.

These amendments more or less carry into effect the recommendations made by the committee last year. At that time we thought there was enough power in the act to have our recommendations put into operation without the need for amendments, but apparently the scope of the act was not sufficiently wide, so it is necessary to have these amendments before those recommendations can be carried out. For that reason I am very grateful to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who, having given us the assurance that he would carry out the recommendations, now has brought in these amendments. This means a great deal to the people of my constituency, because they have to do in large measure with the river lots and settlements, and the great difficulty we have had ever since this act has been in operation. I intend to go further into this question in the committee stage, but I do want to commend the minister for having brought in these amendments at this time.

I should like to take exception to some of the remarks made by previous speakers. With the possible exception of one hon. gentleman they have all made the statement that this act has been of great benefit to the western provinces. They should have said it has been of great benefit to two of the western provinces; because as far as Manitoba is concerned, instead of having been a great benefit the assistance given to that province under this act has been so small in proportion to the contributions the farmers have had to make to the fund that it has become a direct burden instead of a great benefit. If you review the statistics, the contributions and the amounts that have been paid out, I think the figures will confirm my statement. Two years ago I said that I did not think we in Manitoba could expect this act to be of any great benefit to us as it was written and being administered at that time. I repeated that statement last year, and the experience since then has only strengthened my belief.

One of the first demands to be made by those who have spoken so far is that this act should be operated on an individual basis. In other words everyone has argued that this legislation should be converted into a crop insurance scheme. In the past I have taken the stand that we should have a crop insurance plan; but to argue that this legislation should be converted into such a scheme I think is barking up the wrong tree. This has never been a crop insurance scheme, and was never meant to be such. We would have to change the act entirely to make it so. Furthermore I think everyone realizes that we would run into constitutional difficulties. I am not a lawyer, but no doubt some of our legal friends will speak in this debate, and I fear that any crop insurance scheme would fall within provincial jurisdiction.

The moment we would start to apply this act on an individual basis I feel we would have to change the contribution, which would have to be on a larger scale. In that event you could not possibly expect the farmers of southern Manitoba, for instance, to make the same contribution to the fund as the farmers of Weyburn or the farmers of the Souris area. The various districts of the provinces would have to be zoned, and naturally the rate in the Souris district would have to be much higher than the rate in southern Manitoba, or the rate in Weyburn, or in some other areas. In other words there would have to be different rates, as there are in all insurance schemes, because in certain parts the risk is much greater than in others. Therefore that raises an altogether different question.

To come back to my province, I said this act really had not worked to the benefit of the farmers there. To prove my point I should like to complete the figures I put on record two years ago, showing the amounts that have been actually collected in Manitoba and the amounts that have been paid into the fund:

1945	30,000	575,000
1944	159,000	754,000
1943	13,000	779,000
1942	....	482,000
1941	36,000	340,000

With the exception, therefore, of the first three years of the act, the farmers in Manitoba actually always contributed far more than they collected from the fund. I think the reason for this difference should be pointed out.

Hon. members will recall that in 1939, 1940 and 1941, the three years during which we received a little more than we contributed to the fund, section 3, subsection (2) (a), applied; that is, the twelve bushels to the acre basis was taken into consideration. It would appear that the only chance we in Manitoba have of getting any benefit from this act would be that the basis, instead of being the four and eight bushels, should also include the twelve-bushel basis, because in those three years we collected something from the fund; but from 1942 on, when four and eight bushels was the basis, the amount distributed in the province was a negligible one.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) said that if Saskatchewan received a great deal, it also contributed more than the other provinces.

Mr. ARGUE: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. JUTRAS: Yes.

Mr. ARGUE: Is he in favour of Manitoba withdrawing from the scheme?

Mr. JUTRAS: All the hon. member needs to do is to look at the record on that point. I went on record in 1945 and again last year. I am definitely in favour of it. That is what I am coming to.

As I was saying, the hon. member for Weyburn said that Saskatchewan had been the greatest contributor to the fund. What he meant, and what he probably said, was that the greatest deductions were made in Saskatchewan, but actually it appeared that he said the contributions in Saskatchewan were greater than those of any other province. If contributions are considered on the basis of the fund, of course there is only one province that contributed to the fund, and that is Manitoba; because we always received less than we contributed, whereas Saskatchewan and Alberta always received more than they contributed.

If we look at the record from the time this act came into operation—and it has been in operation, as I pointed out, since 1939—and the breakdown for the three western provinces showing the receipts from the levy, the award and the percentage of the award to the levy, here is what we find. This is taken from the Manitoba Co-operative of December 18, 1947, in an article based on the auditor general's report as tabled in the house. The breakdown, as follows, which shows the respective benefit received by the three provinces over the years since the inception of the act, is as follows:

Manitoba	$ 4,233,284	$ 1,772,162	42
Saskatchewan .	14,652,897	54,502,886	372

It will be seen that Manitoba had a 42 per cent return, Saskatchewan a return of 372 per cent and Alberta a return of 225 per cent. There is a great discrepancy there as between the three provinces. As a matter of interest, if we make a computation, just to show our chances in Manitoba under the operation of the act without section 3(2)(a)—and there is not much hope that this section will apply for quite a few years to come—if we operate only on the basis of four bushels and eight bushels to the acre, and if we exclude in Manitoba the part that was paid on the twelve-bushel basis and take only the money contributed on the four and eight bushels to the acre, the return in Manitoba over the eight or nine years that the act has been in operation has been six per cent. If we take the return since 1942, our return has been only four per cent. It also means if there had been three separate funds, and if Manitoba had had its own fund, with the money contributed and the money paid out, we would still have over $2,500,000 in the fund. As it is, naturally, the fund has gone towards defraying the deficit that has been covered by the treasury.

I feel, therefore, that under the present arrangement of a square township, and a four and eight bushel basis, our chances of ever getting any benefit from the act is so slim that it cannot be called a benefit. I have never yet encountered or met a single farmer in my district who, to my knowledge, approved this act in the form in which it is written at the present time. A great many have expressed the view that if it could not be changed, they would rather do without it than have it in its present form.

It would appear from the discussion that most members feel that this legislation should be replaced; or that they would rather have a change in the act so that it would become a crop insurance scheme, and that such a change would meet with their favour. My personal belief is that if we were to have any such scheme it would have to come from the provinces. To my mind it is definitely a matter of provincial jurisdiction. If we are to make any headway we should ask the provinces to take the lead, and seek the co-operation of the federal government, with a view to discussing this matter so as to evolve the project into one of crop insurance.

I brought this matter up last year, and even before that. Last year the minister made it clear that he was prepared to consider any representations made by any of the three western provinces. I was pleased to note in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 25, 1947, an article headed "Use of prairie farm act funds as crop insurance suggested." In this article the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba is reported to have said:

> We should begin to move into crop insurance and develop it one step at a time. I feel we should suggest that the deduction of one per cent now made under P.F.A.A. should be handed to the province as the beginning of a proper crop insurance.

We have had indications recently that our C.C.F. friends in the house have a great deal of influence on the premier and ministers of one of the provinces. I believe they would be rendering a service, and would probably accomplish more quickly what they would appear to wish to accomplish, if they would press upon that provincial government the necessity of initiating a scheme of this kind.

As I said before, we could still use the wheat board to collect the one per cent; then if the wheat board were to turn the money over to the provinces, the provinces could evolve from that point an insurance scheme of some kind to meet the local conditions. This suggestion could be explored, with the possibility of receiving contributions to some extent from the federal government. At least it is my belief that the matter should be explored more fully.

On this score we have heard the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) state his opinion that this should be evolved into a crop insurance scheme. Apparently the only objection he had was that the provincial government may not have the necessary financial backing. I am sure that with a Social Credit government in Alberta this could not be a serious objection, and that they would probably find a solution to the desired end. The matter is certainly worthy of further study. It must be kept in mind, however, that if we do not go the full length into an entirely new scheme such as one of crop insurance, if we are to reduce the qualifying basis from townships to smaller areas, and if we are to enter to some extent into the field of crop insurance, there would have to be some distinction made between provinces and districts.

I am of the firm belief that a basis which might be considered fair in Manitoba would not be a fair basis in Saskatchewan. I have come to the conclusion that the act would have to have at least two and possibly three bases. Because, as is shown by the facts and figures, under the present set-up Manitoba would stand very little chance of benefiting.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the hon. member believe that a crop insurance scheme on an actuarial basis could ever operate in a drought area?

Mr. JUTRAS: I never suggested that. I do not suppose it could operate entirely—perhaps only partly. I believe I made myself clear on that point—that the levy would remain, and then another contribution would be required.

Mr. QUELCH: From the federal government?

Mr. JUTRAS: Perhaps from both the federal and provincial governments.

It was stated in one speech that large number of farmers feel that payments should be made on the basis of individual farm units, in those areas where crop failures are prevalent because of drought. I do not suppose it was the intention to have the act operate only on the basis of drought, because if that were so we in Manitoba would raise strong objection. The act was primarily to meet a drought condition. Gradually hail and floods were included, until at the present time the act makes no distinction between different kinds of disasters. As the act now reads, a crop failure is a crop failure. If the yield is below four bushels, or if it is below eight bushels, they qualify and receive payment; and that is the end of it.

If we were to return to the basis of drought and drought alone, we in Manitoba would have no choice but definitely to drop out of the picture; because I am sure we would have no chance whatsoever of ever receiving any benefit from the act. The only time we receive any benefit is from floods; and this year I understand that we stand a chance of receiving some assistance in certain large areas hailed out last year.

Without taking any more of the time of the house, I would suggest certain concrete points to the minister. First I suggest that the minister give full co-operation to the provinces —and I know he will. There is already some indication that some of the provinces will discuss the matter with the federal government with a view to converting the legislation into provision for crop insurance. I would urge that the minister give the fullest possible co-operation, and that permission be given to certain of the provinces to enter upon schemes of their own if they so desire. If this is not done, then I would recommend that the basis for Manitoba be somewhat different from the basis for Saskatchewan and Alberta. I believe I am being modest when I ask that instead of the square township we be allowed the 36 sections of land. It will be realized that it is most difficult to have the square township in the central and eastern parts of the province. If this is not possible, I suggest a section should be added to section 3(2) so that Manitoba may be allowed another classification. There is provision for four bushels and eight bushels, and I suggest that we be allowed a twelve bushel basis. At the present time payments are made on the basis of four bushels and eight bushels. If Manitoba were on the basis of twelve bushels to the acre I am sure we would still receive less assistance proportionately than Saskatchewan and Alberta are receiving under the eight bushel basis.

If you analyse the figures I have given and the reports that have been made since 1939, I think you will find that a twelve bushel basis for Manitoba would correct the situation a little but would not put that province in a preferred class. It would simply give us a fair share of the benefits paid under this scheme.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I followed with a great deal of interest the speech delivered by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), and also the earlier speech delivered by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough). Their viewpoints are most interesting, in that they indicate the divergence of opinion in the western provinces.

The hon. member for Provencher has suggested that Manitoba more or less secede from the plan. There are material differences in the contributions made year by year by the provinces to this fund, as well as in the benefits payable thereunder. The report for the crop year 1946-47 gives the following figures:

Manitoba	$ 845,631
Alberta	1,644,706

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) asked whether it would be possible to bring in a federal system of crop insurance on an actuarial basis. I think the figures which appear in this record are an answer to that. Between 1939, when the act came into effect, and 1947, the total receipts from the one per cent levy were $27,913,000, whereas the total amount paid out was $73,392,683, or more than three times what was taken in.

Having regard to the conditions which prevail in southern Saskatchewan and in parts of Alberta, I think the general opinion is that a federal system of crop insurance would be altogether too costly, in view of the losses which might result. Last year I referred to the extent to which certain areas had been subject to drought over the years, and I wish to place a portion of that record on Hansard. I should like to give the number of townships in the different provinces which have suffered from drought and received payments over a varying number of consecutive years. They are as follows:

	Saskatchewan	Alberta	Manitoba
Seven consecutive years	34	48	..
Six consecutive years ..	173	223	..
Five consecutive years .	478	368	3
Three consecutive years	1,469	619	17

Those figures indicate that there are areas in southern Saskatchewan and in Alberta that are subject to repeated and continuous drought.

The hon. member for Assiniboia has suggested a system of crop insurance, but I shall not go into the details of that at the moment. I should like to refer to the report of the Saskatchewan reconstruction council, a study of crop insurance by Mr. R. E. Motherwell, wherein it is pointed out that if a system of crop insurance were put into effect in Saskatchewan it would mean that in large areas the farmers would have to contribute from sixteen to twenty per cent of what they sell.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The hon. member realizes that I suggested that the federal government pay fifty per cent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That correction is perfectly proper. I am simply showing how difficult it would be to bring in a federal system of crop insurance which would thoroughly compensate by way of premium for what actually would be paid out by way of insurance. The fact that the difficulties in the way at the moment are almost insurmountable indicates the necessity of serious study before such a scheme is instituted. There is nothing, however, to prevent the provincial governments from instituting a partial scheme which would bring in areas smaller than those now covered by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am going to refer particularly to certain drought areas in Saskatchewan in which the people are denied any benefits under this legislation because the present qualifying area is too large.

I do not intend to enter into a controversy with the hon. member for Assiniboia because I am not antagonistic to his views. I think the summary which was made during the course of this study is well worth putting on Hansard as indicating some of the difficulties which might be experienced in bringing into effect a system of crop insurance. The conclusions represent a summary of the arguments regarding the problem of crop insurance. I do not want to read them into Hansard but with the leave of the house I should like to place on Hansard page 39 and the first few lines of page 40 as indicating the ten difficulties that will have to be overcome before a proper and complete system of crop insurance can be brought into effect.

Mrs. STRUM: I have not had the privilege of reading that brief, and I believe it is quite a useful report. Was the summing up of the reconstruction council for or against crop insurance?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Usually when a royal commission makes recommendations it simply presents the arguments for both sides, leaving to the responsible government the final determination as to what shall be done.

In this report they leave doubt as to whether they are in favour of a crop insurance plan. But they do suggest quite a number of changes in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in order to assure a reasonable and proper return in certain drought areas in Saskatchewan.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask whether it is a provincial government submission?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. The chairman of this committee was F. C. Cronkhite, K.C., who is often charged by the present government in Saskatchewan with responsibility for making investigations. Other members of the committee were well known people in Saskatchewan, including J. H. Wesson, the president of Co-operative Wheat Producers; William Walker, K.C., T. A. McCusker, Mrs. W. K. Cruickshank, J. G. Cooper and W. G. Baker—all representative citizens in Saskatchewan. I think that their viewpoint and summation, after investigation, constitute a worthwhile contribution to the subject. It is for that reason I ask that consent of the house be given to the placing upon the record of their suggestions and conclusions.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Before the hon. member does that, may I ask if the portion to be put on Hansard gives both sides?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place this material on Hansard:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It reads as follows:

1. The plan would have to be preceded by a very intensive educational program to accustom farmers to the idea of such low protection and high rates.

2. Considering the experience of the American plan, it is doubtful that a voluntary system of insurance would be workable, for in high risk areas farmers are, to some extent, able to judge crop prospects and often prefer not to participate when prospects are good.

3. As a result of American experience and from our own general knowledge of southern Saskatchewan it is obvious that many farmers would not be able to pay the high premium charge.

4. Any premium collected could best be done by the percentage of yield or percentage of sales method,—similar to the percentage levy now applying under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

5. If the plan were not compulsory there would almost certainly be a tendency for the park belt area of the three western provinces to participate while the high risk areas of the prairie would not.

6. Many farmers would object to such a plan on the grounds that it "cost too much" and that the "protection was too low."

7. Some farmers would not engage in such a plan, if on a voluntary basis, believing that even if this crop did fail they would be assisted by relief.

8. At present no yield data exist for individual farms. The American experience has shown that such yield data can be secured but that they will perhaps be highly inaccurate in many cases. It is obviously folly to base an insurance scheme on the experience of too short a base period. It would be especially difficult to go into the yield experience of some farms which have been farmed during recent years by a series of operators.

9. It would be difficult and inadvisable to assure each farm in a district for the same yield. Few enterprises respond so greatly to proper timing of operations as farming. If one farmer, assured of 7 bushels per acre, manages to achieve a 7 bushels per acre yield in a poor year by very efficient farming, and his neighbour, as a result of less efficiency, secures a yield of 3 or 4 bushels per acre, the fairness of paying the second farmer sufficient to bring his returns to the equal of the first may well be doubted. The basis of insurance would have to reflect the actual yield experience on each farm during a base period. Even such a basis would contain unfairnesses when the present operator of a farm differed in efficiency from the farmer who worked the land during the base period.

10. Any system of crop insurance would likely have relatively high administration costs, for the first few years at least. Especially would this be so in a voluntary plan.

There are a number of recommendations I should like to make with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, they epitomize some of the views expressed in letters I have received from rural municipalities and others. I feel that the amendments provided in Bill No. 204 are unimportant in the light of the larger issues that might well be determined once and for all in a comprehensive manner. The inclusion of settlement or river lots, however, does represent an advance. It represents the suggestions made last year by various members, including the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), and others. I say this because in a radio speech last evening one of the ministers of the crown, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), apparently was in a state of high dudgeon over the fact that we in the opposition believe in placing proper criticism before the house and the country. Our criticisms represent the viewpoint of the people. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has never objected to suggestions, but apparently his colleague the Minister of National Defence last evening indulged in some, I do not know how to designate them—silly claqueries would probably designate them best—as to the duties of an opposition. We place these viewpoints before parliament and the government in order to secure changes. That is the position which an opposition must take. First it must criticize where it believes things are wrong, and it need offer no apologies for doing so. At the same time it ought to be constructive and bring to the attention of the government and the country the changes which in the opinion of the opposition ought to be made. I resent, sir, the remarks made last evening by the Minister of National Defence. If he would spend more time in looking after the matters concerning defence than in criticizing those who endeavour to be of assistance by making suggestions, things would be a lot better in this country.

The amendment making river lots eligible is a good one, also the further one regarding eligibility of areas adjoining qualifying townships. But these changes do not go far enough. I have brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture on previous occasions. I realize the difficulties involved in an attempt to make an act cover all the anomalous circumstances and conditions that may arise during its operation. I have never refrained from criticism where I think criticism is due, but I believe that when commendation is due it should be given. I have found the officials of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, when matters are brought to their attention, willing to give every consideration to representations made with a view to having injustices removed in so far as the law will permit.

I shall refer to just one case which is peculiar to my own constituency and other constituencies along the Qu'Appelle valley. As I said last year in the house, speaking of the rural municipality of Dufferin, in Saskatchewan:

> Year by year a portion of that municipality, by reason of a valley which runs alongside of it, must suffer continuing drought; yet because it is not contiguous to a municipality declared eligible under the act, the farmers there resident are denied any consideration. From year to year contributions are made; from year to year the contributors are denied any return.

I again bring this to the attention of the minister. There is not only Dufferin municipality but there are other municipalities along the Qu'Appelle valley where like conditions prevail, and where, as a result of climatic conditions peculiar to areas smaller than a township, the farmers are being denied the payment of a bonus. I ask the minister, will he not even now give consideration to reducing the area of qualification provided under the act? As I understand the situation, it is a full township or a contiguous rectangle of nine sections.

Mr. GARDINER: Nine or more.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, nine or more. I think the removal of the descriptive word "rectangle" would make a considerable difference. If you simply said "nine or more contiguous sections", instead of "nine or more contiguous sections in a rectangle", it would remove part of the difficulty. I suggest that contiguity be done away with, and that where there is an area, with nine sections adjoining or joined one to the other, they should be entitled to the payment of a bonus regardless of whether or not they are adjacent to a qualified township.

The municipalities have brought certain other suggestions to my attention. They raise the question of a minimum payment to small farmers. As the situation is today, payment of the award goes to the farmer on one-half of the individual cultivated acreage. But to the small farmers, with fifty or sixty acres representing their entire crop, payment on a half basis at the same rate as for larger farms denies them the opportunity to carry on with any measure of security.

Mr. GARDINER: Unless he is under four bushels.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right, as the minister points out—unless the crop is under four bushels. The suggestion has been made that there should be some varying rate in that regard. By the limitation of 200 acres there is recognition of the fact that payment should not be made to large acreages. That recognition implies that small farmers are the ones to whom the act is designedly intended to assure a degree of security. This being so I suggest to the minister that some sliding scale be evolved so that those with smaller acreages will not be restricted in the same way and to the same extent as those with larger acreages.

Then, sir, there is the question, what is a farmer? There are all kinds of farmers. Some professional men call themselves farmers. It may be a descriptive phrase but they are not entitled to be called farmers. I submit to the minister that the regulations limit too strictly the definition of the term "farmer". As it is provided today in the regulations, a farmer is one who lives on a farm and whose primary occupation is farming, or who lives not more than twenty miles away from the farm and has no occupation other than farming.

Mr. GARDINER: That has been changed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These regulations which I hold in my hand I received yesterday from the Department of Agriculture, and I understood they were the last ones.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not the last ones. Changes have been made in accordance with the suggestions made by the hon. member and by some others before.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a previous occasion I suggested certain changes to cover farmers such as invalids and the like who find it necessary to move away from the farm although they continue the operations through someone else. "Farmer" is defined in the act as one "who as owner or tenant operates a farm in the spring wheat area or who as a member of a co-operative farm association is engaged in farming in the spring wheat area." But in the regulations it is defined at length somewhat differently.

Mr. GARDINER: I should explain that in going to the department now you will not get the regulations as they have been placed before the board and later before the government for passing. The regulations have been amended considerably and are in the process of being further amended. By going and asking for the regulations at this time you would not get these regulations as they are being amended.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I got in touch with the proper departmental official yesterday and asked for a copy of the regulations up to date. I sent a messenger for it and the one I received was dated in 1944. I then communicated with the official and the information I received was that the copy that was furnished me was the last one. It makes it a little difficult in arguing a question in the house to find out that changes have been made but that they have not yet been promulgated.

Speaking now of the regulation the copy I have as the final unexpurgated edition of the regulations, rather than the newly revised and undistributed ones, I say that every consideration should be given, so far as family farms are concerned, to the advisability of extending the right of the head of the family, as for example, a widow, to leave that farm and be farther away than twenty miles. Second, I suggest that when a farmer continues to operate his farm and at the same time takes employment in a neighbourhood town or village adjacent to where he carries on his farming operations, he should not be denied payment of the prairie farm assistance.

A farmer found it necessary, by reason of crop failure, in June or July, knowing that he would have a crop failure, to leave his farm and get work elsewhere, leaving his family on the farm. The attitude taken, until the matter was brought before the board of review, was that he was disentitled to any consideration because he had an occupation other than farming. There should be no denial of entitlement in cases of temporary absence under such circumstances. The regulations should be brought before the committee of the whole, after second reading of this bill, so that we shall know what they are and be in a position to suggest changes which will bring some of them up to date and meet the objections we receive from time to time. I hope that the minister will place in the hands of hon. members the new and revised regulations so that members will be in a position to suggest further alterations and changes.

Therefore, sir, I suggest three things. First, when we go into committee we should have before us the regulations and assist in the revising of them instead of having the revision done by departmental officials removed from parliament and from the representatives of the people in parliament.

Mr. SINNOTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member for Springfield agrees with what I have said in this regard. He is a former reeve of a municipality. He understands the situation and is able to make his contribution, recommendations and suggestions. Other hon. members in other parts of the house are in a position to do the same thing.

Second, I bring again to the minister's attention the necessity of including areas in Saskatchewan which are now disqualified. Third, I suggest a change in the area of qualification. I realize the difficulties in connection with the individual basis, although there are those who believe that it should be paid on an individual basis. The purpose of the act should be to give assurance to all who suffer drought loss that they will be entitled to receive the payment of the bonus so that they will be able to remain on the land and continue their occupation of farming. To achieve this I suggest a reduction in the area of qualification.

My next suggestion is an alteration of the present qualification to do away with the rectangular requirement and make it possible for areas, even though they are not in the form of a rectangle, to qualify under the act.

I suggest a change in the act to cover the definition of "farmer" and indicate who shall be entitled under the regulations. Finally, there should be a sliding scale in the matter of payments where the yield is over four bushels an acre. This would assure a larger return for the small farmer for whose continuation in farming the act appears to be designed.

These recommendations and suggestions, sir, represent the point of view of municipalities not only in my constituency but elsewhere, and are placed before the house with the view of endeavouring to improve the act and to make it cover circumstances which it does not cover now because of the anomalous conditions resulting from the regulations. They are advanced with a view to assuring that the purpose for which the act was originally conceived and the spirit in which it has been administered, to which I have already paid tribute, shall be continued, and to the end that the present injustices and inequities may be removed.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): I should like to say a few words on this bill, Mr. Speaker, though the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) has covered it fairly well. I might also put in a good word for the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has pointed out several deficiencies which still exist under this legislation and which, if corrected, would make it more beneficial to the smaller farmers.

I have the misfortune, I would call it, to have in my hand the names of fifty-five farmers, representing 1,600 acres, who have paid into this fund year in and year out and who have not the ghost of a chance of collecting a nickel. One here has 165 acres; another one has 50 acres; another has 105 acres. Here is a widow with 93 acres, who never stacked a bushel of seed or feed last year but who has not a hope of collecting anything for the damage sustained from floods last fall.

I believe the purpose of an act of this kind is to protect the little fellow rather than the big operator. While it may be helpful to take in the lots along the Red river, which will cover a few farmers, I would say that is only a drop in the bucket compared with the damage suffered by several sections of the constituency of Springfield last year. As has been pointed out, Manitoba has contributed to this fund year after year but has derived very little benefit. So I say we should either make this legislation beneficial to all farmers or get out of this field altogether and make it a provincial or municipal or constituency set-up so that we may get fast action.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that to extend this scheme from one end of the country to the other would be far too complicated and expensive. Personally I believe a provincial set-up would be best, under which a section of the province having a good crop would share with a section having a poorer crop. I do not quite see how the act could be made to take in these smaller areas; but what chance does a poor widow have, with 100 acres of land drowned out, if she has to go to the provincial or dominion government for assistance? Her chances are pretty poor. Until this act is made to apply to these smaller farmers, I do not think it will be very beneficial, so that when we get in committee I hope the minister will see his way clear to make some change in that regard.

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at once that I am in full agreement with the spirit of this legislation which, as I see it, is designed to take care of a particular situation. The basic underlying principle is logical and practical. It can do and has done the job in the most direct and economical way. In a year of crop failure when the farmer has no other return this assistance has enabled him to carry on his farming operations. It takes the place of the old form of relief which was given the individual by the municipality, the province or the federal government, and I am glad that the government has seen fit to take over this responsibility. Climatic conditions, over which the farmer has no control, may bring loss over wide areas almost to the extent of a national calamity.

I am strongly in favour of a contributory form of self-help; and I would be in favour of a contribution larger than one per cent in order that the return to the individual might be increased beyond the present $2.50 per acre, which will not take care of seed and living expenses.

I have lived for thirty-six years in a part of the country to which this act has been applicable from time to time, and I know something about its practical application. As it is administered at the present time, the spirit and intention of the original act are not carried out, and as a result hardship is imposed upon certain individuals. In dry years we may have what they call local showers, which will take in anything from a half-section to six sections or more. One point might even have a soaker, while half a mile away there might be only a light sprinkle. A streak of rain can act very much as a hailstorm sometimes does. As I see it, the only fair way to administer this act is on an individual basis. I would say the inspection would not cost any more, since every section and every farmer are now checked and a settlement made on the basis of the present legislation.

Let me give the minister an actual illustration of what takes place. Let us say that in a given township the full bonus of $2.50 per acre is paid. The township directly below does not get the $2.50. Why? Well, because sections 35, 34, 27, 22, 15, 10, 9 and 3 had one of those local showers, and in some of those sections they had as much as sixteen bushels to the acre. In the same township the sections on the east side, sections 25, 24, 13, 12, 11, 2 and 1, averaged only three bushels to the acre. On the west side of that same township there were sections 17, 18, 30, 31, 29 and 32, which did not get their seed back. That brought a real hardship on those men. As I see it, this act was designed to take in and take care of men who had a complete crop failure. The only opposition I have encountered with regard to reducing the sections from nine was because it would cost more money to operate the act in that way. I would ask the minister this question. Why chisel on this? Why make regulations that would cause a real hardship and, just by those regulations, exclude those men who had crop failures? There is no other reason.

Mr. GARDINER: I should just like to say to the hon. member that it is not a regulation. That is in the law. That is one of the regulations which was brought here and decided on the floor of the house, which makes it law.

Mr. McCUAIG: I will accept the minister's correction. I am not as well versed in law and regulations as the minister is. We shall call it a law. Why make laws which are contrary to the spirit of this act, and exclude those men? That is the point I want to make. I am glad the minister made that interjection, because maybe I did not make myself clear.

Those men paid for this protection. They paid all they were asked to pay. The minister knows the practical side of this whole thing. He knows that, since this act came into force, getting relief or seed is just out of the question. A man is out of luck who is in those parts excluded from this act. He cannot go to his municipality. If he himself cannot finance, he suffers by it, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) so well pointed out.

It has been said in the past that the reason the number of sections was not reduced from nine, or a quarter, was the existence of submarginal land. After thirty-six years of farming there, settlers on the submarginal land are fairly well eliminated. They are not there any more. I would say that is not a factor in this matter now. What I would call submarginal land is land that has four inches or less of top soil. I would say that land with four inches and above—six inches or eight inches—can be farmed and is profitable wheat land today under the present advanced method of tillage and the improved grain we grow on it.

Further, the minister should give serious consideration to getting this down on an individual basis because that, as I see it, is the purpose and intention of the act. It was to eliminate direct relief and all this rigmarole with regard to seed and relief that went on, as hon. members know, from the individual to the municipality, to the provincial government and on to the federal government. I hope the minister will give his consideration to whether it is logical, practical and equitable. I cannot see that it is an equitable and just method which excludes one man who has suffered under the same conditions as the man who gets $2.50 per acre.

In some cases it is even worse than that. I have seen an instance where a township has been under the full bonus, and possibly immediately south—or even north or on either side, or even taken in a circle—there is a group of four, five, six or eight sections that would not be. They would be completely out of it, just because the balance of that township probably averaged up to over twelve bushels an acre. The minister is a man who is practical enough to know these things. He has been on a farm. He knows the condition. In fact I think he knows very well the place where I myself am situated, and knows that what I am saying is near the truth and contains practical suggestions. I would ask him to consider this matter seriously, and to place it on an individual basis or on a much smaller basis than nine sections. I would ask that it be not restricted to a rectangle or square, but take in, say three, four, or five sections, no matter in what direction you go. I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): It is not my intention today, Mr. Speaker, to repeat at any great length anything that has gone before. With much that has been said I am, of course, in agreement, because some of the problems mentioned by other speakers are the problems of my own constituency. On the other hand, quite a bit has been said, even by hon. members from my own province, with which I cannot wholly agree. For instance, I question whether it is practicable for the provinces as such to take over a system of crop insurance. After all, if there were any great crop failure that was province-wide, half province-wide or even of substantial proportions in any province, it might test severely the financial resources of the provinces were they standing behind a system of crop insurance. I think a province should be leery about stepping into this picture, and I think the experience will be that the provinces will probably be leery of participating in any such scheme.

Then, with regard to the administration of it, if there were to be any contributory payments or deductions from farmers' grain, if the province were handling it, it would be impractical for the province to collect.

So far as the amendments are concerned, there is not a great deal with which we can quarrel. There are some things about which I should like to ask some questions when we get into committee of the whole, as no doubt will be the case with other hon. members. I have one suggestion I should like to make to the minister if he would turn to the bill. I know that we are not supposed to refer to the sections at this stage, but it seems to me that there is a misprint in one of the sections in the minister's amendments; I refer to the new section 7(b). Just in order that we may be able to size up what it means, I wonder if the minister would look at it and see if it should not read "within an ineligible township", instead of "within an eligible township", in the second line of subparagraph (b) of section 7. That is in section 3 of the amending bill. It looks as though it should be "ineligible."

Mr. GARDINER: One should be "ineligible" and one should be, "eligible". Maybe the hon. member is right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is a misprint.

Mr. MILLER: The provision respecting river lots is of importance to two or three of us from my province, including the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras). I, for one, am glad to see them included, although the manner of their inclusion may be subject to some criticism, since the procedure to include is to be set out later by order in council.

In fairness I believe I should express my views as to the possibility of Manitoba retiring from the scheme. I know that among many farmers the deduction of one per cent is not popular, and particularly is this true in good crop areas, such as the one I have the privilege to represent. On the other hand it seems to me that this is fair and cheap insurance in our crop areas. It would require only one complete failure for most of these men to get their money back. After all, all of us have carried fire insurance, and I know of no one who objects to the fact that he has not had to cash in on the amounts he has paid in as fire insurance premiums. Those of us who have had fire insurance are grateful that we have not had to cash in on our policies.

I believe that, to some extent, farmers would look at this matter in the same way, and would consider that perhaps that is the fair way of looking at it. I would not be in a hurry to counsel Manitoba farmers to withdraw from the scheme, because the time may come when a catastrophe might befall us; and only one would be required for many of our farmers to get back a good deal more than they have paid in. The surplus of $2,000,000, the amount we have paid in more than we have received, would not last long in the event of widespread catastrophe in my native province. We have the resources of the dominion government behind this scheme; we have more than the contributions made by the farmers in the form of their one per cent deduction. If there were such a catastrophe, regardless of the amounts by way of contributions which had been made, and regardless of the amount of money the government might have on hand from the scheme, the resources of the dominion would be behind the payments to be made to the farmers of Manitoba by way of compensation, within the provisions of the act.

That is the way I put it. Regardless of what other members from my province may say, I am not yet ready to counsel farmers, if they were to ask my counsel, to withdraw from this scheme. So far as I am personally concerned, so long as the scheme is fairly administered and so long as the funds paid into the government are honestly and fairly distributed, according to the spirit of the law, I for one do not think we can have any great objection to it; because we know not what year disaster may hit those of us who come from good farming areas, just as it has hit other areas which have not been so fortunate. We should be careful in suggesting the breaking up of the scheme until we are convinced that it is not fairly and honestly administered, or that it is not doing a good job.

I do believe, however, that the minister will have to give consideration to the insistent demands that the minimum area be cut down. I do not know whether the minister and his counsellors are adamant in their determination to retain the present area as the unit for the payment of losses. I know, of course, that the minister is fully conscious of the objections coming from all corners of the country where this act applies, relating to the restriction which states that it must be a township loss. It seems to me that that could be cut down.

I have argued before in the house that it should be cut down to an individual basis, and I do not yet see why that could not be done. The minister has not said that it would be financially impossible. He has not given any reason, more than to point out administrative difficulties, which would convince me that it could not be done. However, even if I am wrong in my argument that it should be on an individual basis, I still believe that it could be cut to an area much smaller than a township. It seems to me that if we were to adopt the quarter township as a unit much of the dissatisfaction now emanating from the area from which I come would be eliminated.

We do not often have to claim under this act, although we did have a little trouble from flooding in one of the areas during the past year. Unfortunately most of the farmers affected were not well to do, because the flooding occurred in an area where the land is not quite as good. The result was that the flooding caused considerable suffering. There was not a sufficient area in either of the townships affected by the flooding to qualify those men for relief under the act, in spite of the fact that they had been paying their one per cent deduction, as had other farmers.

It seemed to me a pity that those people could not participate in the fund. If a smaller acreage had been required they would have participated. I believe that much of the dissatisfaction with the act is in its administration, and that a great measure of the faulty administration lies in the fact that the unit of crop failure fixed at the township level is considerably too large.

In view of the generality of this criticism, coming from all parts of the country, although I am sure the minister has had this matter drummed into his ears year after year, I suggest that once again he should give serious consideration to the matter, and accept perhaps the quarter township unit for a trial period.

I know of no difficulty which would arise in our area in that respect. It is possible that under this condition the cost might be too great, in view of the fact that farther west they may have many areas which would be entitled to make claims, thereby running the cost up to too high a figure.

May I state further to the minister that I do not believe the farmers of Manitoba who have paid into this scheme will ask to leave it, just because they are paying this one per cent. I believe, however, that if, as has been suggested by some hon. members, and particularly those to my left, the rate of contribution were increased, nothing could stop an insistent demand from the farmers of Manitoba to have that province excluded from the scheme, and that our farmers would have to work out some other method of meeting this situation.

As it stands today, however, it seems highly improbable to me that, with the reasonably good crops we have on the average, any farmer would want to withdraw simply because of the one per cent deduction. After all, these various schemes for the benefit of farmers in general can exist only if the farmers themselves co-operate and are prepared to do their share, not only when they are going to benefit but also to carry out the general nature of the scheme. Perhaps they would benefit from one scheme and not from another. I believe I know the farmers in our western country pretty well, and I cannot believe that they would object to this one per cent deduction when they realize that, after all, it is a measure of cheap insurance, particularly, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said, because the fund does not really carry itself.

There were some other things I had intended to say but, with one exception, they have been said. The one remaining has been dealt with partly at least by the hon. member for Lake Centre. As hon. members know, I have always opposed too much power by regulation; and too much liberty or right to make regulations is vested under this act in bodies other than parliament. I am not taking general objection to them, but I believe that no body except this house should have the power to make a regulation changing the definition of the person or persons entitled to receive benefits under this act. It should not be very difficult to define those who should receive benefits. Section 6(f) is the section which gives the power to make regulations, and paragraph (f) reads:

> . . . and excluding from the operation of this act persons who, in such circumstances and under such conditions as are prescribed in such regulations, have occupations in addition to farming or do not reside on farms.

I maintain that this act should define who is entitled to benefits under the act, and I contend that no body other than this house should have the power to change that. I ask the minister to consider bringing in an amendment to satisfy us on that score.

I want to go farther than the hon. member for Lake Centre went and say again that there should be no power in any body to make regulations that would change the definition of "farmer" in the act. The government can suggest whatever definition they think will be acceptable to the house, but once that is done, there should be no power to make any change.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think a good deal of valuable information has been provided by this debate. It shows that, while hon. members are agreed about many things, there are still some differences. I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) say he would be prepared to support the withdrawal of Manitoba from the act. I can well understand that the people in that province feel that they have received relatively small benefits from the act as compared with the people in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

However I think there are one or two things the hon. member overlooked. In the last few years prices of grains have increased considerably and consequently the revenue derived from the one per cent deduction is much higher. I think that would account in large measure for the fact that in 1939, 1940 and 1941 Manitoba received more by way of benefits than was paid in by way of deductions.

Mr. JUTRAS: The point I was making was that in those years the payments were made on the basis of twelve bushels to the acre, whereas it has not been twelve bushels to the acre since.

Mr. ARGUE: That is a good point and I think it bears out what I have been saying. If we reach the time again when prices of grains go down, not only will the collections be less but the need for this act will be greater. I think there has been a lot of loose talk about the so-called submarginal areas and those areas which are most subject to crop failures.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated that in Saskatchewan there were 173 townships which had received benefits for seven consecutive years. He will correct me if the figure I give is not accurate. I would point out that in Saskatchewan there are twenty-eight municipalities or 252 townships which have averaged crops of between 8·1 and 10 bushels of wheat per acre from 1918 to 1943. I do not think that area is submarginal. Over a period of years those farmers with proper agricultural practices have been able to make a living.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was no suggestion of that kind.

Mr. ARGUE: I realize that. I am just pointing out that when the benefits are paid on the basis of eight bushels down, or in some years on eight to twelve bushels, those areas which have a lower long-time yield get more in the way of benefits than those which have higher yields. I believe that any province should be careful before deciding to withdraw from this act. We do not know how long it will be, although we hope it will be many years, before grain prices fall. We do know that in the last four years there have been widespread crop failures. I believe that if we get continuing crop failures and if prices should fall, then even the province of Manitoba could not carry a scheme such as this.

Reference was made previously in the debate to the recommendations of the Saskatchewan reconstruction council in connection with crop insurance. A study was made by Mr. R. E. Motherwell, B.S.A., who happens to be the grandson of the late W. R. Motherwell. In my opinion he prepared a most excellent brief. While I do not agree with all his conclusions, I certainly agree with many of them. I would point out that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) did not suggest crop failure insurance on an actuarial basis but rather on a basis of a fifty per cent contribution by the farmers and fifty per cent by the federal government.

Mr. Motherwell made an extensive survey of the results from crop insurance schemes in the United States which were based on individual farm yields. It was hoped that over a long period of years each farmer would pay in premiums approximately the amount he received in benefits, but the schemes did not work out very well. Mr. Motherwell summarizes as follows:

1. Completely self-carrying crop insurance has not been successfully achieved for small grains in any country.

2. Of all ventures in the field of crop insurance, the American experiment is the most noteworthy. This experiment showed several things.

(a) That farmers in high risk areas were unable to pay the premiums necessary for their own protection.

(b) That participation in high risk areas consistently decreased, even though general participation throughout the country increased.

(c) That, especially in high risk areas, when a relatively large premium was subtracted from the indemnity receivable by the farmer after loss of crop, the payment was no more than a disaster preventive.

(d) That unless a plan of insurance is compulsory, farmers will not participate in years of favourable crop prospects.

I have read those sections, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think a scheme of crop failure insurance on a self-carrying basis is satisfactory or can be put into practical effect.

Benefits have accrued from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It has been a help to those farmers who at various times have suffered a crop failure. It is also true that this is to a large extent a bonus, in that, of the sum of $73,000,000 in benefits which have been paid since the act was first implemented, $45,000,000 was paid from the federal treasury and approximately $28,000,000 collected from the one per cent levy.

The criticisms of the act have been pretty well covered by other speakers this afternoon. One of the most important is the criticism that the amount paid is too low. In 1939 the value of crops was low compared with their value today, but still the benefits under the act remain approximately the same, and the deductions remain the same. During that period costs of farming have increased tremendously, so that the financial difficulties of surviving a depression or a crop failure have materially increased. The likelihood now is that smaller contributions will be made from the federal treasury because of the increased price of grain. I suggest that the same ratio as between deductions and the price of grain should remain. If that were done, certainly the benefits would be increased twofold or perhaps more.

It has been well pointed out that payment on the present basis of a township or on the basis of a quarter township contiguous to an eligible township results in grave injustice and real hardship. Many farmers find, when they have a crop failure through no fault of their own, that merely because they are not in the quarter township block which is placed under the bonus they have to suffer in comparison with a neighbouring farmer, even though their yield may be as low as his or even lower. The government should attempt payments on the basis of the individual farm. No doubt there would be administrative difficulties in doing that, but that should not prevent the government from going ahead and trying out the scheme on an individual basis to see whether it is practicable or not. Certainly the one-quarter township basis and the township basis as provided in the act fall short of being adequate to meet the situation.

Many of the regulations cause the farmers a good deal of hardship. If the regulations I have are up to date—I do not say they are, but if they are not the minister will correct me—a farmer to be deemed a farmer under the act must be an owner or tenant of a farm from May 1 to November 1 in any one year. If he resides on his farm and finds in July that he has a crop failure and leaves the farm to take employment elsewhere he has great difficulty in obtaining the bonus.

Another regulation provides that the farmer must live on the farm and have farming as his primary occupation, or that he must live not more than twenty miles away from the farm and have no other occupation than farming. I do not see why that twenty-mile limit is in there at all.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps the hon. member was not in when I told the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that this regulation is being changed.

Mr. ARGUE: In what way?

Mr. GARDINER: To remove the twenty-mile limit and some other objectionable features.

Mr. ARGUE: There will be no limit then?

Mr. GARDINER: The limit is the area. It must be persons who live in what is known as the area; that is, the three western provinces. If a person lives in the United States or anywhere outside the area he does not draw the bonus.

Mr. ARGUE: I would not ask that a man be allowed to live in the United States and draw the bonus. If a farmer lives in a town and is a permanent resident in the town and takes on another occupation than farming during his spare time he is ineligible for the bonus. Many cases have been brought to my attention of men with large families, who, owning one or two quarters of land, moved to town in order to have their children educated and have the convenience of medical attention, and who, because their farm was a small unit, accepted another occupation at various periods of the year, and as a result of thus trying to make an adequate living were discriminated against and declared ineligible for the crop failure bonus. I believe that an enterprising individual who has his own farm and equipment and who in his spare time accepts some other useful work in town should not be barred from receiving payment.

Another suggestion made by members of this group is that payments be arranged on a zone basis. If that were done it would remove the complaint of farmers in the province of Manitoba that they are not receiving sufficient benefits under the act. There are broad soil zones through the prairie provinces where farming conditions are relatively similar; I think the soil zones could form a basis under the act for collections and payments that would be fair to all.

I would go a step farther and advocate that the benefits of the act be extended to other parts of Canada, especially to specialized crop sections, such as the tobacco and fruit-growing areas of Ontario and the fruit-growing areas of the maritimes and British Columbia, so that the producers in these areas would receive some benefit when they experienced crop failure.

In addition, the benefits should be increased especially in view of the high costs of production. In view of those costs, a maximum payment of $6 an acre on the present acreage basis would not be too high. I do not think the farmers themselves would object if it were necessary to increase the present deductions.

The government should also take steps to have payments made on an individual basis or something approaching that. Because I think these changes should be made, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny):

That Bill No. 204 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to extending the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to other specialized crop areas, also that the benefits under the act should be increased, and that steps should be taken toward the making of awards on an individual farm basis.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that kind of motion is provided for in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms; that it is not an effort to kill the bill, but that it is merely a resolution stating that in the opinion of this house certain things should be done. We also in this group support the changes which are being made in the act at this time.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first of all, that when this act was brought into being in 1939 it was certainly legislation of the right kind. It has been amended on several occasions, I think in 1940, 1941, 1942 and in 1947. I remember the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) and myself asking for the amendments that are now being provided for to take care of blocks in various parts of the country. I also think the matter of providing assistance might be extended farther than it is. A quarter township might be provided for that was not necessarily contiguous to another township in the area. That might make some difference.

While I like the idea of individual assurance, I will admit that it will be difficult to administer. I have not seen my way through it to that extent yet, and I think we can go a step farther and take the quarter township if it happens to be near an area which has been declared a crop failure year.

As to the question raised by my good friend, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), I do not believe that the great majority of the people in Manitoba really want to be taken out of this Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I agree with the figures which he has presented. I was very proud this afternoon of my colleague, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, who represents one of the surest and best crop producing areas in the prairie provinces. These people are not likely to have a crop failure in the particular riding that he has the honour to represent.

This is a very cheap form of crop insurance, and these people are assured of something. We do not know what the elements of nature might bestow upon our farmers in any one year, and it does mean something to these people to tide them over. I am sure the great majority of people in Manitoba do not begrudge the one per cent deduction toward that end. I want to go a step farther along these lines and say that our problems in the three prairie provinces are so much alike that we should attempt to assist one another. We have been having a debate in this House of Commons which certainly has affected the people of the prairie provinces and of the maritime provinces to a greater degree than any other part of Canada. If we do not begin to assist one another in some of these difficult problems our undertakings will become more difficult than ever. On that basis alone I think we should be prepared to stay under this scheme and have our deductions made to assist one another in the difficulties that the three prairie provinces have so much in common, despite the fact that year after year most of the difficulties have arisen in Saskatchewan and, to a lesser degree, in Alberta and, at times, in a part of Manitoba. Therefore I would hope that nobody will press the case too far here or on our provincial government until something else is put forward to take the place of the operation of this act.

What I do want to discuss in all seriousness are the regulations. I know that this afternoon the minister said they were being amended. But I do not like the regulations being amended by order in council. Apart from my dislike, I wish to say that most of the difficulties we have had in explaining the operation of the act to the people and all the other questions that people who need assistance ask their members have to do with the regulations. The regulations were amended a year ago, and I have been asked many questions by people during the past year. Even as late as Easter when I was home I was asked questions about the regulations and I was not able to give them much information, despite the fact that I had studied this legislation closely.

The regulations are now being amended. I make a plea to the minister that when we go into committee of the whole on this bill we be given the privilege of passing on these regulations rather than having it done by order in council. If that cannot be done I ask him to bring us up to date on the regulations and let us know as nearly as possible in detail what they are. The whole thing should be placed in detail before the committee of the whole when we are at the proper stage of this legislation.

I do not wish to take up any more time now; I shall have questions to ask when we are in committee, and I sincerely hope that the minister will agree with the suggestions I have made so that we may work in greater co-operation with the people who come under this assistance measure.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): As the seconder of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue), I should like to say it is significant that, while the bill which is now before the house is to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, in certain particulars very little of what has been said this afternoon has referred directly to the amendments proposed by this bill. This is not because hon. members do not approve these amendments. Personally I think these amendments were called for and are very much in order, but the fact that the discussion has been on a different phase of the original act itself is indicative of the need for further amendments which are not included in the present bill.

Last summer we had the advantage of having a visit in the town of Dauphin from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a few weeks after we had a rather disastrous flood in that area. The minister will recall that at that time local officials of the municipalities concerned took advantage of his visit to address a public meeting and invited him to meet the municipal officials in order that they might place their representations before him. He will also recall that in making these representations they were unanimous in the plea that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be so amended as to make it possible for farmers to qualify for prairie farm assistance where they cannot do so under the present township plan.

I am not going to repeat the arguments I used in this house two years ago or last year in proposing certain changes in the act so as to make it more applicable in case of crop loss or damage from hail or flood. What other speakers have said today ought to be enough to persuade the Minister of Agriculture that a substantial change is required in that respect. But I do wish to impress on him the fact that the experience we have had in the part of Manitoba from which I come, shows that the farmers for many years paid their share of the prairie farm assistance fund, paid it cheerfully and without any grumbling, then were faced one year with a disastrous flood and, because of the regulations and the provisions of the act as it now stands, found that a great number of them were not able to qualify in spite of the fact that their crops were completely washed out by the flood. One can understand that there will be a great deal of resentment and disappointment among those farmers. The figures which have been quoted today show that the farmers of Manitoba have contributed to the fund about two and a half times what they have taken out, which I think is a further argument in favour of certain changes being made in respect of the province of Manitoba.

While I am on that subject I want to make it clear, as I did two years ago, that while I respect the views of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), I do not agree with his contention that Manitoba should seek to secede from this plan. Last year around Dauphin we had disaster strike a large area; and anyone coming from such a district will realize that but for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act these people would not be able to obtain assistance of any kind. It is perhaps interesting to note that, while the hon. member for Provencher made reference to the fact that a year or two ago the provincial minister of agriculture of Manitoba said that in his opinion Manitoba's contribution to the fund should be laid aside in order to build up a fund for a provincial crop insurance scheme, only a few days ago the premier of that province said that in his opinion what is required is an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make it more applicable to cases such as I have described.

That statement was made to a delegation consisting of several persons from around Dauphin who interviewed the Premier of Manitoba in an endeavour to obtain assistance from his government for those farmers who could not qualify under the present provisions of this legislation. It was estimated that approximately $10,000 would be required to cover those farmers who could not qualify under this act. That is not a huge amount when compared with the over-all picture; but even then this is what the premier had to say, according to the report appearing in the Dauphin Herald of April 15:

> The premier pointed out that the obvious step to take was to have the P.F.A. Act amended so it would apply to units smaller than townships which have suffered flood damages.

And further:

> If the province, he added, were to underwrite the mistakes made by the dominion government by providing assistance to farmers, the act would never be amended. He suggested that a delegation of the reeves of the municipalities concerned make a trip to Ottawa to ask that the act be amended to meet the needs of flooded Manitoba farmers.

Then the report goes on:

> Mr. Garson said he would be in Ottawa for the next few weeks and would be glad "to lend weight and prestige of the government to the amendments asked by the delegation."

It is now April 23, and if this report is correct I would assume that the premier has been in Ottawa for some time. At least I understand that he is to be here tomorrow; and if he has carried out his pledge to this delegation he must have been lending his prestige and support to the necessary amendments in order that the act may apply to units smaller than the township or nine-section block provided for in section 7(b).

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to state the position?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: The present position is that some time ago I wrote the provinces and the municipal associations, particularly, suggesting what was said here last year, namely, that we thought the provinces ought to take some of these smaller areas around the fringe of the areas taken care of by the federal government. As a result of those communications, I had a letter within the last three days —I am not sure of the exact day—from the secretary of the Saskatchewan municipal association, written on behalf of the municipal associations of the three provinces, suggesting that I call a meeting of representatives of the three provinces and the municipal associations to discuss such questions as those just referred to. As yet I have not had time to answer that letter, but it is on my desk now. It did not come from any of the premiers; it came from the secretary of the municipal associations.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am glad to have that information, because it throws a great deal of light on the situation. I do hope the minister soon will find time to call such a meeting for an early day, in order to work out the details of the suggestions that have been made both today and previously. I am tempted, of course, to ask whether the Premier of Manitoba is in Ottawa and whether he is making certain suggestions, but I realize that is not the kind of question the minister would be in a position to answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not seen him.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: While I am on the subject may I say that if the attitude of the Premier of Manitoba is correctly reported in the newspaper article from which I have quoted—and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of that statement—then it is quite clear that the government of Manitoba has no crop insurance plan in mind and is not taking any steps whatever to build up a fund or work out a plan for crop insurance on a provincial basis.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is any other province doing that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not know. I am making that statement, only because the hon. member for Provencher said that in his opinion Manitoba should withdraw from the act. I am pointing out that until such time as Manitoba, or for that matter any other province that wishes to take a similar step, has a crop insurance plan worked out and a fund built up, it would not be wise to withdraw from this legislation. That is not something to be done overnight. It will take some years to build up a fund if it is to be actuarially sound, in order to provide provincial crop insurance. Until that is done, I consider it futile to suggest that Manitoba should withdraw from this act, though I freely admit that the farmers of that province have not been receiving as good a deal under this legislation as would be the case if the unit were smaller than the township basis now provided. While we in this house from Manitoba will continue to press for certain amendments, to which the minister intimated a few moments ago he would give sympathetic consideration, in order that the farmers of our province may have a fairer basis for compensation, at the same time I want to make it clear that, as far as I am concerned, I agree with others who have spoken in this debate, that it would not be in the interests of the farmers of our province to seek to withdraw from this act, because we do not know what may happen within the next one, two or ten years.

I also want to endorse what was said by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller). I think he expressed a fine sentiment when he said that if the farmers of this country, or those engaged in any other occupation, want to work out a system of collective security for themselves with the assistance of the government they must be prepared to co-operate to the point where they cannot expect to get back immediately every cent they put into a fund of this kind.

I also agree that no farmer in any province would rather collect compensation under this act than have a crop, because the scale of compensation under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is small change compared with what a farmer gets if he has a half decent crop. The maximum is $500, and in most cases a farmer will get much less. When farming is done on any sizeable scale at all, a couple of hundred dollars is small change these days.

I want to impress on the minister and the house—because after all, this parliament will have to make that decision at some time—that if the principle expressed in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wood Mountain were worked out in legislation, I think it would cover most, if not all, of the objections which have been expressed to the present provisions of the act. I realize that because of the structure of the rules of this house, it is not possible for private members to move amendments to the act itself, or with regard to the present bill to move amendments which will involve the expenditure of public money. That can be done only through government action. That is why we want to express our point of view in a concrete way in the form of an amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill. If the government so desires, they may take the bill back, put in the particular amendments which hon. members from both sides of the house have been seeking today. Then, when they bring the bill back to the house, if those amendments we are seeking are in it I am sure they will receive general support in this house. I will leave it at that—

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, if the government disagreed and then the amendment carried, the bill is defeated.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If the government disagreed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You lose everything.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I did not get the implication. If the government does not agree to the amendment, what did the minister say followed?

Mr. GARDINER: If the government did not agree to the amendment on second reading of the bill and, if that amendment were carried, then, of course, the bill itself is defeated.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh no; not at all.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be on an amendment of this kind.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I pointed out a moment ago that if the government desires to make amendments of the kind suggested in this amendment to the second reading of the bill, of course all they need to do is to facilitate the passing of the amendment, take the bill back, put the proper amendments into the bill and bring it back to the house. Then there would be no difficulty.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member had better read the amendment carefully.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: On the other hand, if the government is opposed to the amendment in the first place, we know it will not carry in this house. We have had an experience of this type in the past. In fact we have discovered that a motion could even be passed in this house and then, if the government did not like it, they could reverse it in the space of a few minutes.

Mr. GARDINER: If this motion were carried contrary to the wishes of the government, it would in itself be a defeat of the bill. It could be a defeat of the government and of the bill.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Not at all.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister is accustomed to that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We are presenting to the government in a concrete form what I suggest is a summary of the suggestions which have been made by various members on both sides of the house today, in the form of an amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill. There is no reason why the government should be opposed to the amendment in the first place. But if they are, of course the amendment will not pass the house, and the bill will still be before the house. As I said, we approve those amendments which are in the bill; but we are seeking to bring in amendments which are not in the bill and which, even according to the Premier of Manitoba, should certainly be brought before the house at an early day.

As a matter of fact, the Premier of Manitoba is reported to be of opinion that the amendment which would put the qualification basis on a smaller area than the township could be put through this house and made retroactive so as to apply to the crop failures of 1947. If I read the bill correctly, I understand that those amendments before us, according to section 5, are to be made retroactive to the first day of August, 1947. If that can be done with respect to those amendments, of course it can be done also with respect to the more important and more significant amendment which we have been suggesting. In all fairness to the members of the house on both sides, who have been discussing this matter quite dispassionately and in a reasonable way, I think the government could accept the suggestions we have made and incorporate in this bill the type of amendment which is required.

Mr. GARDINER: It is absolutely contrary to the general principle of the bill.

Mrs. STRUM: Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: May I just comment on that last interjection by the minister, Mr. Speaker? He says it is contrary to the principle of the bill. It cannot be, because the principle of the bill is to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; and that is what we are seeking to do.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it may render the act ultra vires, if applied in amendment, in addition to that; and there are several other reasons.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is a brand new argument which I will not go into at this time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Friday, April 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Rinfret for the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, although this debate has been under way for some considerable time, a matter of such great importance should in my opinion have the careful attention of members in all sections of the house. I might remind the house that it was just about twenty years ago that representations were made to parliament to increase the capital from $75,000,000 to $150 million, an increase of 100 per cent, which, in the terms of the amendment before the house, would seem to be a reasonable amount.

I am sure those who were sponsoring the legislation at that time were of the opinion that no greater increase could be warranted. Now, however, we are being asked to increase the capital from $150 million to $500 million, or an increase of 233 per cent, or about five times the increase granted in 1928.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I have no personal fault to find with the Bell Telephone Company. The service they have given me and my family while we have used it has always been of a very high order. Some of my friends have been employed by the company over a period of years, and I have never heard any criticism of their labour relations or the working conditions.

But, Mr. Speaker, this corporation is now in the monopoly category, and before parliament is asked to put its stamp of approval upon the type of legislation before us we should inquire whether the public interest is being served by this type of legislation.

When the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) was sponsoring the legislation he drew our attention to some information contained in the Canada Year Book for 1947 in connection with the telephone systems of Canada. He mentioned that there were 3,151 telephone systems in 1945. It is interesting to note that, although we have 3,151 systems, one of them has over 60 per cent of the total investment in Canada, whereas the remaining 3,150 have less than 40 per cent.

When reading, the hon. member left out one significant sentence in the paragraph. I am sure no offence was intended but, to keep the record complete, I think I should place it on Hansard. That sentence is as follows:

> Of the 2,368 co-operative telephone companies no fewer than 1,121 were in Saskatchewan alone, 785 in Alberta and 212 in Nova Scotia.

Hon. members might find it of interest to have the complete story of the efforts which have been made by people in various parts of Canada to provide telephone service for themselves in areas where the Bell Telephone Company was not interested in making expenditures.

For instance, in 1946 in Prince Edward Island there were 35 co-operative companies; in Nova Scotia, 214; New Brunswick, 9; Quebec, 78; Ontario, 116; Manitoba, 5; Saskatchewan, 1,106; Alberta, 788, and British Columbia 3. This makes a total of 2,354 co-operative organizations which were in the telephone business in 1946.

But the facts are that the Bell Telephone Company is a near monopoly; it controls a very large investment in Canada.

In the Financial Post survey of corporate securities for 1946, I find some information which conflicts with that which was given by the hon. member for Outremont in piloting the bill. The survey of corporate securities states that 21·7 per cent of the outstanding stock of the Bell Telephone Company is held by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Mr. RINFRET: I was questioned about one company.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think the hon. member or some others who are anxious to have this legislation passed and who have not yet spoken should take part in the debate and clarify this matter. According to the information given by the hon. member, only 14·8 per cent was held by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Mr. RINFRET: That is correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is one of the first times anyone has questioned publicly the accuracy of the survey of corporate securities. In view of the fact that it is some little time since the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) first drew this matter to the attention of the house, I think the publishers of this publication would have made some correction, if they had given this information incorrectly.

I have mentioned that many of the directors of the Bell Telephone Company are interested in many other large corporations in Canada. There is no law against that; but I might mention, for example, that Mr. Sise, the chairman of the board, is also a director of the Bank of Montreal. The Hon. Charles A. Dunning, whose name was mentioned in connection with the Canadian Pacific claim for increased freight rates is also a director of the Bell, a director of the Bank of Montreal and a great many other organizations the names of which I shall not take time to mention. Mr. Angus, one of the Bell directors, is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada; and so on, down the list.

There is no law against that, but I think members of the house should be cognizant of the fact that we are being asked to give special privileges to a near monopoly which apparently is in a field where we should have public ownership. I notice that in 1928 the same objections were made as are being made during this debate. It is unfortunate that in the passing of twenty years so few of those who took part in an important debate are spared to carry on, but it is interesting to note that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) were here in 1928. They expressed their views effectively at that time as well as on this occasion. I was interested in reading the comments made by the then member for Mackenzie, Mr. Milton Campbell. On page 3089 of Hansard of May 16, 1928 we find a record of his speech. He quoted from a brief which had been presented on behalf of the province of Ontario as follows:

> What a public scandal this is, to have the same directors sitting on the board of the Bell Telephone Company and also on the board of the Northern Electric Company, buying from and selling to themselves, with the assistance of Western Electric Company directors, and fixing the prices among themselves that the poor milch cow, the Bell Telephone Company, shall pay for such apparatus, equipment and supplies. Is it any wonder the treasury of the Bell is depleted systematically when any money appears, and the contents pipe-lined over to the treasury of the Northern Electric and ultimately into the treasury of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. As a glaring instance of this, let me illustrate by citing the annual dividend payment of eight per cent and two per cent bonus, or about ten per cent paid by the Northern to the Bell, on the latter's share holdings in the former, amounting to $3,000,000. The dividend payment would be about $300,000. This amount is no sooner paid to the Bell than it is sluiced across the international boundary line and into the treasury of the American company as a payment under the 1923 service contract.

Mr. Campbell also complained about the fact that the telephone companies in the prairie provinces were obliged to buy the major part of their equipment from Northern Electric at prices fixed by a company controlled by Bell. According to the Financial Post "Survey of corporate securities", the Bell Telephone has the following subsidiaries:

Kamouraska Telephone Company
Ingersoll Telephone Company
North America Telegraph Company
The Southern Ontario Telephone Company Limited
Woodbridge and Vaughan Telephone Company Limited
Canadian Telephone Company
Chapleau Telephone System
Charlevoix and Saguenay Telephone Company
Welland County Telephone Company
Labelle Telephone Company
Yamaska Telephone Company
New Brunswick Telephone Company

It is unfortunate that this whole matter could not be referred to a committee so that we could hear the officers of the Bell Telephone Company and give them a chance to justify the set-up and give their explanations for what has been done. It is significant that no hon. members on the government side have been taking part in the debate and giving us the information to which I think we are entitled.

During his remarks the hon. member for Outremont referred to the future plans of the company affecting rural service. He is reported on page 1701 of Hansard of February 27, 1948, as saying:

> The estimated increase in telephones in rural areas in the next four years depends on the company's ability to obtain material and equipment. It is expected, however, that 38,400 additional telephones will be installed and an amount of $25,600,000 spent.

It always interests me that whenever somebody wants to get something done they figure that if they shed some crocodile tears for the poor farmer in any part of Canada they will get full co-operation. I presume it was thought that if some mention were made of plans for rural service it would expedite the passage of this bill to provide an increase in capital from $150 million to $500 million. The hon. member went on to say:

> At the end of 1951 it is estimated that between 65 and 70 per cent will have service in the rural areas. These figures will be very close to the development in urban areas.

I made a study of telephone service in rural areas in Canada; and I wish to draw the attention of the house to the dominion bureau of statistics housing census of Canada for 1941, dealing with automobiles, radios, telephones and vacuum cleaners in Canada. I should like to give the house the percentages of the population having telephone service in the different provinces, broken up into total; farm; rural not farm, meaning those living in small villages, neither on a farm nor in a city; and urban. The percentages are as follows:

	Total	Farm	Rural (not farm)	Urban
Canada	40	29	28	50
Prince Edward Island	22	17	16	36
Nova Scotia	33	26	17	47
New Brunswick ..	27	16	18	46
Quebec	33	16	16	41
Ontario	52	51	39	57
Manitoba	33	24	22	45
Saskatchewan ...	32	32	26	34
Alberta	28	18	13	44
British Columbia	48	19	31	66

Members will note that, as far as rural telephone service is concerned, Ontario places first, Saskatchewan second, Nova Scotia third, Manitoba fourth, British Columbia fifth, Alberta sixth, Prince Edward Island seventh, with New Brunswick and Quebec being tied with 16 per cent. I do not know how the hon. member for Outremont can expect members of parliament to accept the claim that by 1951 it is estimated that 65 to 70 per cent of those in rural areas will have service, when in the period from 1880, when Bell first started to function in Canada, to 1941 the best that could be accomplished was 29 per cent. In the areas which the Bell is serving in Quebec and New Brunswick the farm percentage is 16 per cent. I am sure it will be difficult to increase that ratio by 1951 from 16 or 17 per cent to 65 or 70 per cent as the hon. member for Outremont has mentioned. It is very important that people in the rural areas should have telephone service in case of sickness, when life and death may hang in the balance.

We cannot allow a bill of this kind to pass without drawing attention to the fact that the Bell Telephone Company has been chiefly concerned in going into the larger cities where the greatest amount of revenue can be got most easily. In the province where it has its head office it gives a very good service in the big cities; but, according to the 1941 statistics, in rural Quebec only sixteen farm families out of one hundred have a telephone service. The people in the rural parishes in the province of Quebec and those who work on farms in outlying areas should have this modern convenience which is regarded as almost a necessity by most people, and so I think the sponsor of the bill should have some comment to make on the plans of the company to improve its service particularly in the rural districts of Quebec and New Brunswick. In Ontario the ratio is much better, but there I understand that the Bell Telephone Company cannot claim the credit for promoting the construction of rural telephone lines.

Another passage in the speech made by the sponsor of the bill deserves careful examination. At page 1704 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> Section 5 of the bill, which deals with wireless and radiotelephone services, is intended to clarify the company's powers under its original act of incorporation with regard to the use of the latest improvements in the art of telephony, including radio and wireless telephone and television, in providing the communication service which it furnishes. Wireless and radiotelephone is a comparatively new development in the art of communication and lies in the field in which the company operates. It is important not only to the company but to the public service which the company provides that there should be no question as to its powers to furnish service by this means.

I cannot find anywhere authorities who take it for granted that this is a field which has been assigned to the Bell Telephone Company. With the developments that are taking place in wireless and radiotelephone services, it seems to me that section 5 of the bill should not be accepted in principle. If this bill had been presented to parliament without this particular section we should not have had as interesting a debate as we have had. Those of us who are concerned about public ownership cannot accede to the handing over to a privately owned company of the monopoly to operate wireless and radiotelephone services.

Further on, he said:

> Wireless telephone or radio is assuming increasing importance in the economical development of the telephone system. Developments in recent years have progressed rapidly and there is every likelihood that wireless telephone or radio systems capable of handling large numbers of communication channels over long distances may in many cases prove to be an economical alternative to the use of wire lines. Since the economical development of the company's system involves the use of such new developments as become available, it is planned to use wireless telephone and radio systems as an alternative to wire lines.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Outremont will not ask parliament to approve the principle of a bill containing such objectionable provisions.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I must not overlook to pay a tribute to my close neighbour the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who made such an outstanding contribution in the earlier stages of this debate, also the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who was able to speak as eloquently in this debate as he did twenty years ago. I am glad to be associated with these two outstanding Canadian citizens in a struggle to keep for the people the right to have public ownership in the field of communication. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the bill should not pass in its present form.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house for only a few moments, and the effort which I shall make is an appeal to the C.C.F. to stop this filibuster. I shall be reasonable in the moderate language I use and shall make no wisecracks or smart replies. I am anxious that this house, particularly these hon. gentlemen to my left, should see just where we are going in the attitude which they have taken.

Since confederation incorporations of this kind have been made by the dominion parliament, but if the C.C.F. persist in the line which they have now taken, that power of this parliament is taken away from it completely. It will mean that a small group of people, with the limited time which we now have owing to major matters of importance which have to be discussed here, can gather themselves together and destroy a power which rests in this parliament. That is exactly what we are witnessing at the present time.

May I absolve myself immediately from any connection with the Bell Telephone Company. We do not have it where I live, and I have no acquaintance whatsoever with any officer of that company. It is spread wide in this area of Canada. A lot of figures were given just now. I speak only of the province of Alberta, but I think it is also true of the province of Saskatchewan. Alberta had a rural telephone system but it was a complete failure through lack of support. Therefore we have today in that province the farmers grouping together and forming their own organizations, maintaining their lines and so on, in order that they may have telephone service. In other words, the government of that province could not support rural telephones. Although I do not make it as an accurate statement, I think it is true of Saskatchewan also.

Two things seem to be at issue; one, the increase in capital. I have no hesitation in saying that at the moment, without knowing more than has been given to us here, it seems to me too large an increase. That is said without any complete examination of the facts. But on the run-of-mine reasons, if I may say so, that influence our minds it strikes me as a tremendous increase.

The other thing they say is that the Bell Telephone Company should have the authority in brother fields or fields of the same type of communication. I do not agree with them in that. Any company which is dealing with communications must have an eye to the future. I wonder, sir, how many hon. members in this house have read the address recently given by Mr. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia broadcasting system, whose acquaintance over a very good lunch I had an opportunity of making; and that is my only connection with him. He paid for it and we had a very good lunch. He visualized within the next twenty-five years, and with authority, that you would have a vest-pocket radio not larger than your watch, and you would also have a sending set not larger than your watch, with which you could communicate with your wife and tell her that you would be late for dinner, or whatever message you cared to send.

He also said that it is well within reason—these are not imaginings; they have gone a long way—that when you telephoned somebody you would see the person at the other end to whom you were talking. That will stop a lot of fellows calling up somebody and saying you are talking to your wife, because it may be the maid to whom you are talking or somebody else in your house. Then it is well within reason that within ten years when you get up in the morning and go to your radio you will have a newspaper in that radio in colour, folded and so on and you will have the news at your breakfast when you sit down to eat your morning meal. What company like the Bell Telephone Company should not anticipate things of that kind which are anticipated in radio and which are certainly well within reason within twenty-five years?

To hear some of my friends speak, one would think Alexander Bell was an enemy of society instead of being one of the greatest men that this world, and particularly this Canada, ever gave birth to.

Here is my point, and here is my appeal. Why not let this bill go to a committee? Cut down the capitalization if it is too high; eliminate some of the powers which are sought if they do not justly belong to this company. But let it be stopped now and never said of this parliament that a small group by a filibuster can thwart laws which we all have thought sound since 1867. Go to that committee and amend the bill in any way you wish. You can cut down the powers; you can cut down the capitalization. There you will have before you men who must justify what they are asking for.

It does not seem to me to be within the mouth of anyone to say that the sponsor of a bill of this kind should supply the House of Commons with complete explanations, authorities and plans for future operations and construction. None of us would ever sponsor a bill in this house, unless it were something with which we had grown up, some business with which we were entirely familiar if that were so. I doubt very much even whether hon. members who sponsor bills with respect to divorce would be able to rise in their places and do what they do here with respect to such bills. Therefore I make this submission in all sincerity. I think I cannot be accused of rudeness or unkindness of any sort, but I do say: let this go to a committee; let us examine the people who want this, the officers of the company. We can send for them. If the $500 million is out of line—at the moment I think it is—we shall make them justify it.

What is at the bottom of this? In opening on this matter the leader of the C.C.F. party said that this company may grow to a size where it would be difficult for a government to take it over and operate it. I am paraphrasing, but that is exactly what he said. Is that a reason? Because a political group say that,—I have told them again and again that I respect their views, and I do—is that a reason why obstruction—because that is what it is—should be carried on in this House of Commons to make us who are supposed to be powerful in legislation the laughing stock of any man of business; and by that I mean anybody who earns his living or operates a business or anything of that kind?

Let me close with this. I will go with them on a committee to bring everybody before it whom they want. I do not think I am on the committee, but probably I have a friendly fellow member who is, and we shall be able to bring anybody here whom they want. But for us now to be compelled to withhold judgment because a group, for purposes best known to themselves, delay this matter and talk it out, so to speak—I think the words "talk it out" are to the utter disgrace of this whole House of Commons—something should be done so that these things cannot be talked out. I am thinking of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). If this sort of thing is allowed to continue what does it mean? It means that the smallest group, two men within an hour, can ruin what the rest of us want. Therefore I appeal directly to my hon. friends and say to them: let us have the committee; let us get the evidence. If you want to alter it, alter it in committee; if you want to defeat it, defeat it on third reading, but let us have an end to this one-ring circus which is operating in this house at this time.

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont): When this bill was called the first time for second reading I made as full and complete a statement to the house as I could. I took every minute at my disposal in the forty minutes that I had. I might say right away to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) that the reason a private member is presenting this bill is simply that a minister cannot present a private bill. The reason I had prepared a statement at that time was to crowd in as much as I possibly could in as few words as I possibly could use. Because I spoke for forty minutes, I was congratulated by some hon. members on the other side on helping them to talk out the bill.

If one reads the introductory statement that I made he will recognize that practically every obstacle and every objection that have been made to the bill have been answered. This is a private company, first of all, and there cannot be any question of public ownership at this time. It is a private company, duly incorporated; and surely the principle of this bill is not whether or not this company can be publicly owned.

I gave a long history of the company to show that this was not a monopoly of the octopus type that my hon. friends on the other side wish it to appear. In the beginning the company had authority to cover the whole of Canada except British Columbia. In January, 1908, they relinquished the territory now comprising Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. Later they relinquished the territory taking in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In Quebec and Ontario they have retained a certain amount of the territory, though not all. They are not a "grab-all" concern. They are a competitive monopoly carrying on business in Quebec and Ontario with 893 other companies, 578 in Ontario and 315 in Quebec. There are also thirty-three other non-connecting companies or systems.

If my hon. friends wish to call this company a monopoly in the sense used the other day by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster), when he said he could not dream of two telephone systems operating in the same area; if that is what they mean by a monopoly, I am with them and this company is a monopoly. Within its territory there is only one telephone system. But it is a monopoly that is fully and completely controlled by the board of transport commissioners. Its rates have been subject to regulation since 1892. It has been subject to all pertinent provisions of the Railway Act and the regulatory jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners since 1906. The issue of capital stock has been subject to the jurisdiction of the board since 1929, or for the past nineteen years. No other private company in Canada is so well controlled by the board of transport commissioners.

Objection has been taken to the increase in capital. I submit that this is not a principle of this bill and should not have been discussed on second reading. In my statement I gave the financial position of the company at the present time. I gave details as to the intended construction and gave the estimate of the company at that time, amounting to over $700 million. I did not separate the amounts in the various years. They are as follows:

1950	71,000,000
1952	70,000,000

For the following five years an expenditure of $68,000,000 a year is anticipated. A moment ago the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) said we were trying to make stock by appealing to the rural areas. I did not say the whole of the province of Quebec was controlled by the Bell system, but only part of it. And I said in my introductory remarks that within the Bell system area in 1945 some 39 per cent of the establishments had service. In 1947 this figure had reached 55 per cent, and it is estimated that by 1951 between 65 and 70 per cent will have service. That is within the area served by the Bell system, not the other companies. That was my statement and I repeat it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does that mean that percentage of the people have telephones in that area?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes, in the area served by the Bell system.

In my introduction I also said I realized the increase was substantial, but that the program contemplated is also substantial. In my final remarks I said hon. members would have full opportunity in committee to examine the various questions involved.

During this discussion three suggestions have been made by hon. members who have let their imagination run wild. One was that this amount of money was to be used to purchase the provincial systems. My answer to that is an emphatic no. Another hon. member thought we might use this money to build a line through the United States to by-pass the western provinces in order to deprive them of large revenues. My answer to that is that there is no such intention. At the present time there is a line operated by the Trans-Canada telephone system, which is some sort of co-operative system in which all telephone systems including the provincial systems share both as to revenue and as to cost of operation, and which serves as a sort of clearing house for the purpose. So there is no such intention.

Another hon. member suggested this additional capital might be used to purchase, through War Assets, a complete communication system developed during the war by the army, navy and air force. There again my answer is that there is no such intention. The new capital will be used as I have indicated, to extend the company's plant and facilities in Ontario and Quebec, and there is no intention on the part of the Bell company to invade the territory of any other system in those provinces.

Another matter brought up was the splitting of shares, and again I suggest that is not the principle of the bill. I might say to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) that never before has the Bell company split its shares. This was imposed in the other place. It does not mean any change in the situation for the shareholders, except that out of the grand total they will have four times as many shares. The ratio will remain constant.

As far as revenue is concerned, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) spoke of ten per cent which might be reduced to two and one-half per cent. That is impossible. The percentage will remain the same; it will be eight per cent, but it will be eight per cent on $25 instead of eight per cent on $100. Since the shares are now selling at $165, however, the percentage of dividends at present is 4·65.

Someone brought up the question of radio and television. Again that is not the principle of the bill, but of only one section. The company has no intention of going into the business of broadcasting radio or television programs. It will continue, as it is doing at present, to link various programs initiated by others. It has the power, which it asks to have confirmed, to operate in the radio-telephone field. This it does under proper licence obtained from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which permits it to operate mobile telephones and the like, in order to bring service to outlying districts and in order to have it as stand-by equipment in case of storm damage, and so on.

I dealt with all these matters in my introductory remarks. At that time I did not deal with rates, because I did not consider that matter came in on second reading. The principle of the rates is quite a complicated matter, which might be fully dealt with in committee.

One thing I should like to explain is the question of free connection. If every hon. member would take a pencil and piece of paper and put two dots on the paper representing two telephones, in order to connect those telephones they will require one pair of lines. If they add one more dot, representing a third telephone, they will have to add two more lines, so that there the ratio will be one to one as against one to two as it was before. If they add another telephone, they will have to add three lines, making six lines for four telephones. If they go on to five telephones they will require ten lines, or a ratio of two to one. If they continue on to ten telephones and interconnect them they will have forty-five lines connecting the ten telephones, or a ratio of 4·5 to 1. If they go on to 10,000, which is the limit for a central office, they will require 49,995,000 lines to connect them, or a ratio of 4,999·5 to 1. That is why it is more expensive to instal telephones in large cities.

The Bell company has been said by hon. members everywhere to be a well managed and efficient company. We are told that they have a fine group of directors, who are jealous of the reputation the company has built up for service and efficiency. They wish to keep that wonderful reputation. They wish to maintain good relations with their employees, so that those employees will be able to say, as the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) said, that this is one of the best of private companies for which an individual could wish to work.

They want to keep that reputation among their clients, and at the present time they are concerned because they cannot provide a better service than they are doing. They are concerned because there are 95,749 unsatisfied applications for service. That is an increase of 1,700 over the figure I quoted last time. There are some 69,000 reported cases of people having a party line who would like to have a single line. There are some thousands of people like myself in the country who would like to have single lines but who cannot obtain them.

In 1902, by chapter 41 of the statutes, parliament imposed upon the company the obligation of furnishing telephones on demand. They are not in a position to do so today. They ask to be put in that position. They are operating a public service and they know it. They are trustees for the public and they know it. That is why they come before parliament and they say, "We need what we are asking in this bill in order to be able to discharge our obligations to the public. We expect to be obliged to explain why we need those powers." Are we to refuse this company the opportunity to discharge its obligations? Are we to deny to people who have not a telephone today, the use of a telephone service?

The principle of this bill—and that is the only principle which applies to the whole of this bill—is whether or not we shall authorize this company to perform its obligations toward the public. The company says it needs the provisions contained in the bill. The hon. member for High Park says that the Bell Telephone Company is all the time trying to find out what the necessities of the future will be. Then I ask hon. members to let this bill go to the committee. The committee will study it attentively. It must do so. It is its duty to do so, because it is an important bill. The committee will decide whether or not the company is entitled to obtain what it asks for.

We are on second reading of a private bill. I wish to refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, notation 769. There they will see that on second reading of a private bill the situation is different from that on second reading of a public bill. The second reading of a private bill is only a conditional approval of the principle. It is conditional upon proof before the committee of the various facts that are set out in the bill. That appears in notation 769 of Beauchesne. Therefore the objection that has been made, that if we give second reading to this bill the principle will be accepted, does not hold water. The principle is accepted only conditionally. If the company cannot prove what it advances; if the experts cannot show that they need this money, then the committee is entitled to reduce the amount or to do whatever it pleases.

Everybody knew this rule, or at least everybody is supposed to know it is there. That is the rule with regard to a private bill. What are we met by? We are met by a sugar-coated six months' hoist by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which is meaningless in the light of this notation 769. I think the purpose of the amendment was just to kill the bill. We are also met by another amendment by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough), an amendment which also is meaningless, because it would mean that we amend the Companies Act in a private bill. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to declare this second amendment absolutely out of order.

"This bill has been pretty well discussed." That is the hon. member for Selkirk speaking. The C.C.F. group has made its position clear on this bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke. If, as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) says at page 2829 of Hansard, they are not trying to talk out the bill because it would not be democratic for him or anyone else to occupy all the time on this or any other bill in order to prevent it from coming to a vote, then I say: let it go to a vote. We have already voted on the question, and the decision of the house was three against one. Let us go to the committee in order to give to this company what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked for, namely, a fair, square, honest and honourable consideration of the bill on its merits. Let us not prejudge the merits until we get to the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I hope that we in this parliament will never reach the time when a private member of this house will feel shame at rising to his feet to exercise his democratic right to speak. I want to say at the outset that, as a private member of this house sitting in the opposition, I resent another member sitting in the opposition getting up and handing us a curtain lecture about a filibuster.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is any of it untrue?

An hon. MEMBER: Not a word.

Mr. BENTLEY: Every word of it.

Mr. SKEY: It is nothing but the truth, and the hon. member does not like it. He can dish it out, but he cannot take it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The hon. member says I do not like the truth. He does not seem to realize, nor do hon. members who interrupt, that, when the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) was castigating those who were exercising the right to speak—and incidentally he spoke ten times as long as I did when I rose to speak on this matter—he was also castigating the members of his own party, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster). All those hon. gentlemen rose and spoke on this bill; and I ask them, do they like the truth or do they not?

Mr. MacNICOL: And the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes, and the hon. member for Vancouver South. Surely they do not want to attribute to other members of the opposition motives which they would not accept for themselves. I am sometimes surprised that a party—

An hon. MEMBER: I am not surprised at anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having expired, the house will revert to the business before six o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to make provision inter alia for a contributory superannuation scheme for future members of the force and present members who elect to come thereunder, and also for the granting of compensation to members suffering injury in the course of duty and pensions to widows and children of members losing life in the performance of duty.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I asked that this order be taken up now, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that it should not take any time at all to dispose of it. The resolution is self-explanatory. As members of the house probably know, the pension scheme for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is based upon an entirely different principle from that which applies to the armed services and to the civil service; and it has been thought for some time that it was desirable to apply the same principle in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as applies in the other services. This is the main and practically the sole purpose of this bill. The bill is a fairly lengthy one, and it is almost impossible to discuss it intelligently on the resolution. Therefore I hope the resolution will pass the committee and be reported back tonight, so that the bill can receive first reading. Then, if the time is opportune it can have second reading on Monday, or as soon as we can get to it. The bill can be circulated immediately, or at least tomorrow morning.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss the resolution at this time. However I should like to make one thing perfectly clear. Since this would appear to be the only amendment to be brought in this year regarding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I suggest to the minister that when second reading is proceeded with on Monday, if in discussing the principle of the bill certain suggestions are made outside its exact ambit. no objection should be taken. Anything that can be done to have this legislation expedited will, I am sure, meet with the approval of all hon. members. But I wish to make it perfectly clear that a number of members wish to make some observations regarding the general administration of the mounted police; and I trust no objection will be raised, in view of the fact that we are consenting at this time to expedite the passing of the resolution and first reading this evening.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the bill is a long one, and I shall take no exception to any suggestions made for the improvement of the mounted police.

Mr. CHURCH: I am glad that at last the government is going to do something by way of superannuation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Their duties have increased about fourfold owing to the war, and the conditions following it. I am glad to see that the scheme is a contributory one for those members who are at present on the force, if they wish to come in, and for future members.

The minister has added on some of the ordinary provisions which superannuation schemes of civilian police forces throughout the country have had in the past. We have, in connection with our Toronto police force, a contributory system under which the members of the force pay in seven per cent of the fund. But that did not provide for those constables who might be injured in the discharge of their duties, or for widows and orphans.

I am pleased to see that the proposed superannuation scheme is a contributory one; it should not be any other way. It is also pleasing to note that it makes provision for those extra emergencies as will be found in the systems of superannuation in municipal police forces of the country—injuries while on duty, and widows and orphans.

There is one other matter in this connection about which I should like to speak. As I said, the rate used to be seven per cent for the Toronto police force. Then an actuarial report was made by Mr. N. A. Mackenzie, an economist; and he found that, owing to the large number who would be superannuated, the fund would become insolvent. For that reason the city of Toronto had to make provision for the sum of $40,000 over a period of ten years to make it solvent.

It might be said that, since this involves an arrangement between employer and employees, this system might be placed under the Workmen's Compensation Act. However, that could not be done because, like some other public bodies, including public utilities, they had to qualify under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and under the heading of employers and employees. It will be recalled that that act also operates on a contributory basis, and the contributions have reached a very large sum. The more employees and employers contribute, the better for the fund and for the economic condition of that fund.

I admit that a scheme of that kind could not be applied to the mounted police. They are performing a duty which does credit to the minister and his department. Their work has been greatly intensified in the years since the war, and it must be a heavy burden upon the Department of Justice. However, the force is attracting an even better type of men, and they are all very good. Those men are doing excellent work and, so far as I can see—and I see quite a few of them—I would say that they are doing good work.

A great part of the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police today comes under the system which has been in operation since confederation, a system through which the enforcement of federal law comes under provincial attorneys general. They, in turn, turn it back to the municipalities, and the municipal police systems.

That is a condition which should not obtain. I believe the time is coming when the Minister of Justice will have to give some compensation to the municipalities which are doing a large part of this work. We know that the municipal police systems throughout the country are enforcing federal laws, and they get nothing for it. It is a direct charge on real estate.

I believe the system should be expanded so that the government could grant to the municipal police systems of the various provinces moneys for the services they render. For example, during the war the city of Toronto spent sums of money running into millions of dollars to maintain our police force and in the enforcement of justice, but the Toronto police commission does not get a dollar from any federal authority for the enforcement of federal laws. Yet they had to enforce tens of thousands of orders in council. I believe there were, all told, over 100,000 orders in council during the war. That was a burden placed upon the municipal police systems, so far as enforcement was concerned.

May I compliment the present minister upon the work he has done since taking over the department. It would appear that in this measure we shall at last have something to offer an even better class of men, many of whom are returned soldiers. They and their families will now have some better protection when they meet with banditry across the country, risking their lives in every day of the year. Some provision will be made under the new system for widows and orphans of those men.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the proposed superannuation scheme be exactly the same as that now in force in connection with wardens in the penitentiaries service?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it will not be the same. I cannot at the moment set out the various points of difference, but there are some.

Mr. BRYCE: I shall deal with them later, then.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favour of the principle of this bill. I believe I have had association with the mounted police as close, perhaps, as that of anyone here. For fourteen years I prosecuted and for sixteen years I defended. I met only one member of the mounted police among hundreds—and I mean hundreds—concerning whose integrity I ever had any doubt. I wonder if the same could be said of any other group of persons anywhere. I know the time they have put in; I know the care they take; I know the learning they must acquire—and they must learn it pretty much by themselves.

It has been said thousands of times—and it cannot be said too often—that for the finest police force in the world this parliament cannot do too much. In my judgment it is only now beginning to be fair to that splendid body of men.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask one question? If it is too big a question I shall not press for an answer. The wording of the resolution indicates that the bill will cover other matters besides those referred to in the resolution. Are those other matters many and could the minister indicate what they are?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have concentrated so much on the main provisions of the bill that I cannot give an indication of what else there is. I did know about them a few months ago, but I do not at the present time. The main provisions of the bill are indicated in the resolution.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 211, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AREAS SURVEYED AS SETTLEMENT OR RIVER LOTS—LAND IN ELIGIBLE AND INELIGIBLE TOWNSHIPS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 204, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. SPEAKER: We have before the house an amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue), seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), reading as follows:

That Bill No. 204 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to extending the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to other specialized crop areas, also that the benefits under the act should be increased, and that steps should be taken toward the making of awards on an individual farm basis.

I have considered the amendment very carefully and have to rule it out of order on two grounds. First, I would call the attention of hon. members to citation 551 of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads:

It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the Speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

I would also call attention to citation 760 which reads:

The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every proposed resolution, which must, therefore, "strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering" and must not include in its scope other bills then standing for consideration by the house. Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the bill.

For those two considerations I declare the amendment out of order.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. As has been stated by a number of members, this act was placed upon the statute books in 1939 for the purpose of taking care of conditions that had developed in an area of western Canada subject to drought. The proposal has been made by some hon. members that there should be a zoning of the three western provinces in order that different payments and different collections might be made in different areas.

I would point out that when the bill was first drafted and passed by this house in the form of the present act that question was fully discussed. One of the reasons it was not thought possible to zone successfully and to the advantage of the farmers was the very point made by a number of members. I think this was emphasized more by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) than by the others.

The suggestion was made that the problem which exists could be taken care of by insurance. The hon. member for Lake Centre and others questioned that on the ground that under no plan of insurance could one raise sufficient funds on an actuarial basis to take care of the losses which would occur in the drought areas of western Canada. Because of that fact, it was thought wise that the basis upon which funds would be obtained to take care of the losses ought to be as broad as possible.

In other words, it was felt that there should not be any zoning in order to obtain funds, that the basis should be the whole of Canada, not the province of Manitoba or the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Alberta. It was felt that the only way in which to get sufficient funds to take care of losses which might occur through drought in western Canada was to collect money at the expense of all Canada. I only need to hold up a map of each province showing what has occurred this year in order to indicate why that is true.

This is a map of Manitoba showing the condition in 1947. The red areas are those having under four bushels per acre and the blue areas are those having under eight bushels but more than four bushels per acre. The areas affected are this block in the Dauphin area, this block in the Red river area and this block in the western area. It does not show up as much on this map as it does on the others because the areas affected in Manitoba are not large.

This is a map of Saskatchewan showing the areas affected by drought this year. We hear very little in other parts of Canada about drought this year out west, but if hon. members will look at this map, they can see that the greater part of the province is affected. A considerable part is under four bushels to the acre with a larger part being under eight bushels.

Taking the map of the province of Alberta while the area is not large one must remember that the agricultural areas of the other provinces are not as large as that of the province of Saskatchewan. However, you can see all down the east side of Alberta up north and west of Edmonton is affected. These are maps for this year only.

I repeat, we are not hearing very much with regard to the difficulties that the farmers in western Canada are experiencing as a result of drought. I indicate these areas which are affected only to point out that if you are to take care of areas like that by any means of assistance, the area against which you are going to levy the collection must be a very large area. So we said: We will take one per cent on all the grain delivered in the prairie provinces. That is the first source from which we get funds. Then we provided that in addition to that, we would take all the money that is necessary in order to make up the amount that is to be paid from all the taxpayers in Canada. In other words we take the very broadest basis that can be taken for the collection, and then we make the payments in the areas that are affected by drought. So I suggest that it would not be wise to narrow in any way the basis on which the amounts are levied.

Someone has suggested that this is somewhat similar to unemployment insurance. It is in this sense that a certain amount is paid by the treasury. Someone has suggested that if we paid 50 per cent of the amount into the fund we could administer it on an insurance basis. On the basis on which we have been operating, we have paid out of the federal treasury two-thirds of the amount, and the other one-third has been collected at the rate of one per cent on all the grain delivered. Under unemployment insurance the government pays 20 per cent into the fund, the employer 40 per cent and the employee 40 per cent. But under this prairie farm assistance plan as it has worked out, the government is paying about 66⅔ per cent and the farmers, not only the farmers who may obtain benefits under it but all the farmers in that area, are paying the other one-third under compulsion.

I do not think it would be wise, at any rate at this stage, even to attempt to put it on an insurance basis, even if the federal government had the authority to do so. But we have always been informed, ever since this legislation was first considered, that it would be ultra vires of the authority of this parliament to pass legislation providing for insurance in connection with losses of this kind. For that reason, if we were to adopt the insurance plan, it would have to go back to the provinces, and for the reasons I have given only one of the provinces, namely Manitoba, would have a chance of surviving under such an insurance plan. The other two provinces, under no system of assistance that could be given on an insurance basis, could survive.

If we needed any further proof of that we have only to remember that, following the advice we have received back over the years that only the provinces can bring in an insurance plan in connection with crops, we have had provincial schemes in connection with hail insurance. The losses from hail are not anything like the losses from drought; yet, in spite of that, every one of these provincial schemes has run into difficulties in financing on a provincial basis and some have given it up altogether, leaving the insurance to go back to private companies. So I would suggest to those who are urging that this should be put on a basis of insurance that the area from which you could collect for it would be altogether too small, even if you applied it to all of western Canada.

Some say, Why should we spread the collection over other parts of Canada? I remember the arguments in 1939 with which the house agreed, and some of those arguments have been heard in this house on a number of occasions during recent days in discussing another matter. It is generally acknowledged throughout Canada that the great development we have had in this country from about 1890 onwards was due to the railway development in this country and its association with the opening up of western Canada. I think it is generally agreed in all parts of Canada that we could not have had the great industrial development we have had, and certainly we could not have maintained our railway organizations on the standard on which they have been maintained, had it not been for the production of the area with which we are concerned when dealing with prairie farm assistance.

One other point ought to be made. When we were discussing this question in 1939 the idea that was in the minds of many people in Canada was that the area which we were talking about had been proven to be nonproductive. Some people even went so far as to say we ought to move out of that area the one million people who had settled in it. Well, we did not do so. Since then, we have gone through the war, and during the period from 1939 down to the present we shall have paid into that area under the scheme by the end of this year $90,000,000. Of that amount we shall have collected $30,000,000 from the farmers in western Canada and we shall have paid out of the treasury of Canada approximately $60,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister describe that area in a little more detail. What does it comprise? Does he mean in all the drought area?

Mr. GARDINER: In all the area pictured on the maps that I held up. As I was saying, about $90,000,000 has been paid to the farmers there, $60,000,000 of which has been paid out of the treasury of Canada, the other $30,000,000 being put up by the farmers paying the one per cent levy. What I want to say about that area is this. While we might have thought it had served its purpose so far as producing food products is concerned, nevertheless during the war we have taken more tonnage by a very considerable amount out of that area in the six years of the war than was ever taken out before in a six-year period. In the years when we were breaking up the new prairie and seeding it to cereal crops we no doubt surprised all people living outside western Canada with the production of that area. Then we ran into the drought period from 1930 to 1937, and many people outside that area had the idea that we were through producing in that area. But, as a matter of fact, from 1939 down to the present we have produced more in the area that is known as the drought area in western Canada than was ever produced in it in a corresponding period since it was first broken up. In other words, it is a case of our keeping people in that area and teaching them how to live and how to handle their land to the best advantage, and if that is done over one or two generations they will know how to live there and will be able to produce enough to keep a greater population in the area.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the minister figures to indicate the production since 1939?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not them here at the moment; I could give them fairly closely, but I think it is generally acknowledged by all members of the house that the production is very much higher in the area. The reason, then, for continuing this act and for extending it to some extent is the fact that the area is productive; and the reason why all the people in Canada have been willing to pay toward the maintenance of the scheme is that shipments of food out of that area have supplied employment and food for people not only all over Canada but in other parts of the world, and during the war it was the source from which much of the surplus food came that made it possible for us to maintain our armies overseas. I think that is all I need to say with regard to that question.

There are a number of matters which have been brought up by hon. members with regard to which I should say a little. Some have said that we should base the decision as to whether we are to pay on a smaller area. I am surprised to find that many of those dealing with this question still talk about wheat and so many bushels per acre as though they were the main consideration. That is not the consideration at all under this act. We do not care whether the people grow wheat or whether they run cattle. We are not concerned whether they grow feed grain or flax or what they may grow. We use wheat only as a barometer to tell whether it has been dry weather in the area or not, and we believe that wheat yield proves whether it has been dry or not better than any other crop that is grown, and it is grown more generally over the area. Therefore we say that if the farmer has not produced more than four bushels to the acre on an average, it is proof that it has been dry. Whether he has been running cattle or no matter what he had been doing, he is entitled to payment. We say further that, even if there is a farmer in the district—and this is one of the reasons why I am not in favour of dealing with individuals—who had twenty or twenty-five bushels to the acre on a piece of good summer-fallow of, let us say fifty or one hundred acres, and his neighbours or the people all around the area have had an average of four bushels or less per acre or eight bushels or less per acre, that is no reason why the man who has twenty or twenty-five bushels should not be paid. You would have to go into his books and find out everything that he did, whether he produced cattle on grass that had dried out during the season, whether he was feeding hogs for which he did not grow feed grain and a great many other things that have to be examined into before you could say that one fellow was entitled to payment and the other was not.

All we examine into is the question whether in a considerable area it was dry. We say that if the average crop over that area was four bushels or less per acre, then there is a crop failure. If it is eight bushels or less per acre, then it has been dry enough that some assistance ought to be given when the price of wheat is over eighty cents a bushel, and if the price of wheat is lower than eighty cents a bushel, then some assistance should be given up until the yield is twelve bushels to the acre in the area.

Some have said that you could get it down to a section or down to three sections, or you could get it down to four or five farms or half a dozen farms. Those who understand conditions out west know this, and even men in eastern Canada know this, that you can find areas in any country or in any township where you would have three or four farmers on light land. For example, you could go outside Ottawa on the way to the airport and find land that used to be occupied by farmers which is now a sand pit. You could find areas like that all over the country. To say that because three or four men insist on living on an area that is nothing more than a gravel pit or a sand pit and try to farm there, they ought to be maintained there, is not in accordance with the principles of this bill as it is drawn up. We say to these men, We are prepared under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to move you off that land; we will help you pull down your buildings; we will pay the freight to ship them somewhere else; we will provide you with land in an irrigated district at a certain rate; we will move your equipment there for you. If, after they have had that offer, they will not accept it and still insist on remaining on poor land we say that this act should not provide for that small group of men, within a township that is not eligible, having assistance. Therefore we do not feel that it would be wise to undertake to do it on a smaller district than it now is.

The suggestion has been made that we ought to lower the area from a township to a quarter of a township. In effect, that is what we have already done. We say that wherever there is a block of land of a township or more that is eligible under this act we shall make payment; but we say that if there is a quarter of a township or more that, when we check up, we find has more than fourteen bushels to the acre we can take it out, and we will say that if, around the edge of that block, there is an area that is under eight bushels to the acre we can put it in. In other words, there is not any necessity for dealing with anything less than a whole township in the solid block.

But when you are dealing with the area that I have described in the province of Saskatchewan, the great block which I have shown on the map, every section of land in it is under the act for payment. All that the bill permits us to do is to say that we do not have to go over that whole area and look into the production of every quarter of a township and take one quarter township out and put another quarter township in; when we are satisfied that the average in each township is below the eight bushels to the acre we make payment. The only place that there is any reason for giving consideration to the quarter townships is around the outside of the solid block.

Under this legislation, one of the sections we are amending is the one which has to do with the matter of taking out quarters of townships or putting in quarters of townships, and all the operation takes place around the edge of the solid block which is all in. I say, in effect, that that does put you in the position that, wherever there is any question about it at all, it is on the nine sections or quarter township basis, and I do not think it is necessary to go below that in order to make units which would meet the wishes of hon. members.

Someone has said that the deductions and payments are the same—I think it was the hon. member for Wood Mountain—

Mr. ARGUE: Approximately.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, they are approximately the same. The deductions and payments remain approximately the same as in 1939 when the act was drawn. The suggestion is made that payments and deductions should go up and down with the variations in the prices of grain. Again I would call the attention of the house to the fact that we are not paying on grain. We are paying on cattle; we are paying on feed grain for hogs. We are not paying on wheat; we are paying on anything which a man happens to be doing in the area. He can in relation to agriculture get payment even if he does not sow a bushel of wheat or if he has not an acre of wheat during the whole period. We are paying him because of the condition through which he is going, and that condition affects him no matter what he is trying to produce. Therefore it will not be possible to vary it on the basis of wheat. But even if we attempted to vary it on the basis of the prices for farm products in general, I do not think we would be accomplishing what we had in mind when we passed the act.

My reason for that is that when you have only four bushels of wheat to the acre and the price is $1 a bushel, your return is only $4 an acre and you need whatever payment there may be more at that time than you need it when wheat is worth $2 a bushel and instead of $4 an acre you get $8. In other words, it would not be fair to the man you are dealing with if you increased the payment he is to get, or even if you increased the amount he is to pay in, over the period when prices are high. What we are desirous of doing under this bill is accumulating surpluses when prices are high, which make it possible to take care of your people on an equal basis when prices are low.

Up to the present our experience has been that we are faring a little better under this act than we anticipated in 1939. At that time, when we were first getting this measure through, I was asked in the house how much I expected it would cost the treasury, and I think at that time I said our estimate was that it would cost the fund about $4 for each $1 put up by the farmers. Well, it has worked out that it is costing about $3 for every $1 put up by the farmers; and the only reason we have been able to keep it down to $3 is that in 1942 we did not need to pay out anything. That year there were only twelve townships in all western Canada that had less than eight bushels to the acre, so that no payments were made and everything collected that year was accumulated, to be charged up in the other years.

At the present time, when we have high prices for grain, one per cent means a great deal. But I would suggest to hon. members from Manitoba that in only two years has that one per cent meant enough to cover what Manitoba drew out of the fund the first year. That year Manitoba drew out $849,000, and the highest collection ever made in Manitoba was $889,000, and in another year, $859,000. I think the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) are quite right in suggesting that Manitoba could have a year like that again. It could have a year twice as bad, because it did have years twice as bad before any such assistance was given, and we could run into that condition again. So that, while they are paying in more than they are getting out for the time being, a time might easily come when they would greatly benefit by the plan.

Perhaps I should say more than I have said already with respect to the meeting that may be held as between the municipalities, the provinces and ourselves with regard to the areas. I think I know what hon. members have in mind when they suggest that we ought to put this plan on an individual basis. They have in mind that group of people who are in the corners. They say that showers do not go in squares; that they simply go across the country, and that when you cut this out in squares you leave the odd corner where a few people live who are just as badly off as the people living inside the solid block. We have always acknowledged that; we have always said that is true, but we have called attention to the fact that this was first considered to be a municipal problem. The municipalities were supposed to look after indigent people, just as they were supposed to look after unemployed people and those who are in difficulties for other reasons. When that task became too great for the municipalities, under our constitution the province had to assume the responsibility, and kept on assuming it until it became so big they could not take care of it any longer. Then they came to Ottawa and said, these people are going to starve unless somebody takes care of them; and we entered upon the task.

The basis on which we entered into it was this. We said that when there were twenty-five municipalities in a province which could not take care of themselves, then the dominion government would consider going in and helping. But we said that when the number gets down to ten we shall get out. We were operating on that basis prior to 1939. In that year we said that we would take as our obligation any full townships in the three provinces that were in difficulties, but we suggested that the provinces, or the provinces and the municipalities combined, ought to take care of these corners.

We went along in that way for two or three years. Then we found that they were not going to do anything about it, so we took in quarter townships around the edge. But we said that we would take on quarter townships only on the condition that we were allowed to take out the quarter townships which did not need assistance and which also were around the edge. That is what we have done from that time up to the present. But many people are living in these corners all the way around each block who, as I indicated a moment ago, are not getting assistance under this plan. Every year we have suggested to the government of the province—it did not matter what government it was—that we thought they should go in and pay something toward the care of these people if they wanted us to look after them. If they can provide a scheme of their own to take care of them we are quite satisfied; but we think, if they wish them brought into our plan, the province should contribute.

Now, for the first time, they have all got together in these meetings which were spoken of today, and agreed that we ought to meet to consider this matter. So I would suggest to those who have said we ought to do some things which are not in the amending bill at the present time, that in my opinion the best place for these matters to be discussed is at this meeting which we shall arrange by some method or another, just as soon as we can get away from this house and from some other activities. We shall have a meeting called somewhere, I hope out in western Canada, where we can discuss this question through to a final conclusion; and when we have done so I hope the provinces and municipalities will be able to make some provision by which we can take care of most of the cases that have been discussed here, particularly such cases as were referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), having to do with blocks on one side of the Qu'Appelle river, when the greater part of the municipality is either down in the valley or extends up the opposite side where the crops are fairly good.

These problems can be taken care of under a plan that may be worked out. Whether the provinces will want to administer the small areas under some plan they will provide, I do not know. We have always said we would be quite satisfied to carry on the administration over the whole area, provided that the provinces, or the provinces plus the municipalities, would put into the fund some amount bearing a reasonable relationship to the amount all the taxpayers of Canada were contributing, in order to deal with the solid block of people who are suffering from drought.

That, I think, is all I need to say at this time.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If an arrangement such as that described by the minister is arrived at, would he consider making it retroactive to 1947?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I do not know. I think I know what my hon. friend has in mind. This bill was not drafted in the first instance to take care of anything but drought, and we have been making payments under the provisions of the act for other reasons. We have been making payments, however, where the destruction that has taken place has covered a township, whether it is by hail or by flooding. Every member of this house knows that ordinarily, when flooding takes place, the responsibility for assistance is with the province. We had very heavy storms in western Ontario, and an appeal was made to us for assistance. We said, No; that was a provincial responsibility. A year or two ago we had the same thing in Quebec, and we said that was a provincial responsibility. We had the same thing up in northern Alberta, and we said that was a provincial responsibility, until finally they showed us that under this act we had authority to pay on full townships.

This year it has been shown in the province of Manitoba that up in the Dauphin area there are additional townships that are affected by flooding. But we still maintain that the responsibility for flooding, generally speaking, is a provincial responsibility, and that the province ought to show some interest in the matter and some inclination to work out a solution for any problem that exists. As the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) will remember, he and I attended a meeting in Dauphin last summer when all this matter was discussed with officials of the province there and with the officials of the municipality. I think we finally reached an understanding that a plan ought to be worked out by the province and submitted to the federal government, and that the federal government might, under the item providing $100,000 we had voted last session, find funds with which to assist in dealing with the problem there.

We did not have a plan working last summer, with the result that the suggestion is made by the hon. member for that area that he would like to have anything that is done made retroactive. I would call his attention to the fact that anything that is done, in addition to what has already been done, would have to be financed by the province. That is, we are taking care of the full township plots, and we would expect that if anything were done beyond that in that area—at least anything beyond the nine sections that might be around the edge of it—it ought to be taken care of out of funds provided by the province. So I am not in a position to say whether it should be retroactive or not.

But I would say that the most important thing for the Dauphin district is not the application of this act at all. The most important thing for the Dauphin district is to do something similar to what we did some years ago in the northeastern corner of Saskatchewan. There is an area there that flooded every spring. The farmers were not able to get on to it until June, and that was too late. The provincial government went into that area and put in drains which drain off the water before it reaches the land, take it down around another way and keep it off that land altogether. I think something of that kind must be done in the Dauphin district, and that is not something which can be handled under this act. It is much more important that we get busy, as soon as possible, with some understanding as between ourselves and the province, and then between the province and the municipality, to have that job done and done in a way that will avoid that flooding. Then the people in that district will not need assistance under this act, and I hope they will not object to paying their one per cent, for all time to come, to take care of the other people.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Might I ask one question? Will the regulations be placed before the committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest to the hon. member that he wait to ask his question until we have reached the committee stage.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"Township."

Mr. JUTRAS: There is one question that I should like to ask on this first section. The new part reads:

> . . . and includes any group of settlement or river lots declared by the governor in council to be a township for the purposes of this act.

The explanatory note says:

> This amendment is to provide that the act may apply to areas surveyed as settlement or river lots in the same way as it applies to areas surveyed as townships.

I do not know whether the minister can answer my question tonight, but at all events it will be on the record for the officials. Does this mean that river lots are constituted in a separate block as townships, or is there also the alternative that they may be part of the township? I am just wondering if it leaves out the two alternatives, leaving the discretion to the commission, for instance, to constitute a certain number of river lots into a block or declare it to be a township. Or is the alternative left of leaving them as part of the township.

To illustrate this point, I will give one instance where it would appear that the river lots are taken out entirely. In my constituency there is this year a township, I understand, township 62, which illustrates that point very well. The Red river divides the township north and south practically in the centre. Then there are two rows of river lots on each side of the river. Since it is more or less in the centre of the township, it leaves a strip of sections which are survey sections on the east side and on the west side. My understanding is that the township in question, namely township 6-2-1E, qualifies this year; but, on the other hand, apparently all the river lots in the centre, which are really in this case a part of the township, do not qualify. That is my understanding.

So I do not know if it can be worked out to leave the two alternatives in the act. But I think it would be preferable to leave the two alternatives there; to leave in the intention of the act anyway, the two alternatives open as the case may be required from year to year. I do not know if I have made that point clear, but it looks like an anomaly to say that the township qualifies and yet all the strip of land in the very centre does not qualify.

Mr. GARDINER: Hon. members who are familiar with the river lots will know that these strips run diagonally as compared with many of the township lots. That is, they were there before the western part of Canada was surveyed into townships six miles square. They ran back from the river at right angles to the river, to begin with; and these strips were formed on both sides of the original. We started out, as a result of the undertaking given last year, to try to draw in what would have been the township boundaries if the survey had been made after the river lots had been put there, to try to make them coincide as nearly as possible with where the lines would have been. The river lots are so much on an angle to where those straight lines would be that this was found to be impossible. If we could have done this, we would simply have drawn a map, made it a schedule to this bill, brought it in and said: Those are the townships, and any one of those areas must have less than four or eight bushels to the acre before they are paid a certain amount. But we found that it was impossible to do that, so we are taking authority here to go into those districts and lay out areas which are, to all intents and purposes, the same in area as a full township.

It will be found, just as has been indicated by the hon. member, that there may be a township where a piece has been taken out of the middle of it or of the side of it. That is, all over western Canada there are partial townships, and we have another section in this act which is intended to deal with those partial townships.

The legal township is six miles square, but when they come to the next meridian, because the lines you draw toward the north pole come together, eventually there is a correction on these meridians. Those corrections vary all the way from six-mile square blocks to blocks which are six miles north and south, but only part of a section or part of a mile east and west.

In this bill we are making provision for dividing these for the purpose of making payments. In other words, while they are not six miles square, they are legal townships. Just alongside these strips of land which run diagonally out from the river, there may be a part of a township which is left, and under the bill they will be designated as separate townships. And these areas which are in the river lots will be separate townships.

I am not altogether certain that there will not be some places where it will be found possible to take what is part of a township and include in it some of the river lots in order to make a complete township for the purposes of this act. But eventually the map will be drawn and it will be properly made out, so that we are not deciding the matter until after the facts are known. The boundaries will be there before. Then, when the facts develop which make it possible to pay under the act, we shall pay under the act.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask the minister a question; and I am not sure if this is the proper place to ask it. I would ask him about those regulations which are being altered. Would the question be properly asked under this section? I do not see any other place where I could raise the question.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there is any amendment here with regard to regulations.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, but the minister was making a statement to the effect that there was some confusion in the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. GARDINER: If I remember correctly, the hon. member for Souris was here at the time the bill was originally introduced.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I think I remember informing the house at that time as to the regulations. The regulations, as they were drawn in the first instance, including this 20-mile limit, and all that kind of thing, were discussed on the floor of the house.

One of the reasons it has been found difficult to cover what is in the regulations by law has been the fact that we are receiving continuously representations from members and others indicating the difficulties people get into.

Take, for instance the question of widowed mothers having to move into towns and leaving their land. Sometimes they move a little more than twenty miles, or they may have moved into a town more than twenty miles away in order to obtain hospitalization. That question was brought up. If we had been committed to twenty miles by the legislation, we could not have done anything. But having the authority to amend the regulations, we were able to say, Well, in cases where people have gone to hospitals and had to go more than twenty miles, and where they have had to remain there for a period of time—sometimes two or three years—for treatment of different types of diseases, payments can be made.

It is to meet a situation of that kind that authority has been left to have regulations made by orders in council. I am not able to make them myself. The board cannot make them. But the whole council can change those regulations from time to time.

Another case was that of soldiers. During the war soldiers just picked up from their land, enlisted and went overseas. They did not think anything about prairie farm assistance. Probably they did not know they would have any crop failures while they were away, or at least did not think they would have. But they got overseas. Those people were the owners of land, the real operators of it, although they hired men to look after it.

It was found that, strictly speaking, these men did not have a claim unless we did something about the matter in the regulations. We dealt with those cases and said that when a man was overseas he was an exception. All kinds of cases of that kind have come up, and we have dealt with them. I think hon. members will agree that we have attempted to administer the act so that it would not create undue hardship, and so that it would not give favours to anybody. I believe that is pretty well agreed, because it was so stated many times this afternoon by hon. members.

