
What this will mean is the necessity for some form of export controls, and I think the minister should have said something about that tonight. If we do not have export controls, just as sure as we are here tonight we will experience severe shortages in a number of Canadian markets in the weeks and months ahead. So the problem is simply postponed by this decision. It is not dealt with at all.

I should now like to refer the minister to page 2 of his own statement. The concluding sentence of the second paragraph reads as follows:

> If there is evidence of excess export profits and evidence that they are not being reinvested, the matter will again be reviewed by the government.

● (2030)

What is the definition of "excess export profits?" The minister did not answer that. Does any company in Canada know what the definition will be? Previously, under the guidelines and in the special regulations for the export levy, that was made clear, but nothing could be as unclear as this phrase "excess export profits". It is completely undefined, Mr. Speaker, and I think that is unwise. The government should have produced more specific details along with the announced change in regulations.

If the government does take any action, however it defines excess export profit we are going to have a further example of ex post facto law. Companies that are now operating will gain a certain level of profit from their exports, but precisely because it has not been defined by the minister they do not know what will be seen as excess export profits and may later find that retroactive action is taken against them. I think it is extremely unwise and unfair.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the potentially serious situation that could arise for firms which under the existing law and under certain circumstances—that is, prior to the announcement that was made tonight—were going to be permitted to charge world prices in the domestic market, should be pointed out.

I refer Your Honour to page 18 of the white paper entitled "Attack on Inflation". In the section "Exports" the following appears:

> If a firm can demontrate to the Anti-Inflation Board that it would be impractical or harmful to the national interest for it to price in the domestic market differently than in the international market, the firm will not be regarded as having failed to follow the guidelines if it prices all its products at international prices, but would be subject to the specical levy on all its profits.

More concisely stated, this says that certain firms in Canada are going to be permitted, prior to the announced change, to charge the world price for their product. That is to say, they are to be exempt from the guidelines. The "hooker" prior to tonight's announcement was that the excess profit that might accrue from that was going to be dealt with in precisely the same way as excess profits in the export markets. That was dealt with by the special levy. The minister has removed the special levy tonight and therefore leaves this part of the program in limbo.

Certain firms are going to be permitted to charge Canadians world prices, and they are now going to be in a vacuum in terms of any regulation under the program, that is, a vacuum in terms of not having a special tax of some sort put on them to take account of the excess profit. So, Mr. Speaker, tonight we have another example of the rough justice that the minister has spoken of so often in describing his own program. I hope in his answers later this evening the minister will clarify this very important point.

The change announced by the minister has removed certain problems and certain injustices that were bound to occur from those regulations but he has put nothing in their place. The very problems about excess profits and diversion to export markets that the export levy was brought in to deal with in the first place remain, and the minister has brought in nothing tonight to suggest that the government is going to deal with them in any reasonable way at all.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the minister a couple of questions about his announcement. He said that he intends to monitor the industries that are both exporting their production and selling on the domestic market. Could the minister tell us how he intends to monitor industries that would divert products to the export market? This would be a great concern of many businesses, particularly the lumber and wood fibre industries. I can see a blackmarket developing in all corners of the country.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about firms which, because of their size, would have been subject to the mandatory control provisions. Some 6,500 of those firms have been required to file regular reports with the Anti-Inflation Board with respect to their activities. Prior to this evening's announcement they would have had to make the calculation with respect to domestic and export business for the purpose of arriving at the export levy. Now they will have to make a differentiation for the purpose of determining which is export profit; therefore the Anti-Inflation Board will have the responsibility of scrutinizing those reports and comparing the historical performance of the business as between domestic and export business with the returns as they come in. The Canadian availability of products will also be scrutinized.

May I take this opportunity to indicate to the business community that if they find their suppliers are falling short of commodities it is important that this be made known to the government. In those circumstances, as the hon. member for Edmonton West commented, of course the Export and Import Permits Act would be available to exercise quantitative restrictions on exports so as to ensure availability.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question deals with the statement made by the minister with regard to his intention to monitor the profits that companies will make on the export market and whether they will be reinvested in their businesses. Must the investment be in the form of expansion of plants, or can it be in the form of retiring debt charges that the company has accumulated?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the primary interests is in creating additional jobs and growth in the Canadian community. We will continue to be concerned to see that there will be investment in capital expansion or in some of the other goals of the government, such as better pollution control systems and energy conservation. That will be primarily the object of scrutinizing the matter. Of course it will have to remain a matter for rather more flexible scrutiny in this case since failure to carry out this kind of investment will not result in immediate levies. But if we were to find a particularly widespread diversion of funds from constructive uses for the construction of additional facilities elsewhere, we would have to give very serious consideration to whether the proposition could be brought forward again.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this export tax was an ill-conceived idea in the first place. It shows how naive the government is when it comes to knowing what our industries have to do to achieve export sales. The government should have been aiding those industries to achieve export sales instead of prohibiting them with this proposed tax.

May I ask the minister why the government proposed this tax in the first place with the resulting difficulties that have already been shown for exporting firms and when it was brought to the government's attention by the opposition some time ago that there was little support or agreement for this measure, why was it so long in making the announcement which was made tonight?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member was not in the House when I made my statement, because I dealt precisely with the purpose of the export levy proposal. I take it that the hon. member and his colleagues are not concerned with the equity argument, the question of fairness as between the employees of exporting firms, and the capital of the firm. As I said in my statement, we are concerned about the inequity of employees having their compensation controlled while the firm's will not be controlled. That was the purpose for putting the measure into effect in the first place.

To be fair to the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley) his misunderstanding of the measure has been mirrored in other sectors. There will be this difficulty with regard to inequity. As I said, we have been prepared to be flexible and seek the co-operation of provincial governments. Provincial governments representing all parties represented in this House have spoken against the export levy. We have co-operated and withdrawn it. But the equity difficulty still remains. I hope that the hon. member and his colleagues will not raise any criticism in future if the question of equity is raised.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and clarification. My concern was for those people who have lost jobs as a result of this proposed tax. They are not worried about the Anti-Inflation Board controlling their wages, because they are not being paid any wages.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence at all that any have lost jobs as a result of the export levy. The levy has not yet taken so much as a nickel from any firm. What the hon. gentleman has raised, I say in all fairness, is a myth. No export business has been lost up to this point as a result of the export levy.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, in my riding it happened.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With respect, I think the hon. member is mistaken.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I must tell the minister that the proposal to impose the tax did the damage, and the damage has already been done whether or not the tax was put into effect.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is misinformed on that, just as he was misinformed about the basis for the measure itself.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, has the minister's department looked at the industrial structure of this country, for example, firms operating in the paper, lumber and auto parts sectors, and assessed the difficulties of those industries? For example, a number of firms in each of these three named industries produced substantially for the export market, whereas other firms in the same sectors produced substantially for the domestic market. Has his department looked at this question to determine whether there will be major inequities as between firms within those industries? Has the minister looked into this matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Just so that I may understand the hon. member, is he talking about inequities as between firm and firm or as between a firm and its employees?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am talking of inequities as between firm and firm. I take for granted the inequities which apply to employees.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it would be fair to say that, although we have given this question some attention, returns from industry in general indicate an almost universal request for the export levy proposal not to be carried through. I myself have seen no evidence of any one firm seeking the continuation of the export levy because it felt that, without it, it would be put in a disadvantageous position vis-à-vis any other firm.