If there was any reason for thinking that we have been abusing the authority which was there, then I would agree with those hon. members who say we ought to write into the act what we are going to do, and say. That is the only thing we can do. But I would suggest that this is not legislation which lends itself to that kind of thing. A great many situations develop which ought to be dealt with from time to time, whether this house is in session or not. And we asked the house to give authority to the government. They gave it to the government at that time. I consider it wise to leave it there unless we run into difficulty which might be considered serious.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You have reports of individual cases and then you take the matter up with the cabinet council; is that the situation? I have had many cases such as the minister has mentioned which have come to my attention in the past few years. I believe they have been ironed out; I will admit that. But I would ask this further question, as to whether there is any provision for flooding in connection with this act. Where farmers have been flooded out, can something be done for them? Can settlement be made for those farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: Not for an individual farmer. If he is in an area six miles square, or alongside one six miles square—I think it is nine sections—he can get assistance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If it is nine sections it does not have to be contiguous to any other area?

Mr. GARDINER: It would have to be adjoining a six-mile square area, or a township, unless it is one of those along the river, where they are not six miles square. For instance, take along the Qu'Appelle—and I do not know the situation at Portage as well as I do at Qu'Appelle—there are areas only two miles wide which really constitute a township.

Mr. MILLER: I was going to ask about that, as to whether the minister had any idea how they would settle areas on the river lots, because some of them are very narrow and very long. Would it be a question of acreage?

Mr. GARDINER: Approximately that. As I remember the map, there were stretches where possibly they were six miles long, and where along those six miles you can take strips which are six miles wide, or approximately that, and draw the line down the road allowances and then across the top, and you have a six-mile square block. It will not be at right angles with the block around it, but it will be six miles. We will try to map it out into blocks of that kind, and map it out without relation to what happened this year or what might happen.

Mr. MILLER: It will be comparable in acreage area with the ordinary block?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is right.

Mr. McKAY: Since the minister has been discussing the 20-mile clause, may I ask another question? Just how flexible is that regulation? I understand what was said this evening regarding the subject, but I am wondering if it has anything to do with the particular case I have in mind.

For instance, if that clause definitely states that a man cannot reside twenty miles distant from his farm, what is it composed of? How is mileage based? Is it road allowance? How is it calculated, because there are areas in the province where there are very few road allowances.

Mr. GARDINER: If hon. members will not hold me definitely to what is read as the regulation which may be finally decided upon, I shall read it to them. But it was just suggested a while ago that we might have it before us. This has not yet been adopted, but it has been recommended that an owner is not a farmer for the purposes of the act (a) unless he is an owner or tenant of a farm from the first day of May to the first day of November in the same year, or (b) unless he lives in the spring wheat area and his primary occupation is farming from the first day of May to the conclusion of the crop season.

There is nothing in that about twenty miles.

Mr. McKAY: No—

Mr. GARDINER: If he is the owner or renter of land and lives in the area, and his primary occupation is farming—and it will be noted that it does not say "only occupation"—from the first day of May to the conclusion of the crop season, he can draw under the act. The next section provides that he must be responsible for the farming operations and the disposal of the proceeds of the farm.

I have one case that is before me now. A father who homesteaded in western Canada years ago moved back to Ontario to live. His boy is now on the land in Saskatchewan and the father wants to know why his boy cannot be paid this year. I have written to him to say that if he will either rent the land to the boy or give it to him the boy will be paid, but so long as he insists on only hiring the boy and sending him out there he cannot be paid under the act. The man can fix that himself; we do not need to fix it for him. He can put his son on a rental basis and the boy himself will be paid. I do not think it is necessary to change the regulations in order to meet a case of that kind. Under the act the boy can be paid, but the man himself would not be paid when he lives in Ontario.

Mr. MILLER: Is there any question of a split as between landlord and tenant? I presume that the minister's own farm is rented. Is there any rule that the landlord will get his portion of what is paid?

Mr. GARDINER: The intention is that the tenant or the operator of the farm shall get it, because the idea is to keep the operator on the farm until he gets another crop. We have never put anything in the way of an owner making any deal he likes with his tenant. The only thing is that he cannot seize the money while it is in our possession; he cannot get possession of the money until the man gets it. In other words, it would have to be a cash rental.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He has no claim.

Mr. MILLER: He might not have any claim on the tenant either.

Mr. GARDINER: There are some other paragraphs to which the 20-mile limit did apply, but does not now. One is:

(e) if renting from a parent, unless he has a written lease executed prior to the first day of May of the year of award.

That has been there all the time. There is another one that concerns the 20-mile limit:

(2) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection 1 where a farmer dies or becomes mentally incompetent and the operation of the farm is continued by a person who

(a) is related by blood or marriage to the deceased or mentally incompetent;

[Mr. McKay.]

(b) is the sole beneficiary of the deceased or mentally incompetent; and

(c) is operating the farm on behalf of a beneficiary who is living in the spring wheat area and is primarily dependent upon the farm for a living.

Mr. TOWNLEY SMITH: A township is a piece of land six miles square. In the west, where the township line intersects the range line, we are given such townships. I have seen cases where two such adjoining townships were ineligible, but adjoining halves of such townships were eligible. Has the minister ever considered changing the actual numbered townships of six miles square so that we can take in, say, the east half of one township and the west half of the adjoining township and still have a piece of land which is essentially a township?

Mr. GARDINER: That comes up almost every year, but it is usually related to some specific case where they think something would happen if we would do that. We do not think it would be wise to operate that way. There would be great difficulty in administration, because you would have to check each area to see whether you could take the south half of one township and the north half of another. Then you would have to go over and check whether you could take the west side and put it on with the east side of the next township. It will be seen that this would increase the administration costs approximately four times in order to do it successfully for everybody.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Weyburn was asking about the regulations with regard to the twenty miles distance which a farmer may live from his farm. Does the Minister of Agriculture realize that we have a lot of power farming in Saskatchewan? Would the minister give us assurance that a farmer who is farming a parcel of land more than twenty miles from the town in which he lives would be eligible for an award?

Mr. GARDINER: It has been recommended that everything about the twenty miles shall be left out. However I have warned the committee that the regulations are not yet brought to a finality, but I have no doubt that they will be. If they are, there will be no 20-mile limit at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is there any regulation as to the minimum size of a farm?

Mr. GARDINER: Twenty-five acres is the smallest.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There is no change contemplated in that respect?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Blocks ineligible for award.

Mr. GARDINER: I will ask my colleague to move an amendment to this section.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move:

That section 3, line 13, be amended by deleting the word "eligible" and substituting therefor the word "ineligible".

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The Minister of Agriculture gave a detailed account of the administrative difficulties in putting this act on an individual basis, and he referred also to the additional cost which would be entailed. In his address he indicated that he did not consider that any farmer who would get twenty bushels or more per acre in an eligible township or portion thereof, which would be one-quarter of a township, should not be eligible for an award; he said that no one could argue that that person should not be eligible for an award. I take exception to that. I think it would be more reasonable to say that in no case should a farmer who is eligible or who has a crop of less than eight bushels per acre not get an award.

The hon. member for Acadia indicated that he thought we should get closer to the individual farm basis. With the present amendments it is possible to have six sections lying along an eligible township and those six sections not be eligible simply because they are in an ineligible township. Under section 7 it is quite possible for the government to take out certain farmers and put them in an ineligible block of nine sections even though they may suffer either a total or partial crop loss. I think there is an injustice there.

Mr. GARDINER: I think there is too, but the suggestion we make is that that is a problem that the province ought to help us deal with. I am not saying that because the government is such and such a government, for we have said that ever since 1939, no matter what government was in power. We say that that strip of six sections alongside the drought area—it would probably be in one of the corners spoken of—ought to be dealt with under the act but that if they are to be dealt with under the act the provinces should help us in the financing.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I was glad to hear the minister say that the municipal association was meeting with the government with a view to coming to some decision whereby some of these injustices would be ironed out and provision made to take care of them. But here you have in an eligible township, say six sections with a fairly good crop, and in order that the department may take a block of one-quarter of a township it includes three more sections where the farmers have poor crops. Those farmers do not feel that they should be included in any sort of relief system administered either by the municipality or by the provincial government, nor would it be reasonable to expect that, when they are suffering crop losses for the very same reason as these other people and they get no award under the act. We could amend this section in a way that would ensure that the farmers who had suffered crop losses would be paid something, without in any way increasing the expenditure of the government, and so I move, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn:

That section 3 of Bill 204 be amended by deleting all the words in lines 5 to 11, both inclusive, thereof, and substituting therefor the following:

"(a) where any farm is located in a township contiguous to an eligible township, it shall be eligible for award; but no farm which has an average yield of more than fourteen bushels of wheat per acre, no matter where it is located, shall be eligible for award."

This does not in any way penalize any farmer who should get an award, but it reduces the expenditure of the government through not paying any award to a farmer who, I think, should not get an award because he has a decent crop, namely, fourteen bushels to the acre. I think that is only reasonable.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that the hon. member has not read the section.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I have read it.

Mr. GARDINER: Then he did not understand it. This amendment applies only to areas along the meridians and other places where you have part townships. The legal township is six miles square, but the amendment proposed by the bill provides that in areas along the meridians where the township may be only two miles wide or even one mile wide, the section will apply to one-quarter of the township, not a quarter of thirty-six sections but a quarter of twelve sections. As the explanatory note says:

3. The act now provides that a block of sections having an area of not less than a quarter of a township may be taken into account under section 7. This was interpreted to mean a quarter of a full thirty-six section township, and as a result it was rarely possible to apply section 7 to the fractional townships lying along meridian lines. The proposed amendment corrects this by making the section applicable to one-quarter of the township under consideration, whether of thirty-six sections or less.

Even if it is only four sections, one section can be taken out. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend would delete the proposed 7(a) and 7(b) and substitute something else for it.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Does the proposed amendment not merely change the meaning of section 7 in the original act so that the townships which lie alongside of a meridian can for administrative purposes be considered under the act?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it means exactly what the explanatory note says it means. It means you do not have to take thirty-six sections lying alongside the meridian to make one-quarter of it eligible under the act. That is all it means. I think the hon. member understands the position. Meridian 2 is possibly the nearest to him. When you run up the east side of meridian 2, some of the townships are only two miles wide, some four miles wide and some five miles wide, and at the boundary line six miles wide. Our amendment provides that you have only to take a quarter of that township, no matter whether it is composed of twelve or thirty-six sections.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The amendment which I have moved eliminates 7(a) and replaces it with another, and of course it changes the whole subsection to provide that where any farm is located in a township contiguous to an eligible township it shall be eligible for award, but in no case where there is an average yield of more than fourteen bushels to an acre shall an award be made.

Mr. GARDINER: It takes away the whole intention of the amendment proposed by the bill. If my hon. friend's amendment were made to the original section it would mean exactly what he says; but, as it is drawn, it strikes out the whole intention of the present amendment in the bill.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): That is what I want done.

Mr. GARDINER: But quite apart from that, if you were to apply it in this way to those areas you would have to apply it to the township areas as well. The hon. member's amendment says:

> . . . where any farm is located in a township contiguous to an eligible township, it shall be eligible for award; but no farm which has an average yield of more than fourteen bushels of wheat per acre, no matter where it is located, shall be eligible for award.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

My hon. friend's amendment does not deal with this section at all, but with sections in the earlier part of the act which provide for payment, and which say that the payment is to be made at so much per acre to each farmer who lives in a township. But this section does not say anything about that.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): That is one of the sections which are not up for amendment at all at this time.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course I would be opposed to my hon. friend's amendment even if it were moved in the right place.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it the intention under 7(a) to include sections of land with an average yield of less than eight bushels in the rectangular block? The minister remembers the case I brought to his attention a year or so ago where a township had been declared eligible; then within the township it was found that there were six sections of land with a yield of over twenty bushels to the acre, and under the act it was not possible to take those sections out. Therefore it was decided to add to the six sections four more sections that had practically a total crop failure, but the average yield was still about fourteen bushels to the acre, and that was done. I think the minister will admit that it does not seem fair where you have already declared a township eligible to take out four sections of the land without a crop failure. Was it not really the intention of the act to include in that block only land with a yield of only eight bushels to the acre?

Mr. GARDINER: No. I do not think it is possible to find a piece of land of nine sections of the kind the hon. member has described. I have seen land, and I am sure my hon. friend has also, farmed by certain farmers in a certain way where, on five or ten acres, they will get twenty bushels to the acre in any kind of year. To say simply that you cannot take that land, in order to get nine sections within a township, would make it impossible to get nine sections anywhere. That is again the idea that we are paying on wheat. We are not paying on wheat at all.

I do not know the Acadia area very well, but I have been over it a number of times. As the hon. member will admit, I think it is one of the most difficult areas in either Alberta or western Saskatchewan, and I know that people there are experiencing considerable hardship, and will until certain things can be done which have not been done and may not be done for a long time. But I do not think you can take care of all these difficulties by any rule-of-thumb thing that we can put into this act. We simply say that if there is an area there that has an average of less than

To say that you would have to find an area that has not anybody in it who has twenty bushels to the acre or fourteen bushels to the acre would just make the thing inoperative. You would take out probably half the people who are getting assistance, and it would not be just to them to take them out. On the other hand, if you said that every fellow who has under four bushels to the acre is to get paid no matter what he does, some fellows would sit in the house probably and wait for their $4 an acre and do better than if they worked, particularly if they are living on a piece of sandy land. My hon. friend knows there is land of that kind in the area about which he is talking. If a man insists on living on that sandy land and says that he can live there and get $4 an acre by living there, I do not think we should help him to do that. Some people could have activities elsewhere of a kind that makes it possible for them to live there. I do not think we should do either one thing or the other. I do not think we should shut the man out who may have twenty bushels to the acre on a very limited acreage of wheat but who may be trying to feed a hundred head of cattle for which he has no grass, and at the same time take another fellow in who just insists on living on a piece of land whether he can ever grow more than four bushels to the acre or not. It is in order to avoid both of these things that the act is drawn as it is.

Mr. QUELCH: What I cannot understand is this. When a township has been declared eligible and it is found that a certain amount of land has a yield of about fourteen bushels to the acre and you then desire to take that land out, why should you be forced to include with that land other land which has had a crop failure? Would it not be better to reduce the block from nine sections and put in certain land other than the area which has a yield of fourteen bushels to the acre? That land could be taken out, and you would not be forced into the position of having to include land which has had a crop failure in order to make up the nine sections. It seems to me to be an injustice that, in order to take out land which has an average yield of over fourteen bushels to the acre, you have to take out as well land which has had a crop failure. That is what is being done at the present time. That is the unfair part. I think it would be better to say that any section of land with a higher yield than fourteen bushels may be taken out of the eligible position. If you did that you would not be forced into the position of having to deprive people with a crop failure of a bonus in order to make up the nine sections. It would not cost the government more; if anything it would cost the government less.

Mr. GARDINER: The only further answer I can give my hon. friend is that that question has been brought up to me at at least a dozen different farm annual meetings, and they have always started just as the hon. member is starting. I have always convinced them that I was right, and I was right; I am quite sure I am right, and we intend to stay with it as long as we think I am right.

Mr. QUELCH: One other question. Has the minister ever given consideration to dividing the township into two categories, one of four bushels and the other of eight. This year for the first time I have had several townships referred to me where one-half had a yield of under four bushels and one-half of four to eight bushels, and they wanted to divide the township into two divisions so that one area could be paid for four bushels and the other area could be paid for eight bushels. Has that ever been considered?

Mr. GARDINER: It has been considered, but it has been decided in exactly the same way as other suggestions that we would take half of one township and add it on to the half of another and make a whole township. We would have to go over every section of the country and divide it all up and examine it from that point of view. That would increase the cost so much that I do not think it would help very many.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If the amendment is to be put, this is what is disturbing me. The rules provide that the Speaker or the Chairman may get the views of hon. members on this question. What I should like to know is whether this amendment will increase the expenditures.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I wish to refer you, Mr. Chairman, to the argument of the hon. member for Acadia who has just taken his seat. His argument was almost identical with that which I made in moving the amendment, namely, that it would reduce the inequalities now and pay awards to those who, I and all hon. members are agreed, are deserving of them.

My second point is that it does not, of necessity, increase any expenditure of money. With all due respect to what the Minister of Agriculture has said that ten or more agricultural bodies have met him and put up similar arguments to those put forward by the hon. member for Acadia, I for one disagree with him when he says he is right in his argument, because an award is made to a person who really has an income, having fourteen bushels or more on an average on his farm, and in certain instances a farmer who has a complete crop failure does not get an award. I think my motion, whether you rule it out of order or not or whether the government is prepared to accept it or not, is a reasonable one, and I maintain that it should be given consideration by the minister.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to support the amendment. I do not think it can be argued that it would mean an increase in government expenditure; I think it would mean the opposite.

Mr. GARDINER: It means expenditure, I do not know whether it is more or less. Let us look at this thing and be a little bit reasonable. The amendment says that you are going to strike out all the words in lines 5 and 11, both inclusive, from this bill. It starts with "where". Paragraph (a) is struck out.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Yes, but (a) is included in the amendment as drafted.

Mr. GARDINER: You have a new (a).

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: It has nothing whatever to do with the question that is being discussed here. Let me get the original bill and indicate to the hon. member the section which deals with the question he is trying to deal with in this amendment. It is section 3 of the original bill, not section 7. You are amending section 7. Section 3 of the original bill says that, subject to this act, the minister may in any crop year award to each person who was a farmer from the first day of May to the first day of November in such year a sum by way of assistance according to his cultivated land in any township with respect to which application for assistance has been made by the rural municipality in which that township is situated or in a case where no such rural municipality, by the government of the province in which the township is situated.

Subsection 2 provides the sum to be awarded by way of assistance under subsection 1, and paragraph (a) does not apply, because in this case the limit of eight to twelve bushels does not apply. Paragraph (b) provides that if the average yield of wheat in the township is more than four bushels and not more than eight bushels per acre, the award shall be $1.50 per acre. We have provided here how the payments must be made in all townships, and now you want to say in another section that payment is to be made in some other way. This is not the section that should be amended. All section 7 says is that you may take in nine or more sections along the edges of the whole area. Now you are going to take that out, so that the nine sections will not be eligible, and provide that anywhere in the whole district you must pay on a basis different from that provided in section 3.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The minister read section 3 of the original Prairie Farm Assistance Act of 1939. My amendment dealt with the bill now under consideration. The intent of the resolution is, of course, to do away with paragraph (a) and replace it with the amendment I moved, making an exception to the eligible blocks under paragraph (b) of section 7 on the basis indicated in the motion. So I think it is quite in order.

Amendment (Mr. McCullough, Assiniboia) negatived on division.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section as amended carry? Carried.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Are we now on section 3 or section 4?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Section 3 has been amended, and I declared it carried as amended.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The question I should like to ask applies to the other sections anyway. A short time ago the minister said he felt it was the responsibility of the provincial government concerned to look after those portions of the townships which could not qualify under the present act. As the scheme is now set up, the only levy made is the one per cent, all of which goes into the fund under this act. In other words, the provincial government does not participate in the levy. Would the minister recommend that in the event of the provinces concerned agreeing to look after these fringes, so to speak, which cannot qualify under the act, they would participate in the levy? Or would they impose a levy of their own? In other words, how would they set up a fund in order to have something with which to work in conjunction with this act?

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion I have made from time to time since 1939 is that the amount they put in should bear a proper relationship, having regard to the land involved, to the amount of money put up from the federal treasury. The amount collected should, of course, go into the general fund to deal with everything.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In other words, you would be asking the provincial governments to put up as their share as much money as the federal government does, exclusive of the prairie farm assistance fund?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not as much as we put up.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I mean in proportion.

Mr. GARDINER: We now put up two-thirds of all the money involved, but I would say we are covering 95 per cent of the land that might be affected. If that estimate is correct, then we would ask them to put up about five per cent of what we are putting up.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. GARDINER: It may be ten per cent or twelve per cent; I am guessing at it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It means that the provincial governments would have to accept responsibility for an amount equal to what the federal government would put up if they endeavoured to look after these fringes that do not qualify?

Mr. GARDINER: In proportion.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Levy of one per centum from purchase price of all grain purchased by licensees, etc.

Mrs. STRUM: I believe this is a very useful act, but I do not think it should be considered separately but rather as part of the whole program for agriculture. We have two other acts that have done a great deal for the western provinces, the P.F.R.A. and the wheat board act. We are beginning to eliminate the risks and provide ourselves with safeguards against emergencies. In effect, the long-term contracts are price insurance. The P.F.R.A. has helped us to insure a water supply. The dugouts all over the west have been a tremendous help in maintaining the livestock population, and under the P.F.R.A. we have taken a great deal of submarginal land out of production.

These things when integrated could work into a stabilization of our whole agricultural industry and help maintain a high level of prosperity and spending which would be a great aid to Canada's whole economy. I suggest to the minister that we extend this program to include the principle of insurance. I was interested the other evening to hear the Minister of Reconstruction outline the provisions of the amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act. As reported at page 2774 of Hansard he said:

> More than seventy different countries received a variety of agricultural products, raw materials, and manufactured goods from Canadian exporters, insured by the corporation.

Under that act we insure against such things as war, revolution and defaulting governments. If we can insure our exporters against risks of that kind, which include such tremendous upheavals as war and revolution; if we can insure our agricultural products when they reach the export stage, surely we can work out a system of crop insurance on the first level to cover the man who is actually in the business of producing. I do not think we should consider it too expensive a proposition to put on an actuarial basis. It would not be nearly as expensive as the loss of a crop is to an individual. Speaking as a farmer, I would much rather put in five or six bushels or more, when I had the bushels, than lose an entire crop and have nothing but the very small payment now being made under this act. I think it is only intelligent to put it on the basis of insurance and remove it from the category of relief, because it was originated with the idea of helping the farmers set up a system to pay for each other's relief and thus take us off the federal treasury.

I am glad the minister made a statement a few minutes ago as to the amount the government has put in. I do not think it is too much when one considers the contribution agriculture makes in this country, and the sacrifices agriculture has made in accepting lower prices when we might have had higher prices.

I think we have accepted the principle of insurance. We have unemployment insurance; we are considering health insurance, and we are also considering a contributory old age pension scheme. This may be slightly off the subject, but I think it is part of the argument. A contributory old age pension will be insurance against old age, and I think it is not too much to ask that we should begin now to put agriculture on an insurance basis, so that in years of crop failure we shall have more than a relief standard.

Mr. McKAY: There is one question I should like to ask the minister before this section is carried. It deals with a levy of one per cent that was deducted for the servicing of the act. I wish the minister would tell me whether any consideration has been given to the zoning of the province into high or low risk areas; because as he is quite aware, owing to climatic conditions there are such areas. While it might be difficult to zone the province, I think it would be quite feasible and it might result in a better reaction in the west with regard to these deductions which are being made.

Mr. GARDINER: I imagine that the hon. member was not in his seat when I spoke on second reading.

Mr. McKAY: Yes, I think I was.

Mr. GARDINER: I dealt fully with that question. If the hon. member will read Hansard, he will find that is so. It constituted most of the speech I made. I pointed out that the matter of making it possible to pay under this bill necessitated the widest base possible from which collections are to be made, and we have made that base the whole Dominion of Canada. In so far as the farmer himself is concerned, we have made the basis all the farmers in the west. Just as the hon. member for Souris pointed out, if you tried to make it any higher, and districts that are never going to collect would raise some objection, and naturally so. As long as you keep it to one per cent, they say: All right, we will go along with you. But when we start to make it five or six per cent, or get it up to twenty per cent or sixteen per cent which is necessary to carry it in the areas that are affected, we would run into trouble.

I cannot argue that question of insurance, because, when this bill was drafted, I was definitely told by every legal authority we are advised by, that we just cannot pass insurance legislation on a question of this kind. I took the matter into the senate. I was asked to go there myself. Mr. Meighen was the leader of the opposition in the senate, and the legal adviser to the senate was there. Mr. Meighen asked him the definite question. He said: Is this insurance? The legal adviser said that, in his opinion, it was not, and because of that he thought it was intra vires. It was on the strength of that advice that it got through the committee over in the senate, and finally through the senate itself and came back here. I am absolutely convinced from all I have had to do with it that we cannot bring in crop insurance.

The only other thing I can say about it is that for fifty years to my knowledge the farmers in western Canada asked for crop insurance; or rather for forty years up to about ten years ago, they asked for crop insurance and never were able to get it. When I came here I made up my mind that we would not talk about crop insurance but would talk about prairie farm assistance, and we got that inside of two years. I would rather take what we obtained after two years of discussion of something which can be given, than to go back and start talking about something which we talked about for forty years and could not get. I do not want to go back and talk about that.

[Mr. McKay.]

Mr. SINNOTT: This section makes provision for the further collection of money—and I raised this point this afternoon—whereby the dominion government is taking care of anything up to a township. The provision here now is to deduct from the mills. While the farmers paying into this fund are subject to that with regard to the areas not coming under the dominion government would the minister consider giving a grant to the provincial government to take care of this matter of the smaller parts?

Mr. GARDINER: We are asking the exact opposite. We are asking the provincial governments to give us a grant in order to help take care of them.

Mr. SINNOTT: Those farmers are already paying in. You do not want them to pay twice.

Mr. GARDINER: They are already paying in, but they are paying in one-third of what they can draw. We are suggesting to the provinces that, since we are taking care of the six-mile square lots and the quarter township alongside of it, the provincial government should step in and help to take care of the small section. We say: If you come in and contribute proportionately to what we are contributing for the large areas, then we are quite prepared to carry the whole thing along under this act.

Mrs. STRUM: In answer to the minister's argument, I want to point out several things we have achieved in Canada in the way of over-all security, in spite of constitutional difficulties. According to the British North America Act, health is a matter in which the provinces have complete jurisdiction. The same thing is true with regard to labour. Yet we have achieved, through conferences and agreements of various kinds, a large share of the federal government's jurisdiction in matters of social insurance, health and so on. As a matter of fact—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mrs. STRUM: Coming back to this bill, the thing I wish to illustrate is that we did not leave it on the basis of our original decision.

Mr. GARDINER: We did not here either.

Mrs. STRUM: The point the minister was making was that, because in the beginning

Mr. Meighen or someone else said we could not go into crop insurance, then we can never go into crop insurance.

Mr. GARDINER: May I just explain? I should like to get this bill through, but I shall take only a few minutes. If we were trying to have our authority over insurance law amended—it is one thing to say you can amend the constitution; but I was in the provincial house for a long time and in the provincial house we had a great deal to do with insurance legislation—I am satisfied that the insurance companies across this country would not consent to our being given all the control over insurance. If we start out with that objective of taking control over insurance before helping farmers, the farmers will never get anything.

Mrs. STRUM: Are the insurance companies the government?

Mr. GARDINER: No, they are not; but they have influence in nine provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do they?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. It is a well-known fact that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under discussion. The clause under discussion does not deal with insurance.

Mrs. STRUM: The point I wish to make is that we are not bound to this quantity or this percentage of contribution; that we have in large areas of government made adjustments between provincial rights and federal rights. I do not see that the life insurance companies are mentioned in this section. I see nothing about the life insurance companies, and yet they were dragged in during the last two or three minutes. I do not see that we have any concern for life insurance companies in our crop insurance plan. We are considering the ability of the farmer to protect himself against risks. I submit that we could extend this act, just as we have extended so many other kinds of legislation, by agreement between the provinces and the federal government; just as we have done with regard to unemployment, which is a labour problem, and which, under the constitution, is dealt with by provincial legislation; and just as we shall do one of these days with health insurance which is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I submit that we could extend this act to set up a graduated scale of contributions whereby those areas with the greatest risks would contribute most, just as we do with life insurance. You do not insure at the same rate if you are twenty years of age as you do if you are older.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes, I know, Mr. Chairman. But on the same basis this insurance could be on the basis of graduated risks; if it were on that basis, I do not think you would have the objection there is from those areas where there is less risk, and I think there would be much greater support for the act.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sitting.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that only one word was changed, "eligible" to "ineligible", could third reading not be given now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On Monday we shall consider in committee of the whole Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then we shall proceed with the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Dominion Elections Act; Bill No. 35, respecting the provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States; the bill concerning amendments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; Bill No. 9, to amend the Northwest Territories Act; Bill No. 11, to amend the Dominion Water Powers Act, and finally the resolution in the name of the Postmaster General concerning the Supplemental Payments Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 26, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

THE KING AND QUEEN

CONGRATULATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MARRIAGE OF THEIR MAJESTIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of the house are aware, our King and Queen are celebrating today their silver wedding anniversary. It will be the desire of all citizens of Canada to have congratulations and good wishes extended to Their Majesties on this occasion. I can think of no more appropriate manner of so doing than by resolutions of both houses of parliament conveying expressions of loyalty, devotion and affection toward the King and Queen from the people's representatives in parliament assembled.

I have had a word with my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bracken), and he has kindly agreed to join with me in a resolution of which we have both approved, and which I shall move in just a moment. Let me only mention that never before in the history of our parliament has there been an occasion when it was possible to pass a congratulatory address upon the day of the silver wedding anniversary of the reigning sovereigns. When King George V and Queen Mary celebrated their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary the parliament of Canada was not in session. King Edward VII and Queen Alexandra celebrated their silver wedding anniversary before King Edward VII ascended the throne. Because of the untimely death of the Prince Consort which occurred before the twenty-fifth anniversary of the marriage of His Royal Highness to Queen Victoria there was no opportunity to extend such an address. These circumstances lend a note of added significance to the opportunity which is ours today. I am sure it is one that will be welcomed in all parts of our country, and by none more than by those of us who are representatives of the people in parliament.

I accordingly move, seconded by Mr. Bracken, the Leader of the Opposition:

That an humble address be presented to Their Majesties, the King and Queen, in the following words:

Most Gracious Sovereigns:

We, Your Majesties' loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, beg to offer our sincere congratulations to Your Majesties on the 25th anniversary of your marriage.

As members of the Parliament of Canada, we are happy to avail ourselves of this anniversary to express the warmth of the feelings cherished towards Your Majesties by the Canadian people. Your devotion to each other, the exemplary character of your family life, and your unfailing consecration to public service through years alike of war and peace, have been an inspiration to your subjects everywhere.

We trust that Your Majesties may long be spared to share the happiness of life together, and to enjoy the affection of your peoples in all parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

I would ask that when this resolution is passed a copy of the resolution be cabled to Their Majesties by Your Honour, also that the cable be later supplemented by a copy of the resolution suitably engrossed and bound as a permanent memento of the expressions of the Canadian people toward Their Majesties, King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, at this time.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion just moved by the Prime Minister is one with which I am sure every hon. member of this house will be in hearty agreement. I rise only to associate myself formally with it as seconder.

The silver wedding anniversary of our King and Queen serves to remind us that the crown in British commonwealth countries is one of the few remaining evidences of unity that we have, perhaps the best remaining one.

Fortunately the royal family has set us an example of family life and public service which has gained for them the respect and admiration of us all. At a time when certain political and social institutions are crumbling, and when other monarchies are falling, the British crown has emerged with a reputation enhanced throughout the world and more strongly enshrined in the hearts of the people than ever before.

Under such circumstances—on behalf of my associates, and I am sure I speak, as the Prime Minister has done, for all members of the house—we join with all the other members in offering congratulations to the King and Queen on the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding, and in wishing for them many more years of life together in which to serve their people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have spoken for all members of the house on this occasion, and we of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation wish to associate ourselves with the motion and the congratulations to Their Majesties.

May I take this opportunity of pointing out that a few days ago we celebrated another anniversary, that of the Prime Minister of Canada in exceeding the record of Sir Robert Walpole for long tenure of office as Prime Minister of Great Britain. What an extraordinary thing it is that throughout the last two centuries the British monarchy has remained a symbol of our unity and of the privileges and liberties which the parliaments of the commonwealth have won for us all. Because Their Majesties are symbolic of this unity and this great progressive democratic tradition, it is with pleasure that we join the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in this message of congratulations and good wishes.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in this expression of our good will and congratulations to Their Majesties the King and Queen on the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding day.

I speak for all in the Social Credit group when I say that we are deeply mindful of the high place which the King and Queen hold in the hearts of the people of this country and of the commonwealth as a whole. We wish for them long life and a continuation of the splendid example which as the royal family they have set to all the people of the commonwealth.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the house express its approval of the resolution by joining in singing God Save the King.

The members rose and sang

God Save the King and at the Prime Minister's suggestion, three cheers were given for the King and Queen.

[Mr. Bracken.]

TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE

EXPRESSION OF THANKS OF VISITING PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege, in the name of those members who accepted the invitation of the board of trade of the City of Toronto through its worthy president, Mr. Hugh H. Lawson, to visit the Queen City under its auspices on the 24th and 25th of this month, I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the House of Commons to express the thankfulness and appreciation of the many members of the house, representing every province and every political group in this assembly, who accepted the invitation.

No expression of gratitude on my part could properly record our appreciation of the warm and cordial reception we were accorded by everyone, the friendliness of our hosts, and the interesting instructive program which most delightfully guided all our activities during our sojourn, and which was expertly scheduled and smoothly and beneficially implemented.

The same sentiments are also gratefully expressed to the mayor of Toronto, Mr. Hiram McCallum, and to the city of Toronto for their welcome and the banquet at which we were guests last Saturday evening.

Our thanks are also extended to the officials of the Toronto Transportation Commission for their most instructive demonstration dealing with civic improvements and rapid transit. Special mention should be made of the excellent transportation facilities which were provided for us and which we thoroughly enjoyed throughout the trip.

I should also like to express our most sincere appreciation to Mr. Thomas Rennie, former chairman of the Toronto Harbour Commission, and to the commission itself, for the information they provided us, the well-planned tour of the harbour by boat, and the luncheon given to us yesterday.

We express our most sincere gratitude also for the warm and gracious hospitality extended to us at a reception given by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, Hon. Ray Lawson, and Mrs. Lawson, at their Oakville residence.

I also wish to express well deserved thanks to all the federal members representing the city of Toronto and adjacent districts, and their wives, for the courtesies and attentions they bestowed upon us on all occasions.

We cannot let this opportunity pass without making reference to one of our members who by his constructive contributions to civic and national welfare has left a deep imprint upon the hearts and minds of the citizens of his city, of which he had been the mayor for seven consecutive years; and he has been a active representative in this parliament almost continuously since 1921. We all realize that he is a peer among his people, and that he is held in the highest respect and affection by all. He was our constant companion, giving us practical and illuminating information on civic matters, and, by his wide experience and enthusiasm, inculcating in our minds a better knowledge and understanding of the problems and aspirations of the fine progressive people of the city he serves so well, in both the civic and the federal field. I refer, as all members know, to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

I feel that we should be remiss in our duty if we did not express to you, Mr. Speaker, our sincere admiration for the delicate, efficient and eloquent manner in which you expressed your sentiments when on several occasions you were called upon to speak. The spontaneous and prolonged applause you received in every instance from all your listeners was ample evidence of the impression made upon them by the words spoken by you in our behalf.

As a result of this journey we know that section of the country better than we did before, and there is no doubt that such contacts make all of us feel more friendly toward the people of the splendid city we had the good fortune to visit under such pleasant and efficient auspices, and a little closer to them than ever before.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in order to make it unanimous, having been privileged to accompany the delegation to the city of Toronto, I should like to add a word of appreciation of the courtesies and hospitality we received from the Toronto board of trade, the city council, the Toronto harbour commission, the Toronto Transportation Commission, and all their officials, who contributed to making this a most educational and entertaining visit.

We spent two delightful days in the city, well on into the evening and night, and those who were able to rise early on Sunday morning and go out and inspect the new Sunnybrook veterans hospital found it an experience well worthwhile.

I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house, but I wish to endorse all that the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has said, and to express our unanimous thanks to all those who had so well planned and organized our visit. In saying that I am sure that I speak for all hon. members As one who comes from the far distant prairie provinces may I say that the visit has given me a much better understanding of the problems of this great Canadian nation.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to move an amendment, but I should like to say that we of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation also want to make it unanimous. We should like to be associated with the expressions of appreciation that have already been uttered by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). We all enjoyed the week end immensely, and are grateful for the hospitality shown us.

I should also like to join with the hon. member for Cochrane and say that we of this group, as well as hon. members from all parts of the house, were proud of Your Honour on the occasions on which you were indeed our spokesman. I think Your Honour would probably wish me to add that we were proud last night of the hon. member for Cochrane when you called upon him to be the spokesman for us on one occasion.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those who have already spoken in appreciation of the splendid entertainment which was provided for us in Toronto. It is a matter of much satisfaction that on such an occasion all parties could meet on a non-partisan basis in the city of Toronto on the invitation of the board of trade. That all parties were very efficiently represented was indicated by the large number of members of all groups who were present.

Special appreciation should be expressed to the city of Toronto for the manner in which they carried out their entertainment program. It was gratifying to all of us who were there to see the way in which the city of Toronto entertained the federal members regardless of party lines.

The members of this party would like to join with those who have already spoken in extending our thanks and appreciation.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

NORTH FRASER—SUBSTITUTION OF CITY OF VANCOUVER FOR MUNICIPALITIES OF SOUTH VANCOUVER AND POINT GREY

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 208 (from the senate) to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

CONSOLIDATION OF PARK DESCRIPTIONS—REGULATIONS EFFECTIVE WHEN PUBLISHED IN "CANADA GAZETTE"

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HEALTH AND WELFARE—CHILD AND MATERNAL DIVISION—PUBLICATIONS

Mr. ROSS (Hamilton East):

What publications are distributed by the child and maternal health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. MARTIN: No publications are distributed by the child and maternal health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The responsibility for the production and distribution of all health education material rests with the information services division of the department, and distribution of most books, pamphlets, folders, posters and other similar material is normally made through the provincial departments of health. Where the provincial departments have active divisions of health education the best possible use of such material can be made when it is placed in the hands of public health nurses and medical health officers who are directly in touch with the public, or when distributed through well-baby clinics, health units, child guidance clinics, etc., etc.

Many publications of the Department of National Health and Welfare have to do with the health and welfare of mothers and young children. Chief among such publications is the 232-page book "Canadian Mother and Child" written by the chief of the child and maternal health division, over 800,000 copies of which have been distributed to expectant mothers and others interested in child care.

Booklets, pamphlets and posters published by the department include the following:

"Healthful Living"; "Your Baby's Teeth"; "Your Child's Teeth".

Pamphlets dealing with dental hygiene;

"Polio": A leaflet dealing with infantile paralysis;

"Let's Talk Food Mother"; "Mother! The School Lunch". Pamphlets on nutrition.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

"A Children's Charter". A booklet on Family Allowances in Canada.

A set of six posters on immunization.

A series of folders on child training, originally produced and distributed by the Canadian welfare council and now taken over by the Department of National Health and Welfare, is being revised and reprinted for general distribution through provincial channels. Already published are three in this series entitled:

"Obedience: How Can I Teach My Child to Obey?" "Bed-Wetting: How Can I Correct My Child's Habit?" "Feeding Habits: How Can I Guide My Child's Eating?"

Three others in this series will be issued very shortly, as follows:

"Temper: How Can I Control My Child's Outbursts?" "Fear: What Makes My Child Afraid and Nervous?" "Sex: What Should I Tell My Child?"

A new folder devoted to child and maternal health, which will be appearing soon, is entitled "Ten Points to Remember—Before and After Baby Comes". This is intended as complementary material for distribution when the department's films on child and maternal health, "Mother and Her Child" and "Know Your Baby" and the filmstrips—"Nine to Get Ready" and "Introducing Baby" are being shown.

FLOOD CONDITIONS—TORONTO AREA

Mr. CHURCH:

Regarding the great damage to the federal Department of Public Works breakwater at Wards to Centre Island, Toronto Island, has the district engineer of the department yet reported on this, and what action is being taken to remedy the damage?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes, report dated April 23, 1948. No action is being taken to remedy damage, as recent examination revealed that no damage whatever had been sustained.

AFTON-BAYFIELD-SUMMERSIDE RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What is the government's policy in regard to the establishment of rural mail routes?

2. Are the wishes of the majority of the patrons respected?

3. On whose recommendation was the Afton-Bayfield-Summerside, in Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, scheme proposed or inaugurated?

4. Is it the intention of the postal department to establish this rural route in opposition to the wishes of the vast majority of the people served?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Rural mail routes are established in reasonably well settled rural areas to provide an improved standard of postal service commensurate with the requirements of the community.

2. Rural mail delivery service is not placed in operation until at least fifty per cent of the eligible residents have purchased and erected rural mail delivery boxes.

3. Action in this case was taken on a report of the post office inspector based on representations of Mr. J. R. Kirk, M.P.

4. Rural routes are never established in opposition to the wishes of the people.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES—VETERANS WITH CHILDREN

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many veterans receiving war veterans' allowances have children who are minors? How many minors does this grouping embrace?

2. How many T.B. patients receive war veterans' allowances? How many children are there in the families of such T.B. patients?

Mr. GREGG:

1. Records are not maintained to reflect the answers to this question, as war veterans' allowance is not paid in respect of minor children as such, except orphans. War veterans' allowance is paid at higher rates to married recipients whether or not they have children, and irrespective of the number thereof. War veterans' allowance is also paid at higher rates to a widowed recipient (a widower or widow), having dependent children, irrespective of their number.

2. Records are not maintained to reflect the answers to this question as, in the case of a veteran under the age of sixty, war veterans' allowance is awarded on the basis of established incapacity, regardless of the nature of the disabling condition, and, in the case of a veteran over sixty, the question of disability is not a determining factor.

WHEAT PRODUCERS CERTIFICATES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the total number and amount, by provinces, of wheat producers certificates covering the wheat crops of each of the years 1943 and 1944 that have not been presented for payment to the wheat board?

2. What is being done to ascertain the identity of the persons entitled to such unpaid certificates?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 1943 Crop	Bushels	Value	% Unpaid	Number of Prod. Certs.* (estimate)
Manitoba	2,885,198-05	$ 340,511 03	7·95	24,944
Saskatchewan	10,660,263-10	1,331,549 14	6·18	97,552
Alberta and B.C.....	7,805,234-55	1,038,660 60	9·55	76,104
	21,350,696-10	$2,710,720 77	7·38	198,600
1944 Crop
Manitoba	4,461,677-30	$ 833,961 33	10·63	25,623
Saskatchewan	16,898,590-30	3,174,364 49	7·73	97,519
Alberta and B.C.....	11,459,272-30	2,147,024 59	12·56	65,958
	32,819,540-30	$6,155,350 41	9·32	189,100

The above figures are as at March 31, 1948.

* The number of producers certificates outstanding is an estimated figure, as an actual count was not made, but the figures stated are approximately correct for all practical purposes.

2. The producers concerned have not yet been contacted directly regarding certificates outstanding in their favour for two main reasons—

(a) Both accounts are still very active, as during the month of March we dealt with approximately 2,500 claims (1943 crop) and 8,000 (1944 crop).

(b) A very large percentage of the outstanding certificates are being held by the producers concerned until such time as they elect to forward them for payment, and only a comparatively small number are actually lost certificates.

By circular to elevator agents, reference was made to both crop years and the quantities and relative amount outstanding. A poster was subsequently supplied to all elevator agents. Producers who were holding 1943 and/or 1944 crop certificates were specifically requested to forward them to this office for settlement.

At a later date, when the accounts become less active and the volume of outstanding certificates is reduced, the producers concerned will be contacted individually by means of a form letter. In the meantime, when we receive definite advice that certain certificates have been lost or mislaid, the producer concerned is forwarded a "Lost certificate application form" which, when returned completed, is authorized for payment without delay.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—VIOLATIONS OF REGULATIONS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many persons have been prosecuted for violation of the family allowances' regulations since the family allowance act came into effect?
2. How many convictions were obtained?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Eight.
2. Seven convictions have been obtained to date; one pending.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASE NECESSARY TO PRODUCE EVEN BALANCE SHEET

Mr. ISNOR:

(1)
Based on the volume of freight traffic and the cost of operations in 1947, what percentage increase in freight rates was necessary to bring about an even balance sheet—(a) to the Canadian National Railways; (b) to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

(2)
1. What was the volume of freight traffic in the Atlantic region of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1947?
2. What was the cost of operation?
3. What percentage increase in freight rates was necessary to bring about an even balance sheet?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would ask that these two questions be passed as orders for returns. The railways do not operate their accounts on a cost accounting basis, separating their expenses between their passenger, mail and express, etc.; therefore it is impossible to give the information asked for by the hon. gentleman. What we can do is to file exhibits covering, in part, some of the things asked for, which was given at the hearings in the freight rates case, if that is satisfactory to the hon. gentleman.

FILM BOARD—OFFICES, AGENCIES AND STUDIOS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Does the national film board maintain any agencies, offices or studios in Canada, other than those offices and studios, etc., in Ottawa?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

2. If so, where are these offices, agencies or studios located?
3. Does the national film board pay the rent of the premises occupied by the above, and if so, what rental is paid for each property?
4. If the national film board does not pay the rental of these properties, give name of department paying rent, or upkeep, and the amount of rent, or upkeep, of each agency, office or studio.

REPRESENTATION—ADDITION OF MACKENZIE DISTRICT TO YUKON

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Did not residents of the district of Mackenzie and of Yukon Territory petition parliament or the government not to add Mackenzie district to Yukon?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

WARTIME TAX AGREEMENTS

Mr. FAIR:

1. What amount of taxes has been collected each year from each province under the wartime tax agreements?
2. What amount has been paid to each province each year as a result of the above mentioned agreement?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many veterans of great war I took out loans under the soldier settlement board scheme?
2. What is the total amount of loans extended?
3. What is the total amount of interest accrued from the inception of the scheme to December 31, 1947?
4. What rate of interest was charged?
5. What rate was paid by the government for use of this credit?
6. From whom was it obtained?
7. What amount of (a) principal; (b) interest, was repaid up to December 31, 1947?
8. What amounts were cancelled under the different legislation?
9. What was the total still outstanding at December 31, 1947, of (a) principal; (b) interest?
10. Since the scheme became operative until December 31 last, how many settlers (a) signed quit claim deeds; (b) were served with 30-day notices to vacate?
11. How many settlers still were in debt to the board at December 31, last?
12. How many of those are over 70 years of age?

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—EMPLOYEES

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. What was the total number of employees employed by the federal government as of March 31, 1948?
2. What was the total salaries of these employees as of March 31, 1948?
3. What is the number of employees in each department of government and the total salaries paid in each department?

4. What are the names of the existing crown commercial corporations or boards of the federal government as of March 31, 1948, and what (a) is the number of employees in each and the total salaries paid; (b) are the names of the directors or administrators and the salaries paid each?

WHEAT BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

OATS AND BARLEY—DECISION IN CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD VS. HALLETT AND CAREY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) two or three days ago, but to which at that time the ministry was not in a position to answer.

In view of the press reports on the judgment of Chief Justice E. K. Williams of the Court of King's Bench of the province of Manitoba, in which the chief justice held invalid the powers exercised by the government with respect to barley under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, I desire to ask two questions. First, is the government taking steps to have the judgment appealed, and second, what effect will the judgment have on existing controls that derive their validity from the same act?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, instructions have been given to appeal from the judgment of Chief Justice Williams. In answer to the second question I would say that, so far as I can ascertain, the judgment has no effect on existing controls that derive their validity from this act. The validity of the act itself was affirmed by Chief Justice Williams. The authority of the governor in council to pass a certain order in council appropriating property was denied in the judgment of Mr. Justice Williams. But I am not aware of any prejudicial effect upon any other controls.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did not that judgment decide that the bare reference in an order in council that an emergency existed was not of itself sufficient to permit emergency legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot discuss the judgment here, and therefore I am unable to answer the hon. member's question. Probably the answer would have to be given with many qualifications, if I did attempt to answer it. But I am answering the question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), whether the effect of this judgment is to unsettle existing controls. My answer is that I think not.

PENITENTIARIES

BREAKOUT AT KINGSTON—REQUEST FOR ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, arising out of the murderous breakout today in Kingston penitentiary, following as it does so quickly on the recent successful breakaway. Does the minister intend to have an investigation made and drastic measures taken to prevent such things from recurring?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to get a full report on the circumstances. The convicts who broke out this morning at 9.40 have been apprehended by the penitentiary staff who pursued and caught them, and who have them in custody at the present time. Nevertheless it may be that a careful investigation is indicated.

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LAST DATE FOR FILING RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that rural law offices and auditors' offices are overwhelmed by requests from farmers to assist them in connection with their income tax returns would the government consider extending the date for the final filing of the returns so that the returns may be completed?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any authority at the present time for extending the final date at which returns must be made. I have not had notification of the question; but if there is any change from the usual procedure it will be announced.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue, and I do so because of the number of communications I have received from central and southern Alberta. In view of the fact that, according to this morning's paper, there is another tremendous storm reaching from central Alberta to within fifty miles of the United States border, will the minister give consideration to postponing the date of returning income tax forms? I can assure him that the roads in many sections during February and March, and even now, have been impassable; and they will continue of course under present conditions.

I make the request seriously because I know many people are anxious to make their returns, and if they cannot do so will be subject to severe penalty.

Mr. McCANN: In view of the representations made by the hon. member, and of the extraordinarily bad conditions which appear to have obtained in the last month or so, I shall certainly bring to the attention of the government the matter about which he has spoken, and will later indicate the decision arrived at.

Mr. COLDWELL: Saskatchewan and Manitoba are in the same position.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall send the minister one letter which I have on my file.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF BROADCAST BY MR. CLAXTON

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a question on a matter of privilege, rather than to make an inquiry of the government. I wish to lodge a protest in connection with certain matters precedent to the calling of the committee on house rules, which is to be convened for the first time tomorrow.

As Your Honour very well knows, the idea behind the calling of that committee was that it should consist of as few members as possible, and that those members should be as representative as they could be, having in mind certain circumstances and conditions in connection with the political parties. Two members of the committee were to be from the government, one from the Progressive Conservative party, one from the C.C.F., and one from the Social Credit party. At best, the getting of agreement on certain necessary changes in house procedure and rules will be difficult enough. But, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in a broadcast which was reported in the press on Friday—I could scarcely believe it, or I would have raised the question then—puts entirely upon the Progressive Conservative party the blame for the necessity for revising those rules, then I must protest. And more than that, I say to the minister that, after all, if he wishes to beat his leadership drums around through the country, or on the air or elsewhere, I do not want him to do so at the expense of trying to get agreement while the rules committee is sitting. If that is to be the attitude of the government, they can get ready for a first-class fight when the committee convenes tomorrow.

SOLDIER SETTLERS

REQUEST FOR CLEAR TITLE TO VETERANS WITH UNPAID BALANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, today the Prime Minister moved a motion extending felicitations to Their Majesties the King and Queen upon the celebration of their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary, after which the members joined lustily in singing God Save the King. A little later, well-merited thanks were extended to the Toronto board of trade and others in that city for their hospitality on the occasion of a visit of parliamentarians to Toronto. Since coming into the house I have had handed to me a copy of the Western Producer, which contains a letter dated April 22 over the signature of Walter Tucker, House of Commons, in which he deals with the question of clear title to soldier settlers. I wish to read three or four lines from the letter, and then to ask a question.

This is in reply to a letter entitled "Tucker and the Veterans" which appeared in a former issue of the Western Producer. It says:

> If he is I can only say to him that I have urged, and am continuing to urge, that these old S.S.B. accounts should be settled on an individual basis so that in those cases which warranted it clear title could be given for a further perhaps nominal payment, and other cases adjusted accordingly on a fair and generous basis.

I want to ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs if they will be good enough at this session—not later—to see that all those 3,000 veterans are granted clear title, without delay. I do not want the House of Commons to have to rise and sing God save our old soldier settlers of great war I. Let us give them clear titles instead. May I ask the minister for an answer?

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall study carefully the question asked by the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CHANGES AT NO. 5 EQUIPMENT DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. I would ask him what action his department has taken with regard to No. 5 equipment depot which would warrant the headlines in the local papers and warrant local radio announcements referring to the closing of that depot.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, No. 5 equipment depot has an establishment of nine officers, 137 other ranks and 221 civilians. That establishment is being reduced to eight officers, 102 other ranks and 195 civilians, largely due to the removal of the instrument repair section consisting of one officer and 11 other ranks. The purpose of its being moved is to promote efficiency and economy by putting that section in close working arrangement with the corresponding civilian industry and also to put it in a centre of population, industry and military activity in Ontario.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTRIBUTIONS, PROCEDURE, OFFENCES AND PENALTIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Exempted persons.

Mr. KNOWLES: The other night at a previous stage of this bill the minister indicated that he had an open mind on one question that I brought to his attention. The question had to do with the request of certain labour bodies that provision be made for three umpires instead of one. I see no provision for that in the amending bill now before us; hence my question at this time. Can the minister say whether further consideration has geen given to this request, and if so, with what result?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): While it is true that I said I had an open mind on the matter, I should like to point out to my friend that sometimes all wisdom does not necessarily come from national organizations or national political parties. The resolution to which he refers came, I believe, from the Winnipeg trades and labour council. Provision is made in section 53 of the legislation giving the commission power to appoint additional umpires, or deputy umpires, as they call them. But the commission is of the opinion at the moment that the volume of work is not of sufficient magnitude to warrant the appointment of additional deputy umpires. Last year the umpire dealt with 136 cases. While it is a matter of judgment and opinion, I still think there is something to be said for one umpire, where you do not get a difference of opinion in interpretation of these problem cases. My hon. friend may rest assured that should the volume of work become such that the commission and the government feel it is necessary to appoint deputy umpires in order to expedite the work of the commission, we shall be glad to do it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then I can take it as definite that no change in the act itself is needed in order to make this possible?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. Section 53 permits the appointment of deputy umpires. That had slipped my mind. It is already provided for in the act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to thank hon. members for the quick passage of this bill. The work which has been put into its preparation in the last twelve months is, I think, appreciated by the committee.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): All good legislation gets the same treatment.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of the appreciation just expressed by the minister, might I suggest to him that he refrain from asking for third reading today.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, certainly.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASE IN SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

He said: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is to be referred to a special committee of the house after second reading. A special committee has been set up to consider it.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I know it is to be referred to the committee, Mr. Speaker, but is it in order to make comments at this time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will not be long, Your Honour. I have had a great deal to do with election acts. I am thoroughly familiar with the election acts of all the democracies, particularly those of the British empire. I am glad to say that on the whole the Dominion Elections Act, which came from the committee and is going back there, is in my opinion the best election act in any of our democracies. I do not say it is perfect, but it is better than any other act in operation in any component part of the British empire. It is a monument to our chief electoral officer, who has studied election acts more than anyone else I know of. He was a very great help to the committee, as was also the chairman. I did not notice the hon. gentleman in the house, but I can repeat that statement. He was an excellent chairman and kept the committee going forward all the time.

I might mention just one or two things the act does, which lead me to say it is a most excellent piece of legislation. In some parts of Canada when an election occurs we may have both fast and slow time. The act now makes it specific that at all times during an election standard time governs. I believe that is something new.

The part of the act dealing with advance polls has been improved to permit sailors, mounted policemen and government officials who are to be absent on government work, to use them, all of which should have been done in previous acts. It seems to me that for years the chief electoral officer has been keeping notes of things that should be done to bring the act right up to the minute, and so far as I have observed he has not left out anything. It was not his fault we did not adopt the Quebec system of manning and conducting the polls. I brought up the matter, but the committee did not see fit to adopt the suggestion. I believe it would have been an improvement, and when the act is again revised I hope the Quebec system will be followed. There the government of the day names the returning officer, while the party receiving the next highest vote names the clerk. I have advocated that for years in this house. I am not now going to complain because my suggestion was not adopted; I am satisfied to let it go through as it is, but on another occasion I hope we may be big enough and broad enough to adopt this change. It simply means that you take politics right out of the polls, and it would obviate the necessity of other parties having scrutineers, because with two parties represented there would not be much chance of crooked work.

Another provision in the act permits all Japanese who served in our forces during the last war to vote. Not only that; they are accorded the same privilege that our own people are given, namely that their wives may vote as well. I am convinced that this is a step in the right direction. The same thing applies to Indians, of whom several thousand served in the last war. Those Indians and their wives are also permitted to vote. The Indian committee has not yet reported to the house; we do not know what they will recommend in reference to permitting all Indians to vote, so I am not going to offer any comment on that at the moment.

Another clause permits all veterans of the late war under twenty-one years of age at the time of the election to vote. I believe that also is a step in the right direction. Perhaps by the time an election comes along there will not be any veterans less than twenty-one years of age; but if there are, they too will be able to vote.

Another section deals with students at universities or colleges. If they are registered at the university or college on the day of the issue of the writ they will have the privilege of registering to vote either in their home ridings or at the university or college they are attending. In the past many students have been barred from voting merely because they were away from home at the time of the enumeration.

Another provision which I think is very good pertains to soldiers in hospitals. A soldier is allowed to choose whether he will register in the riding in which the hospital is located or have his vote transferred to his home riding.

One section perhaps will need some amending; that is the section which refers to contract workers away from home. I know the chief electoral officer has been written to about it. At the moment it is not quite clear, but I am satisfied the committee will rectify that and make it possible for persons working in ridings in which by-elections are to be held, to vote there if they were residing in that riding at the time of the issue of the writ.

I like the section referring to enumerators; it really is to the credit of the chief returning officer. When the enumeration is taking place two enumerators shall be appointed, one by the government of the day and one by the party which had the next highest number of votes in that riding. This will not mean that all parties will be represented in the enumeration, but one of the enumerators will be appointed by the government and the other by one of the other parties; and the act has been amended to provide that the enumerators will have to do their job. We had instances in connection with the enumeration in the last election where one of the two enumerators might say, "I have to go down town for the afternoon. You go ahead with the enumeration." That sort of thing will be stopped now, and the enumerators will be compelled to go in pairs and stay on the job until it is done properly. This is another step in the right direction.

I want to say just a word about the riding of Yukon-Mackenzie, though I do not know whether we can do anything about it. We did thresh out that question thoroughly in committee, but we were not unanimous on it. Some of us felt that Yukon-Mackenzie is really an impossible riding for size. It covers over 700,000 square miles and consists of two very large areas. The activities of Yukon are not in any way related to the activities of the Mackenzie district, and there is no connection between them by air, road or railway. I cannot see how in the world any candidate can contest that riding. I have been over it myself, and I know. You cannot go straight through the Mackenzie area to Yukon. I flew there in a powerful American plane. It had to go over two high ranges of mountains, flying sometimes at an altitude of eight to nine thousand feet, and I do not think ordinary commercial planes can do that. Anyone going from the Yellowknife to the Yukon would have to go away south and then come north again; therefore I do not know how in the world the candidates contesting an election in the Yukon-Mackenzie riding can get around the riding.

The people in that area are strongly opposed to this. I am not speaking now in the expectation that anything can be done, but I would remind the house that a census will be taken in 1951, only three years hence. Then there will be a redistribution, and I hope that at that time the committee dealing with redistribution will give direct representation to the people in the Mackenzie district, as well as to those in the Yukon. As I said, the people up there are opposed to these two areas being put together.

I think I should place on Hansard what the local paper in Yellowknife has to say. I should like to quote from the Yellowknife Blade of April 5, 1948, the editor of which is John Murray McMeekan. He has been a stout advocate of separate representation for these two areas.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member confine his remarks to the principle of this bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not have to read this editorial, because I know what is in it. This editor points out that there is nothing in common between the two areas.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that we are discussing the second reading of a bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of that bill. He will have an opportunity to discuss the bill in detail when it has reached the committee stage.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not continue, because I have no intention of holding up the bill. I am on the committee and I shall reiterate in the committee what I have had to say here.

I will close by saying that I think the country is to be complimented upon having such an excellent chief electoral officer.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the committee will deal with the section relating to Indians and Eskimos. Five thousand of these men fought in the first world war and even more in the second. They should be treated as human beings and given the full rights of citizens. I hope that when the committee considers the bill this section will be dealt with.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the minister has said that this bill will be referred to the committee, but I am almost certain that I shall not be a member of that committee. I have glanced over the bill and I cannot find any provision for the transferable vote in single constituencies. This has been a strong contention of mine, although I know that some hon. members do not agree with me.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am absolutely opposed to it. I hope there will never be anything like that in the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I want to repeat what I have said in many past sessions and point out what may be the result in this country if we do not make provision for the transferable vote in single constituencies. In the federal election of 1940 seventy-four members out of 245 were returned to this house with minority votes of their constituencies. In the 1945 general election approximately 150 members out of 245 were returned to this house with minority votes in their constituencies. I submit that before a member is finally declared elected he or she should have in the transfer at least a majority of the votes cast in the riding.

This principle has been in operation for many years in Manitoba and I believe also in Alberta. If anyone wishes to study the acts and how they work out he can confer with the officials in those provinces.

I trust that the members of the committee which will be studying the act will consider this matter very seriously.

I can picture the possibility in the future of a government coming into office after obtaining only a small percentage of the votes cast. I am democratic enough to say that I would be satisfied if even an extreme socialist government came into power provided they had obtained a majority of the votes cast at the time they were elected. I do not think we should make it possible for a government to be brought into power with perhaps only a quarter or a third of the votes cast. I am thinking of the years ahead when such a thing might easily be possible.

I hope that the members of this committee will give serious consideration to providing for the transferable vote in single constituencies.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say on the second reading of this bill. While we in this corner generally approve most of the amendments provided by this bill, we were disappointed last year because the voting age was not reduced to eighteen years. I hope that the committee which is to consider the bill will reconsider its attitude in this particular matter and provide that the age qualification be so reduced.

I shall repeat in committee the plea which I made last year in this particular regard. I feel that persons eighteen years of age who are old enough to don a uniform and fight for this country ought to be considered old enough to exercise the franchise. Since the government has the power in an emergency to declare that these young people must fight for their country, I feel that these same young people should have some voice in the selection of the government which has that authority.

I hope that this matter will receive more favourable consideration this year than it was given last year. The committee which was set up last year to review these amendments did a very good job. They worked long hours over a considerable period, and on the whole, with a few minor exceptions, what the committee accomplished was approved by our group. But I hope the one point I have mentioned will be given careful consideration this year.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I rise to put on record some suggestions which have been sent to me by one of my constituents who might be described as a shut-in. He is, however, a man who despite some physical handicaps has achieved considerable and commendable success in the business world. He has spoken to me on behalf of those who are handicapped or shut in. His name is R. S. Macdonald, and I should like to put before the minister one or two of his suggestions so that they may be considered by the committee.

The first is that the directions to district returning officers should be published in two booklets, one for urban and another for rural constituencies. This would make it easier for new returning officers to familiarize themselves with their duties without having to search through a long and cumbersome instruction booklet.

A second suggestion is that a candidate's party should be mentioned under his name on the ballot, and that he should be permitted to label himself as the official candidate of his party. I believe that that suggestion is a good one, especially in these times when we have as many as eight candidates in a constituency. Some voters are anxious to support a party with whose principles they agree, but they are confused when they find eight or ten names on the ballot.

Another suggestion is that some effort be made by the returning officers to clarify the occupation of the candidate. For instance, after a candidate's name there might be just the word "president". He might be president of anything. Perhaps the returning officers could be given instructions in that regard.

His final suggestion, and this is the one for which I particularly plead today, is that the enumerators be instructed to take the names of shut-ins, bedridden voters, who have no chance of ever getting to the poll. He suggests that when the enumerator calls at a house he ask if there are any shut-ins or bedridden people there, and that the enumerator make a separate list of such people for the returning officer, who could then mail each of them a ballot before election day. The shut-ins could mark their choice of a candidate and return the ballot in the self-addressed envelope sent by the returning officer. The returning officer would know how many ballots he had sent out by mail and could check that number against the numbers that come in, to prevent any voting by ineligible persons. He would then credit the ballots to the proper candidates and deposit them in the box.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee in 1936, 1937 and 1938 when the Dominion Elections Act was being overhauled, and a pretty good job was done at that time. I also was on the committee which dealt with the Dominion Elections Act in wartime. That committee was on a non-political basis. Again last year we spent many days making minor changes in the elections act, and I do not know whether we have had any more friendly committee than that one.

I understand that this bill is to be referred to a committee for consideration. So far, few fundamental changes have been suggested, but there is one which I think should be made to ensure that the candidate returned will have a greater proportion of the votes of his constituency than often happens at the present time.

In Alberta we have in the rural ridings what is called the single transferable vote. I think we could very well adopt that system, in the rural ridings at least, for the purposes of the Dominion Elections Act. At the present time, where you have five candidates running in a constituency, one may get only twenty-one per cent of the total vote and yet be elected to parliament. I do not believe that is good business, either for the candidate himself or for the country. I suggest that the government or the committee do something to remedy that unsatisfactory situation.

I hope that when the committee meets we shall all use the best judgment of which we are capable in dealing with the amendments which come before us.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I want to endorse what the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Fair) has just said. In Alberta we have had the single transferable vote for a long time, and in Manitoba too, and I have never in all these years heard a single complaint about it. Most people confuse it with what is known as proportional representation, but that is not the same thing at all. The single transferable vote simply means that we do what we do at a political convention which is electing a candidate, where the low man is dropped and his votes transferred until finally the person elected is bound to have fifty per cent of the votes plus one. If that system were adopted in our federal elections it would mean that the candidate elected would not be a minority representative. I am one myself, though not by very many votes; nevertheless I am.

I do not see how we can continue to talk about the grand principle of majority rule when the most of us who are here—150 of us, I am informed by an hon. member—are here without the support of the majority of the people within our ridings. There were five candidates in my riding, and on that basis a person could be elected, theoretically, we will say, with one-fifth of the vote plus one. I do hope that the committee will give consideration to the suggestion.

There is one other matter, and only one, that I wish to mention. I have not read the bill, but I do not think it contains a provision to enable permanently disabled persons to vote. I may say that being very much interested in this matter I communicated with the chief electoral officer. All of us I think will realize the justice of it, and it is only a matter of working out a rule or the conditions under which this could be done. I have had not many letters—I have had three—from my own home city, with respect to three persons there. I should not tell you their politics, sir, but perhaps you may be able to guess it; so I am helping myself to that extent.

But leaving that sort of thing out, it might be impossible at the moment in some constituencies which are far-flung and sparsely settled. It might present difficulties there but it seems to me some arrangement could be made by which we could carry the ballot to the person. It would not be a very expensive matter. I think I represent about half the city of Calgary. I am quite sure that so far as numbers go it would merely mean the employment of one or two persons and one motorcar for the day of the election.

I merely make the suggestion, sir, in order that the committee may examine it and see if it is not—to borrow the expression I hear from my friends to my left—physically possible to permit these people to exercise their franchise.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to endorse the principle of the single transferable vote. When I was first returned to the House of Commons I was a minority member; I won a majority of all the votes at the general election. There is no guarantee that that situation will prevail, therefore in passing I should like to say that I believe it is fair and democratic and would result in returning the people's choice as their representative in the House of Commons.

My principal object in rising is to speak for a moment on behalf of the Canadian Indian. I have served on the Indian affairs committee for three years and I know there is a sense of fear on the part of the Indians themselves in seeking the franchise. They fear that they might be required to give up some of their treaty rights. The Indian was disqualified partly because he enjoys exemption from taxation. We all know of the mounting taxes which we have today. His exemption was on the land on the reserve, and is his by treaty right. But today the average Indian contributes a great deal in taxes. He pays the eight per cent sales tax; he pays the tax on gasoline, and a multitude of other taxes. On the money he earns off the reserve he is subject also to income tax. The evidence presented before the Indian affairs committee has indicated a still further desire on his part to be relieved from the income tax; and yet some of them are making substantial incomes. It seems fair to say that if they are to work off the reserve and take the place of one who might otherwise earn this income, they should be subject to income tax. However, I am prepared to say this: if we were to grant them the right to vote in the dominion or provincial elections it would be educational in itself. It would break down the feeling of inferiority, and I do believe it can be done in a practical way; that is to say, I can imagine that some of the Indians living in the more remote areas, where they might be considered more or less primitive people still, might not have the necessary qualifications to exercise the franchise. But I do believe the act can be so worded that the Indian on an Indian reserve within or adjacent to certain electoral districts, where the Department of Indian Affairs are acquainted with their standard of education and their educational facilities, could be given the franchise.

These reserves are all well known. The Indians should be given the franchise because, as I have already said, they are making a sizeable contribution in taxation to the national exchequer and to the provincial government as well. The Indian is not prepared to accept this if it means giving up any of his rights, and yet one of the principal objects of our committee is to encourage the Indian to become a full-fledged citizen, prepared to accept his full responsibility. Such a move would be a step in the right direction if he knew in the beginning that he was not giving up any of his ancient rights to enjoy the franchise.

As the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said, these people made a tremendous contribution in both wars. I can think of the reserve adjacent to my own riding, Cape Croker, where their enlistment on a per capita basis was far greater than that of any other community I know of, and many of them made the supreme sacrifice. I realize that provision is made here for the Indian veteran to vote, and I am pleased to see an amendment to the act to permit that Indian's wife to vote. I hope that in considering this bill the committee will give serious consideration to the suggestions I have made with respect to the Indian reserves adjacent to or within electoral districts, where in the opinion of the Department of Indian Affairs the inhabitants of that reserve have reached such a satisfactory level of culture and development that they might exercise intelligently the franchise, even if in the beginning it is granted only to male Indians. There is a degree of backwardness amongst some of the women which I think could be corrected in due time through the educational advantages they are enjoying. In the beginning the franchise might be granted much on the same basis as we first enjoyed it, and after a time the women could be included, to make the job complete.

I want to say a word as to the suggestion offered by the members of the C.C.F. party with respect to young persons eighteen years of age. I have never been able to support this view. All too soon the burdens of national responsibility fall upon the shoulders of these young people. I wonder whether my hon. friend appreciates entirely what the franchise means or should mean. If we provide the franchise to the eighteen year olds, along with that franchise should go the responsibility of citizenship, the responsibility for debt, the responsibility of being sued in a court of law and subject to judgment being executed against him if one was obtained; the right to hold a liquor permit, the right to frequent beverage rooms and cocktail lounges, and everything else. I doubt whether we are prepared to go that far.

So far as the young men who enlisted are concerned, I can look back and take this view. I know that the young man of seventeen or eighteen who is full of enthusiasm, healthy and robust in physique, venturesome and willing to take a chance, would make an ideal soldier under the leadership that is provided for him. Because some of our greatest airmen were willing to venture and take a chance they made great names for themselves. The same thing applies to men in other branches of the armed services. But provision is already made in this act that even if the soldier were discharged from the armed forces, because of his enlistment he would still be entitled to the franchise irrespective of what his age might be when the election was called. Someone might say: Well, that will soon pass away; but I would be more impressed by the advantages of extending the franchise if those who now enjoy that right would roll out to the polls in greater numbers and exercise their right to vote. In other words, unless we can encourage our people to believe that the franchise holds something of advantage for them; unless we can impress upon them the great instrument the ballot really is and have them vote in larger numbers than thirty or forty or fifty per cent, why extend the franchise to those of younger years?—although I must say in my own riding in both the by-election and the general election we polled well over seventy per cent of the eligible voters.

Of course, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) has said, there are those who are shut in and unable to get to the polls. I am not prepared to say we should call for compulsory voting at this time, but I do believe that through the educational approach we should try to impress upon our young people the advantages the franchise offers. As the parent of young children I cannot think of anything of greater importance.

I believe that a man reaches mature judgment—I do not know that I would use that word literally, but certainly he reaches a stage of better judgment at twenty-five years than at twenty-one. I question very much if the youth of our land are prepared to accept this responsibility, subject to a poll tax and all the other obligations which go with it, at eighteen years of age.

I do not believe I have anything further to say, except to leave my appeal with the committee with respect to the Canadian Indian.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention only one or two points in connection with this bill. First I would point out that there is a principle in the act by which a person is deprived of the franchise because of his race. There is a section in the act which states that if a provincial legislature deprives a person of his franchise because of race, then automatically such person is deprived of his federal franchise.

I noted that in this connection the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) mentioned that persons of Japanese origin were allowed to vote if they had seen service in the armed forces. However, the principle I have mentioned, which applies only in British Columbia, does apply in that province. Despite that, of course, the Dominion Elections Act provides that if a person has seen military service he is qualified to vote.

However I would draw attention to this fact, that the right to vote in Canada is not based upon military service. The right to vote in this country is based upon citizenship. And in my opinion every citizen, regardless of race and regardless of any provincial law, should have the right to vote in a dominion election. If a province lives in the dark ages, that is no reason why the federal government should also live in the dark ages. Consequently, if the committee does not change this provision then I hope the house, when the bill is before it, will remove this stain from our elections act.

I should like to say a word on the plea made by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) in connection with the vote for the Indians. I believe he suggested that some way should be found by which the Indians would be given the franchise and still retain what he described as their ancient rights. However, in view of the fact that the Indians are wards of the state, I do not see how they can be made citizens of Canada and remain wards of the state at the same time. It may be done; but it does not appear feasible to me. A citizen has to be a citizen with all his rights; and if he is a citizen with all his rghts he cannot be a ward of the state. On the other hand, if he is a ward of the state he is not a citizen with full rights of citizenship. However, as a member of the committee I shall be glad to consider the question in the light of any information that may be brought before us.

The hon. member for Grey North also opposed the proposal made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) that the franchise should be given to citizens at eighteen years of age. He supported his opposition by various arguments, and indicated that if persons of eighteen years of age were to receive the right to vote they should receive various other rights such as having liquor permits, going into beer parlours, and cocktail lounges, et cetera. I assume that if he were to give the Indians the franchise they, too, would be able to have liquor permits and to frequent cocktail lounges. However, at the present time Indians cannot have those things legally. I should like to point out that we give a person of eighteen years of age the right to vote, if he has seen military service. If he is called upon to defend his country in time of need, then in my opinion he should have some say as to why that need arose which necessitated his risking his life. He should have some say as to why his country is at war. If we are to call upon young men and ask them to risk their lives in defence of their country, then surely they have reached sufficient maturity to vote for their representatives to parliament.

I should like to say a few words upon the other matter which has been discussed, namely, that of different systems of voting. Those members who praised the use of the alternative vote in Alberta and Manitoba for some reason or another were ignorant—if they were not ignorant of it, they did not mention it—of the fact that in both those provinces they have not only the alternative vote but also proportional representation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not in the same ridings.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course not in the same ridings; you could not have proportional representation in a one-man riding. But the purpose is the same. The single transferable vote provides that before a person is elected he must have a majority of the votes cast. When the votes are counted the low candidates are counted out and the second and third choice go to the candidates in the field. That is continued until one person receives a majority of the votes cast.

It is interesting to note that this question of the single transferable vote has come to have such importance in the country at this time. I have been interested in proportional representation for many years and have advocated it. If we are to have the single transferable vote in one-member constituencies I suggest that in urban constituencies, where constituencies can be bunched, we have proportional representation.

I say that because there are two important points in connection with representation in parliament. One is that as nearly as possible the government in office should have a majority of the people behind it. The second is that significant groups within the country should have representation in parliament and in the legislatures in proportion to their members. Let me point this out, that with the single transferable vote, although every member elected might have a majority of the votes in his constituency, yet a government could be elected with the minority of the votes in the country. Consequently we may not be any farther ahead than we are at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A minority of votes cast?

Mr. MacINNIS: A government could be elected; even with only two parties, a government could be elected with a minority of the votes cast, having regard to the total population. That is quite possible. I quite understand the attitude of my Conservative friends in this regard. They feel that their chances of being elected are getting less—

Mr. LENNARD: Do not worry about that.

Mr. MacINNIS: —and that if they are elected at all, they will be elected on the second choice, of Liberal voters.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who had a minority of votes the last time?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. STEPHENSON: All the hon. member has to worry about is the communist vote. The communists are going to vote for the C.C.F.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are the only party in this house that rejected the communist vote—

Mr. STEPHENSON: That does not help you. They are going to vote for you anyway.

Mr. LENNARD: The hon. member for Vancouver East is wrong.

Mr. MacINNIS: —as has been pointed out.

Mr. LENNARD: That is an absolute misstatement which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has just made. He said his was the only party in the house which had rejected the communist vote. That is a misstatement.

Mr. MacINNIS: I say I cannot find on record anywhere that any other party rejected the communist vote.

Mr. SKEY: The leader of the opposition said we did not want it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And that will be found in Hansard.

Mr. CASE: The C.C.F. is the only party in the house the communists are going to vote for. That might make a difference.

Mr. MacINNIS: At the proper time I will give this house an exposition—I believe that is the proper word—of what the communist word is worth; and I will quote chapter and verse.

As I said, I have been interested in proportional representation for quite a long time, and have been gathering information on it. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on February 4, 1943. It is a reprint of an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 19, 1943. This is what the Winnipeg Free Press had to say on the question of a new system of voting. I will not read it all, it is fairly long. This article is advocating both the alternative vote and proportional representation. In regard to proportional representation it says:

> The election of the best men of all the groups could be practically assured by having them nominated in the cities with P.R. in operation. That is the effect of the larger multi-member constituency in which the single transferable vote is used. Leading government candidates and leading candidates of the Conservative party and the Labour party have been regularly elected in the provincial elections in Winnipeg.

Earlier in this article the Free Press had this to say:

> It is significant to find support for this reform coming from the Montreal Gazette, usually not keen for new experiments.

Here we have the Conservative Montreal Gazette and the Liberal Free Press in full agreement and for the same reason.

The article continues:

> Now it sees that the two-party system is gone and that "there are many ridings in Canada where the C.C.F. will win if Liberals and Conservatives both enter candidates and thus divide the non-Socialist vote." P.R. would remove this danger, it says and "it would prevent the extreme left from gaining power, or the balance of power, on a minority popular vote, an eventuality which appears increasingly likely under our present ballot system."

In another place in this article I believe, the Winnipeg Free Press pointed out that the old system was all right as long as it worked in the interests of the old parties; but the moment the old system has begun to work in the interest of the new parties, then the old system is bad and it should be changed. I have no objection to change when change is desirable; but I should like to find people advocating changes on principle, and not because the old system no longer favours them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Example: Saskatchewan.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Saskatchewan government was elected on the old system, and it is still going to the country on the old system.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What did they do about bringing in this change they had in their platform?

Mr. KNOWLES: They had a clear majority.

Mr. MacINNIS: They had a full majority, and I do not know what change my hon. friend is referring to.

I do not know that there is anything further I wish to say on this point. If it comes up in the committee I shall have something more to say on it. I am not opposed to electoral reforms that will assure the people of Canada the opportunity to exercise fully their democratic right of electing members to this house. But I would just warn my hon. friends to my right—and any on the opposite side of the house who think as they do, if there are any—that they might save a few years for themselves in office with a move of this kind, but eventually—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Some of us have other things in life to do than this.

Mr. MacINNIS: —it will catch up with them and they will be in the position in which they find themselves in British Columbia. No matter how much the Liberals and Conservatives hate it, they must work together if they are to prevent the C.C.F. from coming into office.

Mr. STEPHENSON: And the communists.

Mr. MacINNIS: The communists will be with you, I say to my hon. friend, whenever they think there is anything to be gained from you.

I was greatly interested when in Victoria recently. A provincial by-election was being held close by. The seat that was to be filled had been held by a Liberal. A joint nominating convention was to be held, on this basis: The Conservative wing of the coalition could attend the nominating convention along with the Liberal wing, but the Conservatives could nominate only Liberal candidates to contest the seat. Before the nominating convention was called the Liberals nominated a candidate. When the Conservatives saw that, they would not attend the convention at all. In British Columbia the old parties are in an uneasy position. I do not wonder at my hon. friends wanting to keep out of it as long as possible. They are not going to keep out of it for long by merely changing the method of elections, although they may decide to abolish elections altogether. Who knows?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We know who would like to do that.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): In these days, Mr. Speaker, it seems popular in some quarters and with some people to suggest that teen-agers should be given the franchise. I am not clear as to whether or not they want that privilege. As far as my own riding is concerned, only a few months ago at the Westdale collegiate, a large high school in that riding, this matter was taken up by the youth organization. It was ably argued against and voted down by a considerable majority. The same thing happened in the town of Dundas, in which I live; the high school there voted it down almost unanimously. So, as I say, I am not at all sure that these teen-agers are in sympathy with this movement on the part of a great many people who feel that it would be to their advantage to have this change.

I could not remain in my seat and allow this discussion to continue without stating that I am not at all sure these young people want the franchise.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I want to oppose the single transferable vote. Despite the fact that I personally am a minority representative, having received I think forty-four or forty-five per cent of the votes cast, I still believe the single transferable vote would complicate our voting procedure and furthermore would lend itself to a duplication of candidates with complex instructions to the electors how to cast the second vote. From the point of view of my own constituency, which is a large industrial constituency in Ontario, I see nothing but complication, confusion and a general lack of efficiency in the taking of a vote under this system.

I have not had any experience with the single transferable vote or with proportional representation, but I must also oppose proportional representation because almost always you find that the man whose name heads the ballot stands the greatest chance of election. So much is this the case that in many instances the names are jumbled alphabetically after every thousand or so ballots, so the people will not be influenced by the names at the top of the list and vote as they really wish. Proportional representation may be all very well for those of us whose names begin with the early letters of the alphabet, but I feel that individual contact between the elector and the candidate for whom he wishes to vote is the important contact to maintain. To confuse the matter by complicating the electoral machinery would, I think, not give as direct representation as we have at the present time, despite the faults in the present system which many of us in this house recognize.

I should like to mention one other matter which has to do with the boundaries of constituencies bordering cities, though I do not think it comes under the Representation Act. Certainly this matter concerns the four York ridings and probably a number of others contiguous to metropolitan areas. In almost all cases, for the purpose of constructing streets, the city boundary does not run down the centre line of a street bordering a city. The city boundary runs one lot, or sixty feet, behind the outside edge of the street. In other words, in the case of York West, people living in the front of an apartment house on Bloor street will vote in the city riding of High Park, while those across the hall in the same apartment building will vote in the county riding of York West. I want to suggest that this anomaly should be corrected, if at all possible. Certainly it confuses a great many voters who live in apartment houses, part of which are in one riding and part in another. Despite the fact that the city boundaries are not the same as the boundaries of the ridings, I suggest that, in order to simplify the matter, whenever possible the centre street line be used as the constituency boundary.

Then I should like to add one word to the remarks of the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) with respect to the eighteen-year-old having a liquor permit, and so on. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) pounced upon that, which I suppose was to be expected; but the point is, are you going to make the eighteen-year-old, who is in many cases a high school student, a legal entity? Are you going to make him capable of being sued and responsible for debt before the courts? Are you prepared to do that or are you not? That was the important question raised by the hon. member for Grey North, and it is an issue which I think should be decided. There is no question that the man who enlisted and fought obviously must be given the vote. That question is not pertinent at the moment, however, because the war has been over for a considerable period of time and those who fought in it will now be over the age of twenty-one.

Then it has been suggested that the ballot should be so designed as to indicate the political party of each candidate. That might be a useful innovation, despite the fact that in British countries we do not recognize political parties as such. Under our type of government these parties form the government and the opposition; unlike the United States, we do not recognize the political party as an entity. The United States system is to have political parties definitely shown on the ballot or, in their case, in the voting machine. This is an innovation which might be studied, but I would hesitate to give an opinion on it at the present time.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the debate it was ruled that only the principle of this bill could be discussed, but I would observe that sections of the bill refer to the electoral district of Yukon-Mackenzie. There went through this house last session legislation which was entirely unprincipled and in favour of which no argument could be advanced. It was legislation that it was not necessary to enact. If that legislation continues on the statute books it will involve the legislation included in the bill now before the house.

That legislation set up as an electoral district two separate communities of people, each having nothing in common with the other. There was no community of interest. The people of Yukon trade with the west coast of Canada, whereas the people of the Mackenzie district trade with the centre of Canada. The people in both these districts were unanimously opposed to that legislation, and they still are. A government majority in the house crowded that legislation through without regard to the wishes of the people concerned.

There was not one voice in those districts in favour of that legislation. It created a constituency of over 700,000 square miles, if one can imagine the immensity of that. It will be practically impossible for a candidate to get around the district and it will be impossible for the election officers properly to discharge their duties. It created an electoral district as large as British Columbia and Alberta combined, or equal to the province of Quebec; yet it is to be represented by one member. That was done without any request being made to this government or to this House of Commons. It was passed in violation and regardless of the wishes of the people of the district.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): What my hon. friend is saying really has nothing to do with the elections act. He is dealing with the provisions of the Representation Act.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): We are dealing with the principle of this bill and there are sections in it which refer to the Yukon-Mackenzie constituency. The vote in favour of that legislation was sixty in favour and twenty against. The votes against were made up of nineteen Conservatives and Social Credit members. There was one Liberal who refused to be a party to that nefarious legislation.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I must object to the hon. member referring to legislation that was passed by this house last year as nefarious legislation. The matter he is dealing with does not come within the purview of the elections act. In referring to a bill passed at the last session of parliament I do not think the hon. member should refer to it as being nefarious legislation, because that is a reflection upon hon. members of this house.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): It is not in order for an hon. member to reflect on legislation which has been approved by the house. As the minister has pointed out, the representation bill is separate entirely from this elections act. There is a section which refers to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon-Mackenzie constituency. It may be that the hon. member is referring to some point covered by that particular clause. If that is what he is trying to do I suggest that he confine his remarks to the clause and not deal with the representation bill which was approved by the house. As I said before, it is not in order to reflect on legislation already approved by the house.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I know of no authority which says one cannot reflect on legislation passed by the house at this or any other session. It is not too late to undo the cruel wrong which was done to the people in these districts. The principle or lack of principle in the bill which was passed created the constituency of Yukon-Mackenzie, and I say it is not too late to undo the cruel wrong that was done by this House of Commons with a small majority. There were less than 100 members present when the vote took place and one minister of the crown was too manly to put through legislation in violation of the rights and wishes of the people.

If the government chooses it could now take out those sections that deal with the Yukon-Mackenzie constituency. That could be done at this session of parliament if the government chose to do it. It would be an answer to say there is not the requisite number of people in the Mackenzie district to entitle them to representation. The fact is that Yukon has never had the requisite number; but because of its isolated position, which compares with that of the people of Mackenzie, this parliament saw fit to give them representation. The same representation should be given to the people in the Mackenzie district. The government can do so if it wants to and undo the wrong that has been done.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks, which I hope will bring about comments in one direction or another. In this country we have a strong belief that we live in a real democracy which is endowed with the best in the way of democratic institutions. That statement is probably as true and accurate in Canada as it would be anywhere else, but is it as true and accurate as it might be?

Many definitions have been given of democracy, some at variance with others. It is hard to decide which definition best serves the purpose; but perhaps a common one is as good as any other; that is, government of the people, by the people, for the people. "By the people" of course means the majority of the people, particularly those who express their views on the proper occasion. People have the opportunity to express their views through agencies such as the radio, the press and different bodies and organizations, but by far the most efficient and decisive manner in which the people can express their opinion is through the ballot on the occasion of an election.

Since this unique opportunity of a general election does not arise very often, it is of the utmost importance that we should have a government faithfully reflecting the opinion and views of the majority. Great care should be taken to see that the general expression of opinion given at a general election shall be given with the greatest possible degree of freedom.

In order to make democracy workable, this greatest possible degree of freedom in the marking of the ballot should be followed up with an equal degree of freedom when the elected representatives of the people are called upon to cast their votes on the floor of the house. In this debate I cannot discuss this latter aspect of the problem of the freedom of the vote on the floor of the house except to the limited extent to which it may be met through amendments to the Dominion Elections Act. I may, later on, refer to it.

Let me first deal with the suggestion which in my opinion would lead to a freer and more accurate expression of opinion on election day. This could be brought about only through further amendments to the elections act. In the first place, there is a serious problem, the matter of election costs to candidates or to whoever supplies the campaign funds. Campaign funds are no secret. It is a fact publicly known to the people of this country, and it has been admitted, without great criticism. But I think today we are beginning to meet more criticism on that aspect of our democratic institutions. I feel that I could put up a fairly good case to defend and justify this modern institution of campaign funds. I am prepared to admit that there are two aspects of the problem. At the same time, in an academic discussion or in a public forum I think I would rather defend the other view, namely, that party funds should be eliminated. This need not necessarily affect personal contributions coming from personal friends of the candidate within the county. I think there would be no great objection to that provided that fact were known to the public.

In order to bring about this much needed reform, I feel that the elections act should be amended in many respects, and in such a way as to provide under the act for more financial assistance to candidates. With that object in view, I should like to suggest that the elections act be amended in such a way as (1) to pay reasonable remuneration to the election agents of all candidates, not more than one per poll; (2) to pay reasonable amounts for publicity, be it through radio, the press or otherwise; (3) to pay reasonable expenses for the use of halls and travelling expenses. What are reasonable expenses for radio, the press, halls, and so forth, would depend to a large extent upon the size of the constituency, its locality, the density of its population and the publicity agencies therein.

In order to offset to some extent this increase in election costs, I would urge that the amount of the deposit of candidates be raised from $200 to $1,000. This would discourage straw or nuisance candidates. I would urge that deposits of unsuccessful candidates be disposed of on a slightly more equitable basis. Refunds could be made on the basis of a percentage of the votes obtained by each unsuccessful candidate as compared with the total number of votes collected by the successful candidate. For instance, suppose that the elected candidate received 10,000 votes and the runner-up 8,000; the runner-up receiving 8,000 would be entitled to a refund of 80 per cent of his deposit. Another candidate receiving 4,000 votes would be entitled to a refund of 40 per cent of his deposit, and one receiving 1,000 votes would be entitled to only a 10 per cent refund of his deposit. If that principle had prevailed in the 1945 election the government would have collected larger amounts of forfeited money. For instance, in the constituency of Verdun forfeited deposits would have amounted to $7,800, instead of $1,800. In the constituency of Vancouver South they would have amounted to $3,240 instead of $800, and finally in my own riding of Restigouche-Madawaska forfeited moneys would have amounted to $2,200 instead of $600. I submit that these sums would go a long way toward the payment of the additional election expenses which I have just advocated.

On the other hand, this deposit of $1,000 required from each candidate would not constitute an undue burden on him because he would receive considerably more than that amount for his benefit in the nature of paid publicity and other election expenses. At the same time this larger deposit would act as a deterrent to straw or nuisance candidates, such as the one we had in the Glengarry by-election.

Mr. PROBE: Which one was that?

Mr. MICHAUD: The total costs of the 1945 general election amounted to $2,850,000. With 255 seats it should run to approximately $3,000,000. This amount spread over a five-year period gives an average of $600,000 a year. This amount of $600,000 a year represents only three-hundredths of one per cent of the annual budget of, say $2 billion. The cost of the election in Restigouche-Madawaska amounted to approximately $11,000, which is a very fair average compared with the total cost.

The payments by government which I have advocated would probably average between $2,000 and $3,000 per candidate, and in the case of a four-cornered fight, these would give a total of approximately $11,000. In other words, it would just about double the cost of the election, without taking into consideration the additional forfeited money which might result as I have explained. If we assume that it would just double the cost of the election, the total cost would only be six-hundredths of one per cent of the annual budget, and I submit that this is not an exorbitant proportion. I submit that those expenses are warranted because they would offer greater freedom of action to the candidate, and I think they would go a long way toward restoring the confidence of the people by assuring them that no funds of unknown origin were used to help candidates. Some will likely object and say that this is another impossible dream, and that it is impossible to change the set-up. It might be difficult of achievement under the present state of the law; but if the law were amended, if sufficient teeth were put in it, I submit that it should be possible to bring about these amendments which I consider desirable.

The time has come when this matter of election funds should be looked into a little further. Under the present set-up, many good candidates are prevented from going into politics on account of the difficulties experienced in financing an election. If the facts were laid before the general public I believe they would have no objection to the reforms which I am advocating.

There is another suggestion which I wish to make before concluding, and on which I should like to have the opinion of some hon. members in the course of the discussion. I understand that the bill will go to committee and that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss the different sections. The time has come when we should have in this country some mitigated form of compulsory voting. Some countries have compulsory voting but I do not know how it works out. Possibly we could have something a little less stringent. Some people take no interest in public affairs. They do not want to be bothered; they do not want to go to the polls. Others take the view that politics is so complex, so difficult to understand and to follow, that they would rather refrain from taking an interest and from exercising the right of franchise. Well, that is the privilege we enjoy in a democracy. The fact remains that in 1945, 24 per cent of the Canadian people did not exercise their franchise. On the other hand, in some provinces, for instance, Saskatchewan, a much larger percentage did go to the polls, and in some constituencies of Saskatchewan, and even British Columbia, I think the vote was as high as 93 per cent. If we are to believe the reports that we read in the press in connection with the recent elections in Italy it would appear that approximately 90 per cent of the people did exercise their franchise.

Mr. LOW: Did they force them there?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know; I do not believe they did.

Mr. LOW: What good is a compulsory vote?

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, my suggestion would be this. It would simplify the work of candidates from all sides if this mitigated form of compulsory voting were exercised somewhat along these lines. People abstaining from voting would be given, let us say, three months to appear before a county court judge or perhaps the returning officer to show cause why they did not vote. If they were in a position to show cause, then everything would be well done.

Mr. LOW: Didn't they try that in Australia?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am sorry; I am not familiar with what has been tried and done in Australia. Then, at any time prior to the calling of the next election those who defaulted or refrained from voting at the previous election would be given an opportunity of paying a small fine and qualifying themselves to vote at the coming election. Failing that, I suggest that if they are not interested, if they have evinced no interest in public affairs, their names should be deleted from the election lists of that election.

These are a few suggestions which are strictly of a personal nature, particularly those referring to election expenses. Election expenses should be considered with a view to improving further our elections act which I believe is commendable in many ways; but since we amend it before every election, it shows that there is room for improvement. I suggest that there is room for improvement to some extent along the lines of the remarks I have just made.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words only because of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Restigouche - Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). Sometimes one notices that when novel suggestions such as he has made are put forth on the floor of the house and no one replies to them, the stories that appear in the press indicate that they were well received. I feel that it would not be wise in this instance for hon. members to let that happen, and I for one would like to express opposition to some of the suggestions of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska.

I thoroughly agree with the purpose that he indicated in the early part of his remarks when he spoke about the fact that people do not know the source of some contributions to campaign funds. I would go along with him in urging that legislation such as we had in the Dominion Elections Act at one time with respect to this matter be restored. I have not the act in front of me, but if my memory serves me aright there was at one time a prohibition against political parties or political candidates in the federal field receiving contributions from incorporated companies. In due course, by amendment, that ban was struck out of the act. Whether it is that which should be put back or something else, I am not prepared at this moment to say; but I agree with him that in many instances there is a loss of confidence on the part of electors because of questions that arise as to the sources of campaign funds. I fear, however, despite all the research that the hon. member obviously has done in this matter, his suggestion does not fill the bill.

The hon. member proposes that under certain specified headings the government pay the election costs of a candidate's campaign; perhaps that the official agent receive certain expenses and that the candidate receive expenses for certain specified items such as halls, advertising and so on. He indicated that, as he was working it out, it might mean the government paying each candidate a total of some $2,000 or $3,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): There would be plenty of candidates.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly the point. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska proposes that this extra expense be offset in part by increasing the deposit from the present figure of $200 to the figure of $1,000, which in my view is a step in the wrong direction. The hon. member said that this would have the effect of keeping nuisance candidates out of the field. I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has it in the back of his mind right now that if by putting up

$1,000 you could get $2,000 or $3,000 out of the government the number of nuisance candidates would greatly multiply.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): A three to one bet is not bad.

Mr. KNOWLES: No, but that is what it looks like, doesn't it? In fact it seems to me to make an election something of a lottery, especially in view of the further schedule that the hon. member drew up as to the percentage of your deposit that you would get back, depending upon the percentage of your vote to the total vote cast.

I believe there are some pretty obvious faults connected with this novel suggestion. For one, I do not see how it could operate without the fear developing that the government in power was exercising some influence. All sorts of questions would arise. I think, for example, of the difficulties we run into in carrying out what I regard as a very good proposition, namely the free time that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation provides in political campaigns. But I point out that in the effort to implement that proposition it becomes necessary for the different parties to get together. I have sat in on some of those meetings and have listened to and participated in the arguments as to whether the division should be equal or in proportion to this or that weight of the parties involved.

That kind of question would certainly arise when it came to the matter of appropriating funds out of the consolidated revenue fund for the campaigns of different candidates. I would say that the only way to do it would be to do it on the basis of equality. But I can imagine the difficulty we would have arguing in favour of that, because the government, no matter what its party label, would argue, but, you see, we start off with 50 or 60 per cent of the seats; and that group over in the corner has only a much smaller number; therefore you will have to change the basis to something less for the smaller group.

Even if those arguing the matter were prepared to agree on a basis of equality, the government would then still have the say as to the total amount of money to be spent. And, depending upon the political weather at the time, and depending upon whether it might be to the advantage of the government to have a lot of money spent or to its advantage to have a lesser amount spent, through the powers ministers exercise over financial appropriations they could control the amount of money to be spent. Thus it does seem to me that the advantages which I have no doubt the hon. member might be able to advance in favour of his scheme are more than outweighed by the difficulties.

The other point I wish to make is that I fear it defeats the purpose which was enunciated, namely the attempt to increase interest on the part of the people of Canada in this sacred heritage of democracy, the right to vote. I very much fear it would be precisely the other way. I fear that if all that was necessary was for candidates to get together a thousand dollars for a deposit and, we will say, a certain number of signatures, with the understanding that he would get two or three thousand dollars expenses, we would have all sorts of candidates in the field, and they would find it difficult themselves to get the people interested in supporting or sponsoring their campaigns.

I believe there is something to the fact that what people have to work for and pay for means more to them. I am attempting to be non-political in this, but in the back of my mind is my own experience in the group to which I belong. We certainly have found it means something, so far as interest in what we advocate and interest in the political picture generally is concerned, to have our members and supporters have to work and to put in both their time and their money; in other words they are actively engaged, and that certainly increases their interest.

I feel that that kind of interest which is so valuable in a political democracy would be lost if we carried out the hon. member's suggestion. I need not go farther in discussing the matter. I do not criticize the hon. member for bringing these points before the house; indeed I believe he has done a service by suggesting to us that we should not just go on doing things in the same old way. There are some changes which should be made to improve the democratic nature of the elections we hold. But I do feel that that proposal concerning a deposit of $1,000 in return for which there would be $3,000 expenses, is one which should not be enunciated without some opposition being expressed in relation to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) spoke about the harmony and good will which existed in the committee last year. I should like to go farther and congratulate the committee upon the excellent work that it did in studying and revising the act.

I would point out that this year we have practically the same personnel on the committee which will consider the bill. The chief electoral officer has some further suggestions to offer to the committee, and we have received other suggestions in the house this afternoon. I have no doubt that when the committee sits it will show the same diligence and the same spirit of harmony and good will which existed before, and that it will bring down a bill which will receive the approval of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

FUR SEALS

PROVISIONAL AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, respecting the provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks concerning this bill, about the principle of which I have spoken on several other occasions.

This bill has for its purpose the carrying out of the pelagic sealing provisions between Canada and the United States, as set out in the agreements of 1942 and 1947. The bill represents something more than the mere carrying out of those agreements. Its purpose is to put into the Pelagic Sealing Act such teeth as for the future will assure both the United States and Canada that pelagic sealing will be a thing of the past.

I am not going into the history of the fur seal trade, because there are other hon. members who will discuss that part of the subject. I would point out, however, that the United States purchased Alaska in 1867 and, as they term it, made the greatest territorial purchase or bargain ever known to the world. At that time they paid for Alaska $7,200,000 and, while it was a large territory about one-fifth the size of the United States, there came with it a herd of fur seals numbering almost four million. This then was the property of the United States. There were, however, entanglements with other countries bordering that area. These have been dispensed with through the years.

After the purchase in 1867 by the United States, nothing was done in connection with maintaining the herd until about 1911. It was found that, because of extensive pelagic sealing, from 1867 the herd of about four million had been reduced to 125,000. The danger facing them at that time was the extinction of this great fur seal trade of Alaska.

In 1911 the English, the Russians, the Japanese and the United States governments put into effect a treaty which gave the United States entire control of the seal herd of Alaska. Today there are only two partners, Canada and the United States. The United States get 80 per cent of the herd seal pelts that are taken off each year, and Canada is entitled to 20 per cent. If we do not have a proper, strong Pelagic Sealing Act that will take care of this great industry, Canada's 20 per cent will not be worth much to her in years to come. That is one reason why I hope the committee of the whole, in going over this act, will examine every part of it in order to make it as strong as possible, both in our own interests and in those of the United States.

Since 1911 the United States have taken over one million pelts or skins, which have brought in to them more than twelve times the amount they paid for the whole of Alaska and the fur sealing trade.

One more thing I wish to emphasize in reference to this matter is that today we have more interest shown in the House of Commons with regard to the fur seal trade than we have had for a good many years. Interest is being taken in it because it produces quite a large revenue to the fisheries department of our government. I might say that at the present time, even when furs in general are at a little lower price, the recent sale of furs which was held on April 19 showed that the three types of seal skins, in which Canada as well as the United States, has an interest, sold at wonderfully good prices, even under today's fur depression as we might call it.

The dyeing and processing of these fur seal skins is done in two different countries: London, England, and St. Louis, Missouri. During the war the processing was not as good in London as it had been in St. Louis, because of conditions over which they had no control. However, the processing in St. Louis has developed so much that today it is acknowledged to be finest processing system for seal skins anywhere in the world, and this is shown by the three classes of skins they process, machine and dye. The skins are put out in three colours: safari, matara and black. The black is a glossy skin, and in the last sale averaged some $47. The safari is a unique kind of colour. It might be called a rich seal brown. It nearly held the spotlight, and averaged $65 per skin. The matara is a kind of neutral colour, brown with a bluish cast, and in the sale of some 10,000 skins it averaged $75 per pelt. I mention this just because Canada is greatly interested today. Some 5,000 skins are today being processed in St. Louis. Three thousand of them have arrived in Montreal already, and will be sold at an early day—some time in June—for the benefit of the fur manufacturers of Canada.

In connection with this I might also say that the government or the fisheries department at the present time stand in the position that, by looking carefully into this industry, they have and can have a net revenue of at least a million dollars a year. Perhaps some of it may be swallowed up in duty on the skins coming into Canada because, when these skins go to St. Louis to be processed and are brought back into Canada, the national revenue department take away from the fisheries department some 12½ per cent by way of duty. However, it is just going into a different pocket in the government.

Although I am not quite certain as to the amount, I think the cost of processing these skins is somewhere around $14 per skin. If I am wrong in this the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacKinnon) will correct me. It may be a little more or a little less. What I wanted to say in reference to the matter is this. We might in the future consider a proposition to have the processing done in Canada. The only way we might approach it is to ask the fur company in St. Louis to place an extra factory in Canada for processing our share of these pelts.

Again I want to repeat that in this act there are some things which might be made a little bit more drastic. For instance, I notice that, under certain conditions, certain individuals living in the north—the aborigines, the Aleuts and others—are allowed the right themselves to take on pelagic sealing. Personally I think that when we come to committee of the whole, those are things which we should look into carefully. As I said at the beginning, let us put all the teeth we possibly can into this act in order to save one of the greatest industries in the fur trade of Canada.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Fisheries): I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to make a short statement on second reading of this bill. However, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) got ahead of me for the moment. Before making this statement, I should like to compliment him on the speech he has just made, and for the knowledge he shows he has with regard to the sealing industry.

While my statement is short, it is longer than might be required under this bill; because, as far as I know, and as far as I can see, there is little of a contentious nature in it. But in making the statement I want to anticipate questions that might be asked me later.

The purpose of this bill is to carry out Canada's obligations under the provisional fur seal agreement made between Canada and the United States in 1942. The terms of this agreement are printed as schedule A of this measure.

In 1911 an agreement was reached to regulate, by international action, the killing of fur seals in the north Pacific. In that year Canada, acting through the United Kingdom, entered into the first pelagic sealing convention with the United States, Russia and Japan. All parties observed the terms of this convention until 1941. As a result of its abrogation by the Japanese government, this initial agreement came to an end about the time of Japan's entry into the second world war.

Canada and the United States were anxious to continue their joint efforts to preserve and protect the seal herds. A provincial fur seal agreement was therefore entered into by our two countries in 1942. But the Canadian legislation giving effect to this agreement was based on the War Measures Act. This meant, of course, that the life of the agreement was subject to a definite time limit. Accordingly the purpose of this bill is to enact legislation extending the life of the 1942 agreement for an indefinite period.

In the main, provisions of the original 1911 international convention are incorporated in the present Canadian-United States agreement. The principal changes may be briefly summarized as follows:

(a) An increase in the Canadian share of fur seal skins taken annually at Pribilof islands from 15 per cent to 20 per cent.

(b) A provision for enabling pelagic sealing under emergency circumstances. Details regarding conditions under which such emergency sealing might be conducted and the sharing of seal skins so taken are to be the subject of consultation between the two governments.

(c) A provision for permitting the taking of fur seals for purposes of scientific research.

(d) A provision that the two governments consult from time to time regarding the level of population at which the seal herd is to be maintained or other important phases of management or policy.

I do not propose to review in detail the extensive and interesting background of this sealing question. Briefly, the situation is that the breeding grounds of the fur seals are located on islands in the north Pacific. The seals breed during summer months and then swim to about the latitude of southern California before returning to the islands in the spring. The term "pelagic sealing" refers to the killing or capture of these fur seals at sea when they are migrating to and from their northern breeding grounds.

An international agreement was necessary in order to prevent the complete extinction of these seals from the effects of unrestricted slaughter. In 1867, when the United States took over Alaska, there were nearly five million such seals. By 1911 the population had dropped to less than 125,000. By 1947, as a result of conservation measures, this number had increased to 3,600,000. These figures speak for themselves.

Canadian revenues as a result of the treaty and under its provisions have amounted to $5,482,141.15 since 1912. The consolidated revenue fund of Canada benefits in the following manner. Every fifth barrel of raw skins obtained by the United States government at the breeding grounds is stencilled for Canada. The skins are brought to Seattle by the United States and shipped from there to London, England, or to St. Louis in proportions governed by the decision of the Canadian government. When the skins are dressed and dyed at these centres they are returned to Canada for sale in Montreal through the Canadian Fur Auction Sales Company, which acts as government agent in these transactions. The proceeds, as I have indicated, go to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The provisions of this bill follow closely the contents of the Pelagic Sealing Act of 1938 enacted by this parliament to carry out the terms of the 1911 convention. The 1938 legislation came to an end, of course, as a result of the abrogation of the treaty in 1941. The only changes made by this bill are those required by a few modifications of the original 1911 agreement and the necessity for clarification on some minor points.

There is one principal exception to the restrictions imposed by the treaty. This relates to the provision that pelagic sealing may be carried on by Indians and other aborigines dwelling on the coasts of the waters to which the agreement refers. These sealing operations so permitted must, however, be carried on by means of canoes and without the use of firearms. These conditions are provided, because the existence of any large scale catching or killing equipment in the hands of the exempted persons might well open the door to serious abuses.

These are the main provisions of the legislation now before the house. I should add that Canada, under the treaty arrangement, undertakes to give the United States 20 per cent of any seals captured on Canadian territory.

Mr. GREEN: Is Russia under the agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: Russia is not under the agreement. As a matter of fact, however, practically no seals are captured or killed on Canadian land. On the other hand, as I have stated, Canada receives 20 per cent of the total catch from herds on United States territory as compensation for prohibiting Canadians from sealing activities on the high seas.

There is little doubt that these treaty undertakings have saved the Pacific seal herd from extinction. Nearly a million pelts have been taken since the first treaty was signed, but without harmful effect. In 1911 the seal industry was drifting to absolute ruin. Today, because of what has been done through international action, the industry is in a healthy, thriving state and soundly established on a permanent basis.

Mr. GREEN: When did Russia drop out?

Mr. MacKINNON: In recent years; during the war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I crave your indulgence this evening to speak on this bill because I am one of the few, if not the only member who has seen this animal in its natural environment. I have seen the islands which are alike its breeding and killing grounds. This treaty was made in 1911 between Great Britain representing Canada, the United States, Russia and Japan. At that time we were at the close of a century during which the fur trade had played a tremendous part in the economy of the world. As hon. members know, Baranoff, the great Russian fur merchant, colonized the Aleutian islands, the Pribilof islands and what is now Alaska. He entered into a treaty with the fur traders of America. As I say, furs played a tremendously important part in the national economy of all the countries concerned and provided a most lucrative business.

The early fur traders built up a kind of mystery around this seal fur trade. They started off by giving extraordinary names to the various branches of their activities. Pelagic sealing means nothing more than the killing of seals in the water. It is a ridiculous name. When citizens of Edmonton come to spend their summer holidays on the gulf islands in my constituency we do not refer to them as pelagic Edmontonians.

I think it would be worthwhile for a moment to investigate the reasons why these treaties were first made. They were made with the idea of preserving the seals, so that the rich skins might be sold to the aristocracy of Europe and the newly made millionaires of the United States. It was found that you could not control the killing of seals if they were killed in the water. As soon as they come on to their breeding grounds, there is an opportunity for wholesale slaughter of these defenceless animals and there is also an opportunity to control the slaughter.

The seals come on the land for breeding purposes. An old bull seal will collect around him a harem of some sixty female seal cows. Those are not the animals that are killed. Because of the peculiarities of natural history, the younger males have to remain back from the breeding ground, contenting themselves as best they can until they are old enough and are able to entice some of the virgin cows. These are technical names used in the trade.

The younger males are kept back from the breeding grounds until they are old enough to gather a harem. It is at this time that the native Aleuts and Indians drive them away a short distance and knock them on the head. This business of killing is a messy one and very few white men will indulge in it. But it can be regulated and the numbers killed can be controlled by government inspection, because the carcasses are laid out in rows of tens and hundreds and so forth. It is all controlled; so many are killed each year.

When they are killed in the water there is no control as to what sex of seal is killed. It is quite impossible to distinguish a young male from a young female, and you may kill a mother who has a pup on the land in what are called the rookeries. The mother suckles the baby seal and does not take it out into deep water.

Great destruction was done in those early days. As was mentioned earlier this afternoon, at one time before the treaty was made the herd numbered over 4,000,000 fur seals. Then the indiscriminate killing occurred and the number in the herd dropped down until in 1910 there were no more than 133,000 fur seals. At that time restrictions were put on the number killed and the herd increased, until today it is estimated to be in the neighbourhood of 3,000,000 animals. I want to call the attention of hon. members to that increase since 1910 from 133,000 to 3,000,000 animals.

Why are these animals preserved? That is the big question. They are preserved so that their skins may be sold to make expensive furs for a very fancy trade. It is still a lucrative trade. The last figures which I received from the department show that in 1947 some 12,289 skins were delivered to Canada as her share and these brought $994,061 in profits to Canada. The question I want to ask is this: At what expense was that $994,061 worth of skins obtained?

I have pointed out that at one time the herd was much larger than it is now, and that it is very much on the increase. These animals live on fish. They are on the Pribilof islands for only a couple of months during the summer when they live on shell fish and decomposed matter. During the rest of the year they range the Pacific ocean, some travelling across to the Siberian shore and others going down the west coast of the continent of America as far as California. While they are moving back and forth they are living on the fish which constitutes the food for the people of this world—fish food that is caught by the fishermen of British Columbia. From estimates which have been made of seals in captivity and by various expeditions which have been carried out by the United States, it has been calculated that the seal herd of a few years ago ate more than the total catch of commercial fishing from Alaska, British Columbia, Washington, Oregon and California. I quote from a report which was produced by Mr. W. McLeod Chapman, who is a biologist of the department of fisheries of the state of Washington. This was published in the California publication, Fish and Game, of October, 1942:

> The herd of fur seals now includes more than 2,500,000 individuals. From such data as are now available it would appear that this herd, at a minimum figure, consumes in excess of 2,500,000 pounds of fish each year in the area from the Pribilof islands to California. This is roughly the annual production of food fish by all the commercial fisheries of Alaska, British Columbia, Washington, Oregon and California.

Millions of tons of small fish are eaten by these animals. A full grown fur seal will weigh anywhere from 350 to 600 pounds. It consumes, so it has been estimated, no less than forty pounds of fish a day, when living on what one might call an austerity diet; that is almost a starvation diet.

We find that Russia has withdrawn from this treaty and Japan has withdrawn from it. Why? Russia has a fur seal herd smaller than the Pribilof herd and it has its rookeries on the Commander islands off the coast of Siberia. There is a smaller Japanese herd off some of the islands off the main islands of Japan. Russia and Japan have withdrawn from this treaty because they realize that these fur seals destroy far more fish than the value of their skins is worth.

There has been in recent years a distinct reduction in the catch of certain types of small fish. I am not suggesting for one moment that a fur seal tackles a full-grown salmon. Oh, no; they eat the smaller fry; they eat the herring; they eat the pilchards. There is a big demand now for herring and a market is opening up again in Asia for the salted herring of British Columbia waters. Those are the type of fish which these marauding animals devour in great quantities. I say that the figures show that there has been a distinct reduction in the number of fish of that type caught in those waters in recent years, in spite of the improved equipment for catching fish of that type. I am not suggesting that the increase in the fur seal herd is the only cause of the reduction in the number of herring that are caught, but I claim that it is very much one of the contributing causes.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of maudlin sentiment created around these fur seals. It all started when Rudyard Kipling years ago wrote a delightful little story in the "Jungle Book" about a dear little baby fur seal. I suppose every hon. member, when he was a child, saw some performing seal balancing a ball on the end of its nose. Oh, we loved the dear little seal. There have been all these fantastic names to describe the rookeries and the pups. Whoever heard of a pup being born in a rookery? A rookery is where rooks nest. Pups are born on the ground. But all these romantic names, the bachelor bull, the virgin cow, the rookeries and all the rest of it, have been created, with the result that, I suggest, a maudlin sentiment has been built around these poor little animals.