Mr. Broadbent: I am raising a question about the existing regulations which will permit firms under certain circumstances to charge the world price on the domestic market. The government having removed the export levy, which was an instrument for dealing with the unfairness which would result from charging the world price on the domestic market, can the minister tell the House what the government plans to put in the place of the export levy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the kind of situation to which the hon. member refers affects the base metal industries. For example, copper is customarily sold at one North American price, and at a higher price on the London metals exchange. We anticipate that copper will continue to be sold on that two-price system, the lower price being charged in North America, in the United States and Canada, and the higher price on the London metals exchange, or in countries where the London metals exchange price applies. In those circumstances there could be an increase in the domestic price beyond the strict cost-pass through rules. In those particular circumstances there would be justification for the increased price, and it is this: In a saw-tooth market such as exists for a product like copper, the current price of about 53 cents is probably below the cost of production. The return on investment in that case is calculated over a period of years rather than during a single year. Therefore, within moderation, we would recognize that it would be reasonable to recover the higher price, even from domestic customers.

If there were a dramatic price increase because of a copper shortage—and I interpolate here to say that, at the moment, it is calculated there is a substantial inventory of copper overhanging the international market and we do not anticipate a price increase at this time—then indeed, we may be forced to adopt a two-price system or, in the case of copper, a three-price system, one price for Canada, another for North American customers, and a third for the London metals exchange.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the regulations and the definition of excess profit. I am referring to page 2 of the minister's statement for the latter definition. I take it that the government will practice a form of ex post facto regulation making. It will see what happens, and then it could end up taking punitive action some way down the road after the event has occurred. It will do this, apparently, instead of setting up in advance detailed guidelines, so that corporations can know in advance the rules of the game.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised the question of the definition of excess export profits. We would be looking in that case at an export profit above and beyond the sort of profit the firm in question had realized historically. Naturally not all export profits will be dealt with, only those that rise above and beyond the historic differential between domestic and foreign prices. In other words, we shall look at profits which are above and beyond those realized in an historic period.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, over what period of time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks, over what period of time will this apply. I remind the hon. member that, in net profit margin cases, we are looking at a five-year average.

The hon. member mentioned ex post facto regulations. It will be difficult to act in an ex post facto fashion. If we find that there is a widespread policy not to put profits back to work, to create jobs for Canadians, we may have to implement our policy at that time. But I think that parliament as a whole would oppose government action which would act retroactively in this regard. I take it that business will be concerned about the fact that if they fail to put that money to work for Canadians, there could be a re-introduction of the levy. I hope they will take note of this aspect of my statement this evening.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is some indication of a disposition on the part of the minister to ask for the withdrawal from the order paper of the ways and means motion.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be much obliged if hon. members would give their consent to the withdrawal of the ways and means motion from the order paper.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is the minister referring to the one having to do with the export levy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Order No. 14 discharged and motion withdrawn.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the amendment of Mr. Gilbert (p. 11210).

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, last evening my remarks were interrupted by a knock at the door, after which Mr. Speaker and the House proceeded to the Senate.

I had been saying that the federal government had reneged on another pledge when this bill was introduced without warning. As has been pointed out, the federal government has on more than one occasion pledged that it would not introduce any changes in the cost-sharing arrangements in the absence of consultation with the provinces. How is it that none of the provinces are aware of such consultations having taken place? This is further evidence that the government only honours its agreements with the provinces when it is in its interest to do so. Instead of members of a party in one corner of this House using the bill for partisan political purposes we should be united in opposing the measure; that is the only way in which we can convince the government that we intend to throw the whole weight of the opposition against this bill and other legislation of this kind.

I wanted to get some first hand information on this bill from my own riding so I got in touch with a couple of doctors in my home town. I asked one of them, Dr. Dempster, what his opinion was. "There was no doubt about it," he told me by telephone, "medicare is here to stay. There is no way we can ever go back to private billing because nobody can afford to do so. We have too many doctors being paid under the scheme now. It would make us bankrupt if we had to go back to private billing."

Medicare was aimed at helping people who could not afford medical services. That was the primary reason for starting it. It is said now that doctors are seeing people unnecessarily, that hypochondriacs are coming in all the time and that they should be discouraged by the imposition of a deterrent fee. It has not been demonstrated that this, in fact, is the case. The wealthy people who could afford to pay would pay and come anyway, and if the old age pensioners and the welfare recipients, those who, by and large, most need medical care, were required to pay they would not come because they could not afford it.

The doctor went on to say that in his opinion it had not been demonstrated that the plan had been abused significantly. "I think they could probably prove or disprove this by pulling the profiles of patients with a computer", he added. It was, he said, a time for consolidation. There was no sense in each little bailiwick carrying out a research project which was never likely to be of any significance. He further stated, "There is no way you are going to back down from medicare. As far as the federal government's contribution is concerned one accepts that it is a moral responsibility, and if you accept it you have to pay for it."

I appreciate Ontario's point of view because, as one of the have provinces, they are carrying a tremendous load, along with British Columbia and Alberta. The doctors have agreed to an increase of 8.3 per cent. They are living with it and I guess they should be commended for doing so. The doctor's comment on this point is interesting: "Well, they had to, by God!" This young doctor had attended the meeting which was held in Toronto. The doctors originally wanted an increase of 35 per cent, plus other things as well. In his conversation with me, the doctor I was speaking to commended the Ontario Minister of Health. Frank Miller, he said, must be an exorcist, having succeeded in talking the meeting out of that.

Further, in conversation, he expressed the opinion there were too many doctors in Ontario now, one for every 585 of the population, whereas the accepted average was one for every 650. There were, however, shortages in certain fields. There is a shortage of phychiatrists, anaesthetists and cancer specialists. Possibly, my contact suggested, some of the younger general practitioners might specialize in those fields. This might very well be.

I am aware that there are smaller communities in northern Ontario to which it is difficult to attract doctors, ever under the provincial scheme for this purpose which ha:

enjoyed some success since it came into operation. There are many isolated communities in which doctors are reluctant to set up practice. Their wives would probably not be too happy to find themselves in remote areas isolated from family and friends and some of the amenities of life to which they are accustomed.