What did we get out of this agreement at an expense equal to the total catch of all the commercial fish on the Pacific coast from Alaska to California? We got 20 per cent of the kill; 20 per cent of the hides that had been cured. Does that give us any employment? Last year, 1947, there were as Canada's share some 12,289 skins. We had no part in the killing or stripping of the carcasses, that was all done by the Americans, done with native labour, by the Aleuts and by the Indians of Alaska. Those hides were shipped past Canadian ports, past Prince Rupert, past Vancouver, shipped in United States bottoms to Seattle, where they were transported by rail. From Seattle we pay the cost of transportation to a United States firm of furriers. Of those 12,000 skins last year, some 8,602 skins were cured in the United States, the remainder, or some 3,687 skins, were cured in Great Britain, in London. No Canadian labour was employed in the curing of those skins. Canada paid for the curing of those skins, as has already been stated this afternoon, at the rate of $14 or more per skin. Then at Canada's expense they are sent to Montreal, some but not all of them, because I inquired from the ministry the other day as to the number of skins which were sold outside Canada, and was informed that last year we sold outside Canada, from Canada's share, some $66,450 of skins which never reached Canada at all. I suggest that this is giving no employment whatever to Canadian men in the curing or selling of those skins until they reach the auctioneer in Montreal where, I suppose, he draws his salary for selling them.

During the last war it was found that the skins which were being sent over to Great Britain could not be cured, partly because the manpower of England was required in the services. An attempt was made to ship out equipment and to send a limited number of trades specialists to Canada with the idea of starting the curing process here. The question I should like to ask is this, why cannot we obtain the patents for the special process of curing these skins? I believe there are some fourteen different processes through which these skins go in the curing.

Mr. McLURE: One hundred and twenty-six processes.

Mr. PEARKES: The skins go through 126 processes before they are actually cured. That will give the house some idea as to the highly technical nature of the work and the difficulties there would be in establishing the industry in Canada. But these difficulties are not insurmountable if we are anxious to develop this luxury trade. I feel that this is probably a lucrative business; if I might be pardoned for making something of a pun, I would say that we are concealing big profits made by the company as well as low-neck dresses under fancy sealskin coats for Hollywood actresses, and if that is to be done, why should we not carry out this process in Canada? Therefore I suggest to the minister that he refer this bill to the standing committee on fisheries, because I believe that far more investigation is required than this house is competent of giving at the present time. I think we want to get the reports from the cruiser which has been sent out by the state of Washington to examine into the exact diet of these fur seals. Remember, there is a distinct difference between the fur seal and the hair seal. The hair seal lives in the waters close to the shore; it inhabits the mouth of the Fraser river and does a great deal of damage to the salmon as they go up to the spawning grounds. But the fur seal is able—again I use this horrible pun because I cannot think of a better word—to conceal its activities by working some fifteen, twenty or more miles out from the coast.

At the present time I understand that an investigation is being carried out by the fish and game department of the state of Washington in order to ascertain the amount of damage which is being done. Therefore I wish to suggest, in the first place, that this bill be referred to the standing committee on fisheries, which has not met during this session. I think we can get much valuable information from a detailed examination of the various clauses of the bill.

Then I should like to suggest in the interests of the fisheries of British Columbia that a definite limit be agreed upon as to the size of the herd. The minister referred to discussions taking place as to the population of the herd and said that it would be agreed upon from time to time between Canada and the United States. That is not good enough, because under the old treaty, and I believe it is in the present bill, the United States has the control to say what regulations may be imposed and the number that will be killed. It was only a few years ago that the United States prohibited all killing of seals on the land as well as at sea. That, of course, meant an increased growth of the herd. If the predominant influence is to be the production of fancy sealskin coats we may find again that there is a demand, or pressure is used, to increase the herd. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, at this time that food is far more urgently needed than sealskin coats. What I should like to see is a definite ceiling placed on the size of this herd.

My third is this: I should like to have it definitely agreed upon that the seals will be delivered at such Pacific coast ports as Prince Rupert and Vancouver. I know they have to be delivered in United States bottoms. United States ships will have to pick up the sealskins as they are killed in the islands, but they can be delivered there and can be transported to Canadian factories either on the Pacific coast or in Toronto or Montreal, where an industry, as was suggested by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure), could be established, so that the curing process which is used either by the London firm or by the United States firm could be established in Canada to give employment to Canadian furriers, instead of our merely having these skins cured in the United States.

Finally, I should like to suggest to the minister that in many parts of this country we are building a fur breeding or a fur farming industry in which in captivity various animals such as muskrats, mink, foxes and so forth are being raised. One might say that we are producing synthetic furs. That is a growing industry. Should we not be encouraging that industry, which in many parts of the country is still in its infancy, rather than specializing on the production of skins from an animal which spends the greater part of his life, and which lives to the age of eighteen or twenty years, in consuming food which eventually would be fit and desirable for human consumption?

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to keep you in the chair for a few minutes longer, but this discussion has intrigued me. I recommend that the caption on today's Hansard should be "The love life of the seal", and it would be widely read. After listening to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), I want to compliment him upon his knowledge of the subject.

He must have made quite a study of it. However I was more particularly interested in the latter part of his remarks, where he dealt with the agreement itself and the mechanics of the marketing of this product, in which the government is so much interested.

I support him in his contention that this bill should go to the fisheries committee for further study. This afternoon the minister made an interesting statement. In his statement today he advanced an excellent argument for government ownership of industry. First he told us that this industry, under free enterprise as it existed up to the agreement between Russia, Canada and the United States, and the later agreement between the United States and Canada, had been freely exploited, without any regard for the perpetuation of the seals. They were killed off, and the industry had practically died.

Free enterprise killed them, as it is doing with many of our natural resources in this country. Free enterprise is merely exploiting them, and not thinking about those who will come in the future. In connection with the sealing industry, the government stepped in; indeed I should say two governments stepped in, those of Canada and the United States, and rescued the sealing industry from those who had wrecked it. The facts are there; the minister said so this afternoon. And they have done a fairly decent job. Not only have they provided fur coats for those who can afford them, but they have pretty well rehabilitated the industry.

I was particularly interested in the point which was brought out to the effect that the Canadian government pays for the shipping and processing of the raw furs. Also in the United States they pay for the shipping and processing. Those furs are sent to Great Britain and, as the hon. member for Nanaimo pointed out, this provides in this country no labour which would serve as compensation to our people. That is money spent on the outside.

The point I would ask the minister to clarify is this: why cannot that raw fur be processed in this country, thus saving shipping charges to Great Britain and the United States? Secondly, if the government pays the shot to put that fur into a condition in which it can be marketed, why should it ship that fur out when it is ready for market to some private firm in Montreal, permitting that firm to sell it and make the profit from it?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: This subject of whales and seals is the subject of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. If he will just let me finish with the mechanics and the economic end of the industry, then he can handle the blubber.

Mr. KNOWLES: He will be wailing before the night is over.

Mr. GILLIS: I would ask the minister to explain why these furs cannot be processed in Canada, particularly as the government pays the total cost; at least that is my understanding of it from the statement made by the minister and by the hon. member for Nanaimo. Why cannot the government market the product through a crown company? Why should it be handed over to some private company simply for the purposes of sale, so that they may make the greatest amount of profit from the transaction? These are people who have nothing to do with this agreement at all.

There is no section in the agreement which compels the government to do this. The minister stated that the exchequer has benefited to the extent of some $5,000,000 since the inception of the agreement. I should like to know how much money this private company has made through the marketing of the furs for the processing of which the money was paid by the government. If the minister can give us that information and if he can tell us why the government cannot follow through and market the product, and why the raw fur cannot be processed in Canada, then there may be no necessity to send this bill back to the committee.

Otherwise, however, I think the committee on fisheries should have an opportunity of overhauling this bill. This is too important a matter to let it go through with only the short explanation we have had with respect to it, particularly after the doubts which were raised in my mind by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say a few words on this matter, because perhaps I am the only old seal hunter and seal buyer in the house. Perhaps I would do well if I were to clear up some of the misapprehensions which appear to be in the mind of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who is undoubtedly a great authority on coal. But if one may judge from his most recent remarks, the hon. member knows very little about the sealing business.

He seems greatly concerned about the fact that these sealskins are sold in Montreal by a private firm. I can assure him that they are sold there in one of the greatest fur auction markets in the world, and that they are sold to the highest bidder. And despite the success, or lack of it, of the Saskatchewan government's venture into the marketing of fur, I can tell him that I would be greatly adverse to our government setting up any such agency to handle these few sealskins. I think we do very nicely at very small cost in disposing of these skins at the highest world market prices.

Something too was mentioned about the fact that this industry under free enterprise had finally been run into the ground. There is such a thing as free enterprise within one's own country and also free enterprise within the world. I think everyone realizes that at one time five great nations were fighting for the privilege of getting these seals, and it was not found possible for them all to get together and to decide on a proper procedure. It is only recently that Canada and the United States have been able to go in together with a view properly to safeguard the breeding grounds on the Pribilof islands where these seals have been given an opportunity to propagate, and have developed into great herds.

I might say that I feel particularly sorry for the Indians involved. I was not in the house tonight earlier, so that I do not know whether they have been mentioned or not. The fact is, however, that in the early days on the British Columbia coast the taking of sealskins was one of the great means of earning a livelihood for our Indians there. Schooners from Victoria and San Francisco used to call at west coast ports, pick up a load of Indians and their wives, and take them all over the world chasing seals. They would start off at Victoria, and follow them around through the Pribilof islands, across to Japan and to the Hawaiian islands, calling in at San Francisco and then back home.

It has been found necessary to stop the Indians from sealing on their ancient grounds out there; this is done in the interests of conservation. We find that the Indians are no longer able to go out and catch seals by using their canoes, or boats powered only by hand, or through the use of spears, as was their custom in the old days when the seals were more numerous than they are today.

The thought has occurred to me that these funds which are taken into our consolidated revenue fund might very well be earmarked for the use of Indians, so that in some fashion or another they might be compensated for their loss in revenue which it was their custom to receive.

So far as the amount of good food eaten by seals is concerned, I believe the department has spent a great deal of time in a survey of this subject. I remember in 1936 collecting a lot of seal stomachs for the Department of Fisheries, and it is my understanding that those stomachs were analysed. It was found that only about three per cent of the stomachs showed any trace of salmon, which, after all, is the only commercial fish that would be eaten.

Mr. PEARKES: Mainly herring.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The sea is full of herring. The amount of herring seals would be able to eat would have no effect on the commercial quantities which would be available. If I were convinced that any great depletion of salmon was caused by the ravages of seals I would agree that the hon. member's point might be well taken. In this particular instance, however, I have never seen a herd of seals chasing salmon in any appreciable degree. The seals which are a menace to our salmon fisheries are what are known as harbour seals or hair seals. The government pays a bounty on them, and has been doing a very good job in suppressing the damage done by this particular variety. However, I think it is difficult for the minister to say anything about the matter. I feel that if there is any way in which we can compensate the Indian population for the loss they have sustained from the way we are now handling the sealing industry, it would be well to get together with the Department of Mines and Resources and see if something could be worked out along that line.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the minister refer this bill to the committee on fisheries, as I suggested, so that an opportunity may be given for thorough study?

Mr. MacKINNON: I think a mountain has been made of this matter. I do not see any occasion for following the suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: A whale, the minister means.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, possibly a whale. I do not see any occasion really for referring this bill to the committee. The simple, ordinarily expressed situation is that these seals are reared on United States territory and at one time were subject to killing by Japan, Russia, Canada and the United States. For some reason which we do not know, Russia dropped out of the arrangement that had been made. Japan dropped out during the war. That left the United States and Canada to agree on some method of protecting these seals. Canada shares not in processing, curing or any other way except in the profit realized from a percentage of the skins. After they are transported to the United States and cured, 20 per cent of the skins are given to Canada and, on our direction, are sent to the Canadian Fur Auction Sales Company in Montreal which, as all hon. members who have any knowledge of the fur industry know, is a great organization set up by people interested in fur trading, for the handling of the sale of furs. The Montreal fur auction sales company handles these seal skins on a commission of 3½ per cent. That includes storage, grading and selling. The government gets Canada's share of the proceeds of the furs.

Only two plants in the world have the secret of curing these furs. One is in St. Louis in the United States of America, and the other is in London, England. Before the war, Canada found it advisable to send many of these furs to London for curing. Canada got better prices. During the war, the London firm was bombarded and destroyed in whole or in part on two different occasions. Since the war, Canada realizes a better price from the St. Louis processing. As I have said, the process is a secret one known only to those two companies. The question was asked, why should we not do this processing of our own furs in our own country? I have answered that question by stating that the process is a secret method not known to Canada.

It has also been suggested that a plant be established in Canada. From time to time the Canadian government has made efforts to persuade both the London company and the St. Louis company to establish in Canada a plant for the curing and processing of these furs. Some consideration was given to the suggestion by the St. Louis company, but it reconsidered after going into the matter. It found, I believe, that it would be unprofitable to establish a branch in Canada for the handling of 20 per cent of the skins.

I am advised, too, that a London firm actually started a plant in Canada, but gave it up because it was uneconomical.

The matter of the fish consumed by the seals was answered in part by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). I could go more particularly into the matter and I intend to do so while we are in committee. I do not want to be adamant about it, but I do not see anything to be gained by referring to the committee on fisheries this bill with respect to the renewing of the agreement we now have with the United States.

Mr. PEARKES: Can the minister tell us the exact relations with regard to Canada and Russia. I presume this treaty refers only to the Alaska fur seal herd. What is our situation with respect to the Russian fur seal herd which have their breeding grounds on the Commander islands. They also ravage the Pacific ocean and destroy fish. I understand that the Russian government is endeavouring to exterminate that herd because of the damage done to the fish there. Do we get an opportunity to go over and share in the skins derived from that Russian fur seal herd?

Mr. MacKINNON: Canada has no access whatsoever to the Russian seal herd. It is in Russian territory and is not tributary to Canadian sealing operations. We do not know the reason for Russia's abrogating its treaty arrangement with us, but we know that they ceased to have any interest in participating with us. We are informed and we believe that they are endeavouring to process their own furs for sale abroad.

Mr. PEARKES: While the breeding grounds are on Russian territory, there is nothing which limits the Russian fur seal herd from travelling all over the waters of the Pacific and gaining contact with our fish.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am told that we do not know the ocean route of the Russian seals, but that the seals tributary to Canada and to Canadian fish are the seals reared in the Pribilof islands.

Mr. PEARKES: Then might I ask a question regarding the British equipment sent out here, I believe, during the war, when the minister said they tried to establish a curing and processing plant in Toronto, I understood, but found it could not be done economically. Why was that? Was it because the skins were not being shipped direct to the firm in Toronto?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am told that the machinery referred to, which was shipped from England, is still in Toronto; that seal skins were supplied to this company but that they abandoned the project for reasons of economy.

Mr. PEARKES: Because the war was on and the personnel were required for active service. Might this not be an opportune time to reopen negotiations? If the equipment is here, perhaps we could have some of the specialists sent out, and it might be possible to have that industry commence operations in Toronto, so that under the direction of these British specialists employment could be given Canadian furriers.

Mr. MacKINNON: The suggestion is very good, and I think it will be followed by the department.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there anything to prevent either Russia or Japan from killing these seals that breed on the Pribilof islands, while they are on the high seas?

Mr. MacKINNON: When the seals are on the way from the Pribilof islands to the California coast they are under the protection of the United States navy.

Mr. HAZEN: Are they on the high seas then?

Mr. MacKINNON: They are on the high seas.

Mr. PEARKES: Has it not been established that a portion of that fur seal herd crosses the Pacific when they have left their breeding grounds and live off the coast of Siberia, actually mingling with the Russian herds?

Mr. MacKINNON: I believe it is suspected that this may happen, but there is no definite knowledge about it. Our knowledge deals with the journey of the seals from the Pribilof islands to the California coast and back.

Mr. PEARKES: There is nothing to prevent Russian fishermen from killing the Alaska fur seal if it is found off the coast of Siberia?

Mr. MacKINNON: I imagine not, but they are not doing so.

Mr. PEARKES: How would we know?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is this great difference in processing? That is a tremendous word which seems to mean a great secret. In this country we have many fur bearing animals that enter the water, such as beaver, otter and muskrat. There is no difficulty in processing them, and they look rather good in Hollywood fur coats. What is this mysterious secret with respect to seals? You pick up a skin and it feels the same as any of the others; perhaps the best way to put it is that it is a skin you love to touch. What is this secret we are so greatly worried about?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is what we have been trying to find out in Canada, as well as in other parts of the world, for a long time. As I said, there are only two firms that have this necessary secret, the know-how, to process these fur seals.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): All right, but why cannot the fur seal skin be tanned? That is a word the meaning of which we all know. Has anyone ever tried it? To me it seems like a lot of nonsense, as though someone were running a big racket on us and we are dumb enough to accept it.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed that Canadian firms have tried it, but unsuccessfully.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who?

Mr. MacKINNON: If, instead of being Minister of Fisheries, I were in the seal skin processing business, probably I could give a very good and proper and convincing answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, you have a couple of gentlemen in front of you. I do not know what they are there for except to give answers to questions of this kind. It does seem rather dumb on our part that two groups of people, one in St. Louis and one in London, should say they have a secret process for the handling of seal skins, when we have dozens of processes for the handling of skins of other animals which frequent the water. It seems to me very strange that we cannot unmask this masquerade, shall I call it, or whatever is going on with respect to fur bearing seals.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): We have been taking these seals for about seventy-five years, I may tell the hon. member for Calgary West. Hon. members know how enterprising our United States friends are, but it was only about fifteen years ago they finally discovered an alternative process to that used by the English processors. Up to that time the Americans sent all their furs to England, and it is only within the last fifteen years that St. Louis has been able to carry on the same process.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I fully appreciate what the hon. member has said, but all Americans are not tremendously brilliant. Perhaps they were dumb and woke up fifteen years ago. We are being dumber than they were for another fifteen years. That is the obvious answer to what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): On the other hand, it may be that not enough seal skins come into Canada to make it worthwhile for anyone to waste a lot of time and invest a great deal of money in a particular process.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You have said the same thing that occurred to me a long time ago.

Mr. PEARKES: Has this question been referred to the national research council to see if they can assist the industry in finding a way to cure these seal skins, just as beaver skins are cured, for example?

Mr. MacKINNON: It has been referred to the national research council by the government. I do not know whether private industry has done so, but I do not believe it has.

Mr. PEARKES: Then might I suggest that it be referred to them?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): An ordinary chemist can tell by smell.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister tell me how the United States can protect these seals from Japan or Russia while they are on the high seas, if those countries have not entered into the agreement? I know that a year or two ago the United States claimed certain powers over the seas as far as the continental shelf extended, but these seals must be beyond the continental shelf. I just wondered what power the United States navy would have there.

Mr. MacKINNON: I understand that there was a tacit agreement between Russia, Canada and the United States that Russia would direct its operations to the seals along the Russian coast and Canada and the United States would direct their attention to the Pribilof island seals. That tacit agreement is still being respected and acted upon, though there have been no conversations with Russia on the matter.

Mr. GREEN: How was the catch divided when Russia and Japan were parties to the agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: Canada was getting 15 per cent; the United States, 70 per cent, and Russia, 15 per cent.

Mr. GREEN: Was Japan not a party to the agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: Japan was not a party to the agreement at that time.

Mr. GREEN: Japan has never been a party to the agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: It has never been a party to the Pribilof agreement.

On section 7—Importation or possession prohibited.

Mr. PEARKES: I assume, from the Latin names which are used, that the three species referred to in paragraph (b) are the Russian, Japanese and Alaskan fur seals.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Sections 8 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On section 21—Duration of act.

Mr. PEARKES: Will there be any time limit? I think I am correct in saying that an investigation is now being carried on by the United States as to the actual damage being done by these animals to the fisheries of the Pacific coast. If the report from the fish and game department indicates that there has been a great deal of damage, will it be possible to review this act and have it changed, or is its duration indefinite?

Mr. MacKINNON: That question is answered by article X of the agreement.

Mr. HAZEN: Has legislation confirming this agreement been passed by the congress of the United States and approved by the President?

Mr. MacKINNON: It was passed and approved last year.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 211, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I feel that I need to add but little to what I said when I introduced the resolution. The bill has been printed and circulated, and hon. gentlemen who wish to question any part of the bill will have ample opportunity for so doing in committee of the whole. The main part of the bill is that which brings the pension provisions for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in line with the pension provisions for members of the armed forces.

There are other sections of the bill of a miscellaneous nature. There are certain provisions for pension for disability as distinguished from service pensions. It is the kind of bill which cannot be discussed very well by the minister introducing it on second reading, because it has so many diverse provisions which, I assume, can be dealt with in committee.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bill was just distributed this afternoon and therefore it is somewhat difficult to analyse the general principles as one would have hoped to be able to do had it been distributed earlier. As far as the general principle of the bill to extend provisions for retirement and compensation to members of the forces is concerned, there is entire agreement in so far as the official opposition goes. On this occasion there are a few ideas that I wish to place before the minister with a view to removing some of the anomalous conditions that prevail and clarifying some matters regarding which there is a critical feeling on the part of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

One of the main criticisms in the past was that the pay received by these officers was not commensurate with the responsibilities they had undertaken. That was so particularly during the days of war, even though provision was made by means of a temporary arrangement to increase the pay. The recent increases that were announced do not go as far as some of us would have liked to see them go, but they have been favourably received and have gone a long way toward removing one of the major causes of dissatisfaction on the part of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Their duties, as your honour knows, were most onerous during the period of the war. Their duties today, having regard to the work they do in connection with the investigation of subversive elements such as communists in our midst, is of grave importance and demands the most serious attention on the part of parliament. These officers—and by officers I mean the general personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—however much their pay may be increased, still find themselves in the position of being very lowly paid, having regard to the fact that in the main they are on duty 168 hours in each and every week.

In running over this bill, I am particularly impressed with one thing, and that is the care with which these amendments have been prepared and the apparent desire of the minister and those associated with him to remove a number of causes of serious complaint.

I realize that I should not go into any particular sections at this time, and I do not intend to do so except to say that one of the major causes of objection until this bill was introduced was that time served in active service during the last war was not in the term of service of an officer counted for pension purposes under the act. But that has now been covered, removing a serious cause of objection.

I would ask the minister, however, to explain this. What about the position of the men who served in the mounted police during the period of the war and who, at the conclusion of their term of office, decided in their own interests—and by their own interests I mean in the discharge of their patriotic feelings—to enlist in the armed forces and go overseas instead of continuing in the service of the force? Provision should be made so that their period of service should also count, irrespective of the fact that in September, 1939, the statement was made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) that no permission would be granted them to enlist in the armed services.

Another matter of importance is that, while part 3 today provides for retirement allowances for members of the force, those who are serving at the time this bill goes into effect are not being compulsorily required to give up their choice in favour of the provisions of this act whereby a compulsory amount must be paid by them if they would come under its provisions.

I should like to mention a few other anomalies which should be removed and regarding which there is considerable criticism. First and foremost, there is the matter that has been brought up on previous occasions, the marriage regulations. We have been losing our trained men in the mounted police, and no man can discharge his responsibilities as a member of this force unless he has training and experience. Only last year I ascertained this fact, that between January, 1946, and May, 1947, 246 members of the mounted police voluntarily left the force, which number included 109 retirements at the expiration of their respective periods of service, 45 of whom had a matter of only between five and ten years' service. One of the causes of ill-feeling is the fact that marriage is denied to members of the force until the expiry of five years' service. In addition to that, a new rule is made that they must have assets of $1,200 instead of the $500, as the rule used to be. I know the explanation that is given. It is that we must have young men in the force. But surely these young men who serve in the force should not be required to remain in the force until they are approximately thirty years of age before being permitted to marry.

Another matter is the personnel report. As a member of the force moves from place to place a secret personal file is kept of him. He never has an opportunity of seeing that file, but that file operates against him as the years go by, and many of the men in the force find themselves in the position of not understanding why promotion is being denied them. I suggest this—and it has come to me from members of the force—that they should have the right to peruse their file with a view to answering any charges which have been made against them but which have not gone to the point where an actual charge has been preferred under the provisions of the police act.

Just in that connection, I see by the amendments that further provision is made for the trial of police officers. I consider it most unfair, as do the members of the force, that when they come up for trial they are denied the privilege of being represented by counsel. I have not the regulation here—I could find it without any difficulty—but it is a rule which prevents them from being represented by professional counsel on charges that will determine their future.

Another cause of complaint is from many of the younger members of the force who wish to go on to police colleges. Their usual complaint is that, however much they may wish to improve themselves they find that seniority, seniority bordering on retirement, is the qualification for attendance at courses from which improved technological procedures might be learned by the members of the force.

So far as the detective force is concerned, one of their major complaints is that, while they are required to go about in plain clothes, the total amount allowed them as a plain clothes allowance was, at the last information I have received, twenty-five cents a day, an amount totally inadequate to permit them properly to clothe themselves.

These are just a few of the complaints that, I suggest, should be removed in order to restore a higher degree of morale than prevails today in the force.

There is one other matter and it is of major importance. Today the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in all parts of Canada are engaged in a recruitment campaign to secure 300 to 400 new men for the force. No doubt the reason for that campaign is the fact that the duties and responsibilities of members of the force have been materially increased by reason of communistic endeavours in all parts of Canada. We are in a position where we cannot ourselves ascertain what the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police consider is necessary to increase their ability to cope with the subversion that they find in so many places. I realize that the mounted police officers are denied the privilege of discussing these matters publicly, although it has come to this stage that in the last few weeks two of the officers have dealt with communism and its danger to our country. One of them, Superintendent McClellan of the intelligence branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police spoke in Ottawa; another one, Inspector Savoie, spoke in Winnipeg before a service club. They placed before service clubs something of what the danger is.

There is only one way in which the people of this country can fully understand the situation, and that is, by being given, within the limits of security, nevertheless in general terms, the information that is possessed by the Department of Justice in order that our people may be aroused and not soothed as so many are today.

I do not know what the mounted police officers believe is necessary to cope with this situation; none of us do, except the minister and those charged with the administration of the Department of Justice. In the United States there have been continuing investigations regarding this situation and as to the proper course that should be adopted. One of the star witnesses before the United States committee was no other than J. Edgar Hoover, head of the investigation branch of the United States. When he appeared before the committee of congress this outstanding police officer advised the people of the United States by placing his point of view before the members of congress on what should be done. We meet in parliament from week to week and all the information we have regarding this problem is what we read in the newspapers.

The committee of the United States congress dealt with the matter and made certain recommendations which are set forth in an article in the Christian Science Monitor of April 25, 1948. The conclusion which they came to was that communism should be kept above ground as much as possible, but that the party and every fringe organization should be subject to the principle of self-identification; that is, require them to register and to reveal periodically their offices, their connections and the sources of their support. I point out that one of the men who took that stand was the man who has built up in the United States an effective police organization embodying many of the great principles of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police without at the same time having the lengthy tradition of that organization.

I should like to ask the minister this question: will he frankly tell parliament what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police require to do in order to cope with the cult of confusion that is being disseminated by communists in our country? I speak with police officers. They say that the law, as it stands today, is insufficient to meet the situation. After all, what we are trying to do here is to place in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, under democratic principles and under parliament, the tools with which they can cope with the situation they find. Because the Canadian people are asking for this, I ask the minister if he will place before the house and the country what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are asking in the way of amendments to the law, and will he make this country aware of the situation, generally speaking, in regard to the spread of communism in our midst?

The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) made a striking speech the other night, but I cannot refer to another debate in this connection. I do say that, however striking are the speeches which are made in this house, none of us is in the position of the Minister of Justice who represents the law officers of this country, since he is the head of this great institution which has behind it a record and tradition of service equalled by no other police organization in the world. No one is in a better position to place before the house and the country exactly what the position is. No one else is in the position of placing frankly and fairly, and again I say within the limitations of national security, the situation as it is.

I am going to bring one matter to the attention of the minister. It was brought to my attention again today and to the attention of other hon. members, as indeed to his. I know what the situation is in some parts of our country. We have people who came here from various parts of Europe, and they have relatives over there living today under the shadow or behind the iron curtain. I know there are hon. members in different parts of the house who can bear me out in this. These people are being asked for contributions, if not directly, certainly indirectly, to assist in the spread of communism in Europe. They are loyal Canadians; they have no loyalty other than loyalty to our institutions, and I want to say in that connection that the record of voluntary enlistment in the armed forces in the last war was not exceeded either by Anglo-Saxon Canadians or Canadians of French origin when compared with those whose people came from continental Europe. These people ask, why is it that we are placed in a position of being intimidated?

I place one example before the committee. The minister himself has received a letter along the same line. A group of men representing the council of Canadian south Slavs are today using threats against members of their own race domiciled in Canada that if the individual threatened does not conform to the wishes of the group his relatives still in Yugoslavia will suffer. That is happening to people of other racial origins in Canada. These people in Canada whose loved ones are over there are being intimidated by a form not of subtle threats but of actual direct intimidation.

As I understand the law, there is nothing that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can do today to proceed against those who, by subversive activity such as that, actually undermine the state. The only provision that I know anything about, outside of the provisions covering sedition, which can be used in these particular circumstances is section 748 (2), which deals with the question of threats, but does not deal with questions such as I have pointed out.

What is the situation? Mounted policeman after mounted policeman have told me this, that they go out into these districts and find these activities going on. They find these threats being made against loyal Canadians; and these people cannot understand why, under our law, activities such as that may flourish and expand, and why there should be no law to proceed against the wrongdoers.

I suggest this—and it is just one example; I could mention several others—that the mounted police charged with this great responsibility did not fail us during the war. They did not fail us in 1939 at the outbreak of war.

They had complete lists of those who would have undermined the state; and they are not failing us today, operating as they have in the past as a silent force.

But I do feel this, that they have the right to ask those of us in parliament to face up to this issue, and to give to them within democratic confines something by way of teeth in the law which will support them, and which will serve to prevent the uncontrolled dissemination of communism in our country.

I am not going into any further detail at this time. Let me say to the minister that this bill goes a long way toward removing many of the anomalies which have existed for years. It will be appreciated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police throughout our country. They have been prepared to make sacrifices in the interests of Canada. We in parliament should, as I see it, do our part to place on the statute books laws which are more up to date, laws applicable to 1948, laws that will have some regard to the expansion of the subversive undercurrent of communism in our country, laws which will meet present-day needs, so that our police officers will be able to assure us of protection against subversion, which protection too often was absent in those countries which have recently been overrun.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, because a major part of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has its headquarters in my city of Regina, and because of the tradition built around the work of the mounted police over the past several years, I consider it proper that the member from Regina should say a few words respecting the general principles underlying the bill now before us for second reading.

I have not had an opportunity to study the bill in detail. However it looks to me as though it is designed to remedy those conditions which were brought before the House of Commons when in previous years we have been in committee of supply on mounted police estimates.

I said at the beginning that those of us who call ourselves prairie pioneers look upon the mounted police as our own force. While undoubtedly some seventy years ago it was initiated in Ottawa, the fact remains that the major part of its early work was performed on the prairies from the time of the Riel rebellion, and has had a great deal to do with the attitude toward law and order that those of us who spring from non-British stock have come to regard as the law of Canada. I say that because we see it through the eyes of the mounted police, to whom we have looked for friendship and counsel.

I believe the glamour feature of the mounted police has often been over-emphasized. We could properly leave that to the autograph seekers who come to these buildings during the summer months to take pictures of the men who are on duty outside the building and who are more or less on show.

Sometimes it is said that it is difficult to get recruits for the mounted police, or that the type of recruit today is not of the same high standard attracted some thirty or forty years ago. I believe that in some measure the glamour aspect is responsible; because, while the young men of today are as good and loyal citizens as were their fathers and grandfathers in years gone by, they are a little more hard-headed with respect to the dollars-and-cents aspect of the matter, and regarding the amenities which go with the duties they have to perform.

I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) the fact that the conditions under which the force operates, particularly the conditions of discipline, are in many respects outmoded. No one would say that a police force as much respected as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should not have a high and rigid standard of discipline. But when the disciplinary features become petty, or when a constable or non-commissioned officer may be made or broken by a martinet above him, then I think it is time we brought ourselves up to date. The commissioner and, through him, his assistant deputies are practically the sole arbiters as to the worth or otherwise of a constable who may have served for years on important missions. They are the sole arbiters in respect of dismissal.

Reference was made earlier by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the fact that members of the force are not in a position to comment on adverse reports in their files. That is not just, and does not improve the prestige of the force, nor does it improve the attitude of the men toward the work they may have to perform.

There was a time from October, 1918—and perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong—when order in council P.C. 2213 was passed, when members of the mounted police force were prevented the right of association, whether through trade unions or through organization of a fraternal nature among their own membership. They were denied those channels through which they might present their grievances on a semi-equal basis to higher officers, or to make comments with respect to the good and welfare of the service.

That form of rigorous treatment of men as competent as those in the mounted police is as outmoded as are the horses and buggies we used to use on the prairies forty or fifty years ago. It seems to me that the right of association of constables of the force should be encouraged rather than frowned upon by the Minister of Justice.

Tradition in an excellent thing; but when it is hedged in by an obsolete form of discipline, then I think it is time to do away with it. I want the minister, if he will, to comment during the course of his remarks on the fact as to whether or not the superannuation referred to in the amendments to the act will supersede the original superannuation plan whereby constables of the force received superannuation rights without contribution on their own part. We now have a contributory system of superannuation being introduced here for non-commissioned officers and constables. Formerly only commissioned officers were obliged to contribute.

Second I should like to know whether or not the pension plan that had been instituted for non-commissioned officers and constables, which was non-contributory on the part of non-commissioned officers and constables, is now being incorporated into this plan, or whether it will be possible for those who were not contributing to their pension to continue to be free of contribution from here on for the remainder of their period of service; and whether or not those who had contributed to the superannuation plans involving their wives would now have some consideration by having the old plan incorporated in the new.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is clear in the act.

Mr. PROBE: I may not have read it carefully enough. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said it is clear in the act. If it is, then of course the fault is with my poor reading. I had the bill only this afternoon, and to me it was not clear. The minister may be able to clear that up.

I think that is all I wish to say at this time, Mr. Speaker. But I should like some clarification as to where the old pension plans stand now with relation to the contributory ones that are now being discussed here.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a remark or two about the police, and then to suggest to the minister three points or three legislative fields which I think are worthy of study, following the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Mr. Probe.]

To those of us who have watched this force and have been close to it, theirs is an amazing achievement. I refer particularly to Regina whence comes the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe). I do not know that we really appreciate what has gone on in their laboratories by way of scientific study. We always hear about the great achievements of the federal bureau of investigation. They are great; they are not only great but tremendously expensive. The federal bureau of investigation are now recruited from persons who must have professional education, even graduation in accountancy or law. There may be some other profession involved, but I know those two are.

Not so long ago I had occasion to have experience with some of the excellent work which is being done by the mounted police on a number of subjects. One was human hair. It would just amaze you, Mr. Speaker, how those men in that place, having found a bit of hair, and then getting a piece of yours, would show that you were the person who was at the scene of the crime at the particular moment when it was committed. The things they have done with steel and the things they have done with paint are remarkable. I was on the losing end of a case not so long ago where my unfortunate client, in committing his crime, had scraped against the wall and a bit of paint came off and fell into his overcoat pocket. The paint was of a common variety, the kind used in painting barns and so on. But the mounted police were able, by an amazing instrument, to photograph in colour the bit of a crumb of paint in this man's pocket. Then, by comparing it with the paint on the wall, they were able not only to trace it and establish that it belonged to that kind of paint, but to trace it back to where the paint was made and the shipment from which it came; and in that way to trace it to the store from which it was sold and thus identify my innocent client with this crime which had been committed.

Those things have been done, and I mention only two or three. The work that has been done with regard to blood is simply phenomenal. The mounted police, I might say, have matched and in some cases exceeded the achievements of this institution in Washington. It strikes me as strange that the man who is in charge of all that, and who is a wizard if ever I saw one, is only a sergeant major in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I will not mention his name because he may be getting a medal; and if I mentioned his name he probably would not get it, so I will not do so.

Then going back through history, I know of so many fine, extracurricular things, if I may use that expression, that have been done. But they all point up this fact, Mr. Speaker, and I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has no doubt given it consideration. Our greatest lack in crime detection and punishment in the Dominion of Canada is a central police organization as, for example, England has.

I am happy to think that in the province from which I come we have no provincial police. The mounted police perform those duties. In many towns in Alberta that is the situation and they are growing in number. The mounted police, under contract with these towns, are also doing the municipal policing which is required in these various places. The thing that I call to your attention there is this. Consider what a mounted policeman in Alberta must necessarily know. He must know the dominion laws, outside of the code laws with respect to narcotics and all that sort of thing. The mounted police have been involved —and I am sorry they were—in the wartime prices and trade board prosecutions. They must know the many dominion statutes. In those towns which have contracted with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police they must know the municipal laws of the community in which they are carrying on. I can think of three places now in which I know the municipal authorities are happy about the change they made. They have no municipal police. The whole thing is carried on by the mounted police.

I said that I intended to make some suggestions to the minister as to a field in which legislation might take place. One is with respect to the field of communism. The first thing I point out is this. There are in the Dominion of Canada thirteen foreign language newspapers which are admittedly communist newspapers. They have a large circulation indeed. There is no hiding the fact—it is admitted—that all their propaganda is obviously of that kind. I do not want to go into detail with regard to matters of perhaps jurisdictional differences, but I mention it merely as a field of study. I have no doubt the minister has already given consideration to that point.

I turn now to something else, perhaps the most important field in which this parliament may operate. That is the pinpointing, if I may use that expression, of communist propagandists, both oral and through the newspapers. That must rest on one thing. I would rest it on the principle that all persons doing that sort of thing for a country other than Canada must register as a foreign agent. Then, when our people know the person to whom they are listening is a foreign agent they can accept what that person says and evaluate it properly. I spoke on this matter in this house some time ago. Some people thought I went too far; and at times when I am told that by enough people I even doubt my own judgment. But it does seem to me that we must come to this point in whatever we do, that the person among us who confesses higher loyalty than that to the Dominion of Canada, should, in short order, be regarded and treated and punished as a criminal in this country.

In saying that, I am saying nothing against our freedoms the freedom of a citizen; because what is the privilege and what are the responsibilities of a citizen of Canada? His privilege is the protection the laws of Canada give him. His responsibility is loyalty to the king of Canada and to Canadian institutions. If that person is not prepared to accept the responsibility while he enjoys the privilege, then the equation is broken; the equality is gone. He stands for what he is, the agent of a foreign country. I do not want to go into detail, but I suggest that basis for a study of what may be done legislatively by this parliament in combating that menace.

Another matter which I think requires thorough investigation is this. Are the embassies and consulates of certain countries being used for the spread of propaganda here which, in the final analysis, is aimed at the destruction of this country? I make no charge, but I say this. We have an expression "diplomatic immunity." We even had a couple of dogs barking at our diplomatic immunity the other day. But this big expression, "diplomatic immunity," must certainly be a two-way street. In other words, diplomatic immunity should never permit an embassy or a consulate in this country to be the means of spreading propaganda for the destruction of our way of life, unless in the country from which those people come we have permission to act in a similar way. There is no sense, it seems to me, and no justice in our just hiding behind a formula when we know very well that the immunities we would get over there are not the same as we are granting here. In other words, I think in the legislative field we might find something in the nature of reciprocity on that subject.

Once more I want to say how much I am in favour of the principle of this bill. After we pass it, no mounted policeman will die with a sockful of money, or anything like that. The pay is modest. The reason is just. The time is opportune, and I shall help the minister in every way possible to get this bill, as he has drawn it, through the House of Commons.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): The points I planned on discussing have already been mentioned, Mr. Speaker, but before you leave the chair I want to urge that greater consideration be given the question of the compensation of members of the mounted police. I have always thought that, if we take into account the responsibilities of the members of the force and the number of hours they are on duty in the course of a week, the compensation is quite inadequate; and the increases that have been given on account of the increase in the cost of living have not been sufficient. I also want to urge that consideration be given those who joined the armed services that they should not be penalized through the loss of seniority.

Then I want to raise the point that has often been mentioned in the house, the medieval ideas still prevalent in connection with the marriage regulations. For some twenty years I have lived in a northern frontier area where we have seen a succession of young men join the service and come north. There they have become acquainted with schoolteachers, nurses and other charming young women in that north country, and decided they would not wait for five years to get married. As a result, they have given up the mounted police and have been lost to the service. It could be understood, perhaps, that regulations of this sort might be necessary before the railways were built across Canada, when men went to their posts on horseback; but now, with modern travel, I can see no reason why a man who is able to measure up to the requirements of the force should not be allowed to get married.

The standards that have been set are high. No officer or constable shall be appointed to the force unless he is of sound constitution, active and able-bodied, of good character and between the ages of eighteen and forty, and unless he is able to read and write either the English or the French language. Men who can meet these requirements should not be asked to wait for five years before marrying, if they meet the young lady of their choice. I would remind the minister that, during the war years, he did not ask young men who joined the army, the navy or the air force to wait for five years before taking on family responsibilities. The minister was able to find the wherewithal to provide allowances for the dependents of those who risked their lives for our country in wartime; and I urge that now in peacetime, in his own department, he remove these barriers which prevent his personnel from living a normal life.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

In northern Manitoba there is today no problem in providing air transportation. I know of a corporation which maintains a large establishment in the Churchill river district. They encourage women to come into that community, and men to live normal lives, because they believe they get much more in the course of the year from men who come in and bring their wives and children with them. In the event of illness, people are flown out to the nearest hospital, and provision is also made to fly them out for their holidays. I believe the people who live in these northern areas deserve the best from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I think we should encourage the young men who go in there to marry and bring in their wives.

The final thing I want to do is to put in a word on behalf of my legal friends. I find in the act a long list of offences and penalties. The paragraphs run all the way from a, b, c and down to x. Section 31 of the act provides:

> The commissioner, the deputy commissioner and assistant commissioner, or the superintendent or other commissioned officer at any post or in any district, may, forthwith, on a charge in writing of any one or more of the offences mentioned in this act or any regulation made under the authority hereof being preferred against any member of the force, other than a commissioned officer, cause the person so charged to be brought before him, and he shall then and there, in a summary way, investigate the said charge, and, if proved on oath, to his satisfaction, shall thereof convict the offender. Every commissioned officer for the purpose of this section is empowered to administer the necessary oaths in dealing with a charge in a summary way.

I know that some provision has been made in the bill for lesser punishments, but this section still places members of the staff in a position where they can be dealt with in what I consider to be an undemocratic way. I can quite understand where regulations of this sort might have been necessary before the railroads were established and when men went out to the northwest and were beyond civilization for six months or even six years at a time. No doubt it was necessary to give special responsibilities to those in charge of the force, but I can see no reason why the personnel should not have legal assistance.

I know if I were in trouble I should like to have my good friends, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), or if I were in serious trouble I should like to have the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) plead my case. I would feel that, no matter how dark the future might seem to be, he would make a good argument for a very bad case. I think members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are entitled to legal assistance.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) lives in a province in which they have high union fees. I notice that a publisher got a lawyer from Ontario and had to pay union fees in Alberta which ran over $1,500. That publisher probably considered it important that he have legal counsel available to argue his case. No matter how clever a lawyer one might be, I think if a charge were made against you, you would want someone else to argue your case. While the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are familiar with law and no doubt could defend themselves in most cases, I think they are entitled to counsel to argue their cases.

Many members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have to take on assignments at risk of life. Section 30 provides:

(n) wilfully, or through negligence or connivance, allowing any prisoner to escape.

A man might act on the spur of the moment. I understand that there have been cases where the record was quite clear but where someone who had a good deal of money and held a spite against the police officer took legal action against him. I think it is unfair that a member of the force should have to argue his own case. There should be legal counsel provided for him at public expense as long as he is a member of the force. If he is proved guilty of the offence and is to be dismissed, well and good, but so long as his record is clear I think it should be taken as a matter of course that, if action is taken against him, legal counsel will be provided to see that his case is presented in the proper light.

I wanted to bring these matters to the attention of the minister because the new bill does not make provision for these matters.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word on the bill before us. We consider that this Bill No. 211 is a step forward in bringing to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that decent treatment which many of us felt should have come some time ago. I want to congratulate the minister upon having gone into the whole matter. I think it was a year ago that he gave the promise that something would be done at the earliest possible moment.

We are in agreement with the principles of the bill. While it does not go all the way toward the objective that we hoped would be attained, it is certainly a substantial betterment and we are happy about it.

It has been my good fortune to live on the frontier and be associated with the work of this splendid force ever since I was a small boy. I have seen the changes that have taken place in the force, and my experience from seeing them work in my boyhood home, and more recently in the Peace River country, has led me to believe that the old pioneering spirit of the force has not lost one particle of its vitality. I find the members of the force to be efficient and courteous without becoming obnoxious or obtrusive in any sense. I believe the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can be compared favourably with the finest police force in the world, and that without in any sense being accused of exceeding their duties or of taking privileges such as are taken in many lands. We are grateful to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and for what they have accomplished in this country.

There is one word I should like to say to the minister. I believe it was during the throne debate a year ago last spring I said that in my judgment the special investigation branch of the force was being neglected. I have not kept up to date with the improvements that have been made, but when the minister is closing the debate I hope that he will have something to say about the special investigation branch.

At that time I was of the opinion, from information which I had received from very good sources, that the special investigation branch was being sorely neglected. I did not think at that time—and I think I so stated on the floor of the house—that the best men available were being recruited into that branch. Subsequent events proved that we needed them, because it was not long after that Mr. Gouzenko made his sensational revelations which touched off the communist hunt throughout this country and, in, fact, throughout America.

Reports had been sent in by special investigators prior to that time from various parts of Canada; in fact I would say that some were dated two or three years before the spy probe. These reports from special investigation officers were sent in from areas where it was known that communistic activity was strong, but no attention whatever seemed to be paid to them. The details given were correct and those details were furnished to headquarters, but the reports were pigeonholed. In some instances that I know, these officers were told to tread lightly and not go too far.

When you have an efficient special investigation branch and where it is known there is a strong possibility of communist infiltration, every report sent in by these special investigation officers ought to be carefully scanned and sent on to the commissioner or assistant commissioner, and a note taken, with action wherever it is recommended.

It seems to me that, in selecting men for the special investigation branch, full cognizance should be taken of the experience of the men and of the effective work they have done over the years; and further, that in a specialized branch which requires a particular type of investigational sense the men should receive pay comparable with the qualifications which are necessary to the attainment of a high degree of efficiency in that branch. I do not believe, from my experience with that branch, that these men have been given quite a fair deal in years past.

I recall particularly, when we made the change-over in the province of Alberta from the old Alberta provincial police, there were some misgivings about making a contract with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We were uncertain as to the abilities of the force to police the province generally. We did not know how efficient their special investigation branch would be. But after ten years of quite close association with the acting assistant commissioner in Edmonton, and with the force, generally, I want to pay tribute to these men for what they did accomplish, both those in the general force and in the special investigation branch. Those officers were splendid men. I think it is time that the minister and his department strengthened the whole force, as well as the special investigation branch by getting in the very best men they can get, men who are trained in all the modern techniques of investigation and report, and that adequate pensions be provided and payment be made to them commensurate with the services they are rendering. We are very happy, Mr. Speaker, to support the principle of this bill.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, as a former member of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police I should not like this bill to go to the committee without expressing my appreciation to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) for having introduced the bill, which will improve the service conditions and pensions of the force that now perpetuates the tradition of the force to which I belonged. I should like to say from my personal observation, that I am convinced that the younger men who are in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are in every way upholding the highest traditions of their former comrades.

I have not had an opportunity to study the bill in detail, nor should the details be discussed at this stage, but there are three points which have already been mentioned in part that I should like to emphasize and perhaps illustrate.

The first is the effort to intimidate certain groups of Canadians who have come to this country from Europe. Only today it was brought to my attention that a disturbance had occurred at a meeting held in Nanaimo and presided over by the mayor of that town, when a gentleman who had recently come from Europe was endeavouring to explain to some of his fellow countrymen and the citizens of the town at large the conditions as they exist in Europe at the present time. The greatest difficulty was experienced in trying to maintain order during that meeting, because a group of some thirty or forty hooligans, mostly of foreign extraction, were endeavouring to prevent this gentleman from telling of conditions as they actually exist. They were accused of being communists, and actually four of them stood up and admitted that they were communists. But they were holding out threats to their fellow countrymen that their relatives in Europe would be persecuted if they listened to the words of advice which were being given by this Canadian gentleman of foreign extraction who was speaking to the meeting at that time. I understand that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the law officers of the crown to take any action against people who threaten to do bodily harm to relatives of other people when those relatives are not resident in this country. Whether it is possible for the criminal code to be amended in order to take care of that situation I do not know, but I feel that the task of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be made easier if something could be done along those lines.

The second point I wanted to bring to the minister's attention was touched upon by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe), who expressed the hope that there might be some means of harmonizing the various pension schemes that existed during the long service of the various forces, the Northwest Mounted Police, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are men living today who joined the Northwest Mounted Police and who served for years at fifty cents a day, that being the rate of pay at that time. I received a letter not very long ago from a warrant officer of that force who joined in 1905 and served until 1935, when he was asked to make way in order to speed up promotion. He had done thirty years of service instead of thirty-five years. By agreeing to the request of his superior officers, he forfeited the full pension that he would have obtained had he stayed on for another five years. I should like to read an extract from his letter. I prefer not to mention his name, although I shall be pleased to give it to the minister if he so desires. He says:

> I have to date contributed the sum of $2,609.75, leaving a balance of $249.53 still due on the full amount.

After he discussed his retirement with his senior officer, he was informed that he would have to pay the sum of $219 yearly for the rest of his life. Actually the words which are written on his discharge certificate are, according to my information, these:

> A clause should be inserted on the discharge board to the effect that Sergeant (So-and-so's) pension will be subject to a monthly reduction of $18.25 on account of prior service contribution to the widows pension fund for the rest of his life. Please exercise care in seeing that this clause is inserted on the discharge board for Sergeant (So-and-so).

It seems to me that is a hard case, this old retired police officer who joined up when the pay was only fifty cents a day.

I hope that the details of this bill, or any amendments which may be suggested during the discussion, will harmonize these various pension schemes.

The last point I wish to make has to do with the question of whether provision is being made in the bill for those ex-members of the force who served overseas in units other than the No. 1 provost company, which was a unit in which men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police enlisted directly, to count their services overseas toward their police pension fund if they rejoined the force after taking their discharge from the navy, army or air force, as the case may be. I understand that this was permitted in the case of members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who served in world war I and came back and joined the force. Unless it is included in the amendments which I have not had a chance to study in the short time since the bill has been distributed, this provision has not been extended to former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who served overseas during world war 11.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that I can really add a great deal more to what has already been said. I appreciate the remarks of the leader of this group (Mr. Low) who has made our position quite clear. I appreciate also the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). We favour this bill because we believe that the magnificent work which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have done in the past and are doing today deserves great consideration.

The particular thing I had in mind, and which called me to my feet this evening, is that I believe there should be inserted in this bill somewhere some assistance to the unfortunate widows of those Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers who were perhaps, shall I say, unfortunate enough to be non-pensioned. I do not know to what extent that situation exists, but I do know of one case, and perhaps if there is one case there must be others, where a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police died, leaving a widow. She is now growing old and is in need. Her husband had a good record, but because she did not come within the scope of certain acts that are already in existence she was unable to be the recipient of any assistance. I do not know just how far this bill goes along that line and I cannot pick out the section here and discuss it now, but when we come to that section I wish the minister would elaborate on it a bit and tell us how far we are prepared to go in that direction. These cases cannot be very numerous; there cannot be many of them. It surely should not take a great deal of money to look after the few that there may be.

While I am on my feet I want to pay tribute to the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because I am inclined to believe that, while they may have been lauded to the skies in fiction, when perhaps it may appear that they have made a bit of a mistake here and there someone in the country is too quick to pounce upon them and besmirch them. I say that what we have to remember—and this goes, I suppose, for any police force—is that the police are in reality our protectors. Let us not forget that. I know that among some of them there may be those who appear to have that police complex, shall I say, and if the word is not too expressive, that bludgeoning aspect; but I am inclined to think that perhaps it might be a matter of the nature of the particular individual, because you cannot stereotype human nature, any way.

Generally speaking, I believe that they are doing work to protect the country and to protect the citizens, and not necessarily running out and hunting up a lot of trouble for the sake of doing so. Let us remember that. While my little voice here will not get very far outside this chamber, I am quite certain it might be well for parents in this country to teach their children just that very thing. Children do not need to have the attitude of being just a little frightened of the policeman. That does not need to be. I can say, from experience and from my association with some members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in our province of Alberta, and in my own constituency—and I am not going to mention any names, because like the hon. member for Calgary West, I say that if there are any medals to be passed out I do not want to prevent their getting what is coming to them—I have received many comments from police magistrates to the effect that the officers are very helpful in solving cases, not necessarily or particularly as would-be prosecutors but with regard to the administration of justice as well. I have been told that many of them are very helpful to police magistrates in arriving at a rightful and just decision in respect of their duties.

I know a good many officers. I do not want to over-elaborate. I know some Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers who are highly respected in their communities because they take an interest in community life. They recognize that an ounce of prevention is much better than a pound of cure. Through their community activities they command respect, and the young people look up to them. They are not afraid of the mounted police, but look upon them as men who are interested in the welfare of the community. When that situation exists it is a healthy sign, particularly when we know they are our protectors.

There is an attitude among some people in the country to besmirch the mounted police and to attempt to make them look ridiculous. When our young people hear that sort of thing it is not good for them, nor is it good for our country. I remember an occasion a good many years ago when I attended an open-air meeting at which a soap-box orator was speaking. One or two mounted police constables were standing around; and this speaker actually pointed them out and said, "There they are; look at the yellow stripes down their trousers. The only thing wrong with that is that it should be down their backs."

I do not think that sort of thing impresses sane-thinking people. Perhaps people of the kind I have described should be thankful that they live in a free country, where they can make statements of that kind without being molested. Be that is it may, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not deserve anything like that, and there is a responsibility on the citizens of this country to see that that sort of thing does not happen. We must take people to task if that sort of thing is done.

We are behind this bill, and would be pleased if it went farther. The members of this group believe that these pension schemes could be well-handled on a non-contributory basis. I shall not go into the economics of the matter, more than to say that these men deserve all we are able to give them, not only in pensions but in pay. I do not believe their pay is high enough in view of their responsibilities. However, that is another subject which does not come within the provisions of the bill. We cannot forget, however, that the cost of living is constantly rising, and these men deserve even more consideration along that line. My last note would be a request for the government to reconsider their scale of pay.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, as they generally are. I shall not refer to any particular sections in the bill, and shall not do more than in a general way express my approval of this important legislation which will redound to the further advantage and further protection of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I join with all other loyal and law-abiding Canadians in paying respect to this police force, a respect shared not only by the people of Canada but by many thousands in other nations of the world. These men perform their duties midst greater dangers than most of us realize. I know for a fact that often they are ferreting out crimes when most of us are at home and are comfortable, probably asleep. No matter what dangers they have to confront, it can always be said that the mounted police acquit themselves like men.

I believe that in late years they have been successful in doing their work with a greater degree of smoothness and a lesser degree of irritation than was the case some years ago. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) referred to their work among the young people, and their addresses to groups in the different communities. I know a little about that, and it is my belief that the results have been far-reaching in creating better understanding between these officers of the law and ordinary citizens.

It is not necessary for me to speak at length; but one of the previous speakers suggested that, while a number of anomalies in the act have been remedied, some still remain. I would add to his remarks that every reasonable step should be taken to remove any anomalies which, he suggests, remain in the act. I am in favour of anything within reason that would redound to the advantage of the force.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like briefly this evening to express my approval of the action of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) in bringing this measure before the House of Commons so soon after his taking over his new post.

It was in 1946, shortly after I came to this twentieth parliament that I made the suggestion—I suppose it had been made before, but the fact is that I did make it—that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be put on a pension basis comparable with that of the armed forces. I am greatly pleased that the minister has done that, and I hope that the armed forces service of those now in the mounted police will be counted immediately for pension purposes, and also for marriage privileges and benefits.

I am advised that service in one of the armed forces is now only counted after the constable has given twenty years of service with the force. I may be wrong in that, and if I am I hope the minister will correct me. I would make one further recommendation, one which has been made by several other members this evening, and it is that, now that the principle of equality with the armed forces in the field of pensions has been recognized, the minister will ask his department and his officers to compare the ordinary pay of mounted police constables and officers with that of those of the armed forces. If anomalies are found, perhaps in a short time he could put them right.

I believe, too, that there should be special pay for certain posts in this service, perhaps for the special investigations branch. Then, consideration might be given to the cost of living in urban centres for members of the force who are posted in large cities where the cost of living rises sharply.

I shall not delay the house much longer, more than to say that, from the speeches tonight, it seems clear to me that further legislation is required to give our mounted police the power to fight the battle in which they are engaged today, the battle against foreign agents and communists in Canada. I believe we must have legislation to give the mounted police power to protect our people and to protect those who are threatened by the agents of a foreign power, who would approve engaging in subversive activities or belonging to subversive organizations in this country.

I am another member of this house who has the greatest admiration for what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have done for Canada, for their great services to our nation and for the high reputation they have maintained for a number of years. I will close my remarks by saying this. The members of this force are now in the front line of the cold war. It is the duty of every member of the house and of the government to support them in every possible way.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, there are two points I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I will not delay the house by repetitive remarks on our pride in the work that has been and is being accomplished by this force. I will associate myself with most of what has been said. Personally, I would draw to the attention of the minister that at the present time, and back over a period of a year or two in particular, organizations are continually approaching business people for the purpose of raising money under the pretence of some alliance; perhaps they have the name of their nationality or racial origin attached to them. I am satisfied and convinced, from investigation, that this money is going back through these channels into lands where freedom is a thing of the past.

I suggest to the minister that something might be done to bring organizations of this kind more out into the open. They are not only taking money out of the country but are organizing to the extent of getting people of their own nationality and others to join them. There is no accounting for these moneys which are raised. As I say, the activities of these groups should be forced out into the open. The officers of these groups should be known. These groups should be forced to publish the officers' names on their letterheads. I could produce a letterhead of a so-called society, which gives no name of the president. You cannot tell who is who or anything about it. The result is that these organizations often perpetrate things on the community which, I say, ought to be stopped. I do not know whether there is any law in the land which would stop them, but I am drawing the matter to the attention of the minister.

I want to go a step farther, and this is all I intend to say. These same groups at the present time, particularly with respect to displaced persons who are coming into this country, are making it their business to follow every individual under pretence of teaching him the language he is expected to learn. These groups are bringing these people to meeting places under that guise and are teaching them communism in its worst form. They go a step farther. They point out to these people who are loyal citizens of Canada—and I know many of them—that it is their duty and obligation to join these subversive societies, and indicate what will follow if they do not join. I point out to the minister that there is a sinister threat to people of this type who, as I say, have made their new homes here in Canada.

This matter was referred to by previous speakers; I believe it was referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in a way. I know of cases within the past three weeks in which it has been pointed out to these people that their safest procedure is to join up with these groups. They are reminded that back home in the land of their origin their own people are living under the type of discipline which they are suggesting to our Canadian citizens that they should follow. Something should be done to strengthen the enforcement of the law through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and every other way possible, in order to bring this kind of thing out into the open more than it has been over the past few years in particular.

This thing is growing, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the mounted police know it. I am sure the minister has a good deal of knowledge of what I am referring to. Those are the two points I wished to make: the question of the raising of money and not having the identity exposed, and using a sinister influence to coerce displaced people and others of racial origin other than ours, in order to bring them under an influence which is not conducive to what is best in Canadian citizenship.

I propose to give the minister or some of the officials some details in this connection from time to time. But I urge those two points upon the minister, so that some provision may be made somewhere in order to bring this matter more to the fore than it is at the present moment.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): For the past fifty years, Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of observing at close quarters and associating with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. When I first knew them, they were not called the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They were called the Northwest Mounted Police. That was the force which opened up the middle west.

I saw them in the gold rush of 1898. I went through part of Alaska to get into Yukon. In Alaska there was no such thing as law and order. There was murder and robbery, and crime of all kinds was rampant. When you stepped across the boundary into Canada, you were in a different world. There disorder ceased. If a man came into town packing a gun, the mountie would say, "Let me see that gun." He would say, "Old man, I don't think you will need that. You might hurt yourself with it." And the man did not get the gun back. No one in Yukon carried a gun but members of the mounted police, and then only under exceptional circumstances.

I do not think most people understand or realize the variety of duties performed by the mounted police. They are always ready to go to the rescue of anyone in trouble, no matter what danger or exertion is involved.

This bill is all right as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. This wonderful police force is underpaid, having in mind the value of the services it gives the general public. The pay is out of all proportion to the importance of their duties, and I say we should pay them better. They are not paid as well as those in other branches of the civil service or the public service generally. The work they do and the services they perform entitle them to more pay than the great majority of people in the employ of the government. It is a force to be proud of, the greatest police force in the world, and I am glad that to some extent the minister recognizes that in this bill tonight.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I have just a few words to say. I know that the many tributes which have been paid to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been heard by the commissioner with feelings of gratification, as they have been by myself. During this debate ten or eleven speeches have been made on a wide variety of aspects of the work of the mounted police. Suggestions have been made for amendments to the criminal code, which perhaps were hardly in order in this debate, but all of which will be given respectful consideration by my colleagues and myself.

Some questions have been asked as to the principle and meaning of the bill; but, as I said in my opening remarks, I think those questions can be best answered when we are in committee of the whole. The general nature of the bill is well understood by hon. members, but the details can hardly be advantageously dealt with in a speech on second reading. So, without taking more of the time of the house now, I suggest that second reading be given and that we go into committee for a few minutes, so that we may resume the discussion on another occasion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"Member of the force."

Mr. ILSLEY: This section may as well stand. It is late, and I move that progress be reported.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ILSLEY moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance to go into committee of supply, with the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party. We hope, with the co-operation of hon. members, to be able to dispose of that debate early in the day. If we are successful, then we shall go into supply and call four departments, agriculture, external affairs, trade and commerce, and transport. We shall proceed first with the Department of Agriculture, and then, if we dispose of it, any other items on the order paper.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 27, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 23

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I find in Hansard for Friday last, on page 3301, the following exchange:

Mrs. Strum: Are the insurance companies the government?

Mr. Gardiner: No, they are not; but they have influence in nine provinces.

I was in the house, sir, when this exchange took place. Had I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say what is recorded in Hansard I would have risen immediately on a question of privilege to deny emphatically the assertion that the insurance companies have influence in all nine provinces. I certainly did not hear the minister make any reference to the provinces on Friday evening. The discussion had to do with federal legislation, and I understood the minister to say, "The insurance companies have influence." Whatever was said on Friday evening, and whatever influence the insurance companies may have in other provinces or with the federal government, I think it is apparent that they have no influence on the Saskatchewan government, as is clear from the kind of legislation enacted in my province.

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO REPORTS IN VANCOUVER "NEWS-HERALD" AND WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand a communist sheet of Vancouver called the Vancouver News-Herald, of April 14. It is surprising how intolerant are some protagonists of human rights. They refer to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) and myself, and they say about myself that I am "another in the house's lunatic fringe." We are called the "three crackpots" and the "three 'nut' M.P.'s to smear such a list of distinction" as I read, and they say that the effort "backfired as one of the funniest incidents of the session".

That paper has no official representative in the press gallery, sir, but I understand that this was sent by the nigger in the woodpile, the peevish and rancorous bootblack of the demoted right honourable.

But here is something else. I rise to another question of privilege. This time it is the Winnipeg Free Press, whose Ottawa correspondent sent an honest report of what had happened in the house on April 12. The article I am to mention appeared in the Free Press the day after, April 13, the day Hansard came out. On the 14th one of the editors of this paper wrote this sentence:

After reading Mr. Pouliot's speech in the House of Commons—

He could not have read it because he did not have the Hansard in Winnipeg by that time.

—we were almost ready to join the Montreal Star in its current crusade to protect liberty by abridging it.

That is what the Winnipeg Free Press has done. It goes on:

For if the Quebec member is right, this country is indeed "rotten wth communism", and not only this country but this newspaper.

That newspaper may be, but I never said the country was; I never used that expression. I protest strongly against these pharisees, these hypocrites, men without any sincerity who are ready to protect Tim Buck and all the subversive elements in the country but always have insults for those who abide by the law.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege, if he has one, as briefly as possible.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It goes on:

Mr. Pouliot, in his list of communists or communist dupes—

I did not use the expression "communist dupes", although the names of those who appear on the list are dupes. I say it now but I did not say it then. It was not "my" list, but the list that was sent by the Civil Liberties League to the members of parliament who were on the human rights committee. Therefore I say that the editorial staff of the Winnipeg Free Press are rotten, malfeasant, and hypocrites.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

VETERANS AFFAIRS—FOURTH REPORT

Fourth report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Mutch.

PRICES—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Kuhl be substituted for that of Mr. Johnston on the special committee on prices.

That the name of Mr. Beaudoin be substituted for that of Mr. Cleaver on the special committee on prices.

Motion agreed to.

"CANADA"

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION OF "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION OF CANADA" IN ACTS, ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 213, respecting Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. ARSENAULT: The purpose of this bill is that whenever in any act of the parliament of Canada, or in any order of the governor in council, or in any regulation passed pursuant thereto, the expression "Dominion of Canada" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the expression "Canada"; and whenever the expression "dominion" is used there shall be substituted therefor the expression "Canada" or "Canadian" as the case may be.

One of the many reasons for this bill is that since Canada has become a sovereign state the word "dominion" as applied to Canada has entirely lost its original meaning.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN SLOVAK BENEFIT SOCIETY

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) moved the first reading of Bill No. 210 (from the senate) respecting Canadian Slovak Benefit Society.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION IN FLIN FLON, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, notice of which has already been sent. Have the postal authorities purchased a site for the construction of either a federal building or a post office in Flin Flon, Manitoba? If the answer is no, do they intend to purchase such a site in the near future?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): To the first question the answer is no, and to the second the answer is yes.

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—ASSETS AND LIABILITIES, 1946—QUESTION AS TO OBLIGATION TO FILE RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. A short time ago the minister announced in the house that it would not be necessary for farmers to complete the net worth statement with respect to the 1947 income tax returns. My question is in regard to the return for 1946. Farmers have received forms for 1946 together with a statement of assets and liabilities, which in many respects is similar to the 1947 net worth statement. Is it necessary for the farmers to file a statement of assets and liabilities along with their return for 1946?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, while in most cases it may not be necessary, it is very desirable; and in cases where it is specially asked for it is necessary.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the government intend to provide a bookkeeper for the farmer?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): May I ask a supplementary question? If the farmer receives a letter from the income tax department with the forms, and there is included the statement of assets and liabilities, is it to be taken that he must fill out the statement of assets and liabilities?

Mr. McCANN: If he is making his return on a cash basis it would not be necessary unless asked for. If it is on an accrual basis the statement of assets and liabilities would be necessary.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask a further question of the minister. On the T-1 prairie farmers 1947 form in the upper left-hand corner on page 1 the following appears:

This return must be filed on or before 30th April, 1948 (whether or not any tax is payable) in order to claim the privilege of averaging income over a three-year period. See guide, page 8.

Is it necessary for the farmer to file a return whether or not he is liable for tax? There is a good deal of confusion in the country over that very point.

Mr. McCANN: It is very desirable that they should file that form whether they are taxable or not, because of the fact that if they want to go on the three-year average basis the filed form for that particular year would be very important and necessary.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Did I understand the Minister of National Revenue to say that it was necessary for a farmer to file a return whether or not he was taxable?

Mr. McCANN: I said it was very desirable that he should, particularly if he wanted to go on the three-year average basis.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Then it is quite clear that if a person is not taxable there is no legal obligation on his part to file a return?

Mr. McCANN: Quite true.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I thought the minister had just said that it does apply if a request has been made by the department for a return.

Mr. McCANN: No, it does not apply. I read the sections the other day. If he is taxable he puts in a form; whether he is taxable or not, if he is requested to put in a form he must do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: They have all been requested.

Mr. McCANN: I pointed out that it was to his advantage whether he was taxable or not, if he wanted to go on the average basis. Otherwise he could not come along two or three years afterward and put in a form for a previous year.

FREIGHT RATES

REPRESENTATIONS OF SEVEN PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would inform the house what representations were made to the government yesterday by the premiers of the seven provinces, and what replies were made by the government. If the government is not able today to inform the house as to their response to these representations, when may we expect a statement?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to have the premiers who made their representations yesterday state what these representations were. At the time of the conference I made it quite clear that any of the premiers who had appeared before the government would be at liberty to make public anywhere at any time the representations which they had made to the government. These representations were not presented in the form of a memorial or a written communication. I would not, for that reason, among others, wish myself to state what the representations were. So far as the government is concerned, I gave the assurance in the presence of practically all of my colleagues that the government would take into consideration the representations that had been made. They would have to be, as I have just said, from what we heard orally, and what we have been able on request to secure since that time, in written form.

COARSE GRAINS

ADJUSTMENT PAYMENT IN RESPECT OF PERIOD BETWEEN AUGUST 1, 1947 AND REMOVAL OF CEILING PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. When does the government intend to make an adjustment payment on coarse grains marketed by farmers between August 1, 1947 and the removal of the ceiling prices on coarse grains last fall?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): That is not a matter which will be finally dealt with by the Department of Agriculture; it will be finally dealt with by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The present position is that only about half of the companies have made their payments and the government is not yet in possession of information as to what the others intend to do. Therefore the matter cannot be considered until they have that information in their hands.

SUPPLY

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASES ORDERED BY TRANSPORT BOARD—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL

The house resumed from Thursday, April 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to express my thanks to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for helping to carry over this debate until the provincial premiers had had an opportunity of being heard in Ottawa. I hope that before the debate closes the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will supplement the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and hold out more hope to the people of Canada than that contained in the Prime Minister's statement.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a story from Ottawa, written by Warren Baldwin, to the effect that while in Ottawa the premiers recommended that a royal commission be appointed to investigate the whole question and that pending the royal commission's report the additional rates now in effect be suspended. The royal commission plan involves an investigation of the financial position of both railways, study of the Canadian National capitalization, study of the whole freight rates structure and a re-examination of the evidence and judgment of the board of transport commissioners allowing the present increase.

Also on the front page of the Globe and Mail is a story in connection with the seven cents increase for railroad employees being the board's limit. Some criticism has been made of members of this group for urging that no increase in freight rates be granted while representations are being made for increases in wages. In view of the fact that no increase has been granted to railroad employees for a long time—and the increase in the cost of living has affected these employees as it has all citizens—I do not see that there is any argument about it. The railway employees are entitled to an increase in order to cope with rising costs. In my opinion the Canadian Pacific is in position to pay the increased wages asked for, and the taxpayers of Canada should be prepared if necessary to make it possible for the Canadian National Railways to pay the increased wages.

When I was speaking the other evening I mentioned that again and again throughout the judgment of the board of transport commissioners we read that rates may be increased, may be adjusted, and so on. I expressed the fear that in some parts of Canada where there are already excessively high rates the full 21 per cent increase would be authorized, while in other parts of Canada, where the rates are not so high, no increase would be put into effect. I now have information to support my fears.

For example, the producers at Edenwold have had their rates on eggs increased by 57 per cent whereas the producers in the Ottawa area have no increase in the minimum rate. I have received a copy of a letter written by the Western Canada Produce Association to the Express Traffic Association in Montreal outlining their position. They point out that for at least fifteen years public and private organizations have encouraged the farmers to improve their breeding stock and to deliver their eggs to market more quickly. The railways have received greatly increased revenues from the shipment of eggs.

It is noted that the producers in the west are being faced with a serious increase. They give a list of seventeen points in Saskatchewan, such as Caron, Mortlach, Chaplin and so on, at varying distances from Moose Jaw, the mileages ranging all the way from 16·2 to 137·1. I find that the freight rate for a thirty dozen crate of eggs is increased 57·1 per cent for the lowest point and 114·2 per cent for the highest, with an average of 85·7 per cent. For the shipment of smaller crates of twelve and fifteen dozen, the lowest increase is 28·6 per cent, the average is 35·7 per cent and the highest 42·8 per cent.

I submit that it is difficult to build a united Canada when there is such discrimination as is shown against these seventeen points in Saskatchewan. They have had these drastic increases while points in the Ottawa valley continue to pay the old rates.

On a number of occasions I have expressed the opinion in this parliament that as Canada has a large investment in the Hudson Bay railroad and the harbour facilities and elevator at Churchill, it is in the interests of Canadians that this line have a fair break. According to my information this particular railroad does not come within the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners and no application was made to have the rates on this line increased. No authorization has actually been given for an increase, but the fact is that freight rates have been increased.

From Regina to Churchill is a distance of 843 miles. The old rate was $2.36 per hundred as compared with the new rate of $2.86. That is broken down as follows: for the 510 miles on the government-owned line south of Churchill the old rate was $1.43, while the rate on the Canadian National line was 96 cents for a distance of 333 miles. On the new basis the rate on the portion on the Hudson Bay railway is being increased from $1.43 to $1.73, and on the Canadian National portion from 93 cents to $1.13. I do not think there is any argument to be advanced with regard to the increase on the portion from Regina to The Pas, but I do not think there is any justification for the increase of rates on the portion from The Pas to Churchill. As I said, this portion of the railway was not covered in the application, and no one has any jurisdiction to decide that there should be this increase.

I want to point out that these increases will wipe out any advantage there might have been for Manitoba or Alberta in using the Churchill facilities. It is true that for Saskatchewan it will still be to our advantage to use the Churchill route during the summer months. From Regina to Churchill the first-class rate on the Churchill route will be $2.86 a hundred pounds as compared with $3.93 via Montreal, lake and rail. From Winnipeg to Churchill the rate is $3.60 as compared with $2.83 to Montreal, lake and rail; from Edmonton to Churchill, the rate will be $3.58; whereas from Edmonton to Vancouver the rate will be $3.01. It will still be cheaper to ship from Edmonton to Churchill than from Edmonton to Montreal, but it will be much cheaper to ship from Edmonton to Vancouver.

In view of the special concessions which have been given to Halifax, Montreal and Vancouver, I think it is not unreasonable to ask during this trial period that the government refrain from making it impossible to give this route a fair chance.

In connection with incoming goods, chinaware, for example, the mileage from Regina to Churchill is 845, and the rate is $1.97. From Regina to Montreal the mileage is 1,707, and the rate is only $2.98. From Regina to Halifax the mileage is 2,367, and to Saint John 2,131; the rate is $3.19. If Regina were to enjoy a rail freight rate comparable with the rate to Montreal, Halifax, or Saint John, our importers would be paying the $1.14 rate instead of $1.97. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to urge that, before this debate closes the minister assure parliament that he will review this illegal imposition of increased freight rates on the Hudson Bay railway, which is wholly owned by Canada, does not come under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners, and therefore was not up for consideration when the hearings were being held.

As I mentioned before, the Saskatchewan government prepared a great deal of evidence. I think it cannot be disputed that most fair-minded men would agree that no action should have been taken by the government until this case had been studied and the necessary adjustments made. On page 105 of the compilation of the Saskatchewan government's argument before the board is found the following submission:

> The province of Saskatchewan submits that, under such circumstances the railway deficit thus hypothetically assumed should, in the national interest and in order that further regional injustices may be avoided, be financed through a national subsidy rather than by an increase in freight rates. It is further submitted that in the first instance the national subsidy should take the form of a conditional loan. If a railway crisis exists or develops it may be only temporary in nature. A conditional loan, repayable when the situation becomes normal, and with strict supervision during its currency, would seem to meet the circumstances in a reasonable way.

In supporting the Saskatchewan argument, Mr. M. A. MacPherson, the government counsel, made a careful analysis of the financial position of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He argued that the activities of the railway in land, in the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, in hotels and steamships, should be taken into account in deciding whether the railway was facing bankruptcy or not. Mr. MacPherson asked Mr. Walker, one of the vice-presidents, the following questions regarding Consolidated Mining and Smelting, a subsidiary of the C.P.R., and received the following answers:

> Q. I put it to you that the book value of that stock today is $32,000,000? A. You may or may not be right. I would not contradict you.
> Q. I put it to you that the market value of that stock today is $148,000,000? A. You may or may not be right again. I would not contradict you, because I do not know.
> Q. If I am right, the book value is $32,000,000 and the market value is $148,000,000, but you are only carrying it in your annual report as an asset of $8,412,000? A. Well, again the accountants will have to justify that.
> Q. The return speaks for itself, Mr. Walker?

Then as to the whole financial position, Mr. Walker said, in reply to the following questions:

> Q. So we now have you saying that your credit is impaired, yet your funded debt has been cut down from $228,000,000 to $83,000,000 in six years, your reserves have been built up from $91,000,000 to $350,000,000, you are paying less for your money than you have ever paid in the history of the company, and you are rid of all your high interest-bearing securities; this is right?
> A. I will have to answer the questions in pieces, I am afraid, because it is many-barrelled.
> Later: A. That is largely a matter of bookkeeping, the transfer of items from one side of the ledger to the other,—

And so on and so forth. The argument all the way through, I think, convinces most people that the Canadian Pacific even a year ago, when their financial statements were being examined, were in a strong position. But since that time we have had the report of the 1947 operations, and it is clear that there was no justification for the pessimistic view the C.P.R. took. The company were able to pay all the increased costs they have had in connection with their operations. They were able to pay their income taxes to the federal government. They were able to have available for distribution to their shareholders something over $16,000,000. Really the company are asking for this increase of 21 per cent so that they will be able to build up a much larger surplus.

In view of the fact that the people in all parts of Canada will be affected by this legislation, I think the representations made by the provincial premiers were not unreasonable. They asked that a royal commission be appointed and that in the meantime we wipe out the 21 per cent increase that has been authorized. If the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific cannot meet their legitimate commitments, I am sure that members in all parts of this house will be prepared to vote necessary subsidies at the proper time.

Before concluding I should like to remind the house that we have had a most unusual procedure in connection with this whole question. Although months were spent in studying the matter, the findings of the board of transport commissioners were not brought down until March 30, 1948. Most hon. members at that time were away from Ottawa visiting their constituencies. I was on my way back when I read of the finding. At the earliest opportunity—on April 5—parliament had this matter brought before it by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Again on April 7, when it was clear that the government was not prepared to delay in one detail, the present amendment was placed before parliament.

I should like to remind the house that section 330 of the Railway Act sets out certain regulations which must be observed when these tariffs are up for revision. Subsection 2 of that section reads:

> Upon any such tariff being filed and approved by the board the company shall publish the same, with a notice of such approval in such form as the board directs, in at least two consecutive weekly issues of the Canada Gazette.

I should like the minister to tell the house whether these new tariffs were published for two weeks.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I may interrupt the hon. gentleman, I would say the section does not apply to the order issued by the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why not? It is statutory.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Because the order of the board is not only a standard freight rates specification as set out in section 330. If it is, as my hon. friend states, then the order of the board is illegal and the shipper would not have to pay the rates. Let it be tested in the courts; but the counsel of the board of transport commissioners informed me that this section has not been violated.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Again I think I shall have to ask some of my legal friends to come to my assistance, because I do not believe any board has authority to set aside acts of parliament. I shall be surprised if some of the larger shippers do not do as the minister suggests.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They have not set aside any act of parliament, or any section. The section is there, and it has not been contravened.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If I understand the English language, this section clearly states what is to be the procedure when new tariffs are introduced. Subsection 4 says:

> Until the provisions of this section have been complied with, no toll shall be charged by the company.

Then section 31 deals with special freight tariffs:

> Special freight tariffs shall be filed by the company with the board, and every such tariff shall specify the date of the issue thereof and the date on which it is intended to take effect...
> 3. When any such special freight tariff advances any toll previously authorized to be charged under this act, the company shall in like manner file and publish such tariff thirty days previously to the date on which such tariff is intended to take effect; provided that where objection to any such tariff is filed with the board, the burden of proof justifying the proposed advances shall be upon the company filing said tariff.

I think that type of legislation is reasonable, Mr. Speaker. These companies are public carriers. They not only serve the people in the Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto area; they serve the people of Lintlaw, Hazel Dell and Arran; and the shippers there are entitled to at least thirty days' notice before the rates are changed. They may wish to move their goods by truck, or to make other arrangements; and I do not think the board of transport commissioners or the government should ask parliament to approve changes made so hastily. The decision was reached on March 30. The matter was brought before parliament on April 5, and though representations were made by members of all parties, including their own, particularly by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), two days later the minister rose and said the matter had been considered, that no changes were to be made, but that the new rates were to go into effect immediately. I shall be surprised therefore if the government does not change its mind, if some of the firms that are able to engage competent legal advisers do not make a test case of this. The result might be embarrassing to the companies involved, and certainly to the government.

I urge upon the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) and all the other members from British Columbia and the maritimes on the other side of the house to stand up with us and register this last protest at the failure of the government to meet the requests of seven provinces.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, there may be discriminaiton in freight rates. It is possible; but I do not see what a royal commission could do better than the transport board. That board is supposed to do its work properly. The other day the minister spoke plainly about it; he said the transport board would have to consider any discrimination that may exist with respect to freight rates. That is pure horse sense, pure common sense; the transport board is supposed to do some work. If that work is not done properly, or if it is not completed, let them start again; then if they cannot do it, let us fire them. That is an honest view of the whole thing.

The transport board should read the speeches that have been made in this house, especially the one by my good friend who preceded me (Mr. Nicholson). The transport board should read what has been said here with respect to discrimination, and they would do much better than any royal commission. If we have a royal commission it will take a year or so, it will cost a million dollars and will do nothing. How is it my friends of the C.C.F. party are always so ready to defend public servants, yet when there is work to be done by a public servant they say, "Let us have a royal commission"? There should be no royal commission unless it be for the investigation of scandals or something of the kind. The purpose of this board is to inform the government. It is not for us to look into matters of discrimination except when they are mentioned to us by our constituents. I had some discriminations in my constituency, and I complained to the board in due course. I do not pretend that the freight rates are perfect; far from it, but I say the transport commission should have taken the trouble to find out what those discriminations were, without being told each time.

Now, sir, this is the time to vote. We have heard a lot about freight rates from every section of the country, and we cannot learn any more than we have been told already by hon. members. We are saturated with this discussion about freight rates. It is not that I do not believe they are important; I think they are important, but the issue is not freight rates. The issue is a vote of confidence in the government. If this house has confidence in the government we will have the support of the majority of the house. If the house has no confidence the government will be voted down.

Now that we have reached this stage I should like to express my confidence in the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I hope the vote will be taken very soon. The provincial premiers have the right to make representations, but I do not see why they are suggesting a royal commission. It is an insult to the transport board and to the intelligence of the members of the House of Commons. A judge would know no more than the transport commissioners are supposed to know. If they do their work properly, most of the difficulties will be ironed out and we shall have a satisfactory compromise concerning freight rates. Therefore I rely upon the wisdom of the house to have a vote taken right now, or just as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES—REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATE USED IN COMPUTING PURCHASE PRICE

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Before Your Honour leaves the chair there is another matter about which I should like to speak at this time, exercising the ancient right of a private member to air grievances before the house goes into committee of supply. This is indeed the first opportunity that I have had to discuss this matter since it was precipitated by the action of the government in the tabling of certain orders in council by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) on April 19. The matter referred to in these orders in council, and about which I wish to speak, is the action of the government in making certain changes by order in council with reference to government annuities.

As everyone knows, the action taken by the government was, in the main, to change the rate of interest on the basis of which the annuity tables are calculated. The rate was changed from four per cent to three per cent. The result of that change, along with other changes made at the same time, is that Canadian government annuities as from April 19, 1948, cost more to Canadians who wish to purchase them. In my view, Mr. Speaker, this action of the government is a blow at social security which is hard to understand at this stage of our national development.

Despite the differences that might obtain amongst the various parties in this house as to ways and means of achieving social security, there is general agreement that we should move in that direction. There is also general agreement that a plan of old age security involving contributions by citizens themselves, by employers in certain cases, and by the government is all to the good. Therefore I say it is hard to understand the government, at this stage of our national development, when the people of Canada are calling for better old age security, taking this action which has the effect of striking a blow at one very good plan that has been on our statute book since 1908.

The effect of this decision by the government is best seen when one considers the group plans that are taken out, by arrangement with Canadian government annuities, by employers on behalf of their employees. Most people imagine that government annuities are mainly taken by individuals. The fact is that there are more individual contracts than there are group certificates thus far, but the number of individuals included in group contracts has been increasing very rapidly during recent years. As at March 31, 1947, there were in existence 194,623 contracts. Of these, 108,625 were held by individuals by direct arrangement with the annuities branch; 85,998 were held by individuals through the medium of group plans taken out by employers on behalf of their employees.

With reference to the number of individuals in group plans, may I point out that in 1945, 9,313 individuals were enrolled in group plans. In 1946 the number enrolled in group plans was 17,355; in 1947 it was 30,411. In other words, despite the fact that very little publicity was given to this excellent plan, its use has been greatly increased in recent years, and all the evidence seems to suggest that still greater use was being made of it in recent months, and still greater use was in store as time went on. But the action of the government in reducing the interest rate, or increasing the cost of these annuities, will have not only the effect of discouraging individuals from taking out government annuities but will definitely discourage employers—companies and corporations, large or small—from interesting themselves in what is no longer an attractive plan.

When you look at the group arrangement to which I am referring at the moment you realize immediately that it is a three-way contribution plan. The employee makes a contribution; his employer makes a contribution, and thus far the government has been making a contribution. That contribution has been in two parts. On the one hand, the government has paid the administrative cost of the plan, and on the other hand, by computing the value of annuities on a four per cent interest basis, which is a little higher than the normal interest rate on government bonds, the government has in fact been making a cash contribution to the fund itself.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if any member went out on the street and asked any ordinary citizen of Canada what would be the best kind of old age security plan, in most cases the answer would be: Let us have a three-way contribution—contributions from employee, employer and the government. That is what we have had in this very plan. But the effect of the government's action is to take away the contribution that was being made to the scheme by the government. It is true that the government will still pay the cost of administering the plan, and it is also true that it will still pay what is involved in computing the value of the annuity at three per cent; but, after all, that is not paying anything to the annuitants. That is simply paying the going rate of interest on borrowed money.

Not only does it have the effect to which I have just referred of striking a blow at the one kind of plan which everybody supports, but it also sets up discrimination between different employees working for the same firm. I will not mention the name of the company, but the bread man who calls at our home in Winnipeg has told me about his company being in this plan. He has an individual contract within a group plan. His contract, of course, was issued prior to April 19, and therefore he gets the advantages of the old rate; but a new employee of the same bread company who may be delivering bread over on the next street next week will have to have his pension with that company computed on the basis of a new rate; he will have to pay more for the same rate of pension. It is perfectly true that contracts that were in effect prior to April 19 suffer no change, but individual contracts that are written after April 19, or the contracts of employees in groups, where the individual enters even an established plan after April 19, must come under the new rate; and so I point out that discrimination between employees working for the same firm will result from this decision.

There has been considerable reference to this in the newspapers, both before and after the event. Papers like the Toronto Star, for example—I will not take time to read the quotation—have pointed out that by this action companies are already being discouraged from going ahead with plans they had in view. I would point out that what this means is not that annuities of this description will be written by the insurance companies; it means that they will not be written at all. What I have said about group plans points up the issue in terms of the over-all picture, because, as I say, the whole country is looking toward a three-way contributory scheme.

It is also true with respect to individuals who have suffered a sad blow in their aim of achieving social security. I think of the large number of self-employed persons, of professional men—even members of parliament—who have no pension scheme which can be carried on on a three-way basis. Prior to April 19 they at least had a chance of entering into a two-way plan that was really worthwhile.

I hold in my hand just about the only piece of advertising that was circulated by the annuities branch prior to April 19. It is an attractive booklet headed, "Canadian government annuities," and below that appears a picture of the parliament building. Then underneath is the caption, "Backed by the whole resources of the dominion." On page 3 there are the following two paragraphs:

> If you are a young man or woman this little booklet carries to you a wonderful opportunity to secure comfort and independence in your old age. Read every word of it. Bear in mind that, if you would have an old age free from want or dependence, you must save and invest wisely in your youth.
> If you are an older man or woman with limited capital, and your earning days are over, this booklet carries a message of comfort and cheer. It tells how you can invest your capital in a way which will give you a safe, steady and dependable income for the rest of your life—an income guaranteed by the entire Dominion of Canada.

If this was not the last copy of the book that I possess I would tear it up right here, because that is what the government has done with this most attractive plan.

The argument is sometimes advanced that the change to which I refer had to be made to put the annuities fund in a proper actuarial position. It was said that it was not proper for the government to pay what amounted to four per cent on the money paid in by annuitants when it could borrow money in the open market or on government bonds at three per cent.

I submit that that argument misses the whole point and purpose of Canadian government annuities. This was not something actuarially unsound; it was—and deliberately so—a straight government contribution in the interests of old age security. Everyone knows the way it worked. The payments that were made went into the consolidated revenue fund, and when an annuity was paid it was paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. At the present time the amounts being paid in are greatly in excess of the amounts being drawn out; the only separateness about this is in terms of bookkeeping.

Let me remind the house and the government that the purpose of government annuities was set out in the preamble to the original bill, which was passed in 1908—for back in those days bills had preambles to indicate their purpose. This is chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada for 1908, being 7-8 Edward VII. The preamble reads:

> Whereas it is in the public interest that habits of thrift be promoted and that the people of Canada be encouraged and aided thereto so that provision may be made for old age; and whereas it is expedient that further facilities be afforded for the attainment of the said objects: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows—

Then follows the act itself.

The purpose was to encourage thrift and the making of provision for old age. Part of the purpose was to provide facilities to make that possible. The providing of facilities did not mean just the employment of a bookkeeper; it meant the providing of the necessary contributions to set up an attractive plan. I hope hon. members will pardon my making a somewhat personal reference, but in studying the origins of this act I confess that I ran across something that interested me in a personal way. I found that the second reading of the bill was moved, the debate thereon took place, the bill was considered in committee and reported all on June 18, 1908. That was the very day on which I was born. Little did I realize when I was howling in my crib that forty years later I would be howling in defence of an act passed in this house that very day.

The bill was piloted through the house by Mr. Fielding, minister of finance in the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This was just a few months before the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was first elected to the house. Mr. Fielding pointed out at that time that in the bill presented to parliament there was a small element of government subsidy or government assistance. Even in those days there were a few members who hoped that the bill was not going to provide competition for the insurance companies. Mr. Fielding answered that while they were not paying very much by way of subsidy, to the extent that they were paying four per cent on the money invested rather than three per cent, there would be that element of government assistance toward achieving the objectives set out in the preamble which I have just read.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): What was the general rate of interest paid by the government at that time?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry I cannot answer that. However, Mr. Fielding said, according to the Hansard I have in my hand, that the government was planning to pay four per cent, and that this would be about one per cent more than they would have to pay for other money. He stated that that one per cent would be an element of government subsidy in addition to the cost of administration. I have no doubt that there have been ups and downs in interest rates in the meantime, but the general picture in the year 1908 was much the same as it is now.

Mr. ISNOR: There is the same difference today.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to be just about the same.

Mr. ISNOR: That is, with the change.

Mr. KNOWLES: The change made on April 19 was from four per cent to three per cent.

Mr. ISNOR: With the change there would still be just about the same difference as today.

Mr. COLDWELL: The same difference as before April 19.

Mr. MITCHELL: The relative contribution of the state is the same today as when my hon. friend was howling in his crib.

Mr. COLDWELL: You have increased the premium by 25 per cent or more.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) defended this action the other day he referred to the rate that the government paid on Dominion of Canada bonds, namely, three per cent, and said that the effect of this order in council was to put government annuities on a parallel basis with Dominion of Canada bonds. I submit that that argument does not hold at all, that you are dealing with two different things. If this government were selling bonds which could not be redeemed except in small amounts in later years or at death they would not be able to sell them at a three per cent interest rate. That is what you have with an annuity. An annuity is not something with an immediate cash surrender value; it is to make provision for old age and is on an entirely different basis. As I say, if bonds were on that basis you would not be able to sell them at three per cent.

One other argument which is frequently made is that the rate that was paid involved a subsidy. It is strange how many there are in the house who, whenever a subsidy is offered with which they do not agree, get up and argue against the general principle of paying subsidies at all, and yet in some cases readily agree to a subsidy payment. In this connection may I read a paragraph, commenting on the action of the government—not on the action of the house, Mr. Speaker—from the Toronto Daily Star of April 20? This, I may say, was on the financial page and was written by the financial editor:

> Business is very apt today at criticizing government subsidies to the people. The fact remains, however, that business itself is not adverse to soliciting government help in reaching an objective it considers desirable. The subsidy to gold mines is but one of many instances where this principle applies.
> Another is the government guarantee of loans made by insurance companies under the National Housing Act. To encourage home construction, a desirable social objective, the government assumes the risk for the entire loan although the insurance companies nevertheless receive a five per cent return on the money they advance.

I contend that those who argue against government annuities on the old basis by saying that they involved a subsidy, are not putting up an effective argument at all. Our economy is full of the paying of subsidies of all kinds, and I suggest there is no worthier objective for the paying of subsidies than that of providing old age security.

It strikes me as strange that this action of the government in reducing the value of government annuities, thus striking a blow at this form of security, should come at a time when so much use was being made of this plan. I have already given some figures with respect to individuals in group plans. May I give a few more figures and show that in recent years this was becoming a very popular arrangement. First of all, may I say that back in 1925 the total number of contracts taken out—now I am giving total figures, both individual and group—was only 486; in 1930 it was 1,257; in 1935, 3,930; in 1940, 9,014; in 1945, 15,796; in 1946, 25,538, and in 1947, 43,585. Those figures, I may say, are in each case for the year ended March 31 of the year indicated. The last figure I was able to get was for the year ended March 31, 1947. I do not know how many were taken out in the year ended March 31, 1948. But it seems strange that just when it is getting popular, just when the people of Canada are realizing what a good thing this is, the government strikes the blow it has struck.

May I read a word or two from Mr. Fielding back on the day to which I referred, June 18, 1908, when he said this, as reported at column 10851 of Hansard for that year:

> The mere fact that a thing is good in itself does not mean that it will be taken up by the public. Even the best things of life have to be recommended. Although I believe this to be an excellent scheme, founded on sound principles and calculated to do much good, I do not anticipate that the public will rush after it unless somebody takes pains to explain its merits and advantages.

Mr. Fielding went on to indicate that the Post Office Department or perhaps some other branch of the government would do its best along that line, but to me the tragedy is that Mr. Fielding's admonition has not been acted upon. There has not been what could really be called an attempt to sell government annuities to the people of Canada. But despite that fact, its popularity has grown in recent years; and just now when it has become immensely popular the plan is literally scuttled. I know that the minister—

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member say that was because of public ownership?

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, well—

Mr. KNOWLES: I am afraid I do not see the connection. I wonder if the hon. member sees the connection between my remarks and what he has asked?

Mr. ISNOR: Certainly. The fact that there has not been the development of this scheme as compared with insurance under private enterprise clearly shows which is the better.

Mr. KNOWLES: There has been no development of a comparable plan under private enterprise at all. That has been the complaint that private enterprise has been making—that this was something they could not match. I know the Minister of Labour does not like the comments that have been made in some newspapers as to the information the insurance companies seem to have had about this change, and the representations they are reported to have made. But it is difficult for the minister to explain away the fact that there were these stories and comments in the newspapers for some days, if not some weeks, before he made the announcement in this house. I have had the experience that I suppose other members have had. A friend of mine who is in the life insurance business told me—as a matter of fact, just a day or two before I asked my question in this house—that he had heard that the rate was being changed from four to three per cent and that there would be consequent changes in the tables. He had, therefore, taken out an annuity. He is a life insurance salesman with whom I have had many arguments from time to time, telling him that he should be taking out a government annuity instead; he was always on the other side of the fence until he learned that the rate was to be changed, whereupon he immediately took out a government annuity.

As I say, many newspapers in the country ran these reports, and they were strangely accurate. The reports indicated that the rate would be reduced from four to three per cent. They indicated it was a change which was coming soon. I saw one report somewhere which suggested that the matter of annuities was to be transferred from the Minister of Labour to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If that was correct, it has not happened yet. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is hard to take—to stand up in this house as a member of parliament and ask a question about this matter a few days before the announcement is made, to be brushed off by the kind of smart answer which the Minister of Labour gave me on April 15, as reported at page 2976 of Hansard, and then to discover that the insurance companies apparently knew all the time what was going on. But despite the campaign the insurance companies have carried out through the years against government annuities, the fact of the matter is that even some private-enterprise organizations are disappointed and discouraged by the change that has been made. I will not take up the time to go into it, but I know of many private firms that had counted on developing employee pension plans under this scheme who now realize that it cannot be done.

I wish also to say a word or two about the actual changes in rates that have taken place. I hold in my hand a copy of the new annuity tables. I do not know when it was printed, but the effective date was stamped in afterwards; therefore it must have been ready in advance. I also have a copy of the tables as they stood before, and I intend to make a few comparisons.

For example, under the old plan, an immediate annuity of $100 at age sixty for a male cost $1,163. It now costs $1,355, an increase of 16 per cent. Similarly, an immediate $100 annuity at age sixty for a female used to cost $1,327; it now costs $1,550, also an increase of 16 per cent. An immediate annuity, guaranteed for ten years, for a male at age sixty used to cost $1,247; it now costs $1,431, an increase of 15 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is an annuity of how much?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry; an annuity of $100 a year in all the cases I am giving. For other amounts you multiply accordingly. An immediate annuity of $100 a year for a female at age sixty used to cost $1,379; it now costs $1,598, an increase of 16 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend will readily admit that life expectancy has increased, and that has some bearing on the figures he is quoting. Of course he may object to people living longer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, you know better than that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to see the minister is following me. I have a note about that, and I am coming to it in a few minutes.

Now let me turn to deferred life annuities. First I will take the instance of a male aged thirty purchasing an annuity of $100 to commence at sixty-five guaranteed for ten years. It used to cost $15.06 a year; it now costs $20.50 a year, an increase of 36 per cent. A female aged twenty buying a $100 annuity to commence at age sixty, guaranteed for ten years, used to have to pay $14.37 a year. Now it is $20.64, an increase of 43 per cent. I might go on and give other figures, but they run in these general brackets. In the immediate annuities there is an increase of 15 or 16 per cent, while in the deferred annuities the increase runs from 36 to about 44 per cent.

These rate changes are due in part, as I have said already, to the withdrawal of the contribution by the government to this two or three way scheme, which is what results from the reduction of the rate from four per cent to three per cent. The rate changes result as well from a change in mortality tables, this also being done by order in council. These tables are worked out by actuaries, and the government decided to use a certain table, namely the mortality of annuitants, 1900 to 1920, published by the institute of actuaries in Scotland, known as—well, there is a long list of letters here—with an arbitrary reduction of three years in the age. In other words the government has conformed to the general pattern of the insurance companies, and the fact of the matter is that insurance companies have to set their actuarial rates to include their extra costs and profits, which are not necessary in the case of the government scheme. Therefore the point the minister interjected a moment ago is also one about which I complain. I do not complain about people living longer, as he says, but I do complain as to the basis upon which the actuarial change has been made.

Not only have there been these changes in rates and tables; there have also been changes in the regulations. For example, one of the outstanding features about government annuities thus far has been the right of purchasers to pay odd amounts and at odd times. I have in my hand my own little pass book—having started to purchase an annuity some time ago so that this contract is not affected by the change—and in it I note that payments of twenty-five cents and upwards will be received from any annuitant. It is well known that under the old plan you could make such payments of odd amounts at any time and at any post office in Canada. Now a change has been made, which is set out in this document; which reads as follows:

> New contracts will not permit deposits of odd amounts at odd times. Purchasers will be expected to follow the prescribed schedule of premium payments. Provision will be made for the payment of arrears within reasonable limits, and the prepayment of premiums will be allowed by special arrangement.

I have no doubt there have been abuses of that generous privilege under the old contracts, but it seems to me the attempt to correct abuses has led the government too far the other way, and has turned what was a simple, attractive plan into something that will require the purchaser to meet his payments regularly and will frighten many people away from taking it on lest it become a commitment they might not be able to keep up. The regulation to which I have just referred suggests that the government annuities branch may accept payments in arrears, but under conditions we do not yet know. In other words the whole thing is being hamstrung and changed from an attractive, simple, popular plan into something that just will not appeal to people at all.

Here is where I think my private enterprise friends should listen. This does not mean that annuities of this kind will now be sold by the insurance companies. Everyone knows the insurance companies could not possibly meet these terms. What it means, however, is that this sort of thing will not be done at all, and that we shall have had a set-back in our hopes of developing a reasonable plan for social security.

I am afraid my time is just about up, and I had better come to a conclusion. I have had a great many representations about this matter since the tabling of the order in council on April 19. I have had resolutions from labour bodies, in one case a copy of a resolution which was also forwarded to the minister, indicating their opposition. The other day I also received an interesting resolution from St. Jude's Anglican church in Winnipeg, part of which I should like to read:

Resolved, that the congregation and vestry of the parish of St. Jude's Anglican church, Winnipeg, make representations to His Grace the Archbishop of Rupertsland and to the general synod of the diocese of Rupertsland requesting that the general synod and his grace the archbishop instigate through the various channels open to them, a campaign or crusade, on a national basis, for the immediate reform of the Old Age Pension Act and the establishment of a contributory old age security fund. And, that until such reforms have been made and such a contributory fund established, that the federal and provincial governments make immediate provision for:

1. The increase of pensions . . .

And other matters. The thing that struck me was to read that such a body of people as this—and I think they have the sense of the country at large—feel that the time has come for a campaign or crusade for greater old age security; and just at that time, while we still have as leader of the government a prime minister who back in 1919 took a strong stand for insurance against unemployment, sickness and old age, we have this government scuttling such a good piece of legislation, which as I say, was put on the statute book under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government and piloted through this house by Mr. Fielding back in 1908.

I do hope others will support me in the representations I have made, and that the government will yet realize the folly of their ways in this and other matters; that it was a mistake to pay any attention, no matter in what way they did it, to the opinions or representations of insurance companies. I hope the government will realize that the people of Canada want this government annuities act put back as it was before, and indeed built upon to give them something better.

I have just one other word before I sit down. I recognize that the original act as passed in 1908, and as it still stands, gave the government power to make this change by order in council; but I submit that morally they did not have that right. Knowing the interest of parliament in this matter, which has been discussed on the floor of this house for the last two or three sessions, I say they should not have taken this action without first giving parliament a chance to say something about it. Not having done so, I hope when they hear the voice of parliament they will change their minds and restore the implementation of this act to its basis prior to April 19.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to lend some support to the representations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). For a good many years I have been a strong supporter of the government annuities plan, and I have had considerable to do with inducing folk I have known to invest in the government annuities program. I shall be sorry indeed if the proposal which has been mentioned will retard that plan or hinder in any way the ordinary working man from investing in this goverment annuities program.

Just today one of the most prominent labour leaders called upon me. He seemed to have some knowledge of what was to be introduced; in fact he spoke to me some few days ago about it. At that time I did not know anything about the proposal. I had not thought the government would interfere with a program which had been so successful. However, this man came to me today and told me that this proposal was to be introduced. I strongly urge that the government give serious consideration before it takes action in the matter. It should consider the effect such a procedure would have on the average member of the working class.

Just a few years ago a gentleman who had been a bachelor all his life, and who had worked in a woodworking shop in Toronto but who had never had steady employment all the year around, came to see me. This man had been thrifty and had saved the odd dollar here and there. Fortunately for him his uncle died and left him $6,500. This man was at that time sixty-four years of age. He said to me, "This $6,500 is more than I had ever dreamed was in the world". In addition to that amount, because of his thrift he had been able to save a few hundred dollars during his years of work. This man said to me, "What would you advise me to do with this money?" I said, "Get in touch with Mr. Blackadar of the government annuities branch at Ottawa; tell him the amount of money you have and your age. Then, having in mind the possibility of holding your present job until you are seventy, ask him what $6,500 paid into a government annuity today would provide for you as an annuity six years hence".

He did that, and came to show me a letter he received in reply. I said to him, "That will be a satisfactory income for you when you reach the age of seventy. Write another letter to them and tell them you are a bachelor and have no one to whom you would leave your money. Tell them you want the largest amount you can get during your lifetime, and that the government can have whatever is left in the annuity". He wrote to the annuities branch and asked for an annuity which would permit him to draw the maximum amount on reaching the age of seventy years, with the understanding that if he did not reach that age the government would get $6,500. Consequently he was entitled to a fair-sized annuity.

I have given similar advice to more than one person. I am glad to say that those who are living are happy indeed with their annuities. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, a booklet was issued by the government. But that is about all that has been done to sell annuities. Salesmen have not been sent out, and no widespread effort has been made to make these sales. If such a procedure had been followed there would have been many thousands more participants than were mentioned by the hon. member.

It has taken years for this program to become known to the people. That is perhaps one of the reasons why in the last year or two the number of participants has increased so greatly. In the booklet sent out it was stated that the country was behind these annuities. I cannot help feeling that any program which would have the effect of slowing up the purchase of government annuities by the ordinary citizen would not be a step in the right direction. The people should be encouraged to buy rather than discouraged.

I do not say the government should go out and put on a widespread campaign to sell government annuities. I am a supporter of private enterprise and would not want to see any widespread effort which would have the effect of discouraging annuities plans sponsored by the insurance companies. The country owes a good deal to the insurance companies. It has been my experience that those who invest in government annuities and those who accept insurance company programs are different types of citizens. Those who invest with the insurance companies are usually people with plenty of means. If I thought I was not going to live for a few more years I should be inclined to go to an insurance company and tell them that I want the most I can get after I reach a certain age, and that when I pass away they can have the money—because the government would likely get it anyway. I might as well get the most I can out of it while I am able to use it.

Another man who was about to make his will came to me and asked what I would suggest as provision for his nephew. The nephew was a bachelor whose health was not too good, and I advised this man to put in his will a provision whereby, if the nephew lived to the age of seventy years, he should have the most that could be derived from a sum of $5,000 allotted to him in the will. I suggested that the executors purchase a government annuity, and the lawyer in charge carried out that suggestion. Just two years before the nephew would have derived the benefit of the annuity which had been purchased for his benefit, he died. There was a provision which stated that if he died before reaching the age at which he was to draw the annuity the whole amount would go to the government.

These are two instances which have come to my attention in connection with the purchase of annuities. The second man to whom I have referred also died before reaching the age of seventy, with the result that the government got the $5,000 that had been put in, and had to make no return whatsoever.

I have always thought that is one of the reasons why the government has been able to give the ordinary citizen such a fair deal, because upon the death of annuitants who have bought annuities on the expectation that they would reach a certain age, which in fact they had not reached, the money remains with the government.

So if what is proposed by the government has the effect of retarding the purchase of government annuities by the ordinary citizen, it would be too bad. We should encourage rather than discourage thrift.

I believe this is the third or fourth time the annuities program has been cut down. I knew a man who some years ago, after retiring from business, placed $50,000 with the government for the purpose of obtaining the largest annuity he could get, one which would bring him in a high return. All he wanted was security, and government annuities do give firm security to those who invest in them.

To my mind there is nothing safer than a government annuity. I believe it is stated that they are the first charge on the consolidated revenue fund—although I am not definite about that point. I can say, however, that there is nothing safer or more solid than a government annuity, because the country is behind the government. What could be stronger than the country?

Not long after the last man to whom I referred passed away, the annuities program was changed again so that the participants had to pay, in effect, a good deal more than they had earlier. Again, under the present proposal it would appear that anyone who buys will not receive as much for his investment as would have been obtained earlier. That does not seem fair; we all try to get a fair deal.

Suppose one of these gentlemen I refer to is drawing an annuity of $100 a month, or $1,200 a year, which is the maximum; then, if a month or two hence someone else wants to buy an annuity under the amended scheme, he would not be able to get the same return as the person who bought an annuity a short time ago. That does not seem to me to be fair on the part of the government, because everybody should be treated the same way. I have only praise for Canada's government annuity program which has been in operation for quite a long time. It has promoted thrift in Canada and given a feeling of security and safety to those who have invested in it.

I am not conversant with the whole program, but having listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who apparently is conversant with it, I would urge the government to reconsider any proposal which would retard or slow up the purchase of annuities by the average citizen. A government annuity is one thing in which the average humble citizen can invest with a feeling of safety and security. I am not suggesting, of course, that annuities sold by large insurance companies are not safe or secure; I will go so far as to say that they are. But, after all, there is nothing better than an annuity contract with the government, because the whole country stands back of it.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I know that you and the members on the other side of the house do not welcome this discussion at this stage, and knowing how anxious the house is to get into supply, at the risk of being unpopular I wish to make a few remarks on this subject.

I think the government are away out in their timing in these things. They are making these changes at the wrong time, and I have in mind freight rates also.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The freight rates question has been considered by the house and a decision has been reached.

Mr. GILLIS: I had no intention of discussing freight rates, Your Honour, but certainly the timing on this particular thing is bad. What I mean by that is this. There has been considerable talk in this country for some time about the danger of isms. There is only one thing that breeds isms, that is, insecurity and poverty, and until you eliminate those evils there will always be the danger of the things we fear from the other side of the tracks. Secondly, I say the timing is bad because we are still in the process of swinging our economy from war to peace. In the wartime economy the government exercised considerable control and protection over the lives of the people of this country. Both the government and the official opposition have been vying with each other since the swing-over from war to peace as to which are the greatest free enterprisers, and there is pressure from outside on both these parties.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. GILLIS: I have been living in this country for a little while. What I say is quite apparent, and mind you, the average Joe on the street today recognizes that. They are not being fooled. Many people today will tell you that what is growing up in Canada is a managerial form of society in which the government are managed from the outside to the detriment of the people.

When the government annuity scheme was started away back in 1908 a definite rate of interest was fixed. That is now being changed by making the rate one per cent lower, which is equivalent to stepping up the premium by 25 per cent. Surely if the government was liberal enough in 1908 to lay the basis for an annuity scheme which would be available to the people of this country, it must recognize that the step it is now taking is retrogressive and might well have been initiated by the Conservative party. That just bears out my contention that what has happened in this country is that the Conservative party has disappeared, and the Liberals have gone Conservative.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You wish they had.

Mr. GILLIS: Their actions in the house and in the country demonstrate that. I say the timing of this measure is bad and, along with other steps which the government has taken, it indicates that the government is being pushed from outside. My guess is as good as anyone else's and it is that the old line insurance companies fear the development of government insurance because they cannot compete with it. Saskatchewan in the field of automobile insurance and fire insurance has demonstrated that the government can give better service and better protection at cheaper rates than the old line insurance companies, and the insurance companies want to offset that development.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, the fear of insecurity is what everyone in this world has been struggling against and suffering from, not just for generations but for centuries. We have now entered a period in the history of this country where provincial governments and industries are trying to evolve some scheme of protection for the average worker. Let me give the minister an illustration that the change he is making shows bad timing so far as the industry I am going to mention is concerned.

The minister knows that the mining industry in this country never had a pension plan, despite the fact that, as far back as 1920, I know of my personal knowledge that we approached the provincial government time after time for a three-way pension scheme, but we did not succeed in selling it to the government. But away back in 1923 and 1924 the company instituted an anaemic scheme of their own. Nevertheless, though it was anaemic, the company did something, and they bore the whole load. Only a year ago some 1,500 employees of that mining industry in Nova Scotia who had reached the age of sixty-five were laid off, and because there was no three-way contributory retirement scheme, the company made these employees a grant, which they call a pension, and which ranges all the way from $16 to $70 a month, based on length of service and a percentage of the average earnings for the last ten years. But a miner's last ten years' earnings would be largely from piecework; it would be the lowest period of his earnings. So the pensions are very small.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask the hon. member if he is in favour of piecework in coal mining?

Mr. GILLIS: Whether I am in favour of it or not, it is there.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are trying to get rid of it, are you not?

Mr. GILLIS: Not being actively engaged in that occupation, I let those who are make the decision. Why I hate to see this change made in the government annuity scheme at this time is, among other reasons, the fact that the miners' union and the provincial government have for the last six months been engaged in negotiations to evolve a three-way scheme which will not only protect the miner in the future but also do something for that large group of miners who have been retired with no adequate pension. Many of these men still have families on their hands and homes to maintain with the income I have just indicated. This kind of thing, which is a trend away from the three-way pension scheme that protects the average person in the country and gives him an opportunity to participate, is being discouraged. With this measure we are farther back in this field than we were in 1908.

To establish in the industry that I am talking about the kind of scheme which will protect those who are now out, and those who may come in in the future, will require a contribution from some source of about $12,000,000 to lay a base for a three-way contributory plan. If that is done, if the fear of insecurity, when a person is no longer productive, is removed you remove a lot of the fear of these changes that are talked about which we do not like to see, because insecurity is what drives people toward any kind of solution of the problem where they see themselves on the scrap heap, and are no longer able to produce themselves.

Instead of starting on the road to abandon a very good scheme which covered only a small percentage of the people of this country—it is a very small percentage of the people of the country who can come under the government annuity scheme—we should be trying to improve it.

Let me say this with regard to most industrial workers and, I think, farmers in the country. They are not in a position to carry any kind of insurance with the old line companies. The best they can do is to take a $1,000 policy payable to the beneficiary when they die, and pay on it monthly. When they pass away there is enough left to pay the funeral expenses. They live day by day and pay that kind of insurance, which is the most expensive kind of insurance, against the time when they pass away, so that their families may not go into debt for funeral expenses. That is the only kind of insurance that the average low income person in this country is able to get and pay for with the old line companies.

Rather than do what we are doing now, in effect, stepping up the premium on government annuities by 25 per cent, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should be bringing in a bill making this plan of government annuities still more available to the people of the country, by reducing the premium and by advertising it widely and incorporating in the national government annuity scheme the industrial workers across the country who are trying to get into some kind of three-way contribution scheme with the companies across the country. I am sure you would get co-operation from the industrialists, and I am absolutely certain that you would get it from the industrial workers.

When you have 100 or 200 schemes operated separately by each industry in the country the administrative costs are terrific. But if it were centralized with the central government with the staff that is now available, with the scheme brought up to date and the administration done from here and the people of the country covered under this scheme, it would cheapen the administration and it would guarantee the solvency of the fund because the government would be behind it. Proper audits would be made from time to time and, regardless of whether the old line companies like it or not, it would not be competing with them, because they certainly cannot give this kind of insurance.

I see in this scheme the basis for the expansion of a well developed three-way contributory scheme which would take care of both farmers and industrial workers either individually or co-operatively. I seriously suggest to the minister that he not go ahead with this thing at this time. This is thought about a lot in the country. Over the week end I had a meeting in Hamilton, praising the government, of course.

Mr. KNOWLES: And passing the ammunition.

Mr. GILLIS: I was questioned. After I had got through telling them what a good government we had, half a dozen people rose and asked me why the government should step up the premium rate on these annuities and why they should be making these changes.

Mr. KNOWLES: What was your answer?

Mr. GILLIS: I did not have much time. The answer I gave them briefly was that I thought there was pressure from the old line companies. They want to get the government completely out of the field of insurance and leave it wide open to them. The examples in Saskatchewan are demonstrating that government protection in the fields that they are suitable to handle cannot be competed with by the old line companies. I told them I thought it was a wrong step. I said that I thought we could have confidence in the judgment of most hon. members and, that once this thing is analysed, the orders in council will likely be taken back and re-arranged and the minister perhaps bring them back and centralize the scheme as one that might embrace all of the groups across the country to which I have referred.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): If I may say a few words on this question—I should like to stay here all day on this discussion—I wish to say that the hon.

member for Winnipeg North as usual showed the great courtesy of not giving any notice that he was going to raise this question.

Mr. KNOWLES: Get the riding right, Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wherever the hon. member comes from. It is a highly technical question and the fundamentals cannot be expressed in simple terms.

My hon. friend said that he was howling in his crib, which he understands. I think it is a fair thing to say that he has been howling ever since in every walk of life in which he has taken part—at least that is my information.

The further point I wish to make is this. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have said that influence has been brought by the insurance companies on myself in connection with this change in interest rates on annuities. I want to say without equivocation, Mr. Speaker, that to my knowledge I have never met a representative of an insurance company since I have been in the ministry. That is the kind of smear which will go up and down the country in a way that cannot be answered. One may have his point of view, but I do not think it is necessary to broadcast that kind of thing when I have already said that I have never met any of these people since I have been in the ministry.

Mr. KNOWLES: How did the insurance companies and the newspapers know of it a week before it was announced?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is an easy thing—

Mr. PROBE: Just mind readers.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are mind readers. When an industry is being run at a loss it is obvious that any person with any common sense would face up to his responsibilities. By the very nature of things, when you set an investigation in motion, human beings being what they are, leaks sometimes happen. That happens in every country and in every clime and in some political parties.

My hon. friends spoke about the influence of insurance companies. I had to take the long view on this thing to be frank, and I take full responsibility for it. My good friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, spoke about insurance and trade unions. Whether we like it or not, we are the product of our experience, and he and I know quite well, probably better than anybody else in this house, at any rate as well as anybody else in this house, that a number of insurance schemes set up by trade unions have been wrecked because they were not on a sound actuarial basis.

Take my own organization. I remember attending a convention in the city of Detroit as a young man thirty years ago. When we set up a scheme for the payment of funeral benefits I rose and pointed out to the chair, when the matter was up for discussion, that I thought it was unsound because some members of the organization or their heirs would not receive the benefits to which they were entitled.

You cannot have it both ways. My hon. friends of the socialist party have been advocates of low interest rates, and I have no objection to their having that point of view. They are also great believers in subsidies. I said once before in this house that if the payment of subsidies is a sound policy to follow, let us subsidize everything and get it all for nothing.

Mr. PROBE: You believe in selective subsidies.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not believe in anything.

Mr. PROBE: There is no need to be personal about it.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member does not need to be personal either, but when he sticks out his neck he must expect to get it chopped off.

That is the position I was faced with. I know that the believers in public ownership think that the government is the only institution that can run a business at a loss. How do you run it at a loss? You take money from the other fellow to pay for the losses.

That is what has taken place. In order to pay these annuities it was necessary to take money from other people who did not hold government annuities. That was necessary in order to make the thing actuarially sound from the point of view of the person holding an annuity.

Take this House of Commons as an example. We cannot even run a restaurant. You get a $1.50 meal for seventy-five cents, but who pays for it? The people of this Dominion of Canada pay. We cannot even run a barber shop on a sound basis. You get a sixty cent haircut for thirty-five cents.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that true?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course it is true and my hon. friend knows it is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is a debatable point.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let my hon. friend go into any union shop in Toronto and try to get a haircut for thirty-five cents.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister has not much hair.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will return that compliment and say that my hon. friend has not much brains. I was raised in a thrifty school. I was raised in a school where we were taught to pay our just debts. If we did not have the money with which to buy a thing, we did not buy it. That is the backbone of the British commonwealth of nations and I hope we shall never get away from it. I hope we shall never go out and kid people that they are getting something for nothing, old age pensions at twenty-one and what have you.

Mr. KNOWLES: Annuities might save the government part of the cost of old age pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will come to that in a minute. My hon. friend had his day, so he should just listen to me.

Mr. KNOWLES: You passed the order in council before I had my day.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to place on record the amounts which it has been necessary to transfer in order to maintain reserves and the expenses of administration. The figures are as follows:

At or for the year ending	Amount transferred to maintain reserve	Expenses of administration
March 31, 1947 ..	$977,069.58	$566,968.04
March 31, 1946 ..	293,797.96	400,916.51
March 31, 1945 ..	257,288.00	353,556.72
March 31, 1944 ..	32,180.49	303,917.28
March 31, 1943 ..	497,790.26	264,228.67

Mr. LOCKHART: Is that the annuities administration?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. I understand that in private companies the cost of administration is between 12 and 15 per cent, whereas under this scheme the cost is under one per cent. Of course that cost is borne by the government. I wonder what position would have been taken by hon. gentlemen if, during the years of high interest, we had moved in the other direction? There is some responsibility on the ministry to see that these plans are administered in as sound a manner as possible. I should like to ask my socialist friends in Saskatchewan if the cost of their various insurance schemes are paid out of the public treasury. I am referring to the cheap car insurance and other forms of insurance they have been talking about.

Mr. BENTLEY: The answer is definitely no. It has paid its way all the way and has provided service.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then what is the difference in the Regina administration carrying on an insurance scheme and the government here in Ottawa carrying on an insurance scheme?

Mr. KNOWLES: This is not insurance.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friends cannot argue both ways. They cannot stand on a public platform and say that the Social Credit party, the Liberal party and the Conservative party must run their administration at a loss, but in order to satisfy their point of view, that the government of Saskatchewan must run theirs at a profit.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just take your medicine.

Mr. GILLIS: You are arguing against yourself.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend from the socialist camp said that there were no administration costs paid out of the public treasury; yet he and his friends expect the other political parties to take the position that, because a thing is state operated, it should be subsidized by the people. I do not think that is logical. It may be logical from the point of view of those who are thinking in reverse all the time.

I do not intend to take up any more time of the house. I think I have proven that it was necessary that this position should be taken. I should like to know what the position of the opposition would be, particularly my hon. friends from Saskatchewan, if this scheme were absolutely bankrupt. They would, by the very nature of things, be comparing it with the projects they have in their own province, and in my judgment justly so.

I have always been a strong advocate of pension plans of every kind and character. I have been a strong advocate of contributory unemployment insurance. If the house will permit a personal reference I was one of those who played some part in the establishment of old age pensions in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for Cape Breton South also played a part. In our youth, in our simple way we advocated the establishment of a non-contributory scheme of old age pensions such as they had in Great Britain. I have often thought that if I had my life to live over again I would have advocated a scheme on a contributory basis where the pension would belong to the individual by right without any contribution from anybody. I believe that is sound common sense.

Notwithstanding the points raised this afternoon by hon. gentlemen, I say without fear of contradiction that this is still the cheapest, the safest and the best annuity scheme in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a word or two to say. I do not think anyone can accuse me of being a socialist, nor can he accuse me of being a Conservative. In my opinion the one is just about as bad as the other.

An hon. MEMBER: Where do the commies come in?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Of course the Liberals are right along with them. But when speaking about annuities, the minister went on to point out definitely the difference between the way in which the annuities branch is run and the way other departments of government are run. He pointed out that he thought the annuities branch should stand on its own feet. That might be all right, but let us consider the Post Office Department. Does that stand on its own feet? No, it does not, and it never has.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. JOHNSTON: In the Post Office Department all the public service is charged against the Department of Public Works. The Canadian National Railways has never stood on its own feet. Yet the government does not intend to take a stand here and say that it is going to throw over the Canadian National Railways. It will not even go so far as to write off some of the watered stock. When it comes to the matter of annuities, that is the only type of investment in which the small income earner has a chance to invest. Where else can a man with a salary of $35 a week invest his meagre savings and get four per cent interest? There is not another place unless he wants to invest in government bonds, and those are not now for sale. More than that, he would have received only three per cent on them.

I have discussed this question on other occasions with insurance companies, and one of the things they have always beefed about was the fact that the government was selling annuities which would give a return of four per cent. They said frankly that they did not intend to go out and sell annuities against the government, because they could not get a sufficient return or the return to which they thought they were entitled.

When it comes to the general field of life insurance, the government is not in competition with the life insurance companies, and of course they can go ahead in that field.

In fact I think it is a healthy thing to have the government selling annuities paying four per cent in competition with insurance companies. It is not like taking over a monopoly. I do not think it is comparable with out and out socialism. It is a form of competition. In that way I think there is a good control of private insurance companies, so that they will endeavour to keep their rates down as low as possible.

We hear a great deal about people being encouraged to invest their savings in order to protect them in their old age. I think that is a good thing. The minister himself spoke about contributory old age pensions. How are people to contribute if they have not sufficient income on which to live? Last year when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought his budget down, he told us that over fifty per cent of the people in Canada were living on less than $1,500 a year, if married, and on $750 a year, if single. When you find a condition like that in the country, how do you expect for one moment that these people will be able to get the money to invest in contributory old age pensions or any other compulsory contributory scheme the government may have in mind?

I would not say that the government has had pressure brought to bear on it, or that the minister particularly has had pressure brought to bear upon him from the insurance companies, but I will say this definitely; the insurance companies have been complaining strongly against the government's selling these annuities, thereby allowing room for the small investor to get a four per cent return on his money. I think the minister himself is aware of that fact. That does not necessarily mean to say that they came to him with a written complaint; but I am sure the minister is too smart a man not to know that the insurance companies have been bitterly opposed to the government's selling annuities bearing four per cent interest.

So far as the matter of taking money out of the general revenue is concerned, I think the minister said that on March 31, 1943, approximately half a million dollars was taken out—$497,000, to be exact—and that in March, 1947, $997,000 was taken out. What do we pay each year for family allowances? That money comes out of the general revenue. It comes out of taxation. Will the minister stand up here and say that we should not have family allowances? If he made such a statement as that, I am afraid the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might ask him to take a vacation. If the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) can logically say he thinks the annuities branch should be put on such a sound financial basis that it should be run with no contribution from the general treasury, then all these other things which I have mentioned—and which the government has sponsored—should be put on exactly the same basis.

I think the time was certainly not opportune for the government to lower this interest rate from four per cent to three per cent. We expect the people of this country to look after themselves in their old age. Almost everyone who has spoken for years past in this house has advocated that procedure. Yet we take away one of the opportunities for people to do that. I want to protest against the government's taking this action at this time. It is most inopportune and it will not work in the best interests of the people of Canada.

PROVISION OF SUPPLIES OF COMMODITIES TO SASKATCHEWAN FEDERATED CO-OPERATIVES LIMITED

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I suppose the house will be impatient, Mr. Speaker, with anyone who rises at this particular time. I do not know that I blame them a great deal, but I want to point out that those of us over here have no other means of voicing our grievances except as the opportunity arises in this way. At times we have been accused of holding up a vote when, as a matter of fact, it was not a question of holding up a vote; it was simply a matter of trying to register our protest in the time at our disposal. We do not make the rules of the house. But we must obey them.

I want to speak principally on another matter this afternoon; but before I do so, I want to advise the house and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), through you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a vast difference between this government annuity and the insurance plan and operations carried out by the Saskatchewan government. In the first place, the Saskatchewan government insurance office does not deal in life. It deals in a variety of other things.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: By the very nature of things, when you insure against fire, does that not include life, indirectly?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, indirectly. I mean that there is no straight life insurance. The only socially-owned life insurance company in Saskatchewan is the Co-operative Life Insurance Company, which also has a charter from Ottawa.

However, the point I was about to advise the minister on was this. That insurance company is a crown corporation which operates entirely under its own steam. It pays its own administrative and operating expenses and submits its accounts to the government. Its surplus is disposable, of course, by government decision.

Mr. CASE: Does it pay provincial taxes?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, it pays all taxes except municipal taxes; that is a matter which is one of controversy at the present time, and I understand that payments will be made in lieu of them, in agreement with the municipalities.

The matter I wish to introduce this afternoon is opportune now after I have spent these few minutes in the way I have. I am glad to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his place before I bring it up. It has to do with the matter of the supply of hardware, particularly nails, to one of our big Saskatchewan co-operative associations, namely, the Saskatchewan Federated Co-operatives Limited. This is an institution which has been built up over the years by the same process that governments here and in other places have advised the people to undertake. They have said the same as the Minister of Labour said a while ago, that people should help themselves when they are in extremities. The people of Saskatchewan have in a variety of ways set up organizations by which they hope to help themselves. They do not consider it fair when obstacles are placed in their way that prevent them from helping themselves as they should be permitted to do.

The file of correspondence I have here is between the president of the Saskatchewan Federated Co-operatives Limited, Mr. George Urwin, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and it also contains letters between the steel controller of Canada, Mr. Fred Ashbaugh, and Mr. C. H. Millard of the united steelworkers of America. The reason that correspondence enters the picture will become apparent as I go along. This co-operative has a membership of around 75,000 people, of whom about 96 per cent are farmers. It is not a corporation in the sense that people have invested money in it for the purpose of making money out of their investment. It is a co-operative in which people have invested money for the purpose of building certain things to serve themselves.

They have done that in this way. They have built 540 retail outlets which service every populated area in Saskatchewan. Through the affiliation of those 540 retail outlets they have ownership in the central organization, the federated co-operatives limited, through which they operate two coal mines at Drumheller, a lumber mill at Canoe, British Columbia, an oil refinery at Regina, a flour mill at Outlook and two feed plants, one at Saskatoon and the other at Regina.

As I say, they have done these things to service themselves. They are asking no favours from anybody. They simply want to be able to use their purchasing power in that way, to go into the market and purchase their supplies from manufacturers, or to purchase the raw materials from the suppliers and make them available in consumable form through these outlets. Last year they did a business which would not be considered much in big business circles but which was very satisfactory to them, a business of around $11,500,000; but they are unable to get some supplies, one of the most important of which is nails.

The subject matter of the correspondence I have here is a request to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (a) to make it possible for this organization to buy its portion of the available supply of nails from the present distributors, or (b) to make available 300 tons of steel wire to a firm in Galt which is willing to make these nails for them, provided that it can get the steel wire with which to do so. These are their two requests. The replies are, of course, the same kind the minister has given the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) when he has asked about nails. The minister has given a short, rather abrupt answer, which in most instances could be described as a brush-off. That is about the tone he takes in his replies to the president of this co-operative institution.

Then the Canadian director of the united steelworkers of America, Mr. C. H. Millard, took up the matter on behalf of the co-operative, with which he had some correspondence. Mr. Millard got in touch with the steel controller in an endeavour to have these necessary supplies made available to the firm which is willing to manufacture the nails, but Mr. Ashbaugh has been no more considerate than the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for the obvious reason that he is under the direction of the minister and therefore, I suppose, can do nothing the minister will not permit him to do. Mr. Millard pointed out that a great deal of our iron ore goes to the United States, and for that reason we should be able to get larger supplies of the finished steel. The minister and the controller replied that the shortage of steel would make it impossible to provide the 300 tons required for the manufacture of these nails.

Just on that point, I remember that back in 1942 a request was made by some people in British Columbia who believed there were deposits of iron ore and coal sufficiently close together to make it possible to put up smelters and manufacture steel products there. At that time they were told that there has always been a surplus of steel in Canada, and as a result they were not given permission to do as they wished. If that permission had been given at that time, perhaps the condition of which I speak today would not have arisen. That permission not having been given, however, we now face this shortage; and I claim it is the responsibility of the government either to make this quantity of raw material available for the manufacture of the nails required by this co-operative institution, or to see that the distributors make available to the co-operative enough nails out of the total going into the retail trade to supply their members.

Of course the minister and others will take the position that this would be interfering with private business; but I claim that when seventy-five thousand people have clearly stated by their membership in this organization that they want to do their retail trading in their own stores, they should not be compelled by some business circumstance to go to another person, who certainly would be a competitor of the co-operative institution, in order to buy their nails. If we believe in free enterprise in this country we should certainly make an effort to see that those who engage in it are able to practise that principle through whatever channels they consider are proper and lawful.

I had hoped that the Minister of Agriculture would give some attention to this matter. As everyone knows, he has risen in this chamber on more than one occasion and said that he and his Liberal party in Saskatchewan and here fathered the co-operatives. As a matter of fact, on one occasion he made the statement, "We built the co-operatives". I take issue with that statement, because it is not correct; but if he believes it to be correct—and he would not have said so if he did not believe it—certainly he should do his utmost to let his brainchild grow. Those of us who come from Saskatchewan find it difficult to realize that the government can be so inconsiderate as to permit a lusty baby in the co-operative family to be denied the food necessary to continue its growth in this country of free enterprise. Someone says the child is now bigger than its father. That is so in Saskatchewan; whether it is true here remains to be seen. I do not want to make an unpleasant political issue of this, but the government say they believe in free enterprise, that they believe in people helping themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: We believe in co-operatives.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister repeats that he believes in co-operatives. That is splendid. If the government believe in these three things; if they believe in free enterprise, if they believe people should help themselves by their own free enterprise, and if they believe in co-operatives—which I think the minister will agree are a democratic and sound type of free enterprise—then I say this government should not permit either their own policies or the policies of private business to prevent this enterprise of which I speak from obtaining its share of the available supplies of the goods it requires to satisfy the needs of its membership. The minister could, I think, do a lot to convince the government that that situation could and should be taken care of by his administration.

I do not know that I can give any more convincing arguments than I have given. I have just one further quotation which I think might be brought to the attention of the house. This is from a letter addressed to Mr. Charles Millard from Mr. F. K. Ashbaugh, the steel controller, wherein he says:

> In view of the fact that we are not giving assistance in procurement to more than an infinitely small percentage of Canadian industry...

This indicates that they are giving some assistance in the matter of procurement. And the very fact that they are doing that indicates to me that it is their duty to make supplies available to this organization about which I have spoken today. They have not asked much. They need a great deal more in the hardware line, such things as wire and other metal retail objects. However, they have stated clearly that rather than press the point, to the embarrassment of the country, they will be happy for this year at least to have these 300 tons of steel wire made available to this firm in Galt so that they can manufacture nails. I say the government should proceed immediately to see that this firm gets what it asks, or to see that private industry makes available to the Saskatchewan Federated Co-operatives Limited its share of nails, which will come through the retail trade and which the farmers will buy anyway, because they must have nails to carry out their operations.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) has put the case so well that I wish only to add my voice to what he has said. It is true that the Saskatchewan Federated Co-operatives Limited has its headquarters in my city and that I have been interested in its growth over a number of years.

This is not the first time that this firm, if I may so describe it, has had its troubles in matters of supply. In 1946 I tried to obtain from the wartime prices and trade board a proper quota on canned milk for this co-operative. I have here a letter which advanced the argument against the distribution of canned milk to this organization. This letter, signed by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew), parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, states:

> I have taken the matter up with the wartime prices and trade board, and am advised that under their policy of equitable distribution, evaporated milk is one of the items which continues to be classified as in such serious short supply that it may only be distributed to basic period customers in quantities related to their basic period purchases.

The situation in regard to nails is much the same today, and it is with that argument of the government, as set forth in the letter I have just read, and which refers to basic period customers, that I find fault.

Let me put to the house a ridiculous case. We will consider two rival business institutions on two corners of a street. One of these loses all its customers to the other, but the government persists in supplying with the goods the one losing its customers, while the other firm which now has the customers can obtain no goods with which to supply them. Perhaps that is going far afield, and may be considered a ridiculous case. But it will at least point up the fact I wish to make clear. Here is an institution which has been growing in membership but which cannot get supplies. The hon. member for Swift Current put the number of shareholders in the organization at 75,000. I have a statement here from the Co-operative Union of Saskatchewan which states:

> Allowing for duplication of membership, it is safe to say that some 300,000 Saskatchewan people are members of one or more co-operatives.

This may be considered a startling statement, particularly to some of my hon. friends to my right. However, that is the way in which we are now doing business in Saskatchewan, on a co-operative basis. There are, of course, reasons why we are operating in that way.

[Mr. Bentley.]

But to get back to my argument, I think the basis of distribution should be one of population or customers who buy goods from a firm. If this particular firm can show a membership of 75,000, and potential purchasers numbering 300,000, I say that firm should receive a great deal of consideration when it comes to a matter of supply.

As my hon. friend pointed out, people started these institutions to help themselves. Here is an organization which says, "We have no nails; nails cannot be obtained." The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) would support me in this. They say, "All right; we have no nails; we will make them." Then they proceed to negotiate to buy unused machinery which will be shipped out to them so that they can make their own nails, if the government will only guarantee a supply of steel from which the nails can be made.

Then the government comes along and says, "No; already all the nails which can be made are being produced. Why should you make nails out there?" I have tried to explode that argument, and I believe I have done so successfully. If the customers are there, then those customers are entitled to their proportion of nails, on any basis of need or equitable distribution.

In connection with canned milk, about which there was discussion a couple of years ago, I have reason to believe that the distribution was not equitable. Is it not ridiculous that a man who buys his groceries at a co-operative store should be permitted to fill his basket or the back of his car—we used to do that, but now a brown parcel will hold the lot of it—and then if he wishes to buy canned milk find that he has to go to some other store to make the purchase? Is that not ridiculous? I believe I have said sufficient, and practically all I had intended to say. I would ask that it be called six o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion (Mr. Abbott) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

52. Departmental administration, $1,915,860.

Mr. GRAYDON: When does the minister expect to go on with the debate on external affairs?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Thursday, and Friday, if need be, providing a sufficient opportunity for members who wish to speak on external affairs to be heard.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the debate will open at the beginning of the sitting on Thursday.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the beginning of the sitting on Thursday, and it will continue on Friday, if need be, to give members who wish to be heard an opportunity to speak.

Mr. KNOWLES: Tonight it will be agriculture from nine o'clock on, will it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We propose to introduce the other departments mentioned, and have them stand. Then we shall call agriculture, to proceed at nine o'clock.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

463. Departmental administration, $690,670.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $234,297.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Stands, until later this day.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE KING AND QUEEN

MESSAGE OF THANKS FOR CONGRATULATIONS ON TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MARRIAGE OF THEIR MAJESTIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following cable from His Majesty the King:

London,
The 27th of April, 1948.

The Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, Ottawa.

The Queen and I thank you and the members of the House of Commons of Canada most sincerely for your congratulations on this twenty-fifth anniversary of our wedding.

On this happy occasion it is particularly pleasing to receive this further expression of the affection and loyalty which you have constantly shown toward us, and we both appreciate greatly the warmth of your address.

George R.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CASE—BELL SUMMONING MEMBERS TO HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to ask if you could arrange to have a bell installed that will have a little more tone and music in it. The bell which rings on division and calls the member to labour has a very harsh tone. There are so many harsh things sometimes in this chamber that I wish you could secure a bell with music and sweetness of tone.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is exactly the same as Bill No. 154 of the last session of parliament. I moved the second reading of that bill on May 9, 1947, but unfortunately it never came up for discussion again. In support of last year's bill I asked the house to give it favourable consideration as I believed that the vast majority of the Canadian people are in favour of abolishing appeals to the privy council and setting up our own final and ultimate court of appeal for Canada, because it is the next important and logical step toward Canadian sovereignty. I still believe this to be the case, and I am convinced that the vast majority of the Canadian people are today of the same frame of mind.

I have had an opportunity during the recess, since last July, of discussing this question with many people in all walks of life and of different shades of political affiliation, not only in western Canada but in other parts of Canada, and I feel safe in saying that in presenting the bill for the second time to this house for its favourable consideration and support I have most Canadians with me.

Even among the members of my own profession, particularly in the west, I find a preponderance of opinion that we ought to be sufficiently grown up and emancipated to administer and interpret our own laws, and that our supreme court should be the final court of appeal in our own country.

At the last session I based my argument for support almost entirely on the fact that Canada is now a sovereign nation, and this alone should be sufficient for this house to pass this bill. I again make this plea with all sincerity, and at this time I shall go farther and argue that our present position in this matter is incompatible with our status as a member of the British commonwealth of nations and as a member of that larger body, the united nations.

Someone said, improperly I believe, that the privy council, in deciding that Canada possessed the power to abolish appeals to that body, signed its own death warrant as a Canadian court. I cannot look at the matter in that way. The spirit in which this famous judgment was rendered is something entirely different from the spirit of a death warrant. It was rather the spirit of a new life; it was an enthusiastic invitation to Canada to assert its sovereignty and to pass this very bill which is now before us. It was an invitation to enjoy that new sovereign life, which in reality we were capable of possessing since the Statute of Westminster was passed in 1931.

To make my point clear, namely that I can read an invitation into the language of the judgment, listen to some of the passages of the judgment as delivered by Lord Jowitt, the Lord Chancellor:

> No other solution is consonant with the status of a self-governing dominion . . .

Later on:

> It is not consistent with the political conception which is embodied in the British commonwealth of nations that one member of that commonwealth should be precluded from setting up, if it so desires, a supreme court of appeal having jurisdiction both ultimate and exclusive of any other member.

Later again:

> That natural attribute of a sovereign power (namely the establishment of a general court of appeal) stands unqualified and absolute.

While it would have been improper for that body to suggest action, it seemed to me that the general tenor of the language used implies an invitation to apply immediately the law upon which they had adjudicated, because our present position in still maintaining the right of appeal to the privy council is, in the language of Lord Jowitt, "inconsistent with the political conception which is embodied in the British commonwealth of nations".

Surely I need no better authority than the privy council itself for the argument that our present status as a sovereign member of the British commonwealth demands the action which is proposed in this bill.

Before turning to the other point which concerns our relationship in the united nations, let me deal for a moment with the arguments which might be, and undoubtedly will be, advanced against this measure. There is the contention that it would destroy the prerogative of His Majesty. I think we can dismiss this argument as invalid in view of the long standing and adopted British constitutional conception. It is unthinkable that His Majesty could act without the advice of the privy council, and it has been held on numerous occasions that the privy council is, in fact, an appellate court of law.

In the case of the British Coal Corporation versus The King, 1935, 3 D.L.R., 401, the privy council itself says this:

> It is clear that the committee is regarded in the act as a judicial body or court, though all it can do is to report or recommend to His Majesty in Council by whom alone the order in council which is made to give effect to the report of the committee is made. But according to constitutional convention it is unknown and unthinkable that His Majesty in Council should not give effect to the report of the judicial committee who are thus in truth an appellate court of law, to which, by the statute of 1833 all appeals within their purview are referred.

It is clear, therefore, that in passing this bill we are not in the slightest degree interfering with any supposedly existing prerogative of His Majesty. We are simply substituting one final ultimate appeal court of our own for another which is not our own, and about the composition, jurisdiction and powers of which we have no voice whatsoever.

In anticipating arguments in opposition to the bill of last session I mentioned, and I disagreed then with the position taken by some people, that the privy council should be retained as the final court of appeal because it would be a neutral or more impartial tribunal to adjudicate upon controversies involving the interpretation of our constitution, the British North America Act. I find that this sort of argument still forms the main source of opposition to a measure such as the one before the house at the moment.

I also find the argument advanced that we might abolish all appeals to the privy council except cases which involve a constitutional question. With that I disagree entirely. In the first place, I would say that such arguments are not very complimentary to Canadian judges who are as good judges as any in the British empire. In the second place, I shall contend that Canadian judges who have lived here all their lives, who are conversant with Canadian life, Canadian habits, and who know Canadian social, economic and industrial conditions are in a much better position to interpret our constitution in the light of ever-changing circumstances in this country of ours. You see, I do not regard our constitution as a dry, inflexible law or statute, and although I will admit that it needs to be changed in some places, I think the framers of this law and its sponsors, the fathers of confederation, did very well, and when they built this constitution I think they had the future in mind.

I said once before in this parliament, and I should like to emphasize again, that the fathers of confederation were out to create a unified nation. Canadian unity is, in my opinion, the cornerstone of the British North America Act, and it is in that light that its various provisions should be interpreted. I think we can safely leave that interpretation to Canadian judges. There is no question that, as time passes, conditions will arise through the natural progress which we are bound to make, which will require the interpretation of the British North America Act in the light of the emergence of such new conditions, which conditions will be bound to be subject to dispute as to where the jurisdiction rests to legislate with respect to such new circumstances. I believe that such disputes will in future be decided more or less upon the basis of the recent privy council decision in respect of the Canada Temperance Act case, which says that parliament has jurisdiction, under the peace, order and good government clause, on any subject that, by its inherent nature, is of national importance. I have an idea that future constitutional disputes will revolve about that question, and I believe that Canadian judges will be in a better position to adjudicate upon such a point, namely, as to what is a subject which, by its inherent nature, is of national importance, and what, on the other hand, is a matter of merely provincial or local concern.

These judges, as Canadians, will have been part and parcel of this national progress. They will understand better the causes of changing conditions, and for these reasons I maintain that Canadian judges are in a better position than the learned law lords of the privy council in interpreting the Canadian constitution as a flexible, progressive statute, which, as Lord Sankey once said, "was a live tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits."

The only hon. member who was able to take part in the debate last year was the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who opposed the passing of the measure in no uncertain terms, basing his argument mainly, as I understood him, upon the supposition that the privy council has been the great defender of the rights of minorities of this country, and likewise that the provinces were not favourable to this bill because the privy council was the guardian of provincial rights. I think it is, to say the least, incongruous to argue in this manner, because the judges of our supreme court come from different provinces and they understand, better than anyone, provincial rights or the rights of minorities.

I have not taken any census of the numerous decisions rendered by the privy council upon constitutional questions since confederation, but I venture to say that the decisions rendered against the provinces and favourable to the dominion are more numerous than decisions rendered the other way. In any event, however, the argument is invalid. If you say that the privy council has been the guardian of provincial rights you suggest that that body has favoured the provinces as against the dominion, and that sounds to me rather like a reflection on them, which is certainly unjustified. Our courts of law bestow no favours.

As to the privy council being a great defender of the rights of minorities, I may say that the records of the decisions of the privy council with regard to minority rights would certainly not bear out that this is a fact. If you refer to that most excellent book of Doctor Maurice Olliver on "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", you will see the leading cases on minority rights cited, which appear to be proof of the fact that most cases show that the people who claimed certain rights as minorities were told by the privy council that they did not have any such rights.

I have also heard it argued of late that we should retain the appeals to the privy council because the decisions may form a valuable part of our jurisprudence based upon English common law. That, of course, would not be true if applied to the civil law of the province of Quebec. But even if we did abolish appeals to the privy council, any judgments which they might render in the future would still be valuable, as in our courts we look with great respect upon the judgments of British courts, although these judgments may not be binding in our courts. Therefore I maintain that there is no argument on that score either.

I mentioned in my opening remarks a few moments ago that I maintained as a second point that the retention of the privy council as a Canadian court of appeal was inconsistent with our status as a member of the united nations. The charter of the united nations on membership qualifications states that we must be able and willing under our own laws to enforce and carry out the obligations which we undertake when we become a member of that great organization. I maintain that, by retaining the privy council as the final court of appeal, we offend against that qualification, because it would not be a court of our own making which might have the final word with respect to our obligations as a member of the united nations.

For instance, there is the act which we passed last year, being chapter 69, to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the united nations and related international organizations. That act contains as a schedule the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations. It is quite possible that there might be some legal controversy as to the interpretation of the act or of the convention which forms part of it. As a matter of fact, article 1 states:

> The united nations shall possess juridical personality. It shall have the capacity:
> (a) to contract;
> (b) to acquire and dispose of immovable and movable property;
> (c) to institute legal proceedings.

It has that authority to institute legal proceedings within our jurisdiction; that is, within Canada. Section 34 of the convention which is ratified and adopted by chapter 69 of the 1947 statutes reads as follows:

> It is understood that, when an instrument of accession is deposited on behalf of any member, the member will be in a position under its own law to give effect to the terms of this convention.

I emphasize the language used in that article, namely, "under its own laws." Our judicial system is established by law, but that system includes the highest court of appeal, which is not constituted under our own laws. Therefore I would argue that we offend against the convention adopted by this statute because we are not in a position under our own laws to give effect to the terms of the convention.

The sections of the statute just quoted and the articles of the convention itself suggest that there may be legal proceedings for their enforcement, instituted even by the united nations itself. All of this might be subject to appeal to the privy council, and we might find ourselves in what I believe would be an embarrassing position if the privy council, a court which is not our own, should tell us what our duties and obligations were in connection with a relationship into which we had entered as a sovereign state.

Then there is chapter 46 of the statutes of 1947, the United Nations Act. This act provides that if the security council decides upon a measure, including the interruption of economic relations, the governor in council may make orders and regulations enabling such measures to be effectively applied. The act means that if the security council requires us to do so we have to apply economic sanctions or any other sanction short of war against an offending member of the united nations. If we pass regulations in respect thereof I can imagine litigation arising from such regulations, such as the numerous prosecutions which occurred under the War Measures Act. I can imagine a possible appeal to the privy council and that body telling Canada, a sovereign nation of the united nations, what our duties are with respect to the obligations we have entered into.

Apart from our status as a member of the united nations, there is our general relationship as a sovereign state to the other nations of the world. For instance, take the case of the Polish art treasures about which there might be a lawsuit which would command headlines on the front pages of the daily press. However innocent and well meant were the actions of the dominion and Quebec governments in this mix-up, they might very easily become an important feature in such a lawsuit. Imagine the possibility of the privy council having to adjudicate upon that matter in the light of the acts of the dominion or the province concerned!

I think it is intolerable to contemplate that Canada as a sovereign state, which it is in fact whether we like it or not, should submit in a case such as this to the judgment of a court which is not our own. To me the retention of the privy council as the final court of appeal is incompatible with our membership as a sovereign state in the united nations. I commend this bill to the favourable consideration of the house.

(Translation):

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, since the time reserved for public bills is very limited, my remarks will be rather brief.

The bill proposes to abolish appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council.

Since the enactment of the Statute of Westminster by the imperial parliament, on December 11, 1931, which recognized Canada's sovereignty this matter has been discussed at the sessions of 1937, 1938 and particularly that of 1939, when the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Ernest Lapointe, unreservedly approved a similar bill introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. James, Mr. Cahan.

However, passage of the bill was delayed until such time as the government could obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the privy council regarding the power of parliament to legislate in that matter.

Since it was decided by the supreme court, in 1940, and by the privy council, in January 1947, that the dominion parliament had the power to abolish appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council, we have reason to wonder why the government did not introduce, in 1947, a bill implementing those decisions. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who asserted that he favoured the abolition of those appeals, when he was chairman of the Canadian Bar Association, will facilitate the passage of this bill which may otherwise meet with the same fate as the one introduced last year by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke).

We have every reason for acting without delay. First, our present position is incompatible with our status of sovereign nation. Canada is a free and sovereign country and is recognized as such by other nations. Canada is a member of the United Nations Organization, based on the principle of the equal sovereignty of all its members, and even holds a seat in the security council. Yet, for the administration of justice, one of the most important functions in a really free and autonomous country, Canada depends on a foreign court which operates outside our borders.

Under such circumstances, what is meant by equal status and full autonomy? What is understood by the Statute of Westminster? Our prestige among nations is at stake unless we eliminate as soon as possible this ancient vestige of our colonial status which hinders our judicial autonomy and fosters among us an inferiority complex.

In so far as Canadian courts feel bound by decisions of the privy council which, in effect, are akin to enactments, this state of things interferes with our legislative autonomy.

In his book on Responsible Government in the Colonies, Keith says at page 1102:

> It is idle to deny that the taking of appeals to the privy council is a mark of inferior status and partial servility . . . The maintenance of the present position is just and proper so long as the dominions desire to remain dependencies.

Moreover, it is insulting to our judicial body and humiliating to the entire Canadian population to maintain this right of appeal. It implies that we have not among us people sufficiently enlightened, sufficiently intelligent, to interpret our laws and statutes and that we must ask a foreign court for an ultimate decision in matters at issue. We are able to enact our laws but unable to interpret them.

Would anyone claim, for instance, that in a matter of civil law, a foreign judge with little or no knowledge of our Quebec civil code would be more likely to safeguard the interests of the citizen than our own judges with their lifelong experience? Here also one may not forget that their lord justices seeing no difference between the Quebec civil code and the common law, as they have often stated, have been too prone to abide by the precedents of the English courts.

Some claim that the privy council is the guardian of minority rights. In the light of experience, far from being so, this claim is but a myth as was stated by the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. Were this not sufficient, I could remind hon. members of the judgments rendered in the cases of the school laws of New Brunswick, in 1871, of Manitoba (Barrett v. Winnipeg) in 1892, of the Ontario Regulation No. XVII, and in the case Despatie-Tremblay. Without any exception, the judgments of their lordships were against the claims of the minority. Moreover, the privy council is more a political than a judicial body. As was stated in this house by Mr. Cahan, in 1937:

> Many of its active members are at the same time members of a legislative division of the British parliament. The Lord Chief Justice is a member of the government of the United Kingdom and no report of the judicial committee can be binding unless approved by an order of the British privy council.

This accounts for certain decisions such as that which, in 1927, granted Newfoundland a portion of Labrador peninsula which until then had been part of the province of Quebec.

Moreover, such appeals to the privy council wreak an injustice upon people of slender means, because they are too costly. After all, it is within the reach only of great corporations and wealthy people. Let the hon. members imagine the costs of taking a case to London, and the predicament of the Canadian citizen of limited means who faces the threat of an appeal to the privy council, after winning his case in a Canadian court. Unable to meet the costs of such an appeal, he agrees to some more or less advantageous settlement, which means that powerful companies have used the outside tribunal as an instrument of intimidation.

What of the multiplicity of appeal jurisdictions whose very numbers increase judicial costs and hamper the administration of justice? In our judicial system, there are three appeal courts, including the privy council, whereas two appeal jurisdictions within Canada, namely the Court of King's Bench and the Supreme Court of Canada, are amply sufficient. As far as I know, that number is not exceeded in other countries.

As an example of the delay caused by this third appeal to the privy council, there is the Despatie-Tremblay case, first heard in the province of Quebec Superior Court on June 26, 1911, then carried to the privy council where it was first heard in 1914 and finally settled on February 11, 1921, after a second hearing, that is ten years after the decision in the first instance.

I remember a saying of a former justice of the Court of King's Bench, Sir Horace Archambault:

Justice which is not expeditious is not justice.

Let us therefore put an end to these injustices and rid ourselves of this last vestige of colonialism.

We are concerned today with abolishing appeals to the privy council, but I believe it would be proper to complete this legislation by regulating the working of the Supreme Court.

In any case involving civil law or civil procedure, the decision of the provincial court of appeals should be final, and the right of appeal to the Supreme Court abolished. Alternatively, it should be decided that the cases from Quebec should be heard by five judges, including three from Quebec, and the cases from the other provinces by at least three judges from such other provinces.

In constitutional cases a special court could be set up, including the judges from the Supreme Court and the chief justice from every province.

But let us begin by abolishing appeals to the privy council.

(Text):

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), Mr. Speaker, on having introduced again this year a bill to abolish appeals to the privy council. He said tonight that this was the next logical step in the establishment of Canada's sovereignty. I am in perfect agreement not only with what he said on that point but generally with all the reasons he gave, both tonight and last year, in favour of the abolition of the right of appeal to the privy council.

(Translation):

May I also congratulate the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) for his truly Canadian stand on this subject? After his speech, there can be no doubt in our minds about his genuine Canadian spirit. Once more I commend him for it.

[Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie).]

Several reasons have been brought forward in the two speeches which I have just mentioned, as well as in others made on previous occasions, for the elimination of appeals to the privy council. Outstanding remarks have been made especially by the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe and by the hon. Mr. Cahan. The argument presented by Mr. Maurice Ollivier, in his book, is consistent, perfectly established and most convincing. While thus reminding the hon. members of outstanding contributions on the subject, I do not intend to repeat tonight in my own words all arguments previously adduced.

As was stated last year by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), the right of our Canadian parliament to do away with appeals to the privy council has been definitely established by the privy council itself. All we have now to discuss is the advisability of a bill such as this.

Before dealing with this matter, I should like as briefly as possible to call the attention of the house to the following point. Bill No. 5 would do away with all appeals to the privy council and even with the appeals to the royal prerogative, commonly known as appeals to the throne. Therefore, no Canadian citizen would have the right to appeal to the King in the case of certain grievances for which no remedy may be sought from other jurisdictions.

Though I would not wish to give a final opinion on this matter, I am inclined to believe that on this score serious objection could be had to the bill as now drafted It is not inconceivable that serious trouble might arise from the final decision of a court due to gross injustices which would be without remedy after the elimination of these appeals to the throne. Of course, this objectionable feature does not challenge the principle of the bill but it might properly be the subject matter of an amendment in committee. I wonder if it would not be better to amend the bill so as to allow appeals to the Governor General who would act on the advice given to him by the Supreme Court after having heard all parties concerned, except of course in cases already dealt with by that court. I am not in a position to express a definite opinion on the matter, but no doubt that many hon. members have had enough experience in legal matters and are conversant enough with those questions to put forth useful and interesting opinions.

I repeat, however, that there is not the slightest doubt in my mind about the principle of the bill, which I entirely approve.

The judicial committee of the privy council was empowered by chapters 3 and 4, William IV, to hear any appeal from His Majesty's colonies. Previously, the appeals from the colonies were heard by His Majesty in council. The said committee was established to hear appeals from the colonies, but not appeals from judgments brought down in England and Scotland.

After the hearing, the judicial committee of the privy council submits a report to the King, stating the reasons which have motivated the lords' decision, advising His Majesty to give effect to their recommendation. The report is then referred to the King in council for the United Kingdom, and not for Canada, and is approved. An order in council is then passed, quoting the report verbatim. The decision then becomes the King's judgment.

From the above, it should be remembered that the judgments of the privy council are, in fact, only judgments of the King and his council for the United Kingdom—that is of the British government—judgments which are rendered upon the recommendation of the lords, who are members of the judicial committee of the privy council. In its very essence, this court is of a colonial order. That, to my mind, is the main reason why Canada can no longer allow decisions of our courts to be appealed to the privy council.

Mr. DECHENE: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: Canada being a sovereign nation, it is inconceivable that within our borders, no court should be able to settle our lawsuits conclusively. Since we are free to sign any treaty we choose, since we rank third in the world among trading powers, take part in all international assemblies, decide between war and peace, Canada can surely no longer tolerate seeing another country settle our lawsuits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: Personally, I admit quite frankly that I will not believe there are still people in Canada whose colonial-mindedness comes before patriotism and national pride.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: If we are proud of our Canadian status, if we are proud of our nationhood, if we are proud of our country, the least we can do, the first step we can take is to have our own courts render conclusive decisions.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that the privy council was a political court. In fact, it is political not only in its composition, but in the judgments it has brought down. Members of the judicial committee are active politicians, which is contrary to our conception of the judicial body in Canada. In our country, we never see a judge on a political platform; he never takes part in political debates, and is not allowed to. Here, a judge is not only deprived of membership in the House of Commons or the Senate, but also of the right to vote. We have adopted as a principle that Canadian judges should be entirely free from politics and from political influence.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: In Canada, writes Mr. Maurice Ollivier in his work "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", page 255, "the separation of judicial and legislative powers advocated by de Montesquieu is complete". We take all necessary precautionary measures to safeguard the independence of our judges.

Some members of the judicial committee of the privy council are also members of the House of Lords.

Mr. POULIOT: Shame! Shame!

Mr. LESAGE: They take part in political campaigns, supporting their party's candidate in the election. Being human, even though they are British lords, they are subject to political influence and considerations.

Although in Canada, and again I point this out, we do everything to ensure the complete division of powers and the absolute independence of our judges, we still submit our disputes, in a last appeal, to those same persons whom we would never ask to preside over our courts in Canada. The record of the judgments brought down by that court proves that in several cases, and the most important at that, the decisions were only in the nature of political expediencies. May I be permitted to quote the words spoken in this house by Mr. Thorson, during the debate on the Hon. Mr. Cahan's bill (Ollivier, page 246): "The Privy Council has proved itself to be a court not of law but of political expediency".

Those who contend that the judges of our supreme court are not sufficiently independent and do not have the required legal experience to render final decisions which are fair, are insulting our judicial body, as was pointed out a moment ago by the hon. members for Kindersley and for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). Those who venture to hold this view should not forget that in so doing they are undermining the very foundation of our democratic way of life. Indeed, in these troubled times, one of the cornerstones of our nation's faith in democracy is its confidence in our courts and judges. Yet, I go so far as to say that those who object to the elimination of appeals to the privy council are undermining democracy in the country. Its opponents are divided into two classes. I need not insist on the opinions of the imperialist diehards since this group is fast disappearing in Canada and amounts to so little that it is not worth mentioning.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: However, those who, under cover of narrow provincial-mindedness, strive to preserve Canada's colonial status, err far more grievously. They try to maintain the right of appeal to the privy council in constitutional matters because they claim that since judges of the supreme court are chosen and appointed by the dominion government, they lack the fairness required to prevent them from favouring the federal body in constitutional issues involving the central government and the provincial legislatures. Experience has shown that in constitutional matters, the Supreme Court of Canada has agreed with the provinces about as often as with the dominion government. It has certainly decided in their favour at least as frequently, if not more so, than did the privy council.

I find in the 1939 Canadian Bar Review, a most scholarly article on the subject by R. F. McWilliams which shows the undeniable truth of what I have just asserted. Mr. McWilliams reviews the main constitutional cases referred to the privy council and draws the following conclusion which I quote:

(Text):

The score may be summarized as follows. Of the twelve cases which came to the privy council from the Supreme Court of Canada, the decision of the latter court was sustained in nine cases and over-ruled in three cases. In the cases sustained the Dominion claim was upheld in four cases and disallowed in one case. The provincial claim was upheld in four cases and disallowed in none. Of the cases over-ruled all three were on provincial claims, and these were sustained in two out of three cases.

Of the thirteen cases, which came to the privy council from provincial courts, the lower courts were sustained in five cases and over-ruled in eight cases. Of the cases sustained, one upheld the dominion right, three upheld a provincial right, and one disallowed a provincial claim. Of the eight cases in which the provincial courts were over-ruled, two upheld dominion claims, three upheld provincial claims and three disallowed provincial claims.

(Translation):

And a little further:

(Text):

The record as to the earlier judgments might be supplemented by reference to the judgments in the most important of the recent cases. In the aeronautics cases the privy council upheld the dominion claim and reversed a judgment of the supreme court, which was in part unanimous and in part by a majority of six to one against the dominion jurisdiction.

In the radio case the privy council upheld the dominion claim and sustained the majority of three to two of the supreme court.

In the six cases arising out of the "new deal" legislation, unemployment insurance and so on (1937 A.C. 326 and following) the privy council upheld the dominion claim in three cases and disallowed it in three cases but in every case sustained the judgment of the supreme court.

(Translation):

This in short seems to me conclusive evidence of the mistake made by those who claim that the privy council has proven a more reliable protector of provincial rights than the Supreme Court.

Now what about the way in which minority rights have been treated by the privy council? I shall merely recall what was just said by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie when he referred to the cases issuing from regulation 17 and the cases relating to the New Brunswick and Manitoba schools. Suffice it to add the famous case of The Board of Education for the City of Windsor vs. Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited and the Board of Trustees of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools for the City of Windsor. For the first time in its history, the Appeal Court of Ontario gave judgment in favour of the separate schools. The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the Appeal Court's judgment but the privy council, before which the case was brought, reversed the decisions of the Appeal Court of Ontario and of the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Windsor separate schools had to hand over the amount of taxes paid to them by the Ford Company.

The cases I have just mentioned are among the outstanding ones in which the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council were both called upon to make a decision concerning the rights of minorities. The results would appear to show that the privy council cannot be considered as a tribunal aiming at the protection of minorities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: Therefore we are bound to infer that the argument submitted by the provincialists to the effect that the upholding of appeals to the privy council guarantees the respect of provincial and minority rights is not based on historical facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: Some very well-meaning people may, I imagine, have certain apprehensions with regard to constitutional difficulties between the central government and the provinces being finally decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, whose judges, sitting at Ottawa, are appointed and paid by the federal government.

It has been suggested, especially by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, that constitutional cases between the federal government and the provinces be heard both by the justices of the supreme court and by the chief justices of the various provinces, in the capacity of ad hoc supreme court justices. That can surely be considered as a means, not of ensuring justice because I believe it is ensured by the integrity of our supreme court judges, but perhaps of reaching a compromise likely to dissipate the apprehensions entertained in that respect. On the other hand, before we endorse the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kindersley, I think we should not wait until the suggestion I have just mentioned or some other proposal along the same lines, is carried out. To my mind it is so urgent for a sovereign nation like Canada to remove the colonial humiliation implied by the existence of the right of appeal to the privy council that the passing of this bill should not be further delayed.

Besides, that fear which I consider unjustified arises from anomalous situations connected with the fact that our constitution is a statute of another parliament, which was passed when Canada was a colony. In some respects, the British North America Act is certainly inconsistent with the present sovereign status of this country.

As the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) stated in this house, in 1946, we shall face endless constitutional problems as long as we are devoid of a Canadian constitution enacted by the Canadian people as Canadian statutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. LESAGE: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it would obviously not be expedient at this time to discuss the means whereby agreement could be reached between the central government and all the provinces, and between the whole population and its various sections, on the provisions of a Canadian constitution. I believe, however, that the problems relating to appeals to the privy council and those encountered in the matter of redistribution, unquestionably show that, if we are to maintain our sovereignty, we must find a definite solution. I realize that it involves no small task since a constitution could be drafted only through an assembly or a national constituent convention. Although the task is long, arduous, and difficult, I am confident that Canadian patriotism is now sufficiently developed. I am convinced that Canadians everywhere have enough love of country and pride in their country to seek all the prerogatives of full sovereignty.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $234,297.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman, may I first of all make some references to these estimates for the Department of Agriculture. We have read and heard about many reports in which the Department of Finance has boasted of a surplus of well over $750 million in the past fiscal year. Bearing that fact in mind, I note that, while the estimates for the fiscal year 1947-48 amounted to $63,185,158.37, the amount for the fiscal year 1948-49 is only $41,822,602, showing a decrease, in the present year, of $21,362,556.37. That is an enlightening comparison in view of the greatest surplus in history about which the government as a whole are boasting. I think there is too heavy a decrease in the estimated expenditures for the Department of Agriculture for the coming year. I know that many of us are asking for decreases in governmental expenditure, but I do not think that under present conditions there should be a decrease in this department. Our present per capita expenditure on Canadian agriculture is very much less than that of the United States. In the United States last year their expenditure on agriculture was, I understand, $1,247 million. Our population is approximately one-twelfth of theirs, and to be on the same footing we should be spending well over $100 million on agriculture this year.

As has often been pointed out, our own Canadian government has placed an embargo against beef cattle going to the United States. That was imposed in 1942 and still exists, and the beef producers of the west and their association are very much concerned lest they lose that natural market of theirs in the future. They have recently briefed the Prime Minister about it, also the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance.

This government has also placed embargoes against other agricultural products entering the United States. When you think of those embargoes and then consider that, according to the press, a statement was issued by the Minister of Agriculture the other day that we now have 48 per cent more meat in storage in this country today than we had a year ago—

Mr. GARDINER: I know the hon. member would not want to leave on the record a statement which is not correct. I am not criticizing him for putting it on, because the statement did come over the radio on Sunday morning that we had 48 per cent more meat in storage than we had a year ago. I immediately got in touch with those who put the statement on and it did not go out over the radio again or appear in the press. The report was inaccurate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to hear that. Can the minister tell us what the correct figure is?

Mr. GARDINER: I can get the exact figures but it was not anything like that. The 48 per cent increase was the amount of bacon hogs which were delivered in January of this year as compared with January of a year ago.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Can the minister say where the radio and the press got their information?

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

Mr. GARDINER: No. It was just a wrong impression that a reporter got from a statement which was made.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to have the minister's correction, because the statement received publicity all across Canada. On the other hand I believe there is a lot of meat in storage and we should be glad to have the exact figures on that.

With respect to feed grain, I understand that there is a much greater quantity on hand today than there has been for many years. I understand from a report that there is a surplus of 10,000,000 bushels of barley. The minister will correct me if the report was inaccurate.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the statement was made on the radio that there was a surplus of 10,000,000 bushels of barley that was to be sold outside Canada, but the actual statement which the reporter said he made was that there were 5,000,000 bushels of barley and 5,000,000 bushels of oats, the two making 10,000,000 bushels, which was likely to be exported.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to have that correction. We should like to have the exact figures, because I understand that there is a surplus of feed in Canada at this time as well as of meat. There is consternation among the coarse grain producers in western Canada, especially those who marketed their grain between August 1 last fall and the date of lifting the ceiling. The minister has said on several occasions that an adjustment would be made, but it is now seven months since the ceiling was taken off and many producers who sold their grain during that period are anxious to know when the adjustment will be made. It seems to me that they ought to be told, because at present confusion exists. There was a federal-provincial conference last fall and a plan was issued for the guidance of the farmers this year; nevertheless considerable confusion exists among western farmers as to what they should plant at this season of the year.

A question that is uppermost in my mind and in the minds of many people who have spoken to me is, what prospect have Canadian producers of marketing agricultural products this year through the Marshall plan? I believe that plan has been approved by the United States authorities, and I would assume that our Canadian authorities have been negotiating with United States officials. If no agreement has actually been signed as yet, perhaps the minister could give us some idea of what our agricultural producers might reasonably expect to market through the Marshall plan. This information would be very useful to those who are about to proceed with their planting operations at this time of year.

If the minister would make a fairly full statement at this time I think it would tend to shorten the debate and save a lot of questions, and certainly it would facilitate the passage of his estimates.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would it be possible for the minister and his assistants to move nearer the agricultural centre of gravity in this house?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. WRIGHT: Now that we have the Minister of Agriculture among the farmers, we can get down to business. I agree with the hon. member for Souris that it certainly needs a little bit of explaining why there should be such a large decrease in the estimated expenditures for agriculture for the coming year. The decrease would seem to indicate that the government are satisfied that we have as efficient agricultural production as it is possible to have in this country, and that we have also a growing agricultural production in Canada. Neither is the case, if we take the government's own publications as our authority. For instance, 28 per cent of the farms in Canada today are subsistence farms.

The definition which I am using of a subsistence farm is one that produces less for sale than is consumed on the farm itself. There is a tremendous variation between different parts of Canada in the number of subsistence farms. Alberta has the lowest percentage, with 15 per cent; Saskatchewan, 16 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 40 per cent, and New Brunswick, 51 per cent. Anyone who has visited Prince Edward Island knows that province has a soil which is as productive as that of any other province in the dominion. Yet 40 per cent of the farms, to use the definition that I have given, are on a subsistence level. The 28 per cent of the farms of Canada that are on a subsistence level produced less than 10 per cent of the total marketed agricultural production of Canada; while 10 per cent of the most productive farms in the country produced over 30 per cent of the marketed agricultural produce of Canada. This indicates that there is need of a great deal of extension work, both in the federal Department of Agriculture and in the provincial departments of agriculture. There should not be such a variation in the production capacities of our farms as is indicated by these figures.

Probably we have a greater investment in agriculture in Canada than we have in any other industry. I believe that the investment in agriculture in this country should be protected in every possible way. We protect our investment in other great industries. Take our railways. When they show a deficit we are prepared to give them a 21 per cent increase in freight rates to protect their investment. Take our packing industry. The evidence given before a committee of the house would indicate that the capital invested in our packing industry is amply protected in Canada. The figures given there show that an investment of $2,500,000 made by Canada Packers when that company was formed some twenty years ago has today grown into some $86,000,000 without the investment of another cent by the company.

They paid off all their indebtedness in various forms, such as bonds which they had to issue during the early years of the amalgamation of the companies which went into Canada Packers. They built up millions of dollars of reserves in their reserve accounts. If the agricultural industry which has supplied most of the capital for this increase in the investment in these various industries, in our railways, in our packing industries, is not protected as it should be, then the drop in the expenditures indicated in the estimates for this year cannot be justified.

We should have certain objectives for our agricultural industry in this country. The first objective should, as I say, be to produce efficiently for optimum nutrition for all our people, and to produce all the possible raw materials for industry that industry might need from agriculture. Second, to establish for all workers in agriculture a standard of living comparable with that provided in the better organized urban industries, especially in relation to housing, educational opportunities and facilities in health and general culture. Third, to produce, over and above domestic needs, the maximum amount of agricultural commodities for export. If we had an agricultural policy in Canada which would meet these three requirements, then we would be much better off in the agricultural industry than we are today.

Let us see how we are meeting these three requirements: first, to produce efficiently the food necessary for nutrition in this country and to supply the export markets. We find strangely today that in agriculture, with some 100,000 young people returning from the armed forces and entering that industry, our production is decreasing. I hold in my hand a current review of agricultural conditions in Canada for February, 1948. This indicates that inspected slaughterings of cattle during 1947 amounted to 1·3 million head, a decline of 22 per cent from 1946. There was a 30 per cent decline in western Canada and a 10 per cent drop in eastern Canada.

Take hogs. During 1947, 4,765,000 hogs were marketed in Canada, a slight increase over 4,465,000 marketed in 1946. However, in western Canada there was a 12 per cent decline, while in eastern Canada there was a 20 per cent increase.

I want to say something with regard to the policy of the government which has, during the last three years, practically wiped out the hog industry in western Canada. If there is one place where hogs can be produced efficiently and at the lowest cost it is in western Canada, where the grain for feeding is grown; yet we find that the policy of the government since almost the beginning of the war has been such as to re-direct the production of hogs in Canada from the west to the east. I have no objection to the increasing of hog production in eastern Canada to the maximum amount necessary to make good use of all the by-products of the dairy industry that can be fed efficiently in eastern Canada. But when we pay the subsidy on coarse grains that we are paying in shipping these grains from western Canada to eastern Canada, and these grains are used for the production of hogs in eastern Canada, then I do not see why the government should continue that policy. That policy is all right so long as these grains are used to increase the dairy industry in eastern Canada. Probably the dairy industry needs that subsidy. But when we find large quantities of this grain being used for the production of hogs in eastern Canada and, on the other hand, the production of hogs in western Canada declining where, by all measures of efficiency, the production should be increasing, then I think it is a wrong policy. The government should re-direct this policy.

We want to see some diversification in western Canada in the agricultural industry, and it seems to me that the production of hogs and poultry are two particular agricultural products which we can increase in that area of Canada, and produce more efficiently than they can be produced in any other part of the dominion.

Let us take a look at dairy products. Milk production in 1947 recovered from the decline of 1946. The production in 1947 of 17·2 billion pounds shows an increase of 1·6 per cent, but on the other hand we have a decline of 19·4 per cent in the production of cheese, and a somewhat similar decline in the production of certain other dairy products. I am convinced that, through the Department of Agriculture, we should have some program which will increase our production of agricultural products in Canada.

My second requirement was to establish for all workers in agriculture a standard of living comparable with that provided in the better organized urban industries, especially in relation to housing, educational opportunities and facilities in health and general culture. What is the picture in Canada with regard to facilities which we have on our farms? I hold in my hand the figures which were prepared by the Ontario government, "A Conspectus of the Province of Ontario", prepared by the Ontario bureau of statistics and the research section of the department of the provincial treasurer. This paints a pretty dark picture of the conditions that we find on farms in Canada today. Even in Ontario, which is probably the best agricultural province, the one in which they have the most facilities—

Mr. BOUCHER: The best province all round.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not agree with that, although, due to its particular situation close to the large manufacturing centres, the agricultural industry in this province is in a more favourable position than that in any other part of the dominion. I think it will be agreed that even in good old Ontario conditions are not just as good as they might be.

For instance, over 50,000 Ontario farmers have no automobiles. We do better than that in western Canada. Over 160,000 Ontario farmers have no motor trucks, and over 140,000 have no tractors. Over 145,000 farm homes in Ontario have no means of refrigeration and over 160,000 farm homes in Ontario have no vacuum cleaners. Over 60,000 homes in Ontario have no radios and over 125,000 farm homes have no running water. Over 85,000 farm homes in Ontario have no telephones and over 130,000 are still heated by stoves, not having furnaces. Over 160,000 Ontario farm homes still have outside toilets and over 160,000 farm homes have no bath or shower equipment.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you reading from.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is a "Conspectus of the Province of Ontario," prepared by the Ontario bureau of statistics and the research section of the department of the provincial treasurer. This table gives the percentages for 1941 in all provinces.

Mr. BOUCHER: You do not realize that this is 1948.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think many of these facilities would be put in Ontario farm homes during the war, especially if you were doing your part in the war effort. I would ask the permission of the committee to place on the record the figures for all the provinces. I admit that Ontario is the best even with its needs.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On a point of order, this request is antiquated and is out of date; it is not a legal request because the table is dated 1941 and this is the year of grace 1948. Even though Ontario had the best record in 1941, it would have a better record in 1948. Why clutter up the record with 1941 figures?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Unless the hon. member has unanimous consent, it would not be permissible to put the table on the record. Has the hon. member leave?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then I shall simply have to give the figures for the other provinces. I know the Minister of Agriculture is anxious to get his estimates through but it will be quite easy to put the figures for the other provinces on the record. In Prince Edward Island 29 per cent of farm homes and buildings need external repairs. Only nine per cent of the homes have inside running water and only six per cent have electric lighting. Only 10 per cent are heated by furnaces and only 12 per cent have either mechanical or ice refrigeration. Fifty-four per cent of the homes have radios, 18 per cent have telephones but only two per cent have vacuum cleaners. Only 30 per cent of the farmers have automobiles.

In Saskatchewan 47 per cent of the farm homes and buildings need repairs. It will be realized that this is before the C.C.F. government came into power in Saskatchewan. Only one per cent of the homes have running water, while only five per cent have electric lighting. Only 12 per cent have furnace heating and only six per cent have mechanical or ice refrigeration. Seventy-two per cent of the homes have radios, while 33 per cent have telephones. Only one per cent have vacuum cleaners and 46 per cent have automobiles.

Mr. BOUCHER: But they have a C.C.F. government and they would not want anything more!

Mr. KNOWLES: Ontario will see the light some day.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the people in Ontario had percentages as low as that they probably would be wise enough to get a C.C.F. government to improve conditions here.

In Quebec 40 per cent of the farm homes need repairs and only 25 per cent have running water. Only 24 per cent have electric lighting and only 10 per cent have furnace heating. Only 14 per cent have refrigeration, while 36 per cent have radios. Sixteen per cent of the homes have telephones but only one per cent have vacuum cleaners. Sixteen per cent have automobiles.

I think these figures are sufficient to indicate the position of the farming industry today. Apparently my hon. friends in the Conservative party are not much interested in conditions on our farms today. They seem to be more interested when we are dealing with the packing industry. We do not have as many interjections when we are talking along those lines as we have when we are talking about the facilities in the farm homes of Canada. When you are referring to any other financial interest in Canada you do not have the interruptions you have when you talk about the position of agriculture. If my hon. friends would get up and defend agriculture they would be doing more good, instead of interrupting as they are.

Mr. GRAYDON: Come down to our province and see.

Mrs. STRUM: How many Tory members are there in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GRAYDON: How many C.C.F. members are there in Ontario?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members to permit the hon. member to make his speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just playing politics.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member for Peel talks about playing politics, but I do not know of any other hon. member in this house who does that more consistently than he.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Or more successfully.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not playing politics; I am just stating the position of agriculture in this country today.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Seven years ago.

Mr. WRIGHT: The sooner we recognize that position the sooner we shall get legislation in this house that will be favourable toward agriculture and give agriculture in this country the position which it should have as the first industry and one of the most important in the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: That will not get one vote for Mr. Jolliffe in Ontario.

Mr. WRIGHT: At least the hon. member might come into the chamber to make his interjections, and on this first item in agriculture he might attempt to do something for the farmer in Peel county which he represents. I admit that that is one of the best agricultural counties in Ontario.

If the agricultural industry in Canada were given an equal opportunity with other industries, I believe we should find that they would make a maximum contribution toward the welfare of this country, not only in raising our nutritional standards but in supplying more foods for export to other countries which need them at the present time.

The position in the world today with respect to food is serious. It is so serious that, because of discontent caused by malnutrition, we find growing throughout the world communism and a great many other things which we do not like and which we should like to see stopped. One of the best ways in which we can stop the growth of communism or any other ism is by the abundant production of food and the proper distribution of it throughout the world. I think the objective of agriculture in this country should be: first, the supplying of the nutritional needs of our own country, and then the production of the maximum amount of food for export to those countries which today need that food.

Mr. FAIR: It would appear that the question of agriculture is a little bit distasteful to some of the members of the house tonight; but I do not know of any group who can enjoy the products of the farm better than some of those who have been butting in on the speaker who has just taken his seat. While I am one who enjoys his eats just about as well as anybody else, I think the question of agriculture is of sufficient importance that we should give it the consideration to which it is entitled, and should give it its proper place in the Canadian economy.

I feel that agriculture, as it has been in the past and as it is now, will continue in the future to be the basic industry of Canada. In the past, agriculture has not had its proper share of the national income. The farmers on the land and those working for them have had a poorer standard of living than has any other occupational group in Canada that I can think of. I know that from personal experience, because I have been farming for more than thirty years and should know a little bit about it. I think also that every other profession in Canada is dependent, either directly or indirectly, upon agriculture. For that reason, I consider that all of us, whether we live on a farm, in a town or in a city, should give agriculture the attention to which it is entitled.

[Mr. Wright.]

I am sorry to see that the Minister of Agriculture has agreed to have the estimates for his department cut by about one-third this year. There is perhaps some excuse for it. Perhaps the autocratic treasury board would not allow him any more money. But I feel that he and we should protest against the cut in the estimates.

While many people today consider that agriculture is really prosperous, I could give an entirely different picture. If those people to whom I have referred took the trouble to investigate the real position of agriculture today, they would find that it is not nearly as prosperous as some people would lead us to believe. While the farmers have today reduced their debt much below what it was at the time war broke out, I am quite satisfied that if the farmers were to put their buildings and their machinery in as good shape as those things were in 1939, there would not be so much money for paying off debts as some people imagine. The farmers of this country have not been able, during the past seven or eight years, to buy the machinery they require. For that reason they have been compelled to produce with dilapidated machinery such as tractors and other implements. Their buildings have gone down in condition, and it will take many thousands of dollars to bring them up to the state of repair at which they were at the time war broke out.

Again I feel that while we have accepted, and are still accepting, prices below those to which we are entitled, we have not yet done anything in fact about stabilizing the agricultural industry in the years to come. That is one of the main things about which we should be concerned at the present time. Again, while the price of butter has gone up a little bit, and there is a battle on by some people who apparently are interested in the production and sale of margarine in Canada, I feel that butter is not selling at a higher price than that at which it should be selling. But because, during the depression years and during the early years of the war, butter sold at a low price, many people believe that it should continue to be sold at that low price, even although the wages of all the workers in Canada and the incomes of other people as well have increased considerably during the past seven or eight years.

I do not intend to say much more in this connection, but I consider that we should all work toward a policy of stabilization which will give agriculture the place to which it is entitled in Canada; because, if we have not a successful agriculture, we cannot have success in other parts of Canada. We were told in 1938 that agriculture in the prairie provinces absorbed 69 per cent of the farm implements that were manufactured in central Canada. If we are to be able in the future to purchase our share of the farm implements and other things that are manufactured in central Canada, then we must see to it, whether we live on the land or not, that we are given an agricultural policy which will guarantee prosperity on the farms in all parts of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: One representative from each of the three groups opposite has spoken with regard to the estimates, and probably I should deal with the general criticisms that are made before we go farther. It has been pointed out that there has been a decrease in the estimates, in the figures as shown. The summary is on page 7 of the main estimates. The ordinary expenditures of the department are in round figures, $18,600,000 this year. They were $17,000,000 last year. So that under ordinary expenditures there is an increase of $1,579,000. Then, on the specials, there is $8,865,000 this year and there was $15,433,000 last year, or a decrease of $6,567,000. Then, under demobilization and reconversion there is $14,298,000 this year and there was $30,672,000 last year, or a decrease of $16,374,000. The figures show a total for 1948-49 of $41,810,000 as compared with $63,173,000 last year, or a decrease, as has been indicated, of $21,362,000.

While it is true that there has been a considerable decrease, it will be noted that there is not a decrease in the items that were voted prior to the war. There is a marked increase in the ordinary expenditures under agriculture, and the specials are of such a nature as to indicate that this is not unexpected. They are all noted in the items that are voted. There is a reduction of $7,773,000. The first item is to authorize and provide for the payment of subsidies on oats and barley used to feed livestock; and since those subsidies have been removed and are now part of the price of the grain, that figure is down by $6,000,000. Next is prairie farm rehabilitation and water storage, which is down $1. Then comes the amount required to recoup the agricultural prices support account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural prices support board, $171,053. That, of course, was an amount taken out last year in order to cover certain items for which we could not secure the money elsewhere. The next item is to authorize and provide for the payment of subsidies on oats and barley used as feed for livestock under vote 715, $1,600,000; and to provide for a grant to the Federated Women's Institute of Canada, $2,000. It will be noted that $7,600,000 out of the $7,773,000 is in connection with reduced subsidies on feed grain, so that no further explanation is required to indicate the reason for the reduction.

Then, under demobilization and reconversion there is an item covering the appropriation not required for 1948-49, $6,035,625. This is made up as follows. Under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the agricultural board, $2,030,000; agricultural supplies board, $42,700; to encourage the production of essential supplies, $102,250; food administrator, including freight assistance on western feed grains, $21,000,000 voted for 1947-48, less $18,000,000 only required for 1947-48, leaving a balance of $3,036,875 not required. Then there is the vote for the fertilizers and pesticides administrator, including subsidies on lime and bulk purchasing of fertilizer chemicals, $618,300, and for the seeds administrator, $205,000. It will be noted that the greater part of the reduction is $3,036,000 on freights paid on western grain; but as a matter of fact, since these estimates were prepared, I have announced that we will continue the freight payments for the year 1948-49, which will mean that, instead of a reduction, the sum of $16,000,000 will have to be added to this item.

That pretty well takes care of the reduction we have been talking about. Some $16,000,000 additional will be required in order to continue to pay the freight, since in these estimates we have provision for the payment of freight only until August 1 next, an amount of about $7,000,000. We shall require over $23,000,000, however, to pay the freight from Fort William east on an amount of grain similar to what was shipped last year, though we estimate that the amount of grain will be greater this year, the chief reason for the increase being the 21 per cent freight rate increase. Therefore we anticipate that the total this year will be $23,000,000 instead of the $18,000,000 last year. I should have said, of course, that we pay the freight not only from Fort William east but also on grain moving west from Calgary and Edmonton to British Columbia. So that our estimates for this year will not be very much below the figures of last year.

I believe that is sufficient to indicate that there is very little difference, and where any difference does exist it is entirely a matter of doing away with some of the expenditures we were making during the war, but which are not now considered necessary. In saying that, I might emphasize that this is quite a different picture from that of some thirteen years ago. Then the expenditures on agriculture had been gradually reduced until they were at a very low level, and from that time up to the present they have greatly increased. I remember attending a meeting in the city of Toronto after I had been minister for one or two years. One of the daily newspapers devoted a whole page to an attack upon myself, in which they asked me to explain at a public meeting why I should have spent $20,000,000 in the Department of Agriculture. Tonight I am being criticized, by some of the same people who were criticizing an expenditure of $20,000,000, for spending only something over $40,000,000 this year.

Mr. WRIGHT: No, it is not the same people.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not very much concerned about the criticism at either time. The expenditures have been gradually increasing on matters considered essential to agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who were the people? Not those who are here tonight.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, in any event they represent some of the same people; I think most of the Toronto seats are represented over on that side of the house. I have just been handed the exact figures of the expenditures of this department from that time. For 1934-35, the year prior to the time I brought estimates into the house, the expenditures amounted to $7,106,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: Who was in power then?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I was not. In the following years the expenditures increased. In 1935-36 the total was $9,637,000. In 1936-37, the first year I had charge of the estimates, the expenditures went up to $13,375,000. The following year they were $33,204,000, and the next year, $22,367,000. In 1939-40, the first year of the war, they were $26,000,000, and since then have been as follows, in round figures:

1940-41	$ 21,000,000
1941-42	82,800,000
1942-43	58,000,000
1943-44	110,000,000
1944-45	104,000,000
1945-46	110,000,000
1946-47	95,000,000

When one compares present expenditures with those in the middle of the war, which, of course, included a great many activities not now being pursued, the present expenditures are comparatively low. But when one compares them with the expenditures in any year prior to the war they are still quite high; and in addition to the total of $41,000,000 for this year we shall require another $16,000,000 in order to take care of the freight payments I mentioned a moment ago.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FAIR: Then the minister expects that we shall get rid of the snow that blankets the west at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, snow does a lot of good sometimes.

Mr. FAIR: At the right time.

Mr. GARDINER: And I think the right time is just before seeding. Something has been said with regard to the condition of agriculture. I am not going back over all the figures with regard to the production of cattle, the production of hogs, the production of poultry and eggs, the production of milk and so on. But I would suggest that if one would leave out the war period in making comparisons he would probably have a much sounder basis from which to reason than if he were to continue to compare the production of some particular commodity now with its production during the war.

For example one of the favourite criticisms which comes from the central part of the opposition is that at one time we paid the farmers to stop producing certain things. We paid them $4 an acre to take land out of wheat and put it into some other product. It is obviously unfair to compare the production of those years in livestock, which was encouraged by the payment of the $4 an acre, with production of livestock in years now, when the war is over, and we have gone back to wheat production, and when there is not that encouragement given to change over from wheat to livestock.

So I say we are on much sounder ground when we compare the results of farming in 1946 and 1947 with the results of farming in the years prior to the war, or at the latest the first two years of the war.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the minister not think we should diversify our agriculture in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; and if the hon. member for Melfort would make his comparison as between the present time and the time prior to the period when we were paying farmers to change over from wheat production to livestock production, he would find that the statement he made a few moments ago was quite ridiculous. I refer to his statement that the records would indicate that the government, or even the farmers themselves, have been changing over from the production of hogs to such an extent that the farmers have almost entirely gone out of hog production. That statement is not borne out by the facts at all. Saskatchewan has not gone out of hog production. Alberta has not gone out of hog production.

As a matter of fact, as my hon. friend knows, during the years when we were paying western farmers to go out of grain and into livestock the provinces of western Canada produced hogs as they had never produced them before. They were producing far more hogs in the west than anyone ever expected them to produce.

Criticism has been made that we are encouraging the farmers of eastern Canada to feed western grain to hogs. Well, I am not able to follow the two criticisms as being in the interests of agriculture in this country: one to the effect that we should still be doing in western Canada what we did at the peak of the war in order to get hog production up, namely, that we should be paying to have land changed over from the production of cereals to the production of livestock, so as to have mixed farming in western Canada; and then in the next sentence, a criticism of the government for, at another period, as well as at the period in question, giving assistance to eastern farmers to encourage them to feed western grain to livestock.

My hon. friend knows as well as I do that a great many of the farmers in western Canada prefer to produce grain. Not only do they prefer to produce grain, but they think they can make more money producing grain, under ordinary circumstances. And the only one thing that took them out of grain for two or three years during the war was the fact that that grain could not be sold. We were not able to sell wheat in 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944 except to Great Britain. And we were growing much more wheat than Great Britain could eat. For that reason, and because the farmers had to have money, and because they could not get that money with their grain lying in their own bins or in elevators, we paid them to take their land out of wheat and to put it into feed grain for the purpose of feeding livestock. We told them that they should sell livestock; that they could sell it every day of the week, and get cash for it. So they did that.

Surely no one is suggesting that government should be carried on on a basis of that kind during a period of peace, during a period when the whole world requires and wants cereals even to the exclusion of meat in many parts of the world. They prefer to have cereals. And when we have cereals to sell, and have farmers who are producing cereals, and doing it very well, they themselves prefer to sell that grain to farmers in other parts of Canada who are going to feed it to livestock. Anyone who has lived among the farmers of western Canada knows that to be the case.

I remember the leader of the official opposition appearing in Montreal—I believe it was in 1938—and making a speech which appeared in the headlines across Canada, in which he stated words to the effect that this country ought to be, or was actually, divided into two areas, one west of the lakes and one east of the lakes; and that in the best interests of agriculture in this country the western farmers ought to be encouraged to produce more and more grain, while the eastern farmers ought to be encouraged to produce more and more livestock.

There is an element of truth in that. The argument was well received by farmers in both ends of Canada. We on this side of the house have sometimes said similar things; but we have never suggested that we ought to give all the assistance to people at one end of Canada, whether it was the east or the west. We have always argued that we should divide up the assistance. And if at certain times we have given assistance to western farmers to do certain things, at other times it might be in the interest of Canadian farmers that we give assistance in order to direct production into some other line.

But the most important fact in connection with anything done with regard to agriculture is the return the farmer gets. We hear a great deal about the position of agriculture, and how poorly off the farmers are. But I just wish to say that, while the farmers are not in the position, financially, in which I should like to see them right across Canada, nevertheless they will acknowledge that in all parts of Canada they are, on an average, in just a little better position at the present time than they have been at any other time in their history. I am not saying that is as good a position as they ought to be in—I repeat that statement—but they are in a little better position at present, financially, than they have been at any other time in their history. The figures indicate that.

I am not going to go back many years. In 1941 we had about as high a return from agriculture production, on a cash basis, as we ever had in Canada up to that time. The return in that year was $967,600,000. The highest year we had ever had before that was 1928, with $1,063,000,000. Just in the second year of the war we had almost reached the highest figure we had ever had in Canada in returns from agricultural production. Then the next year we passed that highest figure. In 1942 the amount was $1,155,900,000, and the next year we went up to $1,441,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that the gross figure?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The next year we went up to $1,846,000,000; 1945, $1,704,000,000; 1946, $1,759,000,000 and 1947,— last year—$2,213,900,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister indicate what part of that $2,200,000,000 was for payment on other crops than grain in that year?

Mr. GARDINER: This last year there would be very little, because our bins were empty, or as empty as we can ever get them, at the end of the crop year 1946, so anything that was obtained in the crop year 1947 was obtained largely from production in that year. But there was not only an increase in grain production; there was an increase in livestock production, and an increase as well in prices. The figure of $2,213,000,000 is to be compared with the highest figure that we ever had in the history of agriculture in Canada in the best period before the war, between 1926 and 1929, when the figure was $1,063,000,000.

Someone has said: Are those gross figures? Yes, they are. But I have also the net figures, and the net figures are, of course, of greater importance than gross figures in considering a question of this kind. We hear it constantly said that we are paying more for our implements, more for wages and many other things, and because we are paying more, the gross figures do not mean very much. But when we take the net figures, what is the position? I shall take only a few back along the way and come down to the present as soon as possible.

Back in 1938 the net income of our farmers right across Canada was $387,000,000. Coming down to 1940, it was $529,000,000; in 1941, the same year I began with when covering gross returns, it was $597,000,000; in 1942, $1,104,000,000. It dropped in 1943 to $990,000,000. In 1944 it went up again to $1,226,000,000; 1945, $1,003,000,000; 1946, $1,267,000,000; 1947, $1,259,000,000.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Would the minister give us the figures on the basis of the average per farm operated?

Mr. GARDINER: I have them here and could search them out, but I had not intended to go that far. I think it would be better to give them to the committee at some other time rather than take the time now.

The figure of $1,267,000,000 for 1946 is the highest net return, and very much the highest, which the farmers have ever had in Canada. The figure of $1,259,000,000 for 1947—that is the present estimate; it is not yet brought to a finality—is almost equal to the 1946 figure. There is very little difference between them. I think that should be conclusive evidence that the farmers have been doing a little better in the last three or four years in Canada than they have done at any other time in their history.

Again I repeat that I agree with members who say we ought to do all we can to see that they do better still, but I do not think it is helpful either to agriculture or to Canada to be continually saying agriculture is going down and down rather than going up and up and up, because the facts are the very opposite to those pictured by the members of the C.C.F. when they speak on this question.

I was reading the other day—and on another occasion I shall bring this to the attention of the house if the discussion follows the line which it has up to the moment—a comparison of the figures per farm in the different provinces of Canada which was put out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics only last week, from which it will be found that some statements which were made with regard to 1941 do not, as hon. members over in the Conservative section of the house were pointing out, apply to 1948. The situation in the different provinces has improved all across Canada, and I should like to say that the statistics indicate that the farmers have made more improvement in the areas which have stayed with livestock. Because of that fact, I agree with the hon. member for Melfort that we should encourage in western Canada, as far as we possibly can, the production of more and more livestock products. I agree with him that we as farmers would make more money in western Canada if we fed all our grain to livestock, but I am not so sure that we would enjoy life any better than we do farming as we are at the present time.

We have a great many farmers, just as we have a great many other people, who are not spending all their time trying to make money, and I cannot understand my hon. friends of the C.C.F., who are against anybody making profits, talking the way they do. They are not supposed to be in favour of people making profits. They speak rather in terms of people enjoying life, having an opportunity of living a fuller and a better life. I am sure there are many of us who belong to other parties who, whether we preach that doctrine or not, act that way in our living. We are not so anxious to make money as to be talking all the time of the fellow who spends all his days and nights thinking of ways of making more money. I do not agree with my hon. friends of the C.C.F. that the profiteers are living the best life in the world. I think some of us who are not spending so much time thinking about making money are getting through life, not only with greater happiness to ourselves but with greater benefit to all the people round about us. And so I suggest that when we discuss agriculture we discuss it from the point of view of what the farmer is really getting out of what he is doing on his farm.

I agree that it would be much better if we had more bathrooms and more electric light on the farms.

Mr. WRIGHT: Do you not think we would get more out of life if we had them?

Mr. GARDINER: Sometimes, yes. When I go out to my farm in the summertime and find the waterworks out of condition, I have to become the chap who works down underground, but when I am in the city I do not do that. Some of our farmers perhaps prefer the system to provide water which they have on their farms, and sometimes the supply of water they get is better than if they had some other system.

The same is true more or less about electricity on the farms. It is the simplest thing in the world to have electricity on a farm in western Canada, and I can never understand why more farmers do not have it? It does not cost half as much to have electricity on the farm in Saskatchewan as it does to own and operate a car; I do not think it costs 25 per cent as much. All you have to do in the part of western Canada in which I live is to pay $150 for a windmill—

An hon. MEMBER: You have the wind.

Mr. GARDINER: We have the wind, yes. Pay $150 for the windmill; put a generator on top of it; put a set of batteries in your basement, and you can have just as good lights as you have in this chamber. Not only that, but you can have a pressure tank to pump your water up to the top story, and not only that, you can have lights in all your buildings as well as in your home. But I think some people prefer to drive cars and do some other things rather than have what some of my hon. friends of the C.C.F. think they ought to have. My experience with farmers has been that if you give them an opportunity to do things they will do the things which they themselves think benefit them most.

I have found, during the time I have been administering a department either here or in the west, that a great many people do not take kindly to being told what they ought to do. There are things they can do, and I like to tell them some of the things that can be done, but I do not like to go so far as to say that they ought to give up some one thing on which they are spending their own money in order to invest it in something else. But they can get the equipment which has been referred to by hon. members tonight much cheaper than most farmers realize in western Canada. We like to talk about irrigation developments; we like to talk about waterpower developments and great expenditures of money. We have got into that habit, but I would not care how close a power line was to my farm, I would not put electricity on to the farm from a power line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: I have better equipment without it, and at half the cost.

Mr. WRIGHT: Oh, no.

Mr. GARDINER: You had better come around and visit me some day and I shall show you.

Mr. WRIGHT: The figures do not show that. I have it on my farm as well, and I know the difference.

Mrs. STRUM: Is the minister aware that it costs approximately $500 to get a refrigerator which runs on kerosene?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not run mine on kerosene; I would run mine off this windmill that I am talking about.

Mrs. STRUM: I have one of those windmills too, but I have not yet found a satisfactory refrigerator arrangement that will work off it. In my part of the country, if you wish refrigeration you have to buy one of these refrigerators the entry of which the Minister of Finance has prohibited.

Mr. GARDINER: You can get a 32-volt refrigerator that will operate all right off wind power, and you can get a 110-volt one for that type of plant. You can get a 110-volt refrigerator just the same as you have in Ottawa and operate it.

Mrs. STRUM: Will the minister admit that every time the motor starts up, the battery has to start on the 110 volts; that every time you turn the switch, you have to start your engine, and you get into a lot of trouble? Then you have to take out your plant and send it away; they fix it, and then it comes back and goes on the blink again.

Mr. GARDINER: You have a poor plant. I have had one for fifteen years. The one I have at the moment I have had for three years. We have never even had to go up on the windmill. The plant runs all the time without any difficulty. Therefore it will be seen that it is not a bad plant. Farmers who operate them know very well that they do give good service, and particularly in the section of the country in which we live.

Mrs. STRUM: I do not find that.

Mr. GARDINER: Again I would invite you over to my place, since you are not so very far away, and we shall have a look at it.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not invite all hon. members to come?

Mr. MILLER: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MILLER: The minister has invited several hon. members to visit his farm. Last week the Toronto board of trade gave us all an invitation. Is he going to invite us all to visit his model farm?

Mr. GARDINER: My farm is not exactly a model farm, but it apparently is a little better than those which some of my hon. friends in the C.C.F. try to picture as the farms in Saskatchewan. However I should like to leave a little different picture in the minds of hon. members and in other parts of Canada than is usually given by hon. members who sit over in the C.C.F. section.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has a different type of income on which to work his farm than have most people in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: My farm will operate on the income that comes from that farm, and so will the farm of my hon. friend, as he knows.

Mrs. STRUM: I have one question which I should like the minister to answer. Will he not admit that it is much more difficult to get the equipment to run off these power plants which are relatively limited, the 32-volt or the 110-volt, and will he not admit that they are much more expensive and much more difficult to get repairs for than the power cycle?

Mr. GARDINER: I said a moment ago I did not find them very expensive from the point of view of repairs. In the last fifteen years I have had only one set of equipment. I have had the same washing machine, the same toaster, and so on. I could go through the whole line of equipment.

Mr. WRIGHT: And the same batteries?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, we get new batteries about every seven years. I have had the same pumping equipment and I have not found it at all expensive, not any more expensive than any other equipment of that kind that is put on a farm.

Mrs. STRUM: What about the initial purchase price?

Mr. GARDINER: The initial price of the plant is about $1,400 under present high price conditions. The 32-volt equipment is higher than the 110-volt, but the 110-volt equipment is exactly the same price, whether you purchase it in Ottawa or on the farm.

Having said these things, I wish to complete my remarks by repeating that I do not think, in discussing these estimates, we are going to help the farmer by trying to make out that our farmers are not better off in Canada today that they were in previous times. I can agree with those who argue that they ought to be still better off, but I do not like to see our country pictured as one in which farmers are getting along so poorly as some people are trying to picture here.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I asked the minister a question or two which he did not deal with; whether he agrees with it or not, can he give us some lead at this time as to what might be done with respect to marketing agricultural production through the Marshall plan, and whether there has been any preliminary discussion that he can tell us about now?

Mr. GARDINER: I purposely did not say anything about it because the arrangements are not finally concluded. As hon. members know, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is now in Washington discussing that question. My understanding is that even the offices in Washington are not yet equipped to get on with the task of deciding what is to be done in the different areas. The offices are not staffed up to date. Hon. members will probably have noted that the minister met the administrator in the Canadian embassy last night. That is not just an accident. They have not yet their offices established and their staffs set up. I am not going to attempt here tonight to discuss what will be done when they have their full organization set up to deal with it; but I can say this: press reports coming back from Washington this morning appear to indicate that a very liberal provision is likely to be made for handling Canadian food products.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Probably within the next few months?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I would think we would not run into any great difficulties within the time that it takes to have the organizations set up.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The other question had to do with oats and barley that were marketed last fall. I do not think there is another item in the estimates on which I could ask this question. The minister might make a statement on that now.

Mr. GARDINER: With regard to the oats and barley items, the companies that have already paid something in addition to the price paid prior to October 21 are as follows: the Pioneer Grain Company paid twelve cents on oats and ten cents on barley. In making that announcement they said that was an interim payment. In other words, they suggested that there might be more paid by that company. I do not know whether they would say that today or not. They were the first to announce their decision. The National Grain Company paid 10⅛ cents on oats and 14¼ cents on barley; the Canadian Consolidated paid 11⅛ cents on oats and 13⅛ cents on barley; the Western Grain Company paid 9¾ cents on oats and 9¼ cents on barley; the Federal Grain Company paid 10¾ cents on oats and 13½ cents on barley; the Alberta Pacific Grain paid 10½ cents on oats and 13¼ cents on barley.

None of the wheat pools has yet made payments, and a number of other elevator companies have indicated that they are going to make payments but have not yet made them. The last discussion which I had with any of this group directly was with the Saskatchewan pool. They are probably the largest dealers in oats and barley in western Canada. Their suggestion was that they would not be able to give us final information as to what they would be paying until after they had dealt with their May options. I presume that that is within the next month or so. We do not feel that we should proceed to consider what the government ought to do until we at least know what the three pools will do. They handled about half of the feed grain that was marketed in western Canada. Then, other companies are quite large operators as well. We hope within the next month or six weeks to have full information from these companies—they are paying out their share of it—and then we can determine what the government's share is and have these payments made.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have a few remarks to make on various items of the agricultural estimates, but on this item I briefly wish to draw to the attention of the minister and the committee one matter that is of serious concern to the fruit industry of British Columbia, and particularly certain fruit growers in my constituency. I refer to the loss of the British preference on apples. Over a period of forty years we have been developing a fruit industry in the district which I have the honour to represent. We happen to have a particularly fine climate that produces a high quality of people and first-class fruit. For thirty years the officials of both the dominion and the provincial departments of agriculture have advised our people, particularly those in the Kootenays, to plant certain varieties because it was proved that we could grow those possibly to better advantage than anywhere else in Canada. I refer to Cox's Orange Pippin and the Jonathan. The British people have a great liking for the Cox's Orange Pippin, while the poorer districts are fond of the Jonathan because of its medium size, high colour and solid flesh and particular flavour.

A considerable number of orchards were developed on the basis of the recommendations made by the officials of the dominion and provincial departments of agriculture. Unfortunately it is not easy to change one's horticultural habits. Over a matter of years these growers have developed orchards which produce from 1,000 to 10,000 boxes a year of these varieties. This product went largely to the British market under the benefit of the preference. The Canadian people have not to date taken to the Cox's Orange Pippin or to a great extent to the Jonathan. I mention this because it is a serious thing to the fruit industry in British Columbia and particularly to the growers of certain varieties in my district. I should like to quote from a press release on the multilateral trade agreement among seventeen countries which was issued on November 17, 1947. Dealing with the loss of this preference, it states:

> Apples. One of Canada's most important contributions to the general agreement on tariffs and trade which has for its purpose the reduction of tariffs, the elimination of tariff preferences and other trade restrictions is the relinquishing of the apple preference in the United Kingdom. Canadian apples have always enjoyed free entry into the United Kingdom market. Through the Ottawa agreement in 1932 a duty of 4s. 6d. per hundredweight was imposed on non-empire apples. In the 1938 trade agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom this duty was reduced to 3s. per hundredweight for the period August 16 to April 15. At Geneva, Canada agreed to the elimination of the apple preference during the northern hemisphere marketing season so that now apples from all sources enter the United Kingdom market free of duty from August 16 to April 15 inclusive. During the balance of the year the duty continues at 4s. 6d. per 112 pounds.
> Compensation for the apple concession is obtained mainly from the United States but it cannot be matched with any single item among the United States concessions. It is a part of a mutually advantageous agreement between Canada and its neighbour and other contracting parties.

It seems to us that sufficient consideration has not been given to the position in which a considerable number of fruit growers have been placed. It would seem as though their interests had been sacrificed to some other economic interests in this country and the United States. On January 20, 21 and 22 of this year the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association held a convention. This convention was addressed by Mr. A. K. Lloyd, chairman of Tree Fruits Limited, which is our central marketing organization. He had this to say about the imperial preference:

> Under the empire trade agreement effected in 1932, we enjoyed a preference of 39 cents per box in relation to non-empire countries. In January, 1939, this was reduced to 26 cents per box.
> These preferences benefited the Canadian apple industry in at least two important ways:
> 1. It insured an outlet for all of the apples Canada wished to export.
> 2. It obtained for Canada a higher price than was being quoted by competing countries, and while not increasing our price to the full extent of the preference, it conservatively produced from 15 cents to 20 cents per box more than would have otherwise been secured.
> This empire preference, and the increased prices derived therefrom, can largely be credited with keeping the apple industry in Canada alive during the thirties.
> Under the agreement just concluded at Geneva, these preferential rates have been completely abolished, so that if and when there is re-entry in to the United Kingdom, Canada will be in open competition with world apple producers.

The tree fruit growers of British Columbia feel that they have not been properly considered in this matter. As I pointed out before, when a man has spent a lifetime growing certain varieties on the recommendation of dominion and provincial officials, when he has a large investment of labour and capital expended in the growing of certain varieties and then suddenly finds himself practically cut off from a market through the loss of this preference, it seems to me that he has a right to complain about not receiving sufficient consideration.

I should like the minister to explain if he can why our officials agreed to the loss of this preference, because apparently it was done with the consent of the Canadian officials at Geneva without any reference to the tree fruit industry of British Columbia. The industry is entitled to an explanation from the minister.

Mr. MILLER: I have only a few remarks to make, which arise mainly out of the speech made by the minister. I think the minister came pretty close tonight to telling western Canada farmers that he wanted them to stay in the hog business. I think that will be surprising news to many of the farmers in the locality from which I come.

The minister also made some play, and perhaps effectively, upon the fact that hon. members to our left picture the farmers as being in a state of semi-poverty, or words to that effect. The minister has been guilty, during the last two sessions at least, in overplaying the prosperity of the farmer. I do not think anyone will deny that in western Canada—and perhaps this is true of all Canada—the farmers are in better shape than they have been for a long time, if not at any time in history. I think in fairness it must be admitted that the farmers had their innings coming to them after what they had gone through in the years preceding the war.

Most of the farmers' prosperity resulted from the war, but by reason of certain policies of the government which the official opposition have criticized to a great extent they are not nearly as well off as they otherwise would have been. I think it is true to say that the farmers of western Canada have not had an opportunity to build up reserves for the years to come.

Because of a shortage of materials during the war, they were not able to obtain the mechanized equipment or to erect the buildings that they needed. If the farmers had been able to build up the reserves they needed they would have been in a position now to obtain this equipment and erect these buildings. Those reserves would have been possible if they had been allowed to secure the prices they should have got.

I do not agree with the minister when he says that hydro is not a valuable thing for the farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that.

Mr. MILLER: No, you did not say that.

Mr. GARDINER: I said it was not as valuable on my farm as what I have.

Mr. MILLER: Yes. The minister preferred the windmill. But I suggest that the farmers of Manitoba, at least, would not. And so far as their judgment on that score is concerned, I am afraid, if I had to choose between the minister and the farmers of Portage plains, I would have to take the judgment of the farmers of Portage plains. They are almost fighting to get the hydro into their farms. As the hon. member for Souris reminds me, I think that is true in other parts of the country than Manitoba. I think they are entitled to the hydro, and the sooner they get it, the better off they will be. Their work will be easier and so on.

The minister has said that the farmers have had a greater gross income, and also a greater net income in the last few years than ever before in their history. I am inclined to think he is perhaps right in that, because I am sure the figures he quoted would be official figures of some sort. I am also prepared to admit that probably he can produce figures to show that individual farmers are better off. But what is the reason for that? It is that the west, or at least in parts of it, we have had about seven exceptionally good crops which have been raised under pressure during wartime, and there has been the means of disposing of and turning those crops into cash which has boosted the returns beyond what they normally would have been. But even at that, the results are good.

But what other business similarly has not had good results? If the return is compared with that in other businesses, I do not think it will be found that the farmers have shown as great a percentage of gain as have other businesses in western Canada or in other parts of Canada. But even if they have, and even if I am entirely wrong in that argument, let us say this. The farmer today in my part of the country has the greatest capitalization he has ever had in the history of farming. He has invested more money in expensive machinery which he uses only for a short time in a year, which eliminates a good deal of expense for hired help and so on. With a combine and the field tillers and so on he can do more work with less help. His expenses have become less as a result of that. It is therefore only natural to suppose that his net will be much greater than it was ordinarily.

I think it is an important point to consider that, in order to earn the increased net about which the minister has boasted, and quite properly, the farmer's capitalization is today perhaps many times more than it was ten or fifteen years ago. Any business that increases its capitalization would be a poor one indeed if it could not increase its net, particularly when that increased capitalization has the effect of cutting down out-of-pocket expenses such as wages and so on.

I wish the minister would clarify or perhaps even retract the suggestion he makes that western Canadian farmers want to make their money the easy way; because I do not believe that in any shape or form the farmers of western Canada have ever looked for that or ever expected to make money in the easiest possible way. That old saying which perhaps prevails even yet in some parts of of the east, to the effect that the western Canadian farmers grow a big crop of wheat in a few months and then go off to California or Florida, is pretty much a shibboleth. That is a story I have heard ever since I was a boy, but I have not seen many farmers who were able, more than once in their lifetime at least, to go to California and to spend the winter there. I do not think they would go to Florida when they could go to California if they wanted to. But I do not think that is the situation in the west. I think the western Canadian farmers are willing to produce hogs or cattle, and are willing to work or do anything; but I maintain that they are not willing to produce hogs or cattle if there is no profit in it for them for doing that.

Mr. AYLESWORTH: There is a certain amount of profit in it.

Mr. MILLER: I am talking about western Canada.

Mr. AYLESWORTH: I have not yet seen in my life a western farmer in this house who was satisfied.

Mr. MILLER: That is true. Perhaps the hon. member is right. But there will come a day, if enough of us in parliament continue to stick with the western Canadian farmers, when they will get their rights and when they will be satisfied.

Mr. AYLESWORTH: I do not know when that time will ever come. It will be after the hon. member is gone.

Mr. MILLER: What I was saying before I had the helpful interjection from my colleague was that the farmers of western Canada were prepared to do their job and were not looking for the easy way to do it. Of course they will not do it the hard way if they can find an easier way; but the western Canadian farmers are certainly prepared to work and produce hogs and beef cattle if the Minister of Agriculture and his department can make it profitable for them to do that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GARDINER: In reply to the questions asked—

Mr. BENTLEY: Would the minister allow me to ask my question and he can answer them all at once? I do not intend to make a speech.

Mr. GARDINER: All right.

Mr. BENTLEY: A little while ago, before we had these last two speeches, the minister answered a question with regard to the payments on oats and barley that the government might make. In his reply the minister said he did not yet know what all the elevator companies intended to do, so I can understand the government's position in that regard. What I want to know is this. Can the minister tell us now whether the government's policy will be to make the payments equal to all the farmers, regardless of what elevator company they delivered to and how much that elevator company itself contributed toward the equalization? One may pay ten cents; another may pay twelve cents, and another may pay less. What does the government propose to do toward equalization?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state what the government will do. Certain members of the government who are on the committee having to do with the matter have discussed it from time to time; but it has not yet been referred to the government; and I doubt that it will be until we have the full information, because it would be a waste of time to be discussing it in the full government until that information is available. I am not in a position to state whether it would be a flat rate to everyone or whether it would be varied to some extent.

A suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie to the effect that I may have pictured the position of the farmer as being somewhat better than it is. I was careful to say each time I mentioned it that his position was not nearly as good as it ought to be. I think, when one has said that, one has said about all that is necessary to say in order to indicate that he has no idea that the farmers are doing nearly as well as some people who are not farmers think they are doing. I have had some lively arguments recently, some of which have found their way on to the floor of the house, and hon. members opposite have been attempting, in a sort of kindly way, to use the words of my friend the Minister of Labour, to suggest that probably I may have gone too far in suggesting that a large percentage of the farmers in Canada could not pay income taxes and, therefore, should not be required to make out income tax forms. I have said that outside the house and inside the house. That in itself is an indication that I do not think that nearly as large a percentage of farmers are in the income tax brackets as ought to be able to get into them. In other words, the farmers are not doing as well as some of us would like to see them do. Still the statement I made is true, that at present they are doing better than at any other time. I am not taking credit for that to the government, except to the extent that we have attempted to guide the farming community in what they are doing, in order to get returns from those who require the products we are suggesting they should produce.

That brings me to the first point raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, who suggested that from what I said he would take it that I should like to see the farmers of western Canada producing more hogs at the present time. Well, that is true in a sense, but still I do not feel that at this time I should urge the farmers of western Canada to produce more hogs. The situation in the world is such that at the moment it is easier to market cereals than to market hogs. Someone may think, when I say this, that I am advising the farmers not to produce hogs, but I do not know where you can draw the line as between the two statements. The farmers will have to do that themselves.

I would say the farmer who is properly equipped to produce hogs would be very foolish to get out of that production. The farmer who went into hog production during the war period in a temporary way, without providing himself with all the necessary equipment to carry on that production in a country as cold as ours, is perhaps wise to be out of it at the present time. But I think those of us who have farmed over a period of years have generally found that it is good to take up one line of farming which is suited to the community in which we live and go ahead and produce on that basis through good times and bad. In the long run such a farmer will be better off. So I have not thought it advisable for the department or myself as minister to start advising farmers in different parts of Canada as to what they should do.

What I had in mind in suggesting that the farmer of western Canada prefers to produce grain was just that and no more. I did not intend to say anything beyond that. He does prefer it, and I do not think anyone who lives in the west would question that. He prefers to produce grain; and I quite agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that people who go around talking about western farmers going to California do not know anything about western Canada. Only a very small percentage of the farmers of the west are able even to come and see Ottawa occasionally, let alone go to California; and some of those who are elected to the house do not always tell the correct story with respect to conditions back home.

The farming community out west is much like the farming community anywhere else. I do not think I would be fair to this house or to anyone else if I did not say that farmers, as human beings, are much like any other group of human beings; and I venture to say the majority of the farmers in this house like to make their living in the easiest way possible. When I say that I am not suggesting that the farmers are trying to avoid work, because any farmer who tries to avoid work does not remain on the farm very long in this country. Work is the main thing that keeps him there.

Having said this in order to clear up any ideas that may be in the minds of those who heard the hon. member for Portage la Prairie give his impression of what I said earlier, I hope it will not be necessary later on for me to say that I have not been attempting to suggest that the farmer is making great wealth, nor have I tried to suggest that he is not as well off as people in most agricultural areas are at the present time.

Mrs. STRUM: I believe two or three other things should be said, and I should like to refer to the Economic Annalist, put out by the department under the minister, in relation to farmers' costs. We agree that the gross product, the physical volume, has gone up tremendously, because of rainfall and perhaps because of the Minister of Agriculture. It is pointed out here that a tremendous program was carried on by educational campaigns, plus price increases and subsidy payments, all directed at production; and the sum total of all those efforts was a tremendous increase in the physical volume of goods. Rainfall, price subsidies, the necessity of feeding the world—all these things were factors. But the farmers' costs have gone up tremendously, too. It we take the period 1935 to 1939 as the base, and the index as 100, in February, 1948, farmers' costs stood at 170·7; so that while he has more money his real income has been reduced to that extent.

Then the farmer still needs many things. According to this report, his buildings need painting; he needs more machinery; his farm home lacks many facilities essential to the well-being of the modern farm family. I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie; I think the minister is placing a wrong interpretation upon what the farmers like. To a farmer a car is not a luxury but part of his working equipment. He depends upon it to get his repairs; he must have it in order to run his business, and it cannot be looked upon in the same way that a car is looked upon in the life of an urban dweller. In the same way a telephone is not a luxury to a farmer; a tractor is not a luxury. The farmer has been forced to put money into these things as part of his equipment. His home also is part of his equipment, but he is not given any exemption in his income tax return on account of it. He can get an allowance with respect to a henhouse or a pigpen, but not with respect to the family home, which is just as much a part of his equipment as anything else he uses in order to remain there and produce.

I doubt whether the program for next year will show the same results as the past year or two, if the minister's own report is correct, because it points out that the size of the net income determines whether or not a farmer remains solvent. The net income in the years between 1941 and 1946 increased from $250,000,000 to $625,000,000; but in analysing these figures the report goes on to say that the increase was due in part to price control and subsidy programs. These price control and subsidy programs have been removed as incentives, and it is doubtful whether agriculture will be able or will want to keep up the effort to produce this volume of goods to maintain this level of income.

I do not think it should go out across Canada that the western farmer is crude or callous or does not appreciate the better things of life. As against that we have the fact that the farmer goes to so much trouble to do the things the minister is suggesting; the fact that he will put a thousand dollars into the erection of a wind charger, and the tremendous difficulty there is in doing that sort of installation yourself. It has been particularly difficult in the last few years. If a contractor is building a block of houses in town he can get twenty bathtubs; he can get all his shingles and nails, because he is in that business; but when a farmer looks for those things he has to pay a great deal more. There is no wholesale price for him; he gets no priority. No one comes along and digs his ditches for him with a ditching machine. He digs them with a pick and shovel. He can do these things, though, if his farm income remains at a sufficiently high and stable level so that it will pay him; and incidentally they increase his production.

When the minister said a few minutes ago the farmer did not get as much as some people think he gets, he should have said the farmer does not get as much as some people. The farmer is the man who does the hard, physical work to feed the world; and we should not forget that food is the one thing you cannot do without. You can do without a lot of people and a lot of other things, but if you run short of food you begin to die and eventually starvation gets the better of you.

I think we should demand for farmers some sort of civilization which would be complete with educational and health facilities, things that make life comfortable, things which farm families certainly earn and deserve. But we should never apologize for the farmers, and certainly we should never accept less than other people get.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The discussion thus far on this item has been pretty well an effort to estimate what the farmer has been receiving, or what he should receive in terms of national income. I should like to spend a few moments tonight to set out, perhaps in a somewhat broader form, what I believe we should have for ourselves, as a nation, by way of agriculture.

I believe we should first of all, set out those objectives upon which we can agree, namely the purpose for which agriculture exists. They could be classified under three headings: first, to provide food for the optimum nutrition for all our people, and to produce all possible raw materials for industry; second, to establish for all workers in agriculture, including farm operators and farm labour, a standard of living comparable with that provided in better organized urban industries, especially in relation to housing, educational opportunity and facilities, health and general culture and, third, to produce over and above our maximum needs the maximum amount of agricultural commodities for export.

If we set out those as objectives, to begin with, I think we might even surprise ourselves as to how many other things we could agree on in the House of Commons. I do not know that it does us very much good to thresh over what the farmer received back in 1940 or 1920 or 1947, if we do not make any concrete or comprehensive plan as to what the farmer may be able to receive in 1949 or 1960. I believe that is far more important.

Another factor which seems to come out of this discussion is the interdependence of agriculture generally across this country. It is so easy, as was exhibited here tonight, to get into an east versus west argument about agriculture. I cannot think of anything more futile. East or west in this country, the man who tills the soil and who produces food is attempting to make a living for himself and his family and is contributing to the wealth of the nation. It does not matter very much what type of produce he produces, or what province he happens to live in.

The fact that he is in that industry, and the further fact that that industry is the backbone of the economy of the country should be sufficient for us to treat it as a national industry, for the good of the whole nation.

As an example, in the house on many occasions we have heard about various forms of assistance for agriculture. At one time we talk about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and at another time about the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, each of which has to do chiefly with western Canada. At times members from other parts of Canada get a little tired of providing that sort of assistance, and wonder why it is not given in other parts of Canada.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not know that we are tired of giving assistance, but we have to sit here so long and hear so much about it that we get pretty tired of hearing it repeated so often. We are more tired of that than of giving the actual assistance.

Mr. IRVINE: Do something about it, then.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I hope the hon. member will not blame those who are talking about it if there is some measure of repetition. After all, those of us on this side of the house particularly, can only suggest to the government what it should do. The government has to carry it out; and so long as the things we are suggesting have not yet been carried out, to that extent we shall have to keep on urging that it be done.

Mr. LENNARD: I just wished to point out that we were not—

Mr. IRVINE: You have been talking about tariffs for a hundred and fifty years.

Mr. LENNARD: I will do my own talking; you do not need to put words into my mouth.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to assure hon. members that, regardless of where they come from, I am not approaching this matter in a partisan spirit; as a matter of fact, I am trying to do the very opposite. I understand what my hon. friend means when he says that sometimes he becomes annoyed at or tired of listening to the long discussions on a subject about which he may not be particularly interested at the moment. But of course that works out both ways. And so long as we are members of the House of Commons, that is one of the penalties we have to pay for being public representatives.

An example of the interdependence of agriculture, both east and west, is the fact that while we in the west do ask taxpayers right across Canada, whether they are farmers or not, to contribute through their taxes to help us in connection with prairie farm assistance, and so on, on the other hand we are quite as cheerfully contributing to our taxes to help pay, for example, for the freight charges on feed grains going into eastern Canada. That is costing the western farmer in his tax bill a certain amount of money. Not only that, but it adds to the annoyance when he sees the feed which he himself has produced going somewhere else to feed somebody else's hogs, when he, the farmer who produced it, has to pay the freight to take it there.

We can understand those small sources of friction or annoyance. But I do not think they are enough to make us talk of an east-west attitude in the house.

There are many other ways in which we are interdependent. The nature of production in different parts of Canada makes us so. There are some things which can be produced on the prairies far more economically and far more conveniently than they can be produced, for example, in Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick. On the other hand, potatoes can be produced in those provinces to better advantage than they can in western Canada.

What is required is not so much a piecemeal argument as to how much the farmer should get for this or that at any given time, as it is a comprehensive program designed to increase over-all production in agriculture throughout this country, through a fiscal policy which will provide an incentive to farmers to produce the goods required, and at the same time give them a certain amount of protection and stability in their prices so that they will know that they will not produce themselves right out of their own market.

We know that not long ago an international wheat agreement was agreed upon, and that it is to be ratified at a future date.

It appears, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not be able to complete my remarks this evening.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CASSELMAN: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. GARDINER: For Wednesday the order of business will be the third reading of Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940; committee of the whole on Bill No. 211, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Northwest Territories Act; second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Dominion Water Power Act; Bill No. 208, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act, Bill No. 209, to amend the National Parks Act, the resolution of the Postmaster General to amend the Supplemental Payments Act, and supply, Department of Agriculture, if we get that far.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 28, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING—FIRST REPORT

First report of the joint committee on printing.—Mr. Emmerson.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Tremblay be substituted for that of Mr. Halle on the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

EXTENSION, FROM APRIL 30 TO MAY 31, OF DATE OF FILING CERTAIN RETURNS

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to make a statement with reference to the filing of income tax returns for the year 1947.

Extreme weather conditions in various parts of the country are making it impossible for taxpayers to get the appropriate income tax forms. In addition, there is a substantial increase, particularly in rural areas, in the number of taxpayers over the previous year. This has added greatly to the problem of distributing the various forms.

For these and other reasons, many taxpayers throughout the country are finding it extremely difficult to complete and file their returns on time.

As a consequence, the government has decided that the time for filing 1947 individual income tax returns will be extended from April 30 to May 31, 1948. This applies only to those returns known as T.1 General, T.1 Special, T.4-T.1 employees, T.1 Farmers and T.1 Prairie Farmers.

The penalty for late filing will be assessed if the taxpayer fails to file his return on or before May 31, 1948.

Individual taxpayers who ordinarily would be required to pay the balance of their tax on or before April 30, 1948, must now make payment of that balance on or before May 31, 1948. If they fail to do so, interest will be charged from that date.

This extension does not relieve those taxpayers who are required to make quarterly or other instalment payments, from making such payments when due, nor does it relieve them from interest on any arrears of such instalments.

All returns, other than those listed above, required to be filed under the statute, must be filed on the due date.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on behalf of myself and I am sure of all prairie members, I wish to thank the minister for the timely and prompt action which he has taken in this matter. I also wish to advise him, to my regret, that according to a communication by telephone yesterday, flood conditions out there have reached the point now where they may be described as disastrous. A foot of new soft snow has fallen over that whole area, and it is difficult to prognosticate the ill effects that may follow. The Minister of Agriculture could no doubt do that better than I can. With respect to some crops the condition is quite serious.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 212, to incorporate Canadian Co-operative Processors Limited.—Mr. Weir.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES

PROVISION OF INDETERMINATE SENTENCES FOR PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 214, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN ARMY—ACTIVE SERVICE IN EUROPEAN THEATRE—CASUALTIES

Mr. McMASTER:

1. How many members of the Canadian army saw active service in what is known as the European front, i.e., that portion of Europe other than the British Isles and Iceland?

2. What were the casualties suffered by the Canadians in the European theatre of war as above described?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The actual number of individual members of the Canadian Army who saw service in the European theatre of war, excluding the British isles and Iceland, is not immediately available. Approximately 368,000 individual members, however, did proceed to the United Kingdom and Iceland. The breakdown of this number into service in different theatres of war will be available in the near future from individual record statistics now in course of preparation.