I also talked to another doctor, an eminent surgeon in my constituency—and a very forceful one when it comes to speaking his mind. He declared that there were too many frills attached to the medicare scheme—frills which had nothing to do with sustaining life. Too much money was spent on lab tests, repeated and repeated. These unnecessary costs were incurred by patients referred to as "doctor hoppers"—they hopped from one doctor to another. According to this doctor—Dr. Hallam—most of the money was thrown down the drain. He said it boiled down to one thing, "There are too many frills, get down to the basics." I must say, Madam Speaker, I had to edit the good doctor's words in order to get that statement printed in Hansard.

I was interested to listen to the speeches made in this debate by colleagues who are physicians. They are very knowledgeable on this subject and they are to be commended for the part they have taken in this debate. Those of us who represent Ontario ridings are very pleased with the standard of health care we enjoy.

Some members may recall that two or three weeks ago Senator Edward Kennedy, I believe it is, came to Ontario heading a Senate committee on health care in the United States. While there he met with our provincial minister of health, Frank Miller, and was most enthusiastic about the way in which the medicare plan was working in Ontario. They have nothing as encompassing in the United States.

About ten days ago I had the honour of having the provincial minister of health speak in my riding, in my own village of Burk's Falls—

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, I would like to know whether the hon. member is in the process of defending Dr. Frank Miller or dealing with the bill now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Naturally, the bill deals with medical services, and it is very difficult to limit the speeches of hon. members strictly to the bill before us.

[English]

Mr. Darling: I am certainly not defending the Ontario minister of health. I am pointing out certain things. I admit I have more than a passing interest in the provincial minister of health, as the hon. member probably knows, because he happens to represent a part of my own riding. I am also interested in the example Ontario is showing to others. Criticisms and suggestions have been made to help cut down costs, which is what we are all interested in, without cutting down services.

● (2100)

I mentioned that the provincial minister spoke in my riding to a service club, and he pointed out there had been some misuse of the Ontario Health Insurance Plan. He had this to say:

> My individual feelings are—and they are not necessarily those of the ministry—that we are nickel and dimed to death. You cannot control this until it comes out of your own pocket. Maybe we should use the method of billing for each visit to the doctor for those that did not use the insurance; then they should get a rebate back at the end of the year because now some people are going to the doctor for no reason whatever, and this costs all of us money.

I think we will all agree with that. As hon. members are well aware, in cutting back health costs the minister has made himself unpopular in certain areas of the province because he has closed hospitals and hospital wings, a program that he says will save between $30 million and $35 million. The minister has also ordered closure of four health laboratories, in Woodstock, St. Catharines, Kenora, and North Bay which is quite near my riding. In justification of this he said that 50 per cent of the work carried on consisted of the testing of water, milk or swabs, which were mostly sent in by mail and therefore could be returned by mail. He said that the unified labs at hospitals could handle 40 per cent of the remaining tests at no extra cost. The minister went on to say this:

> If I am able to make those savings and I do not close them, I am nuts.

I expect we would all agree with that, despite the fact that the particular areas concerned were really uptight about it and naturally criticized the closures strongly.

My colleagues to my left have taken great delight in taking the Ontario government to task for closing hospitals and reducing the number of wings and beds in hospitals. Let me emphasize that the provincial treasurer of Ontario has introduced a measure of restraint in allowing only a 10 per cent increase in the budgets of all departments, though health was granted an 11 per cent increase. If hospital costs were allowed to increase to the same extent as last year, the health budget alone would have increased by $600 million. That is a lot of money, Madam Speaker, no matter how quietly you say it. As I say, the budget has increased by only 11 per cent to stay within constraints. It has been necessary to carry out bed closures, hospital closures, and also reductions in complement, not only in psychiatric hospitals but where there are excessive paid hours of employment over hospitals of comparable size. These hospitals have been asked to reduce their staffs.

Let me emphasize that these hospital closures have been carried out after a great deal of investigative work by the ministry's staff to assess the health needs of communities and to determine the physical assets of existing hospitals. If there were hospitals needing replacement within the next few years and there were nearby hospitals that had surplus beds, it would make sense just to close those hospitals and utilize nearby hospital beds to a greater extent. This will effect economies and make more efficient use of hospital facilities. This program has been carried out throughout the province on a non-geographic and non-political basis, with the hope of achieving a saving of some $50 million, amounting to a little over 3 per cent of the hospital budget. Hospitals account for 53 cents of every dollar spent on health.

As a result of negotiations, doctors have now settled, as I have already mentioned, for an 8.1 per cent increase, which is well within the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines. Funds for new nursing beds have been frozen; no new nursing beds are going ahead. Any commitments that were made prior to this stand are being honoured. With the closing of the hospitals already announced it should be pointed out that there will still be a surplus of 3,000 beds in the province of Ontario. Ontario's health budget for 1976 will be $3.4 billion, or $400 per person.

We know there are a great many ways to control health costs, and one is to make our health care system more efficient. I appreciate the undertaking of our minister that greater emphasis will be placed on reducing health hazards in the environment and increasing health awareness among Canadians. If we are going to become more healthy and save untold millions of dollars, then we had better stand up, be counted, and be ready to bite the bullet. The minister has pointed out, and rightly so, that we must exercise more, and smoke and drink less. If I had my way, I would ban the latter two activities entirely—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Darling: —though I realize I am slightly biased there. In addition, we should eat more wisely, in other words less, and I am one who is as guilty, if not more so, as the next person.

Mr. Symes: Let us put up prices in the restaurant.

Mr. Darling: I see a lot of the saintly people to my left eating there, and even eating in the cafeteria.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't look at me.

Mr. Darling: I am not looking at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As a general insurance agent I have some knowledge of the great increase in premiums for automobile insurance policies, in spite of the fact that since my election to parliament I have not been active in this business. Nevertheless, I still receive letters and hear complaints about the high cost of automobile insurance.

Statistics inform us that traffic accidents are the second most prevalent cause of early death next to heart disease. In 1971, according to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), figures show that accidents cost us 250,000 years of potential life. Human factors are blamed for 80 per cent of traffic deaths, and these factors include drunken and impaired drivers, speeding, carelessness, failure to use seat belts and, in all probability, failure to use just plain common sense. There were 223,777 injuries on our highways in 1973.

The tremendous cost of related medical and hospital care for victims of highway accidents is staggering, Madam Speaker. Traffic accidents cost Canadians well over $2 billion a year, including cost of hospital care and treatment for accident victims who require over two million days of hospitalization. Such hospitalization is estimated to cost this country at least $200 million a year. Medical care costs amount to approximately another $100 million, and these figures do not include legal expenses, public liability, property damage, loss of time from work, and the cost of permanent disability.

It might be a good time, Madam Speaker, to put in a plug for the wearing of seat belts, which I know is distasteful to a great many automobile drivers in my own province of Ontario where seat belt legislation has just come into force. Again speaking as an insurance agent I am well aware that wearing of seat belts does save lives as well as huge sums of money.

Australia has implemented seat belt legislation over the past three years. In its first full year of enforcement there was a reduction in fatal motor vehicle accidents of 25 per cent. A similar situation exists in France. There statistics reveal that their new compulsory seat belt legislation saved 1,200 lives in 1974.

Another staggering statistic is the great number of industrial accidents and fatalities. In 1974, 1,415 workers were killed on the job. The average over the past 10 years is 1,076. One out of 20 workers had a disabling injury in 1974, there being a total of 473,000 injuries. Industrial accidents were estimated to cost the United States $32.4 billion a year. I am sure our losses would be in the same ratio, which would mean about $3 billion a year. This certainly gives us food for thought. Something must be done to reduce these accidents. We must also consider this in terms of lost production, in human suffering, and in medical and hospital care.

We are told by experts in the field that for every dollar spent on medical research today there is a savings of $20 in health costs within ten years. I trust, therefore, that the minister will reconsider reducing the medical research budget by too much.

The bill proposes to limit the government's increased participation in medicare to 13 per cent next year, 10.5 per cent the following year, and 8 per cent in subsequent years. This will certainly be a great burden on the provinces and will be especially hard on those provinces which do not have the wealth and taxing revenues of a province like Ontario, British Columbia, and those blue-eyed Arab sheiks in Alberta.

Mr. Towers: Take it easy now.

Mr. Darling: That's O.K., my hon. friend from Red Deer.

Our minister of health in Ontario was quoted some while back in this regard. In fact I found the quotation at page 10411 of Hansard and I think it bears repeating. He said:

> If I have ever seen any example of unilateral decision making without consultation with the provinces that is it. We have been negotiating patiently for four years with the federal government to get a means of sharing health care costs that would allow the provinces to use their own discretion and to set their own priorities, instead of sharing on only those most costly services, the hospital and the physician. In the face of that, without any further consultation, they unilaterally set guidelines. They started the plan; it has got out of control. They have unilaterally limited the amount they will put into it. I don't know how we will live within it.

Other provincial health ministers have voiced a similar opinion.

On July 10 this past year the Canadian Medical Association declared:

The budget controls will produce definite health hazards for Canada's health care delivery system. The Government of Canada's budget controls will have the effect of restricting the availability of health care . . . in effect, rationing needed medical care, unless additional funds are provided by the province or the public. This action could endanger the quality of medical services available to Canadians.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has come up with the magic or unlucky number 13, which may be an omen in relation to health conditions in the coming year. How do we know he will not change this figure downward this year, and more in future years? A great many of us are worried that he may drop the entire responsibility for this program on the provinces, or at least limit future contributions even more.

Newspapers all across the country have been writing editorials pointing out that great care should be taken and the government should take a second look at this. They have also suggested that the provinces must also reconsider the situation. I hope the minister will reconsider amending this legislation. I have here an article from the Toronto Star which again quotes the Ontario minister of health as follows:

Health Minister Frank Miller believes that the growth of health care costs can't be curbed unless individuals have to pay part of the cost out of their own pockets.

It's a belief shared by many people as soaring health costs undergo searching scrutiny.

Most of us are aware that the Ontario Minister of Labour, who was the president of the Canadian Medical Association, suggested deterrent fees as a way of restraining health care costs by making patients think twice about visiting doctors. This article from the Star goes on to state:

The belief is based on the supposition that individuals, because health care is "free"—that is, paid for out of premiums and taxes—use it unecessarily. People go to doctors with colds and sore throats, it's said, and others go to hospital emergency wards with minor ailments.

But something more than casual supposition about unnecessary visits to doctors and emergency wards is needed if the government is to take the drastic step of imposing deterrent fees upon individuals.

Later the article states:

These computers could produce patient profiles that would show, for example, whether Patient Smith saw Doctors Brown, Black and Green, all to complain of the same sore throat, within a 10-day period.

They could show how much use is made of the system by patients of the 800 doctors who have opted out of OHIP.

I know that one of my own colleagues who is a doctor is in that category. The article continues:

These patients have to pay themselves the difference between what health insurance pays and what the doctor charges, which in effect is a form of deterrent fee. It would be useful to know whether they see their doctors more or less than people who don't pay extra.

It's important that facts of this kind be available before a decision is made to impose deterrent fees. Otherwise what may happen is that a wealthy hypochondriac will continue to make frequent visits to a doctor, while a mother on welfare is prevented from seeking help for a fevered child.

Before imposing this kind of deterrent on people who legitimately need health care, the provinces—and this would include Ontario—should certainly provide clear evidence that this abuse is indeed occurring. If it is occurring I suggest it is on the part of a small segment of the population.

I am in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) that this bill be delayed for a period of six months.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Darling: Yes.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member made such an excellent speech advocating restraint in the expansion of costs of the medicare program I could not believe it when he came to the end and asked that the matter be put over for six months, particularly since the measures of restraint he referred to are well within the responsibility of the provinces, and the user charge is entirely a provincial matter, so what—

An hon. Member: That is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Kaplan: Having advocated restraint as strongly as he did, what is the hon. member seeking? Is he saying the 13.5 per cent, which is the government limit, is too large or too small? He is asking for some restraint and I would like some indication of just what he thinks the restraint should be. What is wrong with the 13.5 per cent?

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that we are looking for restraint, but there are certain cases and certain fields where there should not be restraint, and this is a particular case where the government has taken a certain decision against the wishes of every province. This was a deal that the provinces were urged to get into in the first place. Now because it is costing a little more, as a great many other things, the federal government is saying: O.K. sink or swim yourself without our help.

There is another point. Although I am not sure of the percentages I can speak with some authority having been a member of municipal government and head of a small municipal council for about 26 years. A very small part of the taxpayer's dollar, I think about 10 cents, went to the municipal government which had to spread it as thinly as possible. They spent it a lot more wisely than higher levels of government. The provincial government receives a little larger share, but the lion's share of the tax dollar, about 65 cents or 70 cents, is in the coffers of the federal government, and since it has the most it should be able to return the most. Public servants do not have to live in these great palaces that are being built across the river in Hull. It is more important to spend the money on hospital beds to look after the health of the people.

Mr. Kaplan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a further question—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) who has the floor, but I do not think the parliamentary secretary to the minister should have an opportunity to make a speech by way of asking a question. If he wants to make a speech he should enter the debate and I will be delighted to hear him, but not in this way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I too hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan) will rise in his seat and explain this regressive and backward piece of legislation and the rationale behind it, because we on this side of the House do not accept the arguments the minister has put forward. Bill C-68 to amend the Medical Care Act and to amend the formula of payment by the federal government to the provinces is one of those backward steps this government seems to take. The government is reneging on an agreement and on a responsibility to pay half the cost of medical care in this country.

If this bill should pass it would mean that ordinary Canadians will suffer in terms of the kind of medical care to which they are accustomed, and which we hope to improve. They will also suffer because of higher taxes and deterrent fees which will be the inevitable result of this welshing by the federal government on its commitment to the provinces.