2. For European theatre, excluding British isles and Iceland:

(a) Fatal—all causes	18,375
(b) Non Fatal—battle casualties	51,955
Total	70,330

NATIONAL HOUSING—CONVERSIONS IN HAMILTON DISTRICT

Mr. LENNARD:

Of the twenty national housing conversions effected in the Hamilton, Ontario district, what items were salvaged in each conversion and what were the estimated values of same?

Mr. McILRAITH: When the administration of the twenty home conversion projects was turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on January 1, 1946, the following items of salvage were in storage for disposal. These were subsequently disposed of at the prices listed below.

Project No.—Salvage items—Salvage value

5-2-H.C.-2, 46 Arkledun Ave.—5 No. 30 hot water tanks, $10; 5 2,500-watt electric heaters, $10.

5-2-H.C.-4, 116 Main St. W.—1 jacket heater, Dominion H.10, $5.

5-2-H.C.-10, 68 Arkledun Ave.—5 No. 30 hot water tanks, $10; 5 2,500-watt electric heaters, $10.

5-2-H.C.-11, 79 Arkledun Ave.—4 No. 30 hot water tanks, $8; 3 2,500-watt electric heaters, $6; 1 No. 50 Rex gas heater, $6.

5-2-H.C.-12, 415 King St. E.—1 jacket heater Viking No. V.12, $5.

5-2-H.C.-16, 72 Victoria Ave.—1 thermostat for hot water control, $5.

5-2-H.C.-20, 28 Myrtle Ave.—1 Imperial jacket heater No. 12, $5.

5-2-H.C.-22, 5 Linden Place—1 Imperial jacket heater No. 12, $5.

5-2-H.C.-23, 800 Main St. E.—1 Imperial jacket heater No. 12, $5.

5-2-H.C.-24, 11 Torrance St.—1 Imperial jacket heater No. 112, $5.

5-2-H.C.-36, 609 Beach Blvd.—1 jacket heater Dominion H.10, $5.

[Mr. McMaster.]

SECURITIES INVESTMENT FUND—PURCHASE OF DOMINION BONDS

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario):

In sessional paper No. 29D dated March 23, 1948, in answer to a question asked by myself, the Department of Finance indicated that the securities investment fund from August, 1947 to January, 1948, inclusive, had purchased a net amount of approximately $300,000,000 of Dominion of Canada bonds: 1. Under what authority is this fund set up?

2. How much does it amount to?

3. How is it invested?

4. Were the bond purchases made by the various government departments set out in this return made independently of each other, or were they made in conjunction with, or under the supervision of, the Department of Finance?

Mr. MAYHEW: Stand.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that I put this question on the order paper on April 16, which is almost two weeks ago, with reference to the origin of the fund of $300 million which had been used in the purchase of Dominion of Canada bonds. The question was, under what authority was this fund set up, and so on. If there is a proper authority that question could be answered in half an hour. I wish to protest, with all the bitterness that my nature is capable of, against being brushed off. I wish to ask that this question be answered immediately, because there can be no earthly reason for its not being answered, unless it was done without authority, and in that case we should know.

SASKATCHEWAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. THATCHER:

During the calendar year 1947, how much money was actually spent by the federal government for (a) surveying and engineering; (b) construction on (1) the St. Mary's River irrigation project; (2) the Red Deer irrigation scheme; (3) the South Saskatchewan irrigation project?

Mr. McCUBBIN:

1. St. Mary's River irrigation project: (a) $130,154; (b) $746,189.

2. Red Deer River irrigation scheme: (a) $130,154; (b) nil.

3. South Saskatchewan irrigation project: (a) $152,616; (b) nil.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—DENTAL SUPPLIES

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. Has the government given effect to the conclusions of the report made by the commissioner entrusted with the investigation of an alleged combine in dental supplies?

2. What action has been taken by the government in order to put an end to the unfair practices disclosed by such investigation?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes. Prosecution was instituted and following the unfavourable result at the trial the crown appealed and it is expected that the appeal will be heard by the Ontario court of appeal in the near future.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN NAVY—PRIZE MONEY

Mr. MARIER:

1. Has the government received sums of money from the British government with regard to the payment of prize money to members of His Majesty's Canadian navy during the late war?

2. If so, shall said prize money be distributed to those entitled to it, and when?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. While no prize money has yet been received from the British government, the matter is under consideration at present, and it is possible that money will ultimately be received. In addition, the Canadian government has in hand moneys resulting from prizes taken by the Royal Canadian Navy.

2. When the amount is known, consideration will be given to the manner of dealing with it.

NATIONAL INCOME, 1939-1947

Mr. HANSELL:

What was the national income for each of the years 1939-1947 inclusive?

Mr. McILRAITH: The national income and the gross national product in Canada for the years 1939 to 1947 were as follows:

	National income	Gross national product
	(Millions of dollars)
1939	4,274	5,581
1940	5,236	6,740
1941	6,544	8,403
1942	8,273	10,487
1943	8,941	11,244
1944	9,596	11,820
1945	9,644	11,614
1946*	9,617	11,656
1947†	10,735	13,052

*Revised preliminary estimate.
†Preliminary estimate.

EXPORT OF CANNED MEATS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What quantity of canned beef, pork or other meat products are at present allowed to be exported to the United States?

2. How are quotas for such exports allocated as between Canadian firms or exporters?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. (a) Spreads and potted meats, 579,000 lbs.; (b) Pork products, 207,000 lbs.; (c) Solid pack, other than pork products, 283,000 lbs.; (d) Stews, boiled dinners, hashes and chile con carne, 883,000 lbs.

2. Individual company quotas have been established for the export of all types of canned meats to the United States of America. The quotas are based in relation to the packers' domestic production of canned meats during the period September 1, 1946 to July 31, 1947 inclusive, and the present quotas set up for the meat packers are in operation until June 30, 1948. Applications for export permits must be submitted prior to that date. In the case of canned hams, exports to the United States must be limited to 10 per cent of the quota covering canned pork products.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HOUSING—CONVERSIONS IN HAMILTON DISTRICT

Mr. LENNARD:

Of the twenty national housing conversions effected in the Hamilton, Ontario district, 1. How many conversions were on a contract basis?

2. How many conversions were on a cost-plus basis?

3. How much rent has been collected on each to March 31, 1948?

4. What has been cost of maintenance on each to date?

5. What amount was owing to the crown on each on March 31, 1948?

6. What are the completion dates?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

EXPORTS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. What was the number of automobiles and trucks exported from Canada to other countries of the world as of March 31, 1947 to March 31, 1948, by months?

2. What was the number exported to each country?

3. How many automobiles and trucks were manufactured in Canada from March 31, 1947 to March 31, 1948, by months?

Mr. WINTERS: Return tabled.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—RECONSTRUCTION—TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. FRASER:

1. Were any civil servants, or temporary employees, of the Department of Munitions and Supply, or the Department of Reconstruction, in receipt of $3,000 a year or over, transferred to any other department during the years 1945, 1946 and 1947?

2. If so, to what departments were these employees transferred stating the number of civil servants and number of temporary employees in the case of each department to which they were transferred?

3. What salaries were paid to all such temporary employees of the Department of Munitions and Supply, or Department of Reconstruction (a) before transfer; (b) after transfer?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

NORTH STAR AIRCRAFT

Mr. SKEY:

1. How many North Star aircraft have the Canadian government purchased; (a) for what departments or companies have these purchases been made; (b) how many aircraft have been purchased for each; (c) at what price per aircraft were these purchases made?

2. How many additional North Star aircraft have the government agreed to purchase?

3. What is the maximum fuel capacity of the North Star aircraft without overload tanks?

4. What is the gasoline consumption per hour at cruising speed of the North Star aircraft?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. ARGUE:

For a statement showing the 1947 wheat yields, as set forth in the P.F.A.A. inspector's report, on all lands located in township 8 in ranges 8 and 9, west third meridian.

Mr. McCUBBIN: Since the inception of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act it has been understood between the department and the farmers that information obtained by P.F.A. inspectors as to the yield on individual farms would not be made public. There are instances in which the farm operator would not wish to have this information disclosed, and the principle of treating it as confidential has been maintained in all P.F.A. dealings with individuals, municipalities and others.

Mr. ARGUE: Mr. Speaker, I have discussed the matter with the minister and he informs me that provision is made by which the farmers concerned can ask for reinspection. In view of that, I shall be willing to let the matter drop.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

GREAT SLAVE LAKE AREA—PROSPECTING FOR MINERALS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

For a copy of the agreements, documents and correspondence granting to Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and Ventures Limited the exclusive right of prospecting for minerals over 500 square miles of land south of Great Slave lake or in that vicinity, and showing the boundaries of that area of 500 square miles.

[Mr. Fraser.]

FLOOD CONDITIONS

WINNIPEG AREA—EFFECT ON MEAT PRICES IN WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? Can the minister give the assurance that everything feasible is being done by his department to relieve the flood conditions in the Winnipeg area? I have in mind the control of the volume of water in the Red river which is exercised by the gates at Lockport.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I will inquire of the officials in Winnipeg. Perhaps something can be done in connection with the flow of water through St. Andrew's locks and if it is feasible we may direct operations to relieve the situation. I will make inquiries and give instructions accordingly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Take another look at Etobicoke.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I ask the minister to see that the situation in Winnipeg is corrected? My apartment is now flooded.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Has his attention been called to newspaper reports to the effect that meat prices are rising in the city of Winnipeg because farmers are unable to bring in meat owing to the flood conditions? Will the minister have the wartime prices and trade board look into this in the hope that profiteering of this kind may be nipped in the bud?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I will draw my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the prices board.

CONDITIONS IN VICINITY OF DAUPHIN

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I regret I was not able to give him notice because the matter came to my attention only before I entered the chamber. I understand that a telegram was dispatched yesterday to the minister in connection with this matter. In view of the very serious flood conditions in the vicinity of Dauphin, the second within one year, will the minister assure the house that his department or the government will lend all assistance possible to the people who are suffering from that flood?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The matter of flood conditions in areas of that kind is in all parts of Canada the responsibility of the provincial government. I assume that representations have been made to the provincial government as well as to this government, and that matters will be discussed between them.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that there are exceptions to the rule he has just laid down.

Mr. GARDINER: Not in connection with this type of flooding.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, there are—for instance, the Grand river in Ontario.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The answer is yes.

POSTAL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO REDUCTION OF AIR MAIL LETTER POSTAGE RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): May I be permitted to address a question to the Postmaster General, a copy of which I have sent to him? In view of the fact that air mail volume is not approaching the capacity of Trans-Canada Air Lines for mail transport, and that planes are only partially loaded, when will the Canadian air mail rate be reduced to five cents, the same as in the United States, in order to develop new business?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): This is, of course, a question of policy for the government; and we are not yet ready to say when or how we shall act in the future.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was the answer given two years ago.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would say that we should not reduce the postage rates too soon, for this reason: in the United States, immediately after the war their ordinary letter rates were reduced from three cents to two cents and from four cents to three cents. The air mail postage rate was also reduced. The result was that at the end of last year there was a deficit of $442,000,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps the government is partly loaded.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT—SURVEYING OF MINERAL CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): May I call the attention of the government to the fact that on March 10 an order was passed for a copy of all correspondence and communications between the Minister of Mines and Resources, all officials of his department and corporations and/or persons concerning the action now being taken by the minister affecting large numbers of owners of mineral claims in Yukon. I regret that illness makes it necessary for the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) to be absent from the house, but perhaps the acting minister could speed up the return on that order.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall be glad to make inquiries.

OATS AND BARLEY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO EXPORT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Owing to lack of definite information with regard to the export regulations applicable to oats and barley, will the minister make a statement to the house outlining the regulations governing the export of those two commodities?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I could not hear the question asked by the hon. member, but I shall be glad to read Hansard and try to prepare an answer for tomorrow.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTRIBUTIONS, PROCEDURE, OFFENCES AND PENALTIES

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Before the bill receives its third reading, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make one or two observations. Perhaps I had better wait until quiet is restored in the house, because it is difficult for me to make myself heard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I must be lenient with hon. members, because I am afraid I myself am an offender in this regard.

Mr. MacINNIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: In that regard I take second place, however, only to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

In rising to say a word on the motion for third reading of Bill No. 203, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, I do so because of certain statements which have been made from time to time with respect to this party's position on unemployment insurance. It is necessary, although I am sorry that it becomes so, for us again to place our record so clearly on the record that even those who are desirous of altering that record will not be able to do so without bringing upon themselves the condemnation of the electorate.

I have a personal reason for rising at this time, sir, because down through the years as a member of parliament, along with others in the Progressive Conservative party, I have taken a consistent and, I think, a vigorous stand in seeking legislation by this government with respect to unemployment insurance. It must be remembered that the party now in power had unemployment insurance in its platform as far back as the year 1919. It must be remembered also, Mr. Speaker, for those whose memory at times becomes conveniently forgetful, that it was not the Liberal party or the C.C.F. party, but rather the Conservative party, which in 1935 had the honour of bringing in the first bill for unemployment insurance in Canada. In addition to that—

An hon. MEMBER: The Conservatives did not bring in unemployment insurance.

Mr. GRAYDON: We shall let the hon. member make his speech again, although I doubt if it is necessary. Not only was it our party that brought unemployment insurance legislation for the first time into the House of Commons, but it was this party as well which, during the sessions of 1936 and following years, saw the present government sending legislation which had been passed in the House of Commons to the Supreme Court of Canada and elsewhere for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it was constitutional. This had the result of delaying legislation from 1936 until 1940, when it was finally passed.

In 1940 the present government brought in a new measure with respect to unemployment insurance. I was one of those who tried to take a little lead, so far as our own party was concerned, in promoting and attempting to improve the measure that had been brought down. I was a member of the special committee on unemployment insurance which was set up under the chairmanship of the then minister of labour, Mr. McLarty, and had much to do with the various debates and discussions which finally resulted in an unemployment insurance measure being passed by the House of Commons. That was in the year 1940. It was in that year that the measure received its third reading.

The point I wish to make is this. Nowhere in this report of the special committee on unemployment insurance which I hold in my hand will anyone find the slightest suggestion of any opposition on the part of the Conservative party to unemployment insurance or its principles, and scarcely any to its details. In addition, if one turns to Hansard of July 19, 1940, one finds that the Minister of Labour himself put his imprimatur on the position of our party at that time. This was toward the end of the debate, when the legislation was finally going through. At page 1786 of Hansard for 1940 Mr. McLarty said, with a great deal of truth:

> It has been a congenial task for me as minister, sponsoring a bill such as this, to have received such wholehearted approval of the measure, in principle, as has been given this bill.

In addition, I was looking up the records and found that going back from third reading, which is indicated at page 2088 of Hansard for that session, at every single stage the bill went through without division and without amendment, and with the wholehearted approval of the Conservative party of that day.

That makes it very difficult for me, after such an active part in the consideration of that legislation as I tried to take at that time, to swallow the remark made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) over the air last Thursday night. This is what the minister said in that broadcast on The Nation's Business:

> Next, look at unemployment insurance, introduced by the Liberals in 1941—

Well, he was so much asleep that he even missed the year the measure was introduced.

> —and opposed by the Conservatives; another measure of social security introduced and put into effect by the Liberals.

I resent that statement, which was made over the air more than a week ago. The minister has had plenty of time since to correct it. If he did not know that was not the fact, he should have known it. If he did know it was not the fact, then I think this house and this party deserve an apology from the minister for having made that statement.

I well remember my old schoolmaster in the town of Brampton giving this good advice to his students: "You cannot at the same time whistle and chew a meal, and do justice to both". Neither can the Minister of National Defence look after our armed forces and at the same time keep an eye upon his political fences, as he was trying to do in that broadcast the other evening.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the minister that what we need is a man with both eyes on the defence of Canada. I want to say also that instead of taking his little pencil and trying to figure out the total time that has been taken up by some members of parliament, and what we have been saying in Hansard, he had better get out a great big pencil and figure the total strength of the armed forces of this country, for I can tell him those are the totals in which the people of this country are interested, not in all this small political nonsense that has gone over the air under the title The Nation's Business.

I would not have risen at all had I not keenly resented the suggestion that I and others who tried to do a good job in the committee which considered that measure, had opposed this legislation. I resent it when someone who should know better comes along and makes that statement. The minister was here then; but if he was asleep at that time I hope he will not continue to sleep now that he has such a big job as the defence of Canada. So far as our position is concerned, I hope it will be made clear in this instance as it should have been made clear in the instance brought up by the minister. Our name should be cleared of a blot and stain which it is beneath the dignity of any member of the government to attempt to put upon us.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to—

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister closing the debate?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. I have said all I should say about unemployment insurance. The bill has been passed unanimously, and no credit has been taken from any political party in this house in that regard. But I think a short history of the development of this legislation should be given. I do not believe this is the time or place for the Minister of Labour to defend the Minister of National Defence on an entirely different question.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not a different question at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a moment; I did not interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. STEPHENSON: He was in your department.

Mr. MITCHELL: He was not in my department.

Mr. STEPHENSON: He was meddling with it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say to my hon. friend that those who know me best know that other people do not meddle in my department. I well recall the history of this legislation; and let it be said without fear of successful contradiction that, other than political organizations, the organization that should be given most credit for the establishment of this legislation in Canada is the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We put your bill through in record time. What are you kicking about?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am just giving the history, and I am not taking any credit away from my good friends the Conservatives.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is all we ask.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my memory serves me correctly, the original unemployment insurance legislation was put through this House of Commons by the Conservative government under the leadership of Mr. Bennett just prior to the 1935 election. I have a vivid recollection of the support given that legislation by the late Mr. Woodsworth, by my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and I think by almost everyone in this house. If I remember aright the bill was passed under the treaty-making powers of the British North America Act, in that the international labour office had passed a convention, which was adopted by this country, favouring the introduction of unemployment insurance.

I remember the occasion very well. I was not a lawyer; I was a young member, and having spoken in support of this bill I was standing behind the curtains over there speaking to Mr. Lapointe. He said, "Humphrey, you cannot break a law by agreement. You have to amend the British North America Act." As assistant to the late Mr. Rogers I played some small part in drafting the amendment to that act. I also recall vividly that in the election of 1940 one of the main planks of the Liberal platform was the amendment of the British North America Act to make possible the establishment of unemployment insurance in Canada without any constitutional question.

Mr. FERGUSON: You were still a young man then.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am a young man yet. At the moment—and I have no objection to that point of view—certain provincial governments are very jealous of their jurisdiction, and I think it is the duty of a government sponsoring legislation to see to it that such legislation comes squarely within the four corners of the British North America Act.

I thought I should make these few remarks to put the record straight, and to indicate that all parties in this house can take credit for the adoption of this very necessary legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear. That is what we wanted the government to say. We did not want them to say we were opposed to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: No one has said you were opposed to it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes; your deskmate said so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the record speaks for itself. The hon. member for Calgary West has said that this is good legislation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Indeed he did.

Mr. MITCHELL: There was no destructive criticism from any section of the house in connection with the provisions of the bill. Let us be frank and honest about that. I believe this bill went through faster than any bill of its kind in the history of this parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was good legislation and it was given good treatment.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot take full credit for that.

Mr. GRAYDON: You bring in a bill like that and you will have no trouble.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Record time on a fast track.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, as one individual who did not understand the full extent of the reference to giving credit where credit was due, let me say that I appreciate fully the frank statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I am glad the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) made his interjection, so that we may know where we stand. Why should the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) go monkeying around with the Department of Labour, seeking to gain some political advantage with respect to a bill which is national in importance and will be of great benefit to all those who come within its provisions?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

I believe the Minister of Labour deserves great credit for straightening the matter out; I for one appreciate his frank statement of this afternoon.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONTRIBUTORY SUPERANNUATION SCHEME—COMPENSATION FOR INJURY SUSTAINED IN COURSE OF DUTY

The house resumed from Monday, April 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 211, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Member of the force; member.

Mr. CASE: Mr. Chairman, I feel this may be the only opportunity I shall have to say a word in commendation of the splendid service rendered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I believe they are appreciated by the people of Canada as an outstanding force in the regulation of law and order.

I was pleased to note that in the advertising prepared by the Ontario government for tourist purposes a full page was devoted to the work of the mounted police; and at a conference held in Toronto the only persons who found fault with that advertising were the two communist members of the provincial legislature.

I feel that those who are seeking to visit our country are impressed by the fact that this is a country in which law and order is respected. We as citizens of Canada appreciate more and more the service rendered by this great force. Indeed the regulations under which they work impose upon them great sacrifices which, for the glory of their unit, they are prepared to make. Throughout the length and breadth of the universe the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is known as the force that always gets its man.

During the past few summers, tourist vessels from Chicago and other points in the United States have been calling at my home city of Owen Sound. This splendid unit, the mounted police, have always provided an officer dressed in his scarlet uniform at that port. Let me say that citizens of the United States respect this police force, just as Canadians do. They feel that when they set foot on Canadian soil they are entering a land where freedom and justice prevail and where law and order is maintained.

I have taken this opportunity to pay my compliments and tribute to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A number of questions were asked the other night about administration in general, and in particular as to the matter of investigation of subversive elements in the country. In concluding the debate the minister said that those matters did not arise particularly at this time and could not very well be answered or discussed by him. I do feel however that the country as a whole would like to have a general statement from the minister at this time with respect to the work being done. No other opportunity will arise for discussion of this matter. It is one that is being given much attention in the press of Canada, and of the United States as well. I refer to the whole matter of investigations made by the police forces having to do with subversive activities connected with communism.

I mentioned the other evening one matter which affects thousands of people in the prairie provinces, namely, the subtle forms of intimidation that are being practised by certain individuals in this country in order to extract from the people assistance for communist endeavours in other parts of the world.

I am not asking anything out of the way when I ask for a statement in this connection; for Mr. Hoover, the head of the federal bureau of investigation in the United States, has set forth in detail what that organization is doing. His statements, made in general terms, have given the people of the United States some idea of the extent to which subversive elements are widespread throughout that country, and also the measures being taken to prevent their continuance or development.

The other day I raised the question of intimidation of racial groups. I know that the minister within the last few days has received certain suggestions and recommendations in that regard. Representatives of an anti-communist group, persons of Slavic origin, came here and placed the matter before him. They were asking for some assurance that they would be protected against this sort of thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Against what?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Against the threats that were being held out that harm would be done to their relatives in continental Europe unless they adopted the suggestions of those who had got in touch with them. These men who were here the other day said that they had called a meeting in Toronto with a view to building up a solid front against communist activities. A number of persons with whom they had communicated said frankly to them that they were fearful of attending any meeting, of showing their hand in any way, or of contributing their efforts to the combating of communist activities. These operators had instilled in their hearts the fear that should they act or show their hands their relatives abroad would be endangered.

After all, this is a matter under the jurisdiction of the minister, and I should like to know what the department is doing in this regard. Does it contemplate the introduction of an amendment to widen the sections of the criminal code which cannot now be used to punish those who do this kind of thing? If the legislation is widened it is possible that the relatives might be proceeded against, but in any event the fact that such legislation was on the statute book would in itself be a deterrent.

I should like to have a statement from the minister with regard to a number of matters affecting mounted police administration in respect to which the members of the force would like to have certain changes made. I shall not repeat them, because repetition will not make them any clearer. Would the minister be willing to indicate to the committee the attitude of the department toward these questions, and whether or not any changes are contemplated other than those covered by the bill which has been introduced?

I believe that when this force, which is great in service and magnificent in tradition, asks for the removal of a number of little pinpricking things, every consideration should be given to their request. The amendments provided for by this bill go a long way toward removing serious complaint. Over a period of two or three years we on this side of the house asked for an increase in the salaries of the mounted police, but the answer was that they were getting reasonably good pay. We pointed to the number of fully qualified men who had served only five years but who resigned or retired because of the hopelessness of their position as they saw it. I understand that normally a man must be in the service eleven years before he achieves the highest salary paid to a constable. Promotions have been too slow and opportunities for advancement too restricted. These things which they object to should be remedied if possible.

I come now to one other matter, the personnel report. I was joined in this by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe). The fact that the constable may not express his views in connection with adverse personnel reports affecting him has caused a great deal of resentment. We are asking the members of the R.C.M.P. to discharge great responsibilities. Our safety depends on them. I suggest that we in this house should do everything we can to remove anything that might cause them not to have that degree of contentment without which efficient work is impossible.

I want the minister to understand that we are not in the position in which the minister of defence endeavoured to put us the other day. We are here to place suggestions before the government. We want to co-operate in this matter. The people are asking, through us, for the assurance of the Minister of Justice that all is well so far as internecine activities which might undermine the country are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, naturally I came in with the thought that the bill would be taken up section by section, but I shall answer the questions asked by the hon. gentleman in so far as I can.

I am not in a position to make a statement about the program of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in watching communists in Canada. I do not think it would be desirable for me to make such a statement in the house. It is well known that for many years the R.C.M.P. has been keenly alive to the possibilities of subversive action, and I think they are as much alive today as they ever were, perhaps more so. If it is possible to make a more comprehensive statement without defeating the end that is sought, I will see if one can be prepared and delivered on another occasion. I submit that the proper occasion for that would be on the estimates of the mounted police rather than on this bill.

With regard to the other questions that were asked, I should like to deal with one to which a number of speakers gave some attention the other night. I refer to the question of threats to persons of foreign origin or foreign parentage. Apart from those that were made across the floor of the house the other night, the only representation that has ever been made in this regard was contained in a letter which I received from a solicitor in western Canada advising me that a client or a person who had consulted him had stated that injury had been threatened to his relatives in one of the communist countries of Europe if he did not do certain things. I forget whether he was to join a communist organization, contribute to a communist organization or what it was. However, that is irrelevant.

This solicitor suggested that there should be an amendment to the criminal code to go beyond the present section dealing with threats to parents and other relatives. I turned that over to officers of the Department of Justice and asked them to advise me whether such an amendment could be drafted and whether in their opinion it was desirable. Since the speeches were made the other night, in which several hon. members said that officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police themselves said that this is becoming almost a practice throughout the country, and after consulting an hon. member or two on this side of the house who said that there was some talk about it, I tried to ascertain just what, if anything, is going on. The information I got is that occasionally in conversation there is some reference to relatives of the displaced person or other person of foreign origin or foreign parentage in the home country or communist country. These references are not threats; they are merely reminders, I suppose, or hints rather than threats.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: In a minute, yes. I have asked the deputy minister of justice to see whether any strengthening of the criminal code is possible in that regard, and he advised me at noon that he would work on it this afternoon. I do not think the house should have too high hopes of anything of much value being done, because certainly it seems to me that if I were a communist approaching a non-communist with a view to getting him to contribute money or do something else of that kind, I would not be making a threat. It is a little difficult for me to understand how a reference to his family in the old country could be made the subject of a criminal prosecution. I think it would be pretty difficult; but as I say, the Department of Justice is giving consideration to something of that kind.

Whether it would accomplish anything, even if proper criminal legislation could be passed, is another question; because I doubt whether any information would ever be given. If we did have legislation of that kind I doubt whether anyone would ever inform or lay a charge. Certainly he would not if he had any real fear of retaliation or prosecution of his relatives in the country from which he came.

My hon. friend asked whether any other amendment to the act was proposed at this session. The answer is no. These are the amendments that were proposed for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act at the present session. I think that they deal with everything that needs to be dealt with. They do not deal with everything that has been brought before the department for attention; they do not by any means adopt all the suggestions that have been made, but I think they include all the suggestions that should be acted upon.

May I say a word with regard to pay. My hon. friend said that for years it has been urged that the pay of the R.C.M.P. has not been high enough. Well, the pay that is adequate today may not be adequate tomorrow. I have no reason to think that the pay of this force has not been comparable with that of other forces and with the armed services throughout the years. Recently, of course, there have been increases to the civil service and to the armed forces, and the time had come when another pay increase was desirable for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; that pay increase has been provided for by regulation. I think the force is fairly well satisfied with the pay increases that have been provided.

A question has been raised about the rule that members of the force are not shown reports on themselves. The commissioner informs me that anything adverse in the reports is shown to the members of the force.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister say that that is a fact, that anything adverse is shown to the member of the force so that he can answer it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the commissioner informs me now that the officer or non-commissioned officer or constable against whom anything adverse is being recorded is paraded, warned, and told of the entry that is being made in his record against him.

Mr. HAZEN: Does he have to sign anything then?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. PROBE: Will the minister indicate to the committee what effect, if any, this legislation will have on adjustment of the amounts of pension of those who are now in receipt of superannuation?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has no effect on them at all.

Mr. PROBE: There are former members of the force, now on superannuation, who are contributing. These men are constables or N.C.O.'s, or were of that rank at pension time, and they are still contributing to the widow's portion of the superannuation. I have mail covering this specific point, showing that pension deductions are being made to cover the widow's allowance following the decease of the husband. In view of the fact that widows are now being covered by the terms of this bill, is it proposed to cancel the contributions, which in some cases are fairly high? I have one that comes to $18 and some cents a month, and it has been running that way for twelve years. Are these payments to the pension fund being cancelled or returned, or what is being done about them?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a complicated matter. The hon. gentleman is now taking the case of a superannuated member of the force who for some reason is making contributions to the dependent's pension fund.

Mr. PROBE: Exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I am correct in this; this is my information. If the person is superannuated he would not be making contributions to that fund unless he were paying up for back service of some kind. He has an option under this bill of changing to the new pension scheme contemplated in this bill. Any person now in the force may change over from the present pension plan to the new pension plan, and provisions for transition are provided for. If he wishes to remain with the present pension plan he has the option of doing so. I presume hon. members understand the difference in principle between the two pension plans. The present pension plan provides for a free pension to the member, but a wholly member-financed pension for the dependents. The government makes no contribution to the dependent's pension under the present system, but the member of the force makes no contribution to his own pension. Every present member of the force who wishes to continue along that line may do so. Of course none of his contractual rights are taken away from him.

Mr. PROBE: That is true only of constables and N.C.O.'s.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is true of everybody.

Mr. PROBE: Officers were on a different basis before.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I have said about the non-contributory plan applies only to those below the rank of officer. The present pension plan, so far as officers are concerned, is a contributory plan. The government contributes to that, and so do the officers. The officers may continue under their present pension system, in accordance with the arrangements they have already made, or they may transfer to the new one, which is more favourable in some respects, less favourable in others, but on the whole more so, I should think.

Mr. BRYCE: I asked the minister some questions the other night about the superannuation scheme. When the new scheme is inaugurated I hope it will be a scheme whereby, when a man decides to take advantage of the superannuation act, he will not have to continue to make payments after he has paid to the government everything he owes them. I tried to explain to the house the situation with regard to the wardens in our penitentiaries who come under a scheme such as this. They had so much to pay because they had not already made those payments, but after they had paid that up and were all clear they still had to keep on making payments until the day they died. That is not a good scheme, and I raise my voice against it now. I would ask the government not to have a scheme like that but to see to it that when a man has paid his dues to the government he will not be required to keep on paying until he dies, because there are some people who live to ninety.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think my hon. friend must be under some misapprehension. This is quite simple—at least if I can make it so. The principle that applies to penitentiary employees is exactly the same as the principle that applies in the civil service. A man may have temporary service when there is no deduction from his pay, and that arrangement may go on for ten years. He may then become permanent and may wish to take advantage of the superannuation fund. He may desire to have the time during which he was not making contributions count for pension purposes. If he wishes to have that time count for pension purposes he must make the contribution in respect of that period. He must pay 5, 5½ or 6 per cent, as the case may be, of the pay he received during that period in which he made no contributions, and he must pay interest on it, into the superannuation fund. If he pays that in a lump sum, that is the end and he needs to make no further contributions. But many persons are not in a position to make a lump-sum payment. Many persons desire to have deductions made in the future, either from pay or sometimes from pension, until they die, and a calculation is made to determine how much shall be deducted from pension to be put into the fund, being that amount which the person had not contributed in respect of the period during which he was not under the superannuation provision, when he was merely a temporary. That is the reason these deductions continue until death. They are merely the equivalent of the contributions which had not been made and which have to be made if the person is to be pensioned in respect of that period; otherwise there would be discrimination between that person and someone else from whose pay deductions had been made from the beginning of his service.

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. BRYCE: The minister has made that plain, and I understand it, but I am dealing with penitentiaries. I will take the matter up with him privately and thresh it out, because there are men in our penitentiary service who have paid their debt to the government, which they owed by reason of coming in late under the pension scheme from temporary service, and still they have to keep on paying until they die. This does not concern the mounted police. I hope that when the minister is preparing the bill he will see to it that no man shall have to keep on paying until the day of his death. These people I am speaking of do not owe the government anything and they are still making payments.

Mr. ILSLEY: This scheme is the same as the other one.

Mr. BRYCE: Then it is no good.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is wrong about the other plan. No one has to keep on paying superannuation contributions which he does not owe.

Mr. PROBE: What facilities have the rank and file of the R.C.M.P. for making representations with respect to pension plans, conditions of service or pay? How can they make representations either to the commissioner or to the Minister of Justice? Where a man has been crimed, as will happen even in the R.C.M.P., what appeal is there from the commissioner's adverse decision for the R.C.M.P. constable or the non-commissioned officer under subsections 1 and 2 of 31?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those having complaints may go to the personnel department which exists for the purpose of dealing with complaints, and they may also go to their own officers and make complaints.

Mr. PROBE: They are denied power of association, however, by that order in council which I mentioned the other night.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe there was an order in council which was passed after the Winnipeg strike or at some other time. At any rate, it has been long outstanding and I have received no complaints with reference to it.

Mr. PROBE: I have had some representations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other question was—

Mr. PROBE: Appeal from adverse decisions.

Mr. ILSLEY: If a member of the force is dissatisfied with the decision of the deputy commissioner or assistant commissioner, there is an appeal to the minister. I have always understood in the department that they have an appeal to the minister. Certainly they do once in a while write to me, and they are outspoken. I believe that has happened twice.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is one suggestion I wish to make with regard to the question of intimidation. The intimidation is undoubtedly very real; it does exist. The minister asked how the criminal code might be amended. I suggest to him that any organization or any individual collecting funds for use outside Canada, for charitable purposes or for a service outside Canada, should be registered with the federal government. During the war we had the War Charities Act and it created no great hardship in the raising of funds for charities. Much of the intimidation comes from persons who have been citizens of, or who are descended from persons who were citizens of countries behind what is known as the iron curtain. They approach others asking for donations for charitable or other purposes. A great deal of the trouble in this respect might be overcome if the appropriate act, whether it be the criminal code or some other statute, were amended to provide that anyone soliciting funds for charitable purposes or for other uses outside Canada should be registered with the federal government. I believe that is in accordance with what the United States government has done, and it is particularly useful in this country, where we have had recently a number of serious attempts at intimidation, particularly of displaced persons. Persons coming to this country, often with little or no knowledge of our language, have frequently been met and have been made to undergo certain pressure tactics by communist groups to join the communist party. In any case their faith in the democratic system under which we live in Canada is exposed to danger and may be shaken. I think that has been proved in numbers of cases, and is particularly true of displaced persons coming from Europe to work in the mining and logging industries.

There is one more case which received a good deal of attention in the press recently. That is the case of the Soviet embassy's advertising in the foreign language newspapers of this country, particularly the Baltic language newspapers, and stating that it was necessary for those persons who were Baltic citizens at one time to register with the Soviet embassy. I believe that case has been taken up by the Department of External Affairs. Nevertheless, that advertisement constituted a definite threat to those people who read the foreign language newspapers and whose knowledge of English is not great or is perhaps nonexistent. In my opinion that amounts to a threat. Not only that, it amounts to an abuse by the Soviet embassy of its rights and is a departure from the ordinary course of diplomatic behaviour in Canada or in any other country. No Canadian embassy would ever dream of doing such a thing in any foreign country, and I consider this definitely amounts to a threat. That case is particularly interesting today when, although perhaps from a de jure point of view there is a difference between the Soviet government and the communist party, there is perhaps no difference from a de facto point of view. I believe the government should consider an amendment to the criminal code particularly with regard to that matter.

I have one more suggestion to make with regard to pay to the mounted police. In the force today there are a number of officers who must undertake special extra training. I am thinking of the matter from the technical point of view, and am referring to those who are doing, shall we say, flying operations or special operations with regard to medical and legal work. These men must have high technical qualifications. Frequently they are university graduates. I believe that some recognition of these extra duties should be given in this act. I have read the act cursorily, but I believe that the men who are thus specially trained should receive special consideration with regard to pay.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is with regard to these men who are doing work in the intelligence department of this great force. An intelligence officer frequently does not wear a uniform. He must assume various types of dress. He is required to mingle in all classes of society. In this day and age he must be a diplomatic and cosmopolitan person indeed. Particularly with regard to the clothing and travelling allowances of persons doing this work, I think the regulations should be made more liberal so that under no circumstances will an officer of the force who is doing intelligence work ever need to think of the extra cost of, shall we say, spoiling his civilian clothes or having to take, in the line of duty, chances which might damage his property. I mention that matter inasmuch as several officers have mentioned it to me.

In conclusion, I want to say that in the federal bureau of investigation I think the minimum salary starts off at the rate of $4,000 a year for what they call the agent. It rapidly increases to $6,000 or $8,000 for the next two or three steps up. Those are rates of pay considerably in excess of the pay given to the mounted police. It was said by the minister's predecessor that we in Canada could not ever expect to pay our services the rates paid in the United States. That perhaps is an unfortunate truth; but I suggest that, with regard to work done in line of duty, these technical men of high educational qualifications and great training should receive extra consideration for the work they do and the risks they take.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will take just a moment or two. The minister may reply when he answers the question asked by the hon. member for York West regarding possible changes in the criminal code. The hon. member has covered the point fairly well. In his remarks he said that donations were requested for specific purposes. It is not only a request; it is a demand. I can assure the minister of that. I may advise the minister that I made it my business to pass on to the officers of the R.C.M.P. certain information pointing out that a dead set was being made by certain active communist workers to specialize on their point of contact with the displaced people. I sent to the department the evidence in a specific case. I had the gentleman who was kind enough to come to me about the matter interview one of the officers of the R.C.M.P. staff.

I will go a step farther. There is a definite circulation of subversive literature going on in certain parts of the country. I am wondering if steps are being taken to stamp this type of thing out. I should like to cite to the minister one instance which occurred quite recently. Within the last two or three weeks a man was caught distributing, in the dead of night, this particular subversive literature. He was brought in by one of the local police officers. He was caught with a copy of the literature. He openly defied the police officer and said, "I am a communist and proud of it." That was his attitude, and these threats are actually being made.

There has come to my attention something else, which perhaps the minister knows about; that is, the practice of sending teen-age children back to certain foreign countries, supposedly for education. Several people of European origin have told me of being approached in this connection, and that many of these children have gone back. I believe the country concerned, as far as I was told, was Czechoslovakia. I should like to know if there is any law or regulation under which Canadian citizenship could be taken away from any person proved guilty of doing things of this kind. I think that would have a definite effect, because they value that citizenship and guard it closely once they get it, since it protects them in case they get in trouble and go a step too far.

I mention these things so that the minister may know the anxiety I feel, because I have come closely in touch with these matters; and I have other information I want to pass on to the officers of the mounted police within a very few days. I am digging up more all the time.

Mr. SHAW: When Bill No. 211 came before the house for second reading the hon. member for Lake Centre made reference to a matter it had been my intention to raise. I appreciate the fact that it has been discussed, but I should like to refer to it again.

The hon. member indicated that he considered it most unfair to members of the force that when they come up for trial they should be denied the privilege of being represented by counsel. Without making reference to any specific case, I have an incident in mind in making these remarks. As matters stand at present, a commissioned officer may issue orders or instructions. An N.C.O. on detachment may conscientiously carry out such orders or instructions, but somewhere someone may err. The commissioned officer is in a position to lay a charge against the N.C.O. He may also hear the charge, and may also impose sentence, though the original error in judgment, made in good faith, may be attributable to the commissioned officer involved. It seems to me the N.C.O. is placed in a most unfortunate position. He is not represented by counsel. It is not as though the charge is being heard in a civil court. I understood the minister to say such a man could appeal to a personnel board or to the minister—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, he does not go to the personnel board. In the case the hon. gentleman is describing, the officer would be holding an investigation under oath for the information of the commissioner, and if the constable or non-commissioned officer is dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner he can get in touch with the minister.

Mr. SHAW: The unfortunate part of it is that the N.C.O., who may be desirous of continuing with the force, is placed in the position that he has to appeal against the decision of his superior officer, and he is a bit hesitant about doing that. He fears the repercussions that may follow; he sees the possibility of a reduction in rank at some time or another, without a great deal of justification; he may experience a transfer to a much less desirable detachment. As I say, he is placed in a much more unfortunate position than he need be if he were given an opportunity in the first place to obtain the assistance of counsel or, as I have heard many people suggest, if he had the right to appear before a civil court. There may be arguments against that, but certainly it appeals to me as preferable to the existing practice.

In what I say I do not want it to be considered for a moment that I am endeavouring to detract from the great work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. On previous occasions I have expressed myself in this connection. One would have to be blind indeed to fail to appreciate the great work done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, both now and when they were known under another name. I do feel, however, that injustices have been imposed upon N.C.O.'s and constables under the present method of conducting trial of charges laid by commissioned officers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the regulations a member of the force being investigated has the right to request the assistance of any officer, non-commissioned officer or constable in the force. He may not have outside counsel, I admit, but he has the right to be assisted or represented by another member of the force.

Mr. SHAW: Are they made fully aware of that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In the only case I can remember reading through I was impressed with the great intelligence shown by the man being investigated, who was permitted to cross-examine and did cross-examine, with much ability, the witnesses who appeared against him. He was found guilty and dismissed from the force, and appealed to me. I was struck with the fairness of the proceedings. That man did not require the assistance of anyone; as far as I could see he certainly did not need it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is there a verbatim transcript of these hearings?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not going to take very much time, Mr. Chairman, nor shall I go over the ground already covered with respect to this fine body of men. On more than one occasion I have gone on record in that regard. I remember that in the Nova Scotia legislature in 1929 I said I felt that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be a much better body of men to carry out the work of patrolling our province than men selected locally, because they would be a more independent body, and for other reasons I mentioned at that time. So I do not propose to deal with that point at all beyond saying that I believe the Halifax division is composed of men of a very fine type. I believe I should make that statement because of the splendid type of service they have given, not only in the capital city but throughout the province.

I wish to bring two matters to the attention of the minister, because I consider them important in view of the effect they may have on the service. I notice that in section 1 it is proposed to drop the word "marine." Unless I hear very good reasons for it, I am inclined to think this is a mistake. In the Department of National Defence we have the army, navy and air force, each with its own work to do, but all under one head and operating efficiently. I believe it is a good thing to have them all under one department. But I say that on the east and west coasts the marine section has a certain type of work, and does that work well. Instead of dropping the marine section, I would hope there would be a general expansion of the branch, and added duties which would perhaps give us greater protection along the shore and at the same time carry out a still greater degree of rescue work.

I feel that if the marine section of the mounted police were expanded or enlarged it could be closely co-operative with the Royal Canadian Air Force, and perform the duties carried on by the coast guard in the United States. They could be of valuable assistance along the Atlantic shoreline, and I suggest that the minister might discuss this matter with the commissioner who, I believe, appreciates the points I am raising. What I have said about the Atlantic coast applies equally to the west coast. That is all I wish to say about the marine section. I thought it was a mistake to drop the word "marine". It is about the same as taking away the uniform worn by members of the mounted police.

There are two other matters I would bring to the attention of the minister. The first has to do with the transfer of men from one section of the country to another. This is done often. Perhaps it is a matter which the commissioner and officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police understand more fully than I do. However, with the housing situation as it is throughout certain sections of Canada, and in view of the fact that a number of these men are married, it seems to me unreasonable and not in the best interests of those concerned to transfer a man from Halifax to Vancouver, or from Halifax to Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto, where housing conditions are similar to those we have in Halifax. A man for a long period of time would have to maintain two homes. I should think that at the present time it would be good policy not to bring about any unnecessary transfers; indeed it would be wise to keep them at the lowest possible minimum.

Then, it is my understanding that transportation is provided upon a man's leaving the force or retiring therefrom. The rule is that a man taking his superannuation must signify immediately his intention of moving to a certain section of the country. A short time ago a member of the force took his superannuation; but when, in the regular way, he was asked the question as to whether he wanted transportation he was unable to say that he did require it. He had been unable to secure housing accommodation where he wished to go, and for that reason was unable to accept transportation, or to say, "Yes; I want transportation for my wife, myself and furniture". Two months later he did find a house and then made application for transportation, this time only for himself and his wife, without the furniture. I feel that there should be a time limit, or that some leeway should be given, so that cases of this kind could be given favourable consideration. I quite realize that regulations must be followed; but common sense should be exercised and a certain degree of reasonableness shown in borderline cases like this one.

I have presented these facts as briefly as I could, sincerely hoping that, with his usual good judgment, the minister will give them the attention they deserve.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Was that man refused transportation?

Mr. ISNOR: He has not yet received it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But he was not refused it.

Mr. ISNOR: In a sense, yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Was it to go to the same place?

Mr. ISNOR: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall give consideration to the matters the hon. member has raised, although, with the exception of the one having to do with the marine section, they do not have reference to the present bill.

The marine section is not abolished, but the force amounting to the marine section is incorporated into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This means they have the same ranks, and their ranks will have the same description now, by regulation, as those in the mounted police, namely officers, non-commissioned officers, constables and so on. Before this they were known by all kinds of names, such as skipper-lieutenants, and descriptions of that kind. They are now brought into conformity with the rest of the force so that an officer now means a commissioned officer of the force. It is not necessary to add, "and also an officer of the marine section", because he has the same rank.

Mr. ISNOR: The marine section will still be maintained?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is not provided for in the act. This is merely the definition of "officer".

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There is greater opportunity for promotion in a larger field.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that; I should think there would be more mobility.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not wish to open up the subject of pay, because it has already been discussed, and it comes into this bill only indirectly in view of the contributory pension scheme. It does affect one's pay, because there comes a time when people speak in terms of their take-home pay. I do not think the minister or any other person can compare the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with that of the civil service, or other types of employment such as driving trucks or operating garages, or with the work of men who would take odd jobs here and there. I say that because the mounted police to a great extent offers a life's work, otherwise I do not suppose the pension scheme would be before us. When a man joins the force he does so with the idea of making it his life's work.

I was wondering if the minister would care to place on Hansard, without any discussion of the matter, the scale of pay that the mounted police receive.

I think it can be said that the work of the R.C.M.P. is highly specialized. While at times they are used as highway patrols or something like that, that is only a small part of their work. They have to be schooled and as they are in the service they have to become highly specialized in their work. Their work is comparable with that of many of the professions, and that is why I believe this matter of pay should be taken into consideration.

Before I take my seat there is one more question I should like to ask the minister. Does the R.C.M.P. carry out secret service work, or is there a secret service or intelligence branch in Canada? Perhaps I had better put it this way. There is such a thing as military service. Is that a separate branch from the R.C.M.P., or is there such a branch? Is the R.C.M.P. the branch of government service that takes care of intelligence work throughout the country? If that is so, then their work becomes highly specialized.

I am interested in this for more reasons than one, which I think can readily be guessed. There are more dangers in this country than most of us realize. When we think of espionage and sabotage we think in terms of blowing up a public building, a factory, a ship or something like that, but there are more than buildings and factories that can be sabotaged. The thinking and the minds of the Canadian people can be sabotaged. That is a branch of intelligence which seldom comes into the picture, but it is an important one, because what is happening today in Canada and what has happened in the past is conditioning our own people to receive that which is absolutely foreign to our concept of democratic citizenship.

I think I have said a lot in these last few sentences. There are just the two questions I have asked the minister. First, will he put on Hansard the scale of pay and, second, will he state whether there is any other body in the country doing intelligence work? Perhaps that last question should be answered privately, because I have no desire to embarrass the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the consent of the committee I would place on Hansard these rates of pay and allowances.

Mr. COCKERAM: Those are the new rates?

Mr. ILSLEY: The new rates.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But not perquisites?

Mr. ILSLEY: In addition, the members of the force are found, so to speak. They get their food and uniform and boots and they receive medical, dental and hospital care. They are pensioned for disability if disabled in the course of duty and they are under a pension scheme to which the government makes a large contribution. These things are all in addition to the rates of pay and allowances.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I merely thought they should all be shown together.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would feel better about it if that were done. What happens is that someone looks at this and sees that a constable receives $3.50 a day, and he thinks that is not very much.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is what I was talking about.

Mr. ILSLEY: A third-class constable receives $3.50 a day or $5.90 if married, but that is just the beginning because there are these other things as well.

Mr. BENTLEY: Are all the items on that list?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I had better wait and put the whole thing on together.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think it would be better.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): A man in a detachment has his house.

Mr. COCKERAM: Have the Arctic allowances been increased?

Mr. ILSLEY: Living allowance was increased fifteen cents a day and the pay was increased seventy-five cents a day. The matter was considered for some time, and there was a feeling, on the part of some in the government service for whose opinion I have great respect, that to have the pay compare with that paid in other comparable forces it should be increased sixty cents a day with a 25-cent increase in the allowance, or a total of eighty-five cents. It was finally decided to give an increase of seventy-five cents a day in the pay and an increase of fifteen cents a day in the allowance, which is a little better. In fact it is much better for the kind of people we want to recruit.

Mr. COCKERAM: I had in mind the Arctic regions, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories where the cost of living is so much greater than in other places. Has that been taken into consideration?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are special living allowances for those regions where the cost of living is high.

Mr. BENTLEY: Could the minister give some indication what part of the allowance is deductible for income tax purposes and what part is tax free?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall try to get that information. I had better not put this list on the record this afternoon. There will be sections in this long act under which it will be in order to put it on the record. I shall try to get a complete statement as well as the income tax information.

Mr. HANSELL: We want a true picture, so that we may as well leave it to the minister to decide when to put it on. Will the minister answer my other question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Was the question as to whether this is the only intelligence branch in the public service?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The armed forces have their intelligence branches.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps I had better talk to the minister privately about this, because it is a delicate matter.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there an allowance for those on plainclothes duty?

Mr. ILSLEY: Fifty cents a day.

Mr. LENNARD: Is that a clothing allowance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: I rather hesitate to comment. The men that I know are of a very high type. I doubt very much whether fifty cents a day as a clothing allowance is enough when one considers the work they have to do and the different circles in which they have to move. I doubt very much whether it is adequate to permit them to do the job they are supposed to do.

Mr. PROBE: I do not want to delay too long the passage of this section, but the amendment deals with members of the force and states:

"(c) 'member of the force' or 'member' includes the commissioner and every other officer, non-commissioned officer and man or woman of the force."

As a matter of statistical interest, can the minister indicate how many women are in the R.C.M.P. and whether they are on the same pay classification as other members of the force, whether their duties correspond with those of other members and whether they are subject to the same discipline and promotion?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no regular women members of the force at all at the present time. There are some women who are special constables, but none who are constables, non-commissioned officers or officers. This makes provision for adding them some time in the future, but I may say there are no definite plans for adding them either.

Mr. MASSEY: I wish to make a few remarks in regard to my high opinion of the force as a result of my contact with it during the years in various ways and the magnificent work done. I should like to associate my voice with those who have uttered panegyrics when discussing this legislation.

My chief purpose in rising now is to ask the minister a question. I refer to a particular case and the decision made in that case, namely, an officer or constable of the R.C.M.P. who served the forces well and faithfully for many years prior to the war. He asked for his release from the R.C.M.P. in order to become a D.A.P.M. with the R.C.A.F. He was released from the service of the R.C.M.P. in order to join the R.C.A.F. He was one of the first of the D.A.P.M's. I personally saw him at work, and for the time that he was with me he did a perfectly magnificent job of a highly specialized nature. He continued to do his good work; he was promoted consistently until he attained the rank of wing commander, which was a very high rank, as the minister knows, for a D.A.P.M. During the course of his duty he had to report to Newfoundland, and during a trip there he was torpedoed and suffered a severe illness consequent upon the exposure. However, he ultimately returned to duty where he remained until the end of the war, and then he endeavoured to rejoin the R.C.M.P. At that time he was told he was over-age and could no longer be a constable in the R.C.M.P. He had retired from the R.C.A.F. because his services were no longer required. He had been released from the R.C.M.P. and could not rejoin them because he was over-age. He now finds himself with only a very small pension from the R.C.A.F. and with no pension whatsoever from the R.C.M.P. and no hope of getting any.

It would seem to me that the position of that man is most incongruous. He did not leave the R.C.M.P. to take up some civilian employment or to get a better job or really to change his duties. He virtually changed his uniform. The service in the R.C.M.P. is the service of his country; the service in the R.C.A.F. is the service of his country. Just because he wears a different uniform for six years he loses the benefits of a pension, and that man today, living in British Columbia as he does, is endeavouring to eke out an existence and not too successfully. It appears on the surface that if what has been done is within the four corners of the act in regard to pension, then the act is definitely at fault.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the man not on pension from the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. MASSEY: No, he is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: What were the circumstances of the separation from the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. MASSEY: He asked to be released from the R.C.M.P. in order to join the R.C.A.F.

Mr. ILSLEY: How long had he been in the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. MASSEY: I have not the file before me, but it was a matter of many years. I would say fifteen years or more, perhaps twenty. He was highly thought of. I do not hesitate to give the minister the man's name. His name is Hammond. I think the commissioner knows something of the case. I bring it up at this time not merely to draw the minister's attention to that particular case; but if what has been done is unquestionably within the four corners of the act as it now exists I suggest that the act is definitely at fault, and when we are making a revision of the act a case of that sort should be considered and the act amended so that such an injustice should not arise. That is my purpose in bringing the matter to the minister's attention now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that Hammond is a pensioner of the R.C.M.P., went on pension and enlisted in the R.C.A.F., and his services in the forces do not count for pension in the R.C.M.P. in those circumstances.

Mr. MASSEY: As I understand the case, the man in question was on active service in the R.C.M.P. at the time he enlisted in the R.C.A.F. He was released from the R.C.M.P. in order to join the R.C.A.F.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will find out about the case. I think I have some correspondence on it. What the hon. gentleman says is so. If a person withdraws from the R.C.M.P. and then enlists in the armed forces he cannot be regarded as a member of the R.C.M.P. for pension purposes.

Mr. MASSEY: But my point is this. It is true he terminated his service temporarily, he hoped, in these circumstances, with the R.C.M.P. in order to serve with the R.C.A.F. The minister must realize that at the start of the war the P.M. services, whether with the R.C.A.F. or with the army or navy, were very much limited. They required experienced men. It was a little tough at the start of the war to enforce discipline and provost marshals were required. Naturally one would seek provost marshals from the sources where he could get the best men.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute. This man could not have been in the provost corps, or what the hon. member is saying would not apply at all.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, he was, ipso facto.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the provost corps?

Mr. MASSEY: Certainly, with my staff.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the provost corps?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: He had separated himself from the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. MASSEY: I tried to make it clear that he asked for release from the R.C.M.P. in order to join the R.C.A.F.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look into the case. At the beginning of the war in 1939 the force was circularized and asked not to enlist for active service except in a particular way. Some of the men disregarded these instructions and did enlist. This man was one of them. The mystery to me is, how did he get out to join the provost corps?

Mr. PROBE: No. 1 provost corps.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was encouraged. The provost corps was organized from the force. Why did he leave the force?

Mr. MASSEY: I am going back to the start of the war in 1939 when the air force was 3,000 all ranks and nobody had ever heard of a provost marshal in it. Suddenly they found themselves enlisting thousands of young lads, and certainly there was some provost corps necessary in the R.C.A.F. from early on. The minister well knows the difficulties which were faced at that time. Experienced men were required. Police constables were not good enough. Some R.C.M.P. constables came into the service at that time. Hammond was one, and he was commissioned. When I first knew him he was a flying officer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why did he leave the R.C.M.P.? If he had not left the R.C.M.P. he would not be in any trouble today.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the man was far more interested in serving his country than in getting a pension. That is the plain answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, it is, ipso facto. He left the force in order to join the R.C.A.F.

Mr. ILSLEY: They were encouraged to join the provost corps as members of the R.C.M.P. Why did he separate himself from the R.C.M.P. to join?

Mr. MASSEY: Because provost corps was army. I am talking about the R.C.A.F. This man came into the R.C.A.F. and not the provost corps.

Mr. ILSLEY: This was not covered by the authorization given to members of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. MASSEY: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: This man, then, acted in a manner contrary to the circularization of the members of the R.C.M.P. at the beginning of the war.

Mr. MASSEY: If you want to put it that way. The man did an excellent job of work, a most useful job. I could detain this committee for an hour reciting his qualifications and commenting on the work he did while I was adjutant at Trenton. He did a magnificent job in cleaning up a serious situation in Trenton, so much so that he was moved to Halifax, where he did an equally outstanding job, and from there he was sent to Newfoundland. That was when the torpedo business happened. He was used for special work because he had had training with the R.C.M.P. and was the sort of man we needed in the air force for our purposes. We got him there and now he is penalized.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Definitions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to have this section carried too, but an amendment is required to section 91. Section 10 is a very long one running over a great many pages. Perhaps it might stand. Does the committee wish to take the various parts of the section one by one?

Mr. KNOWLES: What part does the minister propose to amend?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment to the part I propose to amend has not yet been drafted. It is necessitated by a last-moment emergency. It will be found on page 5 of the bill in (j).

Mr. KNOWLES: Why not let 91 stand?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps that might stand and we could carry the rest of it.

Mr. PROBE: Before the rest of it is passed, I would call the minister's attention to subsection 3 on page 7 of the bill, which comes under section 94. Subsection 3 reads:

> A contribution made under this section or under subsection 2 of section 93 may be made in one sum or by instalments of equivalent value payable by reservation from pay and allowances or otherwise, for life, or for a period of years or for life whichever is the shorter—

And so on. I made reference earlier to a case that has necessitated some correspondence, in which a sergeant-major of the R.C.M.P. had retired some twelve or thirteen years ago, at which time it was calculated for him that, in order to keep certain superannuation benefits active, he could pay in cash at that time, in 1935, the sum of $2,859.28, or elect to pay for life the sum of $219 a year. He elected the latter, and he states that by last year he had contributed the sum of $2,609.75, leaving a balance of $249 still due on the full amount. In the intervening years he had made practically the full payment except for a few dollars remaining unpaid at the present time. He made monthly payments of $18.25 on account of prior service contribution to the widows' pension fund for the rest of his life. That was the option he chose. In view of the fact that he has made approximately the full payment demanded of him, what is the justice in continuing this monthly payment of $18.25 for the rest of his life for the purpose of enabling his widow to benefit?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe I have seen something about that case in my own correspondence. I should like to have the name so that I may look into it, but I will give the hon. gentleman my surmise of the explanation. This contributor apparently elected to pay for his full life.

Mr. PROBE: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: He must have had a life expectancy which he has exceeded.

Mr. PROBE: I see the insurance angle.

Mr. ILSLEY: If he had not reached the life expectancy the fund would have received only half the amount paid in. There must be cases where more than the original amount is paid in; otherwise the fund would not be receiving enough money.

Mr. PROBE: As a matter of fact, the man who was pensioned off twelve or fifteen years ago on the old rates of pay is penalized to some extent, the minister must admit, with respect to his pension expectancy as compared with those who are now in process of being pensioned off at more attractive rates of pay. On that basis could not some consideration be given cases such as this? I see the minister's point all right. There was authorized a commutation of $2,800 in lieu of life expectancy of so many years, or alternatively he could pay $18.25 a month. He has made that payment. The interest has been four per cent. The fund has benefited by these payments and he is not receiving any increased pension because, as the minister said a few moments ago, no consideration is being given to increasing the pension. Would the minister consider increasing some of these pensions that were based on lower rates of pay while in service? I may say that this is the case of Sergeant-Major Hannah.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot hold out any hope that we shall disturb the old scheme. It would upset everything if we did. That pensioner, like others, received free pension for himself to which he made no contribution whatever. It was non-contributory. He purchased a pension. He went into the fund under which his dependents would be pensioned according to a certain plan. The fund cannot begin waiving payments. The process would be endless.

Mr. PROBE: What I am asking the minister to do here is precisely what we are doing in the case of military pensions which were granted at a certain rate following the first world war. I think the principle has been soundly established in this case, even though it is not covered by the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not doing it for civil service pensioners, for people who were under a pension scheme. Disability pensions are entirely different. What about annuitants or anyone else?

Mr. PROBE: I would not argue about commercial annuities.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 10 carry with the exception of 91 (j)?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Section with reservation agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is something else which I might as well explain now. It is at the very end. It is in section 110 on page 15 of the bill. I am sorry to have to explain this because it is difficult to explain. These sections in part VI, dealing with injury or death on service, provide for the application of the pension scale in the Pension Act to members of the R.C.M.P. who suffer disability or die. In order to apply the provisions of the Pension Act, which provide pensions at varying rates for various ranks, we must state in some way or another, directly or indirectly, what ranks correspond to the ranks in the R.C.M.P. For certain reasons it is undesirable to name the ranks. So it is proposed to say this:

(3) For the purposes of the application of schedules "A" and "B" of the Pension Act under this section, the ranks in the force set out in the following table shall be deemed to correspond to the military ranks in respect of which the rates of pension set out in the attached table are applicable.

One of those figures is $840, which is not yet settled as being the disability pension for certain ranks in the armed forces. We must therefore tie to something that is settled. So I propose an amendment which will make this subsection read differently and which will cross out the words "are applicable" and will substitute the words "were applicable on the thirtieth day of September, 1947." Then the figures that will be inserted here will be the figures that were applicable on the thirtieth day of September, 1947, which is the day before the new rates of pensions will become applicable. That does not mean at all that these figures on page 16 will be the rates at which the R.C.M.P. are pensionable. It means that they will be pensionable at the rates applicable to the ranks to which these figures were applicable on the thirtieth day of September, 1947.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reference is to the disability pension act?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Pension Act, which relates to disability pensions in the army. I have explained the situation. I think the best way is to let this stand. We can pass everything, with the exception of 91(j) that we have already mentioned and of this subsection 3 of section 110 of the act. Then I shall bring in a properly written amendment. We can pass everything but that. The rest of the act is all right as far as I know.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is that agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Progress reported.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

PRESERVATION OF GAME—APPELLATE JURISDICTION FROM STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: I do not want to delay the passing of this simple bill, Mr. Speaker, but I think I should make a brief statement. Supplementing the information given in the explanatory notes, I may say that even before the transfer of the natural resources to the western provinces in 1930 the provincial governments administered the game and fur regulations. Similarly, the Yukon territorial government deals with these matters by territorial ordinances. It is desired to place the Northwest Territories council in exactly the same position so that the administration of these particular resources which are of such intimate concern to the local people should be subject to control and administration by the Northwest Territories council. This will enable necessary changes in policy to be made effective promptly to meet the changes which often occur suddenly owing to climatic conditions or forest fires. Already the Northwest Territories council has been authorized to fix and does fix the royalties which must be paid by those exporting fur from the territories.

The other feature of this legislation is the provision which will enable appeals from the judgment of stipendiary magistrates in civil matters. In criminal matters there is already a right to appeal to a provincial court, as set out in the criminal code. The reason why this amendment only provides the right to appeal to the Alberta courts is that the only stipendiary magistrates are in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories, which is directly north of Alberta.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Appellate jurisdiction from stipendiary magistrate.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I wish simply to point out to the minister who is in charge of the bill and to the committee that the wording of the section which provides that appeal from stipendiary magistrates in the Northwest Territories, which territories include the district of Mackenzie, is to the appellate division of the supreme court of Alberta, which is quite appropriate. This emphasizes what I have repeatedly pointed out to the minister, to the government and to the house, namely the impropriety of having added the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories to Yukon as an electoral district. Appeals from all parts of Yukon go, not to the appellate court of Alberta but to the appellate court of British Columbia, because in fact practically all the business and all the communications of the Northwest Territories go to British Columbia on the west coast of Canada.

At this session of parliament I hope the minister and his government will see their way clear to undo the wrong that has been done to the people of the Mackenzie district and of the Yukon in uniting them as an electoral district. Because of the importance of the Mackenzie district, I believe the people of Mackenzie are entitled to a member in this house, just as the territory of Yukon has had a member for many years. It has never had a population which would entitle it to a member, but because of its importance as a producer of wealth in this dominion it has been given that privilege. The Mackenzie district is in exactly the same position, and the government should follow the same course in connection with Mackenzie that has been followed in connection with Yukon.

Mr. GRAYDON: As one coming from another part of Canada than that which the hon. member who has just spoken comes from, I wish to add a word in support of what he has said with respect to the joining of these two very large areas in one electoral district. This is a matter which normally would arise in another debate, but I hope the chairman and the committee will bear with me, because I am not going to take much time now.

It seems to me that the situation in Yukon has been accepted and recognized for many years, and as far as I know there has never been any desire on the part of residents of the Yukon to make any change There we have a small population, but there are special problems in the Yukon which I think call for a member of parliament who is particularly conversant with the situation there. We in central Canada have no conception of the problems that arise, as a result of the distances which must be covered in that constituency, in connection with electoral representation in the House of Commons.

So it is in the case of Mackenzie, which seems likely to become an important and more thickly populated part of this country. It seems to me that they need a member of their own to assist in the development of that district. The situation in connection with representation there is far different from the situation with respect to other great sections of our population which perhaps have a greater past than future, though this may not apply to many districts in Canada. Nevertheless it seems to me that legislation of this kind, and similar matters which may arise from time to time in future, urgently demand the presence in this house of a member representing that district, in order to guide, promote and advance the development that is sure to take place in the Northwest Territories.

It is really a scandal that this house should have added the Northwest Territories to Yukon, when each district has special problems which are difficult enough to handle as it is, without trying to throw the problems of both districts into the lap of one man. I appreciate the privilege you have given me, Mr. Chairman, of saying these few words. I know my remarks have been out of order, but I do not apologize for having made them because I believe this matter goes to the very root of the development of the Northwest Territories. We believe that Yukon is entitled to a member, and certainly the Mackenzie district is equally entitled to a member. It seems to me that these arguments are unassailable, and I should like to see the suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon carried out. After all, what we did last session can be changed if we find what we did was wrong, and I believe that the government should consider what I believe is the almost unanimous opinion of this house that each of these districts, in which all the people of Canada are interested, should have a member. It is for these reasons that I, coming from central Canada, have risen to support the hon. member for Yukon, who I think has an unassailable argument in his favour.

DOMINION WATER POWER ACT

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF UNDERTAKINGS UPON LANDS OF THE DOMINION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Dominion Water Power Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I should make a brief statement at this time. Early in 1946 it was decided to expedite the economic development of the Northwest Territories, including the expansion of the mining industry, by the development of a hydro electric development in the Snare river drainage basin, by the crown, for the supply of power to the Yellowknife district where a demand for mining purposes already existed.

On February 15, 1946, an order in council, P.C. 507, was passed upon the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources concurred in by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply under the authority of the Dominion Water Power Act, R.S.C., 1927, chapter 210, approving the construction in the name of His Majesty of the Snare river power development. The order also authorized the making of arrangements for the construction of a transmission line from the development to the Giant Yellowknife gold mines property, where an immediate market for power already existed.

Subsequently the deputy minister of justice expressed the opinion that, while the Dominion Water Power Act appeared to contemplate that such projects would be constructed on behalf of the crown, the act did not in express terms authorize such construction. In other words, his opinion was that the act did not provide the necessary authority for the order in council.

The development was proceeded with under authority of the wording of a vote approved by parliament for the project in the supplementary estimates for 1946-47, vote 775; and the wording of a vote approved by parliament for the project in the main estimates for 1947-48, vote 165. Similar authority is asked in the wording of the vote submitted to parliament in the main estimates for 1948-49, vote 210. It was felt, however, that in view of the opinion of the deputy minister of justice the Dominion Water Power Act should be amended to remove all doubt as to the power of the governor in council to authorize the construction of power developments on behalf of the crown, if such construction were considered desirable.

Section 12 of the Dominion Water Power Act sets forth the various matters with which the governor in council may deal and the purpose of the bill is to insert after paragraph (o) of the original act a new provision:

(p) for the construction, maintenance and operation by the minister of any undertaking upon lands of the dominion; and"

The amendments provided by paragraphs (o) and (q) are of a minor nature only and do not in any way change the sense of paragraphs (o) and (p) of the original act which they replace.

This bill, which has been prepared by the deputy minister of justice, on enactment will provide authority for the construction of power developments on lands of the dominion on behalf of the crown.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do we understand that this merely has the effect of confirming what has already been done by the government in connection with these power developments?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it clear that, so far as the future is concerned, the reference to lands of the dominion—and if the hon. member's bill is passed that will mean lands of Canada—refers only to lands in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. MacKINNON: This refers only to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. KNOWLES: The passing of this legislation has no bearing upon the ownership by the crown of the power plants referred to in the minister's statement. This will not alienate that ownership?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask only one or two questions. All hon. members deeply regret that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) is laid aside for a day or two; and perhaps we also realize that the minister who is conducting the bill through the house may not have full knowledge of the situation.

I know the Minister of Mines and Resources himself visited Yellowknife, and that visit was favourably reported in the news of the north. It was pointed out that he had given encouragement to this struggling community on one of the farthermost frontiers of Canada. I am not sure whether the minister conducting the bill through the house has been out there.

Mr. MacKINNON: At various times.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In Yellowknife?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes, at Yellowknife.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am happy to know that. It so happens that a cousin of mine operates the local newspaper, and every two or three weeks I receive the news from the north. I had not noted the minister's visit, or that he was so well versed in knowledge of that country.

May I first sound a note of encouragement with respect to the magnitude of the work going on in that frontier section? It is pleasing to note that this work is gripping the imagination of those who have funds to invest; it is calling forth the Canadian pioneer spirit, so that we may develop our frontiers more and more.

I am wondering if this bill is necessitated so as to give further help to the two large mining developments out there. I have been trying to remember their names but, since the minister has been there, he will know them. No doubt he was well entertained while he was there. Would the minister give the committee an idea of the value of this development to the mining interests which are at present making such a success of their development of one of Canada's natural resources.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have been personally acquainted with this field from the time I first went into Yellowknife, when it was only a prospect taken up by the first prospectors. I have been there several times since then but, unfortunately, not in the last couple of years. From my residence in Edmonton, however, I am in close touch with developments in that territory.

The power development is for the use of the town of Yellowknife, and more particularly for the use of the three important mines there, the Giant Yellowknife, the Con and the Negus.

This development will be sufficient to take care of what we believe will be a great centre in the mining development of Canada.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): While I am on my feet may I make one further observation. In the pioneer stage of this development, one which might be of great importance in days to come, I believe all departments of government should encourage these pioneers. I am thinking particularly of the individual men and women who go out to pioneer in that remote part of Canada. They should be encouraged in every possible way to stick to their jobs, so that, in due course, if the development turns out to be really worthwhile it may add greatly to the assets of the country.

In this connection I am thinking particularly of radio development, so that these folk, numbering around 2,000—

Mr. MacKINNON: About 3,000, I think.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In order that these 3,000 individuals may be part and parcel of the enterprise with which they are connected, the department in charge of radio should see that these citizens have every advantage in the matter of radio coverage, so that they may keep in touch with the outside world.

Then, the social services with which we are blessed in the more thickly populated areas should be extended to them in the full, bearing in mind the hardships they undergo during the winter months when temperatures drop below 40 degrees below zero. Yet, despite these conditions, these people carry on, and they should be given every possible encouragement.

I understand that this amendment to the Dominion Water Power Act is just a matter of straightening out the present legislation.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is right.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It has nothing to do with further development. Nevertheless those of us who live in parts of Canada which do not require so much of the pioneer spirit should lean backwards in our support of those who are out on the frontier.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

CONSOLIDATION OF PARK DESCRIPTIONS—REGULATIONS EFFECTIVE WHEN PUBLISHED IN "CANADA GAZETTE"

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 209 (from the senate) to amend the National Parks Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement of further explanation in connection with this bill. There is little I can add to the explanation printed in the bill. However I would emphasize that the chief purpose of the bill is to consolidate the descriptions of the national parks of Canada, because this is very desirable from an administration viewpoint and for the convenience of those who desire the information. These changes were not included in the 1947 amendment of the National Parks Act, since the department was then completing arrangements with New Brunswick for a national park in that province and it was desired that the list of parks be complete.

The National Parks Act of 1930 cancelled three parks and confirmed the remainder as they then existed, with the exception of five, for which detailed descriptions were provided in the act.

All parks established prior to 1930 were set aside by order in council under the old Forest Reserves and Parks Act. There have been many changes in these parks since the first ones were established in 1911. Since the passing of the National Parks Act in 1930, three parks have been cancelled by legislation, namely, Wawaskey, Buffalo and Nemiskam.

A few changes have been made in the boundaries of some of the other parks. The Cape Breton Highlands national park and Prince Edward Island national park were established under provisions of the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act of 1936 as amended. Some changes were made later in the boundaries of these parks.

The New Brunswick national park was established pursuant to the provisions of the National Parks Act of 1937, which made special provision for the establishment of this park.

It is considered that there will be few further changes, if any, in the present boundaries, and it is very desirable in the administration of these areas to have a complete description of each park duly authorized by statute. No doubt many hon. members have noticed that during the past year orders in council on a great many subjects have been consolidated and brought up to date. This has involved a great deal of labour, but it is hoped that the consolidation, now available as a result of this work, will be of great assistance and save much research.

The same idea is carried out in the bill now before the house. In other words, it will only be necessary to refer to the National Parks Act as now amended to get a complete list of the parks.

The second section brings the practice for gazetting regulations under the National Parks Act in line with prevailing practice. Section 3 sets up the new schedule. Section 4 provides for the repeal of the special acts no longer necessary as a result of this consolidation.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say just a few words with reference to national parks. I think it is a splendid idea to determine definitely the boundaries of these national parks. I am also pleased that we are to have a national park in New Brunswick. I believe the idea was first mooted in 1936, but inspections had been made even prior to that. The people of our province were disappointed that a park was not established at the same time as the parks in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. I think all the sites should have been chosen at the same time, because New Brunswick has lost considerable tourist revenue in the years from 1936 to 1948. Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia had no difficulty in choosing their park sites and the parks were developed shortly after the sites had been chosen.

Anyone who has visited the Cape Breton national park knows they have one of the finest parks in Canada. The national park in Prince Edward Island is small, but it is beautiful and is attracting a great many tourists from the United States and other parts of Canada.

Four or five sites in New Brunswick were inspected. There is a feeling, which I think is justified, in certain sections of the province that the best site was not chosen. I also understand that the site chosen was not the one recommended to the department. I realize that the minister who is now doing the work of this department is new to the department, but if he will go back in the records I think he will find that the present site was the second choice, not the first.

I do not want to condemn this site even though it was the second choice. It is in the county of Albert and the park takes in part of the bay of Fundy and some fine hills and lakes. The site which was the first choice was on the Saint John river. I should like to say to hon. members who have not visited that river that we consider that historically and geographically it is one of the finest rivers, not only in Canada but in the world. I am not so sure about the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), but I do know that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), who has lived on the Saint John, will bear out that statement. It has been called the Rhine of America.

Since we have no park on the Saint John river and since the precedent has been well established of having two or three parks in a province, I think the department should consider establishing a park on the Saint John river. As I say, I have no objection to the park that has been established in Albert county, but I think we should have a park on the Saint John river.

On motion of Mr. Brooks the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacKINNON: The business for tomorrow will be the estimates of external affairs.

HONG KONG

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. DREW AS REPORTED IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege touching a matter in which the veracity of Sir Lyman Poore Duff, the former Chief Justice of Canada, and myself as Prime Minister of Canada, was called into question, I wish to draw the attention of the house to certain statements to which I am now in a position to give an answer which I hope will be accepted by the house without question.

The statements to which I take exception are the following, which refer to certain messages furnished by the government of the United Kingdom to the chief justice, as commissioner in the Hong Kong inquiry. Mr. George Drew is quoted in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of March 1, 1948, as follows:

> Having regard to the messages which were placed before him, the finding of the commissioner is utterly incomprehensible . . . The impression is conveyed that the British government did not communicate any warning to the government of Canada. That is not so . . .

On March 2, 1948, as reported in Hansard at page 1771, on a question of privilege I spoke as follows:

> In my opinion, such information as the Canadian government received, at the time, from the British authorities is in complete accord with the finding of the commissioner, Chief Justice Duff, in his report, namely, that "the best informed opinion available to the Canadian authorities was that hostilities would not arise in the near future."

In the Globe and Mail of March 3, 1948, Mr. George Drew is reported as follows:

> Mr. King is simply piling falsehood on falsehood. The dispatches to which he refers left no doubt of the threat of war . . . That was the interpretation placed upon them by Major Power . . .

The house already has Major Power's statement, in which he said in this house that he did not state he believed war was imminent, that in fact he said in answer to a direct question that he thought war with Japan was not imminent.

However, as hon. members know, it was suggested that the British government should be appealed to direct, and asked the question if, since they were unwilling to have the dispatches made public, they would not give a definite indication as to the accuracy or the reverse of statements concerning their contents.

I rather hesitated to make any request of the British government in the matter. I felt that my word as Prime Minister of Canada would be accepted by this house and by the people of Canada. However, since there was always a possibility that the matter would be raised in the future and that there might be a doubt, I did eventually communicate with the Prime Minister of Great Britain in regard to the dispatches, and I have since received a reply from Mr. Attlee.

These communications were exchanged some little time ago; I did not bring them to the attention of the house at the time for the reason that the house had referred to the committee on printing the question of the advisability of printing the evidence in the Hong Kong inquiry. I felt that if I made public the communications before the committee had had its meeting, it might be considered that I was seeking to influence in some way the action which the committee should take. The committee's report was made to the house yesterday and I am now taking this immediate opportunity to place on Hansard the communications which passed between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and myself.

The following is the text of the telegram sent en clair by myself as the Prime Minister of Canada to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on April 13, 1948:

> As you are aware there has been considerable discussion recently in the Canadian parliament on the question of publication of five telegrams exchanged between the United Kingdom and Canadian governments in 1941 with regard to the far eastern situation at or about the time of the dispatch of Canadian troops to Hong Kong which telegrams the United Kingdom authorities are unwilling to have published. On the 2nd March of the present year I referred in the House of Commons to a press report in which it was in effect alleged that one of these telegrams received after the government of Japan changed on the 16th October, 1941, and before the expedition sailed on the 27th October was in the nature of the most complete warning of the probability of early hostilities. I said that not only was such a statement not correct, but that the fact was that before and after the expedition sailed, and indeed until the very eve of the Japanese attack, such information as I received from the British authorities was to the effect that an early attack on Hong Kong was not anticipated.

As the accuracy of my statement has been challenged, I should be grateful for your opinion, which I might be free to communicate to our parliament, whether the information contained in any of the telegrams, which the United Kingdom authorities communicated to the Canadian commissioner in the Hong Kong inquiry, on the condition that they would not be made public, is in any way at variance with my statement, and, in particular, my denial of the statement that after the government of Japan changed on the 16th October, 1941, and before the expedition sailed for Hong Kong on the 27th October, I received messages from the United Kingdom in the nature of a complete warning of the probability of early hostilities. What is obviously meant by early hostilities is hostile action by Japan directed against the United Kingdom, or, for that matter, against the United States.

The following is the text of the telegram from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to myself as Prime Minister of Canada. It is dated London, April 19, 1948:

I have carefully examined the telegrams with regard to the international situation in the far east which were shown to the commissioner in the Hong Kong inquiry. I understand that the question which has been raised in Canada is whether these telegrams or any one of them gave warning that early hostile action by Japan against the United Kingdom or the United States was expected after the change of government in Japan on the 16th October, 1941, and before the Canadian expedition sailed for Hong Kong on the 27th October, 1941. As the Canadian government have been informed, and as has been stated in parliament here, the United Kingdom government regret that for reasons which have been made clear they feel unable to agree to the publication of these telegrams. I can, however, confirm that any such suggestion as has been mentioned is entirely contrary to the facts, and that none of the telegrams contained any warning that action by Japan of the kind was expected.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, a question on the point of privilege he has raised? Does this mean that the government of Great Britain and the government of Canada have agreed that these telegrams will now be made available to the public?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The telegrams mean exactly what they say, nothing more and nothing less.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has any additional copies of the communication from Mr. Attlee, and his own communication, which he has read to the house?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both will appear in Hansard. I have, however, my own copies here which I can send to my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason I ask for these copies is that from time to time the house has been allowed to have little rays of light on this whole matter, and I fancy this only confuses the issue more than ever.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend will now have the full light of day.

[Later:]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that a careful reading of this letter more than ever demands, as far as the public of Canada and this parliament are concerned, that these telegrams be published.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GRAYDON: This only confuses the issue. It is not an answer at all.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORT ON SALARY INCREASES AND ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay on the table of the house the report on salary increases and establishment of the House of Commons.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): There is a point of information I feel the house would like to have. I shall not break the rule by asking Your Honour a question, but perhaps with your permission I may direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Is the document that Mr. Speaker laid on the table today in connection with the House of Commons employees in the nature of a final act, or does it involve legislation being put through the house?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I am sorry, but I am afraid I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister not a member of the internal economy commission?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance, who is a member of the internal economy commission? I did not quite see the need for the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Perhaps the minister would give further consideration to the matter, because it seems to me this is one which concerns the House of Commons itself, and it could not be in the nature of a final act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps it is a question which Mr. Speaker could answer. My understanding is that the internal economy commission, of which I am a member and of which Mr. Speaker is chairman, deals with matters affecting the House of Commons and determines the establishment setting out the positions to be filled. The appointments made to those positions, whether permanent or temporary, come under the civil service commission.

I am not quite clear as to the nature of the document laid on the table, but I believe it has to be implemented by resolution of the house. However, I am not an expert in procedure, and perhaps Mr. Speaker could enlighten the house in the matter.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Will the veterans preference apply in those appointments?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed the same rules apply in connection with the House of Commons as apply in other branches of the civil service.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR THIS SITTING TO ALLOW DEBATE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think it is understood, Mr. Speaker, that this afternoon the house will proceed with the debate on external affairs. In other years, as I recall it, the debate opened with His Honour the Speaker in the chair in order to permit of a more orderly presentation at the earliest stage. Today being Thursday, the position is, of course, that under the rules His Honour the Speaker leaves the chair without the question being put. If the house desires that the debate this year proceed along the same line as in former years, it would be necessary to have a motion that would direct that His Honour the Speaker should not leave the chair, notwithstanding the rule which governs.

Let me make it quite clear to hon. members that as no announcement has been made to the effect that the Speaker would be in the chair, or that the house might so wish, if there is any feeling to the contrary the debate can proceed at once with the house in committee. I believe, however, we should make better headway in the end, and have a more effective presentation of all sides of external affairs problems, were the debate to be opened in the manner I have described. If later hon. members wish to have the house go into committee to take up questions individually, this might be so arranged. I understand the intention is that once the debate is over and the committee discussion begins, the estimates will be referred to the committee on external affairs for further consideration before they come back to the house. Before putting any motion, however, I should like to hear what hon. members have to say.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, there is a good deal to commend the Prime Minister's suggestion of having a full dress debate on external affairs with the Speaker in the chair. I believe that is what was asked for and what the house expected. What the Prime Minister has said makes it much easier for us to agree to his suggestion. He said that if at the end of the discussion hon. members desire to ask questions, they will have an opportunity which would not be available in a full dress debate and which will be available if we then go to the committee stage. On that understanding I think we ought to accept the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I agree, Mr. Speaker, that it will make for more orderly debate if hon. members may speak without interruption, the usual rules prevailing. As the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said, I believe it would meet the situation if, at the conclusion of the speeches, should questions need to be asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), they may be asked then. I think that is the best way in which to conduct the debate.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that we can have a much more dignified full dress debate if the Speaker remains in the chair, and questions can be asked in committee of the whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the provision of standing order 28 relative to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair without question put be suspended for the present sitting of the house in order to allow debate on external affairs.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LENNARD—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON APRIL 28

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Question No. 4 on yesterday's order paper, which stood in my name and was answered yesterday, was not answered correctly. The question was:

Of the twenty national housing conversions effected in the Hamilton, Ontario, district, what items were salvaged in each conversion and what were the estimated values of same?

The answer started out with the statement that "when the administration of the twenty conversion projects was turned over to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on January 1, 1946, the following items of salvage were in storage for disposal." My question asked for a list of items that were salvaged and the value of same from each conversion, not as of January 1, 1946.

I also wish to point out that only eleven of the twenty projects were listed. I know this is not complete, because I have a letter from Mr. Murchison, general supervisor, real estate division, dated March 16, 1948, giving me the value of salvage on a project not listed in the answer of yesterday. I would ask that my question be returned to the order paper until it is completed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SECURITIES INVESTMENT FUND—PURCHASE OF DOMINION BONDS

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario):

1. In sessional paper No. 29 D dated March 23, 1948, in answer to a question asked by myself, the Department of Finance indicated that the securities investment fund from August, 1947, to January, 1948, inclusive, had purchased a net amount of approximately $300,000,000 of Dominion of Canada bonds; under what authority is this fund set up?
2. How much does it amount to?
3. How is it invested?
4. Were the bond purchases made by the various government departments set out in this return made independently of each other, or were they made in conjunction with, or under the supervision of, the Department of Finance?

Mr. BELZILE:

1. The securities investment account was set up and is maintained under the authority of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act and the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931.

2 and 3. $650,779,500 par value of securities of Canada.

4. The purchases of securities by the various government departments were made independently of the Department of Finance. However, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Canadian Wheat Board Act provide for the creation of investment committees. A representative of the Department of Finance is a member of these two investment committees.

COMBINES INVESTIGATIONS—DENTAL COMPANIES—COUNSEL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the estimated total cost incurred by the combines investigation department and the Department of Justice in connection with the investigation of the various dental companies against whom prosecutions have recently terminated, giving a break down and particulars thereof?
2. Who were the legal counsel at the trial?
3. How much was paid or agreed to be paid to each of said counsel per diem as fees and living or other expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The total cost of the investigation was $8,252.92, with details as follows:

Legal fees and expenses	$3,516 01
Reporting services and expenses	1,805 00
Travelling expenses	1,126 55
Printing of report	1,654 34
Miscellaneous	151 02

2. D. L. McCarthy, K.C., Toronto; Peter Wright, Toronto; Donald Keith, Toronto.

3. D. L. McCarthy, K. C.—$250 per day when in court and $10 an hour for preparatory work.

Peter Wright—$100 a day when in court and $10 an hour for preparatory work.

Donald Keith—$50 per day in court and $5 per hour for preparatory work.

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. FAIR:

1. What amount of income tax has been collected in each province each year since January 1, 1939?
2. What amount was paid each year by farmers in the various provinces, and how many farmers contributed each year in each province?

Mr. WINTERS:

1. See statement forming part of this answer.

2. No information, as the taxation division does not maintain records of tax collections by occupational classifications.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—VENEREAL DISEASE

Mr. McGARRY:

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare undertaken any special studies on the problem of venereal diseases?

Mr. MAYBANK: The division of venereal disease control is conducting a study on the effectiveness of the anti-arsenical compound BAL (British anti-Lewisite). This is used in the treatment of toxic reactions resulting from arsenical compounds administered in the treatment of syphilis.

As the provincial venereal disease control clinics have no facilities for testing the toxicity, physical and chemical properties of arsphenamines and related products, the food and drug division of the Department of National Health and Welfare undertook the testing of stocks of these products on hand in the V.D. control clinics throughout Canada. The purpose was to ascertain the stability of these products under varying conditions of storage and to check the effectiveness of the regulations under which the department controls the release of these products in Canada.

The laboratory of hygiene of the Department of National Health and Welfare is participating in a co-operative effort with the provincial public health laboratories to ensure a uniform service in the diagnosis of syphilis, with a view to facilitating the control of the disease. Reagents used in the blood test for syphilis are prepared and standardized at the laboratory of hygiene for distribution to the provinces. Collaborative studies to evaluate the accuracy of the blood tests, as carried out in each laboratory, are conducted from time to time. New and improved methods of diagnosis are being investigated. The directors of all provincial public health laboratories have by unanimous resolution accepted the laboratory of hygiene as the national referee laboratory for this work.

FREIGHT RATES INCREASES—GRAIN SHIPPED TO INTERIOR ELEVATORS FOR CLEANING, ETC.

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. Will grain shipped to interior elevators in western Canada for cleaning, drying or storing be subject to any part of the recent 21 per cent increase in freight rates?

2. If so, give details as to how rates will be applied.

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

[Mr. Winters.]

BANK OF CANADA—PURCHASE OF DOMINION BONDS

Mr. McMASTER:

1. What was the total loss sustained by the Bank of Canada in the recent reduction of the price at which the bank purchased from individual holders the issued bonds of the Dominion of Canada?

2. Can the total loss be allocated in (a) the reduction from 4½ per cent premium to 2½ per cent premium; (b) the reduction from 2½ per cent premium to par?

3. What was the total amount of bonds held by them (a) when the price was reduced from 4½ per cent premium to 2½ per cent premium; (b) when the price was reduced from 2½ per cent premium to par?

Mr. BELZILE:

1, 2 and 3. These questions relate to the internal business of the Bank of Canada and the information is not of government record. However it may be pointed out that changes in market quotations for securities do not necessarily mean that profits or losses are experienced by the holders of such securities. Whether profits or losses are realized depends on whether a security has been bought at one price and actually sold at a different price.

FREIGHT RATES INCREASES—BARLEY FOR MALTING PURPOSES

Mr. WRIGHT:

Will the 21 per cent increase in freight rates apply to barley shipped for malting purposes to malting companies at interior points?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

FREIGHT RATES INCREASES—OATS, FLAX, ETC., SHIPPED TO PROCESSING PLANTS

Mr. WRIGHT:

Will the 21 per cent increase in freight rates apply to oats, flax, rapeseed shipped direct to processing plants?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No as to oats and flax; yes as to rapeseed.

PENSION COMMISSION—VETERANS AFFAIRS INVESTIGATORS

Mr. ARCHIBALD:

1. Who are the members of the Canadian pension commission?

2. With reference to each member, what is (a) his age; (b) date of appointment; (c) military service; (d) occupation preceding appointment; (e) salary?

3. How many investigators are employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs?

4. Of these (a) how many are dual service veterans; (b) how many served in Canada only?

Mr. GREGG:

1 and 2. See statement forming part of this answer.

3. 100 male, 21 female; total, 121.

4. (a) 13; (b) 7.

1. Name	(a) Age	(b) Date of first appointment	(c) War service	(d) Occupation preceding appointment	(e) Annual salary

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

INQUIRY AS TO SUGGESTED CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Can the Prime Minister give the house some indication of what progress is being made in the discussion, formal or otherwise, relating to what the newspapers speak of as an impending conference of prime ministers of the British commonwealth?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can say to my hon. friend that there have been no communications of an official character that I know of in regard to the matter. I think a careful reading of the dispatch to which my hon. friend refers will indicate that Prime Minister Attlee himself was not saying there was to be a conference but rather indicated that nothing thus far had been said about one.

Mr. GRAYDON: My reading of that communication was that there had been some informal discussions with respect to it, but I am glad to have the answer of my right hon. friend.

EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAM

INQUIRY AS TO RECENT VISIT OF MR. HOWE TO WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he or the government expect to be able to make some announcement with respect to the mission upon which he went to Washington last week end, in connection with the European recovery program.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): One of the purposes of my trip to Washington was to make contact with those responsible for the administration of the European recovery program, and to establish Canada's interest in that program. I succeeded in meeting practically all those associated with the administration of the program; the program was discussed, and I feel certain that Canada's position is thoroughly understood.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RENE N. JUTRAS (Provencher): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister aware that the disastrous flood in Manitoba particularly in the southern portion, has been caused to a very large degree by foreign waters flowing north into the province, and that this disaster is a recurrent affair? Will the minister ascertain and tell the house whether the terms of reference which were issued to the international joint commission in January of this year, to investigate and report on the drainage basin of the Red river, are broad enough to allow the commission to make a complete recommendation with a view to preventing the recurrence of such floods?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to have the matters referred to in the hon. member's question investigated, and to report to the house after having done so.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

SEIZURE OF FUNDS AT BORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with a question I submitted on January 30 last and again on March 10, which was passed as an order for return, as appears on page 1102 of Hansard. It relates to foreign exchange control and the seizure of funds at the border. Three months have elapsed since this question was first submitted. Can the minister advise me when it will be answered?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I am afraid I cannot, Mr. Speaker. I am familiar in a general way with the question, which involves a tremendous amount of work including the preparation of thousands of names. I am not in a position to say at the moment just what is the status of that question, but I will look into it and have a word with my hon. friend and let him know how it stands. Possibly we can arrange to eliminate some of the details in which he is not interested.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the Minister of Finance give us any indication or suggestion as to when the budget may be brought down?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I am afraid I cannot as yet. I have a tentative date in my own mind, but I am not in a position to announce it yet because

I am not sure whether I shall be able to bring it down then. I will make the announcement as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could the minister tell us whether it will be before or after he goes to speak in Ontario county?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no arrangements to speak in Ontario county as yet, so I cannot answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then there is very bad liaison in my hon. friend's party, because I understand he is already advertised to speak.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

FLIN FLON, NORTH VANCOUVER, VANDERHOOF, QUESNEL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works arising out of a telegram received today from the mayor of Flin Flon. In view of the inadequacy of the post office facilities at that point, can the minister say when construction of the new federal building will be commenced?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): On Tuesday the hon. member for Churchill asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) whether we had purchased a site for that building, and the answer was in the negative. There is no vote in the estimates this year for that post office; therefore any date I might give for the beginning of the work would be simply guesswork. This project is considered along with many others all over the country, where the need is as great as at Flin Flon.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If I may ask a supplementary question, when does the minister intend to construct the public building in North Vancouver for which there has been an item in the estimates for the last three years?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This question is not as difficult as the last one. In this case we had very good intentions, but I was informed that lack of material and manpower in that district hindered the progress of our work. As soon as that situation improves we will undertake it.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether his intentions are still as good in respect to a public building at Vanderhoof and one at Quesnel?

OATS AND BARLEY

STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO EXPORT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting of the house the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) asked whether, owing to a lack of definite information with regard to the export regulations applicable to oats and barley, I would make a statement to the house outlining the regulations governing the export of these two commodities.

My reply is that during the current crop year the export of whole oats and barley other than registered and certified seed was prohibited owing to the need of retaining sufficient supplies of feed in Canada.

It was considered advisable to ease the restrictions on the export of these cereals. Accordingly on April 1, 1948, the Canadian wheat board advised the trade that the export of limited quantities of oats and barley to any destination had been authorized and that applications for export permits would be considered as submitted.

When obtaining a permit it is necessary for the applicant to pay the equalization fee in effect when application is made and approved. Exporters must adhere to certain regulations as advised by the board from time to time, such as international emergency food committee allocations and foreign exchange control board regulations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN NORTHERN DEFENCE ESTABLISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. A statement appears in the press this morning to the effect that $100 million is being spent by the United States for the improvement of northern defences. Of this amount, $611,570 is being spent for the enlargement of quarters and facilities at Frobisher Bay, Saskatchewan, and Fort Chimo, Quebec. Under what authority is this work being carried out? Has the Department of National Defence any supervision over the work?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked his question in a low voice and I found it difficult to hear him. I believe however that I can answer in a general way.

Under the declaration of the Prime Minister in the house on February 12, 1947, and an identical declaration made in the United States on the same day, arrangements for defence co-operation between the United States and Canada which had been in force during the war were continued.

Under those arrangements it is expressly stated that any activities in either country will be completely under the control of the country in which it is done, and will be done only after an express arrangement is made with regard to that work. If any work is being done in Canada, it is in accordance with that arrangement.

Mr. FRASER: The minister's department has no jurisdiction over it at all?

Mr. CLAXTON: On the contrary, it would be done only after arrangements had been completely worked out between representatives of Canada and the United States.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad indeed to have, after several unexpected but inevitable delays, this opportunity to give the house a short review of world affairs as we see them in my department. This review will, of course, be neither exhaustive nor final. Naturally enough, in one statement it is not possible to refer to all the important questions that face us. If some of these questions must be omitted from this review, it is not because I do not appreciate their importance. There will, I hope, be other occasions during the session when these omissions can be repaired.

It is now, I believe, an accepted fact that practically everything of importance that happens in the international sphere is of interest to Canada—often of direct and immediate interest. For us there is no escape, even if we wish to seek one, in isolation or indifference. Recent events have brought home to all of us the increasing threat to our democratic national existence of the rising tide of totalitarian communism. We know that Canada's boundaries against such a threat extend far beyond her physical frontiers. We know also that a line is being drawn which runs through the hearts of free men everywhere, and that on our side of that line are all those in every country who work and fight to preserve the freedom and dignity of the individual against reactionary dictatorship, whether communist or fascist. We know that there can be no neutrality in this conflict, which is as spiritual as it is political.

In the realm of economic and social welfare as well, it is clear as it never was before that we cannot live unto ourselves alone. Opinions may differ—I suppose they do differ—as to whether the economic and trade policies of this government are wise; but there will, I am sure, be no quarrel with the statement that they are now decisively influenced by events far beyond our borders.

Canadian representatives recently discussing the future of Indonesia at Lake Success, the future of international trade at Havana, or the future of a free press at Geneva, all bear witness to the fact that this country is now inevitably and inextricably involved in the full current of international events. The day has long since passed when we did not have to bother about the policies of other countries far away. When the activities of those other countries determine the prosperity, indeed the very existence of our own country, it is merely elementary prudence and common sense to concern ourselves with them.

The Canadian Department of External Affairs, both at home and abroad, exists for that very purpose. It represents a necessary and, I think, useful development, in the progress of this country from colonial status to national maturity. Its expansion—and it has not been allowed to grow carelessly and extravagantly reflects the magnitude and complexity of the relations between nations in this interdependent age and the increasing importance of these relations for Canada. In her participation in international affairs Canada will, I hope, act with resolution, with responsibility, and also with restraint. We should not evade our international duties; but in discharging them we should not be influenced unduly by national pride and prejudice. I hope that in our foreign relations we can reconcile our first duty to our own people with our ultimate obligations to the international community. In a frightened and suspicious world this is not always easy.

The most cursory survey of international events during the recent months gives one cause for concern, perhaps apprehension. This concern extends even to the very continuance of peace itself, and this less than three years after one atom bomb destroyed 70,000 human beings.

It is possible to recognize this fear and its causes as political realities without giving way to gloomy forebodings about the inevitability of an early war. Ostrich-like optimism and panicky pessimism are equally to be avoided.

Both would be a danger to our security. The fact remains, however, that the trend has unfortunately been away from peaceful co-operation and towards the division of one friendly world into two competing worlds.

The picture is much the same all over the world, much the same in Europe and in Asia. Let us look first at the European side. It seems to me that the most dramatic illustration of division and political deterioration in Europe has been the complete failure of the great powers to agree on even the basic problems of a German peace settlement. This failure has poisoned the political atmosphere and it certainly has hindered all movement toward the restoration and recovery of Europe's shattered economy. This failure itself is merely the result of the tragic inability of the western democracies and the eastern totalitarian states, led by the U.S.S.R., to establish any basis for co-operation or even any basis for mutual toleration.

We had hoped for mutual toleration founded on a genuine desire to live and let live. It seems now that we shall have to be content with toleration based on what I hope will be a healthy respect for the determination of each of us to prevent encroachment and resist domination by the other. But whatever may be its basis, without mutual toleration no satisfactory progress can be made in the political or economic rehabilitation of Europe or of the far east, or even in the development of the united nations into an agency which can maintain peace, guarantee security, and effectively promote human welfare.

Most of the troubles and fears of our day spring from this lack of trust, this absence of mutual toleration. The main although perhaps not the sole responsibility for this rests upon the aggressive and imperialistic policies of communism and on outside sponsorship and support of subversive communist fifth columns in many countries, more particularly in the countries of Europe. Even with close and friendly co-operation between the great powers the recovery of western Europe from the war would have been difficult. We must recognize that before 1939 western Europe depended for its efficiency on a very high degree of economic specialization. Long years of war and of enemy occupation have thrown this delicate mechanism almost entirely out of gear. Physical devastation, the depletion of economic resources, prolonged interruption of international trade, the loss of earnings from foreign investments, the loss of earnings from merchant fleets, are some of the factors which have contributed to the present precarious economic conditions in Europe.

To the destruction and dislocations of war—and we are beginning at last to realize how much greater these were than anybody imagined when the guns stopped firing—have been added difficulties of nature. We all know from what we have read that the winter of 1946-47 in Europe and in some parts of Asia was the worst for generations and would have set back the healing work of recovery even if there had not been these forces of division and disorder to which I have referred.

There is in all this a chain of vicious consequences, and these vicious consequences are exploited by Soviet-inspired communist parties for purposes which have unfortunately become all too familiar. Distress, starvation, even despair are stirred by the communists into political disorder and ideological strife. Every kind of inciting appeal is made, and the highest as well as the lowest motives are fully exploited for the purpose of retarding recovery and preventing progress. Starvation thus becomes a weapon of political warfare and misery, a political platform.

It is not enough, however, to blame the troubles of Europe—or of the rest of the world—on the destruction of war and on the subversive activity of communism. The free governments are themselves at fault if they are hesitant to take the necessary social and political measures, or to show the energy, determination and solidarity required to make democracy into an efficient instrument for recovery and a dynamic political gospel. The ranks of democratic peoples must not be divided. Their energies must not be dissipated in domestic political conflict. The attractions of political manœuvring become dangerous if they override the virtues of self-discipline and self-sacrifice in the face of national danger. Democratic leaders in all countries must realize that democracy does not mean merely the preservation of the status quo. Too often, the lead in energy, determination and zeal has been given by peoples who live and work in undemocratic regimes. To save democracy in Europe—or indeed anywhere else—we must demonstrate by deeds and not merely by words that democracy is a more dynamic and humanitarian creed than communism. No regime in Europe or anywhere else has the right to assistance merely because it proclaims itself the only barrier against communism. It must do much more than that. It must show that it can act promptly and resolutely to disperse by productive measures the accumulated forces of social discontent which communism so cunningly exploits wherever they exist. It is well for us to remember these things as we view, with justified anxiety, the dark surge from behind the iron curtain.

Taking full advantage of economic misery, of political instability, and in certain cases, of the weak and divided political leadership of its opponents, communism in Europe has extended its authority under Soviet control and direction, over Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Yugoslavia, Albania, and now, Czechoslovakia. Freedom, as we know it, but as most of these peoples have never known it, is now a more remote hope in those countries than it has ever been.

In the whole of southeastern Europe and the Balkans, only Greece and Turkey remain free from communist domination. In Greece, subversive revolutionary forces at home, aided by help from neighbouring communist states, have been held in check. At the moment, Greece is a key point in the struggle against aggressive Soviet-inspired communism, and is recognized as such by the British and United States governments. Turkey is another important sector of this front, and assistance is being given to her also in an effort to put her in a position to defend herself from threats and attacks from outside.

The tragedy of the countries of eastern Europe which have become victims of the dictatorship of the communist minority is that they have lost the great chance that victory gave them to establish free governments based on the popular will. They have sunk back into a different, but deeper, despotism than they have ever known before. They will soon learn that, if they do not know it already.

Czechoslovakia, however, is one country which had earned and deserved a better fate. The sordid details of the process by which the Czechoslovak people were despoiled in a few days of their hard won liberty and exemplary parliament democracy are too well known, too vivid in all our minds, to need recapitulation.

The pattern was already familiar enough. The communists, although a minority, were strong enough to obtain in a national government the ministries which give them control of the police, propaganda and the army. They then consolidated their position by appointing communists to key posts in the police and by gaining control of the trade unions through infiltration. Then, through the radio and the controlled press they discredited and undermined the influence of their chief opponents by falsely accusing them of treasonable activities. A political crisis was next artificially brought about. The communists then demonstrated beyond all possibility of doubt that they were both ready and willing to use force to solve that crisis by seizing power themselves. The democratic parties and their leaders were faced, so they thought, with a choice between chaos and submission. Indeed, the choice was so influenced by the ominous attitude of a close and powerful neighbour that it could hardly be called choice at all.

Communist action committees, organized well in advance, then took charge of all activities, both national and local, from government ministries and the courts to factories and football teams. All the grim mechanism of the totalitarian state was swiftly brought into play—arrests of political opponents, prostitution of justice, control of the press, and intimidation of all non-communists. Wholesale purges of civil servants, editors, teachers, managers, and all persons of influence or responsibility were carried out. With power secured by such despotic methods, the communist government then made elaborate plans for an "election," an election in which the right to vote is a privilege reserved for those who will vote right—or rather left! Such an election is scheduled for May 30 in Czechoslovakia. Its results can be foretold with accuracy, and they will deceive no one.

The fate of Czechoslovakia is indeed a frightening case history of communist totalitarianism in action. It is well worth careful study. To understand the shock produced by the complete extinction of Czech democracy in a world not altogether unaccustomed to news of this nature, it is necessary to remember the length and the strength of the Czech democratic tradition and the peculiar significance it has long held for world democracy. Nowhere has the struggle for human freedom and liberal democracy been carried on more valiantly or more persistently than in the Bohemian lands. It was as the heirs of this great liberal and humane tradition that the Czech people were able in the twenty years between the two world wars to establish and preserve liberal democratic institutions which were a model to other less fortunate states.

The nazis were well aware that in conquering Czechoslovakia they were striking a formidable blow at world democracy. The communist dictators of today are equally conscious of the importance of the Czech democratic tradition to the western world. When the Czechs were forced by outside pressure to withdraw their acceptance of the invitation to participate in the discussions of the Marshall plan in Paris last September, it was clear that Czechoslovakia was not to be permitted to act as a bridge between west and east. It has now become apparent to what lengths communist governments will go in preventing co-operation between the free and democratic west and the totalitarian governments of eastern Europe. The Czechs had loyally lived up to their obligations as a member of the Soviet bloc. They were a threat to no one. They were steadily and sturdily rebuilding their economy on a basis of democratic socialism. Yet their liberties have been ruthlessly wiped out by a Soviet-inspired communist fifth column.

Those in each free nation who love freedom should draw the clear lesson of the tragedy of Czechoslovakia. That lesson is that it is impossible to co-operate with communists. They do not want co-operation. They want domination. Communists will pretend to co-operate with non-communists just so long as it is in their interests to do so. But once they are in a position to seize power, they will seize it and will then discard or destroy their non-communist allies. People in Canada, the United States, France, Italy and other countries have been long in learning this lesson. Let us hope that they have now learned it well. The things that divide the democratic parties of the free states, by whatever names they call themselves—Socialists, Liberals, Catholics, Conservatives, Progressive Conservatives—are as nothing compared with the gulf that separates them all from the communists.

Similarly, in international politics the things that divide the free and democratic nations of the world are as nothing compared with the gulf that separates these free and democratic nations from those subjected to the total tyranny of present-day communism.

The tragedy of Czechoslovakia in September 1938 and March 1939 was a prelude to war. The tragedy of Czechoslovakia in February 1948 need not be a prelude to war. It does, however, underline the necessity for the free states of the world to unite their material, their political and their moral resources to resist direct and indirect totalitarian aggression.

May I now cross the world to the far east.

The situation in the far east is, in the long run, hardly less menacing than that in Europe. During the years of Japanese aggression in east Asia serious strains were put upon the political, economic and social organization of that part of the world. The defeat and withdrawal of Japanese forces have left in the countries of the far east a legacy of political unrest and economic chaos. In circumstances such as these, the danger is particularly great that foreign penetration will be accomplished through local revolutionary forces.

The immediate need in the far east, therefore, is, as in Europe, a general peace settlement and the return of economic stability. As far as peace with Japan is concerned, the views of the Canadian government have already been made clear in the review which I gave the house on December 19 of the discussions that had taken place with regard to a Japanese peace conference. It has since then been made clear that the U.S.S.R. seeks to prevent countries other than the great powers from participating in any effective manner in preparing the Japanese treaty, and that procedures similar to those advocated by the U.S.S.R. for the peace settlement in Europe should, in the Soviet view, be adopted for Asia. These proposals we of course regard as unacceptable. It is the view of the Canadian government that an equitable settlement in the far east, reflecting the views of all the principally interested states, can be prepared only in a broadly representative conference where one or two countries do not have the power to block the wishes of the great majority. It is also the view of the Canadian government that the immediate menace of communism in the far east should not be met by the restoration of Japan to a position of such power that she can once again become a threat to peace.

I pass now to two brighter subjects—Canada's relations with the other nations of the British commonwealth and with the United States. First the British commonwealth.

Our relations with the United Kingdom and the other nations of the commonwealth, will, we always assume, and with good reason, be characterized by what is lacking in the world today, mutual confidence and understanding, frankness and good will. Constitutional issues, once of major importance in commonwealth relations, are now virtually things of the past. The principles of equality and complete autonomy are now the accepted postulates of policy for all member states of the commonwealth. The present status of all members is in fact well described in the phrase, now often used, as "independence within the commonwealth."

The commonwealth relationship has, however, never been and cannot remain static. The dangers and uncertainties of the present world situation have compelled Canada to assume greater responsibilities as a North American nation. For the same reasons the United Kingdom has boldly assumed the leadership in reorganizing the security and increasing the economic stability of western Europe. Australia and New Zealand are likewise greatly concerned about security in the south western Pacific. Yet the assumption of special regional responsibilities by commonwealth nations has not weakened their general and close association.

The strength of this commonwealth association rests not in exclusive defence or economic arrangements among its members. Indeed in time of peace formal defence arrangements have been singularly lacking. The greatest strength of the commonwealth bond is the adherence of its members to its common ideals, their common political heritage which assures mutual understanding without the necessity of formal instruments of association; their common interest in promoting and defending their democratic way of life. These ties persist in spite of all changes in the world situation. Common dangers serve but to strengthen them. The commonwealth has twice proved its worth as a powerful instrument for the preservation of freedom for its members and for mankind. As such it remains.

A most significant change in membership in the commonwealth has occurred during the past year. What was once the empire of India has disappeared. In its place are three new nations of the commonwealth, India, Pakistan and Ceylon; while a dependency of the late Indian empire, Burma, has severed formal tie and become a separate republic. I think the good will relations will continue.

The India Independence Act and the Ceylon Independence Act passed last year, as members know, were but the final steps in the transfer to Indian peoples of the right of self-government which began many years ago. It is a matter of rejoicing among men of good will everywhere that the final stage was accomplished, not only without resort to violence, but with such evident good will and respect on either side. History scarcely affords a parallel of an imperial power abdicating sovereignty over subject peoples so generously and so speedily as Britain has done in India.

It does not detract from the merits of the settlement to note that the Indian peoples are in a very real sense the beneficiaries of a system of political freedom which developed here in North America. The first planting of representative institutions in the new world over three centuries ago in the colony of Virginia, the achievement of responsible government by Canada and Nova Scotia exactly one hundred years ago; the growth of autonomy in our external affairs which followed the first world war, are milestones in the development of Indian national freedom as in our own. This heritage of freedom within the commonwealth, the people of Canada, I think I may say, are glad to share with the peoples of India.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Under the India Independence Act, India and Pakistan have the right to leave the commonwealth if they so desire. We hope that they will not choose to do so, though the choice is solely theirs. The people of Canada esteem their membership in the commonwealth not merely for reasons of sentiment or tradition, but for its positive advantage. In a world in which the values and virtues of our civilization are in jeopardy, this association of free nations is both a moral and a material bulwark against the forces of disorder and oppression. It is to be hoped that the peoples of India and Pakistan, like the people of Canada, will continue to find the commonwealth a worthwhile club to which to belong. But whatever their decision, and it is theirs, we wish them well, in the great future that is unfolding for them. We wish to be their friends.

I should like to avoid mentioning one painful subject, but it would be unrealistic to do so. I refer to the serious friction which has developed between India and Pakistan over certain territorial areas, and to the dreadful communal rioting which has troubled both countries. Apart from our concern on humanitarian grounds that peace and order should prevail in that subcontinent, there is always the danger that others may be tempted to fish in troubled waters. Geographically, India and Pakistan lie on the frontiers of the free world. The freedom of their peoples is not unconnected with that of other freedom-loving peoples.

A course of action by which the Kashmir dispute might be settled has recently been adopted as a recommendation in the security council. The Canadian representative on the security council had some part in the preparation of this resolution, and he was associated with the group of members in whose names it was finally presented to the council for adoption. The positions taken by India and Pakistan were found to be so far apart that, in spite of repeated efforts, it was not possible to prepare a recommendation that would be acceptable to both parties. The members of the council who prepared the resolution endeavoured, therefore, to recommend a settlement by which the essential interests of both Pakistan and India, and Kashmir as well, could be protected. In voting for this recommendation the Canadian delegation has not attempted to express a judgment on the circumstances which have led to the present situation in Kashmir, but has merely assisted in formulating an impartial opinion as to procedures by which the Kashmir question might be settled. We are confident that our friends in India and Pakistan, even though they do not consider that the Kashmir resolution fully meets their respective requirements, will nevertheless give weight to the procedure it suggests for resolving the difficulties, and will understand and appreciate the attitude of those states which participated in preparing the resolution.

A word now about our relations with our southern neighbour.

Canada's relations with the United States remain based on frankness, friendliness and good neighbourliness. We have, of course, many common problems, principally of finance, economics and security. We have also had some differences recently over incidents arising out of what we considered somewhat arbitrary United States administrative interference in certain trade and transportation matters. But we talk the same language even when we differ, and so we can always find a way of settling our differences and solving our problems. One source of whatever difficulties we have with our good neighbour is a flattering, if at times a trifle embarrassing, tendency on their part to consider us so much as one of themselves that, with the best of intentions, they occasionally forget that we are as sensitive as any nation about having control over our own affairs; if any country can be said to have control of its own affairs these days.

I know that we all recognize, however, that in a tense and dangerous world our mutual friendship and solidarity provide a strong foundation for the joint existence of Canada and the United States and for the conduct of our relations with each other. On the big issues we think and we are apt to act alike, because our two peoples have the same ideas and ideals, the same basic way of life. We react in the same way to any threat aimed at that way of life. That by itself would be enough to ensure our friendly co-operation apart from all the other influences that draw us close together.