Under the formula proposed in this bill the federal government will limit its contributions to the provinces on a declining percentage formula. In the year 1976-77 the maximum contribution will be allowed to increase only by 13½ per cent. In the year 1977-78 it will be allowed to increase by 12 per cent, and in the year 1978-79 and thereafter it will be allowed to increase by 10 per cent or less. The reason the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) gives the House is that health costs are escalating too much too fast, and therefore he has launched an attack against the provinces by saying the federal government will not match the inflationary increase in health care costs but will saddle the provinces with that responsibility, knowing full well that the provinces are limited in terms of their tax revenue.

The federal government has wider options. It can afford to continue paying half the cost of medical care, while the provinces today--and this is evident in respect of any province, and especially my province of Ontario—are feeling the pinch. If this legislation should pass we will see more hospitals closed down in this province, and not just the ten that the present Ontario minister of health has closed. We will see multiplication of that kind of indiscriminate closure in this province and in every other province throughout the country. That is a backward step.

The people of Canada can be proud of the health care system we have built, a system I need not remind hon. members that was first introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), when he was Premier of Saskatchewan heading the CCF and NDP governments. I think this bill really is indicative of the kind of commitment we have to medicare by the Liberal government. This is a commitment it reluctantly accepted. Medicare was promised by the Liberals back in 1919, but we did not get full medicare in this country on a nation wide basis until the 1960's. In light of that delay and the bill we have before us today, I do not think the Liberals are really too committed to the principle of universal free medical care.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

The Liberals are committed to the dollar sign rather than health care. They try to construct the argument that because we are in an inflationary period—and much of that inflation rests with the government of course—the dollar will take precedence over health care. I say that is a backward attitude. There are other ways to cut health-care costs than to cut back arbitrarily in the funding to the provinces.

Mr. Kaplan: What are they?

Mr. Symes: If the parliamentary secretary will wait I will enumerate them one by one. I hope that after I have finished he will rise in his place either to support or rebut the arguments I make. Let us first look at the components of increasing health costs one by one and then examine whether there is anything we can do to keep them in line. The most obvious reason for the increasing health cost is that more people in this country are using health services. Surely that is a fundamental objective of the program as currently designed, that is, to make the services available to people so that they will go to their doctor when they have early symptoms of illness rather than, as in the past, before we had the universal plan, hold off going to a doctor until the illness has become so complicated that they end up in hospital undergoing very expensive treatment.

If more people use the health services more people will be treated, and thus more people will be in a healthy condition rather than suffering from complicated illnesses. That is an important point to remember. We should not try to hide our heads in the sand. If we are to have a universal scheme obviously people will make use of it. That is the whole point of a universal medical scheme. The practice of going to doctors should not be limited to the wealthy. It should be available to all Canadians.

There is a second component of course to the increasing health cost. That is the wages paid to the hospital staff. Obviously the people who work in hospitals—and I am thinking of nurses, nurses aides, the technicians in the laboratory, the cooks, the cleaners and everyone else—are performing a vital job. They are facing the ravages of inflation as everyone else is, and they have quite legitimately asked for salary increases and in certain cases received at least a percentage of what they were seeking.

I remember examples that were quoted in my province of Ontario of a dog catcher or a zoo keeper who was making more than an hospital attendant. When you compare the services that those people were rendering, that was certainly a shameful state of affairs, and we have not as yet really acknowledged through the kind of salaries we provide to hospital staff the vital service that they give to patients. Therefore I do not think we can be niggardly and parsimonious when it comes to providing adequate wages for people who provide such vital services. That is something we will have to accept.

Likewise, a third component of rising health costs are doctor's salaries. In my province of Ontario in 1975 the average general practitioner was earning $58,000. The salary for the average ear, nose and throat doctor was $71,900, and the average salary of the orthopedic surgeon was $63,000 a year.

As we heard earlier, doctors in Ontario are asking for an eight per cent wage increase. They are making the argument, as is any other working person in Canada, that they face rising costs and want a salary increase. I was very interested to hear a judgment rendered by the Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, Mr. Pepin, that doctors will be able to exceed the wage guidelines as set out in the federal anti-inflation program. An eight per cent increase on the salaries I have mentioned certainly will be in excess, for most doctors, of the $2,400 a year maximum increase that professionals are allowed under the anti-inflation guidelines.

When Mr. Pepin was in Manitoba he stated to doctors there that the $2,400 maximum would only be an average, that it would be averaged out among all doctors in the province. Therefore there can be doctors who will get a salary increase in excess of the $2,400. I think that when we compare that eight per cent increase on a salary of $71,000, one has to admit there is quite a difference between the 10 per cent maximum salary that a nurse's aide or a cook will get in any hospital and the increase that a doctor would get.

The other factor that causes rising health costs is rising laboratory costs. In Ontario alone in 1975 it cost $60 million under the Ontario Hospital Insurance Plan to pay for laboratory costs. Much of this increased cost, I believe is due to overservicing, and there are indications that in some of the private laboratories in the province there has been phoney billing taking place and even some kickbacks among the 282 private medical laboratories. The provincial government is in the process of conducting an investigation of the charge that some doctors in the province have ownership interests in private laboratories, are referring patients to them and having unnecessary diagnosis taking place in order to enhance their personal income. We hope to see the results of that provincial investigation very soon to make sure that that is not going on and, if it is, that it will be rectified.

The fifth reason for rising health costs is the fact that throughout Canada we are keeping too many chronic care patients in regular active treatment hospitals because of the lack of extended care units for these people.

I did some research and I found that it costs as much as $200 a day to keep a chronic care patient in an active treatment hospital. If we were to provide more extended care units, that cost could be reduced to $42 or $52 a day. We can realize what tremendous savings this would provide to our national medicare plan.

The federal government seeks to handle these factors contributing to rising health costs by forcing the provinces to carry the heavier burden of these costs. What will be the result? First of all it seems inevitable if this bill passes that the provincial governments will have to cut back on services. They just will not be able to maintain the present level of health care services, or even expand to meet growing population needs. We can see this beginning under an austerity program in the province of Ontario with the closing down of hospitals and, as I said earlier, if this bill passes we will see hospital closures and cut back of services carried out throughout the country.

Another possible result if this bill passes is that the provinces will have to raise their taxes in order to finance the existing medicare schemes. We would have an increase in the sales tax, although this is one of the most regressive kinds of taxes there is because it hits the rich and poor within the same amount. The tax in Ontario is already 7 per cent. I cannot see the general population being able to afford an increase beyond that. We could have another kind of tax, a per capita medical tax on every family in the province. That is another way that the province would gain revenue to meet rising costs. Again that is a very discriminatory kind of tax because it would be levied on high and low income people most likely at the same rate.

The third result of this program could be for the provinces to impose deterrent fees. This means that every time a patient visits a doctor or has an X-ray, he or she will be charged a fee for that service. It could be $5 a visit, or $10 a visit, or $50 a day for having a hospital bed. If that takes place, what we are doing is taxing the sick, the ill, and the infirm. That kind of principle of a deterrent fee seems to me fundamentally contrary to the principle of universal free medical care, and again we would be going backward in our health care in this country if we impose a deterrent fee.

Let us not forget that deterrent fees discriminate against low income people and they will not deter the wealthy hypochondriac from visiting the doctor. But it will be a real discouraging factor for the poor. Let us remember that in Canada today there are over 5 million people living in poverty. In 1972, the last year for which we have statistics, 20 per cent of the families in this country were living on incomes of less than $5,500 a year. I ask you, how can those families afford deterrent fees? Those are the families that are most likely to have illness and other ailments among their children because of the poor living conditions in which they find themselves. That will be the effect of deterrent fees. It will hit those in the low income areas the hardest and it will not deter the more wealthy from going to a doctor. Besides, many studies have shown that deterrent fees really are not very effective, and that the rate of abuse of our health scheme is very minor indeed.

Another option open to the provinces if this bill passes is to reduce doctors' salaries. This might be especially in the maritimes. However, if that is done, what would happen is that there would be a temptation on the part of those doctors to move out of those provinces to other provinces where doctors' salaries have not been reduced. Again that would destroy another primary concept of the plan, to provide equality of health services from coast to coast in Canada.

A fifth course the provinces might take if this bill passes would be to increase premiums for medicare. There are some provinces—and I am happy to say provinces where New Democratic governments are in power—which do not have hospital premiums. That is, individual people do not pay a set fee each year for the privilege of medicare. That kind of revenue is raised through the general income tax system, which is a much fairer way of levying fees, because if there is a set fee for every person, of course low income people are hit harder than high income people. When the provincial income tax scheme is used it involves a sliding scale, and it is much fairer. However, for provinces such as Ontario which have premiums, the provincial governments may be tempted to increase the premiums. Again that would discriminate against low income earners.

Those are some of the possible repercussions if the bill passes. I suggest that we do not have to pass the bill and that there are other ways of cutting costs. There are alternatives to the method proposed in this bill. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan) is quite anxious to find out what other ways we can go about cutting costs.

I refer the parliamentary secretary and his minister to a publication of their own department. It is entitled "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians". In that study there are some very important recommendations with regard to improving health standards across Canada, and in the long run to make it less expensive. The key theme of that report is to emphasize and to promote preventive medicine. Here is where the federal government could provide leadership and, in co-operation with the provinces, design plans to promote preventive medicine, which would go a long way down the road to reducing the cost.

I ask, in light of that report, where is the leadership of the government in this field? It is sadly lacking, and I think immediately of the regulations of the federal and provincial ministers of environment. Government standards at both levels are very lax.

Where is the leadership of the government in preventing mercury poisoning, which is taking place among the Indian people of Grassy Lake Narrows in northern Ontario? The mercury poisoning is coming from a pulp and paper mill which has been allowed to poison the waters and the fish which the people of that reserve depend on for their livelihood.

Where is federal and provincial government leadership in Ontario and Quebec in preventing asbestosis, where miners for generations have faced this health hazard, faced early death and forced their families on to welfare because of the lack of compensatory programs? Where is the leadership of the federal and provincial governments for miners in uranium mines such as the one in a community near mine, Elliot Lake, where it has been demonstrated that because of poor environmental regulations miners are suffering from silicosis?

Where have regulations with regard to clean air been for the coke oven workers in the Algoma Steel Corporation in my community, Sault Ste. Marie, where workers have met early death because governments have failed to force companies to provide proper environmental working conditions? Governments in those areas have let companies get away with poisoning workers. Constantly they have been given reprieves and delays with regard to cleaning up the air and water. I think that is a very sad indictment of the government and of how serious it is about providing preventive medicine in terms of promoting adequate environmental standards.

There should also be some leadership from the government and from provincial governments in promoting preventive medicine, and I think immediately of denticare programs to help children at early ages. This would be a saving in the long run in adult life. We could have proper courses in nutrition in schools, and much more information should be made available to parents as well.

Previously I have talked about long term preventive medicine, but in the immediate term we could set up local community service centres to provide social and health services at a much lower cost than at our general hospitals. I note that the province of Quebec has used this system quite widely and has promoted these facilities, which are much less expensive than the facilities provided at hospitals. Indeed in my own community of Sault Ste. Marie the steelworkers there, with other interested citizens, have set up a group health centre which provides excellent service to the people of Sault Ste. Marie at a reduced cost. This kind of health care community clinic could be expanded throughout the country and would go a long way toward cutting costs.

One of the main things which could and should be done—it may require an initial outlay in cost but will certainly result in savings in a few years—would be to set up out-patient clinics, chronic care units and nursing homes to get patients out of very expensive hospital beds. I mentioned earlier that the cost of keeping chronic patients is $200 per day in a regular hospital. That cost could be brought down to about $52 per day in a chronic care unit.

For example, the administrator at St. Luke's Hospital in Montreal pointed out recently that 105 of the 704 beds in that hospital are taken up by the chronically ill, who wait on the average five months before they are transferred out of that hospital. At the same time the waiting list of people to get into that hospital averages about 3,000. If we had the kind of out-patient facilities throughout Canada I have been speaking about, we would go a long way toward reducing health care costs.

Another thing we could be doing is making better use of paramedics. There are many examples of where doctors can delegate some of their responsibilities to paramedics. These people can be trained at less cost than doctors, paid less than doctors, and can do much of the work, so that our high salaried doctors do not have to perform it. I think these are some concrete examples and propositions which would prove very effective in reducing health care costs. These would be much more effective and equitable than the measures proposed in Bill C-68. What is at stake really is the continuation of a fine health care system throughout Canada.

I say this bill is a backward step. It is going to weaken, if not destroy in the long run, a principle which was fought for, for so long and so hard by members of my party and by many other concerned Canadians. I think all Canadians must register their protests to the government so that it cannot back out of its commitment to provide half the cost of medicare. That was a solemn commitment made to the provinces. If we are going to maintain a healthy federalism the government cannot back down from that promise. If we are going to try to promote equality of service throughout Canada we must have a national medicare scheme. It is important that this bill not be passed because that would be the first step in the ultimate reduction of health standards and health care across the country.

For these reasons I cannot support the bill, Mr. Speaker. I hope the government will seriously consider some of the alternative proposals that I have made to reduce health care costs while at the same time maintaining our high standards.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) it is my intention to dwell on only a couple of the aspects of this measure. They are aspects which have been underlined by those who have preceded me who spoke of their failure to understand the attitude of the government in bringing forward legislation of this sort at this particular time.

Others who preceded me in the debate, particularly the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), have gone over the history of this medical "come on". They spoke of how a universal medicare plan was thrust upon the provinces in 1968 by a federal government without any thought of permitting the provinces to determine how it was to be applied or to determine any of its principal characteristics.