Strategically we both recognize, I think, our mutual interdependence. Our joint defence measures are based on that fact. National defence alone is not enough in this day of new weapons and new methods of warfare. Collective defence is more than ever necessary.

Co-operative defence arrangements with a neighbouring state need not of course be inconsistent with collective defence within the terms of the charter of the united nations. Such measures are, in the present circumstances that confront our two countries, normal and necessary. They infringe no rights, inside or outside Canada. I can assure the house on this point. There is no threat to the control of our own affairs in our collaboration with the United States on joint defence. The Canadian government is aware of the sensitiveness of our people in this regard. The United States government also is aware of it and respects it. It readily accepts, for instance, the position laid down formally in the joint statement of the two governments of February 12, 1947, that all joint defence undertakings on Canadian territory—and in passing I may say they are of a very limited character with very few United States personnel involved—shall be under Canadian control.

There are some who argue that the mere existence of these arrangements constitutes a provocation to other nations. This is an old and familiar contention often used in the past by aggressors to frighten their victims from joining together for defence. Before the war the nazis used it to confuse and weaken those whom they wished to destroy. Surely in the present international situation it would be the height of folly not to take, in consultation with our friends, such precautions as reason indicates to be vital to our security and to theirs in an emergency. Surely, too, it is apparent to all that those arrangements constitute a threat to no one, except to those who are deterred by them from committing any aggression. Finally, they are not inconsistent in any way with our obligations under the charter of the united nations.

This brings me to another and important phase of my review, the present position of the united nations.

The annual report of the government to parliament on the united nations is now being printed, and I hope to be able to present it to the house shortly. It will be, as last year, a general review of the activities of the united nations, with particular reference to the second session of the general assembly in New York. I will not attempt to cover the ground of that report in this statement, but there are two matters on which I feel sure you would wish me to comment without waiting for the report to be tabled. The first of these is the general policy of Canada toward the united nations; the second is the question of Palestine.

On repeated occasions the government has indicated that collective security through the operations of an effective international organization was a primary objective in the foreign policy of this country. This continues to be our policy. We are fully aware, however, of the inadequacy of the united nations at the present moment to provide the nations of the world with the security which they require. The realities of this situation must be faced, and the policy of the government in respect of it may be summarized very briefly.

In the first place we shall not encourage or foster any activity which at this moment might provide any state with a legitimate—I emphasize the word "legitimate"—excuse to withdraw from the united nations. On the other hand, we shall not refrain from action which we know to be right merely because it displeases certain other members of the united nations. We shall continue to give every assistance to constructive efforts to make the united nations into the instrument for security and co-operation which it was originally designed to be, and in the meantime utilize its present possibilities to the fullest extent.

We will also oppose demands on the united nations which at the moment are too heavy for its resources. It should not, for instance, attempt to undertake administrative responsibilities and police activities in various parts of the world before it has been given the means which may be required for carrying out those responsibilities.

We must realize also that the effectiveness of the united nations is at the moment greatly reduced by the divisions which have grown up between the countries of eastern Europe and the countries of the rest of the world. Until there has been some measure of settlement of the issues that appear to divide the world, we should not expect too much from the united nations in its present form and organization. No one should expect, for instance, the machinery of the united nations to produce a solution for problems on which the two most powerful nations of the world may have diametrically opposed views that cannot be reconciled.

During the last two years our faith in the united nations as an effective organization for peace and security has been pretty severely shaken. What is unshaken is our determination to make of it, or within it, an effective organization for these purposes. Unshaken also is our faith that this can be achieved. It is therefore important that the united nations be kept in existence, and that we make every possible use of the very high degree of vitality which, in spite of these divergent opinions, it has shown. There are, for example, subjects such as the dispute in Kashmir, to which I have referred, and the difficulties which have arisen in Indonesia, which are not directly within the area of conflict between the eastern European states and the rest of the world, and where the machinery of the united nations has been used very effectively.

Our willingness to stand for, and our ability to secure, election to the security council last September was an earnest of our desire to play our full part in the united nations. That part involves us in discussions and decisions on matters which once may have seemed to be remote from our interests. Although we know, as I have already said, that this remoteness is illusory, nevertheless this does not alter the fact that during the next year and a half Canada, as a member of the security council, will, at times, have to declare its position publicly on certain matters which previously might not have come to the attention of the government at all, or might have been dealt with confidentially through diplomatic channels.

The position of a power of the middle rank on the security council is under any circumstances a difficult one. A small power is in a sense by its very smallness relieved from much of the responsibility which participation in decisions involves, and which the implementation of such decisions requires. At the other extreme the great powers can protect their positions with the veto. A "middle country" such as Canada, however, is in a different position. Its economic strength and political influence are of importance, and its prestige is high. The material and moral contribution which Canada can make to collective action, as the last two wars have shown, is significant. The judgments which the Canadian government express on united nations matters must therefore be made with care and a sense of responsibility, especially since Canada is a country the views of which are taken seriously and which has the reputation of conscientiously carrying out the commitments into which it has entered.

Canada's position on the security council, as a middle power, would be an important one in any circumstances. The special nature of our relationship to the United Kingdom and the United States complicates our responsibilities, though it also enlarges our opportunities for influencing developments. Canada will be expected by some to follow the lead of the United Kingdom; by others to follow the lead of the United States. The fact that these two states are now in general agreement on fundamental questions eases but does not remove our particular difficulties. Unfriendly observers will write us off as a satellite of both, hoping in this way to minimize the effect of our independent action. More objective observers will tend to assume that it will be hard for Canada to follow a policy of its own. The fact that Canadian interests will often naturally be identical with those of the United Kingdom and the United States, without any suggestion or influence from these states, in a sense makes Canada's position more ambiguous. It will not be easy to secure credit for independence and honesty of argument and decision. Nevertheless we will continue to make our decisions objectively, in the light of our obligations to our own people and their interest in the welfare of the international community.

I come now to the question of Palestine.

There is not time for me now to discuss this question at length, and hon. members may wish to examine the more detailed account of the discussions in the general assembly which will be included in our report to parliament on the united nations. I should like, however, to summarize a few of the principal considerations which have influenced Canadian policy on this subject since it came before the united nations.

The special assembly on Palestine, which met a year ago, was summoned, we should not forget, at the request of the United Kingdom to make recommendations for the future government of Palestine.

This special assembly established a committee which went to Palestine, investigated the position and reported to the regular assembly which met last September. In preparing its report the committee does not appear to have had any reason to assume that the United Kingdom intended to withdraw from Palestine in the immediate future.

Thus when the general assembly began in the autumn to consider the report of the special committee, the majority of whose members had recommended a plan of partition with economic union, it was found that an important feature of the plan was a suggestion that the mandatory power should continue to administer the territory during a two-year transitional period. The assembly also had before it, however, an announcement greatly altering the situation, but the reasons for which I am sure we all appreciate, that the United Kingdom government would terminate the mandate and withdraw from Palestine at the earliest possible date.

The general assembly, after a long discussion of the problem, recommended by more than a two-thirds majority that a plan based on the proposal of the special committee for partition with economic union should be adopted. It put the responsibility for implementing that recommendation on the security council if the two parties, the Arabs and the Jews, were unable to agree on it. Implementation from outside seems very much like leading a horse to water. You cannot have economic union without agreement between the two parties.

It is important that the Canadian attitude towards this issue should be made clear. This plan for partition with economic union was not initiated by the Canadian government. It was proposed by a united nations special committee on Palestine. When the report of that committee came up for discussion at Lake Success last autumn, it soon became clear that a plan based on partition with economic union was, regardless of its merits, the only one that could possibly secure the necessary majority at the general assembly. At various times the Canadian delegation intervened in the discussions for the purpose of endeavouring to make the plan as practicable and as realistic as possible. Above all, we tried to ensure that there would be some provision for implementation included in the assembly recommendation.

It was, and still is, the Canadian attitude that the united nations should not make recommendations in regard to Palestine without taking into account the problem of whether their acceptance could be secured. In the past the world as a whole has been spared the necessity of concerning itself with the problem of Palestine because of the willingness of the United Kingdom to administer that country. The inability of the mandatory power to continue to carry this burden presented, and still presents, the question of whether the responsibility which the United Kingdom is laying down will be picked up by the united nations; or, if not, by whom?

By the united nations in the form of a trusteeship? That was considered by the special committee and by assembly delegations last autumn and rejected. By the people of Palestine through the establishment of a unitary state with an Arab majority? That would not, so most delegations felt, fulfil the promises made, and so often confirmed, to the Jews that they should have a national home in Palestine. Or by the formation of Jewish and Arab states, with the majority of the inhabitants Jewish and Arab respectively, but joined together by economic union and free communication?

The Canadian delegation supported this last solution, as the least unsatisfactory of the alternatives which had at one time or another been considered; as the least unjust and least impracticable solution to a problem where, hon. members must realize, justice and practicality are so difficult to reconcile or even to discover.

As all of you are aware, the United States has modified the position it took in relation to the Palestine question last November. For reasons which have been given wide publicity and which were discussed by Canada in the security council on March 24, it is evident that immediate implementation of the partition plan is not practicable. You cannot have two states set up and get them to act as an economic union. Necessary adjustments have now to be considered. On March 19 the United States drew the attention of the security council to the fact that if the assembly plan were not put into effect by May 15 the united nations would have no administrative responsibility in Palestine after the mandate ended. In order that this responsibility might now be definitely assumed, the United States proposed formally on March 30 that a second special session of the general assembly should be summoned. It indicated that it would suggest to the assembly the creation of a temporary united nations trusteeship, without prejudice—I emphasize those words "without prejudice"—to the final political settlement in Palestine. This would, it was hoped, serve as a suitable medium through which the united nations might fulfil its responsibility. The United Kingdom supported the proposal for summoning a special session of the assembly, as well as the United States motion calling for an immediate truce in Palestine. The Canadian government also gave its support to both proposals. In voting for the calling of a special session we had in mind the desirability of enabling the assembly to consider whether in this new and changed circumstance, alternative plans should be made for Palestine, particularly if there is hope that by these means processes of mediation and conciliation may be initiated and peace restored.

This special session is now meeting at Lake Success. A specific proposal has been made to it that responsibility for the administration of Palestine now be placed under a united nations trusteeship. An arrangement of this nature, however, unless it were accepted by both parties, might create even greater difficulties of enforcement than partition with economic union. Before such a plan could be put into effect, therefore, it would seem necessary to have the concurrence of a decisive majority of the members of the united nations and particularly those members who would be expected to play a leading part in the implementation of the plan. For this reason, the Canadian government, before it expresses a judgment on these proposals, will await some clear indication that the plans which have been placed before the assembly will produce a constructive result which can and will be put into effect. In the meantime, the Canadian delegation to the special assembly and to the security council will use its best efforts to support the truce agreement which was carried in the security council during the session of April 16 and by which methods were recommended to the two parties for avoiding further widespread violence in Palestine.

Apart from the references which I have made to our relations with our fellow members of the British commonwealth and with the United States, the picture which I have presented to the house has been gloomy. The cause of freedom, of democracy and of peace has had setbacks—in Europe, in the far east, in the united nations. But these setbacks have resulted in a strong democratic reaction.

In Italy, for instance, the communists have been waging a ruthless, determined and skilful fight for power. They have, however, been rejected by the Italian electorate in the kind of free election which they would never have permitted if they had been in power. The free people of Italy have declared that they want to remain free, to remain a part of western civilization and not to become a province of a new totalitarian slave empire. Their decision has been welcomed by free men in every country.

The Italian elections have once again proved the truth of the thesis that no nation by an honest vote has ever put the communists in power. It is well to remember, however, that once in power, the people will not be allowed to vote them out. The communists have only to win one election, because it will be the last of elections as we know them.

Difficult days lie ahead for Italy. The communists, having failed to get power by constitutional means, may resort to the threat and use of force. But we are confident that Italy will prove as successful in dealing with these threats as it has been in dealing with the communist attempt to gain power by using the democratic process of an election.

I would also like to mention three other important, indeed historic steps which have been taken recently, in the organization of democratic action. The first was the passage by the United States Congress of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, authorizing an appropriation of $5,300 million for the first twelve months of a European recovery program designed to last some four years. The second was the adoption on April 16 by the sixteen free nations of Europe and by representatives of the three western zones of Germany of the convention for European economic co-operation. The third was the signing of the Brussels pact. As to the first, on behalf of the government of Canada, I hope I can say even the people of Canada would like to pay tribute to this generous and imaginative act of high statesmanship by the government of the United States. By the enactment of the Foreign Assistance Act, the most powerful democratic state of our day has given new confidence and vigour to all the free peoples of the world.

In their turn, the western European nations have given proof of their ability to respond to the challenge of the Foreign Assistance Act by the adoption of the convention establishing an organization for European economic co-operation. They have established an organization for self-help and mutual aid in economic matters. The purpose of the organization, as set forth in the preamble of the convention, is the—> speedy establishment of sound economic conditions enabling the contracting parties as soon as possible to achieve and maintain a satisfactory level of economic activity without extraordinary outside assistance, and to make their full contribution to world economic stability.

The signature of the Paris convention took place less than a month after a third great historic event—the signature on March 17 in Brussels of the five power treaty of mutual assistance by the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg. The convention agreed to in Paris is a long step towards economic unity in western Europe. The treaty signed in Brussels is a long step towards closer political and cultural unity as well.

This "western union", proposed by Mr. Bevin in his great speech of January 22, the nucleus of which has now been created by the Brussels treaty, is no mere military alliance directed against a possible aggressor from the east. It goes further and deeper and seeks to mobilize the moral as well as the military and economic resources of western Europe. It seeks to restrain the aggressive forces of communism, not by a Maginot line but by building up in the liberal, democratic and Christian states of western Europe a dynamic counter-attraction to them.

The difficulties which the governments and peoples of western Europe will have to overcome in order to create a western European community are formidable. To fail to comprehend their magnitude would be to demonstrate a lack of understanding towards the peoples of that part of the world. To us in this continent of vast spaces, western Europe may seem small and compact, but it is composed of many great nations, each with a long and splendid separate national tradition; each proud of its distinctive character, its peculiar institutions, its national independence. These difficulties are inherent in the rich diversity of the great European tradition. But the move towards the creation of a union of all the peoples of western Europe has been successfully started. We welcome that move and we are confident that the peoples of western Europe will continue to respond successfully to the challenge presented to them by the threat to everything they cherish in the remorseless advance of communist totalitarianism.

It is not only in the European recovery program, the Paris convention and the Brussels treaty that the democratic states have given proof of their ability to work together. They have also demonstrated this by the progress which they have made in bringing about administrative and other reforms in western Germany.

The internal state of affairs in Germany, even before the European recovery program was put forward, was a cause of concern to the three western occupying powers. These powers, already overburdened, were carrying a heavy additional load as a result of their resolve that Germany should not become a vast slum area and a menace to the physical and political health of the world.

From time to time all four occupying powers in Germany have been obliged to take measures for the efficient administration of their respective zones. Until the failure of the meeting of the council of foreign ministers in December last, these measures were largely of a transitory nature and, in general, have been based on the assumption that a German peace treaty would shortly be concluded. But the failure of the last foreign ministers meeting and the non-cooperative policy adopted by the U.S.S.R. in German matters, demonstrated that this assumption was no longer a reasonable one to make. Moreover, conditions in the countries occupying Germany, in the countries bordering on Germany, and in Germany itself did not permit indefinite delay.

Early in February, therefore, the United Kingdom and the United States promulgated a new constitution for their united zones, which placed upon the Germans a necessary degree of responsibility for their own public business. This responsibility should contribute to the re-education of the Germans in democratic and peaceful processes of government. Care, however, must be taken to see that it does not contribute to the re-emergence of Germany as a potential aggressor.

Following the promulgation of this constitution, talks were held in London from February 23 to March 6, in order to secure as great a measure of co-operation as possible in Germany between the United Kingdom, the United States and France. These talks have been resumed in the last few days.

Three of Germany's neighbours—Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg—have a specially direct and urgent interest in a number of the problems under discussion. Western Germany has long been their normal source of supply for many essential goods, especially coal and iron, and their economic welfare depends to a very great extent on that of the western zones of occupation. It can therefore be understood that a discussion of administrative and practical arrangements for inter-zonal co-operation, especially in economic matters, should take into consideration this special position of the Benelux states. They were accordingly invited to take part in some of the discussions at London.

It was the Canadian government's attitude that the special association of the Benelux countries with the occupying powers in the London talks was a reasonable and necessary stage in the effort to bring about closer economic co-operation between the countries of western Europe. We regarded the participation of the Benelux countries in these talks as a step toward the realization of the European recovery program which we had already welcomed. We continue to insist that we have the right to effective participation in any general German peace settlement, when it comes to be made.

It is hoped that these London talks will end much of the enervating uncertainty which has beset Germany since her defeat; and that western Europe generally will profit from the stability which three-power decisions can and must give in the absence of four-power or multilateral agreement. To the extent that this end is achieved, communist propaganda and conditions which produce communist action committees will be counteracted in western Europe.

Before concluding, I should like to say something about Canada's relations to these questions, first, to the European recovery program and, secondly, to the developments towards western European economic and political unity, which I have just mentioned.

As to the first: in the United States program for European recovery, provision is made for purchases outside the United States. A sizeable proportion of the funds which the Congress has authorized for the program has been set aside for this purpose. It is not expected, however, that either the volume or direction of Canadian trade will be significantly altered by this development from that of recent years. The "off-shore" purchases provision of the Foreign Assistance Act can, however, enable us to continue to send to western Europe commodities which otherwise, because of our own dollar difficulties, we would have had to direct to countries which could provide us with dollars or goods in return.

In view of the expected extent of United States dollar purchases in Canada under ERP, it has been suggested that we might now be expected to contribute further substantial direct financial assistance to western Europe. However, our United States dollar reserves are still lower than they should be. Nor can these reserves be increased to a satisfactory level simply by selling wholly for United States dollars those commodities which have in the past been paid for only partly in United States dollars. We must not forget or allow others to forget that since the end of the war we have extended to the European nations, in the form of loans, credits and grants, an amount which, relative to the size of our population, and our national income, is second to none. We must, however, have a surplus in our international balance of payments before we can consider the extension of any further financial aid to western Europe.

In order to secure such a surplus we must, among other things, expand our exports, continue to do without many of our traditional imports from dollar countries, and secure more of our imports from countries in the sterling area.

What of the second question, Canada's relations to the developments towards western European economic unity and western union? The development and rehabilitation of a sound system of international trade, a matter of first importance for Canada, is inseparably linked with European recovery. It must not be forgotten that the United Kingdom and the western European countries have in the past provided valuable markets for Canadian exports. Should the economies of these countries collapse, our own economy would suffer a severe blow. In addition, such a collapse would provide a favourable environment for communism, which feeds on insecurity, unrest and political instability. For these reasons we welcome any development towards European economic unity, which will in the long run be of great advantage to Canada by increasing political security and by widening the area of freer trade.

In so far as widening the area of political security is concerned, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has already outlined in this house on March 17 the government's attitude to the Brussels five-power treaty. I think I might repeat here what he then said, to place it in the context of the world picture. Speaking of the Brussels five-power treaty the Prime Minister said:

> This pact is far more than an alliance of the old kind. It is a partial realization of the idea of collective security by an arrangement made under the charter of the united nations. As such it is a step towards peace, which may well be followed by other similar steps until there is built up an association of all free states which are willing to accept responsibilities of mutual assistance to prevent aggression and preserve peace . . .
> The Canadian government has been closely following recent developments in the international sphere. The peoples of all free countries may be assured that Canada will play her full part in every movement to give substance to the conception of an effective system of collective security by the development of regional pacts under the charter of the united nations.

The time has not yet come when it would be wise or useful for the government to go much beyond that considered and, I think, important statement of government policy.

I referred to one possible line of development when I spoke seven months ago at the general assembly. I stated then that it was not necessary to contemplate the break-up of the united nations or the secession from it of the Soviet group in order to build up a stronger security system within the organization. Without sacrificing the universality of the united nations, it is possible for the free nations of the world to form their own closer association for collective self-defence under article 51 of the charter of the united nations. Such an association could be created within the united nations by those free states which are willing to accept more specific and onerous obligations than those contained in the charter in return for greater national security than the united nations can now give its members.

It may be that the free states, or some of them, will soon find it necessary to consult together on how best to establish such a collective security league. It might grow out of the plans for "western union" now maturing in Europe. Its purpose, like that of "western union," would not be merely negative; it would create a dynamic counter-attraction to communism—the dynamic counter-attraction of a free, prosperous and progressive society as opposed to the totalitarian and reactionary society of the communist world. The formation of such a defensive group of free states would not be a counsel of despair but a message of hope. It would not mean that we regarded a third world war as inevitable; but that the free democracies had decided that to prevent such a war they would organize so as to confront the forces of communist expansionism with an overwhelming preponderance of moral, economic and military force and with sufficient degree of unity to ensure that this preponderance of force is so used that the free nations cannot be defeated one by one. No measure less than this will do. We must at all costs avoid the fatal repetition of the history of the pre-war years when the nazi aggressor picked off its victims one by one. Such a process does not end at the Atlantic.

I am sure that it is the desire of the people of Canada that Canada should play its full part in creating and maintaining this overwhelming preponderance of moral, economic and military force and the necessary unity for its effective use.

One thing we must constantly keep in mind as we approach this fateful decision is that the western European democracies are not beggars asking for our charity. They are allies whose assistance we need in order to be able successfully to defend ourselves and our beliefs. Canada and the United States need the assistance of the western European democracies just as they need ours. The spread of aggressive communist despotism over western Europe would ultimately almost certainly mean for us war, and war on most unfavourable terms. It is in our national interest to see to it that the flood of communist expansion is held back.

Our foreign policy today must, therefore, I suggest, be based on a recognition of the fact that totalitarian communist aggression, endangers the freedom and peace of every democratic country, including Canada. On this basis and pending the strengthening of the united nations, we should be willing to associate ourselves with other free states in any appropriate collective security arrangements which may be worked out under articles 51 or 52 of the charter.

In the circumstances of the present the organization of collective defence in this way is the most effective guarantee of peace. The pursuit of this course, steadfastly, unprovocatively, and constructively is our best hope for disproving the gloomy predictions of inevitable war.

The burden of maintaining peace, however, will not be easy. We must constantly remember that the union of the free world which is now "painfully struggling to be born" will possess overwhelming strength only if it is based on moral as well as material force; if its citizens are bound together not merely by a hatred of communism but by their love of free democracy and their determination to make it work for the promotion of welfare and the preservation of peace.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the house has listened with complete attention to the statement which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) has just made. Many changes have taken place since that day in July, 1911, when Mr. Asquith, the then prime minister of Great Britain said, in answer to the suggestion that the overseas dominions assist in the formulation of the empire's foreign policy, that in matters of such grave import the mother country could not consider sharing her responsibility. Changes have taken place in Great Britain itself. Great Britain was then a world leader in industry, in finance, in trade and in diplomacy. She possessed a navy which was admitted to be double in strength that of everything that could be brought against it from the recesses of seven seas and those were the days when such a navy meant complete protection not merely to Britain but to all who lived under the British flag.

Those days have gone. Science has given to man access to the realms of the air and of the the ether. The submarine, which was only mooted in those days, is now an effective and destructive agency of warfare. Having resisted and resisted successfully the onslaught of tyranny on two separate occasions, Britain is not today the power that she was in 1911.

Changes have taken place in Canada. At that time Canada was a dominion achieving advancement in the economic and industrial worlds but quite unaware of her great potentialities. The great world itself has become a different place. From the close of the religious wars until the beginning of the first great war, that is from the founding of Quebec in 1608 until 1914, the modern state system had been kept together and in order by an instrumentality known as the balance of power. It operated under certain accepted rules and restrictions which brought to the rescue of any nation that was being set upon by a larger one the majority of the other nations. Britain as a maritime power used this instrument with such skill and political wisdom that the world enjoyed for a century—from the battle of Waterloo until that of the Marne—peace, the Pax Britannica.

It is true there were interruptions in this peace, but they were transitory and did not disrupt orderly life in the continent of Europe.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

This balance of power, which was relied upon to maintain peace in Europe and in the world, has also pretty well disappeared from horizons of the mid twentieth century.

At the close of the Napoleonic wars there were eight nations that were called great powers. These were Austria, France, Great Britain, Portugal, Russia, Prussia, Spain and Sweden. Portugal, Spain and Sweden were so called by courtesy rather than because of any great power in themselves.

In the middle of this period, about 1860, the United States and Italy became first-class powers. A little later on, about the turn of the century, Japan became a great power. So at the time of the first great war there were eight great powers. As a result of that war, Austria disappeared as a great power. Germany disappeared temporarily, as did Russia. These latter two countries, however, revived; and at the beginning of the world war in 1939 there were seven great world powers: France, Germany, the Soviet republics, the United States, Great Britain, Japan and Italy. As the outcome of the war, Germany, Italy and Japan disappeared, and there remained in reality as great powers but Russia and the United States, with Britain and those nations which have been closely allied to her in a reduced situation. The world found itself in a strange situation. It found itself in an era in which there were two great contenders, two powerful giants who alone seemed almost able to control the world. The makings of a balance of power seemed to have vanished.

Some days ago I was reading the speech that was made at Bar-le-Duc by General de Gaulle on the 28th of July, 1946. In it I found the amazing prophecy made over a hundred years ago by the historian de Tocqueville. I consider it of sufficient interest to impart a translation of it to the house:

There are at this time—

Said de Tocqueville over 100 years ago.

—two great nations in existence which proceeding from different points, appear to be advancing towards the same end. I mean the United States of America and Russia. All the other nations seem to have reached very nearly the bounds which nature marked out for them and have nothing further to do but to keep what they possess. These two only are still in progress. They alone are marching forward rapidly with giant steps in a career to which the eye can as yet discern no limit. The American depends chiefly on self-interest to effect his objects, and leaves the individual to act almost without direction. The Russian concentrates in one man the whole power of society. The main principle of the former is liberty; of the latter, despotism. Their respective points of departure are different; they move in opposite directions; but each seems to be called, in the secret designs of Providence, to hold in its hands at some future day the destinies of one half the world.

While this prophecy is remarkable in many ways, fortunately it is not quite accurate, because outside the realm of these two giants there remains still a powerful element which can play an important part in maintaining the peace of the world. When the minister was setting forth the Canadian position, he made reference to the relationship between Canada and other countries which it is believed will tend to delay, if not to prevent, a conflict between these two giants.

As the minister has pointed out, the position of Canada, as a middle power, is a difficult one from many angles. By reason of our origin, our economy and, I was going to say, our internal diplomacy, we have a certain facility for meeting and dealing with other people which makes us useful agents in all international gatherings. Our services are sometimes sought; our vanity is flattered. In fact we are but a minor, if not altogether a humble, member of the united nations. That fact is pointed out clearly in the minister's departmental report for the year 1947. When the time came to make peace, to prescribe the conditions upon which peace should be made with Germany and with Austria, Canada was not consulted. We received a note informing us that we might communicate, not with the council of foreign ministers but with the special deputies of the council of foreign ministers. We protested, and there the matter ended.

It is probably well that from time to time we should learn of our own relative insignificance, that we may not be unduly exalted when taking part in international discussions and conferences. Canada seeks peace. That is the chief object of Canada's association with other nations. Within the last few years we have come into a position of responsibility. We are neophytes in the practice of this art or profession of international politics; and it behooves us to be extremely careful lest we be imposed upon, and that, while tendering our good offices, we are not made the agents of those who are willing to avail themselves of our youth and vigour to aid them in their own political difficulties.

I am not going to refer in detail to many of the countries or all the problems to which the minister has made reference. I am fully aware of the difficulties incidental to the solution of many of the problems that come before the united nations. At the end of the war, when it was decided that another effort should be made to establish a body which could govern the world and keep predatory nations in hand, Canada entered willingly and ardently upon the undertaking to form a body whose duty it would be to maintain peace, do away with servitude, protect human rights, and give to the world at large many of the blessings enjoyed in her homeland.

The united nations was set up amid high hopes. It was my privilege to assist at a meeting of the general assembly last autumn. I admit that probably I did not see this great organism in the most favourable circumstances. I saw it while it was dealing with the Palestinian question, a question which has baffled and tortured the ingenuity of many peoples for some scores of years and which does not yet appear to have yielded to treatment.

It is not my intention to criticize any of those who took part in the proceedings which led to the decision that the partition of Palestine should take place. I do think, however, Canada should profit by that experience. Other countries, too, can profit by the same lessons. It was said, and there was something to justify the allegations, that domestic political necessities bore very heavily upon this decision. Whether or not that be true, Canada displayed there an enthusiasm which was perhaps more indicative of youth and good will than of mature experience. We took it for granted that partition would be enforced, without inquiring carefully by what agency or in what way.

In recommending partition the general assembly also voted to appoint a five-man united nations commission, consisting of representatives of Bolivia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Panama and the Philippines, to proceed to Palestine under the aegis of the security council and take over from the British government when it terminated its mandate. To one not altogether familiar with the ways of internationalists, it seemed that the selection of the countries I have mentioned for this important and difficult task indicated that the matter had not been considered in all its aspects. I feel that the Jewish people of Canada, who were very much interested in the solution which was promised by partition, have ground, not to criticize their own government, to regret that this matter was dealt with in a way which did not take into consideration all that enforcement of this policy of partition meant.

There is this to be recalled, that throughout the meetings at Flushing and Lake Success in the autumn of 1947 there was but one issue in which the Soviets took any common interest with the other nations. That was the partition of Palestine. The Soviets were very ardent in their advocacy of this policy, which has now failed. I think that is not too definite a term to use because, whatever may happen, in the result the united nations has suffered a set-back from the manner in which this question has been dealt with. That set-back should be turned to account; and Canada with other nations should recall at all times that in matters of international relations the responsibility for one's actions is very great indeed.

I point this out because thirteen years ago Canada suddenly abandoned a position in international affairs which had been taken perhaps without sufficient consideration. I refer to the sanctions imposed upon Italy in 1935.

It is to be hoped that in dealing with these matters in the future Canada will not give her support until she has satisfactory assurance that the policy determined upon is one which can and will be executed.

The other question which is of supreme interest to the world at large, and to Canada in particular, is the peril that confronts liberty loving people as a result of the attitude of Soviet Russia. Canada wants peace. It wants peace—not at any price—it wants peace if it is possible to have it without the sacrifice of those things which we hold so important, so essential that, for their preservation, she would go to war.

Here I suggest it is most important that Canada give attention to local conditions. We need to maintain peace to give the world the impression that we are strong and ready to protect ourselves. This means in the first place that we should have armaments, and in the second place that we should have allies. It means, above all, and most important, that we should be at one, that we should be unanimous in our attitude toward peace and war.

Beginning first with the last requisite I have mentioned, it is just there that I feel Canada is not at her best. We know there are a great many honest, good and sincere people in Canada who do not believe that this country is in any peril. There are vast elements of our population who, through the last war, and also through the first one, felt that Canada had no direct interest in those wars, and that they were imperialistic wars. There are people in Canada who believe, and believe honestly, that there is in this land a vast, probably a predominating, element which is imperialistic. They believe that if these so-called imperialists had to choose between an interest that was purely British and one purely Canadian, they would select the British interest to the exclusion and to the detriment of the Canadian.

I know many people who hold these opinions. I respect their views; I believe they are in error. I wish to maintain the uncontroversial tone of this debate, but I think it is here that government, that statesmanship and that patriotism can render their greatest service to Canada.

If Canada is not in peril, if the attitude of the government is dictated by interests which are other than Canadian, then there is no reason to fear; there is no reason to prepare. But if in fact there is a peril, that should be made clear to everybody. These good people, these honest people, these people who love Canada just as ardently as anyone else, but who disbelieve that there is danger, should be afforded the opportunity of joining in resistance to a real menace. The government should help them to a realization of the facts.

In other days many Canadians have been interested in foreign matters only because of their reactions upon domestic politics. I hope we have passed out of that era. If we have passed on to another plane and are accepting and acknowledging our international responsibilities as a member of the assembly of the united nations and as a member of the security council, it behooves us to make clear to our people exactly what our situation is. If we can do away with controversy as to the facts; if we can come into agreement as to whether or not there is a peril and as to whether or not that peril is Canada's, then I am confident that we shall have united support for Canada's foreign policy and a most effective agency for the maintenance of peace.

It is an invitation to hostilities for a nation to be divided in its foreign policy. It was said in this chamber on the eve of the last war, when the very clouds were dripping with disaster, that it was unthinkable that Canada should go to Europe to fight for democracy there. That was dangerous talk. If the government can take the people of Canada into its confidence; if it can point out to them that there is a great and real peril I believe that it will have done much, not only for the unity of Canada but for the maintenance of world peace.

These questions are always difficult of discussion, because one wishes to keep away from controversial matters. At the same time there is imposed upon one the obligation of stating how a unified and strong and sincere national sentiment may be evolved. Communism has opened up differences and divergencies between men more far-reaching and rending than any the human race has ever known.

As was stated in the quotation which I read, the philosophy which seeks to dominate humankind by taking from it the exercise of its freedom of will and action, which are the outstanding characteristics of humanity, is a threat which is more terrible in its consequences than any that the civilized peoples of the west have had to face for a long time. However, we can derive some cheer from one aspect of the situation. Communism is a purely materialistic doctrine. It is one which restricts its activities to the physical. As the minister said, you need to have only one successful communist election, because once the communist is in power he uses that power to maintain himself there and to destroy all of everything that savours of liberty.

I say we can derive some consolation from the fact that communism, terrible as it is, ruthless as it is, is an entirely materialistic philosophy and in consequence it cannot tap those bottomless wells of supernatural vigour and spiritual dynamism which make for the triumph of just causes. But it is not enough merely to belabour the communist and to criticize his methods and his attitude toward society. We must in our land improve conditions and make the winning of a living here so equitable and so attractive that the communistic seed, even if it should sprout, will not reach great heights and will never yield an abundant crop.

This debate is somewhat of an innovation. In the past we have had statements by the minister of external affairs on questions which were more or less academic. But now for the first time I think we have heard from a minister who has had to assume responsibility for Canada's foreign policy in an anxious world; and while the responsibility is great and the change has been very rapid from the time when we first had any voice in foreign affairs, I like to think that from this new responsibility and that from the very dangers, the very perils, the very burdens which are inherent to adolescence, if not to maturity in this new sphere, we shall achieve in our land a more complete understanding between the different sections and elements that go to make it up.

Our position is a difficult one. We have an extremely powerful and an extremely bountiful and an extremely friendly neighbour. But it is well to recall that certain restraints must be observed to maintain friendship in a neighbourhood. A little bit of forgetfulness, a little bit of licence, taking too much for granted, sometimes upset what was destined to be and what has been a delightful relationship. I hope that we shall be able to continue our relationship with our good neighbour to the south, and there is no reason to anticipate that we shall not, so long as we are respectful of him and respectful of ourselves and do not rely on that neighbour out of his bounty to do too much for us.

I regret—this may be a little outside the debate, Mr. Speaker—that we have found it necessary to borrow money from the government of the United States. Borrowing puts a strain on friendship. The neighbour might not want back what is owing to him; but until he gets it back we shall owe it to him, and we shall owe him a little bit of that deference, a little bit of that servitude which one good neighbour is happier if he does not owe to another.

There is one other aspect of our foreign relations on which I should like to dwell for a moment. I heard the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) make a very interesting speech the other night. He said that it would be well if appeals to the privy council could be terminated, our relations with England through the privy council brought to an end. I do not wish to insinuate that he said anything which was not proper. He expressed a very respectable opinion in most respectful language, but it raised a point that I want to discuss—our relationship with Europe. We are the umbilical cord; we are the only direct line of communication that exists between the new world and the old, with its wealth of experience and learning, tradition and all that goes to make up that civilization which was the heritage of our forebears whether they came from the British isles, from France or from any other country of the western world. We are the sole direct channel of relationship between the old world and the new. It is out of that east and west relationship which took its origin in the zeal of the missionaries, the restlessness of the pathfinders; it is from those who were seeking the road to Cathay, who were seeking their way to the abundance of the orient, seeking their way to the Pacific and the treasures beyond—it is out of that relationship that Canada came into existence, and it is because of its maintenance that Canada is something different from that which is around us today. If Canada is Canada and distinct from other countries of the continent; if our institutions are a little more secure; if our respect for the past is a little more pronounced, it is because of that continued relationship with the old world. It is because we are in more direct touch with that which has been the source and pride of western civilization, and which is in peril today, that we as children of that great heritage have been trying in our small way to assist in the rehabilitation of Europe.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, I have searched in vain in the report of the Department of External Affairs for any reference to the bill which was passed last session entitled, I believe, the Visiting Forces Act. I looked upon that as an act of major importance because it conceded to a friend and neighbour very substantial and unusual rights, among them the right of setting up in Canada his own courts of justice that members of visiting forces might be tried and punished here according to the laws of the United States.

Whatever may be thought of the legislation, I think it is of sufficient importance to have been mentioned in the report of the minister. I hope that in the next report we shall find that it has been repealed by mutual consent.

There is only one more matter to which I wish to refer, and while it is in a minor key compared with some of the matters that have been discussed this afternoon, it is of considerable importance. I refer to the customs and immigration posts at the frontier.

Our customs offices and immigration offices on the border remind one very much of what one saw in the old world on the eve of the war. There are in the immediate offing of these establishments high-powered motorcars; there are young arsenals, and there are officers whose military bearing and general demeanour spell force and militarism in some of its objectionable aspects.

The customs laws and the immigration laws must be respected; they provide for the punishment of those who break them. It is unfortunate that a borderland of such length, one concerning which we have been proud to declare, for a hundred years, that it has been undefended by fortifications or arms, should be marred by these miniature and pigmy fortresses.

The minister I know will not consider it beneath his dignity to give some attention to these matters, because he too comes from the borderland and knows of the friendly feeling that has always existed between the peoples of the two countries. Recently social intercourse and relations generally between the friendly people on both sides of this international boundary have been profoundly interfered with by the difficulties of border crossing.

I think we owe it to ourselves and to the neighbourly spirit in which we have lived for these hundred years to do something toward reducing these monuments to barbarism which we erect without necessity along our international frontiers. We are probably no more to blame than our neighbours, but I like to think that if the minister would turn his attention seriously to this matter, in collaboration with the secretary for foreign affairs in the United States, he could do much to make less difficult the practice of friendship by the people who live along these frontiers.

It is well to remember, Mr. Speaker, that most of our people live along the frontier. It is said that 95 per cent of Canada's population is within 200 miles of the frontiers of the United States and that 90 per cent of it is within 100 miles of that country. Nearly our entire population live in areas adjacent to or almost immediately adjacent to the international boundary. Therefore much would be done to add to their comfort, to say nothing of the edifying example to be given to the foreign visitor, if these unnecessary impediments to circulation, amity and understanding were made less awesome and the difficulties to international relations reduced.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to two speeches which I think should set a very high standard for this debate. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon dealt with the more immediate problems facing the country and the world, and the government's policy in relation to those problems. Before the dinner recess and tonight the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) gave us one of those rare treats when he placed before us the historic background of many of the problems which we face today. With the introduction contained in those two speeches I think we have had the beginning of a debate which should reach a high standard indeed. I wish to congratulate both hon. gentlemen.

During the war the C.C.F., the movement which we represent, continually urged upon the nation that we should prepare for the winning of the peace as well as for the winning of the war. We said at the time that war aims and peace aims were one and indivisible, and that it was not sufficient merely to say that we intended to destroy the nazi and fascist regimes.

When, three years ago almost to the day, we met in San Francisco in the closing days of the war, we hoped that the nations gathered there would find the basis of friendship and understanding. We established the united nations which, in spite of all its deficiencies, remains the only instrument for co-operation among the nations of the world. In spite of all its defects, it has served already as the forum for public discussion of many of the grave problems that face us in the realm of international affairs. In the forum of the general assembly there have been discussed and examined critical issues which might have been hidden away and led to graver difficulties had the full glare of publicity not been shed upon them. Its social and economic agencies are performing essential services in the cause of human welfare and, therefore, of world peace. We regret, of course, that so far several important aspects of the charter have not been put into effect. I think this is particularly disappointing, when it is remembered that the principal powers have failed to call together their military staffs and to organize the international force for the prevention of aggression that we expected would be established.

The C.C.F. gave support to the united nations charter. We believe that the first principle of Canada's foreign policy should be continued participation in and active support of the united nations organization, its principal organs and specialized agencies. I think it is true to say that Canada has already played an important part, not only in establishing those agencies but in giving support to them and endeavouring to fulfil the obligations inherent in the decisions that have been made. As I say, we believe that our external policies should be based firmly on the principles of the united nations charter even—and I am glad the minister this afternoon emphasized the point I am about to make—if on occasion the proposals of Canada run counter to those of any other nation, great or small.

Those of us who have attended the meetings of the assembly realize that the statements of our government, on behalf of Canada, urging the simplification of the procedure to be followed in the assembly and in the associated bodies, meet with the support of the majority, not only of the people in our own country but, I believe, of people everywhere all across the world. We believe that we must do everything in our power to strengthen the united nations organization, to assist in the development of the economic and social council and its specialized agencies, and to endeavour to develop all these, not only because they are useful in themselves but as first steps in the expansion of the united nations organization into an effective organ of government at the international level.

We realize that a suggestion of this sort necessarily involves something else. It involves the relinquishment of certain privileges associated with what I believe to be an out-moded national sovereignty. Although it means the relinquishment of an out-moded sovereignty, in reality it is not a restriction of effective sovereignty. In reality it is an extension of national sovereignty, because it enables us to take part in decisions affecting not only our own welfare but the peace and welfare of the whole world. In other words, it expands the influence we have from the realm of our own domestic situation into the realm of the affairs of the great world at large. Although some of us assembled in this chamber today may never live to see the united nations organization become the instrument of government at the international level, I believe that the day will come—indeed, it must come—when that goal will be reached by humanity. I believe it is because we have failed to grasp this very fact that the nations at large, and the masses of people in those nations, are today in revolt, if I may use that term, against exploitation and oppression.

The democratic nations sometimes have compromised themselves and placed themselves at a disadvantage in the struggle for democracy and the ending of oppression throughout the world. In other words, because of the international situation the democratic nations at times have appeared to be on the side of reactionary interests across the world, such as feudal rulers in the near and middle east and so on. This at times has placed the democratic nations in an unfortunate light before the rest of the world.

Unfortunately, during the conflict, because of the necessities of war the great powers—and therefore the nations associated with them in the war—committed themselves to various kinds of old-fashioned agreements, dividing the world into spheres of influence and sharing the spoils of victory, in order to maintain the grand alliance that ensured victory. We used to hear eulogies of Teheran, Yalta and the Potsdam agreements. But we must remember that, at those conferences—as we now well know—the great powers set aside important pledges which were made during the war and which in some respects were embodied in the Atlantic charter. By some parts of these agreements the Atlantic charter was nullified and set aside.

Since the war ended, territories have been annexed, innocent people have been displaced, political dissidents have been sent to forced labour in mines and forests, and governments have been established or supported which would not conform to the desires of the people of those countries if they had an opportunity to express themselves freely in regard to them. We condoned—and I am not speaking of our own nation alone—the annexation of the Baltic republics and East Prussia by Russia and Poland; and we raised no objection when the United States retained control of Pacific islands which it proposed to use as military and naval bases.

The two great powers about which we have heard so much today, the two giants as my hon. friend called them, Russia and the United States, which emerged from the war as the dominant nations of our time, each in its own way has proceeded to preach and, wherever possible, practise its own economic and social way of life throughout the world. But I do not think we should ever forget that the devastated and war-worn people of western Europe have realized that capitalism as we have known it in North America cannot be revived; for the destruction wrought by both war and the nazi regime scuttled capitalist ownership in Europe, and indeed scuttled it also in parts of Asia.

I now want to say that we welcome and support the European recovery program, because we believe it will give the nations of western Europe an opportunity to rebuild their economies in accordance with their needs. I am glad that this afternoon both the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Stanstead, speaking on behalf of the government and the official opposition, placed their parties squarely behind this very important project. We believe the European recovery program will give the western democracies an opportunity to rebuild their war-torn economies. I think we have to remember that no rehabilitation of the war-torn continent of Europe could be undertaken without the generous economic help of the United States. We regret profoundly that the Soviet union and the countries associated with it rejected the opportunity of uniting with the rest of Europe in this recovery program. Because of that refusal, the division between the east and the west has been deepened, and another chance for the immediate establishment of a firm economic foundation for European peace and indeed world peace has been lost.

Sixteen co-operating nations are developing a joint program of international planning for the co-operative allocation and use of their resources; and, as I have said, we of the C.C.F. warmly welcome the proposals. Indeed we join with the democratic socialist parties of other countries in their determination that the administration of the program, as far as we are able to exercise any influence at all, if it is to be successful must not interfere with the democratic right of the European peoples to control and determine their own social and economic destinies.

We believe that Canada, for her part, should support and assist the program, and respect the right, which we ourselves must guard carefully in our own country, of all nations to determine their own purely domestic policies. The reconstruction of western Europe holds out hope that the nations joining together in this project will provide a positive alternative to the economic tyranny of private monopoly on the one hand and political tyranny of totalitarian dictatorship on the other.

This afternoon the hon. member for Stanstead spoke of the ancient policy of the balance of power. That policy has gone; but perchance the democratic nations of western Europe may, in the words of Leon Blum, become the third force in the world, which indeed may hold a new kind of balance, so that an aggressor, from wherever he comes, will know that against him would be thrown the weight of the democratic nations of western Europe.

We believe, then, that the rehabilitation and unification of the western European democracies may become one of the guarantees of world peace. We also believe that if the reconstruction of western Europe is to be carried out in a manner that will be beneficial to all concerned, the development of western Europe as an economic unit must be based on the principles of democratic social ownership, principally for the reasons I gave a few moments ago when I said the war and the nazi regime had destroyed the very basis of large-scale private ownership on the continent of Europe.

I should like to add that, even though some governments or political parties in Europe have not accepted these principles for European reconstruction, that should be no excuse for refusing to co-operate with them or indeed to give every possible assistance in their attempt at democratic reconstruction. After all, the very basis of democracy is intelligent compromise; and one of the reasons that among the democratic nations we have found it so difficult to come to understandings with the representatives of the Soviet union is that, as Mr. Gromyko said in an address at Lake Success not so long ago, in the Soviet dictionary there is no word for compromise. In a democracy there must be intelligent discussion leading to intelligent compromise. That is the way in which we make progress in these democratic countries.

We believe that, if carried out, the union of European peoples will provide the world with a strong democratic political force making for peace, thus reducing the dangers of a Soviet-United States conflict. At this stage may I add that I agree with those—and they are many, among the leaders of all the nations of the world—who say that, while conditions across the world are disturbing, there is no reason to believe that war should be either imminent or inevitable.

We do not, of course, regard the union of western democracies as a mere military alliance, but rather as a means for close economic co-operation among the member nations. This, may I add, does not rule out the necessity, in the kind of world in which we live, of nations placing themselves in such a position that they may withstand any attack that may be made upon them. Because of this; because we believe that close economic co-operation among the member nations is fundamental to the welfare of those nations and the world, we believe that Canada and our sister dominions of the British commonwealth should plan their trade and resources as far as possible to strengthen this union of democracies. That, I take it, is precisely what the Secretary of State for External Affairs had in mind in the last part of his address this afternoon.

I said this should not be regarded as a mere military alliance. Unfortunately, of course, there is a great deal of war hysteria among the nations of the world today. Considerations of military strategy and power are responsible for this; and I fear that we in the western democracies, as I said a bit earlier, from time to time have given support to reactionary movements, for example in Greece and elsewhere, and have taken no effective steps against the fascist dictatorship in Spain. Canada has given help to Chiang Kai-shek in the Chinese civil war without any guarantee—and this is the point I want to make—that he intends to introduce essential agrarian and others reforms, or to root out the widespread corruption and inefficiency in the administration that Secretary of State Marshall drew to the attention of the United States and the world when he returned to Washington from China some months ago. The help to which I refer differs fundamentally from aid for European rehabilitation. We believe that Canada should endeavour to urge and follow a more democratic and constructive policy with respect to the matters I have criticized.

Obviously, military and power considerations explain the policies of the Soviet union, which have brought one eastern European country after another under its domination. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out this afternoon, recent events in Czechoslovakia show clearly that political freedom and liberty are completely extinguished in any country which comes under communist domination. In all these countries, the free democratic socialist parties have disappeared. Those who share our views, with whom we have met at international conferences, are either imprisoned, silenced, or living in exile abroad.

The Soviet union has refused to take part in the recovery program. Communist parties everywhere have set out to frustrate its implementation. I criticized the western democracies a few minutes ago because of their support of reactionary elements in Greece. But the Soviet union refuses to co-operate with the Balkan commission set up by the united nations, and its lead has been followed by communist controlled nations surrounding that unhappy country.

Had co-operation been established with the Balkan commission, it might well be that reactionary elements in the Greek government might have been replaced by more democratic elements in that country, and a government more satisfactory to the democratic nations might have attained power.

The fact that we condemned British and American policy in this area, though, does not justify in any way the Soviet in ignoring a properly constituted united nations agency. If nations are members of the united nations, then they should fulfil the obligations that flow from that membership. One of the obligations is that they co-operate with commissions and organizations set up to do things which are necessary in connection with the welfare and peace of the world.

A few minutes ago I criticized our government's policy in regard to China. But looking at the other side of the picture, in Korea the Soviet union has refused the united nations commission entry into its zone. It has refused co-operation in the holding of elections under united nations supervision; but instead, it is busily setting up a puppet government for all Korea in its own zone.

We criticized the failure of the western powers to encourage the demand of the German people for social ownership in the industrial areas of that country; but, in the eastern zone, Soviet forces have successfully destroyed the social democratic party by forcing its fusion with the communists, and Germany is divided into two parts.

Then, of course, there is unreasonable use of the veto in the security council, a veto which Canada, in common with other nations assembled at San Francisco accepted on the distinct understanding that it would be used only in very exceptional circumstances. This use of the veto has been abused on a number of occasions. Then, delay in agreeing to discussions for establishing an international police force has certainly not improved the situation. I remember that in 1946 when we met at Lake Success, and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke on behalf of the Canadian delegation; the immediate establishment of such a force was the principal request made by Canada at that time. I hope that on every possible occasion—and now that we are represented on the security council, those occasions will arise more frequently—our representatives will urge the establishment of that international body for the prevention of aggression and for the disciplining of those who wantonly attack others. If we had such an organization at the present time the picture with regard to Palestine might be transformed.

Then, boycotting of the little assembly by the Soviet union; its opposition to any effective international control of atomic energy—all these have added to the dangerous situation which has developed in our international relations over the last two or three months.

The C.C.F. believes that Canada should resist any attempt by the forces of communism or those of monopoly capitalism, or fascism, to dominate the world. For our part we shall continue to fight against totalitarianism and dictatorships of every kind, whether they come from the so-called communist left or from the fascist or capitalist right.

We believe sincerely that Canada must participate in the defence of freedom and democracy everywhere; but we say that neither communism nor totalitarian forces in any form will be stopped by denunciation and warlike propaganda. The best defence of democracy lies in the establishment of social and economic justice, and in respect for those fundamental human freedoms which are the basis of our own democratic way of life. As the minister said this afternoon, whether we happen to be members of the Progressive Conservative, the Liberal, the C.C.F., the Social Credit or any other party, we all live under these democratic institutions. And any party or anyone who denies the principles of the fundamental rights of human freedom is not a democrat in the sense in which that term is used in our society.

The blind fear of another world war must not replace proper action to provide the hungry world with bread, freedom and the right of all peoples to control their own destinies. I say that these should be some of the aims, indeed the principal aims, of Canada's external policy.

I well remember, and I am sure the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) will remember, how, when we were setting up the economic and social council at San Francisco, again and again it was emphasized that if we wished to establish peace in the world the people of the world must be fed. Prior to the war—the situation is worse since—about half the people in the world did not know what it was from day to day, every day of every week of every month of every year, to be guaranteed a full stomach, to be guaranteed the bread they needed in order to sustain life.

So, then, because of the urgent necessity for the achievement of these humanitarian policies, we must not allow the recovery of Europe to be hampered by the failure of the great powers to reach a basis for a peace settlement with Germany and Austria. We know that, prior to the war, German industry was vital to the economic health of Europe and the world. Divided into two parts, that country remains a danger to world peace. We know that every effort must be made to reconstruct the economies of the defeated countries in a manner that will make possible both the immediate improvement in living standards and the eventual unification of Germany as a democratic state.

The industries of the Ruhr which are vital to the welfare of the whole of Europe we believe should be placed under public ownership and under international control, so that the resources of the Ruhr may be used for the welfare of all Europe, including Germany itself. May I say in passing it is not my own thought that Germany should be allowed to rebuild her heavy industries so that she might become a threat to the future peace of the world. I said they should be under international control.

The present deadlock among the foreign ministers must be ended, even if Canada and other smaller powers have to ask that the united nations call a special peace conference for the purpose of achieving a settlement. It seems to me that the group of nations that are not of the five great powers cannot allow this matter to drag along and they should endeavour to call a peace conference to make a peace settlement with Germany and with Austria as soon as possible.

My time does not permit me to deal at any length with Japan, but I believe that Canada should press for early action in the drafting of a peace treaty with Japan. I agree wholeheartedly with the minister of external affairs who said this afternoon that Japan should not be rebuilt in such a manner that she may again become a menace to the orient and the rest of the world.

I should like to say a few words about Palestine. The right hon. gentleman dealt this afternoon with the problem of Palestine. This vexed question is before us once again. Canada in common with a majority of the nations, supported partition of the country on a political basis with economic union. The long and exhaustive inquiry into the conditions in that distressed country resulted in the considered opinion of the nations, taken democratically in the assembly and by the requisite majority, that the settlement suggested by the Palestine commission was the only one which seemed to offer any hope of a solution of the problem. So Canada quite properly supported it.

It was obvious from the beginning that extremists, both Arab and Jewish, had brought about a situation in which the use of united nations forces would be necessary in order to prevent more bloodshed when the British mandate ended on May 15, particularly when the British removed the last of their troops as they intend to do before August 1 of this year. I think we can all understand and sympathize with the present position of the British government; this position is understandable. The people of the United Kingdom will not tolerate a further loss of British lives in a single-handed attempt to preserve order in Palestine. I think that is the position of the British people and no democratic government can gainsay what the people want to do.

Obviously, when partition was decided upon and the forthright statement of the British authorities made, that come what may they would relinquish their responsibilities on May 15, the united nations should have made immediate arrangements for the protection of human life and property while the decision of the assembly was being carried out. That has not been done. An international police force was not established and no other steps have been taken to fill the gap. Here we are on April 29 facing a condition which may not only bring about within two weeks bloodshed and devastation in Palestine but may create an international situation fraught with grave dangers to us all.

I think the United States must bear considerable blame—that is not often said, but I think it should be said—for the situation which has developed. She has recently proposed a trustee system, but as far as I am aware she has not offered any definite proposals as to how this trustee system should be set up or what the plan of trusteeship may be. In our opinion —here again I am going to agree with the minister of external affairs—Canada, which played such an important part in bringing about the agreement last autumn, should in the meantime continue to support the plan adopted by the assembly. It was the only plan that seemed to be at all feasible last autumn, and it was approved by the assembly itself.

We should urge the United States to place immediately before the united nations its own plan for the settlement of the difficulties which have arisen in Palestine. If that were done I take it that our great neighbour to the south would then be obligated to participate fully in carrying out any plan which she herself suggested. Having proposed trusteeship, in our view it is the obligation of the United States, as I have said, to place clear and definite proposals before the present assembly and to take a leading part in carrying out whatever may be the decision of the united nations. In other words, I agree with the general viewpoint expressed by the minister in this regard this afternoon—a position of anxious expectation, awaiting definite proposals.

These are some of the great problems that face us at the present time. If I may just refer again to Palestine, we think Canada too should support—if I may emphasize this—the decision of the united nations and at the same time press the security council, of which we are a member, or the assembly, of which we are also a member, for adequate means to prevent further bloodshed in Palestine. To allow the situation to drift would bring distrust of the united nations itself and run the risk of a grave international crisis, the result of which may bring widespread suffering and distress to millions throughout the world.

I see that my time has expired, but before I sit down I want to say that the suggestions which I have placed before the house and the discussion on foreign policy which I have made is not only the viewpoint I hold myself; it is the viewpoint of the party for which I speak. I may say that I went over my rather extensive notes with my colleagues yesterday. So I want it to be known that I believe I speak, not only for myself, but for the movement which we represent.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the address presented to the house this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). I want to compliment him most sincerely on what I consider to be a great effort. I believe the declaration he made this afternoon will go down in history as one of the great declarations on foreign policy made in this country. Of course that does not mean that I agree with everything that was said and I am sure the minister would not expect that much of all of us. But if I do disagree with some things it is more the things which he did not say than the things which he did put before us today.

The world situation as revealed by the minister this afternoon, and as one reads about it and watches its kaleidoscopic changes, is certainly one to sober the most frivolous of Canadians. The developments since the summer of 1945 I think can best be described in a general way as a serious deterioration. In many respects the people of the world are abiding in an atmosphere which is somewhat similar in some respects to that which covered the earth in 1938, with the added fear today that stems from the fact that this is the atomic age. Certainly we of this day are groping in confusion and uncertainty; and one is led to ask, where is the brave new world that we were told some years ago we were sacrificing and fighting for during the years from 1939 to 1945, and which was held out to the peoples in the western world to obtain from them an all-out effort against the totalitarian aggressors?

The report of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), after his visit to Europe last autumn, and the speech we heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon have served finally to dispel any illusions at any rate that I might have had that we had even caught hold of the tail of that so-called brave new world.

It is just as well, I think, to take account of some of the things that world war II did to mankind. Nobody won that war. Nobody ever wins a war. Every nation emerged from it materially and physically weakened and, in my judgment, with a considerable decline in the standards of morality and of decency. I suppose that such a result was to be expected as a natural consequence of the training which millions of men from all nations had to be given in the arts of carnage and destruction if they were to win over other millions who were extremely well trained in cruel brutality and complete disregard of human life and suffering. Millions from many nations simply cannot emerge from such training and such activities without some adverse effect upon the general will to resist evil. That, Mr. Speaker, was one of the results or adverse effects that emerged from world war II that I wanted to mention.

Out of that same war, as has already been said, some of the nations emerged all but completely destroyed as great powers. England's vitality was seriously sapped until she could no longer take the initiative in world movements for recovery. Germany was and still is prostrate; France was neutralized, or better, paralysed; Italy had become completely a dependent country. On the other hand

Russia, under the impetus of war and military necessity, discovered sources of new strength and suddenly she became very aggressive. The will to resist her aggression seems to have been dead for two long years and, as a consequence, much of Europe has already fallen to communism. I need only mention Poland, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Roumania, and lately Czechoslovakia, which have become satellite states. It has now become clear to all of us, as the minister so well said this afternoon, that Russia aims at European and Asiatic domination at least, and most likely world domination, for she is convinced that communism and capitalistic enterprise cannot long face each other without armed conflict and without one completely destroying the other.

The picture is by no means complete without mention of the United States and a group of small nations all of which emerged from the war greatly strengthened in some respects, although most of them were materially and physically weakened. The United States demonstrated during the war what free capitalistic enterprise can do in an emergency. Without the immense production from that country and from Britain and Canada, Russia would probably have fallen to Germany's military might. It is now known that most of the time that Russia was receiving help from both Britain and the United States she was plotting her post-war drive for world domination at the end of the war. The initiative or leadership in sponsoring world recovery passed to the United States, and she has become the natural leader of the free democratic nations, at least in the sense that most of the remaining free nations look to her because of her very great industrial power, her very large population, her immense wealth and because of her expressed determination to preserve freedom of enterprise and all the other freedoms.

But our good neighbour to the south also came out of that war ambitious, money-proud, and more materialistic, and with an increase in that spirit of self-interest which was mentioned by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) this afternoon.

Today the world is divided into two camps, each with its mighty champion: Russia in the east, and the United States in the west. How long they can face each other without armed conflict I suppose no one can say. I am not one of those who believe that war is inevitable. I believe that war can be avoided, but I will say, sir, I am convinced that the only way we can avoid a conflict is for the remaining free nations to band themselves together and thus provide a preponderance of united economic, moral and material strength to prevent further aggression by any totalitarian state or any group of totalitarian states. At the same time I am convinced that we must revitalize and rehabilitate democracy by removing social injustice just as fast as we possibly can and by extending opportunities for our peoples to find for themselves contentment and happiness in real freedom. Only in that way can we demonstrate the superiority of the democratic way of life over the communist way of life.

The world picture is not complete without some mention of another force at work in the societies of the world. The minister did not mention it this afternoon, and I hardly expected him to. I do not believe he is convinced that this force exists, but there are a good many people who are thoroughly convinced that it exists. I am one of those who are convinced of the existence of a group of men, some three or four hundred in number, certainly not less, perhaps more, most of them internationalists and strong advocates of internationalism, who control vast sources of wealth. By means of alliances, interlocking directorates, and machinations of one kind and another they are fast gaining control of the money of the globe.

This is what we in this group have often referred to as world or international finance. It is a tyrannical force just as dangerous and as anti-social as communism. Its tools are imperialism in one form or another, and centralization, which finds its ultimate expression in international cartels. It aims—I speak of international finance—to get control of the economies of the globe. The members of this ring have influence with governments out of all proportion to their numbers, and they are the only beneficiaries of war, which makes it a serious consideration for all mankind.

It seems to me, therefore, that freedom-loving people are faced with two unrighteous forces working for their enslavement—international finance on the one hand, and international communism on the other, the latter proposing to control the people of the globe and to use as its tool the workingman, the proletariat.

The aim of both these forces, international communism and international finance, is power—power over the world. There are many keen students of the whole situation who see behind the scenes co-operation of these two forces. Is it possible that finance and communism, having destroyed the axis powers, having operated quite openly together for a time, and having at last divided the entire world of power into two tremendous conflicting camps, have now reached the parting of the ways? I wonder. Is it possible that now, facing each other, the one is determined to crush the other, the other to crush the one? I confess Mr. Speaker, I do not know. Certainly there is evidence to support an affirmative answer, and that is one reason why I mention this matter tonight. That is one reason why we must see to it that men and women are put into offices of authority who will get the evidence and give it to the people—conclusive evidence one way or the other.

If we Social Crediters are wrong, for goodness sake come out and show us that we are wrong.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): It is easy, very easy.

Mr. LOW: I am looking, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member who said it is easy to get up on his two feet in this house and show us.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): I shall.

Mr. LOW: A witness of some authority—I could quote any number but I have not the time tonight—has presented evidence. Upton Close in his weekly "Closer Ups" for August 5, 1946, had this to say:

> Some of my readers have been unable to understand my reference to a new school of big capitalist-communism growing up in America and Britain. It is the same school which, when the time comes, will take us into war with Russia, so that out of the wreckage it can make its group dictators of the round earth.

I do not say that I know the answer, not by any means, but I am convinced that we are in danger from international financial power-hungry men, just as much as we are in danger from international communism. Let us, therefore, not become so preoccupied with the one, international communism, that we fail to prepare our defences and our effective offensive against the other force. I feel that there is danger that we are doing that very thing.

I turn now to another phase of the whole question of international policy, or foreign policy, the question of building a foreign policy for Canada.

As the minister said this afternoon. and said so well, an international policy is a thing of many phases and many aspects. There is defence; there is the question of trade; there is the question of international co-operation, and it even extends into the field of international toleration—all these things. But I say, sir, just briefly, that there are at least two ways of planning any aspect of foreign policy.

In the first place, we might decide what we want and work out a plan of achieving it or implementing it, and then announce or publicize it. That is one way. The second way is to announce the plan first and then improvise ways and means of implementing it as you go along.

The United States seems to have followed the latter method, announcing a policy and then improvising means of implementing it as it goes along. What has been the result? Well, it looks to me as though the United States has got herself into a real jam. Not only that, but she has caused the united nations to lose much of what prestige it did have in the world.

In the past few years Canada has, I think, allowed herself to be too much influenced by the policies of the United States of America. Moreover, I think we have been too hasty in committing Canada before the people have been made familiar with what our policy really is. We ought to be much more careful about this in the future. The people of Canada should know where we are headed and, further, they should have a right good idea of the price they will have to pay for the external policies pursued by their government.

I maintain that the people have not been made aware of the price which they will have to pay for the policies to which we have been committed by this government since 1945. In my opinion it is unsafe for us to follow too much the lead of the United States. I say this for various reasons and I will cite just two or three.

In the first place, the United States is a rank amateur in foreign relations. For a good many years the United States refused to take its place in the world community of nations, practising an isolationism in which it was trained in self-interest. And since it is a rank amateur, I would hesitate very much to follow the lead of the United States until she has gained much more experience and has attained much greater stability in international relations.

There is a second reason which I think I have already mentioned, international finance. With the outbreak of world war II, Wall Street suddenly became the headquarters of practically the whole ring of international financiers. That is their headquarters today. I do not cast suspicion on the United States of America when I say what I am saying. I have great respect for our neighbours to the south. I have great love and respect for those people. My own parents came from the United States of America. But when I speak of Wall Street as being the headquarters of the international gang who are plotting, I believe, without any question in my mind, to control the finances of the world, I say we must keep our eye on Wall Street. The very fact that international finance has its headquarters in New York would lead almost any student to suspect that the men who control the international exchanges would attempt unduly to influence the government of the country in which they live. I say we should either confirm or remove completely the suspicion that Wall Street is today the head of this international gang.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): How?

Mr. LOW: I say that we must keep our eye on Wall Street.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): How are we to do that?

Mr. LOW: The third reason why I would hesitate to follow the United States in formulating external policies is this. I have been reading lately of the revelations concerning the agreements at Yalta and Teheran. I do not like to speak disrespectfully of any man who has stood at the head of a nation, but I am prepared to say that the United States made a deal with Russia at Yalta which resulted in the crucifixion of a great country, Poland.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Explain.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member would not understand even if I explained.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Hear, hear. That is right.

Mr. LOW: All the facts concerning the agreements which were made at Yalta and Teheran are just now coming to light. Poland and its crucifixion must now be looked upon as the gift which the United States was prepared to give in order to pacify the very power that is today attempting to cut the throats of United States, Canada—

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): The hon. member would have done better than Roosevelt, would he?

Mr. LOW: —and of every other free nation.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. LOW: I hope and pray, Mr. Speaker, that some time the world will witness the resurrection of Poland, and the other nations which have been sacrificed to communism, and that the United States, Canada and Britain—all of whom must bear some responsibility for that terrible thing—will repent and take their part in seeing to it that the resurrection of these countries is complete.

I should now just like to say a few words about my experience at the united nations assembly. I was deeply grateful for the opportunity of going to Lake Success. I personally complimented the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the adoption of the new policy which made it possible for members of opposition parties to go to the united nations assembly as advisers, free to speak their minds there, here or elsewhere.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Did they take your advice?

Mr. LOW: I took their advice.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I asked, did they take your advice?

Mr. LOW: No, I am afraid not.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Fortunately they did not.

Mr. LOW: I will attempt to show that it was not so fortunate, as events have turned out. As I say, I was grateful for that opportunity. I tried to do my best while I was there. For nearly a month I attended practically every session, and I was deeply interested in watching this moving drama on the world stage. It was interesting. Sometimes I found it most depressing. I watched the work for a month, and I saw there what made me feel depressed, namely a display of extremely ill-temper. I noted, sir, a serious decline in manners and in humour. As a matter of fact, I did not see much display of that commodity in the whole time I was there. I noted particularly that day after day, in some of these committee debates or discussions, free discussion amongst men degenerated into debate by—what shall I say? These people certainly departed from logic and reason, and it seemed to me that they entered into debate by studied insult. I was happy to note, however, that the democratic nations used great restraint and patience. Our representatives followed that course. I want to compliment them on the way in which they conducted themselves in that regard. Insult and the departure in debate from logic and reason were the means followed by the totalitarian states, led by Russia. Vishinsky, Gromyko, Doctor Bebler of Yugoslavia and others used that style, and they were the only ones who did so; it was somewhat depressing. But it was a measure of great satisfaction to me to note, as I say, the patience, good judgment and restraint used by the democratic nations.

I saw the assembly used by the satellites of Russia as a propaganda body. That was one reason why I believe Russia was anxious to see the headquarters of the united nations established in the United States. I could not escape the feeling that Russia supported the idea of having the united nations headquarters in the United States and the sessions of the last assembly held at Lake Success, because they knew that there was a free press there which was willing and anxious to publicize every single thing these fellows had to say—

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): That is right.

Mr. LOW: —that they had freedom of speech and could say anything they liked, which was something they could not do in their own country. The people of the United States, big-hearted as they are, were naive enough to play up Vishinsky, Gromyko and these others, putting what they said in headlines in the biggest type they could get and spreading that over the country far and wide, with every radio blaring forth the full measure of this propaganda. I recall that, after Vishinsky made his first vituperative speech, one of the Russian delegates told us at a reception that Vishinsky received thousands of telegrams, letters and cables from people in the United States complimenting him on the stand he took when he called certain people—he named a good many people in the United States, put the spotlight on them—warmongers. The Russians knew what they were doing when they supported the establishment of the headquarters of the united nations assembly in New York. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been the smartest possible move for the nations of the world to have established the headquarters of the united nations as near as they could get it to the Russian boundary.

Mr. BURTON: They would not have the free press.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Why?

An hon. MEMBER: Send him to school.

Mr. LOW: Yes. I think we had better send him to school.

At times, Mr. Speaker, as I witnessed the interplay of those forces at the united nations, I was led to feel just what Doctor Evatt of Australia so well expressed when he said, "There is a danger that the united nations is becoming all harness and no horse". However I did see a useful purpose. The assembly was certainly a sounding-board for world opinion, if it were used for that purpose; but all too frequently it was used for airing purely national politics, or for propaganda.

While I was there I attended most of the sessions of the Palestine committee, and I should like to say just a few words about the Palestine situation. I hope I may be able to deal with it objectively and fairly, because certainly I am not a partisan with respect to any of the parties concerned in the affairs of that most unfortunate country. I thought it was a marvellous debate. For the first time in history, as far as I know, the best debaters on that subject in the world met together in a body where they were unfettered, where they were free to speak without fear of unfair criticism or the smear that is all too often used in such cases when men differ one with another. I believe practically all the facts concerning that whole problem were brought before the world in those debates. After listening to the debates for about a month, up to what I thought was the rather weak declaration made by Mr. Herschel Johnson, when he declared the position of the United States after stalling for weeks to work up enough courage to do so, I came to the conclusion that the advocates of partition had failed to make out a case sufficiently strong to warrant a recommendation going to the security council for partition. I thought by far the stronger case was made by those who opposed it; and I am not speaking now of the Arabs alone. I refer to the delegates from India, from China and from several other countries whose contributions I thought were outstanding.

Well, eventually, after following all that was said, I concluded it would be wise for me to advise the delegation that I thought they should not vote for partition. I did so, and I believe I was right. It was not because I felt the Jews should not have a national home. No. I believe with all my heart that the Jewish people are entitled to a place where they can live their lives and develop their culture as they desire. I have never deviated from that belief for the last twenty years. But I thought partition was not the answer at this time.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Why?

Mr. LOW: The Canadian delegation say they voted for the lesser of two evils. I am afraid I must contend that they were unduly influenced by the United States, and by the fact that the report of the Palestine committee was very largely the work of an eminent Canadian, Mr. Justice Rand. So I suppose it is only natural that they should say, "Well, what other course could we have taken?"

To answer that question I shall need just a few moments. It seems to me it must have been obvious to anyone who studied the whole history of Palestine that promises had been made to both Arabs and Jews in years past and at various times, which made it impossible to partition Palestine without doing grave injustice to one side or the other. In 1915 General MacMahon, in the name of the British government, did make a pledge to the Arabs in a bid for their support in the war against the Turks. In 1917, it is true, the Balfour declaration by Great Britain promised the Jews a national home and lifted the hopes of the Jewish people that in due course they would be able to return to that land, develop their own culture and live at peace. But I ask any fair-minded man: How in the world could the Balfour declaration be implemented if the promise to the Arabs were implemented also? Obviously it was an impossibility; and that being the case, a national home for the Jewish people could not be set up in Palestine without doing injustice to the Arab people.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): A greater statesman than Balfour!

Mr. LOW: There was another point. Very early in the game the Canadian delegation could have taken this stand: "We do not think the time is ripe to establish a Jewish national state. Some time it may be, but what is the rush? We feel that the wisest course would be to establish what is right and just and righteous, and then try to find means of working it out."

Then it seems to me that Canada was neglectful of her duty some years ago when, at the height of Britain's troubles in administering the affairs of Palestine, the United States entered into what was to it the ancient and honourable game of "twisting the lion's tail." Almost immediately after the first great war, after Britain was given the mandate over Palestine, criticism began to emanate from the United States, aimed at undermining Britain and making it difficult for her to do the job. That continued and increased in force and frequency as the years went by, particularly after the issuance of the white paper in 1939, which for a time abrogated the Balfour declaration, and temporarily put a stop to the immigration of Jewish people into Palestine. Almost immediately thereafter, while Britain's hands were full, conducting a great war, that criticism continued. Terrorism started, and it was not confined to one side. In some respects the Arabs were just as guilty as the Jews in this regard. Terrorism and aggression and force were used. But in the United States high officials, including even the President, criticized; and their criticism of Britain was anything but fair and just under the circumstances.

It seems to me that this is what Canada should have done at that time. Canada should have stepped forward and stood shoulder to shoulder with Britain, declaring to the world that she would help Britain resist the attempt to undermine her. We failed Britain then.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. LOW: May I have another moment or two?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LOW: Canada should have declared to the world that so long as Great Britain was trying her best to exercise the mandate, and to discharge her responsibilities under it, Canada would stand beside her. We said nothing.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Hear, hear.

Mr. LOW: Our silence may have been interpreted in various ways. It may have been interpreted—not by my hon. friend, of course, who keeps on interrupting; he could not interpret anything.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): You will find that out later.

Mr. LOW: It might have been interpreted as a tacit agreement on the part of Canada that the criticism of the United States was correct. At any rate Great Britain's prestige was weakened. The criticism coming from the United States encouraged lawlessness in Palestine, and undermined the authority of the mandatory power.

It seems to me that Canada at the united nations could have taken this position, and I so advocated. One of the major complicating factors in the whole Palestine problem was the refugee situation in Europe. I think Canada should have declared that the Palestine problem could have been reduced to much more manageable proportions had the first step been to strengthen the work of the international refugee organization to the point where that refugee problem was first solved.

The approximately one million people within the refugee camps in Europe should have been taken care of. China said—and may I say I was much touched by the attitude China displayed—"For many years we have had in the midst of China a thriving Jewish community that has been free to develop its culture as it wished, without molestation from us. They have contributed much to that community. We have given refuge to a great many Jews who were persecuted at the beginning of the Hitlerian regime. We are prepared to take our share of those people in the refugee camps; and we call upon all nations to declare themselves likewise."

There was too much tendency in the propaganda emanating from various sources in the world to treat the refugee problem as an exclusively Jewish problem. The refugee problem was not an exclusively Jewish problem, because there were only about 200,000 Jews in those internment camps. The remainder were Europeans of various nationalities.

I say that if the united nations assembly had first tackled that problem it would have made it possible to reduce the pressure on the Palestine problem to a point where I believe it could have been managed much more efficiently than it was. And surely that great human problem of the refugees—a million of them, languishing behind the fences of those camps—is a sore blot on the humanitarian feelings and aspects of the various peoples of the nations of the world. Until such time as those people are given a home, and until Canada takes her share, and until the United States takes her share, I am afraid we shall not be able to lift our heads without shame.

India declared that she would take her share of them. I am going to close with this thought—

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Hear, hear.

Mr. LOW: —that Great Britain could have been prevailed upon to remain in Palestine.

Mr. HARTT: Do not coax her.

Mr. LOW: I should say not now. But I am sure that Great Britain could have been prevailed upon to remain, had she felt that she had the support of the western powers in the discharge of the onerous duties of her mandate. I am satisfied she would not have announced her early withdrawal. I think Canada should have supported her. I think Canada should have called for united action in suppressing terrorism and acts of violence in Palestine, and in asking Great Britain to remain there for a period of years, and to have assured her united assistance in the discharge of her duties. And finally, at the end of a few years of peaceful living in that unhappy land, the logical thing to do, if we were to abide by the spirit of the united nations charter, as expressed in the preamble, would have been to extend to the people of Palestine the right of self-determination.

If that had been done I believe it would not have been long until the faith of those who believed in the return of the Jews to Palestine could have been justified. Where was the faith, let us say, of the Jews? Where was the faith that they had when, with Moses, they looked upon the supposedly uncrossable waters of the Red sea? Did they have a Stern gang then? Did they have an Irgun Zvai Leumi?

Mr. HARTT: We waited two thousand years and it did not work out.

Mr. LOW: I agree, and I sympathize very much with the hon. member.

Mr. HARTT: Do you? Don't send me flowers.

Mr. LOW: I sympathize much with the hon. member; but nothing can justify the use of force and terrorism. And I am going to say, in conclusion, that the Jewish people and the Arab people, both of them, lose the sympathy of the western nations through their terrorism and their acts of violence.

A Gallup poll was conducted in Canada on February 7, 1948—

Mr. HARTT: Keep your sympathy and give us Palestine.

Mr. LOW: Might I be permitted to quote this one reference?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Proceed.

Mr. LOW: This question was asked in the poll taken in February 1948: when you hear on the radio anything about the dispute between the Arabs and the Jews in Palestine, do you find yourself sympathizing more with one side than the other? The replies showed that 58 per cent had no particular sympathies; 23 per cent had sympathies with the Arabs, and 19 per cent with the Jews. Why? Western peoples do not condone acts of violence.

The welfare of the Jews is bound up with the western powers, not with the eastern powers. The western powers have been their friends; Great Britain has been the greatest friend the Jews have ever had; and it should be their faith that, given time and support, Great Britain would do full justice to and by them.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Smith from the United States would be very proud of you.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have never attended any meeting at Lake Success; but, listening to the two last speakers, I had the impression of attending a meeting of the united nations.

I listened with pencil in hand to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. Afterwards I had to put my notes in order. But unfortunately I could not listen with pencil in hand when the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) was speaking. In the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar there are some rays of hope, because he said this: "Even in these disturbing times there is no reason why war should be imminent or inevitable." This I like. I find it comforting, and an oasis of hope in a desert of distress.

He spoke also of close economic co-operation, which was not to be regarded as a military alliance for war. This is evident, provided that the economic co-operation is not so close as to strangle one. In the third place, he mentioned an attempt at democratic reconstruction to establish a strong democratic political force. This is a fine phrase; I do not know exactly what it means, but it sounds quite good. In all that he said there was not a single word of praise for the united nations. I listened to the leader of the Social Credit party and there was not one word of praise for the united nations. I hope I am not misquoting anyone when I say that.

Unfortunately I had to leave during the able speech of the minister of external affairs. All that he mentioned that was good was the establishment of three new states in the British empire or commonwealth; Ceylon, Pakistan and India. That was all. What did the C.C.F. leader praise about the accomplishments of the united nations in three years? Nothing. What did the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) praise? I do not know. I do not assume that he went any farther because, when I came back to the chamber, he looked very sad about the accomplishments of the united nations. For three years we have had discussions about the united nations. Everybody went to San Francisco; everybody went all over the world, and there were delegations of members of parliament who went to see the wise men and decide the future of the world. Nothing good has been accomplished apparently because no praise has been given.

The same thing happened in connection with the imperial conferences of 1926, 1930, et cetera. The leader of the C.C.F. group made wishes. It is most extraordinary that at the imperial conferences before and after 1930 all that was done by the delegates was to express wishes. They met together and they made wishes. The C.C.F. leader made wishes about the control of atomic energy and the defence of freedom and democracy everywhere.

That is a nice phrase; it sounds good but it means nothing. He spoke of fundamental human rights. I was born with the idea that the man who lives within the law has certain rights. Apparently the hon. member is for the defence of fundamental human rights. What are those rights? He did not enumerate them. It is not in Canada that we are deprived of human rights to any large extent that we have to form a union of all the nations in order to protect our fundamental rights. It is in the larger nations like Russia and its satellites where these rights are affected.

How are we to go about having these rights respected in Russia? There are two ways we can do so. First, we can discuss it with Russia or, second, we can go to war with Russia and impose our way of life on Russia just the same as General MacArthur is imposing it on Japan which is ready to accept that point of view. He is making himself the defender of such actions. I ask the hon. gentleman if this can be done by means other than conciliation, discussion and compromise, on the one hand, or on the other, by the use of weapons, the going to war in order to humiliate a country and to impose our will on it?

We have an example in Japan. Shall we go to war with Russia? We must be logical. If we are to impose these ideas on a country which denies them, the only thing to do is to go to war with that country. The hon. gentleman—when I say "hon. gentleman" I refer to the leader of the C.C.F. group—said that Russia and the United States had emerged from the war as the giants of our time. That is quite true. But that leaves the British empire behind. The two giants are Russia and the United States; the British empire is behind. The hon. member did not say that, but when he referred to two giants he did not mean three.

Then he complained of the division of spheres of influence at Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam. He was not as precise and definite as the leader of the Social Credit group, but he complained of the secret treaties entered into by the three big powers, the United States, Russia and Great Britain at those three places. President Roosevelt attended the first two conferences while President Truman attended the other.

Then he said that the great powers have set aside the agreements which were made during the war. There were two kinds of agreements made by the big powers, the public agreements which were not respected and the secret agreements which were respected. The secret agreements entered into at Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam were put into force while the Atlantic charter was set aside.

He said that we had condoned the annexation of the Baltic republics, and of Poland. What about the Balkans? If I am not mistaken the minister spoke of the Balkans and of Czechoslovakia. But this is continuing to blame the united nations, although he said that everything that had been done by the united nations was not to be praised.

He concluded rather illogically by sponsoring the relinquishment of an out-moded national sovereignty. He is a citizen of the world, and he thinks that national sovereignty is out-moded, that the abandonment of our national sovereignty will bring us a premium in the way of an extension of our powers into the affairs of the world at large. Our reward for abandoning our sovereignty will be that we shall have a wider scope in interesting ourselves in the affairs of other countries, and perhaps we shall do just as well as the great powers have done. However, we have no policy.

There is no difference between Ukrainia and Canada except that Ukrainia is under Moscow and Canada is under London. It is the same thing except that they are on opposite sides. We beat the drum and continue under the illusion that we are running the world. I am sad about it. We should have more of a sense of reality, more of a sense of proportion and a little more imagination.

This is not all that the leader of the C.C.F. said. He said that the members of the united nations should co-operate in the united nations set-up. That is evident and I agree with him. Then he said that political freedom and liberty have been completely extinguished in countries under communist governments. That is also true. We should not forget that Russia would be one of the big powers that would rule us if we abandoned our sovereignty. We shall be governed much more by Russia than by Patagonia and Pakistan; Russia will have much more to say in the government of this country, and like all the countries that are under the domination of Russia and have no fundamental rights, as he called them, we shall be exposed to trouble. He complained again—it was his perpetual complaint—of what the united nations has done ever since its beginning. He complained of the reactionary elements in Greece and China and Spain, and he said that we had not protested against the reactionary elements in Greece or against the mandarins of China, and that we should have a strong democratic policy in that respect; Canada has given diplomatic status to gentlemen going to China to help them; China, one of the great powers in the world today, is still at war; Spain is in a class by itself.

He also spoke unfavourably of the stand of the united nations in Korea and of the zones in Germany, and of the veto which Canada had expected to be used only in exceptional cases. He admitted that Canada had accepted the veto, but realized that it was a dangerous thing and was to be used only in exceptional cases. He was not satisfied with that. He wants to have an international police force. Who would command it? Is it possible that the united nations who are so disunited that they do not agree on a single thing could agree over the command of an international police force? It is impossible.

Then he spoke about Palestine and was not satisfied with what has happened there. He said the United States could be blamed considerably for what had happened in Palestine. He said Canada should urge the United States to place its own plan before the united nations.

He also spoke of the deadlock in the foreign ministers' conference and said that it should be ended. It is a bad picture. He said that we should have a peace front to make a peace settlement. He spoke very nicely. He has a pleasant voice and the gift of speech, but his speech did not stand up. For instance, he spoke of the right of all nations to decide their own domestic policy—

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, here are his words: "the right of all nations to decide their own domestic policy." Yet he favoured the abandonment of our national sovereignty. What logic is there in that? He wants to put us under UNO, where we shall be unable to decide our own domestic policy, and where we shall be ruled by the big powers of Russia, China, the United States and Great Britain. Where is the logic in that?

But he was still more illogical when he spoke of the European recovery program. He said that the nazi regime and the war had scuttled capital ownership, or capitalism—I am not sure just which was the word he used but it was one of them—as we have known them, and that policy, he said, has gone. Having said that he went on to say—and this is the point—that the rehabilitation of western Europe may be a guarantee of future peace. Then, to show how completely illogical he is, he said that the European recovery program is impossible without the generous help of the United States, a capitalist country. He said, on the one hand, that nazism and the war had destroyed capitalism in Europe and that democracy was destroyed, and, on the other, that the only way to re-establish democracy in those countries was to appeal to a capitalist country like the United States. Where is the logic in that speech of my hon. friend? Even with his musical and charming voice there was nothing to it. It was wind from beginning to end. People listened to it and applauded: What a great speech! What a musical voice! I had the impression of listening to President Roosevelt addressing "My friends."

The leader of the C.C.F. group has the voice of Mr. Roosevelt. I have an old record down home of one of Mr. Roosevelt's speeches. I played it before coming here, and I heard Mr. Roosevelt's voice again tonight; it is the voice of the hon. member. But what a difference! I admire the hon. gentleman. He is one of the greatest debaters in the house. But in Athens there were men who spoke as well as he did tonight. They were great orators, but there was a name for them; they were called sophists, meaning that there was nothing in their arguments.

I have tried to give the impressions of one who listened closely to the speech made by the hon. member. I enjoyed it and I took as much from it as I could.

But now let us go to something else. What will be the future of the world? What do we know about it? What does the opinion of Canada count with the United States, with Russia, with China, even with the United Kingdom? They put us aside at a small table. All those members who have spoken on external affairs have the illusion that the voice of Canada is heard. I have written articles in a big Montreal daily and in a Quebec daily giving my sincere views about the future.

The question at issue is obvious: do we want peace or do we want war? If we want peace, let us try the means to get peace. I am against communism, as a matter of principle, not as a matter of fashion. I am against it because I believe that communism is just deceit, and those who are advocating fundamental rights and liberty are fighting for the protection of the scum of the world and of scoundrels who try to destroy the pillars of the state. That is my honest view about it. As I say, I have written articles which received wide publicity on account of the papers in which they were published, in which I said that it was time for Canada to make her voice heard by the whole world. We have the opportunity. We have our seat on the security council. I believe that the minister of external affairs is a gentleman who has the confidence of the house. He is a member of the government, and in my humble view he should have been at Lake Success all the time to discuss international affairs with the representatives of other nations, in an endeavour to make common sense prevail and to make them understand their responsibilities and to appreciate the fact that if all the countries of the world continued to threaten one another we would soon have war. God forbid that such a thing should happen.

Far from being for communism, I am opposed to it; but I hope that this generation of young men, to whom the younger members of this house belong, and future generations of young men will be spared the atrocities of a third world war. This is more important than the denunciation of any government, and we must consider the facts with coolness. We must not be frightened by threats of the atomic bomb, by any threats whatever. We must be cool in our consideration of the facts, so that our decision to maintain peace in this world shall not be shaken.

After the heroic sacrifices that Canada made during the last war and since the war in helping other countries of the world, I believe honestly and sincerely that the voice of Canada should be heard, that the voice of Canada should be listened to, even if Canada is alone in preaching the sound doctrine of common sense and of peace to the entire world.

But Canada will not be alone, because there are sound principles of peace which have been enunciated by His Holiness the Pope, when he spoke of charity and justice. Last night I was talking to one of the brightest members of the press gallery, whom I will not name—when I say that, he will not recognize himself because he is too modest—and he said to me that in order to have peace we should have at least a minimum of justice and charity equal to the minimum of justice and charity that exists between the provinces respectively and the dominion so that they remain together. There should be a minimum of justice and charity to maintain peace in the world, and it is precisely because that minimum of justice and charity has not existed that we have trouble, trouble which has been described by all the members who have spoken in the house today and who have referred to the pitiful role of the united nations organization.

It is to be deplored, and there is only one thing for us to do. Since that experiment of world government through the united nations has not been successful, we must go back to the past and try to make our own alliances with other countries, try to build up our defences, try to protect ourselves. Hon. members will see that the policy of the past will prove in the future to be a much sounder policy, a much better policy than that which has been protagonized by the united nations.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have followed for many years the question of foreign affairs. I did so long before I became a member of this house, and I am surprised that more interest has not been taken in this department of government, since it affects the life, liberty and security of every citizen of the country. With so many universities in the country, there are too many pacifist professors and other people who fail to understand that in days like these might plus right is right.

We are living in the midst of a very dangerous situation. I referred to this the other night, when I asked the question that I am about to put to the house once more: from whom did we derive the freedom and liberty which not only we in this country, but the people throughout the North American continent have enjoyed for the past hundred years? Anyone who is sufficiently fair-minded and who will read attentively the lessons of history, including what great English, American and French historians have had to say, will admit, I believe, that the liberty of which we boast today is a possession which we owe to the mother country. Had not the mother country been mistress of the seas for four centuries, maintaining our liberties against Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon and against dictators in world wars twice in our own time, the liberty that we enjoy today would not have been ours.

That agency alone, the supremacy of the motherland on the seas, has protected America's shores. We remember the Holy Alliance on the part of Prussia, Austria and Russia under Alexander the Great, which lasted for eight years, from 1815 to 1823, and we know that Canning studied carefully the situation in Europe, with the result that the United States promulgated what was known as the Monroe Doctrine. What was the Monroe Doctrine in reality, from the year 1815 to the outbreak of the Spanish-American war in 1898? In reality it meant the protection which America, including our country, enjoyed through the supremacy of Britain on the seas. That was the Monroe Doctrine to 1917.

Had it not been for British naval supremacy, we would have been invaded long ago. In 1938 I was almost the only member in the House of Commons who consistently drew attention to the situation that confronted the people of this country. I pointed out that we had no fleet, army or air force at all. A return was brought down in the House of Commons showing that we had a few boats only; the total tonnage was about that of one large 10,000-ton freighter, and there were three or four ships that really could not go to sea. Our navy was small then. They went from Halifax on an annual trip to the West Indies in the wintertime on a good will trip, and when there was a by-election in Victoria they went into the harbour three or four days before the election took place. The navy made a glorious record in the first and second great wars.

In 1938 we had practically no army, navy or air force. What did we depend upon for our defence? Upon the mother country. The mother country protected our shores from the invader in the last war. There are members of this house, veterans, who appreciate what I am saying. Had it not been for the mother country, Canada would have been invaded, not only in the maritimes but right up the St. Lawrence. As a matter of fact, the enemy did go up the St. Lawrence to a point near Rivière du Loup. I saw the place where they were.

Take the Pacific. When the war broke out in 1939, from Puget sound to the Queen Charlotte islands, a distance of 689 miles, there was no protection except that which was afforded by the British fleet, which had to withdraw owing to events in other parts of the world, in the Mediterranean and the Atlantic.

I believe in paying tribute where tribute is due, and I repeat that, but for that agency, we would have had all the horrors of war on our own soil, not only in the maritime provinces but in Quebec and Ontario and throughout the rest of Canada, and people would have been carted away by the Soviets. We know what happened when the iron curtain came down on Russian satellite countries in Europe. It would have happened in the first and second wars, but for Britain's command of the seas.

When the answer was given in the British House of Commons the other day, the figures were left out. The Navy League gave them away. What have we today? We have a war economy. We are just as close to war at the present moment as we have ever been, if not closer. Russia will strike when she is ready. No matter what we may like, no matter what the people think in Quebec, Ontario, in the maritimes, in the west or in Washington either, Russia will strike when the hour has come. The Russians may strike at this country. It will be a bitter battle. If they repeat what they have done in the twenty-six other small countries of Europe, where they have taken millions of people away to work as slaves, they may do the same thing in Canada also, if they win.

Where is the UNO? Why do they not give out a return and give us some information about the slaves of European Soviet satellites so taken? We have all these gentlemen away down there at Lake Success. I call it Lake Failure. It is the biggest failure we have had. We have had many of these leagues. I referred to one a moment ago, namely the Holy Alliance. We had a second one, about the collapse of which very little is heard. In the reading room I found only one paper which mentioned three lines about the millions of dollars tied up in buildings over at Geneva in Switzerland. It is closed up without any big headlines in the newspapers or publicity over the C.B.C. or anything of that kind.

Having regard to world conditions at the present time, and the dangerous situation prevailing, we have not enough members present. I would call attention to the number of vacancies here in the house tonight. The situation is always the same when external affairs are being discussed. A large number of seats are always vacant. We had a hard time keeping a quorum here last year when this subject of foreign affairs was up for discussion. This is the seventy-third day of the session and this is the first opportunity we have to discuss foreign affairs.

Just look at the figures here. This department is now spending $9,685,942. For what? On foreign affairs. I wish to speak particularly with respect for the present minister, because I know he is serving here at great sacrifice to himself and his family. He is doing so because of his fine spirit and for the good of the country. Anything I have to say tonight is intended as no reflection on him at all. I am just dealing, as in other years, with certain principles. I hope the house will understand that.

I believe everyone is entitled to his view. It is all right to have your own view, the right view and the other fellow's view, but do not forget the other fellow's view. That is the way I have always handled problems in this house and out of it. I have never allowed politics or religion to mix up with friendship. I look upon the House of Commons as a gentlemen's club, and we are supposed to represent our constituents to the best of our ability.

This department's estimates have gone up by leaps and bounds until the figure is now at $9,685,000. They want to keep up with the Joneses, if you please. They seem to think we are a great first-class power.

What did we agree to away down there at San Francisco? A great many people went there. All the parties were represented. That is the greatest mistake the House of Commons has ever made, of wanting a non-partisan debate on foreign affairs. Until recently it was not the practice for selected members from the parties of the House of Commons to take such a trip I never was one who objected to taking a trip. I myself never had much opportunity to take a trip; in fact, I have never been in the old country. I may say that I am not criticizing any members of the house for taking all the trips they like. This was a magnificent event down at San Francisco. Mr. Churchill agreed to it reluctantly. It was started by the late President Roosevelt to whom I paid a great tribute the other night. But it was a flat failure.

What did we agree to down there? We signed, sealed and delivered our people to doom at the league of nations at Lake Success. What did they agree to down there? They agreed to give the Big Five at San Francisco the veto power, so that one of them could veto everything the others did. Do hon. members understand that? Just fancy the situation—no referee and no umpire! One player can just tell the referee to get out of the grounds, can tell the timekeeper to go home, and say "I am it." Did you ever hear of a game like that? It is a game of hide-and-go-seek and bluff; that is all it ever was. What did they do? They went to work with a lot of these fellows down there. We have some fellows down there—pardon me; we have some hon. gentlemen down there. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was there. I was glad to see him take a trip over to Russia and talk to Stalin. He embarked on the sea and, as I said the other night, I suggested to the house leader (Mr. Mackenzie) that he should give the member protection. I was afraid that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not get away from there, and that Stalin might keep him.

I will just say this. These expenditures are too great for this country. If you study the situation carefully, what do you find? Has this nearly $10,000,000 of expenditures contributed to the peace and security of this country? To it must be added the cost of the league of nations and the cost of Lake Success. Millions of dollars worth of buildings down there were torn down and a great big mansion is being built at Lake Success. The tower of Babel was not in it. That is all it ever was. It is the most mischievous institution we have ever had. It produced the present Russian situation. Has Lake Success made it any easier for the United States to get on with Russia? The answer to that is no. They made it ten times worse.

In connection with these estimates, I just want to point out that there must be added the cost of our people down there. These people go there. Once the session is over, it is a nice soft trip to go to Lake Success and stop at the Biltmore hotel in which a whole floor is at their disposal. I can tell you that is running up to a big sum of money.

One paper in the old country, the Patriot, printed some of the menu cards at the sumptuous banquets down there. At a time when the people are starving in Europe and when millions are deported to work in Russia as slaves, this fabulous sum of money is being spent in this way. I can tell you this. You must add on to that the first and second Geneva, the cost of Lake Success and San Francisco. And to the ends of the earth and over the seven seas there are these novice ambassadors, their excellencies. They travel all over the seven seas.

What have we in addition to that? We have trade commissioners in all these countries, and they do ten times more work by getting trade for this country. We are the fifth trading nation in the world now, it is claimed. We have these trade commissioners who are really doing good work and providing work for our industries by sponsoring trade and commerce on the seven seas. That is the most fateful mistake ever made, dividing Britain's representation as ambassadors on the seven seas. As Clemenceau and many others said about Britain, it is the hardest country in the world to make a treaty with. Why? Because so many of the dominions and all these other people must have a say about the matter, and they can never act as one united nation as the United States do. I have great respect for that country. I paid it a great tribute the other night in the house. I greatly admire the people of the United States. But I can tell you this. This representation abroad is in salaries alone costing over $5,000,000. There is a big increase in it this year. We have their excellencies in every little country in South America and all over the seven seas. No wonder there are so many applications for these positions on the seven seas.

Let me say a word for a minute or two tonight about policy. Canada has never had a foreign policy. The policy we have had in this house has always been one of "We have no commitments; parliament will decide." We were ten days late in getting into the war. What was the result? The Athenia was sunk with 130 Canadians on board. The Athenia was sunk about the third day of the war, although it was September 10 before Canada declared war on Germany.

We have never had a foreign policy, and we have none now. The minister's policy is confined entirely to the UNO at Lake Success. Well, there will be a rude awakening if the enemies of our country come here. We tried that before. We know that some of my hon. friends to the left said we should no longer go to London or Glasgow in connection with matters of defence, but we should go to Washington. That proved to be poor advice, because they could not defend their own country; and they are a great nation. The United States has never had a foreign policy, other than that followed by Washington, Andrew Jackson, Jefferson and Madison, which was a policy of no foreign entanglements unless the country was invaded. From 1815 until the Spanish war in 1898 they had no foreign policy at all. The Monroe Doctrine was their policy, backed up by the protection of the British fleet.

Then in 1898 the Spanish war came along, and in 1900 there was a presidential election. What happened then? The government had committed itself to defence on the Pacific ocean, seven thousand miles from San Francisco and from that day forward the United States had no foreign policy. They had none in the two great wars. Their policy was to do nothing unless they were invaded; but they were forced into the last war by what happened at Pearl Harbor. Russia also came into that war because she was invaded by Germany. Britain came into the war because of her pledge to Poland. She went to war voluntarily and sacrificed everything. Today that nation is starving, and it has lost all its foreign investments.

Just think for a moment of Britain's position at the close of the last war. She was at the peak of her career, the most respected nation the world over. She was looking after Palestine, India, Egypt, Greece and all those other countries, after her armies had marched across the desert under our present great governor general, one of the greatest soldiers of all time and one of the most successful diplomats Britain has sent anywhere.

We have now no foreign policy except Lake Success; and if we are depending on that we are depending upon a pipe dream, the most mischievous institution we have yet had. Look at the disaster they have caused in Egypt, India, Palestine, Greece, and the Balkans. Look at the disaster on the Bosphorus and in Greece, all because of this united nations policy. Look at the situation in the Netherlands East Indies and in Burma, also in India where we have four hundred million people with no protection at all. With a wave of their hand, a pacifist government in England destroyed, as Churchill said recently, the whole British empire in a little less than two years, though at the close of the last war Britain stood in a superior position throughout the world.

I say of both the United States and Russia that they want to be imperial nations. When they came into the war I said they might not want to grab territory, but we should wait and see. Look at what Russia has done since that time. Hitler was not in it with the cruelties that have been exhibited by this Soviet nation toward the satellite countries it has invaded.

Then they speak about giving up our sovereignty. Let me plead with those who talk that way, including some of my hon. friends across the chamber for whom I have a great deal of respect. Let me remind them that a million men went to the first great war from the dominions. They did that under their own status, autonomy, and sovereignty. No one asked them; they went voluntarily. We remember what they did in that war. Some 130,000 fell on the field of battle, including many young people from the province of Quebec, and what they did changed the history of the whole civilized world.

In the second great war they did the same thing, only in much larger numbers. They came from cape and island and continent during the two years Britain had to go it alone. We remember when the submarines in 1942 were in the St. Lawrence. There was a secret meeting of this house, which I did not attend, at which the navy minister spoke of the great danger in the St. Lawrence. The young men of the commonwealth went to the colours to defend the mother country which had stood by them in the past and given them the freedom they enjoyed. I ask for fair play and fair treatment in view of what that great nation has done.

In my opinion the UNO has made Russia and the United States enemies forever. It is not diplomatic to attack Russia and so invite them here. We remember when the league of nations, which was to save the world, passed away. There were on mourners, and only three or four lines in the newspapers. Now they have started a new organization at Lake Success. Some of the universities and high schools in Toronto were visited by these people; and what did they say? They said, "Well, you will have to give up your sovereignty if you want security." Where would we have been in the first great war if we had given up Hong Kong and the Cape and Gibraltar to the control of any league of nations or foreign country? We would have had to remain neutral and Germany would have won the war. Many people who are supposed to be learned do not know much about foreign affairs or history.

What would be our position in the coming war if we did what they suggest? That war is sure to come. It is just a matter of time. Mr. Attlee has said so. Mr. Churchill has warned the nation. Mr. Truman issued a warning only the other day. General Bradley, head of the United States army, and many others, have given the same warning. The situation is very grave.

Those are my realistic views, and I believe they are correct. No thoughtful people ever believed that any agency at Lake Success could achieve the results claimed for it. We have heard the same thing before. At Lake Success they even say, "Let's pretend we have security." Well, the Stuarts had pretenders to the throne; so had the Plantagenets, and others. That is the trouble about depending on Washington for defence instead of having an all-empire policy. The trouble is that we have surrendered too much political, economic, social and military initiative to Washington. Our defence policy has been made in Washington. Just recently the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) went there and saw Mr. Forrestal. What about? Did he confer with the representatives of New Zealand and Australia? I asked that question in the house and the reply was no. I asked if he had consulted Britain about our defence on the seven seas. Again the answer was no.

I would remind hon. members that, owing to the present government in Britain, we have not a battleship on the seven seas today, and according to the Navy League, neither a battleship nor an aeroplane carrier nor a destroyer in service on the seven seas today. I take very little stock in what is going on at Lake Success. If you are to depend on what happens there you might as well make no preparation for war at all. If I had my way I would revive the empire training plan at once in Canada as a measure of security for this dominion.

Further than that, New Zealand and Australia, through Mr. Fraser and Mr. Curtin, from that very chair where the deputy clerk is now sitting, pleaded with us to have an empire council for trade, defence and migration within the empire. Had we had that, we would have needed nothing more; because Great Britain with her dominions is stronger than the United States or Russia, in natural resources, raw materials or manufactures, and all that kind of thing.

If the dominions would only hang together along those lines they would need no other agencies to achieve their purpose. That is admitted. In the spring of 1946 Australia and New Zealand asked for a conference. That was before the disasters in India, Palestine, Burma, Greece and the Suez. In all of these we had interests. They asked that a conference of dominions be called in London. The Prime Minister of Great Britain was favourable to it, but we would not attend. Our policy, it was said, was: We have no commitments; parliament will decide.

The people have been blindfolded. People back home in the constituencies know very little about foreign affairs; they know nothing about it at all. But they are very much alarmed at the present time about the lack of the freedom of the seas and no defence at all. From where are they to get their information? Will it be from the universities? No; one of the men from the universities, now a professor and pacifist, was over in Geneva for years; he has written books about it. We shall have a rude awakening along those lines.

I believe we should have had a defence policy long ago. I should like to find out from the government if it has any information to give the house with respect to the millions of slaves in Soviet camps in which the Russians have placed conscripted men from many Soviet satellite countries of Europe. Have the united nations asked Russia to return these people to their homes? I should like to find out about that.

The cost of the Department of External Affairs is fabulous. If we had the policy about which I have been speaking, Britain aided by her dominions for defence purposes as a unit, we would then have within the empire a defence which could be depended upon. We know that in the last two wars Great Britain, save for aid from the dominions, acted alone against the axis powers for two and a half years. She had to go on alone because it took the United States a long time to get in. They were not ready for nearly three years. We must always have good relations with the United States. That is more important now than it ever was before, and it was only a short time ago that I paid tribute to their late president and that great nation with the same views as our own on freedom.

The United States had great success in its conduct of the war. If that success continues in peace, then we shall have some hope of meeting the eastern powers—the Russian power. Neither the league of nations, nor the present united nations organization can solve the problem. The Marshall plan is a little late, but it has the support of the government, and I too support it. I doubt if it will arrive in time.

But neither the leagues nor the Marshall plan, nor any other plan, can do for the British empire what co-operation and enterprise and the strength of our own dominions, with the mother country, could do as a unit for the world and for civilization. These are our own interests; we have depended upon them, and have made a success in two long wars, and in many other wars before that. It would be far better for us to depend upon the empire than to depend upon twenty-six nations now united in a Lake Success agency, which is nothing but a tower of Babel at New York.

If that is the government's policy, I do not like it. If that is the policy of the opposition, then I am sorry for the opposition—because we are supposed to have a traditional policy. We have always believed in paying tribute where tribute is due. I am sorry there are so many members away tonight when these important matters are being discussed, because this may be the last opportunity for a discussion of this kind; this session may be over before the rude awakening comes.

None of these agencies can do what the mother country with her dominions could do. We used to have an empire parliamentary association. But it might just as well be wiped off the map altogether. What did they do? They turned themselves into a pan-American organization, and forgot all about the empire. The result is that they have not the influence that they should have in this country. The empire parliamentary association used to be an up-to-date organization of men from Quebec and from all the other provinces—and some of the best men came from Quebec. But they just turned it into a pan-American organization, forgetting all about the empire, and all that kind of thing, with no agency to inform our country of its defenceless situation.

Then, what is this thing called a customs union? Well, I can tell you what it is. During the second great war I said this:

"The proposal for political amalgamation between Canada and the United States will find little or no response in Canada while we are a unit in our admiration for the people of our devoted ally in this war and have the same common views on the war and the new world to come. Canada will continue forever on her destiny, yesterday, today and forever in a union of hearts and hands with the mother country and her dominions for all time.

We are not an independent nation. Such castles in the clouds had a rude awakening when this war began. We are a link in a chain of free dominions and colonies within and making up the British empire. Talk about annexation with the United States? No. There is no feeling whatever in favour of it. Nor of independence, either. This war showed the folly of small independent nations. Canada was the chief drifter from the mother country for the twenty years between the two wars—the most disastrous years which almost finished freedom, liberty and even civilization itself. Canada's dream of status isolation and separatism exploded and never again will she depend on such folly as pacifism and isolation.

In future, linked with Britain, our policy should be might plus right, and the time has come for Canada to cease whining about status. Status and autonomy and that empire-wrecking Statute of Westminster helped cause this war."

This is from the Monetary Times also of September, 1943.

"What Canada has done the past forty-four years she has done of her own volition and she will do the same again gladly, namely to come to the aid of the mother country in her hour of peril . . .

I believe in what Mr. Churchill said, that he "would not preside over the liquidation of the British empire." Certainly Canadians will not let it go by default. Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire. Canada will have to be fought out of the British empire. If Canada could have been talked out of it long ago this would have been done . . ."

No customs union is wanted in this country, because a customs union would refuse to the dominion the right to protect her industries, even against British competition.

Today we are facing very dangerous conditions. There is the drastic curtailment of the British empire, civil war in India, revolution in France, race war in Palestine, some kind of struggle between Soviet Russia and the United States, and various other strifes, too numerous to mention, in other corners of the world.

There is no such thing as "Peace on earth, good will toward men". The other day there was a meeting in England at which the Earl of Athlone presided. The Archbishop of Canterbury was there, as was the Cardinal of Westminster, who visited this building last summer. There were also the moderator of the Presbyterian church, and representatives of the Free Church of Scotland, the Baptist church and others. What did they declare for? They declared that Christianity is facing a very difficult struggle, and said that if we are to have peace on earth and good will toward men, and if we are to have the gospel of Christianity, from now on Christian churches must stand together against communism or communism will win. That was what was said.

Last Monday, after the king and queen had celebrated their anniversary, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Doctor Geoffrey Fisher, denounced communism as a—

. . . militant political system which in denying God, degrades and enslaves men.

That system reveals itself in its working as utterly hostile to the basic principles of Christianity and of human liberty.

Because of its totalitarian claims it must be resisted at every point; but the final answer can only be given by a free society which so expresses freedom as to abolish the social and economic disorders out of which communism sprang.

I should like to quote what a great bishop of the Church of England, the gifted and learned Right Reverend R. J. Renison, said, in part, in an article yesterday in the Globe and Mail editorial page on "Where are the Peacemakers?"

Where are the Peacemakers?

The Kingdom of Jesus is a Kingdom of Peace. That was one of the names given to Him by ancient prophecy—"The Prince of Peace." That was the hymn the angels sang on the night of His lowly birth. "Peace on Earth." That was the picture given to us by prophet and psalmist of the reign of Christ. It is a reign of love and brotherhood and peace.

And again:

If we were living in a Christian world, there would be no war. The first thing to remember is that you cannot separate human life as a whole from the question of war. We have no faith in the argument as to what the attitude of Christ would be in the world today based on Bible texts, flung from one side or the other. We must remember that Christianity is a spiritual thing that grows from the inside, and we must accept the present crisis in terms of challenge rather than dismay.

And again:

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." In the original Greek they are called the sons of God.

The united nations at Lake Success do not mention any of that in their charter. The mother country is one of the greatest nations that we have ever seen in the world. As Tennyson said in his "In Memoriam":

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be.
> They are but broken lights of Thee,
> And Thou, O Lord, art more than they.

As James Thomson said in his poem "The Seasons":

> The nations not so blessed as Thee
> Must in their turn to tyrants fall
> Whilst thou shall flourish
> Shall flourish great and free
> The dread and envy of them all.

Britain will not sit back and be content to be a second-class power. She still rules the waves. As James Thomson, the Scotch poet, said when he wrote "Rule Britannia", Britons never shall be slaves.

Next to the Christian church, no other agency has done so much for the freedom of the world, and for civilization as has the mother country on the seven seas. The mother country, notwithstanding the terms of the Bretton Woods agreement and the hard terms of the United States loan, can live a few more months the hard way. We have seen recently the collapse of statesmanship.

Sir John Macdonald laid down the policy of this party back in 1844 when he said that the prosperity of Canada depended upon its permanent connection with the mother country and that he would resist to the utmost any attempt, from whatever quarter it might come, which would tend to weaken that union. He went on to say:

For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the Union Jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow from association with the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die.

That has been the consistent policy of the Laurier government. As Sir Wilfrid said, when Great Britain is at war, Canada is also at war. Sir Wilfrid went over to the diamond jubilee celebration and he was the first in the diamond jubilee procession. He established British preferential trade for which he deserves a great deal of credit. He was a beloved figure in this country.

I realize that economics are partly to blame for war, but in this connection I should like to quote the first verse of chapter four of the general epistle of James, which reads:

From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?

That is correct. We have something like that here in connection with the bases on the Atlantic from Newfoundland to British Guiana. These were given under 99-year leases during the war. I contend that those leases should be cancelled and charged to lend-lease. I realize that, had they not been there in the battle of the Atlantic, the shores of North America would have been invaded.

There will be another opportunity to speak. I have great respect for the minister, and I am sorry the government of the day and the opposition have not some other policy to depend on than the united nations at Lake Success because they are going to find out in a few days, as the historians will record, that it is of no great value as an agency for the peace of the world and security and will not make it any easier for the United States to get on with Soviet Russia.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I will preface my remarks by felicitating most sincerely the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the wonderful peroration he made this afternoon, which no doubt will be a guide and a chart to the Canadian people generally speaking when dealing with foreign policies. The same compliment could also be addressed to all previous speakers on this subject.

I am not in entire agreement with some of the statements that have been made, although no one can doubt their sincerity. I should like to make one or two brief references to parts of the fine speech delivered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He knows that I have great respect for him. I appreciate the talents he has given so freely to the House of Commons. He is really an asset here.

There are some things which I believe could easily have been left out of a discussion of this kind. In referring to the rehabilitation of Europe, he said that he did not think capitalism should be revived. I cannot understand why an expression like that is being used in such a discussion. We know that the word "capitalism" in itself does not mean anything. What we have in this country and what we have in most sections of the world is progressive capitalism. Almost in the same breath, a few moments afterward, he found it possible, and rightly so, highly to compliment the United States and Canada upon the help which they intend to give under ERP.

The United States is a progressive capitalistic country. The same is true of Canada, and that would apply also to South America and many others that I have no time to mention. I cannot comprehend why he should find it possible to criticize the system we have in this country, the system with which the majority of people seem to be in agreement. I would rather have progressive capitalism than governmental capitalism such as they have in Russia. We must of necessity remember these things when discussing a matter of this kind.

I would be the last person to criticize the leader of the C.C.F., but I do not think he should have tried to tie in fascism with the capitalistic right. What has the capitalistic right to do with fascism? Is there any fascism in this country? I repeat that the great majority of the Canadian people believe implicitly in progressive capitalism. I for one believe in it. Practically all the people in Canada believe in that system. That is why I deplore to a certain extent that the hon. member, in his masterpiece of a speech, should have tried to slap the face of progressive capitalism upon which the countries of western Europe and Asia, all the devastated nations, must of necessity rely at the present time to receive the help they require. Help will be given liberally, but it will be from so-called progressive capitalistic systems.