In 1968 the provinces were offered the scheme on a take or leave it basis. Since the services, generally speaking, were needed, and since generally speaking the Canadian people felt they should have a general health care service across the country, and since the cost support base then proposed was very attractive, the whole scheme was accepted—on trust. I say on trust, Mr. Speaker, in the belief, presumably, that that trust would be lasting; that the trust in the Pearson government which made the proposal would endure in a successor government of the same ilk. How the provinces have been let down! That belief has been dashed. Now we have a successor government repudiating, reneging on an agreement made not ten years ago, only eight years ago, with the provincial governments.

For 20 years hospital care has been provided under an agreed 50-50 formula; for eight years medicare has also been supplied under a similar formula. They are universal schemes: no means test is needed; all treatments and semi-private facilities are totally covered.

As the minister rightly said in his opening statement, as a result of the Conservative inspired plan of 1958 for hospitalization, and the 1968 scheme taken on trust, developed by the Pearson government and foisted on the provinces, with ample dollops of financial icing as inducements to join, the net result is, by and large, that Canada has a good hospital care and medicare system, perhaps one of the best in the world.

Is the minister suggesting, through the introduction of the present bill, that all the infrastructure is in place and therefore the financial inducements, the financial sharing arrangements may be withdrawn? Is that what lies behind this motion? If it is, such an assumption is entirely wrong—it is wrong—wrong. What was once a medicare "come on" has become a medicare "cop out". On the strength of that cop out I should like to cop out too, and call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, would the amiable Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) be able to advise the House what the business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I just knew the question was going to be asked. Tomorrow we are going to deal with Bill C-68, the same order of business as we are dealing with now. May I also take this opportunity to advise hon. members that there has been agreement that during private members' hour tomorrow we will deal with Bill C-264.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REASON FOR DELAY IN STARTING SEARCH FOR MISSING FISHERMEN—POSSIBLE REASSESSMENT OF SEARCH AND RESCUE CAPABILITY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, on February 24, as reported at page 11191 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) with respect to the air-sea rescue attempt to locate the missing fishing vessel San Juan which had been reported missing the previous Sunday.

What concerned me and prompted my question was the fact that the San Juan was officially reported missing at 7.50 p.m. on Sunday and it was not until 11.15 p.m. that night that the Canadian coastguard ship Bartlett in St. John's harbour responded to an all-ships alarm and commenced the search. Furthermore, it was not until noon of the following day, Monday, that search aircraft were dispatched from Halifax or Summerside, Prince Edward Island, to the scene which was 500 miles to the east.

I wanted the minister to tell the House, and particularly the people in my province, why it took so long to get this search under way. The minister's reply indicated that either he inadvertently misled the House or he had been misled. The information he gave to the House was not in accordance with the information that had been released by the air-sea rescue service in Halifax. Further, the information which came from the air-sea rescue centre in Halifax was at variance with information given by eye witnesses of this most tragic mishap.

This is the third fishing vessel to be lost off the east coast of Newfoundland since the beginning of this year, six people now having lost their lives. This dramatically and tragically emphasizes how inadequate is our air-sea rescue capability on Canada's east coast.

In Newfoundland, especially eastern Newfoundland, we depend on facilities 500 miles to the west, in Halifax and Summerside, Prince Edward Island. Our distance from these facilities means that there is a serious and critical time lag in getting a search and rescue operation under way. This is not the first time that this matter has been raised.

In Newfoundland today there is indignation, and rightly so. We are a sea-going province, and a sea-going people. We do not take lightly these accidents at sea. We feel that if adequate search and rescue facilities were available, we could prevent in many instances tragic loss of life.

Today I asked for unanimous consent, under Standing Order 43, to propose a motion calling on the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to order a judicial inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the foundering of the fishing boat San Juan and the activities of the Canadian Coast Guard Ship Bartlett in relation thereto. After that unsuccessful attempt to raise the matter by way of Standing Order 43, a telegram was sent to the federal Minister of Transport by the minister of justice and the attorney general of Newfoundland asking for a judicial inquiry into this latest mishap, and asking for the terms of reference of the inquiry to include the other two mishaps which resulted in loss of life earlier this year. The inquiry was to go back to the first of this year.

A judicial inquiry was ordered in response to the foundering of the Canadian National Railways steamship Patrick Morris, which was involved in the search for the motor vessel Enterprise, which had sunk in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or the Cabot Strait. I should like, in my limited time, to put on record some of the recommendations emanating from the 1971 judicial inquiry. The accident took place in 1970.

In his report, Judge Soper of the district court said:

> The area served by the search and rescue forces appears to be large when considered from the point of view of distance from Summerside, Prince Edward Island.

The report went on to say:

> It is therefore recommended that the hon. Minister of Transport through his appropriate colleagues in the Government of Canada
> (a) seek a better dispersal of search and rescue aircraft and personnel on the Atlantic coast, with no dimunition of services that will be available, so that aircraft may reach distress areas more quickly;
> (b) cause a detailed review to be made of the procedures followed so that in future search and rescue aircraft will be ordered into action earlier than they were when the Enterprise was reported lost; and
> (c) request an increase in the number of personnel that will be available in shifts at search and rescue stations so that the reaction time may be reduced to a minimum on a twenty-four hours a day basis.

These recommendations were submitted to the Minister of Transport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I just finish my remarks briefly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to set the record straight about the efforts of the search and rescue people in this latest incident involving, as the hon. member says, a tragic loss of lives.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Earlier this week, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) undertook to examine the facts presented to him by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) in connection with the search for the vessel San Juan. As a result of this undertaking I have a report taken from the log entry of the rescue co-ordinating centre at Halifax which outlines the events as they happened during the period in which the San Juan was in distress.

The rescue co-ordinating centre received a call from the RCMP at 7.20 p.m. on February 22 to say that the San Juan was in difficulty. Twenty-one minutes later, at 7.41 p.m., the RCC issued an all-ships alert, and four minutes after that the Canadian coastguard ship Bartlett was tasked for the search and rescue mission.

The weather at that time precluded an air search. The Bartlett located the San Juan at 0400 hours on February 23 and passed a message to the rescue centres that the vessel was in no immediate danger, that sea conditions were unfavourable to passing a tow line, and that the Bartlett would stand by awaiting daylight. Shortly after that message was sent, at about 5 a.m., the Bartlett lost radio contact with the San Juan, the vessel's lights went out and it disappeared. At daybreak the Bartlett was joined by the motor vessels Sea Transport and Arctic Explorer in a search for the San Juan.

A Tracker aircraft was tasked to assist but it could not get airborne because of the weather. The weather moderated during the afternoon and the Tracker joined the search and rescue at about 4 p.m. About 6.30 p.m. the MV Sea Transport sighted some wreckage and the Bartlett proceeded to investigate. Shortly after, the Arctic Explorer sighted and recovered some debris believed to be from the San Juan. The ships and the aircraft continued to search throught the night and around ten o'clock the next morning, February 24, the Tracker aircraft found the San Juan partly submerged with no sign of survivors.