Let us visualize for a moment what happened during the last war. Was not Great Britain, that fine, heroic nation, operating under the progressive capitalistic system? Was not Canada a progressive capitalistic country? We know that the United States, the country which came along with us later, is also a progressive capitalistic country. What did we do under that system? By our inventiveness, our terrific and almost unlimited products we pulverized fascism and nazism, and were in a position to help an ally which had governmental capitalism. That should be appreciated; that should be considered.

I have no quarrel with any parties in this country or with their political ideologies, outside of communism, but why try to put progressive capitalism on the same level as fascism or communism? Such a statement is absolutely unfair and unwarranted. Why condemn a system which has proven satisfactory and beneficial, not only to our cause and that of our allies but to the whole of Europe and the world, and which will be able to do still more?

I speak with all humility on external affairs. The united nations and its activities have been severely criticized by the two previous speakers, but if we would be fair we should reflect how hard it is for us to settle our own national and even regional problems in Canada. We have spent the greater part of the last three weeks, for instance, in discussing freight rates, which no doubt is a national problem, and that discussion should have made us realize how difficult it is in a country like Canada, where we enjoy to the full democracy and freedom of speech, to find a solution of our national or even regional problems. If in a country like Canada, which is blessed with prosperity and where our people live together in harmony, it is difficult for our governments, dominion, provincial and municipal, to solve their problems, how much more difficult it must be for the united nations, with fifty-seven members, coming from every section of the world, to find solutions for complex international problems. It is easy to say: what audacity you members of the Canadian parliament have to try to solve the problems of the world by a wave of the hand, by propounding certain ideas you have at heart, when you cannot solve the problems in your own country. But unless we practise unity of purpose and try to reach a common understanding of each other's problems, how can we expect the fifty-seven nations who are members of the united nations to have unity and co-operation and that much-needed understanding in a so much wider field of action.

Unlike the two previous speakers, I do not believe that the united nations is a pipe dream. It is a living reality that has already accomplished great things. Let us visualize for a moment the alternative if we did not have the united nations at the present time. What would have happened in Greece, Indonesia, China and other danger points in the world? Perhaps our hopes were too high when the nations of the world met in San Francisco, but there was reason for exaltation at that time when the nations of the world got together with the war still raging, with Japan not then defeated, and so that meeting was received with great enthusiasm and high hopes which led to the formulating of the charter, a marvellous document which, if we would implement it in spirit and accept its worthy principles, would help to bring peace and unity to this world.

It would be presumptuous of me to say that the united nations has not difficult problems before it; that it always functioned smoothly, but I know that the Canadian people are fair on that score. In my own constituency I happen to be very fortunate. We have at least a dozen study groups which, over the past few years, have held several meetings to discuss the activities of the united nations, external affairs and international problems. They have set to work to study these problems seriously and have received the necessary information from the personnel of the united nations. On several occasions I was asked to speak to them. The result has been that they are realists and they know and fully appreciate what has already been accomplished by the united nations.

It would be unfair for me to say we are absolutely satisfied with all the activities of the united nations. Some of the criticisms levelled against it by previous speakers are no doubt warranted and necessary to make; but I repeat, let us be realists and face the fact that our own problems in this country, the grain question, maritime rights, the flood situation, freight rates—I could go on with the list ad infinitum—cannot be solved by political partisanship, by destructive criticism or by political jockeying but only by a patient effort at understanding and by unity of purpose on the part of every Canadian. The same principle applies with greater force to the problems confronting the united nations. If people come there with an axe to grind and without any ideas of co-operation they are bound to defeat the high purpose and ideals of the united nations. I now move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I have the consent of the house, so that we may continue this debate tomorrow, to move:

That the provision of standing order 28 relative to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair without question put be suspended for the sitting of the house on Friday, April 30, in order that the present debate on external affairs may be continued.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask, will that debate continue throughout the day, or will there be the usual hour from eight to nine o'clock for private bills?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There will be the usual hour from eight to nine o'clock for private bills.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the debate on external affairs is concluded tomorrow, will the house go into supply?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If this debate is concluded before the end of the day, it would be the intention then to move that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the committee on external affairs, and after that, the Minister of Agriculture would continue with the debate on the agriculture estimates in committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 30, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

Bill No. 227, for the relief of James Young.—Mr. Maybank.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, last evening in dealing with this very important subject I said I was speaking in all humility because I realized the breadth and diversity of the problems we face when we discuss matters having to do with foreign relations. I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who to a certain extent criticized the amount of money being voted for external affairs. Personally I have always been in favour of the strictest economy in all departmental activities, but in my view the total of some $9,000,000 being spent on external affairs is one of the finest investments this country could make.

The hon. member for Broadview, along with every other hon. member of this house and every citizen of this country, is to some extent responsible for the extension and expansion of the external affairs department; and I will amplify this statement. Up to the time of the South African war at the end of last century Canada and the United States were in a complacent mood, because in those days we realized, and had reason to believe, that we were protected by the British navy, while the Monroe doctrine was fully implemented as far as the great American nation was concerned. It is an historical fact, known now to everyone who wants to study history impartially, that the Monroe doctrine was capable of implementation purely and simply because of the wonderful shield and protection afforded by the British navy to all civilized nations, and this applied most certainly to the American republic.

In the 1910's, for instance, who would have thought we were going to have a world war, in which every country would be directly interested and eventually participating? Geographically speaking Canada was supposed to stand apart from any European conflict. We had then thrown aside any idea of participating in any imperialistic war. But the moment we heard that shot at Sarajevo, when the Austrian duke was killed for political reasons, even on this continent we realized that the world was smaller than we knew it in the nineteenth century. It was true that we had no fear from the north. We had no potential enemy there and were protected by nature, by the Arctic ocean and ice cap. It was also true that we had no fear from the south, because we thought and lived much the same as our American friends did. In those days many of us asked ourselves why we should participate in a European conflict, and why we should not let the nations of Europe settle their own problems, by war if they wanted to do so. Undoubtedly that opinion was held even more strongly by our friends to the south. But it did not take us long to realize that we were part and parcel of the whole world, and that no longer could we consider keeping ourselves isolated from the rest of the nations, no matter how far away they are from our borders.

That is why Canada participated, rightly and gloriously, in the war of 1914-18. For many dreary, deadly months we hoped and prayed that the great nation to the south also would participate on the side of democracy and freedom. Eventually, after the Lusitania disaster, they realized that it was also their war. They knew their own shores were no longer immune; that if there was danger to England there was danger to France and the whole of Europe from the hordes of the Kaiser and of Austria; there was also danger to her own soil. They suddenly realized that they had to come into the conflict and stay until the bitter end so as to save democracy and freedom.

Then in 1939, after a period of peace which was all to short, again we realized that the world was growing smaller. National frontiers had disappeared owing to the great advances in physical science. We were all brothers together. It is true that we had to go through the humiliation of Munich; but perhaps that had to be because we were not realists. All the democracies were hoping and praying that we would not have another war such as we had from 1914 to 1918. But we know what happened in 1939; and to her great glory and honour once more Canada realized that she had to be in that battle for Christianity, freedom and democracy. As in 1914 we realized that even if it meant the tribulations of a horrible conflict, those barbaric hordes led by Hitler and Mussolini had to be confined within the borders of Europe and detroyed there; that otherwise they would spread death and destruction throughout the continents of the world.

It took quite a while for our friends to the south to realize how serious was the situation, and again we must thank a kind Providence that in those troubled days the head of the great American republic was one of the greatest statesmen the world has ever known. He appreciated then the seriousness of the situation, though he was a pacifist like our Prime Minister, like the members of this parliament and every Canadian. We were praying and hoping for peace, but he knew the storm clouds which were hovering over Europe were bound to spread to every section of the world. Almost by himself, by his own courageous actions, he aroused American public opinion even before Pearl Harbor.

I have been told on good authority that in a discouraged moment Mr. Roosevelt confided to one of his best friends that though he had thrown everything he had into the battle, his great talent, his high office, his wonderful oratorical eloquence, he was afraid he was losing ground before American public opinion. But then came Pearl Harbor. It is true that prior to this Mr. Roosevelt and leading Americans of all parties in that great nation had heard appeals from Great Britain, which was almost alone for over a year, the only human rampart against the hordes of barbarism, paying the horrible cost in young lives and old lives and in destruction of indescribable magnitude. Mr. Roosevelt and the United States were told that Britain was fighting the barbarians in defence of democracy and freedom; but it was not enough. It took something like Pearl Harbor to make the American nation realize and to direct its policy accordingly, that though this occurred thousands of miles away it was an attack on the American nation, the same as if it had happened in the heart of New York, for instance. From that time on they have been fighting on our side, although their hearts were always with us, from the beginning of the conflict in 1939, through to the end.

That is why I say that it was not of our own choosing that we participated, but our way of life was in danger of destruction. I know that the contribution we made was a necessary one, although costly, and every citizen of this country has reason to be well pleased with our part, although dolorous in it.

As I said before, from the standpoint of geography it could be considered that we were not only pacifist but also isolationist. All that disappeared, because we suddenly realized that every citizen in the world was to a large extent his brother's keeper. That principle has been evident throughout two wars, and it is being just as strongly pressed forward at the present time to emphasize our ideology. Because for every man, every woman and every child in this world, we pray and wish for peace. In the back of our minds, however, and in our private and public deliberations, we cannot get away from the fact that there is a skeleton in the nation's closet, the skeleton of war. If it were possible to have a plebiscite today among all the citizens of the world they would vote one hundred per cent for peace. But there must be a diabolical genie that finds it possible periodically to develop a situation which tries the patience of individuals and of nations.

I maintain that through the united nations organization, to which we properly belong, and to which Canada has made a great contribution, we are fulfilling a high and constructive purpose. If the voice of Canada is listened to and respected through its spokesman, the right hon. the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), to whose eloquence we listened yesterday, and if the ideals he has set forth prevail in that world-wide forum at Lake Success and at Flushing Meadows, we do not need to despair.

We shall have to guard ourselves in our own actions and pronouncements; but, at the same time, anyone who attended the meetings of the united nations last fall will say that the voice of Canada is highly respected and eagerly listened to. The reason for that is simple. In proportion to our population we have done more than any other nation of the world. And there is more than that to the reason why Canada is so highly respected in the forum of the United Nations. After giving of our lives and our resources through our courageous participation in the last two world conflicts, we do not ask for any territorial aggrandizement. We do not wish any additional territory in the Atlantic or the Pacific, nor do we want even any rectification of our own borders, which in some parts are anomalous. If we wanted to be selfish we could be; we could ask for some reward for what we have done in the two great wars, to try to rectify our borders. But we do not want to do that, because we do not want to carry on agitation in respect of any question which might bring friction, when peace deliberations are our chief concern.

Some doubt was expressed yesterday as to the respect in which the Canadian delegation is held. Let me repeat that the voice of Canada is highly respected. There are in these precincts some who were delegates of or advisers for Canada in the united nations organization. They knew that the best way to win the hearts and minds of the people they met was to say that they were Canadians. Immediately there was a sympathetic response; they spoke their minds to us, and left no doubt as to how much they greatly admired the wonderful things that this relatively small nation has accomplished.

These are reasons for great pride. I have seen with my own eyes many nations asking the advice of and a lead from Canada, because they respect our views, and they respect the action we have taken in our own history. I appreciate sincerely the action taken by the government last fall when I was appointed a delegate to the united nations organization in New York. I know, as chairman of the committee on external affairs, that there were many occasions in the course of our deliberations in that committee on which I was agreeably surprised by the knowledge shown by members of the committee. I have in mind the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and others—I have no time to give all their names—who were sent as delegates, as alternate delegates or advisers to San Francisco, to London and to New York. They gave every evidence of having taken a constructive part in those deliberations. I can say that those who were appointed as delegates or alternates left a fine impression as Canadians and as men who understood both national and international situations.

Last fall, with others, I happened to be a delegate from Canada. All parties were represented. I do not wish to give the names, but I can say sincerely that each participated to the best of his ability, and I take pleasure in paying them this tribute. They worked there as Canadians, realizing fully the seriousness of the problems they were facing.

It is no sinecure to be appointed a delegate, an alternate or an adviser in united nations activities. I know that those from the press gallery who attended the last session of the united nations were unanimous in their report as to the activities of the Canadian delegation. They all agreed that we had worked—not eight hours a day, because there was no question of union hours in those circumstances, but from twelve to fourteen hours every day. We did it diligently and willingly. I do not hesitate to repeat that the hon. member for Peel, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and all others who participated in previous meetings and deliberations made a fine impression on all who had the benefit of listening to and meeting them, because I often had occasion to observe their fine accomplishments.

It was a new experience for me as a parliamentarian, and one I appreciated. That was the first time in many years I have had the great honour of being a member of parliament that it had been possible for me to mix with high officials of the civil service—high officials in a very important department. I know I gained much by my contact with those career men. I do not need to mention names, because Canada has been most fortunate in her high officials in the civil service, and particularly in the foreign affairs branch. I could mention the names of Mr. Pearson and Mr. McNaughton, and many others who are making it their life's work to serve in that important department.

It was inevitable that as members of parliament, we were not always familiar with the methods of members of the civil service, but I believe if there was any light friction or any personal reaction the parliamentarians benefited by having been in contact with those high government officials. I have no doubt, too, that the benefit was reciprocal, and that the members of the service benefited by being in contact with men who had taken part in the hurly-burly of active politics, men who must face all conditions, from day to day, and from year to year, and must be prepared to meet public opinion. The contact between those two groups was bound to be beneficial in our deliberations and actions at the united nations meetings.

If an invitation is extended to any member of parliament to appear before the united nations in any capacity, I would urge him to accept it. He will know in advance that he will have to work, but he will enjoy it, because there is a feeling of accomplishment. And we can say that so far as our consideration of external affairs is concerned, the matter has been taken practically out of politics, and this is certainly a great credit to our parliament.

I want to compliment the administration for the fine move they made when they found it possible to have every section of the House of Commons and the Senate represented at the united nations. It is in that way that the government gets closer co-operation and has better work done.

I wish to make a brief reference to our connection with the United States. I may be prejudiced, but I love the United States; I love the Americans, and this attitude does not lessen my love for Canada. The United States is a big exuberant country possessing all the qualities and all the faults of a young, strong giant. Some of us would seem to be afraid of the size of the United States and the important place that it has been projected into. In the course of this debate reference has been made to two worlds, to two philosophies, Soviet Russia in the east and the United States of America on the American continent.

One colossus, Russia, was built up during the last seven centuries. That country carries on today the same imperialistic expansionist idea which was evident back in the ninth century and which has been her continuous policy. Europe and the rest of the world has often suffered from that expansionism. Today the United States is the second so-called world colossus. But she did not reach that stature of her own volition or with any idea of expansion. It was not done by her own work.

I think I showed at the beginning of my remarks that the United States, on account of her prosperity, her high standard of living, her strength, her wonderful natural resources, her climatic conditions, her isolation from Asia and Europe by two great expanses of water, never in her wildest dreams imagined that she would become the leading nation of the world. She was compelled to do so. I think this is an example of the ways of Providence as shown through history, as applied to individuals as well as to nations.

What would have happened in 1914-18 if there had been no United States? That democratic nation did not want to expand her territory. She was satiated as far as territory was concerned; but she answered the call of democracy which she knew was in danger in Europe. There is no doubt that she helped to a great extent to save European civilization, yes the whole world. She applied that principle just as forcibly, if not more forcibly, in 1939. She did not want to participate in a second war. Her people did not want a second war. Why should they want war? They were prosperous; within their own borders they had the highest standard of living of any nation in the world. They were a creditor nation; they were on friendly terms with everyone. They did not want to expand their territory. The territory which she might have annexed unjustly in the past she gave back. She gave those people their freedom. This house should realize that that great nation did not become powerful of her own volition. It was simply because there were compelling circumstances, and she realized the role she had to play at the cost of great sacrifices, in defending civilization and freedom.

Is it fair to make a comparison between the United States ideology and Russian Soviet ideology? Can a favourable comparison be made between communism and progressive capitalism? Such comparisons are not right, yet they are made time and again in this House of Commons. As I said a moment ago, the United States has all the exuberance of a fine, powerful youth. She knows her strength; she knows her ability to produce, but she is also magnanimous. I listened attentively last night to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He said that in the last war we repeated practically the same errors that we had made in the previous war, that there had been an expansion of territory, the annexation of new population and the use of slave labour in the mines and forests of the victorious nations. Surely that would not apply to the United States.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar seems to deplore the fact that the United States wants to have defensive outposts on the Pacific ocean. I for one am in favour of such outposts. The United States does not want them for purposes of aggrandizement. I ask hon. members to think of the situation of Australia and New Zealand during the last war. A large number of the courageous sons of those countries were fighting in North Africa when the attack on Pearl Harbor occurred. After Pearl Harbor their countries were in deadly danger. In those horrible hours after the Philippines were crushed, over two-thirds of the United States navy was destroyed, General MacArthur had to leave the Philippines as a vanquished general, his magnificent armed forces completely destroyed. He went to Australia, and there he was received with open arms. The people in Australia were a little impatient. They wanted to know what was going to happen when their sons were fighting in North Africa and their own shores were in deadly danger. These outposts are needed. If I have any voice in advising my government I hope that we never find it possible to criticize them.

What do they mean? They mean that there is a safeguard for the civilized world, for all free-loving people, for all free-loving nations the same as the British navy to a large extent was a safeguard for the peace-loving nations of the world. This is not the time and place to propound any theories about the great British empire which is not disintegrating but is merely growing into the British commonwealth of nations.

I repeat that these outposts are not for United States aggrandizement; they are for the safety of the whole world. They are not a threat to any nation that wants to remain peaceful. There was no idea of threat in the outpost of Pearl Harbor. When the attack on Pearl Harbor took place the Japanese ambassador, who was supposed to be talking peace to the United States government, must have known that the attack had been planned by the military caste in Japan. We do not want a repetition of that situation. Prevention is better than cure.

Supposing the United States had had no outpost at Pearl Harbor? Supposing that that horrible holocaust had occurred in San Francisco harbour? It might have proved a deadly blow to the United States. With the situation that we must of necessity face in the world today we must have these outposts. They are not for purposes of war; they are merely to tell the nations of the world that they are more than United States outposts, that they are world outposts which will stand guard for all nations which desire peace and freedom. Any nation that believes in peace will not have to worry. The navy, the marines, the army and the air force will be there for one purpose only, the maintenance of the peace of the world. The United States are telling all the peaceful nations to call on them if anyone dares to attack them unjustly, and the United States will answer that call immediately and effectively. That is my way of thinking.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not like to interrupt the hon. member, but if he will read my speech he will see that I was dealing with the Atlantic charter and I gave many other examples to show that it had been set aside at various conferences.

Mr. BRADETTE: I accept gladly the hon. member's explanation.

Might I crave the indulgence of the house for just a few moments to say a word or two on the Palestine question, which I believe is of all importance?

I congratulate previous speakers on the moderation they have shown in treating this important subject and very difficult problem. I should like to deal with it historically and to say first that all due credit must be given to generous Great Britain for its attitude during the last twenty-five years towards both the Arab states and the Jewish people. No nation has done so much as Great Britain for the liberation of the Arab people. What happened after world war I? It was Great Britain alone that promised to lift the yoke from the shoulders of the Arab people and give them freedom. At the peace conference Palestine was made a mandated territory under Great Britain. Particularly I would ask the house to remember that the only nation in the world which ever had the courage and the vision to promise a national home for the Jewish people was Great Britain. Let us try to put ourselves for a moment in the position of that fine old historic race which for centuries was exiled from its motherland and had no national home. Even in our Christian hymns and in the rites of my own church we often mention the name of Sion, Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and use the hymns of David.

We have, then, the Jewish motherland, spiritually speaking, and the same principle applies with all the greater force to the Jewish people, both territorially and spiritually. The Arabs in Palestine were under a trusteeship. No doubt some mistakes were made in the Balfour declaration, and no doubt there was a lack of certain clarifications, but surely this is the time to make an appeal to the magnanimity and fairmindedness of the Arab states. Surely they have all the territory they want. The Jewish people ask for only a very small fraction of that part of the world, hardly more than a symbol, and in responding to that appeal I think the Arab states should be magnanimous just as Great Britain has been in dealing with the Arab states themselves.

I heard an Arab representative from Syria—he called himself an Arab when speaking to me at the meeting of the united nations last fall. He said, "Surely we have enough ground to be able to give a little to the fine Jewish people." I can mention his name if necessary.

Great Britain from the very beginning of this question assumed responsibility, and her generosity has been acclaimed in every part of the world. But in accepting that responsibility and in trying to implement it, instead of receiving co-operation and moral support, she suddenly began to meet with criticism, and public statements were made which reflected on her good reputation. No one could reasonably blame Britain for her stand on Palestine in the last year and a half, and I believe she took the right course when she placed the Palestine problem before the united nations.

Canada gave ripe study and long deliberation to this problem. No one would doubt for a single moment the sincerity of the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who was our Canadian representative dealing with the Palestine question at Lake Success and Flushing Meadows. I know personally that he spent sleepless nights pondering over this important problem. He knew that none of the solutions offered was perfect. He did not take the line of least resistance but in the sincerity of his heart, and I believe in this matter he was voicing the sentiment of a great majority of the Canadian people, he voted for partition as the least evil, as he said at the time. But Canada was in good company. We were not the only nation that voted that way.

I must say that some criticism must be levelled against the Arab states. A year ago last spring they did not participate in the deliberations of the Palestine inquiry commission, and last fall they refused to get together with the Jewish delegates at the united nations who opened their arms to them and invited the Arabs to come and discuss their problems together. But again the Arabs refused. Now we have reached a situation which is almost intolerable, but a solution must be found that will be fair to the Jewish people.

Often in these precincts we hear mention of an international police force. That, in my view, is not the proper expression; it should be "international military force" if it is to express exactly what it means. I may be an idealist on that point, but I am firmly convinced that if we had an international military force to implement partition in Palestine, or even a trusteeship, it would defeat its own ends. It is true that Canada is willing to make the necessary sacrifices, but I hope and pray that the day is not far distant when peace will prevail throughout the world, not through an international military force or physical force of arms, but by the moral force created, practised and maintained by every citizen in the world, and their expressions of view implemented by their governments.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house will join with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) in the fine words with which he closed his speech.

I am glad that my first word this afternoon is to congratulate the minister of external affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) on his comprehensive and constructive statement on our country's position in world affairs. I think it must be a source of considerable satisfaction to him that the statement he made yesterday has received so much support in this chamber that there is very little left to be said by way of criticism.

If I understand the government's policy as the minister stated it yesterday, and I believe I do, it is, stated briefly, to use the united nations as the instrument for maintaining world security and advancing world welfare. However, the minister went further, and here I agree with him. If the united nations does not provide us with the security we seek, then we shall co-operate with other democratic nations to provide that security for us and for them. In my opinion that is a realistic policy; it is a policy with which I agree and with which I think every member of this group agrees. As a matter of fact I suppose it is forced on us by world events, by the shortcomings of the united nations.

It was my good fortune to attend the meetings of the general assembly of the united nations last fall. I say it was my good fortune, although the meeting itself was not very inspiring; but it did give me the opportunity of seeing the organization at work and to meet and hear and see world personalities in action. I am sorry that more members of parliament are not able to attend those meetings. As the hon. member for Cochrane said on his own behalf during the course of his speech, I wish to thank the government for giving me that opportunity and to say how much I appreciated working with the delegation and the members of the external affairs staff.

I believe the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who attended the general assembly as one of the parliamentary advisers, as I was, said that his advice was not accepted. I do not know whether mine was accepted or not, but I can say that I had every opportunity of giving it, and when I did not do so on any question that came up I was invariably asked for my opinion. No one could wish for anything more than that.

We all agree that the united nations has fallen far short of the hopes that we had for it when the charter was signed in 1945. That being so I think this afternoon I shall try to show what in my opinion is the reason for its failure. I hope I shall not be too critical, but what I shall say is what has been impressed upon me, not only by my attendance at the general assembly last fall but by my observation of international events since the end of world war II.

The charter of the united nations is its constitution. The signatories to that charter, if they signed it sincerely, accepted certain principles which would govern their conduct as members of the united nations. Probably the principles I am going to state would not be acceptable to everyone, but they appear to me to be the principles on which the organization of the united nations is based. The first principle is that nations with different political and economic systems can co-operate for certain purposes. Even if those purposes are limited, those signing the charter felt there could be co-operation; otherwise there was no point in signing it. The second principle is that no nation should interfere with the internal affairs of another nation, and the third, that membership in the united nations meant the acceptance of compromise in the settlement of international disputes.

As I said, from my observations at the general assembly last fall, I became convinced that these principles, at least for certain members of the united nations, no longer operate. There is now definitely a division in the united nations on political and economic lines. The Soviet bloc rejects those principles which democratic nations consider the foundation stone of their very existence; while the democratic countries reject those principles on which authoritarian states are based. It is from these fundamental, and I think irreconcilable, differences that conflicts in the united nations stem.

As it appeared to me at the general assembly, the delegates of the Soviet union made no attempt whatsoever to minimize differences or to find grounds for co-operation. Every effort was taken to emphasize differences and to prevent agreement, to use the united nations, as Mr. Vishinsky said in one of his speeches, as a propaganda forum. So long as that spirit exists on one side, the united nations, however useful it may be, will not do for the people of the world what we hoped it would do when it was formed.

On the other hand, I am convinced that the other nations, particularly the democratic countries, are anxious to co-operate with the Soviet union. There was always great joy when the Soviet delegates gave the slightest indication that there could be co-operation. If anyone thinks that the statement I have just made with reference to the attitude of the Soviet union is too sweeping I would draw attention to the excessive use of the veto by that nation in the security council, and to the boycott of general assembly decisions with which they did not agree. The decisions with which they did agree were never particularly important.

But there is a further indication of the unwillingness of the Soviet union to work with other nations. There are associated or affiliated with the united nations certain specialized agencies. I believe there are eleven of these altogether. As far as I can learn the Soviet union has representation on only four, on the world health organization, and on the international trade organization—and I believe that is only partial, being limited to the preparatory committee. They also have representation on the universal postal union and on the international telecommunication union. The Soviet union has no representatives on the international labour organization or on the food and agriculture organization, two organizations which are very important, if for no other reason, so far as the international labour organization is concerned, than that it brings together employers and employees from all parts of the world to discuss questions which are of importance to industrial workers. The food and agriculture organization is of the utmost importance today if we are to have international co-operation in increasing the food supply of the world. The Soviet union has no representation on UNESCO, on the international civil aviation organization, on the international bank, on the international monetary fund, or, as far as I know, on the international refugee organization.

I have mentioned this matter because these specialized agencies, along with the principal organs of the united nations, are the means by which the principles of the united nations charter can be made effective in the lives of the peoples of the world; and I would give it as my opinion that it is most important that all countries should be represented on them. This abstaining from membership in these agencies can only mean that the Soviet union does not believe in co-operation among the peoples of the world. As I said before, until there is a change in that attitude the united nations organization will not be the force in world affairs that we had hoped it would be.

As long as there is any hope, however, that the united nations organization can be of use, we must do everything possible to keep it in existence, even if we are disappointed with its progress. It is an inspiring ideal, and some day it may work. I agree with the hon. member for Cochrane that even if it only provides a forum for the discussion of world problems it is serving a useful purpose. If such is the case I hope the government will give it every support, and I am sure they will.

I come now to the other part of the government's policy, that if we cannot have all the nations of the world in one organization, we must do what sensible people always do when they cannot have all they want, namely, do the next best thing. The next best thing in this case, I think, is the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs of co-operation with the democratic countries of western Europe. Here I should like to express publicly my own appreciation of the action of the United States in providing the funds for the European recovery program. This is economic aid given by one country to other countries on a scale never before dreamed of. As I said, I wish to express my own appreciation of that generosity.

The motives of the United States in making this aid available have been questioned. But whatever the motives, can anyone in his senses object to feeding the hungry, clothing the naked and putting into the hands of the war-tortured people of Europe the means by which they can rebuild their industries and restore their dignity? I cannot understand, on the part of anyone who believes in human welfare, objection to a program of that kind. It is unfortunate and even deplorable that Soviet Russia did not allow the countries of eastern Europe to participate in this recovery program. But I hope that the benefits of the European recovery program will seep into eastern Europe, as I am convinced they will, and that these countries will benefit from the operations of the program. It would have been much more pleasant and much better for the people of the world if this program had been accepted in all the countries of Europe on the basis on which it was offered.

A great deal has been said during the session, and particularly yesterday, about the dangers of communism and the appeal it had to many people in various parts of the world. I think we should try to understand why it is that people will accept the solution of communist revolution for their problems. I feel that sometimes in this house, because of our own comfortable position, we do not appreciate the outlook of millions of people in other lands who have never known anything but hunger and privation. Let us just remember that in almost all countries up to the present, with perhaps the exception of the North American countries, only a small group at the top were ever economically secure, and consequently politically secure; because a person who is not economically secure cannot be either politically secure or politically free. For the great masses of people in all countries the important thing in their lives is bread. Hungry people are always thinking of things to eat. Until we are able to convince them that democracy will give them not only the opportunity to vote but also the opportunity to eat, they will fall for slogans such as "the land for the peasants" and "the factories for the workers," and will always, in my opinion, lose out as well. That is what we must do today. We must not only give the people political freedom and political democracy; we must make sure that with our joint co-operation they will also have bread.

Both the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Stanstead referred to the political changes which have come about in our international relations during the last three or four decades. These changes have been great, so great indeed that foreign relations are no longer the exclusive concern of foreign ministers and their diplomatic staffs. Today our international affairs reach down to the farmer on the land, the miner in the mine and the industrial worker in the factory. That is so because of the importance of production in our international affairs. In a word, international relations today are no longer a question of the manoeuvring by politicians and diplomats to have their country come out on the long end of international deals. International relations are becoming more and more a matter of co-operation in the improving of human welfare and human security.

We in Canada therefore will have to see to it that our farmers understand the part their production plays in maintaining world peace. The miners of Great Britain will have to understand the part they play in providing coal for Europe's needs; and workers in the factories all over the world must be shown that they, too, are important in maintaining peace in this new world in which we find ourselves.

Last winter one of the Ottawa newspapers ran a series of articles condensing the memoirs of Mr. Cordell Hull. I was interested to note what Mr. Hull had to say about his fight for freer trade and the lowering of tariff barriers by the United States, and what he felt was the part played by economic factors in our relations with other countries. I should like to read briefly from one of those articles. He said:

> Over and above the economic side of our foreign policy, but closely tied in with it, I believed, hung the political side. To me it seemed virtually impossible to develop friendly relations with other nations in the political sphere as long as we provoked their animosity in the economic sphere. How could we promote peace with them while waging war on them commercially? When I came into the state department I found in the department files no fewer than thirty-four formal and emphatic diplomatic protests presented by as many nations following the passage of the Smoot-Hawley high tariff act. Nor had their protests been confined to words. Goaded by what they regarded as almost an embargo keeping out their exports to the United States, they retaliated in kind.

If we are to have peace in the world we should remember certain things today. The industrial productive potential of the world is enormous, indeed so enormous that, given a few years of peace, it will be more than sufficient to meet the needs of a world at peace. When we are advocating programs of co-operation we must remember that these must not be short-term programs but programs that are permanent, because never again, if we want to avoid war, can we go back to the cutthroat competition of the pre-war years. Again, there will have to be considerable national and international planning; for if our industrial capacity is more than sufficient to meet the needs of the world, our agricultural or food producing capacity, taking the world as a whole, is far short of being able to provide the peoples of the world with a satisfactory and sufficient diet.

These are matters we should try to always keep in mind when discussing our foreign relations, because hunger in any country is a danger to every country.

I wish to conclude with a brief comment on a statement made by the minister toward the end of his address, namely, that the burden of maintaining peace will not be easy. I hope the minister is wrong. Very likely he is right. But however hard it may be to maintain peace, it will be easier than fighting another war; consequently we should be prepared to make whatever sacrifices are required to maintain peace.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, this debate on external affairs, together with debates on the same subject on other occasions, has been kept on an extremely high level, as is proper when we are discussing foreign relations; to such a question the House of Commons and the public generally would be expected to take that kind of approach. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) opened the debate with an exhaustive analysis of Canada's present position in world affairs, introducing the discussion, in his usual way, on a plane we would all wish to follow in succeeding addresses.

I have always felt that we must look for agreement, rather than division, as far as the political parties in Canada are concerned, on the subject of external affairs. I believe that is what the public of Canada want and what the parliament of Canada demands. Whatever differences we may have in other ways, we must see that as far as humanly possible we achieve a single voice in the councils of the world. Therefore those of us in this house who from time to time have had the privilege and honour of attending international conferences have striven to follow that course conscientiously and consistently, and I hope that will continue to be the policy of all political parties in this country.

The cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy must be of course the achievement of a just, permanent and lasting peace; because after all there is nothing more valuable, more desirable for the people of Canada or any other peace-loving country. This national objective must be pursued courageously and relentlessly. We must not accept the inevitability of a third world war. This is a defeatist attitude which no such nation as ours, vigorous as we are from coast to coast, should adopt. We must not admit that we cannot at least play our part in seeing to it that a world war, which in many quarters is regarded as inevitable, shall be avoided. We must fight to make sure that the inevitability of world war III shall not be realized.

War is not inevitable. But so far as this country is concerned, it is no longer a choice between peace and war. It more closely resembles a choice between peace and the mass obliteration of mankind.

On the other hand this central objective to which I have referred must not be allowed entirely to dull the keen edge of opposition in the House of Commons, although we must always be careful to make sure that that opposition is completely and thoroughly constructive, and that in foreign affairs the linen we may have to wash is washed right here, and not in the councils of the world.

Those are points which all of us want to keep in mind, and which I shall have before me in my observations today. Let me say that the government's policy in the past, so far as international affairs are concerned, has too often been characterized, if I may say so—and in a critical vein now—by what I think is a shocking tendency to keep in the vest pockets of the ministry the important reasons and details leading up to the formulation of policy, and also in some instances even the policy itself.

The place to make foreign policy for the Canadian people is not solely in the east block of these parliament buildings, not solely within the confines of cabinet council, not in other world capitals. If peace is to be permanent it must be a people's peace. And in the light of that fundamental doctrine, a people's peace must of course be made by the people themselves. The foreign policy of this country should be made in the House of Commons and the Senate, in the parliament of this dominion.

But what have we been witnessing in recent times?—and it was worse perhaps in earlier days. In 1946 only three out of 119 sitting days of parliament were given over to the discussion of external affairs. In 1947 only five and a half out of 115 sitting days were taken for the discussion of that subject. And this year, 1948, it is only on the seventy-third or seventy-fourth day of the session that we have now for the first time reached a debate on external affairs.

More than that, a full-time ministry of external affairs came only after great pressure from the opposition. The house committee on external affairs was set up only after similar pressure from this side of the house. No definite time is set aside from week to week for the discussion of foreign relations, despite the fact that the house committee on external affairs in 1946 recommended to the House of Commons that there should be such a definite period, and the house concurred unanimously in that recommendation. But nothing has been done about it.

In 1947 we had to go to the extent of moving to adjourn the house in order to discuss whether or not this country was being given fair treatment in the matter of participation in the peace treaties for Austria and Germany. Furthermore, there were in 1946 some ninety-eight international gatherings at which Canada was officially represented, and there were more in 1947. But in only one instance last year was there multiple-party representation. I am not complaining so much about that. But let us not go away with the idea that all political parties in the House of Commons have a real say in foreign policy as from time to time it is formulated. I bring to the attention of the house these facts because in my opinion the Department of External Affairs, good as it may be—and I am not one who would seek to break it down—is not divine. It is human; it makes mistakes, and I fancy it makes just as many as most of us do. It is the duty of the opposition to point up those mistakes so that the department and the minister may correct them in the days ahead.

One of those mistakes is this. In the representation of this country at international gatherings, I wonder if there is any part of our population which believes that it has a greater stake in peace than do the womenfolk. In the general assembly, and in other places where international gatherings have been held, I have asked myself this question: Where are the womenfolk of the world? True, at San Francisco we did have representation of womenfolk in Canada—exceptionally good representation—in the person of Mrs. Casselman, who formerly represented the constituency of Edmonton East. But since that time where have we gone so far as representation of women is concerned?

Let me point out to the Department of External Affairs that one of the things we should do is to see to it that more Canadian women have the opportunity to express their views in respect of a matter which, I think, is of greater interest to them than to any other part of our population. It is little short of a scandal, if I may say so, that we have not had more women take part in our international gatherings. I believe that if peace were placed more in the hands of the women of the world, it might be more permanent.

I wish to deal somewhat critically—I fancy the minister may feel I am too critical—with some of the matters I mentioned at the outset. As was pointed out by one of the speakers yesterday, we were at one time placed in an embarrassing position in connection with the matter of oil sanctions against Italy. That was about twelve years ago. I sat in the House of Commons and heard the debate which took place at that time. But whatever the pros and cons may have been, it was an embarrassing and humiliating experience, not only for us but for other nations as well—because in these matters we have been travelling in fairly prominent company.

So far as the Palestine situation is concerned—and I shall not deal with it at length—our position, if I may say so, has been one of advancing, retreating, back-filling, backtracking and slowing up. Canada has more than ordinary responsibility for that policy because of her position in the initiation of the plan itself. We have come out of that with something less than a completely unsoiled reputation as a nation in diplomatic affairs.

In addition to that, our performance in the Korean situation has given us a somewhat juvenile diplomatic reputation. I make these suggestions now because I do not think anyone would wish to make them except with the idea that somebody should point out that there are corrections to be made, that there are reforms in the Department of External Affairs that ought to be recommended on the floor of this house.

I come now to another matter. During this debate we have heard the question raised in respect to our relations with the great United States of America. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has given much, and he has much to give, with respect to the question of his contribution to our external affairs policy and his reputation in the gatherings of the world. I was proud of what he said, just as I am always proud of the way in which he represents us from time to time. I was glad to hear him put in a good word for the United States of America.

I am not one who is ashamed to stand up in this house and say that I am proud of the friend we have to the south on this North American continent. I think that what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said was capable of the interpretation which was put on it a few moments ago by the hon. member for Cochrane. As I read what he said, and as I heard what he said, I think there was just a little tendency to balance off, on the one hand, some of the bad thing that Russia had done and then balance off, on the other hand, some of the bad things the United States had done. I am not going to balance today. I say to you that while we must not be dominated by Washington—Washington does not want to dominate us—we must not fail to realize the necessity of friendly collaboration with the republic to the south. We cannot adopt any bull-in-the-china-shop diplomacy with respect to our great friend to the south. Let us be realistic in our arrangements and our dealings with them from time to time.

We must not, so far as this parliament or this government or this people is concerned, be confused as to who are our real friends in a critical, dangerous and uncertain world. The fact that a big friend and ourselves find each other going in the same direction on the international highway should not tempt us to make a detour so that we can boast of our complete detachment. On the other hand Canadians must avoid being hitchhikers on the highway of international affairs. We must recognize our friends because, as in the case of individuals, in international matters our friends mean much to us. They mean much to our safety, they mean much to our security, they mean much to the peaceful days that we hope will follow these cloudy times.

There is one other matter I want to bring up, if I may; I refer to the question of commitments. This is one of the difficult things with which nations have to deal. Unless the public is ready to support every commitment that a nation or its representatives may make from time to time in international affairs, if those commitments have only a fragile backing at home, then I think it is only fair to say that perhaps those commitments had better not be made at all. Commitments which you know you cannot carry out or which you are uncertain you can carry out should not be made in the original instance.

Canada has to make sure that she does not get the reputation of having a bark that is worse than her bite in the international show. That is one of the things we have to consider carefully. In the main I think we can agree with the policy enunciated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There are some things perhaps which one would want to shade here or perhaps colour there. Much of the speech dealt with things which are fairly common knowledge to the people of Canada; nevertheless, presented as they were by the minister, they carried considerable weight in the house and the country.

The government should not allow this debate to conclude without the collateral or complementary policy being announced by the Department of National Defence. We have been told where we stand; we were told yesterday how we got there, but we have not been told where we go from here and what kind of policy will be adopted in order to get there. I think the government must give us an answer. They have told us how we got there. To tell us where we are is not sufficient without indicating what the Department of National Defence is going to do in order to make deeds accompany the government's words.

Some reference was made yesterday to the western European union. I am sorry I have not the exact clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press, but I have a copy here of what they had to say about this. That paper has a reputation for the close study it makes of external affairs. They say:

> In the event of conflict, will United States troops fight with them? Truman didn't say so. We haven't said so. Russia still does not know whether the free world would instantly unite to resist aggression, and in two world wars it was this uncertainty, this prospect of disunity among intended victims that encouraged the aggressor to gamble on an easy victory.

In discussing Palestine that paper went further and said:

> Both the commission and the assembly violated the first rule of statesmanship, that policy should never be allowed to outrun resources.

So far as this party is concerned, we approve what has been said with respect to supporting the western union. In addition we should do some international fire-ranging in places where small conflagrations break out, because that will be cheaper in the long run than waiting until the fire gets out of control. Government policy with respect to that should be carefully considered.

I want to go one step further and indicate that despite the semi-political paralysis of the united nations, and despite the fact, as was so clearly put by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) a few moments ago, that it has failed to live up to the glamorous expectations of San Francisco, nations must not cease trying to find some effective collective formula of lasting peace so that the privations, suffering, distress and death which war has brought to millions of families shall not have been made in vain.

What is the situation now? Soviet foreign policy is a definite and a positive program. While we along with Russia were fighting a war, Russia on its own was blue-printing a Eurasian peace. By this peace Russia has brought under her dominion Manchuria and part of Korea in the east and a number of countries, ranging from the Baltic to the Adriatic, in the west. At Greece and the Dardanelles Anglo-American diplomacy has made a definite stand. All this additional territory is under Russian domination because of the strength and strategic position of Russian armed forces—and I underline "Russian armed forces".

How far has the world gone down the road of gradually abandoning most of the ideals stated in the Atlantic charter and what were the causes that led us to our present position? Was not our early policy of virtually complete surrender to the demands of one nation, namely Russia, a major cause? Has Canada ever asked why Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia are not entitled under the Atlantic charter to have their sovereign rights and self-government restored? Is the virtual occupation of large sections of the Baltic-German and Polish territory and the effective domination by force of Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and a large portion of Manchuria consistent with our announced purpose in the Atlantic charter? Beyond this extended Soviet empire the Soviets operate by the familiar fifth-column methods employed by dictator states. Clearly this continent becomes the effective centre of resistance to Soviet expansion.

It is even more absurd now to talk of hemispheric isolation than it was formerly to talk of North American isolation. The core of resistance will be the British commonwealth and empire, the United States, and such other countries as are able to escape Soviet absorption in the initial stages of a world war. Articles 51 and 52 of the united nations agreement open the door to the new diplomacy to which we in Canada will doubtless subscribe in some concrete way in due course.

An important example of the collective security this article envisages is to be found in the mutual assistance pact made on March 17 last. I so well remember, as do so many of us who were at the San Francisco conference, the discussions which took place and the long hours we spent with respect to the inclusion of those articles in the San Francisco charter. Little did I think in any event—perhaps some were more far-sighted than I—that in another three years we would be relying on articles 51 and 52 as one of the means by which free nations would gather together in the hope of stopping the aggression which has been so noticeable of late. In connection with that mutual assistance pact the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in this house on the day it was signed; and this was repeated yesterday but not extended by the minister of external affairs:

> The peoples of all free countries may be assured that Canada will play her full part in every movement to give substance to the conception of an effective system of collective security by the development of regional pacts under the charter of the united nations.

It is important that this parliament should know just precisely what the Prime Minister means by those words. This diplomatic language does not mean much to the average man on the street. It is still more important that the government of Soviet Russia should know what he means. The Prime Minister should speak boldly and tell our people what the score is in that connection, and I am quite sure that at an appropriate time he will.

Had the dictators been given any substantial reason to believe in days gone by that there were mighty forces in the free world that would rise against them, they might have hesitated before launching the last world war. A policy of firmness means likely peace. A policy of hesitation and infirmity means possible war.

Canada's position should be made clear and her armed services—I want to emphasize this —should bear a reasonable relationship to our population and economic strength. It may well be dangerous in the extreme for us to have let our forces remain at something less than 35,000 altogether. If Russian aggression is halted—and there is every reason to hope that it can be—there still remains the need to remain firm and strong so that an effective role can be played, having regard to our resources, in maintaining peace.

I now come to another subject, and that is the British commonwealth of nations and the empire. In the maze of international developments, Canada must, more than ever before, recognize the vital, long-range importance of intensifying our interest and vigorously promoting the building of a more influential and powerful British comity of nations. Canada, as the senior dominion, has a challenge and an opportunity of leadership which she must exercise. There is every prospect that in the days which lie ahead, be they near or far, this Canada of ours will not be just a part and a unit of the great British commonwealth of nations and empire but will become the very centre and core of that great British commonwealth and empire, and we must chart our course with that definite possibility in mind.

The present international crisis has inevitably thrown our powerful neighbour to the south and ourselves together in a way unparalleled in our history. That being so, our independence and our general position in world affairs will be enhanced and strengthened if our relationships with the units of the commonwealth are proportionately strengthened at the same time, and may I add that that will be underlined by the normal wishes and desires of that great republic to the south as well as of our own. The commonwealth, it stands to reason, is stronger as a group than the units can ever be separately, and stronger, too, in our dealings with other countries. There is nothing incongruous between the building up of our relationship with the United States and other freedom-loving countries in the world, and the simultaneous strengthening of our commonwealth position at the same time. From our own point of view and our own security and independence they must go hand in hand.

I come to one other suggestion. We have talked from time to time about not desiring to make the commonwealth too rigid. I have always held strong views with respect to that. As the minister of external affairs so very well said yesterday, this commonwealth cannot be static. No such growing and developing organism could ever be static or still, and when she is developing she should not have to do it in a strait-jacket. That I think is the answer so far as the commonwealth and the empire are concerned. We do not want the kind of ties which snap when growth and development take place. What we want is the kind of ties of sentiment and desire and patriotism which, as the bonds become looser, become even tighter in the process.

One thing that I think we can all readily agree upon as being one of the great unifying influences in the commonwealth and empire is that of the crown, Their Majesties the King and Queen. Let us not forget that the visit of Their Majesties to this country in 1939 had a compelling effect upon the whole outlook of this nation. Reports from the Union of South Africa which reach us bear a similar tale. Plans are now being made for the royal family to visit Australia and New Zealand. This may be regarded as a bridgehead for a future development which I should like to suggest to the house in all seriousness. His Majesty is king of Canada as he is king of all the other sovereign states within the commonwealth and empire. In my opinion Their Majesties, if the physical strain is not too much, should divide their time on some reasonable basis so that every unit of the commonwealth may have a more equal share of Their Majesties' time and help. It would have a salutary effect upon commonwealth and empire unity; it would take the place of many of the suggestions which have been made from time to time to bring the empire closer together; it would have a stirring effect upon the unity of the various nations, to which they went, and would indicate the importance of the various nations of the commonwealth which nothing else can do, because the commonwealth's greatest sentimental unifier today is the crowned head of that commonwealth and empire.

As I pass along I want to say a word with respect to the united nations organization. It takes no professional observer to gain the inescapable impression that the public has lost a great deal of its confidence in the once glamorously launched united nations. The two complementary features of this great venture in peace, that of making and of enforcing decisions, once they have been made, have not turned out as people were lead to believe and expect. There has been plenty of discussion—perhaps too much—plenty of propaganda, particularly from one totalitarian state, and the assembly in many instances turned out to be a sounding-board for conflicting ideologies, with little seeming effort really to get down to brass tacks on peace and do something about it.

May I pause to say this. One of the things I was afraid of—and I mentioned it in this house at the very beginning of our discussions when the united nations was set up—is this. I was afraid that somehow or another, unless the heads of the nations all over the world, and particularly the heads of the great and major powers once in a while would put in an appearance at the united nations organization general assembly or security council, it might easily develop into a kind of debating society, which in many instances it has, because never since the united nations organization has been set up has there been any meeting of the supreme heads of all the nations at any united nations organization gathering. I think that is a pity. I admit that, so far as our own country is concerned, our Prime Minister did not sin in that regard, but in many other instances that is so, and regrettable.

The security council, that great protective lion which we were told would show every nation of the world that world forces were there to ensure that a threat would stop as a threat and not develop into a war, has suffered almost from its beginning from sleeping sickness and political paralysis. It has proven to be dangerous to have any organization which makes decisions and then fails to enlist sufficient power to carry them out. What good is a court in our land which makes decisions and has nobody to carry them out once they have been made? Better not to have any court; perhaps it would be better not to have a judgment because the two go hand in hand.

Instead of a world police force, the best that has been proposed so far is just a sort of international truancy brigade which would take care of some little fellows in the world. But what good is it to take care of the little fellows? The little fellows do not start and maintain a world war. You must have something bigger and greater than that. I must say this; and I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in his seat. Whatever may be said with respect to the united nations organization, in the social and economic field not quite the same extensive or intensive criticism of the organization's work can be made. Some progress and development have actually taken place there, and I want to pay tribute where tribute is due.

In concluding my remarks with respect to the united nations organization, I have this suggestion to make. This country, along with those of our friends who are interested, should take the lead at once to shake up and reform this whole united nations organization and call for a clarification of its objectives and aims, and then, having defined them, proceed to call for a simplification of the complicated and clumsy machinery which creaks and groans under its own weight in international affairs. In my opinion the united nations organization has become all clogged up; it is too top-heavy and is dealing from time to time with other things that are not helping peace or helping to re-establish its position in public confidence. The re-establishment of public confidence in the united nations is a "must" if we are to continue to participate in it. I do not think it is too late to do that. If we let it run on too long we may find that we are in a position where it is "too little and too late" in all that we do.

In my closing remarks I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker. I believe that fifth column international politics made the united nations unworkable, because it is not to be expected that co-operation and wholesome understanding can result when you know that the man sitting across from you at the international table may be directly or indirectly a party to setting fire to your home while you are away. That is putting it pretty plainly and simply; but as a matter of fact, it is a simple problem and I think it deserves simple language. I must confess that nothing made my blood boil quite so much since I entered public life many years ago as to hear read in this House of Commons the words of a man who was in public service who said that he owed a higher loyalty to some country other than the Dominion of Canada. I never got over that. That is a thing that has seared into my soul and will remain there as long as I live. I cannot have regard for people who have opinions such as that.

I want to say this as well; and this is rather tough language, perhaps, but I think I must say it. The Soviet union and the international communists who are trying to infiltrate into every part of the world, so far as Canada is concerned, yes, and other countries as well, have behaved like less than exemplary neighbours, and that kind of neighbour never built a good community, whether it was a world community or otherwise. I said it when I made a speech on external affairs last year and I repeat it now. Many of us who lived on the farm can look back. We knew what constituted a good neighbour. The good neighbour was the chap who lived next door to you and came to your help when you were in trouble and, when you were in distress, was always there to lend a kindly hand. He would not be regarded as a very good neighbour who from time to time used the hired man on your farm, if you like, to try to change your whole order of business and who interfered with your household as well. That is not neighbourliness. Therefore I say to you, sir, that while the espionage trials told only part of the story in Canada, it was sufficient to demonstrate that we must keep a close eye on a nation, even though officially friendly and in good standing, which has proven—and I am sorry to say this—to have been an international porch climber and a diplomatic Peeping Tom. Those are strong words, but I mean them because I consider them appropriate in the circumstances.

Because of that, I want to make this new suggestion. In view of the fact that there is a cominform, that there is an international movement which has its headquarters in the Kremlin in Moscow, reaching its long fingers into the various governments and into the very fabric of society in the nations of the world, while that is going on, we must review the rules which were formerly made with respect to the diplomatic exchange of representatives between nations. I am not satisfied to allow the present system to continue unchanged. I think the temptation, shall I say, is too great where there are in a nation representatives of an ideology which is so completely different from ours and which is, in addition, so aggressive and wants to change our system to theirs. When there is an embassy here and when there are supporters of that particular policy abroad in our own country, the temptation becomes too great. Because of that temptation, I think in the interests of safety we should alter the rules with respect to our diplomatic representation exchanges.

Nations are spending billions upon billions to see that the aggressive communist offensive shall be stopped in its tracks outside our territorial limits, and rightly so. But is it any more of a danger 2,000 miles away than it is right here at home? The two are linked up together, and it is time for this government, this parliament and our people to "pull up their socks", to use the common parlance of the street, and to bring in legislation that will put communism and communists within our own population in a position where they will not just be martyrs ready to attract sympathetic and sentimental support from the unwary, but where they will be rendered impotent to undermine our way of life.

May I just say one thing to you at this point, Mr. Speaker, at the expense of another moment of my time? Let us not be too hard on the people who have been from time to time among that class of our unwary citizens. Circumstances sometimes dictate strange moves. But I want to see to it that the core which is responsible for enlisting fellow travellers in Canada shall, once and for all, be rendered powerless to continue their work, because those who are at the core of such a movement deserve little from their fellow-Canadians. They should get what they deserve before it is too late for straight-thinking, patriotic Canadians to do it.

I know my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker, but I am nearly through and would appreciate being allowed to finish.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would not drive communism underground. It is there now. It has been operating in the cellars of Canada for years. I would legislate, if possible, to dig it out of the subterranean caverns of this country and send its members, its fellow travellers and all who profess to like other countries' way of life better than ours, to places where they will feel at home and where we shall feel safer when they are gone. Let us not be optimistic ostriches when the red menace is all about us

The days of Pollyanna are not appropriate when these people are among us. There comes a time when you have to fight fire with fire.

Many legislative suggestions have been made with the object of dealing with the communistic cancer in Canada, all of them put forward in perfectly good faith. One may perhaps sum up the situation in the simple words I heard a farmer use not so long ago. He was looking at the question of communism quite simply. He said of the communists, "I do not know whether we should outlaw them, 'inlaw' them, or what we should do. I am not a lawyer. All I know is that what I want to do is to get rid of them". I think that sums up the general opinion of the ordinary people across Canada with respect to what they regard as the necessary thing.

I should like to see the dominion and provincial attorneys-general sit down around a common table at once—surely they can get along for that length of time—and draft something that will, within our concepts—and I emphasize that phrase, "within our concepts" —and our principles of democracy, put big, shiny, sharp, white teeth into our Canadian laws which will tell all fifth columnists of the communist movement in Canada, in unmistakable language, that they have only three choices from now on: (a) go to that economic and political paradise which they say exists behind the iron curtain, and stay there; (b) be dealt with in the courts of our land and take the consequences; or (c) drop this whole dangerous, unfair, domestic offensive and become good Canadian citizens again. The latter is what I hope and trust will eventually take place; because if trouble arises on the international front—and God forbid that we shall ever see it again—we cannot afford to have people lighting fires at our back door while we are extinguishing them at the front.

We should concentrate on maintaining the liberty and freedom of the loyal citizens of Canada. We must remember that the loyal citizens of Canada have some rights. We ought to see to it that their safety and that of their families is ensured, and that they are put first in our consideration.

In closing, may I say that there are three fronts upon which the advance of communism must be met and defeated: on the international front where Russia and her allies must be eventually told where the danger line is drawn; on the fifth-column front in our own land where the law must have sufficient teeth to deal with those who seem to know no other language than force itself; and on the home political and economic front which, in the final analysis, is the one I regard as being the most vital of all.

A defeat for Russia on the war front or the dealing with communist sympathizers at home still falls far short of ending the communistic menace to the world. This nation and her peoples—this has been said often before, but I say it again because I believe it wholeheartedly and with all the conviction I can summon to my command—must improve immensely our democratic methods and raise the standards of our way of life, so that the onlooking millions of sceptical—and I underline and underscore the word "sceptical"—world spectators, who are making up their minds right now which way to go, will see clearly that that keystone in the arch of world peace—economic and social justice for the mass of our people—can best be secured and preserved under a system where the maximum of freedom of the individual exists along with the minimum of state regimentation and control—a freedom that communism denies; a freedom that democracy gives.

The teeming millions of the world's masses are unmistakably on the march for a better, fuller and more abundant life. They are going to either communism or democracy to get it; but I want to say to my colleagues in the House of Commons that wherever they go to get it, make no mistake, they are going to get it. Armed force alone will not settle the question. Ideological crusades are not blocked by the forces of even modern warfare. The march goes on, not alone in the fields of Europe and Asia but in the minds of men all over the world. The march ultimately can be arrested only when we demonstrate to them that behind this temporary face of force—and I repeat, this temporary face of force—lie the benevolent, kindly heart and hand of a democratic people which genuinely desires to see a square deal for all; and when we say "all" we mean exactly what we say.

That way, Mr. Speaker, lies progress. That way lies prosperity. That way lies security. That way lies peace.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house are particularly happy because of the strong stand taken in this chamber yesterday afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) against communism and communist activities throughout the world. We were also pleased to see the leaders and spokesmen of the opposition parties throw their spontaneous support behind the minister's statement of government policy with respect to foreign affairs, and more especially in regard to the official announcement of Canadian support for the collective security pact among the western democracies within the framework of the united nations. The participation in this debate of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was also a valuable contribution; and of course I am perfectly satisfied that no part of his address was intentionally designed to be used as propaganda in the coming Ontario election.

I do not wish to take much of the time of this house in participating in this important debate. I am far from pretending to be an expert in these complicated matters of international relations; nevertheless I should be quite satisfied with myself if I could succeed in expressing a few ideas representative of some of the points of view of the man on the street, who, in the last analysis, is the one who pays the price for war and the one who is called upon to pay the price for peace.

We learn from history that from time immemorial generations of men of different racial origins in all countries of the world have sought methods of preserving peace. For thousands of years nations have brought their wars to an end by the signing of treaties designed by men with the object of establishing permanent if not perpetual peace. Yet up to our time war has never been abolished as a means of settling international disputes and differences between nations. We participated in the first world war on the assumption that afterwards the world was to enjoy an unlimited period of peace. The first world war did not achieve the objective of establishing a lasting peace. During the greatest struggle of all time, world war II, which was imposed upon the free democracies of the world, we were told repeatedly that this time everything would be settled forever. It did not settle anything. At least in 1918, at the close of the first world war, the world seemed ready for peace. Today we find such a state of confusion in international relations that one must reach the conclusion that the nations of the world seem ready neither for war nor for peace.

From the point of view of a multitude of Canadians, lasting peace seems further away at this moment than at any time since the close of hostilities; and a great many think it is beyond our grasp. We live in an atmosphere of instability, insincerity and insecurity. Obviously the fault lies somewhere. But it is no contribution to the solution of this crucial problem merely to say that the fault lies with the other power, with the other country, and let ourselves drift into the unknown without attempting to do something to remedy the situation.

Owing to its strategic position and its economic importance, our country of Canada can play a greater part in the establishment of lasting peace, and has as much responsibility, as, if not more, for pursuing that objective and aim, than most countries of the world. We stand here in the centre of a great struggle. In one way we are the shock absorbers of a gigantic clash between two ideologies, and perhaps I might add, between two shapes of imperialism. There is a war, a cold war, now being fought on ideological grounds. Let us admit to ourselves that the two great goals at the opposite ends of those grounds are imperialism. They belong to the U.S.S.R. team, we belong to the British-American team.

There are some who advocate the suppression of communism by waging another world war. This suggestion finds scores of sympathizers, even in the province of Quebec. I feel that this is entirely wrong, and for various reasons which seem obvious, one of the reasons being that no philosophy has ever been seized and destroyed by war. One cannot destroy a philosophy; one cannot destroy a single idea in this world by the use of bullets; and it will never be done even by the contribution of the frightful power of atomic bombs.

The only possible cure for the discontent found amongst people living under our system of democracy, here in Canada or outside in the world, is to make this democratic way of life work so well that its superiority cannot be challenged, either here in Canada or in any other democratic nation. The only way an idea can be killed is to bring along a better idea.

We have here in Canada political freedom and an immense heritage of wealth. Let us first secure for our country as a whole, and for the people living within the boundaries of this nation, a full measure of economic freedom, as well as a full measure of social security. Second, let us contribute our full share, in order to spread, through our moral and material assistance, this priceless economic freedom and social security to the other nations of the world, which are in such need of our Christian, charitable help, in this crucial period of the history of mankind.

We have paid a terrible price through our participation in two great world wars. We have just paid the price for a most devastating total war. That should be enough. Unless we are ready to take the inconceivable risk of diving blindly into a third world war, which could be a final catastrophe engulfing the whole world, with frightening consequences, let us now be prepared to pay the price for a total peace.

Let us have the courage to tell that story to our constituents, to our own people; and let us have enough brains to talk less about the possibility of participating in a third world war, as a means of destroying communism and restoring a Christian order of charity and justice throughout the world.

Obviously, between the ideologies of Soviet Russia and those of the United States and of the British commonwealth, there is just as great a gulf as existed in 1939 between the allied nations and Hitler's Germany.

But until all countries learn that each nation must be allowed to have, without outside pressure, the ideology it likes best, there can be only very much restricted common ground for the discussion and solution of other problems. We fear that the communist states have not yet learned this; and that is precisely what makes the present position of the world so tragic.

Owing to these exceptionally sad circumstances, and in order to help avoiding a third world war and to promote an enduring peace, we must at all costs, along with the other peace-loving free democracies of the world, be united behind policies designed to promote our own common interest and to safeguard their security as well as our own.

Furthermore, in the councils of the nations we must throw all our weight behind the idea that no peace can be lasting, unless it is established on the natural rights of all countries of the world to equal economic opportunity, whether that country be France, China, Italy, Spain or even Germany.

So long as any one nation, whether it be the United States or Russia, possesses a monopoly over natural resources or raw materials which are needed by all nations, there can be no sound basis for a world order based on justice and on peace. So as Canadians let us start out this peace planning properly, by first establishing, in as great measure as we can, economic freedom and social security for the benefit of our own people, and, second, by contributing our share to bring about the fullest collaboration between all peace-loving free nations of the world. Let us do this to help toward the establishment of equality of trade conditions among all countries, in order to improve the standard of living conditions, national and individual economic advancement and social justice for all people of all nations.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

Another world war, fought with atomic power and modern war equipment, can only mean almost entire destruction of our present civilization. That is the threat which lies in front of each one of us, unless we are ready to pay the price for total peace.

Our democratic Christian philosophy teaches us that man is not made for war, whether it be war between nations or war between classes. It further teaches us, not that war is inevitable, but rather that peace is inevitable if we would only recognize that all men are brothers, and that God is their Father.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the speeches which have been made in this debate, and first I should like to congratulate all those who have spoken before me. I give them credit for their sincerity and I hope they will credit me with a like sincerity. The other day I listened to a broadcast from Lake Success and the speaker said that the time had come for plain speaking. I intend to speak plainly this afternoon.

For the purposes of this debate I shall recognize no political party as such, not even my own. For me there are only two kinds of people to be considered when dealing with external affairs. There are those whose first loyalty is to Canada, a sovereign state within the sovereign nations of the British commonwealth, and there are those whose loyalty is to something outside Canada and the British commonwealth. I do not care what they call it, but anyway it is a loyalty which is given to something outside Canada and outside the British commonwealth of nations. Whether these internationalists like it or not, all communists and all pink fellow travellers are among those who give their loyalty to something wider than the country in which they happen to live. I do not say that all internationalists are communists, but I do say that all communists are internationalists. It seems to me that the education of those internationalists who are not communists has exceeded the scope of their intelligence.

The real threat of communism to this country and to all other countries at the present time does not come directly from Russia, nor does it come from outside the country or from the members of the communist party within the country. It is not the Tim Bucks who constitute the threat to this country. Although I disagree violently with their ideas, I have some measure of respect for those men because at least they have the honesty to say what they are and what they stand for. The real threat and danger to Canada and to those other countries which still preserve their freedom come from those people who talk freedom when they are secretly plotting to bring about the tyranny of communism.

Reference was made the other day by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to an editorial which had appeared in a Vancouver paper, and I believe also in a Winnipeg paper. Along with me the editor referred also to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). Of course the editor brought me into it as usual as having indulged in anti-Semitic diatribes. This is the communist smear and it is always used by them. To my knowledge the hon. member for Macleod has never so much as referred either to Jews or even to the Zionists, and yet as soon as he names these fellow travellers he is smeared with anti-Semitism in the press.

The press has marked my activities ever since the occasion in this house six years ago when I denounced a certain newspaperman who had publicly advocated the surrender of the sovereignty of this country to something wider than Canada and wider than the British commonwealth of nations. From that day to this, everything that I have said has been twisted or ignored by a large part of our press.

Communism has been spread internationally by the secret agreements which were made during the war and since the war, and I refer to Yalta, Teheran and Potsdam. Through those agreements which were secretly arrived at, the greater part of eastern Europe was delivered into the hands of the communists. Greece and China were partly betrayed and would have been fully betrayed had it not been that the authorities awakened to the danger of the communist threat.

I remember defending in this house the British policy in Greece when Great Britain stepped in there to stop the communist revolution. At once I was assailed as a fascist and the British were condemned for their imperialism and attempting to restore discredited monarchs and reactionary governments. I said I would not mention any political party, but that was the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I presume he spoke for his party, but anyway that was the line he took.

Then there was the betrayal of Mihailovich. He was sold down the river and his country was delivered into the hands of Tito. I stood in this house alone when I defended Mihailovich, an honourable man who had stood by us all through the war. But under political pressure he was turned aside and Tito was adopted for purposes of allied support.

An extraordinary incident came to light recently through the publication of the memoirs of Mr. Cordell Hull, former secretary of state of the United States. He tells us in his diary what took place in September, 1944, at the Quebec conference:

I said bluntly to the President that Morgenthau's plan—

It was the Morgenthau plan that was adopted at Quebec.

—was out of all reason and that no experts or officials of our government had had anything to do with its preparation. Morgenthau's plan, I added, would wipe out everything in Germany, except land, and the Germans would have to live on the land. This meant that only 60 per cent of the German people could live on German land and the other 40 per cent would die.

I concluded that I was satisfied that the British at Quebec had joined in on this extreme starvation plan in order to get Morgenthau's help in obtaining the six and a half billion dollar credit proposed by the secretary of the treasury.

That is the statement of the former secretary of state of the United States, and in this connection may I refer to the remarks of the leader of this group in the house last night when he called attention to the power of international finance? Here is one example of it. In plain English, in order to get the loan the British had to sign on the dotted line. I called attention to that in this house in August, 1946. I knew nothing, of course, of the secret agreement reached at Quebec, but I had this to say of the policy that was becoming evident in Europe:

Mussolini and Hitler are dead, and the war in Europe ended over a year ago. But the people of Europe are more hungry and more miserable than they were during the war. What is the reason? Famine can result from a lack of harvest or of transport; it can be imposed deliberately for political purposes. For political reasons German fertilizer plants which formerly supplied European farmers have been destroyed. No locomotives can be built in Germany until 1950. Stalin took the only food surplus area in Germany and now, as the socialist Daily Worker says, food is an international political weapon.

When we blame conditions in Europe for the spread of communism let us remember that many of those conditions were deliberately and designedly brought about to spread communism wherever possible. That is one instance that bears out what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said last night in reference to international finance.

I now want to say a few words about Palestine. First of all, I should like to pay a tribute to those British soldiers and policemen and civil administrators in Palestine who, through all these years, have borne the brunt of savagery and gangsterism, many of them unarmed but shot in the back, even hanged and then turned into booby traps. That has been their lot, and their reward has been to be smeared as brutal, even as brutal as the Germans. I have witnessed that on more than one visit to the United States. I have seen and heard anti-British propaganda there which would make any Briton's blood boil. Zionists have even sent their agents to this country to deliver addresses in Canadian cities where they have made the most disparaging statements about the behaviour of the British in Palestine. In my opinion no soldiers and no policemen ever acted in a better or in a more humane way than the British have done in Palestine, and I want to make that clear.

I have not time to go into the Palestine question except as it bears on the peace of the world. As hon. members know, I have been opposed to political zionism almost since I have been a member of this house, and I have never hesitated to state my opposition to it and the reasons for doing so.

Speaking in Montreal in July, 1946, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) said:

> "Many people think the British Labour party is allied with the C.C.F. party in Canada, but that is not so. There may be some similarity as to certain points, but the C.C.F. could never ally itself with a government that had broken a promise such as that to the Jews in Palestine." Politics of this sort, he said, were not within the spirit of socialism.

I deny that the British have broken any promise to the Jews in Palestine or anywhere else. The Jews have had better treatment from the British than from any other people. The hon. member for Winnipeg North went on to urge the immediate entrance of 100,000 Jews into Palestine, and the newspaper report says:

> Mr. Stewart ridiculed the idea that such immigration would lead to an Arab revolt.

Now see the tragic consequences of that policy; but when I pointed out in this House of Commons and elsewhere the inevitable consequences of Zionist policy I was immediately attacked by the press, by the C.B.C. and everywhere else as anti-Semitic.

I should mention a letter which I received in 1945 from the president of the Canadian Zionist League, in which he said:

> I do not think Arab threats directed at Great Britain, the United States and other members of the united nations organization should be taken too seriously. They are a species of blackmail from a primitive people by which they have profited in gold and various concessions in the past. Threats of violence have been the Arabs' most profitable stock in trade. How much longer are the great powers going to appease them? There is no doubt that a policy on Palestine agreed upon by the United States, Great Britain, and the other united nations will be one to which the Arabs will be forced to adjust themselves.

Force, not justice! What is the consequence of attempting to force a decision which itself was arrived at under pressure? The world is now faced with another world war, because war has started and, like a fire in a forest country, who is to say when and how it can be put out?

The British having withdrawn and having refused to participate in any program that is not accepted by both the Jews and the Arabs, and having refused to take part in any solution which needs the use of force, and the United States, for reasons of its own security and for reasons of preserving the peace of the world, having turned its back on partition, the Zionists turned their denunciation on the United States government. Here is a statement from the New York Post dated February 25, in which Rabbi Baruch Korff had the following to say of the present United States government:

> This generation will have to answer to the generation that will inherit the mess of chicanery, the diabolical treachery, with which we govern our allies and friends, and constantly undermine the noblest of traditions which made America the land of the free. I cannot but look upon the shameless cycle of deceit as pure and simple anti-Semitism—no oil, no gold, no imperialism, but plain everyday anti-Semitism, incorporated in the hearts and minds of those who govern free America in 1948. This type of anti-Semitism, which is today wrecking the lives of wretched souls—survivors of Auschnitz and Dachau—is even more dangerous than the venom of Hitler, because this form of anti-Semitism is wrapped in the stars and stripes of free America, camouflaged in the words of Austin: "The council's action . . . is directed to keeping the peace and not to enforcing partition."

Again in the New York Post the following editorial appears which refers to President Truman as trying to kill the united nations, and reads as follows:

> The President has no mandate to kill the united nations, however convenient this method of appeasing Arabia and Great Britain may seem to the men of power who are heedless of honour.

The United States government is now indicted as anti-Semitic because it puts the interests of world peace before those of the political Zionists.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ELIZABETH FRANCES MARY LIDDLE MCCLELLAND

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 146, for the relief of Elizabeth Frances Mary Liddle McClelland.

He said: May I include the other similar bills in my motion. There are several of them one after the other; they are bills for relief—marital appendectomy, I think they call it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. LaCROIX: On division.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the mover of this bill what the policy of the government is for this session regarding divorce? Has any committee on divorce reform been appointed to investigate these matters?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: On second reading the principle of the bill is involved. I merely want to ask one question. What is the policy of the government this session on these various divorce bills?

Mr. MAYBANK: Since the question has been asked of me as mover of the bill, may I say that the answer is that I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the same answer the government gives.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 215, for the relief of Ella Margaret McLaughlin Baisley.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 216, for the relief of Mavis Aurelia Leney Ogilvie Walker.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 217, for the relief of Joanna Wright Farrell.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 218, for the relief of Margaret Patricia Jones Gavey.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 219, for the relief of Selma Rattner Fridhandler.—Mr. Maybank.

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY

Mr. F. P. WHITMAN (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205, respecting Canadian Marconi Company.

Mr. CHURCH: Explain.

Mr. WHITMAN: This is a simple little bill, Mr. Speaker, and should not take up much of the time of the house. The Canadian Marconi Company was incorporated by statute in 1903 and has only the powers given to it by that statute. If it were to become incorporated today it might be under the Companies Act, and it would then have the powers which are asked for in this bill. There is nothing further that I can add. If hon. members will read the explanatory note, they will find all the information given there.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Friday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Rinfret for the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one fact in connection with this bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I should say that a point of order was raised toward the close of the debate on this bill last Friday, and I feel that the Speaker should give a ruling on the point of order as soon as possible. In fairness, though, to all concerned I think I should hear limited debate on the point of order which was raised. If any hon. member would like to speak briefly on the point of order, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one fact that you probably have not noticed. I am in favour of referring this bill to a committee as soon as possible, but in the past the same question came up with regard to private bills. What is the policy with regard to our rules and regulations relating to public bills as compared with private bills, and the principle of them? This matter came up on March 14, 1927. I shall take only two or three minutes of the time of the house because I believe this bill should go to the committee as soon as possible. I wish, however, to call your attention to the following citation from May, fourteenth edition, at page 901:

> The second reading of a private bill corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the house affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure.

You will notice that Beauchesne refers to public versus private bills, as to whether or not the principle is adopted on second reading. This matter came up and was raised by me then, on March 14, 1927, on a private bill concerning the Georgian Bay Canal Company, under which the whole Ottawa valley, with respect to light, power and transportation, was to be given to a private company, a monopoly. Why, if that had gone through we never would have been able to take over the railway or to secure cheap light and power for any other public utilities. Mind you, I am not objecting to this bill being sent to a committee immediately so that it may be considered and revised there, but I want to point out the citation which was quoted at that time, namely citation 657, Beauchesne, third edition:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

So you see there is very little difference, on the principle of our bills, between a public and a private bill. We are deciding the principle of the bill on this second reading. I call Your Honour's attention to that fact, from May, on the principle or expediency of it, and the house is thus committed to it.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) a week ago tonight. At the outset I must say I was amazed that the hon. member should have taken advantage of the opportunity to speak to this amendment for twenty minutes and then call on Your Honour to rule it out of order. However, he chose that course and indicated, at page 3282 of Hansard for last Friday, that in his view there were two objections to the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough).

In the first instance, on the page to which I have referred, the hon. member quoted from citation 769 of Beauchesne, third edition, which indicates some difference between public and private bills, and said that, in the light of this citation, the amendment was meaningless. His whole case as far as that point is concerned was based upon the alleged difference between public and private bills; and on that basis he contended that we should not be amending the bill or opposing second reading, because it was only a conditional approval.

The second point raised by the hon. member is also indicated on page 3282 of Hansard, where he said that the amendment now before the house was meaningless because—

> . . . it would mean that we amend the Companies Act in a private bill.

That was an interesting comment for the hon. member to make, to say the amendment was meaningless and then turn around and give its meaning. However I wish to deal with the two points the hon. member raised.

The first point was that there is a difference between a public and private bill which makes an amendment of this nature, in his view, out of order. The hon. member referred to but did not quote citation 769. The part he referred to reads:

> There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee.

That is the part of the citation which supports the position taken by the hon. member for Outremont. I would point out that he might have read a bit from another citation, 740, which says in part:

> The house, in reading a private bill for the second time, decides that the matter involved is one which may be looked into by the committee.

In the same way citation 770, if you read only part of it, seems to support his position; for it says:

> The house does not profess to decide upon the second reading as to the truth or otherwise of the allegations of fact upon which a proposed bill is based, and in conceding a second reading to a private bill, the house is regarded as merely giving its sanction to its general principle on the hypothesis that the committee to which it is afterwards referred finds those allegations proved.

I admit that not only the citation from which the hon. member quoted but these other two citations, if read in part, seem to support his contention that there is something rather harmless about giving second reading to a private bill. His whole point, as I say, is that it is different from giving second reading to a public bill. But—and this is something one has always to watch—the hon. gentleman did not give the whole of citation 769.

Mr. RINFRET: I did not give any of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member did not quote it, but he referred in part to what it meant. I have quoted for him the part that bears out his point; but if you go on and read the rest of citation 769, this is what it says:

Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable—

And that holds in this case.

—the house will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee.

Now note the next sentence, which states that the second reading of a private bill—

. . . is the first occasion on which the bill is before the house otherwise than pro forma or in connection with the standing orders; and if the bill be opposed, upon its principle, it is the proper time for attempting its defeat.

I submit that this indicates that when a bill is exceptional this is the time we have to oppose its principle. Similarly, if I go back to citation 740, part of which I read a moment ago, we find that the concluding sentence states:

It is only in case that an exceptional principle is enunciated that the second reading is refused.

Similarly in citation 770, if you read the last sentence:

It is usual, therefore, to allow a second reading, except where the bill enunciates some principle which the house is not prepared to affirm.

As those who have followed this discussion will readily recognize, we have felt that because it asks for such a large increase in authorized capitalization, this bill is calling upon the house to approve the enunciation of an exceptional principle. Therefore we feel perfectly in order in regarding this stage of this private bill as highly significant. I would go farther and point out other citations which raise a question about the propriety of this being a private bill at all. Citation 744 states:

The boundary line between private and public bills is narrow and has varied at different times. The house has refused to give a private bill a second reading on the ground that it should have been introduced as a public bill.

And in citation 745:

Private bills frequently affect the general or public interests of particular localities; and in some cases, from the extent to which such interests are affected, measures proposed as private bills have been declared unfit for private legislation and the parties have been required to proceed by public bill.

I submit that there is good ground not only for arguing against the position taken by the hon. member for Outremont that to give second reading to this bill is a harmless proposition, but actually that it enunciates a principle so staggering, and it invades a field so close to the public field, that not only have we the right to do everything we can to defeat the bill at this stage, but we also have the right to question its propriety as a private bill at all.

With respect to the other point raised by the hon. member for Outremont, namely, that the amendment now before the house is meaningless, but with the meaning that it would be a case of amending the Companies Act by an amendment to a private bill, may I call Your Honour's attention to citation 657 in Beauchesne, third edition.

This is the basic citation which has to do with an amendment of this type to the second reading of a bill. In my view there is something important at stake here. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has just read this citation—at least he read the same words; whether he took it from the same place or not, I cannot say—so I shall not take time to repeat it. However it is there quite clearly, in the words the hon. member for Broadview quoted, that it is competent on second reading for a member to move as an amendment a resolution declaratory of some principle relating to the whole matter then before the house. It is not in order on second reading to move an amendment to the bill itself. It is not in order to move an amendment that is merely a direct negative. It is not in order to attach conditions to second reading. But it is in order, as I say, to move an amendment which expresses some principle related to the circumstances connected with the introduction of the bill.

That is precisely what the amendment does. Without referring to a specific section, the amendment notes that there is a question as to the amount of increased capital requested. The amendment therefore expresses, as a general statement of opinion, that no company ought to ask parliament for an increase in authorized capital in excess of 100 per cent. This bill happens to ask for an increase to the extent of 233 per cent.

The citation from Beauchesne, which the hon. member for Broadview quoted a few moments ago, is to be found at page 390 of May, thirteenth edition. After stating the general right of private members on second reading to move this type of amendment, May gives a considerable dissertation which leads up to this interesting paragraph, which answers the hon. member's point when he states that, to pass this amendment, would be to amend the Companies Act through the process of amending a private bill.

I suggest that it is important for hon. members to take note of this paragraph, because questions are frequently being raised about this kind of amendment to second reading. I quote the following from page 392 of May, thirteenth edition:

It must be borne in mind, however, that the resolution if agreed to—

That is an amendment such as the one now before the house.

—does not arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion. The effect of such an amendment is merely to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time;—

The word "now" is in italics. It continues:

—and the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question. The house refuses, on that particular day, to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal: but the bill is not otherwise disposed of. Such being the technical effect of a resolution, so carried, it need scarcely be said that its moral and political results—

And those are the only kinds of results this amendment can have.

—vary according to the character and importance of the resolution itself, the support it has received, and the means there may be of meeting it, in the further progress of the bill.

Then May goes on to give, from experience in the United Kingdom, cases where amendments of this kind have been before the house. Sometimes they have passed and sometimes they have been defeated. In particular he indicates that, when those amendments have passed, at times it has had the effect of defeating the government, and sometimes it has had almost no effect at all. But in all cases May makes it quite clear that the effect of this kind of amendment is purely moral and political. It does not have any operative effect. It does not amend the Companies Act at all. That suggestion is away off the mark.

Actually, as I say, it merely states the opinion of the house that this should not be done; and even if our amendment were carried—and I hope the house will support the principle enunciated in it—it still is competent for the hon. member for Outremont himself to rise in his place and to move that the bill be read a second time at some other date that he might fix.

I will call his attention, without taking time to read the citation, to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 663, and citation 710 from the same edition. The first has to do with second reading and the other with third reading. Those citations indicate that the defeat of the motion for second reading, whether it be a vote on the motion itself or a vote on an amendment thereto, is not fatal to the bill. It is still in order for the member sponsoring the bill to rise in his place and to move that it be read a second or a third time at a stated sitting of the house.

And so the argument the hon. member puts forth to the effect that this amendment would have the effect of amending the Companies Act by amending a private bill falls to the ground. We have in this amendment, in the terms May has indicated, an attempt to do something which is a private member's right, namely to declare our reasons for opposing the progress of the bill.

I contend that the point which has been raised is a most important one, and relates not only to the bill before us tonight, but to members' rights generally with respect to second reading. I hope Your Honour will see fit to rule that the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have listened attentively to what hon. members have said, and I wish to compliment them on presenting their case so clearly. I am, however, faced with certain difficulties.

In the first place, let me say that the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this is the time to accept or reject the principle of the bill, is quite in order. I agree with him in that.

But the question on which I must give a ruling is whether or not the amendment is in order. In that connection I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 771, where Mr. J. W. Lowther, who was chairman of committees of ways and means of the British House of Commons, made a statement with respect to private bills. This is what he said:

The rule which the house had generally followed and, he thought, very wisely, had been to allow the second reading of private bills to go through unless any strikingly new principle happened to be enunciated therein, and in such cases the house must pause before it accepts the principle.

At the present time I cannot see that any strikingly new principle is enunciated in this bill. I have no doubt other bills have been presented to the house in which capital has been greatly increased.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the fact that on second reading of a private bill the principle was affirmed, and as I have already stated I have no quarrel with that. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre added that if the amendment carried, the bill could be introduced again immediately and be considered this session. I doubt, assuming he is right, if that is practicable at this late stage in the session. Certainly, if the bill had been deferred for three or six months or if it had been rejected, a new bill for the same object could not be presented at this session; reference Beauchesne, third edition, citation 773; for all practical purposes this bill could not be presented at this session. I refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 773. If this amendment carried the result would be to defer this bill at least until another session, which I say would be contrary to the opinion expressed by Mr. Lowther, which I quoted when I read from citation 771.

There is another difficulty with which I am faced, whether in connection with a private bill a general principle should be enunciated which would affect all bills. If the principle which is questioned at this time affected only this bill I do not think I would have difficulty in coming to a conclusion, but the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) is in the following words:

> That Bill No. 8 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house no company—

I emphasize the word "no".

> —should ask parliament for an increase in authorized capital in excess of one hundred per cent.

This principle, if approved by this house, would affect all private bills. I would refer hon. members to the words used by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he moved his amendment, and I quote from page 3058 of Hansard:

> I do not refer now particularly—

Note the word "particularly."

> —to this bill, but I say that as a principle we in the House of Commons should give expression to the idea that no company at any time should be granted a capitalization 100 per cent over and above its present capitalization.

I think hon. members will realize from that how far-reaching this amendment would be if it were allowed. May I also refer hon. members to citation 769 in Beauchesne, third edition, the effect of which has been referred to by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is stated there that on the second reading of a private bill the house affirms the principle of the bill. It has been intimated that there is very little difference, if any, between accepting the principle of a private bill and that of a public bill. Let me read the following words:

> There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked.

I ask hon. members to pay particular attention to these words:

> A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy,—

Hon. members will notice the words "state policy."

> —the house, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill,—

Hon. members will note those words.

> —being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee.

This amendment, if allowed, would establish new legislation which would affect all bills which will hereafter be introduced into the house and would have the effect of establishing state policy. I think all hon. members, even those who have spoken to the contrary, will agree with me that this house should not establish state policy on a private bill. For the reasons which I have given, I find it necessary to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Although I do not find it possible to agree with your ruling, I shall not take the time to appeal it.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. The purpose of the bill as set out in the explanatory note is to obtain authority to increase the capital stock of the company from $150,000,000 to $500,000,000. I want to join with the protests made by other hon. members in this respect.

Before passing on, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) upon the progressive stand they have taken in connection with this bill. It is an indication that opposition to the bill is not on a party basis. The principles of this bill are being opposed by more than the people of just one party because they realize that the passage of the bill in its present form is not in the public interest.

I did not expect to speak on this bill this evening, but I have been interested in the public ownership of telegraphs and telephones and I have been doing some reading in the library, particularly the history of the development of the public ownership of these utilities in Europe. During my spare time in the last month I have read some four or five books dealing with the history of public ownership of telephones and telegraphs in Europe. I have been amazed to find out the sound business administration that there has been in a number of countries in Europe in the public ownership of telegraphs and telephones for over a quarter of a century in most cases and for nearly half a century in some.

Quite by chance I happened to dig up a rare book which I would suggest that the sponsor of this bill should read if he wants to be convinced of the soundness of some of our arguments. He should go to the library and get this book when we are finished.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When he is finished with the bill.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yes. This book is entitled, "Public Ownership of Telephones on the Continent of Europe". It is one of the Harvard economic studies which was published in 1911. This is an objective survey of the public ownership of telegraphs and telephones in Europe. It is not written by people who are professed socialists or professed capitalists. I was amazed, on reading this book, to find out how far in advance of us in this country these European countries are in public ownership. I should like to read briefly from page 14 of this book as follows:

> The spread of the telegraph throughout Europe was rapid once the greater countries had led the way. R. van der Borght, in his treatise "Das Verkehrswesen" gives the following dates of the opening of the various state telegraph systems to the public: 1849, Prussia and Austria; 1850, Bavaria and Saxony; 1851, France, Belgium, Wurtemburg, Baden; 1852, Sardinia, Parma, Modena, Tuscany, Hanover, Holland, and Switzerland; 1853, Sweden; 1854, Denmark and several of the smaller German states; 1855, Norway, Spain and Portugal; 1856, Russia and several of the Balkan States; 1857, the Two Sicilies; and 1859, Greece. In no country were any important lines undertaken by private enterprise. The unanimity of the contemporaneous sentiment which sanctioned the public ownership of the telegraphs was reflected in the deliberations of various parliaments and congresses.

This is an indication, Mr. Speaker, of the sentiment in favour of public ownership many years ago. Yet we in this country, operating as I think one member claimed in the debate on external affairs yesterday, under a system of progressive capitalism, have made a very modest beginning in the public ownership of telephones and telegraphs. I continue the quotation briefly:

> The policy of public ownership of telephones is now established throughout the greater part of the continent of Europe.

An hon. MEMBER: When was that book published?

Mr. HERRIDGE: In 1911. It goes on:

> Only Spain and Denmark, among all the countries which originally declined to adopt that policy, still cling to the alternative of private ownership. The transition has only recently been completed in Italy and is still under way in the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden. In Germany, Switzerland, France, Belgium, Austria and Hungary, however, the governmental monopoly of the telephone business has been exclusive for more than a decade at the least, and in the first two of these countries for a whole generation. What are the results which have been accomplished by public enterprise in the telephone business?
> Writers on the subject of public and private ownership of such business undertakings as the telephone are wont to compare the magnitudes of the business in different countries under different forms of ownership, with a view to deducing from the statistics of development under each of the two forms general conclusions in regard to their respective expediency.

The argument put forward in this objective study written by a professor of Harvard university is all in favour, from practical experience in many countries, of the public ownership of telephones.

One more quotation:

> In the telephone business competition is a failure. Considered as an automatic arrangement for maintaining an accurate adjustment of the supply of telephone facilities to the demand, it easily gets out of order. So long as it remains in order its effect is to diminish the utility of the service to render which telephone facilities are created. For a while it is capable of bringing about low rates and stimulating a rapid development. Sooner or later, however, the self-interest of the competitors or the disillusionment of the public authorities will cause the termination of competition and the substitution of a regime of monopoly. This has been the result everywhere in Europe where competition has once existed, except in Stockholm, and in Stockholm the bankruptcy of the private company or the purchase of its business by the government is only a matter of time.

And so this book throughout gives definite scientific and concrete evidence in favour of the practical possibilities of the public ownership of telegraphs and telephones. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in view of the experience of other countries and in view of the nature of our development in this country, in view also of the fact that this bill would make it possible for a large monopoly to increase its capital to an exorbitant extent and would not require it to come before this parliament for many years and would, in view of the necessity that is approaching, make it very difficult and expensive to acquire control for the purpose of public ownership, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley):

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I want to make it clear that if the hon. member for Swift Current has already spoken on the motion it is not competent for him to second the amendment.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have not spoken on the Bell Telephone bill at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of Bill No. 8 to grant the power asked for by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to increase its capitalization. I believe that the flow of venture capital into private and corporate enterprises should be encouraged rather than curbed at the present time. We have an increasing population, which demands increased productive facilities; also a continuing demand for many scarce goods, and capital is now plentiful and cheap.

I believe that the Bell Telephone Company has given a great service to the people of the Dominion of Canada. One could hardly realize how we could carry on business today had it not been for the invention of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell. The Bell Telephone Company did a great job for the people of Canada during the war period. What would we have done in the way of communication had it not been for this company? In our town we have a local company that serves the local community and it is connected with the Bell Telephone Company for long distance calls. We have as fine a service as anyone could wish for.

The Bell Telephone Company is a large employer of labour and no men in any other company are used better than its employees or are more loyal. Its employees can look forward to a retirement allowance for their old age, a security that is not provided for by many companies as large as the Bell Telephone Company.

This increase of capital which the company seeks will not come out of our pockets. Anyone can buy its shares on any exchange; on the new capital issue the purchaser will be paid on his investment, and the investment will be safe. There are many people in Canada who will look forward to getting these securities.

I do not see why there is such great opposition to this bill. The company has contributed much to the economy of our country, and I will support the bill.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken half as much time on this question as either the mover of the bill or the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who took exception to private members in the opposition expressing their opinion. It is my understanding that the private members of this house have a duty to perform. I do not think that anyone should attempt to cut them off. Incidentally it is not my intention to talk out the bill; I will stop talking long enough before nine o'clock so that hon. members will have their vote; but there is something that needs to be said, namely, in spite of the attack that the hon. member for Calgary West made upon the members of this group, and the accusations which he threw around a week ago, in the course of his speech he himself admitted that he had not thoroughly read or digested the contents of this bill. I do not think any hon. member who was not conversant with a bill under discussion should attempt to lecture any other hon. members who are attempting to clarify the principle of the bill or to express an opinion on it.

Mr. BROOKS: He has read hundreds of similar bills.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He should read hundreds more; it would do him a lot of good.

In his speech the hon. member for Calgary West said something very significant. There is a definite danger in these post-war years of allowing monopolies to grow to a size where they begin to threaten the public welfare. We are not alone in this opinion. Hon. members to my right who have spoken on this bill, such as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), have expressed exactly the same opinion. I believe that this house should thoroughly and carefully look into these matters in which there seems to be an attempt by half the house to push something through which has wide ramifications. Of course those of us who are in the minority in this house cannot override the majority and will not attempt to do so. We believe in the democratic right of this parliament to take a vote on any question and we shall be content with the outcome. But there will come a time when the people of this country, who are interested in the public welfare and who are interested in seeing that the public interest is safeguarded and protected, will send a majority to this house who will effectively deal with monopolies in the future.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to ask the hon. member for Dauphin a question. Where did the hon. member for Calgary West say that he had not read the bill?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If I have to answer that question all I have to do is to refer the hon. member to the speech of the hon. member for Calgary West—

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have just read it over.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —in which he said that he himself had not thoroughly digested the contents of the bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is quite untrue.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Just a minute. If the hon. member is going to make that statement he had better quote what the hon. member for Calgary West said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Herridge) negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

The house divided on the main motion (Mr. Rinfret) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Just before the vote was taken, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) challenged a statement I made in reference to a speech of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I did not have the text of his speech before me at the moment. In fairness to the house and particularly to the hon. member for Calgary West, I think I should quote the particular sentence to which I was referring at the time. It will be found on page 3279 of Hansard of April 23:

> I have no hesitation in saying that at the moment, without knowing more than has been given to us here, it seems to me too large an increase. That is said without any complete examination of the facts.

I did not use the exact words of the hon. member because I did not have the text before me. If I paraphrased his statement incorrectly and took the wrong inference from it, of course I am sorry. There was no intention on my part to place an inaccurate construction upon his words.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wholly accept that explanation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hour reserved for private bills having more than expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

Mr. JAQUES: At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the threat to world peace by the partitioning of Palestine, and I am not by any means alone in that fear. I have in my hand a copy of the New York Herald-Tribune of yesterday's date. This is a statement by the committee for justice and peace in the Holy Land:

> An attempt is being made to stampede the United States government into action in a renewed effort to bring about the partitioning of Palestine. The claim is advanced that an overwhelming majority of Americans of all faiths, support such action. We believe that the claim does not square with the facts; and that the attempt must be resisted . . . Many millions of American citizens are unaware of the significance of this issue in terms of our basic national interest and have not expressed themselves at all. The articulate, highly organized lobbying of those who, for a variety of partisan reasons, favour the partition of Palestine—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might not have a little order in the house. There is so much noise the hon. member has no chance to speak. It seems to me a disgrace that a condition like this should obtain.

The. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to be quiet while the hon. gentleman continues his remarks.

Mr. JAQUES: This quotation goes on:

> The articulate, highly organized lobbying of those who, for a variety of partisan reasons, favour the partition of Palestine must not push us into an action that may have the most serious consequences for our national security, our foreign policy, our friendship with the near east peoples, and the cause of world peace.

The chairman of that committee is Doctor Virginia Gildersleeve; the vice-chairmen are Doctor Henry Sloane Coffin and Rabbi Morris Lazaron, and one of the directors is Kermit Roosevelt, while numerous other distinguished Americans have signed the statement.

I should now like to say just a word about an address I heard at the united nations by Sir Carl Berendsen. Speaking about the decision last fall to partition Palestine he said:

> But if there were in this room any who believed that the partition of Palestine could be accomplished peacefully and with good will on all sides and without enforcement, then I must say that that is a degree of naivete which did them little credit.

And again:

> . . . those members should, on any logical basis, equally be willing to provide their proportionate share of a United States force to implement the decision to which it pledged itself last November.
> I call upon my colleagues to take careful thought before they strike that tragic, perhaps irreparable blow to the united nations that would be involved in capitulation by the world to threats and violence.

I maintain that the decision to partition Palestine was itself reached under threat and by force. As Sir Carl Berendsen says, it would be impossible to carry out partition without the use of further force, or, in other words, without waging war.

In regard to the use of force in deciding upon partition, I have the statement by one of the delegates, Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt, who is reported in the New York Times of February 19 as having said that the United States government had used "legitimate" means to influence wavering delegates, thus forcing them to vote for partition. There was a curious statement I read, I think it was in an Ottawa newspaper, a quotation from the New York Times dated February 24, 1948. It said:

> Instead the U.N. or rather the U.S., using its enormous power, has decided to partition Palestine. In this the U.S. was powerfully aided by the Canadian delegate, about whom the following statements were made by the U.N. correspondent of the New York Times:
> "A special word should be said for Lester B. Pearson, the Canadian representative, without whose efforts it would have been impossible to imagine a decision on the Palestine question in this assembly. It was Mr. Pearson who, with untiring industry, patched up the fragile Soviet-American understanding each time the whole plan received a new blow from the British. The partition plan may turn out to be a mistake, but even a mistake is better than the deadlock which would have been inevitable had Mr. Pearson stayed in Ottawa."

I shall leave my readers to figure out that statement for themselves. I believe the Arabs have done enough. They have received into their very small country of Palestine some 600,000 Jewish refugees; and if all the other countries had done a fraction as much toward giving sanctuary to these unfortunate Jews there would certainly be no Jewish problem today. Two wrongs do not make a right. Because the Jews have been persecuted—and no one denies it—is no reason why one small country should have to bear the brunt of that wrong. May I suggest that, instead of forcing one people to bear the whole burden of this problem, the united nations should use its influence to make the world a fit place for all people, Gentile or Jew.

This partition means the use of force; there is no question about that. Those who favour it say it is impossible to carry out partition without force, or in other words, without starting another war. In fact the very threat of partition has started another war already. I believe, as a consequence of the methods it is pursuing, the united nations, instead of leading us to peace, is leading us nearer to world war. Instead of a world of nations united in the interests of peace, we have a world divided into halves, each half gathering its forces against the other.

Do we want peace or do we want war? There is only one way to peace. We must stop deciding international questions at the dictation of powerful minorities, for purposes of vote catching, or for economic advantages. We all desire prosperity. Prosperity depends upon peace, and lasting peace can be secured only by impartial application of the principles of justice to the settlement of national and international affairs.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, unlike a good many of those who have taken part in this debate, I have not had the advantage of attending any international meetings. But after all it is the day of the common man; the common man must have his hearing, and I will speak for him tonight as well as I can.

It seems to me a good thing to have this debate. There was a time when we appeared to consider it necessary to play the ostrich and debates on foreign affairs were taboo in this house, though in saying that I am not blaming any one party. As a result of ignoring this all-important question, we came to the second war, I suppose almost worse prepared for than the first one, if that were possible. Some of us will remember that in 1914 we could hardly make ourselves believe that, after the many alarms which proved to be false, war had really come.

Well, at any rate here we are having this debate. Yesterday afternoon I had a curious feeling about it. I noticed that even on the opposite side of the house, when one would have expected that even courtesy would have kept the members in their seats to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) expounding the important matters which he did expound, the benches gradually emptied. It gave me a curious feeling about the whole thing.

None of us can doubt that when we talk about external affairs in these days we are, in very truth—in literal, actual truth—talking about matters of life and death. If anyone has any doubt about that, I would read to him a brief quotation from Walter Lippmann, as it appeared in this morning's paper:

> But if we ask ourselves why we have been discussing extra military measures since the middle of March, the answer must surely be that in the judgment of the administration there has been a change in the international situation since the events of Czechoslovakia, Finland, Berlin and Vienna. This was also the judgment of the western powers in Europe, otherwise they would not so hastily have signed the Brussels alliance. . . .
> If all the governments of western Europe, of our own, have not been having an unnecessary fit of nerves, this is in truth a critical period. What will count is the military power which can be mobilized at once and deployed at once so that there may be a force in being. Our paramount need then is not "preparedness" for a theoretical M-day, but a mobilization of what we have and can quickly produce.

I shall have more to say about that later. I repeat that I had a curious feeling about our debate yesterday. I had the feeling that if there were any communist present—and there may well have been a communist present—he would have had rather a sense of exultation in his mind. I had the feeling he might have said to himself, "Look, these people are not really serious yet. They do not know yet the kind of world they are living in." I had a kind of feeling that he might have said, "Do they not realize that the Russia of today is not merely the imperialist Russia of a century ago?" And of course we remember that a century ago Russia was supposed to be the great enemy, because of her imperialist ambitions. I can imagine his saying, "In addition to the imperialist ambitions of Russia of a century ago you have today all the new impulses"—with which we have grown so familiar, and which I need not take time to detail now.

I do not know what the equivalent of this debate would be in communist countries. Of course they could not meet and discuss things as we do. I presume, however, that they do meet and talk together. I presume there would be more intensity in connection with it—not like the lackadaisical, free and easy attitude which we have. I cannot make out whether our careless attitude is due to the fact that we are underestimating the problem or overestimating it. I suppose there are some people who do not take the time to think just how serious the problem is, and there may be others who feel that conditions are so serious that we cannot do anything about them—"What's the use?"

At any rate, it seems to me that this House of Commons is not setting a very good example, and that what is needed is that in some way or another we must make people throughout the country feel that they are facing new grave problems, and that it will need all the capacity and character that we have to deal with those problems.

In one very small way I disagreed with the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) who spoke yesterday, and who used language to the effect that the communists lacked a spiritual basis. I know the way in which he meant it, and giving it that meaning I can agree with him fully. Nevertheless, there is a kind of equivalent, there is a something—you can call it madness or demonology, or anything you like—which, with them, takes the place of faith.

Someone has analysed communism and has stated that it derives from three things—pity, hatred and love of power. We are very familiar with the hatred and love of power. We think of those two poisoned springs from which these horrible emanations come. But we should recall, too, that there is a third source, sometimes quite genuine—and I think a good many well-meaning people are sometimes misled by that.

Whatever the reason may be, I believe there is faith there, or its equivalent, which will not be answered merely by doing things better in a material way, but will need some answering faith as well.

What is our answering faith? We will say that it is the Christian ethic of those who are fortunate enough or wise enough, or whatever it may be, to be practical Christians. And for the rest of us who might not be in that category there is the Christian ethic and the belief in justice, including social justice. But whatever it may be, it seems to me that we should never overlook the fact that there is a moral equivalent and a moral answer which must be found, just as much as a material answer.

Again I should like to quote briefly from Lippmann, again quoting from the Montreal Gazette of April 26—and I think this applies very well to the situation to which we find ourselves today:

> Free and civilized men cannot quiver and quake forever about communism or spend their days doing nothing better than to listen to rumours about what the politburo and the cominform are up to next, or degrade themselves in witch-hunting and a morbid concern with the demonology of Moscow.
> Nor can they live forever and exclusively on the calculations of dollar deficits and predictions about long-range bombers and atomic bombs, and resounding declarations about how much better liberty is than tyranny. They need also great constructive ideas and projects which enlist their energies and give meaning to their lives.

I think we will all agree with that. I said a moment ago that we needed faith but, as the apostle reminds us, faith without works is dead. Faith is not enough. I have to ask, in Lippmann's words, what are the "great constructive ideas which enlist our energies and which give meaning to our lives."

And that brings me to the minister's speech. I was unfortunate enough not to have heard the last part of it. The first part I did hear and the descriptive portion of it I thought was excellent. It gave us a picture of Europe, and his comments with respect to communism were admirable; his explanation to us that we could no longer hope for co-operation, and that the most we could hope for was tolerance—all that I listened to, agreed with and admired.

Nevertheless there was something in the speech that I missed. It came to me that there was something lacking. I sympathized with what I felt was the minister's tone, a sense of sadness, a sense of regret, that somehow or another we had drifted into this appalling situation, but also the feeling that there was not much that could be done about it.

I missed in his speech any sense of urgency. I was thinking of a young student I heard about the other day who remarked how difficult it was for young people to settle down to the problem of beginning their lives because they thought there was going to be war again, and that most of them would be dead anyway in a few years.

It was a sad thing to hear said. As I listened to the minister I wondered what we were really doing, what we were really going to do. His speech was correct though; I could not criticize it from that point of view. The minister said we were ready to co-operate and that we were co-operating. But it did not seem to me to lead anywhere. I did not find any glimpse of a plan. I felt somehow that in spite of ourselves we were drifting, just rolling along. I felt no sense of direction in it, at all, no urgency no instancy. And yet, surely when we look at the world there is plenty of call for action.

When we stop to take stock of the situation, as we find it today, what do we find? Well as the hon. member for Stanstead reminded us yesterday, we find the astonishing prediction of a century ago made by de Tocqueville, quoted the other day by General de Gaulle,—of Russia and the United States practically absorbing the world. We find that now coming true, with these two great nations confronting each other. Where does that lead us? Does that lead us anywhere? Does anyone believe that that leads anywhere but one place? It leads finally to war and to destruction, just as when the world was divided between Caesar and Antony, it led to war. Yesterday the minister said that all we could hope for was toleration, but can we hope for even that? So one inevitably asks himself whether there is any way out. Is there anything that can be done? Is there any other way? Surely the answer is that there is another way.

There is another way which is to create a third strong unit of power in the world. Surely as we go on now we have to choose between two immense aggregations of power who are shouldering each other like two little boys and who may finally break into a fight. That is the danger. What we need has been pointed out by many. What we need is a great trinity of power which would be quite consistent with the united nations charter. It would be quite consistent with that, and again I wish to read from Lippmann. I am going to read at some length because it seems to me that Lippmann, with his knowledge extending over thirty years, with his great capacity, with his imagination, gives in these few paragraphs, which I want to read, a picture of the universe in which we find ourselves. He gives us a working plan which gives some meaning to what we are trying to do. He says:

> In the weeks and months to come we shall find, I venture to think, that we must reconsider and revise not only our strategical doctrine and policy, not only our conception of the western hemisphere, but also our relations with the British commonwealth and empire.

And again:

> The role of Great Britain in this immense evolution is crucial and extraordinarily difficult. For, as an English friend of mine, who has had much to do with working out the E.R.P., puts it, the "dilemma" of Great Britain is that "she cannot afford to go into a federation of western Europe if that involves breaking up the British commonwealth; she cannot afford not to cooperate militarily, financially, politically, economically with France, Benelux, and western Europe."

And again he says:

> But the British dilemma is also an American dilemma. For if Britain's entrance into a European federation means the breaking up of the British commonwealth and empire, what is to become of the non-European parts of the commonwealth and empire? There are some who think they could become parts of an American commonwealth and empire. But this would be a dangerous, perhaps even a disastrous and tragic, outcome.

And again:

> The British dilemma and the American dilemma can be resolved only by the construction of a large political community which includes the British commonwealth, the inter-American system and a European federation with its African dependencies and colonies.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

> In this larger community it would be unnecessary for the British to choose between Europe and the commonwealth. In this community Great Britain and France could at long last become united in peace, not merely allied in war. In this community alone is there hope of solving the German problem, which is becoming progressively more snarled up.
> In this community the United States would be insured against the necessity or the temptation to create an American empire on the ruins of the British empire. In this community the western hemispheres would no longer be confronted with the insoluble and disruptive problems so sharply posed at Bogota.

I have read from that quotation at length, because it seems to me to give an intelligible picture of what otherwise I confess is unintelligible. It is the only intelligible picture that I have seen and if there is a more intelligible one I should like to see it. It certainly has not been given in this house. There is a breadth of grasp there; there is a real capacity for taking stock of the whole broad situation.

This makes clear two things. It makes clear that in his conception—after all, where is there a man with greater experience and authority than his?—a strong British commonwealth is absolutely essential if we are to have peace. This comes back to us; we might as well face the fact that there can be no strong British commonwealth without Canada playing a big part in it. It perhaps was not so much our merit as the facts of geography which enabled us to prevent the last war from being lost. Does anyone doubt that it would have been lost in 1940 if we had not been here to act as a bridgehead for supplies that were flowing from the United States, quite apart from the other things that we were doing? As the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) pointed out yesterday as reported on page 3453 of Hansard:

> We are the only direct line of communication that exists between the new world and the old.

And again:

> We are the sole direct channel of relationship between the old world and the new. It is out of that east and west relationship . . . it is out of that relationship that Canada came into existence.

Another thing that is worthy of mention is that the north Atlantic trade routes have always been the economic lifeblood of this country. It was the preservation of the north Atlantic trade routes that brought us into the first war, quite apart from other reasons. It was that fact which brought us into the second war and it also had much to do with bringing in the United States.

So I say that we have a great part to play and the question is: Can we do it? I think the omens are good. We can say that colonialism in this country is as dead as Queen Anne. It is sometimes talked about in this house. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) talks about it sometimes, but I think he is just pulling our leg. I think he is just having some fun as he often does in his speeches, very delightful as they are.

Colonialism is dead. Our constitutional questions are settled. Old difficulties are gone. Furthermore, there is a new basis of unity. I ran across that in a curious way last autumn. Through the courtesy of one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I met a French Canadian lady and I was trying to tell her that the Progressive Conservative party was the good friend of the province of Quebec. I doubt if I was making as much progress in that line as I should have liked to make, but at any rate she said something to me which I have always remembered, and which I think was profound. She said, "You know I think our old differences are going to melt away because we have a common danger, the danger of communism." I know she meant that. I think that is very true. It may help to solve a lot of our problems. I am not, however, suggesting that they are all gone because I know they are not.

(Translation):

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to engage in a slight digression. I realize that, from time to time, certain people express a point of view that I regret enormously. It has been expressed with moderation, with courtesy, but nevertheless very forcefully by the hon. member for St.Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel).

On March 2, at page 1813 of Hansard, speaking of Canadians of English descent, he said:

> Canada is but a secondary nation bound to sacrifice its interests on the high altar of the British commonwealth of nations. Canadians of French descent feel, however, that their first loyalty belongs to Canada and cannot resign themselves to seeing their country become the cat's-paw of the British commonwealth of nations.

I ask the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche, nay I beg him to forget that idea. I believe one would find only a handful of people throughout Canada who would entertain such feelings. The great majority of English-speaking Canadians are wholly Canadian. As for me, I was born in Canada, my parents were born in Canada and I do not know of any relatives in Great Britain.

My traditions, my sentiments, my ideals are wholly Canadian. The same could be said of all English-speaking Canadians, with very few exceptions.

I hope, with all my heart, that these words will be accepted. I speak in all sincerity.

There is one thing I wish to add now. The formidable danger of communism urges us, forces us to lay aside our differences and to promote a new feeling of mutual confidence which will enable us to remain firm in the face of the many and serious dangers with which we are threatened.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In case, Mr. Speaker, you did not understand my very indifferent French, I might just add that what I have been saying is this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It was very good.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have been referring to a speech made by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel), in which he said that he believed or feared that many Canadians of English origin put the interests of Britain before the interests of Canada, and I begged him to believe that in my opinion there is not a handful of English-speaking Canadians who feel that way. I pointed out that most of them are like myself, born in this country and my parents before me; I have not a single relative I have ever known of in Great Britain. My hopes and aims and ambitions are all Canadian, and I feel that we ought to be able to set at rest such an idea once and for all. If we are able to do that; if we are able in the face of danger to abandon prejudices, I hope it will not be considered blasphemy if I undertake to alter one of the immortal lines of Shakespeare:

> Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, unity.

I substitute "unity" for "safety". If I may say so, perhaps some good may come out of all this evil and we may find a unity in this country we have not had before.

I believe it would not be difficult for the people of this country to recognize the fact in this dangerous world in which we live that there is a part to be played by us in peacetime as there has been in wartime. After all, it ought to be a simple problem. It does not make sense to say that an association of free nations can function together only in wartime and not in peacetime, and that is the whole problem. Can they not work together to prevent war in the same way as they worked together to wage war?

If I have taken the minister's speech correctly his mind does not go along this line.

He seems to accept, regretfully it is true, this division of the world between these two great powers. I found nothing in his speech to suggest that there was anything vital and effective that can be done to counter this. Yet to me that seems a counsel of despair, because along that line it seems to me that what I have read to him from Lippmann shows the way we would go. If we allow the world to be divided in two we have all history to show us what will happen. We have a bleak and sombre prospect.

The second thing to remember, whether we like it or not, is that we are the keystone of the arch. We are now the second partner in this association of free nations. If we believe that; if we accept that; if we get rid of the colonial idea, there is nothing in the way to the fullest co-operation. We are the second partner now, and who knows how soon the day may come when we shall be the first partner?

If anyone asks me what the exact steps are that I think should be taken or what is now being omitted, apart from our preparations in defence, which I shall touch on in a moment; if anyone asks me what omission or failure I think there is now, my answer would be this. If the government give a clear lead, if it is clear that they believe that this third aggregation of power is necessary to the welfare of the world, if they are ready to do their part and they allow the people of Canada to understand this, I have no fear but that their technical advisers, military and otherwise, will be able to tell them the steps which should be taken. It is the will we need; it is the clear lead we miss. The New Testament tells us what happens when the trumpet gives an uncertain sound.

Judged by one standard, I would say that the result at the present time is very unsatisfactory. We have been told that our defence preparations were—I think these were the words used by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) "better than other people". Well, that may be so, but that does not interest me much because I do not know how bad other people's are. We can judge that our own are very bad from the figures given not later than March 10. I shall not go into them in detail. One is bad enough. The authorized strength of the auxiliary air force is 4,500 and the actual strength is 692. I read from a letter written by a man who can be taken as one of the best authorities in this country; you will have to take my word for it. He says:

> I think the figures I gave you regarding the strength of the auxiliary Royal Canadian Air Force are appalling. The actual strength is only 692. Many of these are of an age which is fast passing that at which they would be of primary use in the service for operation purposes. Coupled with this we should remember that the government has discontinued the grant to flying clubs . . .

And so on. That situation is, I think, lamentable, and judged by that, I would say there is no evidence on our part that we are prepared to recognize the responsibility which goes with the position which we hold.

History affords many spectacles and many instances of nations which drifted into war because there was not enough imagination, not enough courage, not enough willingness to call on the people in time. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) this afternoon quoted again the words of Mr. Lloyd George with which we were all so familiar in the first world war, "Too little and too late." I echo his words and express the hope that we in Canada in the year 1948 shall not have to write those words against our efforts.

(Translation):

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) for his tribute to the beautiful French language in the course of his interesting speech. He need not feel any qualms about speaking French in this house. He knows it very well indeed, and I am sure that every time he speaks it, he pleases, not only those members of French descent, but each and every member of the house.

(Text):

In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I would not be frank if I did not say that I feel somewhat apprehensive after the speeches delivered in this house in such an important debate as this on external affairs. I realize that it is dangerous for a layman to take part in the debate; it is difficult in fact to speak to the house and to avoid anachronisms, to look at the accuracy of the information we get and be objective enough, that those who are listening and those who will read our speeches will not think the idea sponsored by any speaker is preconceived on any subject presented in the course of his remarks. In speaking on external affairs, one finds it is very difficult to avoid friction. To us, the nations with which our country has to deal sometimes use words which have not the same meaning to them as they have to ourselves, and in speaking on such an important debate we must have in our mind a strong desire to help our country and may I say to give advice and help to friendly countries or to the world at large.

To sum up what I have said since I began my speech, I think we should say that speeches delivered on international affairs must be constructive. It is difficult to be really constructive when, as I do, one speaks far from being a specialist but having in mind what I said a moment ago, a strong desire to help one's country and the countries which give us their friendship.

There are rules between nations; there are understandings. If one looks at the Atlantic charter he will see that on January 1, 1942, twenty-six nations signed what has been called the "Declarations by United Nations". On page 3 of these declarations I read:

> Each government pledges itself to employ its full resources, military or economic, against those members of the tripartite pact and its adherents with which such government is at war.

Maxim Litvinoff signed on behalf of the U.S.S.R.

On page 8 we find the following:

> Germany, Italy and Japan affirm that the aforesaid terms do not in any way affect the political status which exists at present as between each of the three contracting parties and Soviet Russia.

Two years before the signing of the charter of the united nations the tripartite pact was ready to accept Soviet Russia, and two years after, Mr. Litvinoff signed the charter of the united nations. Therefore he was engaged with two different bodies, with two different unions of nations whose interests were absolutely opposed and who were at war against each other. This proves, Mr. Speaker, that when the United States delivered to the world those secret documents pertaining to a Soviet and German secret pact they were accurate in saying that there was a secret pact, and the last line was signed in Moscow on August 23, 1939, by both ambassadors Molotov and von Ribbentrop. The last line reads as follows:

> This protocol will be treated by both parties as strictly confidential.

I said at the beginning there were rules, there were promises, there were pacts between nations, but those pacts and promises are not always, and very often not, honoured by the signatories. International laws are sometimes and very often against the personal interests of every nation. It is very hard to avoid friction with nations using the same words as we use but giving an altogether different interpretation or an altogether different meaning to them. Let us look at what the word "democracy" means in different countries. In the United States they have freedom for anything, but that freedom for anything results in what is called the melting-pot. In Canada we have as a democracy the unity of races. We have unity, liberty and security which are the three main lighthouses of the Liberal policy; but those races are retaining their character as in Switzerland, and still we have a real democracy. In the United Kingdom they have freedom for everything; they have Trafalgar square and the Albert hall; these three freedoms are tempered by respectfulness and devotion to the crown, and let us hope that it will last.

In Germany, as Ludwig expressed it, you have an everlasting pyramid in all brackets of life, without which the German cannot understand life. In Russia you have the one party poll and freedom to preach communism everywhere in the world. To sum that up, hon. members can read Marx's manifesto. At page 23 he gives a definition of Marxism or communism as the abolition of private property; that is, what they call democracy in this country. Canada must deal with all these countries.

I do not share the opinion of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who said that he felt somewhat sad on hearing the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). I did not feel sad at all; I listened carefully and read the speech over, and I think the words uttered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs are extremely consoling to the Canadian people. He gave advice and he asked for perfect understanding on the part of the Canadian people. At page 3438 of Hansard of yesterday, he is reported as follows:

> I hope that in our foreign relations we can reconcile our first duty to our own people with our ultimate obligations to the international community. In a frightened and suspicious world this is not always easy.

No, Mr. Speaker, it is not always easy; but let us hope that everyone will understand the appeal made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada. A little farther on, at page 3439, he is reported as saying:

> There is in all this a chain of vicious consequences, and these vicious consequences are exploited by Soviet-inspired communist parties for purposes which have unfortunately become all too familiar. Distress, starvation, even despair, are stirred by the communists into political disorder and ideology strife.

Whether we are federal representatives or provincial representatives, it is true that we need to be careful when we are dealing with something that can approach any angle of international affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, as reported on the same page of Hansard, also said:

> The ranks of democratic peoples must not be divided. Their energies must not be dissipated in domestic political conflict.

That brings me to the point where I wish to quote one of the best writers I know of on international affairs, Father Ledit, a Jesuit from Montreal. He was speaking on the famous question of the Polish art treasures, about which we have heard so much. I shall have to quote Father Ledit in French. In "Relations of 1948", he says this:

(Translation):

For some time now, a storm that defies all understanding has been let loose against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Yet, if any force keeps the communists in check and is, for that reason, relentlessly hated by all international saboteurs, it is surely the famous R.C.M.P. To disparage this force is to play into the hands of international communists.

He goes on:

Party differences between supporters of the liberal faction and national union group have become inconceivably violent. Members of the blue fraternity find it very difficult to respect their Liberal opponents, even though one of them be vice-premier in the dominion field of politics; it also goes against the grain for a Liberal to respect a Conservative even though he be a provincial premier. As for those who belong neither to the one group nor to the other, they are beginning to go round in circles! Such differences can only delight international communists. In the midst of the worst crisis history has ever known, may we respectfully remind the parties concerned that the eyes of the world are upon them?

The respect owed by all citizens to those in authority, as prescribed by the Fourth Commandment, matters more than any party victory, whatever side wins.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these words of Father Ledit should be heard in high circles in my province and that when the attitude of our outstanding dominion police force is discussed, people should express themselves in respectful terms and should take particular care not to undermine, by unfortunate remarks, the confidence the public has placed in this splendid police force which, at present, plays such an important part in our struggle against the enemy from within as well as from without.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I said a few minutes ago that the same words did not mean the same thing on our lips and on the lips of some big shots in the international world. As hon. members will recall, when Mr. Stalin gave an interview to Mr. Stassen, a prominent republican in the United States, Mr. Stassen received the following reply when he asked Mr. Stalin if he had ever said that Russia or the communist party could not co-operate with the capitalist system. As reported in all the newspapers of Canada at the time, and in the world reports, Stalin said this:

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

There was not a single party congress or plenary session of the central committee of the communist party at which I said or could have said that co-operation between the two systems was impossible.

The New York Times quoted Pravda in 1938 as having published a letter written by Stalin and addressed to a young party propagandist by the name of Ivanov, in which he quotes Lenin as follows:

The prolonged existence of the Soviet republic side by side with the imperialist states is unthinkable. Finally either the one or the other will be victorious. Until this happens a series of terrible conflicts between the Soviet republic and the bourgeois states is unavoidable.

One interview and one letter, but there is quite a different meaning in the words used or written by Mr. Stalin. Of course he did not say he had written such words. He said, "I did not say anything of the kind," but he never denied that he had written them.

The Soviet union signed the Atlantic charter in 1941 and agreed to the declaration made by Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill. The third paragraph on page 5 of that charter reads:

They respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them;

I hope they did not mean they were free to use inside force against Hungary and Czechoslovakia. They also agreed to this article:

They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

Some speakers have referred to the Yalta, Potsdam, Teheran and Moscow conferences. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that Russia took the eastern part of Poland. Now they would like to keep the part west of the Curzon line which formerly belonged to Germany and which before the war, in the words of Mr. Marshall, provided more than one-fifth of the foodstuffs on which the German population depended. So the allies are caught between two fires. I need not deal at length with these conferences, but let me quote Mr. Bevin:

I was unable at Moscow to accept the argument that the discussions on reparations at Yalta represented a decision binding us to agree to make reparations from current production.

There we have two meanings from the lips of three different men. We have heard many times about Spain. We have the declaration of Winston Churchill and General Eisenhower in favour of Spain; and the other day I was sorry to read in the periodical World Report and in the newspapers that Spain would not participate in ERP. I am not a fascist; I am not a nazi, but I believe that neither Britain nor the United States properly visualizes the importance of Spain in relation to the British empire. I am not an imperialist, though imperialism is born in every man, since imperialism is simply the desire to acquire more strength, more power. Every man wants to be more powerful; and when you take men together as nations, then the nations, which are led by human beings, also want to acquire more power. But at this very moment, as hon. members have said this afternoon and tonight, two imperialisms are facing each other, those of Russia and the United States.

Let us not forget that there was and still is another imperialism which, though not as strong since the war as the two others, if it should disappear would cause terrible turmoil in international affairs throughout the world. It is the British commonwealth of nations. I believe Spain holds a strategic position in the world, and especially with respect to the western democracies, as it always has in the past. That is easy to understand when one looks at the position of Spain. As early as 1915 the communists were working in Morocco, as they were working in Spain. Spain is at the head of mare nostrum, the name Mussolini used to give the Mediterranean. Spain holds important lines from the Balearic islands to Marseilles and Toulon, and from Marseilles to the eastern oilfields, the Suez canal and the Persian gulf.

To show what would happen if Spain were to fall into the hands of the communist imperialism, in order to reach the Persian gulf or India commerce from Britain would have to go around the cape at the south end of Africa. The route from London to the Persian gulf by South Africa is eighty per cent longer; to the west coast of India it is seventy-seven per cent longer; to Singapore it is forty-four per cent longer; to Hong Kong it is thirty-seven per cent longer, and to Australia, ten per cent longer. Anyone who has followed the various meetings of the communist party or the cominform or the communist party of Yugoslavia must have read the speeches delivered by Mr. Tito in which he said: "We have to face the mother of all the capitalist countries, which is Great Britain." That speech was delivered at a Yugoslav communist assembly after the decision was reached to keep Trieste an international zone.

Well, if Britain does not understand its position better than that; if the United States does not understand the position of the western democracies better than that, we shall have to give the Russians all they ask for.

Fortunately I believe our delegates at the united nations took a very good stand. I am proud to refer to what appears in the second report of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations which met in New York from October 23 to December 15, 1946. We find this at page 54—and this is the attitude taken by the Canadian delegation:

> We abhor the record and present policies of the Franco dictatorship.

This was when the U.S.S.R. and a few other members were asking to sever diplomatic relations with Spain, and many other things, just to brand Spain as an enemy nation at that time. I follow with more of the quotation:

> We earnestly hope that the Spanish people may be able to rid themselves of Franco by peaceful means and establish a democratic, responsible and enlightened administration.
> We are not prepared to support at this time outside intervention in Spain which might impede European recovery. . . .

And it concludes in this way:

> We want the Spanish people to enjoy the blessings of freedom—freedom from dictatorships whatever their form, by whatever name they may be called.

We should face the situation as it is because, as Father Ledit stated, they are trying to undermine from both ends, from the south pole and the north pole and from the middle, from the east and from the west, the strength of the British commonwealth of nations. And it will be very bad indeed if we leave the United States alone to face communist imperialism.

That is what I said when I spoke with respect to the British loan and, if my memory serves me correctly, that is what Senator Vandenberg said when he asked the senate to adopt the $3 billion loan to England from the United States.

I was surprised the other day when I saw he was forgetting that Spain was holding a very strategic point, and that the United States and England should have permitted Spain to participate in the economic recovery program, due to her strategic position at the head of mare nostrum, as I call it, and to protect the interest of the western democracies from the east.

I see the hon. member from Muskoka-Ontario listening carefully, and I thank him for it, because a plan was going on long before communism was in power in Russia; that is, the policy of pan-Slavism. It has been building since the congress held in Prague in the early part of the 19th century. This was the pan-Slavism of Pierre le Grand himself, who said that Russia should be going to the east as far as India. And this was taken up afterwards by Lenin who said, "Don't worry; we are going to take the east, to keep the east; and afterwards we will deal very easily with the west."

Suppose Gibraltar were lost and the position of Spain were lost at the head of that sea. Suppose for one moment that we had lost the Italian election. Within six months we would have been at war, because there would have been pan-Slavism to take Greece and Turkey, and within one year all the middle east would have been in the hands of Soviet Russia, in the hands of communism.

When I say that, I say they are undermining the British commonwealth of nations from both ends. This is the resumé I have taken from Father Ledit's story of February 9 of this year:

Feb. 10—Chili, by President Gonzales, takes possession of Graham Land in antarctic regions to south pole.

Feb. 12—Argentine sends destroyers and planes to Falkland and Maritime islands, east of Argentine. Great Britain pretends to own them since 1833.

Feb. 27—Guatemala protests against presence of British ships in waters of British Honduras and by its papers intimates that Guatemala should occupy that country (Honduras). Mexico supports this move but asks for its share of the dominion.

March 4—Salvador, Haiti, Honduras get together in support of Guatemala. Chili and Argentine sign a solidarity pact on Falkland islands.

This is undermining somewhat the feeble powers left to England or to the United Kingdom toward the south pole.

What is happening in connection with Spitzbergen? I read a speech by Ernest Dufour when he spoke to the members of the Rotary club of Hull a few days ago. He intimated in his speech that Russia had many friends in the united nations. Quoting the New York Times of January 11, 1947, he pointed out that Mr. Sulzberger, the correspondent of that paper, had said:

According to responsible diplomatic sources, the Norwegian government proposed to the Soviet union on April 9, 1945, the joint defence of Spitzbergen. The offer is said to have been made while Trygve Lie was Foreign Minister of Norway.

Then, in the Toronto Star of June 10, 1947, we find the following by Ross Munro:

The Spitzbergen question, involving Russia's desire to establish a military base on the mountainous archipelago 650 miles from the north pole is the number one international headache for Norway, which has sovereignty over the islands.

It was in 1945, and while Trygve Lie was Minister for Norway, that they were ready to give to Russia the same participation in Spitzbergen as they had themselves. There was a treaty, I believe, signed by Canada. Canada was interested in it, states Ross Munro, not only because the island was on the direct air route between the main cities of northern Russia, Canada and the United States, but also because she signed a treaty in 1920 which gave Norway sovereignty over the archipelago never to be used for military purposes.

They are undermining the British commonwealth of nations from both ends. I do not wish to create friction against any country, but now that we know that there is an undermining of the strength of the third imperialism, we have to stand on our own feet with United States imperialism and we should build a triangle composed of Greenland, Iceland and Newfoundland in which to erect naval and air bases to protect the Arctic area against invasion should we lose Europe to communism. This is in support of what I said last year. I did not want to refer to a previous debate, but hon. members will remember that Bill 238 granted certain privileges to the United States army on Canadian territory. I remember my hon. friends over there were against it because they contended that we were granting privileges to United States soldiers. I said, as reported on page 3926 of Hansard:

As I understand the bill, we are trying to be co-defendants after having been co-belligerents. When you hear a member from Quebec speaking in favour of an accord with the United States, or in favour of privileges to be given the United States army, it is not because we in Quebec want to turn our eyes away from the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations and turn them toward the United States of America for good, leaving the former alone. It is just because we have the experience of the last war, because we want those two organizations, those two nations or groups of nations, to stand firmly on their feet right in front of the menace from without and from within.

I took the same stand in making my point tonight in favour of Spain. I want these two groups of nations to stand firmly on their feet and face the real menace which at last everyone seems to understand. I was somewhat apprehensive when I got up to speak tonight; but I became quite satisfied during this debate when I saw that at last everyone in this house, and perhaps everyone in the western democracies, realize the peril which we have been pointing out for ten years and which will always be here. I am glad that at last everyone seems to realize it and seems to want to stay awake to fight this peril. We are beginning to know what we are up against, that we must fight for the rights that they would deprive us of.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) say last night that he was not surprised to see that the U.S.S.R. had agreed to the united nations holding its sittings at Lake Success in the United States. They will always take every opportunity. As I stated a moment ago, they have friends there and everywhere. They are surrounding us; and I hope we will stay wide awake, that we will use every means in our power to defeat them, to keep them weak if possible and to make our own institutions strong. As the minister of external affairs stated, we should forget once in a while our own little political troubles and think of the international troubles; we should try to accord our internal policies with international policies.

It will not be easy, but we must realize that the force which is trying to put us down is international and we cannot avoid it. We are all Christians. Let us live our Christian lives thoroughly and carry out Christian principles in the international field. We do not need to worry, because victory is ahead; it is just up to us to take it.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this debate on foreign relations has been very sane and on a good basis and I hope it remains that way. Foreign relations now dominate the thinking and actions of all domestic political forces more than ever before. The same may be said about foreign relations dominating the thinking and actions of domestic economic forces whether they like it or not. I should like to give an example of this by quoting from page 2418 of Hansard of March 19, 1948. At that time the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) asked the following question, which was answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe):

> I want to ask the minister one simple question. I am much impressed, as I hear him talk, as to the position of the milling and other industries. He says that the government will do this and the government will do that, and that as long as these people will do what they are told, they will be well off. Perhaps they will. Would I be wrong in calling this a highly socialistic measure?
> Mr. Howe: State marketing is socialism, yes, if you like. But it is hard to be different in a world that at the moment is following state marketing for reasons which I think are largely beyond their control. There are currency problems, credit problems and a number of factors, which are driving countries to state marketing at the present time.

I should like to point out that the basis of our economy in the final analysis reflects itself in definite political form at home and affects our outlook abroad. For example, if this country were sold on state marketing within as well as state marketing without we would be expressing ourselves in a form of barter arrangements externally rather than following such international legislation as the Geneva trade pacts, which agreements are attempting to reimpose international laissez faire.

With a changing world facing us, our problem at home is to maintain democracy and extend it in the face of that change. There are two extremes fighting for control in the world at the present time over this ever-increasing state apparatus. Whether one considers himself a Liberal or a Conservative, it must be recognized that the state is playing an ever-increasing role in the economic life of the country. Fascism and communism are the two extremes. The best recent example of fascism in the world today is the growth of de Gaullism in France, which of course is being opposed by communism under Thorez. Both are driving each other to further excesses. They are both fighting on the decrepit and tattered remains of laissez faire.

If this statement does not meet with your approval, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote an extremely respectable source, Don Cameron in the Windsor Star. He is the columnist who perhaps has led the field in the anti-communist drive in Canada. In the Windsor Star of March 20, under "Answer No. 6", he writes:

> There is no cure for communism because communism is not a disease, it is a symptom. It is the expression of the vast unrest that permeates all the people of the world, not excepting our own, as the result of the moral, spiritual and economic breakdowns of "bourgeois capitalism."

It has been lucky for capitalism that there has been a corresponding moral breakdown in the communist party, if one deals with the communist party as a political expression of the working class.

I should like to bring to mind Lenin's slogan at the time of the Russian revolution, "No annexations and no reparations". Russia today is leading the field in annexations and reparations. One thing that can be said about the old socialist philosophy is that it never believed in blaming the workers of any country for the war. They blamed the masters. But an entirely different attitude is taken by Russia at the present time.

I should like to quote, and add to in support of my argument, from "Left-Wing Communism —an Infantile Disorder", by V. I. Lenin:

> If the Hendersons and the Snowdens reject the bloc with the communists, the communists will gain immediately in regard to winning the sympathy of the masses and in discrediting the Hendersons and Snowdens, and if, as a result, we do lose a few parliamentary seats it is not a matter of importance. We would put up candidates in a very few, but absolutely safe constituencies, i.e., where our candidate would not let the Liberal in, in opposition to the labour candidate.

That is altogether different from the attitude expressed by the communist party in the last federal election where, as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) knows, they had an alliance with the Liberal party. But now they are zigging instead of zagging. They say they are going to have a united front with the C.C.F. But watch what happens in the next federal general election. They will support us where it will embarrass us, and oppose us where it will ruin the election of a C.C.F. candidate. Watch British Columbia—I state that again for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver North who was just ready with an interjection.

Another thing I should like to bring out in support of my argument is this. The old labour martyrs were always sentenced on the charge of sedition, and a highly respectable Liberal was charged with sedition, in fact, one of the forefathers of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and it was accepted as an honourable charge. But no socialist worthy of the name would ever have the charge of espionage pinned on him. That is a stool pigeon, whether for Uncle Joe or the Liberal party. When the socialist party of Canada voted on whether to enter the third international at the end of the first great war, their position was roughly this. They refused to sacrifice their principles on the altar of Russian nationalism. The communist party has become a nationalist movement and has ceased to be interested in the working class, as such, of any other country. The workers of all other countries are exploited for Russia's national benefit, to the detriment of the workers of the world. This is now becoming apparent to the western worker especially. The last great general strike in France led by the communists was broken by the working class of France itself. They broke the picket lines because they refused to become a weapon in the struggle of power politics.

The same thing is happening in Canada. In the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' Union the fight is coming to a head at the present time. It has been going on for years. I was in that fight and got badly defeated in the old boilermakers' union. The same is true of the United States, where the workers are becoming wise to the fact that they have to find their own political expressions to meet their own needs in accordance with their own historical background.

Again I come back to the statement of Don Cameron, wherein he points out that there is no cure for communism because of the degeneration of bourgeois capitalism.

I now have another quotation. I will read it first and give the source afterwards. I quote it just to point up this problem:

> But above and beyond all that, the material resources of a country exist within the confines of the country and it is only by the implied or expressed permission of the state that the institution of private property can exist. The justification of private property lies in the fact that it has been thought that because of what private property ensures of initiative, self-reliance and the like, the good of the greatest number will thereby best be served. But if as a result of the institution of private property, whether it be the ownership of land or of capital, a social condition may develop which is inimical to the community as a whole, that institution has either to be modified in some particulars, controlled in some directions, or make way for some other system.

That statement was made by the Prime Minister, as recorded in Hansard of March 3, 1943. Let us not talk about socializing the land after that; it is all in there.

The minister of external affairs yesterday made this statement, as reported at page 3439 of Hansard:

> It is not enough, however, to blame the troubles of Europe—or of the rest of the world—on the destruction of war and on the subversive activity of communism. The free governments are themselves at fault if they are hesitant to take the necessary social and political measures, or to show the energy, determination and solidarity required to make democracy into an efficient instrument for recovery and a dynamic political gospel.

The first statement I quoted was made by the Prime Minister in 1943, and the latter was made in 1948 by the minister of foreign affairs. Five years have elapsed between these statements, and yet we are living, if we can believe the press, under a threat of having our liberties removed because too many people are thinking along communist lines. Why is that? This statement of the Prime Minister must be just an empty gesture. He has not a program that will fill the bill. You cannot expect the worker to have faith in democracy when you remove the excess profits tax and slip on a 21 per cent increase in freight rates and a 25 per cent excise tax, and in British Columbia a 3 per cent sales tax, and then pile all the other taxes on top of that.

But there is a program that will fill the bill. I quote from the Globe and Mail of April 7, commenting on Sir Stafford Cripps' budget:

Under terms of Sir Stafford's program a person with an annual income exceeding £2,000 must pay a graduated tax upon the portion of his income that is derived from investments. For example, an individual with an income of £50,000—

That ain't hay.

—all derived from investments, whether in real estate, in stocks or even government securities would be forced to pay a special tax of £24,125. Inasmuch as such an individual is already liable for a regular and surtax levy of £45,024, his tax bill on last year's income will amount to £69,149, or £19,149 more than his income.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That looks like social credit.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: No, this is concrete, real. If you were over there you would find out.

Mr. LOW: This is pretty hard.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I continue:

Roughly speaking, tax relief granted the lower income group will cost the nation £100,000,000 while the new tax on income from investments is expected to yield £105,000,000 in the coming twelve months.

That, friends, is democracy in action. If a program such as that is not devised within the democracies all you are going to do from now on is to juggle the atomic bomb from one hand to the other and you never know where or when it will go off. We are not living in a static age. There are social changes in the air. People the world over are beginning to move. This short outline or budget applies to the program that was built to solve the problem of one country within its own boundaries.

The people in Canada I claim have given too large a measure of freedom to the United States to express international policy. For example, we have fallen in line with the Geneva trade pacts. Because we were so frightened of jarring the Geneva trade agreements, we held off bringing in the austerity program and it cost us $300 million. Since they have stopped sitting in Havana and discussing the Geneva trade pact, we find the agreements have more loopholes than they have principles. The Belgian delegate said they should have gone there and discussed or redrawn the program deleting free trade and then allowed some loopholes and they would have got farther ahead. One eastern delegate said he came there and he became so convinced that the bloc system as enunciated by Great Britain would work that he was going back to the east and would organize a bloc system there.

The point is this. It is becoming apparent that the socialist or the social democrat democracies of western Europe want to bring in such marketing expressed through the barter system that they do not want the dollar sign to act again at the trade toll gates. This was well illustrated in the Ottawa Citizen on Wednesday, April 7, 1948, by Mr. Charles A. Bowman, where he points out that already Washington is going to start bringing in lend-lease, but for arms alone. No, they will not dare bring it back for food and everything else. If that were done little Babbitt down in the United States would not get his rake-off on European misery. Remember this: putting power in Babbitt's hands is not good enough. He has not changed his mentality from 1920 as described by Sinclair Lewis. He was then just a little man who worshipped gadgets and who sat playing with a five-dollar nickel plated cigar-lighter. Now he is playing with the atomic bomb, and he is frightened it might go off in his face. He does not know where to drop it. Suppose he did drop one on Moscow; suppose he did drop one on Leningrad, suppose he dropped one on Stalingrad and so on. He would then have to drop one on Rangoon, and Pekin, Shanghai and many other places. The social forces are beginning to break down national boundaries. It is true that Russia is a force to contend with; but once the force of war gets out, it will break away even from Uncle Joe's hands, and then people will fight for their freedom and express it in their own individual ways.

We can advance a program that will reconcile the contradictions without war. It is being done by the nations of western Europe under socialist and social democratic governments. They want to carry on trade on a barter basis where there will be no debt structures, but goods for goods. The United States is insisting on the almighty dollar as the measuring stick. That in itself will create a vacuum so that the communists can march in.

Take China. The United States has backed Chiang Kai-shek. General Stilwell, known as Vinegar Joe, pointed that out and tried to weld the national forces in that country so that China could become a unified nation; but Chiang Kai-shek sabotaged him, and now we find that such United States periodicals as Time and Life are belittling General Stilwell and saying that he created this chaos. It was created by the United States government assisting Chiang Kai-shek under whom there has been no reform in the land question, which the peasants want. Therefore the vacuum will continue to exist. You may send all the arms you like over there, and it would not surprise me if they went out into the hands of the communists, because the government is so thoroughly rotten.

By having the best elements from the international field, even if it means unpopularity at a given moment, we can build up without exploitation a new world which will, as I pointed out, have to be based on a new form of international economy. It will have to have an economic basis. Unless it is based on that firm foundation, it will lose all value and the many expressions of good will that are uttered by various governments and peoples will be lost, because the force of economics will drive us into more and more contradictions and more and more difficulties.

On motion of Mr. Adamson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On Monday we shall continue with the debate of this motion that the Speaker leave the chair to go into committee of supply. When the debate concludes we shall ask that three more departments be called in supply and proceed with the Department of Agriculture, the debate that was commenced the day before yesterday.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 3, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE SERVICES

TRANSFER OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the following orders in council. The first, P.C. 1929, transfers the control and supervision of the government telegraph and telephone services, except the telephone exchange service for government offices in and about Ottawa, and the functions of the Minister of Public Works under part I of the Telegraphs Act, to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The second order in council, P.C. 1930, transfers the control of the government telephone services for government offices in and about Ottawa to the Department of Finance. The orders are under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—PRESS REPORTS AS TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 30

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in reference to the debate that took place in this chamber last Friday evening from eight to nine o'clock respecting the Bell Telephone bill, and the reports appearing in several newspapers. I gave my opinion of the bill; I said I would support the motion to send it to a committee; but the newspaper reports are not correct. At five minutes to nine I understood no vote would be taken; I had an understanding with an hon. member that I would not vote that evening, and I did not think there would be a division. If I had voted, however, I would have voted against second reading, for the reasons I gave at that time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF ORGANIZATION AND ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT POSITIONS

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved:

That the organization and establishment of the permanent positions on the staff of the House of Commons, 1948, laid on the table on Thursday, 29th April, 1948, be approved.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to this resolution before it is adopted. First I want to make clear that I support the resolution and shall vote for it, and that also goes for the other two resolutions which I understand the Secretary of State will move today.

One little word of explanation on my own behalf, which I should like to give at this time, is this. There is in existence all the time what are known as the commissioners of internal economy. There is also in existence at the present time a temporary committee headed by Your Honour having to do with a revision of the rules of the house. Apparently there are some who have confused these two groups. I am a member of Mr. Speaker's committee on the rules, and within the last few days I have actually been asked whether as a member of that committee I approved the contents of these documents that have been laid on the table. I think it should be made perfectly clear that the group referred to is the internal economy commission, which consists of Your Honour and four ministers of the crown.

With regard to the proposals contained in the document we are now being asked to approve, I am sure we all agree that what is in the document is good. Some of us, however, feel a sense of disappointment at some of the things that have not been included. I refer in particular to the repeated representations which have been made on the floor of the house for some kind of pension plan for sessional employees of the House of Commons. I have pointed up this problem by referring to House of Commons stenographers; but there are other sessional employees who should be similarly covered.

As hon. members know, every time we have raised this question—and it has been raised by all parties in the house—we have run into certain difficulties. When we address our representations to cabinet ministers we are told that this is a matter which comes under the control of the House of Commons itself, and therefore that we must deal with our own officers—in fact that we must make our representations to Your Honour. On the other hand we all know that since this does involve an expenditure of money, to which the government must agree—and that, I understand, is the reason for the internal economy commission—the officers of the house have to tell us that side of the story. The result is that we seem to make headway very slowly.

Last year the question of a pension plan for sessional employees of the house was discussed on the floor of the house a number of times, with the result that we were finally given the assurance that it would be given consideration. After the close of last year's session I wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and placed in his hands a memorandum setting out one way in which this matter could be dealt with. That was not necessarily the only plan, but at least it was a concrete suggestion. The Prime Minister acknowledged receipt of my communication and assured me that consideration would be given the matter.

Several months went by without any announcement being made, so I wrote the Prime Minister on December 16 asking what had happened in connection with the matter. On December 23, 1947, he replied to me as follows:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

I have delayed acknowledging your letter of the 16th instant until there was an opportunity to discuss with the Minister of Finance the question of what further consideration has been given, during my absence from Canada, to the representations you made at the close of the last session of parliament with respect to the establishment of some kind of pension plan for House of Commons stenographers.

This is merely one aspect of the general question of the establishment of the House of Commons which is under active consideration at the present time. Mr. Abbott advises me that every effort is being made to see that consideration is sufficiently advanced to permit of decisions being reached and announced soon after the resumption of the session in January next.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

A little while later, on February 14, 1948, having heard nothing further, I wrote again to the Prime Minister. The pertinent paragraph of my letter on that occasion is as follows:

You suggested to me in your letter that any plan for pension arrangements for House of Commons stenographers would have to be part of the whole question of establishing of the House of Commons staff. I take it, therefore, that the announcement forecast in your letter would relate to the broader question, but I trust that it will include provision for a pension plan for House of Commons stenographers. May I inquire whether this announcement might be expected at an early date?

The Prime Minister did not reply to that letter in writing. But at his request one of his assistants telephoned me a few days later and told me on behalf of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that my assumptions were substantially correct. The information I was given at that time was that two things were in prospect. One was an enlargement of the establishment so far as the House of Commons staff was concerned, and the other was the drafting of some kind of special plan for the sessional employees who are not covered under civil service permanency.

Subsequently—only a few days later; on February 23—I asked a question of the Minister of Finance when the orders of the day were called. This is my question as recorded at page 1489 of Hansard:

I should like to ask either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether it is possible to indicate how soon we may expect an announcement about a pension plan for House of Commons stenographers.

To which the Minister of Finance replied:

The officials of my department have been looking into the matter and have prepared certain recommendations which will be considered at an early day by the internal economy commission of the house, which has jurisdiction in these matters; and I should hope it would be possible to make an announcement very soon.

I held my peace for a considerable time, in fact until March 24 of this year, when an opportunity to discuss the matter arose in connection with estimates then before the house. Mr. Speaker was before the committee of supply, and I asked him specifically whether these matters were under consideration. His Honour said, as reported at page 2592 of Hansard of that date:

The positions of all employees of the house are being considered at the present time by the internal economy commission of the house.

And later:

I have every reason to believe that all the employees will be perfectly satisfied.

I took it from what Your Honour said on that occasion, referring as you did to all employees, also from the correspondence I had with the Prime Minister and from the announcement made in the house on February 23 by the Minister of Finance, that we could expect at this time something along the line of a pension plan for sessional employees of the house.

I want to say I am disappointed, and I think hon. members generally will be disappointed, to find that what has been laid before us does not include anything for that purpose as was promised to us.

Since I have brought up the matter I believe I should say one further word. It should be clear that there are ways in which this could be done without putting sessional employees under the civil service. The House of Commons is jealous of the rights it exercises over its own employees; and we wish to retain those rights. The employees themselves want it that way. I would point out however that it would be possible to follow one of two or three different courses. On the one hand a plan could be worked out by which sessional employees could start, from the beginning, to make payments into a pension fund, on the understanding that if they left in less than five years they would get those payments back, and nothing more, and on the further understanding that if they stayed longer than the period of five years they could begin to build up something in the nature of a pension.

Another plan would be to treat sessional employees, such as our stenographers, upon whom we depend so much, in the same manner in which we treat our Hansard reporters. The Hansard reporters are paid an annual salary. They are subject to duty in the House of Commons only during the time the house is sitting. They have permanency on that basis, and they also have freedom during the period when the house is in recess.

I suggest that would be a fairer and a better way to treat our House of Commons stenographers. Instead of paying them so much per day for the length of the session, as we do at the present time, I would like to see them paid an annual salary of, let us say, $1,800 a year. Give them permanency on that basis, and freedom between sessions, the same as we do in respect of the Hansard reporters and certain other employees of the House of Commons. In this way they would have an opportunity to build up some protection for the years when they should be retiring.

As I have already said, we in the House of Commons are jealous of our rights to maintain jurisdiction over our own employees. We want the stenographers to be available when the house is sitting. We count on the fact that many of them will come back from year to year. I know that there are some who come only for a session or two, after which we do not see them any more, but I am more concerned about those who serve this House of Commons faithfully over a period of years.

It does seem to me that members generally should get behind a move of this kind. In anticipation of this matter coming up this afternoon I read again the debates which took place on March 28, July 7, and July 17, 1947. At that time we were pushed from one side to the other. We were told by the government that this matter was under the control of the house, and we were led to believe by the officers of the house that since it was a money matter, in the last resort we would have to go to the government. In my view it is a matter for which the government will have to take responsibility. I do not see how Mr. Speaker can be asked to work out and be responsible for a pension plan. Obviously that is a matter for which responsibility should be taken by the superannuation branch of the Department of Finance.

As I say, I do not like this idea of telling us that these things are under our control when we know that the final control is in the hands of those who have control of the money. I hope hon. members generally will support some pension proposal. I do not ask that the particular plans that I have offered be followed; I merely suggested them to indicate that something definite could be done and that we should urge the government to take action along these lines.

There are many phases of this whole question on which one could speak. There are many phases of it in which I am interested, but I shall not go further at this time. My reason for leaving it at that is the hope that by so doing we may make progress in connection with this one particular problem.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken before in this debate but speaking I believe on behalf of the Liberal party and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), whom I happen to have the honour of following, may I say that he is taking the right example in this connection. I understand that in August he is leaving for a younger man.

There are means available that would overcome these difficulties. I am not in the fortunate position that some are, but one who has been closely associated with me made arrangements to overcome this difficulty in connection with stenographers and secretaries who have served us so well and faithfully. He has provided one with a pension for life. May I suggest to the Prime Minister that more young men be elected to parliament and then the secretaries will be looked after.

Mr. J. T. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say only a few words with regard to this report. I agree that basically the report is satisfactory; it is a step in the right direction. But I do not think that enough hon. members of this house are familiar with the proposed establishment to criticize properly the plan which the internal economy commission of the house has submitted.

It is easy for us to pose as champions of the well-being of the employees of the house. I am one of those who perhaps has suffered considerably through being around the House of Commons at all times. I have had to share with employees, who feel that they are aggrieved, their feeling of sadness because of their unfortunate position. However, as I look at the rest of the service outside of the House of Commons I must say—I think the employees of the house will agree with me—that conditions for employees in the House of Commons are not bad at all. Indeed I think this house gives employment which is remunerative. If the service of an employee is satisfactory he has a feeling of security which he would not have anywhere else.

Something has been said about pensions for stenographers. I am in favour of everyone having the benefits of a pension plan. However, I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that he consider employees in the Department of Public Works and other departments who are employed at prevailing rates and who work the year round instead of four or five months and who do not have the benefit of any pension plan.

Mr. KNOWLES: Shame.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): That is why I suggested at the beginning of the last session that a committee of this house should carefully study the conditions of work, pension plans, rates of pay and so on, not only of the civil service but of all employees hired by the crown. I agree that this plan is good because it is a step in the right direction.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in one regard. The members of this house should have something to say as to the establishment of positions, as to rates of pay, and as to any pension plan which may be adopted. I suggest again that at the next session a committee similar to the one which I proposed last year should be set up. In the meantime I intend to support the plan proposed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when this report was tabled on April 29 I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) if the veterans preference would apply when appointments were being made to complete the establishment. I should like to draw the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) to the fact that there are a number of veterans, both English-speaking and French-speaking, who are employed on the staff during the session. These men may have been employed when war broke out, at which time they went overseas and thus lost their opportunity of being placed on the permanent staff of the House of Commons. I put in a special plea for those men who served overseas and who have returned to the staff on a sessional basis. They should be given consideration and be permitted to compete for vacancies which are now being created, along with those who did not have an opportunity of serving in the armed forces during the war, who are not veterans but who had an opportunity of being employed on the permanent staff during the war.

I ask the Secretary of State that these veterans who are employed on a sessional basis be given opportunities equal to those given to the employees on the permanent staff.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support largely what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, and also the additional remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). I did not hear the proposal made by the minister, but I am sure it is a good one and is in the right direction. I do not know whether the stenographers who have been on the staff for some years are included in the list of those to be made permanent. If so, I am in accord with that.

I know there are a number of stenographers who have been here quite a few years. If they are not on the list, some provision should be made for them. It always struck me as being most unfair that these women who served us so faithfully in taking care of our mail should be turned out at the end of the session. Some consideration should be given to them. Whether they are to be put on a yearly rate or not is a matter for the government to decide, but I rose merely to say that I agree with the suggestions that have been made. I hope that in making the selection all employees will receive fair play, particularly those who have been here ten years or more. In my opinion they should receive more consideration than those who have been here only a year or two. I presume the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I ought to make a good speech on this matter, Mr. Speaker, based on the fact that I know nothing at all about it. Now that I have read this document which has been tabled, I know less. It is not a report at all. It just gives a list of positions; it refers to "one principal clerk," "one charwoman" and all that sort of thing. We do not know what has been done with these people, when they were appointed, who they are, or what we are going to do with them. When we pass this motion, therefore, I shall not have the least idea what we are passing.

I think this is a terrible way in which to bring up matters and ask us to vote intelligently on them. Perhaps it is my own fault, but I am incapable of voting intelligently on this. I realize that. When I vote I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my vote will show a complete lack of intelligence on my part, but in that respect I do not think I shall be in a small minority in this House of Commons.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to ask for some information with respect to this matter. I am in the same position as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). We have probably a few members of the house who know what is going on, but I think the hon. member for Calgary West was quite right when he said the same knowledge should be given to all members. I should like to ask if the increases mentioned apply to the sessional staff of the House of Commons.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We have not reached the increases yet. They are provided for in a separate motion.

Mr. McLURE: The wording here is salary increases and establishment of the house. There is something radically wrong when even the minister does not seem to know what it is about. In view of the fact that none of us know anything at all about it, I think it should be laid aside for a little while until we get some information.

There is another question I should like to ask. How many years of service on the House of Commons staff have some of the stenographers who are now being made permanent? Why are the senior members of the stenographic staff not included in the list? I know of several stenographers who have had more than fifteen years of service on the staff but who are not included. There is discrimination somewhere. I think this matter should be left over until we get some information at least as to who these people are, why they are being appointed and a few other points of information that every member of the house has a right to have.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, the report that is before the house at the present time is sketchy. We cannot get away from that fact. It is also true that many of the members have been made aware of certain pay inconsistencies and various kinds of inequalities. It is appropriate that some more detailed investigation should be made of the whole matter of temporary employment by the House of Commons, as well as by the various departments of government throughout the country. While I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) that there should be a committee set up to look into this matter, my opinion is that it should not be delayed until next year but should be undertaken at the earliest possible opportunity.

It comes to my mind in the discussion of temporary employees that at one time I personally took up in this house with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) certain aspects of it. I asked him why there should be so many employees in his department who were listed as temporaries, and how long it would be necessary for them to work as temporary civil servants before their appointments were made permanent. As I look at the estimates for 1948, I find a limited change in that regard. It would seem to me that five years on a staff as a temporary employee should be long enough to enable it to be decided whether the employee is or is not suitable to be taken on the permanent staff.

There is also the matter that was mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). We have no assurance in this report, or no comment of any kind, as to what the position is with respect to the veterans preference for those who are on the House of Commons staff. Mention has also been made of the fact that there is no provision for pensions for members of the temporary staff, no matter how long they may be employed. There is also no indication of provision for automatic increases from year to year of service. As I look at this report, it appears to me that those at the top of the scale are fairly well looked after while those at the bottom are ignored.

I want to remind the house, with respect to the remuneration of temporary civil servants—and this is true right across Canada—that in some provinces temporary federal employees are paid salaries or wages which are below the minimum wage of the province. That condition is backed by force of law, because provincial wage statutes—as for example, those in Saskatchewan—are not enforceable with respect either to employees of the dominion government or to persons who have contracts with the dominion government. A court decision was rendered recently in Saskatchewan to the effect that a temporary Christmas employee of a postmaster was not subject to the minimum wage laws of Saskatchewan, because the federal government was the employer. Those employees were getting less than the $18.50 a week minimum provided for by the statutes of my province. Such matters should be investigated by this committee.

Then with respect to employees of the House of Commons who are working part time only, provision should be made that after a few years they be put on an annual salary; and if it is necessary for them to travel to Ottawa from a distance, travelling allowances should be provided to and from Ottawa.

There is one final bone of contention, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to throw into the laps of the members of the House of Commons. In this building and elsewhere in the public service there are long-service employees who enlisted in His Majesty's forces. By regulation of the civil service commission, they were cut off from superannuation rights at that time, and on their re-employment those superannuation rights were and still are denied to them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PROBE: I see that Your Honour is rising, and I intend to take my seat. But I say that these questions should be settled now.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I wish to say just a few words, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this motion. The matters referred to in the motion made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) are, I believe, contained in sessional paper 139B. While I am not going to oppose the motion, I think a great deal is left to be desired. Even though I may not have any great amount of information about the operation of the various staffs in the House of Commons, and in that respect am in the same position as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), nevertheless I have the ordinary powers of observation. In one place I notice that the head of a staff of five has a salary increase from $3,420 to $3,900. I do not think that is too much. But I also notice that in the next case, that of the head of a staff of which 150 people are employed, the salary increase is only from $3,600 to $3,900. It seems a little inconsistent that a person who is expected to maintain discipline and keep happy and harmonious relations in a body of people 150 strong or thereabouts is paid at the same rate as one who has far less responsibility.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): On a point of order, may I say that the hon. member is discussing the wrong motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Bentley) to the fact that the motion before the house reads as follows:

That the organization and establishment of the permanent positions on the staff of the House of Commons 1948, laid on the table on Thursday, 29th April, 1948, be approved.

We are not discussing salaries.

[Mr. Probe.]

Mr. BENTLEY: Very well, sir; I shall wait until the appropriate motion is moved.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (Saint John-Albert): May I ask the Secretary of State a few questions before he replies? How many employees of the staff of the House of Commons have received permanent appointments since the war ended? How many employees of the staff of the House of Commons have received permanent appointments since the last report was made, and how many of those employees served overseas during the last war?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I can only say in answer to the questions of my hon. friend that no employees of the House of Commons can be made permanent except by the house itself. The purpose of the motion before the house is to provide permanent positions for some 102 employees of the House of Commons which up to the present time have been filled by temporary employees. The establishment must be approved by the house itself. When the establishment has been approved the positions will be filled by the civil service commission; and, of course, in reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), I may add that in making these appointments the civil service commission will allow the veterans preference as provided by law.

This motion does not deal with the question of salaries. That matter comes up in a following motion on the recommendation of the civil service commission.

So far as this motion is concerned the establishment was approved by the commissioners of internal economy. It would provide permanent positions to a large number of temporary employees who have been employed for a considerable number of years as temporaries on the staff of the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the Secretary of State permit a question? Will he make some comment on the matter to which I referred, with respect to a pension plan for sessional employees?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That has nothing whatever to do with me; it comes under the Minister of Finance.

Mr. KNOWLES: Back where we started.

Mr. LENNARD: Could we not have a list of the 102 employees who are being made permanent? We are voting to make permanent 102 employees of the House of Commons staff and do not know who they are.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We are not voting on any employees at all. We are voting on the positions as contained in a list which was tabled on April 29.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One copy was tabled, and the 242 of us are expected to read one copy.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the Secretary of State advise me whether veterans who are on a sessional basis will have equal opportunities with those who are on a yearly basis but still are temporary employees?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This new establishment provides for the permanent appointment of thirty constables. There are thirty constables on the entire staff, and this provides that nineteen positions now temporary will be on a permanent basis.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): We in this corner of the house have been silent on this matter, for the reason that we find ourselves in the same position as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and others—we do not know anything about it. I think I can say that that goes for almost everything that happens in respect to the staff and management of the House of Commons. I am not an old member of this house, but I am older than some, having been here since 1935, but I do not know the first thing about how the House of Commons in general is managed. I am going to have something more to say on that when the estimates of the House of Commons come before us.

I believe that the internal economy commission as now constituted is all wrong. I do not believe that the responsibilities devolving upon them should devolve upon Your Honour and four cabinet ministers. Each group in the house should have someone on that commission so that we could all become acquainted with what is going on. I do not know whether you know it, Mr. Speaker, but it would be a much healthier thing for you if all members could waylay a lot of rumours that go around concerning appointments for this and that, and a lot of other things that come to our ears about which we cannot do anything. We do not know anything, and we would not want to get involved in it anyway.

With respect to the appointment of, shall I say, the secretarial staff, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the present method of procedure is all wrong. Hon. members find themselves in this position, that their secretaries are appointed by somebody else. I should like to know who has the right to appoint anyone to work for me. I am the only one who should do that. The government assumes certain responsibilities that it has no right to assume. The government does not employ us. Extensive revisions are needed in the House of Commons Act, I am sure. The government does not employ us; we members of the House of Commons are not responsible to them. We sit here. They do not want us to sit here. We sit here because our people put us here and we are responsible to them. What happens with respect to the appointment of a member's stenographer? I am in a perfectly good position to discuss this, because I have no grievance with any stenographic help that I have ever had; it has always been satisfactory so far as I am concerned. If I had made the appointment I could not have done any better. But a principle is involved. Some Liberal member recommends a secretary whom I have to take.

Mr. McILRAITH: No.

Mr. HANSELL: That is right. I have not been here all these years—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that his remarks are not relevant to the motion before the house which has to do with the organization and establishment of the permanent positions on the staff of the House of Commons, 1948, laid on the table on Thursday, April 29, 1948.

Mr. HANSELL: I thought I was within the rules. The motion has to do with the organization and establishment of permanent positions on the staff of the house. The employees have to be here before they become permanent. If they become permanent they are here. We see them all the time; they work with us and we work with them. I do not know why I am not in order. At any rate I have said what I have, and it gives the house some idea of what I will augment at the proper time.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING REVISIONS IN CLASSIFICATIONS

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved:

That the report from the civil service commission respecting revisions in classifications of officials of the House of Commons laid on the table on Thursday, 29th April, 1948, be concurred in.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion which is now moved by the Secretary of State is passed, I should like to know whether this is all the information the house is expected to have before making the disposition which is proposed with respect to increases in salaries. Is this all the information we are to have before these increases become effective?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The list has been tabled. If the house desires more time to go into it I do not mind withdrawing the motion for the time being, but it means that the increases will not go into effect as soon as they would otherwise.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister let us know who the persons are that are affected—not all of them, but those holding the more senior positions? In other words, there are some, I gather, temporarily occupying permanent positions. Some of us have formed some judgment as to certain persons, and when we are increasing salaries I should like to know to whom we are paying them. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has said, we are asked questions which we cannot answer. Maybe it is our fault, we are so ignorant; nevertheless that is our position. We think therefore it might be of assistance if we could be properly informed so that when someone speaks to us about a certain person we can say: Yes, I know that chap Smith; he is a very good man and he deserves the increase in pay which he is given. I should like to be able to answer simple questions of that kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out to hon. members that on this motion, as on others, hon. members may speak only once. The minister, who is the mover of the motion, is allowed to speak a second time in order to close the debate. I suggest to hon. members that if they wish to speak on the question they put all the questions which they would like to have the minister answer, and he will deal with them in closing the debate. Any other course would not be in accordance with the rules.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not one of those who on this matter wishes to speak at all, but I should like to know exactly what we are doing in passing the motion. As I understand it, the motion of the Secretary of State is to this effect. Certain figures indicated in the report which was tabled on Thursday last will become final on approval by the House of Commons, a report applying to some scores, perhaps hundreds of officials. If by this action today that is all that is required to be done in order to make these increases effective, I suggest that we are not being given much information before dealing with the matter. That is my only complaint. I do not know that it is a complaint, but I do not think the house is being given as much information as it should have before it gives final approval to the proposal.

I think everyone in the house will want to do justice to all the persons affected, and personally I would not expect that there would be much objection to the proposal. But I dislike dealing with the matter in so informal and speedy a fashion, when in matters affecting the estimates we take so much more time.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I would be expressing the views of all members if I suggested to the minister that the members ought to have a little time to consider in greater detail what this report means. I think better progress would be made than if we proceeded in this way.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There are 47 classes involved, and in view of what has been said, if hon. members wish to have more time to go over the salary ranges recommended I should be glad to consent to the adjournment of the debate so that it can be brought up later.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Tell us who they are.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, I believe it requires unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I am adjourning the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a different story. The Secretary of State said he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I have just said I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the motion is put, I should like to ask whether the minister will move the motion again, or rather have the debate resumed, at an early day; because salaries are involved, and if the debate were adjourned without an understanding that it will be resumed quite soon, it would delay the payment of these salaries to persons who need the money.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If I gave some of the classes that are affected by this motion it might be of assistance, but if hon. members wish to look over the list as a whole I would prefer to have them do so and discuss it later. This motion covers increases in 47 different positions, some of which are: Editor of debates and chief of reporting branch; Chief of committees and private bills branch; Chief of English journals; Editor of French debates and chief of French reporting staff; Associate editor of debates and reporter; Assistant chief of English journals. It goes on: Chief of stationery and requisitions branch; Chief of House of Commons stenographic branch; Deputy sergeant-at-arms; Chief of equipment, purchaser and storekeeper; Chief of protective service; Assistant chief parliamentary messenger, and so on. These are all positions in which increases have been recommended by the civil service commission.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Before the debate is adjourned I wish to say one word. All through the civil service, requests have been made that increases be granted to civil servants. The commission was charged with the work of making a survey in every department, in every class of civil servant, and they have proceeded in the last four or five months to make investigations and recommendations. The survey has been almost completed for all civil servants. There remains this group of the House of Commons, and the civil service commission now makes a report after carrying out that survey, recommending the increases mentioned in the list which has been tabled. Any delay in adopting this report will mean a delay in giving the increases in salaries to these employees of the House of Commons. I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. party that the debate should not be adjourned for any considerable length of time. In two or three days the house should revert to the motion and try to carry it.

Mr. BRACKEN: One question. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Public Works that any delay in deciding the matter will postpone the time when the increases will come into effect, may I ask the Secretary of State to say whether the increases are to be retroactive, as I understand they are to be, to a certain date, so that any decision we make now will not affect that date at all?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If the house carries it.

Mr. BRACKEN: The house will want that assurance.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If the house carries the motion the salaries will date back to October 1, 1947.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall be in order now—

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to know whether it is the minister's intention to proceed with the motion or to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Adjourn.

Mr. BENTLEY: Before the motion for adjournment is put I should like to make a suggestion. This matter is pretty confusing to many of us. Is there any method by which it may be dealt with in committee of the whole, where we can ask questions back and forth and get the information we want, instead of in a formal debate of this kind?

Mr. KNOWLES: Standing order 50.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is what I suggest.

Mr. GLADSTONE: May I suggest to the minister that, in asking that the motion stand, he have printed in Votes and Proceedings the reports tabled last Thursday?

Mr. BOUCHER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, lest my speaking now should bar me later when I have further information, if the minister intends to move the adjournment of the debate will he so state; and will he say also that he will give us copies of these documents, or have them printed in Votes and Proceedings, as has been suggested? At the same time he might indicate when the debate will be resumed, and whether any increases granted by virtue of this reclassification will be retroactive to October 1 of last year, even though there may be a delay of a day or two in actually adopting this recommendation. Then the house will have the facts clearly in mind.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If hon. members will refer to the report they will see that it reads:

> In accordance with sections 12 and 61 of the Civil Service Act, the civil service commission recommends that the following changes in compensation be approved, effective from October 1, 1947.

While there will be some delay in the employees getting their increases if this resolution is not carried today, or at least if it is held up for any considerable time, if the resolution is eventually approved by the house they will receive their increases as from October 1, 1947.

I am quite prepared to have the report printed in Votes and Proceedings and then continue the debate at an early day, as has been suggested.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just one word on the question whether or not we should adjourn this debate. It seems to me that if we have more time on it we will not object to any of the increases recommended in this report; we will vote for it as it is. But we would like a further report dealing with employees not covered in this document.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mutch moves that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HISTORY OF SECOND WORLD WAR

Mr. JUTRAS:

1. What is being done to prepare histories of the armed forces of Canada in the second world war?
2. When are the expected publication dates for such histories?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2.

(a) Navy—Three volumes in English and French, as follows:

Volume 1—Events prior to 1939, Volume 2—Policy and Administration 1939-1945, Volume 3—Operations.

Volumes 1 and 2 are nearly completed and will probably be published this year.

Volume 3 is under preparation and will be published in 1949.

(b) Army—

(1) Already published in English and French, three popular booklets as follows:—No. 1—"The Canadian Army at War"; No. 2—"From Pachino to Ortona, the Canadian Campaign in Sicily and Italy, 1943"; No. 3—"Canada's Battle in Normandy".

(2) A one volume historical summary entitled "The Canadian Army, 1939-1945—An Official Historical Summary" will be published May 5, 1948.

(3) A three volume history is in course of preparation and will be completed by the end of 1950.

(c) Air Force—Three volumes as follows:—"The R.C.A.F. Overseas—The First Four Years"—published 1944; "The R.C.A.F. Overseas—The Fifth Year"—published 1945; "The R.C.A.F. Overseas—The Sixth Year" is ready for the printer and is expected to be published this year.

(d) Combined Services

(1) A two volume medical history covering all armed forces and civilian services is in course of preparation and will be completed by the end of 1951.

[Mr. Krowles.]

(2) A volume on policy covering all three services is in course of preparation and will be completed by the end of 1950.

CANADIAN ARMY—APPLICATIONS FOR SERVICE FROM MEMBERS OF INDIAN ARMY

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Have any members or former members of the Indian army applied to join the Canadian army?
2. If so, what has been the result and what are the conditions on which such applications are accepted?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 28.

2. 5 accepted—23 rejected.

Of the 5 officers accepted, 3 were former officers of the Canadian army who had transferred to the Indian army during the war and who applied for reappointment to the Canadian army following cessation of hostilities. Of the other 2 officers accepted, one had special professional qualifications for a corps which was, and still is, short of officers, and the other had special technical qualifications which were required by another corps which at that time was also short of officers.

The regulations governing application and the standards of acceptance for the Canadian army (active force) are applicable to officers serving or who have served in His Majesty's military forces during the period of the second world war. Officers of the Indian army are accordingly eligible.

DEMOBILIZATION

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has demobilization been completed of (a) all personnel enlisted for the period of hostilities only; (b) all personnel of the interim force?
2. If so, at what date were these demobilizations completed?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. (a) yes; (b) yes.

2. 30th September, 1947. Former members of the permanent force being retired or discharged to pension, although demobilized on 30th September 1947, were permitted to continue their rehabilitation leave beyond that date. The last officer in this category completed his leave on 16th April, 1948, and the last other rank on 19th March, 1948.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SEARCH AND RESCUE SERVICE

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Does an organization exist within the Department of National Defence to perform the functions of search and rescue?
2. If so, when was such organization set up?
3. What facilities has it?
4. What missions have been undertaken by such organization?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Throughout the recent war, the Royal Canadian Air Force operated a search and rescue service, established primarily to render aid to R.C.A.F. aircraft in distress. In order to meet a requirement for an over-all search and rescue organization in Canada, that service was reorganized on the 18th June, 1947.

3. The following specially equipped air and marine craft are available to the search and rescue organization:

Location—Aircraft

Trenton: 1 Canso, 1 Norseman.

Halifax: 3 Lancasters, 1 Canso, 1 Norseman, 1 Helicopter; marine craft—2 high speed rescue launches based at Dartmouth, N.S.

Edmonton: 3 Canso, 2 Norsemen, 1 Helicopter.

Fort Nelson: 1 Dakota, 1 Norseman.

Whitehorse, Y.T.: 1 Dakota, 1 Norseman.

Winnipeg: 1 Canso, 1 Norseman.

Vancouver: 1 Lancaster, 1 Canso, 1 Norseman; marine craft—2 high speed rescue launches based at Patricia Bay, B.C.

The Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, and other government departments co-operate when required.

4. From the date of reorganization, 18th June, 1947 to 31st March, 1948, the following missions have been undertaken:

Search for missing aircraft	13
Search for missing marine craft	13
Evacuation of sick and/or injured	16
Missions to provide medical assistance	2
Total	44

ARMED FORCES—WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

Mr. CROLL:

1. What progress has been made by the board of review under the War Service Grants Act and in reviewing the cases of members of the armed forces who were dishonourably discharged?
2. What was the total of dishonourable discharges from the three services?
3. How many of these cases have been reviewed and finalized?
4. In how many of the cases reviewed has an award of war service gratuity been approved?
5. How many cases remain to be reviewed?

Mr. GREGG:

Return at midnight, April 29, 1948:

1. The progress made by the board is indicated by the answers to parts 2 to 5.

2. 8,432 cases that fall within sections 11 and 12 of the War Service Grants Act, 1944, have been reported to the board by the three services.

3. (a) 5,159 cases have been ordered entitled to the benefits of the act by this board; (b) 3,035 cases have been refused.

4. Answered by part 3 (a).

5. 238 cases are under review at present.

ARMED FORCES—MEMBERS OR FORMER MEMBERS SERVING PRISON TERMS

Mr. DION:

1. How many members or former members of the armed forces of Canada are still undergoing sentence in civil penitentiaries or jails for offences committed while they were members of the armed forces on active service in Canada or abroad?
2. For what offences were they convicted?
3. What provision is there for reviewing and commuting or remitting the sentences?
4. How many of the men now in penitentiaries have had their sentences reviewed and how many have had them reduced?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Thirteen.

2. Conviction by civil authorities, 5; Theft, 3; theft and forgery, 1; immorality, 1. Conviction by service authorities, 8: Aiding enemy, 3; murder, 3; manslaughter, 2.

3. The Department of National Defence has no authority to intervene with convictions by civil authorities. Reviews of sentences of all members or former members of the armed forces are conducted at least every six months, at which time commutation or remission is considered.

4. All ex-members of the forces now in penitentiaries, as a result of sentences by courts-martial, have had their sentences reviewed every six months at least. Of the eight at present incarcerated, as a result of sentences by courts-martial, seven have had their sentences reduced.

QUARANTINE CLEARANCE TO VESSELS BY RADIO

Mr. MARIER:

1. Has the practice of granting quarantine clearance to vessels by radio been fully restored?
2. If so, what areas does it cover, how many vessels were cleared in this way and how many boarded?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes.

2. All parts of the world except the orient, including territory in Asia and in the adjacent Pacific, east of the Mediterranean, but not including Australia, New Zealand or the Fiji islands.

During the fiscal year 1946-47, 1,355 vessels were granted radio pratique, of which 1,000 were boarded for inspection before granting pratique.

During the fiscal year 1947-48, 1,561 vessels were granted radio pratique, of which 1,057 were boarded for inspection before granting pratique.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PURCHASE OF HALIFAX HOTEL PROPERTY

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What did the government pay for the Halifax hotel property at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from whom was it purchased and when?
2. What have been the expenditures for (a) equipment and furnishings; (b) plumbing and heating installation?
3. What have been the yearly expenditures for upkeep (a) repairs; (b) fuel; (c) janitor services; (d) taxes, etc.?
4. What have been the total costs?
5. For what purposes is the property now being used, has it been offered for sale and at what price?
6. What sums have been realized?

CHEESE EXPORTS AND SUBSIDIES

Mr. KIDD:

1. What is the total poundage of Canadian cheese exported to Great Britain each year, from 1920 to 1947?
2. What is the total amount of subsidy paid on cheese during each of the respective years?
3. What is the total poundage of butter exported to Great Britain each year from 1920 to 1947?
4. What is the total amount of subsidy paid on butter during each of the respective years?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL HOUSING—CONVERSION IN HAMILTON DISTRICT

Mr. LENNARD:

For a copy of all contracts and detailed receipts for moneys paid out in connection with the national housing conversion at 72 Victoria avenue, South Hamilton.

Mr. LENNARD: I have received the information I require at the moment. If it is understood that any further information required will be forthcoming, I am prepared to drop the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to take this opportunity to answer a question asked on April 29 last by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), as reported at page 3436 of Hansard. The question was:

Is the minister aware that the disastrous flood in Manitoba, particularly in the southern portion, has been caused to a very large degree, by foreign waters flowing north into the province, and that this disaster is a recurrent affair? Will the minister ascertain and tell the house whether the terms of reference which were issued to the international joint commission in January of this year, to investigate and report on the drainage basin of the Red river are broad enough to allow the commission to make a complete recommendation with a view to preventing the recurrence of such floods?

Our information is that the present flood—or perhaps I may call it the recent flood—did come principally from international waterways which flow from the state of North Dakota into the province of Manitoba. While to some extent it is a recurrent flood, it had caused no disaster of this magnitude since 1916.

The reference to the international joint commission dated January 12, 1948, covering waters from the eastern boundary of the Milk river drainage basin up to and including the drainage basin of the Red river, does allow the commission to make recommendations with a view to preventing the recurrence of such floods.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CALLING OF ITEMS NOT ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister about which I have not spoken to him because it arises in connection with the debate which took place this afternoon. Certain reports were tabled on Thursday last. We come to the house today and the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) moves that the house approve those reports. The house had no intimation that he was going to move that motion.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Oh, yes; it was in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. KNOWLES: But not on the order paper and not announced Friday night.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Read Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. BRACKEN: My only point is that if we know these things are going to be brought up we can be ready to deal with them. I looked at the order paper. It was not there. If we have to look at Votes and Proceedings as well, that is something else again. I think the house should know when these matters are to come up. I accept the statement of the minister that we should have known, but I have always gone by the order paper, and it contained nothing to indicate that these matters would be brought up.

RESTORATION TO ORDER PAPER OF QUESTION AS TO HOUSING CONVERSIONS IN HAMILTON DISTRICT

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, on April 29 I suggested that a question standing in my name had not been fully answered on April 28, and requested that it be restored to the order paper. That has not been done. I should like to know if there is any good reason why it should not be done and, if not, when it will be placed on the order paper again, to be completely answered.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On Thursday last when the hon. member for Wentworth raised the point I was not able to hear clearly what he said. This morning I had an opportunity to look at his remarks in Hansard, and I now understand their purport. Upon reading the question it would appear that there may be some deficiency in the answer. If there is, I certainly shall be most agreeable to having the question go back on the order paper and any supplementary information that may be available brought forward as soon as I have an opportunity to look into the matter. I may say there is an order for return related to the same subject matter, and the same remarks made with reference to the question, in answering it, would apply to the order for return. If further or more complete information can be obtained in any way it will be brought forward by way of supplementary return.

REQUEST THAT PROCEEDINGS IN RAILWAY COMMITTEE ON BILL 8 BE REPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. My question has reference to Bill No. 8, the Bell Telephone bill, which has been referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I do not see the chairman of the committee in the chamber. I think in the public interest the proceedings of that committee should be reported as even divorce cases are. It would keep the record straight and save the time of the house later on.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I do not think that that is a matter for the minister to decide. It is for the chairman of the committee together with the members of the committee to decide whether the evidence should be published. I do not think there would be any objection.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VISIT TO CANADA OF UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the pending visit at the end of this week of the United States Secretary of Defence, will the minister say whether the chiefs of staff of the Canadian forces will have returned to Canada by that time?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, arrangements for the chief of the general staff and chief of the air staff to visit and exchange views with high ranking officers of the United Kingdom and various countries of Europe were completed before the visit of the Hon. James Forrestal was arranged. It is impossible to arrange for their return for the visit. Of course opportunities are always available for discussions between our chiefs of staff and high ranking officers of the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask a supplementary question? Does that mean that the three chiefs of staff will not be here for what appears to be an extremely important conference? If so, it is surprising.

Mr. CLAXTON: I referred to two chiefs of staff. As I said, there are ample opportunities for them to consult with high ranking officers in the United States.

ACCIDENT AT VERNON, B.C., RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the press report indicating that three young boys were killed and one seriously injured a few days ago at Vernon, British Columbia, through the explosion of two-inch mortar bombs on the range, will the minister inform the house what steps his department has taken or may take in the future to remove dangerous explosives from such places?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): An inquiry has already been held into that accident, and the report is being forwarded to me here. My information is that this was an old range which had been gone over to recover explosives, and that the boys in question, who were not there on business, had dug down and ran across some unrecovered munitions. A full investigation has been made, and as soon as the report is received I shall tell the hon. member.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ACCIDENT CAUSED BY SLIDES NORTH OF KAMLOOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Press reports disclose another wreck on the Canadian National Railways main line forty miles north of Kamloops, which cost the lives of two of the train crew. In view of this recurrence of fatal accidents caused by slides, will the minister assure the house and country that the lives and safety of the crews and the efficiency of the railway's operation will be protected by the installation of safety devices, including slide detector fences, at a much earlier date than that at present contemplated?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I am sorry to learn of the accident to which my hon. friend refers. I had not been aware of it.

If my memory is correct, there are two methods of dealing with land slides, one of which is to instal the block signals and the other to instal slide detector fences. I am informed that the Canadian National Railways propose to include the sum of a million dollars to instal a block system. I am not sure whether that is to be in the area where the accident referred to occurred, but it is certainly in the area in which these slides have taken place heretofore. It is also intended to instal slide detector fences, and they are proceeding toward that end immediately.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask a supplementary question. The purpose of my question this afternoon was to ask that the minister instruct—if I may use that word—the officials to proceed with the installation at an earlier date than that contemplated at present? The indications are that they will not be ready by next winter. I suggest that they be proceeded with at greater speed than is at present contemplated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am aware that, following the disaster to which my hon. friend refers, a report was sought. What the report contains I cannot say. I am informed however that following previous disasters which have taken place the Canadian National Railways came to the decision I mentioned a moment ago. It is the intention to proceed without delay.

HOUSING

HOTEL VANCOUVER—DISCONTINUANCE AS HOSTEL FOR EX-SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply relating to veterans housing in Vancouver. Has the old Hotel Vancouver been discontinued as a hostel for ex-service personnel and their families? If the hostel has been closed, has other accommodation been found for the tenants, or were the tenants forced to vacate before they had found other accommodation?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): As my hon. friend is aware, the old Hotel Vancouver has been under lease to the Vancouver rehabilitation council for the past two or three years. The rehabilitation council has operated the hotel as a hostel, and the government has given some financial assistance by way of meeting deficits. Last winter the council advised the government they did not wish to carry on the operation for a further time, and asked to be relieved of that responsibility. Early this year the property was sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway to another owner, and it was intimated then that the lease would not be renewed. The lease would normally expire on May 1 last. It was found, however, that proper arrangements for closing the hostel could not be completed on May 1, and a temporary lease for three months has been granted, to continue until July 1. The intake of tenants at the hostel was stopped on March 1 and the numbers in the hostel are shrinking. Eighty-five per cent of the married couples now in the hotel have indicated that they wish to take the alternative housing offered them by the government.

Married families with children have been given the first opportunity to take one of the six hundred houses now under construction by Wartime Housing in Vancouver. So far as single tenants are concerned, it will be necessary for them to find their own accommodation. That is also necessary for married couples without children. The numbers of tenants are normally shrinking down to a point where the residual problem on July 1 will not be serious, and I think no hardship will result.

EXPORT PERMITS

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR—QUESTION AS TO RELAXATION OF RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). As he is not in his seat perhaps one of the parliamentary assistants would reply. In view of the fact that the government is sponsoring an international trade fair in Toronto this month, will the minister state what steps have been taken to relax regulations regarding export permits so that Canadian exporters may realize the fullest benefit from the exhibition?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the trade fair is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and as that department also operates the export permit regulations, perhaps I might answer the question. As announced, an international trade fair is being held in Toronto, and promises to be a success far beyond the expectations of the department when the plans were first made. So far as the relaxation of export regulations is concerned, export permits are granted freely for any Canadian product which is not essential to the domestic economy and is not required to fill long-term contracts. That will continue to be the practice. I am sure no hon. member would wish us to grant export permits under any other conditions.

WAR ASSETS

BUILDINGS AT FORMER CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Are all the buildings at Maple Hills, the former airport at Charlottetown, to be declared surplus by the War Assets Corporation? If so, when and how will they be disposed of?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I received no notice of my hon. friend's question, but I would point out that the buildings would be declared surplus not by War Assets Corporation, but by another department to War Assets Corporation. I shall be glad to see if there is any information available in the department and answer the question later.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CREWS OF FEDERAL HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEY SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources a question based upon a telegram which I received this morning from Vancouver island. Have the crews of the department's hydrographic survey ships, the William J. Stewart and Perry, been asked to sign contracts based on last year's wages, and have they refused to do so, thus causing a tie-up of the vessels?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): I have instituted inquiries and hope to give the hon. member an answer tomorrow morning.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—QUESTION AS TO REDUCTION IN CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the Canadian government has recently made any representations to the government of the United States asking for a new trade treaty to reduce the tariffs between the two nations, this apart from the Geneva or the Havana agreements? If so, has the American government made any response?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That question should be directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance made a statement on the subject a short time ago and any further information would come from him.

Mr. THATCHER: I will refer the question to him tomorrow. Will the minister ask the Minister of Finance about it?

Mr. KNOWLES: Refer it to the Liberal convention in August.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house resumed from Friday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, as we near the third anniversary of V-E day this debate on Canada's position with regard to external affairs becomes most valuable, perhaps more valuable than is realized at the present time. At the close of hostilities it was the hope of the world that some intergovernmental organization might be brought into being which, by its collective action, would preserve the peace of the world. We, and I think all citizens of all democratic states, still clung to that hope, despite the failures of The Hague court and the league of nations.

Today with virtually a full scale war going on in Palestine we read headlines in the daily press like this: "Helpless united nations sees war in holy land". The situation, however, is not one where we should throw up our hands and abandon the united nations. The united nations today are possibly at a lower point in world opinion than at any time in their history. They are probably going through a lower ebb of public confidence than the league of nations ever went through until after the abrogation of the Locarno pact.

Despite the jibes, despite the failure, despite the veto clause, despite the everlasting talk, despite the obstructionism that has gone on in the united nations, the only hope for the security of Canada lies in some organization which will bring about collective security. That fact has been brought out through the passage of time. During the French revolution Talleyrand was quoted as saying: "In foreign affairs the best policy is to have no policy". That supremely cynical statement would apply to what has virtually been the policy of Canada in external affairs until the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke the other day.

I propose to speak a little later on the subject of our trade relations with regard to external affairs, but I want to say now that we have entered into a new era in international affairs. It is obvious by what has happened to that part of the world under the domination of the Soviet empire. It is obvious that steps will have to be taken by the rest of the world to combat this definitely expansionist ideology if we wish to remain free.

One of the steps that are being taken is apparently the abandonment by the United States of the policy of no military alliances which has been in effect from the time of Washington up to the present day. It appears now as though there will be some sort of Atlantic union, or call it by whatever name you like, made up of the countries bordering the Atlantic ocean, whether they be on the European side down to Africa or on the American side from North America down to the outermost parts of South America. In that union the United States will play a dominant part and we, as her next-door neighbour, must be prepared for this new alignment in world affairs.

[Mr. Adamson.]

A military alliance which, as far as I can see, is inevitable under the present circumstances is something which the idealists in the first decade of the twentieth century and in the years after the first world war thought was an anachronism, an archaic revulsion, a return to the wars of the middle ages. I think we and the world have found that we have been driven by force of circumstances into some sort of military alliance with our friends. I see no other possibility at the present time than that this changed fact must be eventually realized.

I said that I proposed to talk about external affairs, particularly as they relate to foreign trade; because this, after all, is the point on which external affairs, relations between countries, first begin to disintegrate. The first troubles between nations are nearly always economic troubles. They lead to further friction and eventually to political action which, as has been said, is the mere forerunner of war. I shall therefore try to deal with the trade situation as it is developing under the present international relationship of the dollar economy and what, for want of another name, I shall call the barter economy.

After the first world war a European banker said to me that the breaking up of the Austro-Hungarian empire meant the end of European economy. He pointed out that the Danubian block formed a great central core of free trade upon which the economy of Europe depended. What he said has been proved to be true, because ever since the treaty of Versailles Europe has not known economic stability. Churchill, in almost the second paragraph of his "Memoirs", mentioned this. After this war there is a strong desire expressed in many parts of the world to break up the British empire, and in fact disintegration has been going on at an alarming rate. The British empire and the Austro-Hungarian empire had many points in common. They were both composed of many different races, speaking many different languages; and, as the German-speaking people in the Austro-Hungarian empire composed a minority, so do the English-speaking people in the British empire.

There is, however, one significant point which we must consider at the present time. The British empire has, despite the individual fiscal autonomy of the various component countries, formed a great worldwide core of trading nations. These individual self-governing nations have had their own tariff policies; but owing to the system of preferences they formed a world system of trade which, if it was not free, at least was infinitely freer than the trade of the rest of the world. If we allow this group of nations to disintegrate, I fear that the same thing which happened to Europe after world war I will inevitably happen to the world after world war II. The parallel is significant. I mention this in the debate on external affairs, not for any reason of patriotism, but merely as a warning to show how dangerous this lust for ethnic self-determination can be to world trade.

During the period of the nineteenth century, which has been known as the period of the Pax Britannica, the beneficent influence cast by the reign of the pound sterling depended, in the final analysis, on British hegemony and an overwhelming preponderance of power ensuring some degree of peace; at least, it ensured that wars would be localized. If, for want of other words, what I shall call the dollar standard is to play a similar role, it will be through the exercise of overwhelming American power on the side of justice. To some idealists this may be an unpalatable fact, but it is as inevitable as night and day, and we must be prepared to recognize it.

This brings me to a critical examination of the Marshall plan. Enormous publicity has been given to this throughout the world, and serious doubts have been expressed as to whether the United States was capable of providing so great a sum and so vast a quantity of material. Some critical examination of this point should be made. In any matter such as this, the salient point is the comparison between the expenditures and that of the total national income of the nation as a whole. This is called the gross national product. In 1948, which is the major year of the Marshall plan, the gross national product of the United States is estimated to be $230 billion and the total gross value of the United States gifts and loans is estimated at $9·7 billion, or 4·2 per cent of the gross national product. As a comparison, in 1919 United States gifts and loans, while only one-third as much as they are today, formed a greater percentage, namely, 4·5 per cent of the gross national product of the United States in that year.

These figures, which are the official United States government figures found through the Harriman and Herter committees, must for evaluation be compared with United States exports under normal trading. In the same year, 1948, United States exports of goods and services come to the sum of $19 billion, or 8·3 per cent of the gross national product. The significant feature is that the 1925 to 1929 average of United States exports of goods and services was $6·6 billion, or 7·1 per cent of the then gross national product. It is seen from this that even in 1948, the year of maximum assistance under Marshall aid, actual United States exports of goods and services form nearly double the percentage of the gross national product. That is provided under the Marshall plan. The extremely significant point is that, even under the most unfavourable conditions, business between corporations and individuals is double that of business between governments.

The Canadian situation is even more intensified, because we are approximately three times as dependent upon foreign trade as is the United States. As a matter of fact our dependence is even greater than this, because, while our percentage trading position is three times as great as the United States, the loss of a third of our total trade would be infinitely more than three times as serious as the loss of ten per cent of the United States total.

This brings me to my next point with regard to trade, and world trade is the essential backbone of foreign relations. Our position in Canada is extremely hazardous because we are placed between the dollar economy of the United States and the barter economy of the rest of the world. Our shortage of United States dollars and the resultant austerity program, instigated by the present administration, is entirely due to our international position. I may say here that, while the austerity program has had some effect, neither it nor any similar program, no matter how drastic, can possibly solve the problem, because it does not tackle the situation at the root.

The drain on United States funds and continuing disequilibration of our over-all trade position are continuing and will continue, despite all the efforts the government may take along the lines of austerity and quantitative restrictions to trade. We are virtually sowing all the evils of state trading, and we have apparently learnt nothing from the past and are following the errors of the United States administration quite blindly.

I want to quote one paragraph of an article which appears in this week's Newsweek, and which I think is apt on this point. The article was written by Henry Hazlitt, who is a well known commentator and economic expert. It reads as follows:

> It is disheartening that the President has learned nothing not only from our post-war experience in price fixing, but from the appalling consequences of existing price control in Europe. The most important thing America can do today is to continue to demonstrate to the world the enormous production possible through free prices and free enterprise. We must not cripple ourselves by imitating the very controls that have forced Europe to turn to us for help.

That is very similar to our position in Canada.

I want to mention briefly what is happening in Europe. The international trade organization which met in Geneva, was succeeded by the Havana conference, to be followed eventually by a further conference in Buenos Aires, drew up a charter for the rules on international trade. In order to make the I.T.O. and the Geneva and Havana trade pacts work, the barriers imposed by the complex mesh and network of bilateral trade pacts made by European nations must be overcome. The total possible number of such pacts, which are the very antithesis of the I.T.O. charter, by every combination and permutation between the nations of Europe is 231.

Since the war, no fewer than 113 such pacts have been made. Many of them involve countries with trade monopolies vested in government agencies, and many carried trade through the iron curtain. By this, Mr. Speaker, the European economy has virtually become a barter economy of bilateral pacts. These pacts are in fact an extended form of barter, but their very existence is a danger to Canada because they set up a pattern of trade which excludes any participation by Canada. Western Europe is working out a financial pool, a sort of international checking account to increase trade bilaterally amongst its members. The plan is conceived by the British who are the masters still of the methods of international banking.

What does this mean for Canada? It means that in Europe today there is a vast network of trading agreements between countries trading chiefly in commodities, trading between themselves bilaterally, at variance with all the pious hopes of the I.T.O., but also —and this is the important part—trading to the almost total exclusion of Canada, because the pacts are bilateral.

As I have pointed out, our per capita trade and our world trade done on a free basis constitute an imperative part of our economy; but, as we are suffering from lack of dollars, brought about by our own stupidity, restricting our freedom of action, and as the rest of the world is rapidly forming bilateral barter agreements, despite the pious hopes of the I.T.O. and the Geneva and Havana conferences, our position is becoming rapidly more and more intolerable and our freedom of action is being taken from us.

It is at this point that I want to suggest one measure which, in my opinion, will restore our equilibrium of balance of payments in foreign trade. That one move is the re-establishment of free markets, particularly a free currency market.

We have to restrict our purchases in the United States and more and more, through the clauses of the I.T.O., as well as through the artificial price structure set up by currency pegging in Europe, we find ourselves unable to buy from Europe, particularly from Great Britain, owing to the high cost of their goods. Incidentally, very recently the United Kingdom told our textile importers that it could not supply Canadian needs for textiles this year. It fell short for many reasons and by many millions of yards. This cost means little in a bilateral agreement which is really a form of barter. If you are exchanging one article for another it does not much matter how much you say your article is worth if you are not to be paid in cash. I should like to quote in this connection one paragraph from a recent article by Jacques Rueff, who was president of the inter-allied reparations agency in Brussels. This is the paragraph:

> The disturbing effect of price control is nowhere more clearly shown than in the sphere of international exchange. The immobilization of the rates of exchange at a level below that which would be assured by the balance of the market dicourages export and often entirely closes foreign markets. For example, it is certain that so long as prices and rates of exchange remain fixed, countries which do not produce gasoline will not enjoy freedom of motor traffic. On the other hand, it provides maximum stimulus to the desire to purchase abroad. It therefore inevitably creates a hunger for foreign currency. Further, the position will continue to deteriorate so long as exchange rates are thus artificially determined. The deficit has a continual tendency to increase those prices which are free as well as black market prices, with the result that production is more and more diverted toward the free or black markets, thereby increasing scarcity on the official markets.

Our currency situation has shown a tendency to stabilize itself at approximately a ten per cent discount in terms of the New York exchange. This is encouraging, but there are discouraging sides to the picture. The investment of United States capital in Canada has greatly decreased in the last two years, and actually there has been a tendency, despite all restrictions imposed, for Canadian capital to leave Canada to seek investment in the United States. This is most dangerous. No one in his senses will invest capital in a country with a pegged or frozen currency. We see at the present time more and more pressure being built up against pegged currency. Mr. Aldridge of the Chase National bank, a close adviser of the United States government, has stated that more realistic exchange rates must be brought about before the Marshall plan can be really effective. Mr. Harriman of the Union Pacific Railway Company, another close adviser, has said the same thing, and Mr. Hoffman, who I understand was president of Studebaker corporation and who is now in charge of ERP, which is administered by what is called the economic co-ordination administration, the ECA, has echoed these remarks.

There has been a persistent rumour that European currency revaluation was to be undertaken, starting with the Benelux union. Whether this is true or not, revaluation is inevitable. When this occurs our trading position will become more and more difficult. Mr. Speaker, before this happens, I believe that Canada should act.

What I am about to suggest may seem unorthodox to the present planners of our economy, but I believe it is the inevitable solution. I suggest two things. The first is that we free our currency from all controls whatsoever. This may seem a revolutionary suggestion, and there will be those who will say that by doing so we expose our economy to speculators in world currencies, and there are those who will say that our Canadian dollar would immediately sell at an enormous discount. Both these fears are, in my opinion, unfounded. In the first instance I believe it unfounded because the dollar has tended to stabilize itself at a discount of ten per cent on the free market in New York. There are those who say that this is a small market and that is not a true indicator of what would happen if we abandoned controls. I am informed that this is not so, and in fact the transactions on the free market in Canadian dollars in New York run to over $100 million a year.

To say that a free market in Canadian currency would expose our currency to wide fluctuation by speculators is not, in my opinion, a possibility. We have one of the strongest international banking systems in the world, the personnel well versed in the business of foreign exchange. Furthermore, while our currency expansion has been considerable, it has certainly not been out of line with our productive capacity and our industrial potential. Thanks to the ability of our banking system, we have not inflated our currency. The soundness of the Canadian dollar is, in my opinion, appreciated throughout the world.

A third point is that we in Canada are producers of goods which the world must have. I refer particularly to the base metal group of copper, lead, zinc and aluminum. We are also the foremost producer of wood products, particularly of paper. Add this to our agricultural products and we have a virtually impregnable position in world trade under a free market.

One other move which goes hand in hand with this free exchange is the establishment of a free market for gold bullion. This would mean that the Canadian dollar would be not only free but would be transferable into gold at the option of the holder at the day's buying rate for bullion, which would be determined by the law of supply and demand. With an option such as this, the Canadian dollar would then become the prime currency of the world, irrespective of the discount it would sell at in terms of United States currency. With the convertible factor, European nationals would do everything possible to sell in Canada; and I again emphasize the fact that private trading, despite all state controls, is still running several times that of state trading. Even individuals of countries behind the iron curtain are engaging in foreign trade.

To induce European nations to sell to us is the only way in which we can be paid for the goods we sell to them. So long as we engage in restrictive measures against traders, and restrictions in foreign exchange, we shall continually aggravate our dollar situation and at the same time make it more and more difficult for non-dollar countries to sell to us. With this in view and with our absolute dependence upon world trade, we face either freedom or bondage. It is my opinion that the move to free our currency should be taken at once. On this question depends our whole future as a free nation and to me it is the most important question in our entire external affairs position.

Stable exchanges are meaningful and useful only if foreign trade and investment are tolerably free. It is idle to say that the pound is worth $4 if no one can use it. If nations continue to plan their internal economies they must plan their exports and imports. Free trade means much more than tariff reduction; it means a free internal market.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the position in which we find ourselves today. Our position with regard to the United States is well known. It has been discussed for many months in this house. Our position with regard to the rest of the world is just becoming apparent. One-half of the world is trading by barter; the other half is trading by hard currency. In Canada, fixed between those two types of trading, we shall find ourselves squeezed almost to the extent of international insolvency because our trade will be so restricted. If we, by the method I have suggested and all the other methods, can possibly aid the freedom of trade, then our future and the hope of a continuing healthy economy on a rising scale will not be diminished.

Mr. MAURICE HARTT (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a pleasure to be able to participate in this foreign affairs debate, and I sincerely hope that I shall be able to make my modest contribution to this debate on the relationship that Canada must bear and carry with other nations in order that it may exist, in order that it may survive, and in order that it may prosper. And we must not forget the necessity of maintaining peace in a civilized world. I hope Canada will pay a debt beyond a debt, in that it will help to suggest, promote and build international relations to a point where at all times we may be able to avoid war, the greatest scourge that can befall humanity when it reaches that point.

I want to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the lucid, definite and categorical exposé he has given this house on the question of international affairs. I regret, however, that one of the principles the minister has accepted is that for regional defence we must work with and depend upon the United States, while on our large-scale policy we must also stand with Britain in determining our world position. I can understand the utility of this statement; I can understand its purpose; but if a nation cannot determine its own foreign policy, if of necessity it must fall between the conflicting interests of other nations, then it does not have the right of self-determination that it should have. Historically, actually and factually the right hon. gentleman could not help but accept the status quo with which we are confronted. By some twist of international mysticism, some ethereal conception of international life, the world has seen fit to divide itself into big fives, big fours, big threes and big twos, while nations which have contributed proportionately as much per capita, if not more, are ranked as secondary powers. Then perhaps there are also third-rate powers. In my opinion it was a grave international error to permit five powers, because of their size, to predetermine the life and future of the whole world.

I am a great supporter of the united nations, but I must say the veto was one of those traps none of the nations should have permitted to exist, even if there had been no abuse on the part of Russia. No nation has ownership of another nation. No nation should be able to tell Canada whether or not she can decide, discuss or express an opinion on a certain matter, whether that is done by Mr. Vishinsky or Mr. Gromyko. No nation should pretend to have the right to say it will veto a certain question. It would be as though a criminal, brought before a court of justice, should tell the court, "I refuse to be tried, and I veto the question." That happened in Iran, in connection with Iranian oil. Russia invades a country, takes possession of territory which is not hers, exploits the people by a fake revolution; and when the question is brought before the united nations it is discussed always under the threat of the veto. Things like this make international fair play impossible.

I must also compliment the government on having established for Canada a multi-partisan committee on international affairs. It is the logical thing to do. This parliament represents all of Canada. We have a common interest; that is, the preservation and well-being of Canada. It matters not on which side of the house we sit; our common interest is Canada. In arranging that all parties in this house be represented on that committee, directly or indirectly, the government has taken a unifying step; and I hope that in and for the future this shall remain a tradition with every Canadian parliament, that foreign policy at least shall be more than bi-partisan and shall be multi-partisan if there are more than two groups in the house. In this house we can act with unity of purpose, with strength and courage for the preservation of this country.

I wanted to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and I might add that I was quite inspired by his address. In his suggestions as to how to deal with foreign matters I found something rarely heard, that human value and those vital principles common to all humanity. I found him logical, contrary to what someone else may say. I found his remarks pertinent; and when he said that he and his party had always urged that of necessity we must look to the winning of the peace, I was profoundly touched. It is true that the C.C.F. do not have a patent on that feeling, that they were not the only party to make the statement. It is true that it was common talk in the newspapers and on the streets, but the hon. member brought it to the floor of parliament; and I hope it registers with the policymakers as a basis for what shall constitute international obligations and international law.

Unfortunately—and I say this with all deference and respect because I know it is much easier to criticize than to put something into effect—in my humble opinion no nation in the world had an international policy. It was a question of makeshift and mischief; "what can I get for my own country first, without any consideration of international justice?" For this reason we are in such a terrible dilemma today. The world is more confused than before the war with the nazis. The people do not know whence or whither, whether we are going or coming. They do not know what is the policy of one nation or the policy of another. The question is terribly complex. I agree with the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) that trade is one of the factors for international peace and also for war. It has been said that trade is the search for markets and that war is the obtaining of those markets. But that alone is not the primary factor, and I do not think the hon. member made that claim.

There is a multiple, a complex system of international relationships as regards which, if we lose sight of one, we lose sight of all of them. It is for this reason that it is most difficult to establish an equitable system of international relations.

I have not seen nations stick together for ideological reasons. I have not seen nations stick together because they had prosperous trade. I have seen them break asunder on little points. For instance, at the time of the first world war Germany and England had a common interest in world trade. "Made in Germany", was beginning to get into the hair of Britain. When 1914 came something had to be done to lessen that trade. So that in this instance common interest is not a preservative of peace. Ideological or religious bases cannot alone keep it, either. The one and common ground must be the vital principle of the right of every nation to exist. That must be the primary humanitarian reason. And if that is accepted, no nation can go wrong.

We feel now as we have never perhaps felt in the past, and we shall feel it keenly in the future. I do not say this because I want to praise anyone or for reasons of patriotism, but because I am thinking in terms of objective reality, when I say that at the turn of the twentieth century a void or vacuum was created in the world Britain ceased to be what she was in connection with foreign relations. Never since the days of Henry VIII to the turn of the twentieth century had Britain been so weak in respect of her foreign relations policy. Whether that was by providence, or whether it was because everything that grows does so with the germ of decay, or whether it was by improvidence, or whether it was from lack of knowledge or indifference, the fact is that it was a policy of ponder and blunder.

It was not a policy which could be considered distinctly British. Something happened in the foreign office or the British government which brought Britain to the position where she created a void, a vacuum, which the world has not the ability to fill. Let us look for a moment at the six or eight years before the second world war, and see the blunders made by that nation which was supposed to be best acquainted with international affairs, and which knew the weaknesses and strength of other nations, and it will be seen how Britain brought herself into that position of impotency.

First of all, in 1933 or 1934 they allowed the German government to gain supremacy in the air. Hitler could not have hoped to organize his army, his navy or any military unit in five years. Mr. Baldwin declared in the British House of Commons in 1935: "We shall have not only parity with Germany in the air, but supremacy by fifty per cent". Subsequently he rectified this statement by saying, "If I had said in a certain by-election that rearmament is the policy of Great Britain we would have been defeated". Imagine! The British Prime Minister, the symbol of honour and dignity itself, which served as an example of character and strength, placing his country in danger for a political advantage. To make such an admission in the British House of Commons was beyond human understanding.

But by 1935 Hitler had already acquired supremacy in the air. We will remember when Sir John Simon was Minister of Foreign Affairs, and he went along with Mr. Anthony Eden—like two underdeveloped maidens, meaning well but doing little—to visit with Mr. Hitler and Mr. Mussolini but without any success, so far as peace was concerned. They learned then that Hitler had air parity with Britain.

Then we come to the Spanish incident. Never in the history of Britain, as I know it, was the union jack so humiliated. And when Mr. Chamberlain got up in the British house and said, "I told the merchant marine not to go to Spain; and if they are bombarded and sunk it serves them right"; and when we have the British Prime Minister telling the House of Commons at Westminster, "We do not allow the British flag to fly in all parts of Spanish waters"—because it suited a certain purpose—we have another unmistakable and dangerous precedent which brought Britain to an inferior position in which she finds herself today.

Then there was the question of the Austrian invasion, which was reported ahead of time to Mr. Chamberlain; and it was told to him and repeatedly told to him. That very night he was having supper with von Ribbentrop, who knew Austria was to be invaded, and carried on an inane conversation with Mr. Chamberlain in order to prevent him from getting to the telephone to learn the real facts. England was faced with a fait accompli which left her helpless and with loss of prestige.

Then came the betrayal of Czechoslovakia, the most pitiful and most pathetic blunder in the world's history. And at the time Mr. Chamberlain said, "We cannot be of any help to Czechoslovakia, let them take Sudetenland" —and this without consulting Czechoslovakia, but giving them the order to comply—France was allied with Czechoslovakia by a treaty, and obliged to defend that country. But she had to retreat and renounce her pledge, thus giving the bastion of Europe together with the Skoda munition works to Mr. Hitler in preparation for the terrible war to come.

Let me relate another incident, which may not be in chronological order. I refer to Hitler's proposed 25-year non-aggression pact with Great Britain. That was, I believe, in 1935. Within two hours after the proposal was submitted to the British foreign office, the German army was walking into the Rhineland. And these know-it-all statesmen could not see that they were dealing with an international gangster whom they could have stopped, and whom they should have stopped in time.

Personally I think a terrible mistake was made by the foreign office. I do not know whether the whole cabinet was aware, but we hold it responsible, by way of ministerial responsibility. To say at one moment that you cannot guarantee Czechoslovakia because you cannot come to her assistance, and then within a year to guarantee the borders of Poland and Roumania, is a farce beyond description.

So that Britain, slowly and by a series of steps, walked into a position where the dignity and prestige of the British empire—I will go so far as to say that—were brought to a position where no one took Britain seriously.

Mr. SKEY: The Germans did, in the war.

Mr. HARTT: I was going to say how pathetic that remark is.

Mr. SKEY: Don't you believe it?

Mr. HARTT: I was going to say how pathetic it is, that it was not the British statesmen who brought Britain to that position who were killed in the war but the common people who suffered. We know it was the ordinary people—you and I—who went to extricate Britain from that terrible, short-sighted policy.

Mr. SKEY: Speak for yourself.

Mr. HARTT: That is the position. It is very easy to settle somebody else's business as they have done in London. I am not trying to speak disparagingly of Great Britain. I still sing "Rule Britannia" with the same fervor as my hon. friends, but I am stating a series of facts which are indisputable, which are definite and categorical. I am not trying to say something that I have invented.

We won the war because of certain fortunate circumstances, but I shall never forget and I do not think any hon. gentleman here will ever forget the tragedy of the days from 1940 to 1941 when Britain stood alone. I know many of you were uneasy; I know many of you were worried, and I say that if it had not been for a mistaken policy on the part of Hitler, God knows what would have happened. If the Japs had not gone crazy and attacked Pearl Harbor I do not know whether you or I would not have been obliged to say, "Heil Hitler." Not I, for I would not be living; I would probably be a cake of soap.

The course of events which brought England to her present unenviable position was of her own doing. The mistakes that occurred in the second world war were also practised in the first world war. While Germany was attacking France, the British cabinet sat up a whole night deciding whether they should or should not go into the war. They did not realize that there was no alternative; that they had to go into the war as a matter of self-preservation. Sir Edward Grey stood at the window and watched a man turning out the street lamps. He turned and said, "The lamps are going out all over Europe; we shall not see them lit again in our lifetime." It was a question of being shoved in or carried into the war and afterwards trying to extricate herself by some blunder or through some good fortune. To say that it was a definite policy, to say that Britain knew where she was going, is a mistake. To say that Britain happens to be in her present position through no fault of her own is to close our eyes to facts, without being well-wishers of Great Britain.

Blunders were made not only before the war but during the war. Three gentlemen, and a fourth one, Chiang Kai-shek, arrogated to themselves the pre-determination of the entire world and what was to be done with the other nations. They made agreements at Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam about which the world knew nothing. When we came to the united nations we were faced with a fait accompli; we had to accept it, otherwise we would have destroyed the only thing we wished to build. Instead of alliances, what have we? We have spheres of influence.

We shout communism. We are so busy with communism that we forget what is going on around us. It was Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt who gave Stalin a sphere of influence which he had never dreamed of getting anywhere else. Stalin tried to get it from Hitler and they were negotiating until 1943. All this was given to Stalin before the united nations knew anything about it. This was given by the heads of the nations who participated in the war. They built up this Frankenstein which we are so busy talking about. While Rome is burning we are playing the fiddle.

This totalitarianism which is so nauseating in its nature and in its conception ought to disappear from the face of the earth. There is a complete misconception of communism when applied to the U.S.S.R. There is nothing of the kind in their system of society. To call them communists is to give them a title they do not deserve. There is no communism in Russia; there is just international gangsterism. That is the name for it. To call them communists or socialists is to give a title to their ideology which they do not deserve. The name of slave state or red fascist would be applicable, but the name "communist" is a misnomer and a terrible mistake.

I do not preach war because I do not like it for my own safety or for the safety of my closest neighbours. However I am afraid that we shall not be able to settle this proposition without war. In 1941 when Russia was attacked by Germany I was sitting as member in the Quebec house. I shall mention names so that I can be checked up. At the time I was talking to the Hon. François J. Leduc, a sane, clear-thinking man. He was jumping for joy, and he said to me, "Now we have Hitler". I said, "My dear François, you are building a Frankenstein that will take more to beat than Hitler." He did not agree with me at the time, but when I met him afterwards he told me that he thought I was right.

Russia ganged up on the world after receiving $10 billion in lend-lease, almost half the entire production of the United States. She has used all this to our disadvantage. She took this as a most ungrateful receiver. Our war materials were delivered into Russian territory without our soldiers being permitted to set foot on that territory. She took all she could get with never a thought of repaying it or showing any respect. We had the atom bomb and yet we told Russia that if she would join in the Asiatic war, if she would take a walk down to Korea, we would give her all we could and what she could take.

They cleaned out Manchuria; they cleaned out Poland—I am jumping from the far east to the west—and they cleaned out Korea. Look at what is happening today in Korea. Our united nations is acting like a paralytic in dealing with these problems.

Mr. MacNICOL: They cleaned out the Balkans and the Baltic states.

Mr. HARTT: Yes. The same policy of ponder and blunder was applied to the near east. That is history and you have all read about it. The world's conscience was shocked into action; and it was said that these people—who had given six million lives, half of our people, to the lethal chambers of Hitler, Jews who had been wilfully destroyed as though it were a matter of sport—good God, I am talking to people who profess to be Christians; I am talking to people who think there is a God, I am talking to people who know spiritual values—would be confirmed in their Jewish homeland.

They gave us one-eighth of what was originally promised by the Balfour declaration. We took it because we were satisfied with little mercies. We must have had confidence in the Christian world to have been able to survive for two thousand years in spite of persecutions, slaughter, murder and everything that could be done, even to dumb animals. We accepted partition gracefully, not ungracefully. We were glad to take it for the sake of peace.

Nothing happened between November 29, 1947, and March, 1948, when all of a sudden we heard of a trusteeship which is still being debated without solution and which will require twice the present army to enforce. Now, we have a fait accompli. The Jewish state is an accomplished fact. We do not call upon the nations to come to help us. We simply say, "You fulfil your obligations and we will fulfil ours". Their obligation is to keep the surrounding countries from invading Palestine. We will look after Palestine and the little bit of territory that you have assigned to us. The nations did not believe that we could do it. At Lake Success they came to us, or came to our delegations. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, I say "us" because I am Jewish. I never belonged to the zionist movement. I never was a zionist, but I do not differentiate between zionists and Jews; they are one and the same. Those who want to introduce that note of division are simply not doing justice to this subject. Those who call themselves zionists are the active leaders of a group that want to see the Jews have a Jewish homeland. It was promised to them; the Jews are in Palestine as a matter of right, not as a matter of grace.

It was under the aegis of the league of nations, under the mandate of Great Britain, that the Jews were settled in all Palestine including Trans-Jordan. The Jews accepted it, not as gift but in repayment for services. When Hitler destroyed the 6,000,000 Jews, his argument was that it was not the German army that lost the first world war but rather it was hunger that defeated them. The Jews of Poland were the purveyors of food to the German army, and the moment they heard of the Balfour declaration, they stopped supplying Germany with food. Hitler advanced that claim and nobody has refuted it to this day. The Germans, being an accurate people, kept records to prove this contention. We paid for that with 6,000,000 lives.

Jewish armies went into Palestine under Lord Allenby. We fought for Palestine. Britain recognized and admitted that. During the first world war Doctor Weitzman invented and gave Britain T.N.T., for which he was offered riches and titles. This he refused in exchange for Palestine. When the Jews went into Palestine they bought every piece of land and paid fifty times its actual value. The Effendi took the money, went to live in Paris and had a good time. When they had spent the money, they came back and with the help of the colonial office began to question the Balfour declaration.

After the last war the Arabs, who had been subjects of the Ottoman empire, did not inhabit that part of the country. Even today Trans-Jordan has only 350,000 people, and it is twice the size of western Palestine. They were a bunch of squatters. The moment the Jews got hold of it, it prospered. We have a habit of bringing prosperity wherever we go and the countries which we leave keep sinking. Those who dream of our destruction are themselves destroyed. It seems that those who dream of our destruction have not learned that we have outlived the Romans, that Spain was reduced to poverty, that the Italians were reduced to the organ-grinders of the world. It is strange that people have not learned that those who plotted the destruction of the Jews were subsequently destroyed themselves. History proves that; and history repeats itself. Perhaps it is because we dream too well. Perhaps it is because we hope too well. We have paid the price, but so have those who wanted to destroy us.

When the Effendi had spent the money in Paris, they came back and suddenly discovered that the Jews had no rights, and the colonial office immediately detached Trans-Jordan. Speeches were being made all over the world and advice given to all plotters that the Balfour declaration did not mean this and did not mean that. However, the people who survived Lord Balfour stated repeatedly—and Mr. Churchill is one of them—that the Jews were in Palestine as of right and that the country belongs to them. The declaration was twice implemented in international law. Twenty-six committees appointed by the mandatory nations came back with reports that Palestine belongs to the Jews as a matter of right. One commission after another was appointed. After the Anglo-American commission two books were published. They exposed the inquiry as the most tragic joke that could have happened to a commission. Bartley Crum came out with a book called "Behind the Silken Curtain," and he states that when those delegates were briefed by the colonial office in England and the foreign office or the department of state in the United States, the thing appeared like a huge joke. It was only a matter of stalling for time. The second book by Crossman is equally devastating.

Britain was backing out of her responsibility. She brought the Palestine question to the united nations at the request of no one. No one asked Britain to do that. She felt that she could not carry on. What is a nation with honour and tradition to do when it cannot carry on a given responsibility? Lay down the mandate and say to the united nations, "We cannot carry on," or "We feel that our mandate has expired." Instead of this, she was constantly and perpetually damaging the whole system that she had installed.

The Jews never thought of establishing a Palestine without a Britain. I confess to you, Mr. Speaker, and you can read Doctor Hertzel's speech at the first congress of the zionist congress in 1897. He said "We look to and shall continually work with Britain and, under the guidance of Britain with other international humanitarians, thus to end the sufferings of our people. These are the people that will eventually give us a homeland."

It is true Britain gave us our start. We cannot deny that but for Britain we would never have had a foothold on the territory. But now that she cannot solve the question, she is acting like a policeman or a detective who cannot solve a murder crime by arresting the corpse. At Lake Success, last November, committee after committee went to the united nations or to the Jewish agency and said, "We know what Jerusalem means to you; it is important to three religions. Give up your claim and you will gain the good will of the world." We did! Palestine to the Jewish people without Jerusalem has no meaning. Every prayer book we have—and we have never renounced Palestine—always refers to Jerusalem and Zion, not Tel Aviv or any port city. We are not seeking any aggrandizement of territory. We want Jerusalem because there we go to pray—go as God wanted us to do there.

What was the result? The Jews did not want to give up Jerusalem. But the matter was put to them on this basis: "It is a centre of three great religions, the Christian, the Mohammedan and the Jewish. Let us put it under an international trusteeship." The Jews consented on religious or spiritual grounds.

It will be noticed from a study of history that the Jews never fought for territory. From Titus to Hadrian they always submitted and paid their taxes. But when Hadrian wanted to put his image in the temple, they rose in rebellion and fought until they were destroyed. The Jews know the spiritual value of religion. They respect other people's religions. After all, we are the progenitors of those religions. They were not just pulled out of thin air. We gave them to you, and there is nothing in Christianity or Mohammedanism that is not Jewish. We only wish that you would carry out their precepts.

We consented to that trusteeship of Jerusalem. What did the united nations do? Nobody went in. Not a soldier nor a policeman was sent in. The Jewish people had to fight for the preservation of Jerusalem for the three great faiths. No sooner did they meet with a little success than Britain suddenly realized that the condition had deteriorated and arms are now flowing in, such an cannon, aeroplanes and so on. The mandatory nation has exceeded its mandate. While Britain gave us a start, she has missed the boat. She could have had an outpost in Palestine, a situation which we never dreamed would be otherwise. We believed in Britain. When the Kaiser offered us Palestine, we laughed at him; but when Britain offered it, we accepted and respected that offer. The same thing happened in Jaffa. The united nations are fiddling while Palestine is burning and while the holy places are being destroyed.

While we are discussing international affairs, I must express my gratitude to the Canadian government. There can be no reproach that Canada has said that in Palestine the Jews should have their commonwealth. Churchill said it; Morrison said it; Attlee said it; Bevin said it during the election campaign of 1945, and it was repeated at every national congress of the Labour party. It was freely given. We accepted their word. In 1939 when the white paper was issued—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house, he may carry on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HARTT: In 1939 Mr. Chamberlain issued the white paper, the most ill-timed declaration that could have been made. The Jews were trapped in Germany and they knew they would be destroyed. Mr. Chamberlain knew just as well that they did not have a place to which to run, and the white paper was issued. It said that the Jews could not go to Palestine, the only country in the world which was supposed to have been given to them. They were told they could not go there and they could not buy land.

When war broke out, what happened? Thirty thousand Jews in Palestine enlisted. They fought at El Alamein. General Montgomery will vouch for that statement. They fought in Italy; they fought in the desert; they fought underground and everywhere for the British empire. They had hoped, and the hope was not unfounded, that when the war once finished they should be able to get what was coming to them. We were badly disappointed; we are terribly bewildered. We did not know whom to blame and do not know where we are going. We say to you people now, for two thousand years we have been the butt of ridicule and persecution all over the world. Every moron, every pipsqueak, every sadist who wanted to get a sort of paroxysm by sublimation used the Jew as the butt of his efforts.

We Jews of the western hemisphere are satisfied with Christian neighbours. We may eventually become completely absorbed in the country and may cease to be Jews. We do not know the future. But those who are persecuted in the lands where their ancestors were and their families were destroyed, where the streets are still blood bespattered with that of Jewish mothers and children, are in a different position. For God's sake, for humanity's sake, let them go where they can have some peace.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in opening this debate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) said that collective security was the primary objective of our foreign policy. I am sure that he has general support for that aim. He also said it was the intention of the government, in so far as it could, to make the united nations an effective organization. There again I am certain that he received a large measure of approval from the Canadian people. It is interesting to note that in these declarations we see today an obvious and welcome change in policy from that which existed during the thirties.

It has been said that the aim of foreign policy is to achieve that which is desirable in the light of that which is possible. Conceivably that might be a dangerous doctrine; for national governments in the field of external affairs so frequently underestimate that which is possible. I think we saw that in 1935 when it would have been easily possible to stop Mussolini and his fascist hordes in their attack on Abyssinia; and had we succeeded in doing that, there is the distinct chance that perhaps even the war itself might have been averted. At least we did not realize then what was possible and I hope that we do not perpetuate the mistake.

Our objectives should be to help build the united nations into an effective international instrument for the maintenance of law and order and what I call fundamental human decency. Not only would such a policy redound to the credit of Canada as a nation, but since it offers the surest way to the establishment of world peace on the basis of justice and regard for human rights, it follows that it must be the wisest course for us to pursue.

In the course of his remarks the minister said that one of his tasks, one of the government's tasks, indeed, was to reconcile our duty to our people with our responsibility to the world. In following out such a policy, which also is the policy of the government, it is obvious that such reconciliation has been achieved. The house will notice that I have not said that peace is the main or is the principal objective. We had peace in the twenties and the thirties. We talked about peace. It became an opiate; and in talking about peace I was not the least guilty. We had peace, but it was an unjust, uneasy and suspicious peace. We had peace, but China was attacked and Abyssinia was submerged; we had peace when Austria was violated and Czechoslovakia was engulfed. We had peace when a world was crying with injustice and rampant with lawlessness. We had peace when Europe was brimming with persecution and pregnant with fear; but every one of us knew in our own minds that that sort of peace was but the prelude to war. We must remember that in our talk of peace in the future or eventually it will become once again something entirely negative and finish up as it did in 1939. That is why I say it is more important to concentrate on the maintenance of law and order and, by maintaining that, and if necessary by the use of force, it follows as day follows night that peace must emerge.

Of course we shall have to surrender a substantial measure of our national sovereignty to an international organization, and I wish to see that done as rapidly as possible, because I am convinced that rival nationalisms have done much to stir up wars which we have seen in the world in the past. There are those, of course, who would oppose that view. There are those who regard internationalism as an act of the devil for all practical purposes. We have the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and it is possible that they might agree with this quotation which I am going to read:

> One of the directions of the ideological campaign which accompanies the plans for enslaving Europe is an attack on the principle of national sovereignty, an appeal for the renunciation of sovereign rights set off by the idea of a "world government" . . . Taken up by the bourgeois intelligentsia, dreamers and pacifists, the idea of "world government" is being used not only as a means of ideologically disarming the peoples still defending their independence from the encroachments of American imperialism, but also as a slogan specially aimed at the Soviet union, which consistently defends the principle of true equality and the maintenance of the sovereign rights of all nations, great or small . . .

The author of that statement was M. Zhdanov who is one of the ten principal men in the Kremlin. There we have this extraordinary position, the representatives from Wetaskiwin and Temiscouata and the Kremlin all agreed upon a common policy. When I say that, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that if I oppose it there is some certainty of my being correct.

It has been said by too many speakers in this house without elaboration that the united nations is weak and that it cannot be depended upon. What do they expect from an organization which is still in its swaddling clothes, but two or three years old? It has not yet had a chance to prove itself. It is not the united nations which is weak; it is not the idea which is weak because, as I said before about the league of nations and say again of the united nations, mankind had the wit to conceive a great idea, but it is doubtful if we have the will to implement it. If the united nations fails it is not entirely because of some inherent fault in that organization, but the fault shall lie within ourselves. The united nations, as the league of nations was, is an example of the whole being much greater than its parts.

The old league of nations was betrayed by those who professed for it the highest esteem, and I hope that act of betrayal does not take place again in our time because, always, we shall be faced with an alternative. Here is the united nations; what is our alternative? It is obvious what it will be; chaos, misery and war. Either we make the united nations an effective instrument of policy, as we say we will, and assume all the responsibilities which that implies, or we prepare for the inevitability of war; and what will come out of that war even I would not dare to forecast.

However I am in considerable agreement with those who believe that today major war is remote, though I would say this, that if there is such a war, then, whether we like it or not, no matter how much we squirm and twist and strive and struggle, we shall be in that war. We shall not be able to escape it.

Therefore I think it would pay us as a nation, in the council of the nations of the world, to take a position in the van, a position of leadership for those things which we consider right and proper. We shall have to take a certain amount of responsibility, but at least we shall be doing something to avert what would be a catastrophe to all our people.

If a major war happens, whether we are in the van of the nations or so far behind that we cannot be seen, we shall find ourselves in it. But I can see no reason why Canada cannot give moral leadership in the united nations today, and we would find there many friends, the closest of which would be perhaps New Zealand and Australia. This much is certain, however. Our international relations have to be built on the basis of morality and of that confidence of which I have spoken.

The day this debate opened I was discussing some of the speeches with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), and during the course of the discussion I said that a nation must be prepared to live up to its pledged word and honour its commitments. In a world of power politics that belief is perhaps somewhat naive, and yet that same night when I got home I read Churchill's "Memoirs" and I found I had distinguished endorsation. Dealing with international morality, he said:

> There is however, one hopeful guide, namely, for a nation to keep its word and to act in accordance with its treaty obligations to its allies.

That is the principle upon which my ideas are based, for I believe that what is morally wrong can never under any circumstances be politically right.

I have said that in my opinion the chances of war are remote, and I have reasons for such a belief. Let me also say this. I believe that the people of Russia do not want war; but after three years of thinking, watching and studying, I have come to the conclusion that the leaders of that people believe that war with the western world is inevitable. Perhaps the limit they might put on the inevitability would be ten years, but at least we have ten years in which to avert the cataclysm.

The present policy of the Kremlin is obviously not only animated by the dynamic of what they call communism but is a projection of czarist imperialism, and today Russia is an expansionist nation, partly from internal compulsion and partly because of this czarist legacy.

Most of the resources in Russia today are concentrated on the production of capital goods, and therefore it is obvious that the production of consumer goods is suffering and that the standard of living is poor. Indeed, from what I can find out it is so poor that it is surprising to find no communist party actively at work in Moscow. In an attempt to ease the strain on the people and to divert their attention from their present miseries, their leaders may be tempted to indulge in further forays abroad in the hope of securing additional resources whereby they can improve the standards of living of their people.

I believe that the aim of the Soviet union is not only the recovery of all that was lost in 1917 but also the achievement of all that she would have gained had she been victorious in 1918. We can see now how far that has gone and what countries have been swallowed during the war and after: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Albania, and part of western Germany. These are already within the orbit of the Soviets. The U.S.S.R. has secured the hegemony over the Balkans which they desired so long. But in the secret treaties of 1915 they were also promised part of northern Persia, the straits and Constantinople. These ambitions have not yet been achieved, and in an effort to discourage any further aspirations on the part of the Kremlin I can see no alternative at this moment to a policy of containment, negative it is true, but at least it gives us a chance to find out whether there is some modus vivendi which we can arrive at in order to maintain, with honour, the peace of the world.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Before recess, Mr. Speaker, I said I thought we had ten years' grace in which to try to create a world organization which would effectively maintain law and order. I said that for this reason. To a large extent today wars are won in factories and industrial plants; and while I believe the Russian industrial potential is even greater than many of us think, nevertheless at this time it is quite inadequate for any major excursion. As far as I can find out, in 1939 the Russian percentage of industrial production, as compared with the industrial production of the world, was something like twelve per cent, and at that time the industrial production of the United States was forty per cent of world production. Today in Russia, despite the ravishment of war, they have increased their industrial production to some fifteen per cent of the world production. While they have succeeded in doing this, however, the United States percentage has increased to 60 per cent.