From this account it would appear that the rescue co-ordinating centre followed proper procedures in its attempt to rescue the San Juan. The weather delayed the initiation of the air search, but three vessels were actively searching the area. I would remind the hon. member that during the night and early morning of February 22-23 the rescue vessels were contending with waves up to 40 feet which made the rescue a near impossible task.

I wish to say to the hon. member for St. John's East that my minister did not, and would not, mislead the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his time has expired.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—LIAISON WITH MANPOWER IN REPORTING JOB OPPORTUNITIES IN COMPANIES FUNDED BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is a condition precedent in the Regional Development Incentives Act that all companies which are to receive an incentive grant must report all the openings to Canada Manpower before receiving any money. Section 13(1) of the act states:

> It is a condition precedent to the payment of any amount on account of development incentive that the applicant keep the Department of Manpower and Immigration . . . informed of the manpower vacancies of the applicant in the designated region in which the facility for the establishment expansion or modernization of which the development incentive was authorized is, or is to be, situated . . .

The regulations clearly state the necessity of reporting vacancies and openings to Manpower.

According to the response to order paper questions 3884, 3885, 3886 and 3887 addressed to Canada Manpower, 94 companies, representative of all the designated regions of Canada, announced in the press releases of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as accepting incentive offers some time between October and December of 1975, are shown to have reported to Canada Manpower 508 vacancies.

DREE press releases indicated these same 94 companies created 2,129 jobs, or four times the number of jobs reported to Canada Manpower. Canada Manpower in the same order paper returns shows that 354 positions were filled. This is only one seventh of the total number of "jobs created" announced by DREE. The report of job openings to Manpower is a statutory requirement that must be met before one cent of DREE money is advanced. The number of jobs to be created is an important factor in determining not only how much money DREE will grant a recipient but whether or not DREE will make any grant.

The large discrepancy between DREE figures and Manpower records is very serious indeed. What is the explanation? Is there any on-going liaison between DREE and Manpower regarding enforcement of the Regional Development Incentives Act for the reporting of job opportunities by DREE funded companies? That is the question I asked the minister. Perhaps now that he is informed of the facts he will not be so proud of his answer. He said "obviously consultations are held between both departments concerned". I do not think it is so obvious. "Generally speaking," he said, "one can say that there is a close co-operation between both departments and the possible employers".

I do not know what they consult about or what they co-operate about, but I do know that DREE should be monitoring the job orders placed with Manpower by companies it funds, to be certain beyond doubt that DREE grants create jobs for people in the economically depressed regions intended.

I want to know why DREE and Manpower are so far apart in their figures when the act clearly states that, as a condition precedent to the payment of any amount on account of a development incentive, the DREE applicant not only should inform Manpower of the manpower vacancies but keep Manpower informed.

The amount of $12,342,909 of DREE grants is involved. How does DREE announce the creation of 2,129 jobs while Manpower has reports of one quarter of those positions and employs only one seventh of them? The returns and releases I cited show that some of the companies in particular were sadly deficient. Didier Refractives Corporation of Beaucancour, Quebec, were to hire 294 people, reported none and hired none through Manpower. Mac Don Industries Limited of Winnipeg, Manitoba, were to hire 276 people, reported 47 and actually hired 38 through Manpower. Targetair Limited of Moncton, New Brunswick, were to hire 32, reported none and hired none through Manpower. Avalon PreCast Concrete Limited of Carbonear, Newfoundland, were to hire 25 people, reported none and hired none through Manpower. Volcano Ltée of Saint Hyacinthe, Quebec were to create 88 jobs; reported eight and hired one through Manpower. The Mikron Group Electronics Limited of Burlington, Ontario, were to create 14 jobs; reported no positions open to Manpower and hired none through Manpower.

The list goes on and on; it is part of the records of the House. Out of all 94 companies only one followed the intent of the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Carter Electronics Limited of Winnipeg, Manitoba, had 13 job openings, reported 13 to manpower and hired 13 through manpower. What a record—one out of 94!

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) raises a very valid question concerning consultation arrangements between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. To begin with, there is not necessarily any direct correlation between the figures the hon. member used in his argument.

The fact that a company accepts an offer and is going to provide a certain number of jobs does not mean that will happen the next day or the next week, as the hon. member is well aware in view of the type of question he has been asking. It could well be sometime later before these particular jobs are made available, so he cannot base it merely on the date of acceptance.

Certainly the evaluation of every project submitted for consideration under the act is done by an incentive officer who is required to ensure that the applicant is co-operating with the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration. When an offer of a development incentive from the department is accepted the applicant, being the company involved, undertakes to comply with the terms and conditions of the legislation.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Under the act he should be required to do that before it is accepted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member cannot rise on a point of order at this time.

Mr. McIsaac: The applicant undertakes to comply with the particular Section 13, a part of which the hon. member has read. So it is up to the applicant, the company, the individual or the firm accepting the offer to live up to the terms of these regulations. It is also important to be aware that when each payment toward the incentive is made, the applicant is reminded again that he must continue to comply with these particular regulations.

As the hon. member is also well aware, I am sure, the department of manpower officials sit on an advisory committee associated with DREE in reviewing all of the major projects, and it certainly has been the experience of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, at least, that these firms do determine the availability and suitability of local manpower, and contact the local Manpower centres for this particular purpose. Certainly it is obvious also that they may not always have available at the Manpower centres men with the necessary skills.

It is very much a requirement of the act, and it is certainly my understanding, that the Department of Manpower and Immigration also has its own arrangements for initiating contact with these particular entrepreneurs. If there are certain specific cases, such as those mentioned by the hon. member during this particular debate, I think they bear some further investigation and I am prepared to undertake that for him.

TRANSPORT—POSSIBLE DISCUSSIONS ON USE OF "MANHATTAN" TO MOVE OIL THROUGH NORTHERN WATERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, after 11,146 pages of bombast and balderdash contained in the House of Commons Debates this session, on February 23 I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) if he could give me any indication whether he or his officials had any conversations with Panarctic in respect of the removal of oil from the northern slopes of this continent. The minister said he had no such direct conversations but would check to see whether any had been held by any official of his department. I accept that and I am very pleased to see the parliamentary secretary here this evening. I hope he can elaborate on some of those discussions which may or may not be going on.

I raise this question because the minister has given an indication that every effort is being placed by the government on the use of Canadian knowledge, technology, and expertise in any activity in the north. Those are my words and I am not putting them in the minister's mouth. I am sure he agrees with the intent of those words in respect of the removal of extractive resources from the north.

In connection with Panarctic, I raised the question the other day as well because it has now been about three months, to my certain knowledge, that Panarctic officials, indeed, Mr. Heatherington and others, met with agents of Canada Steamship Lines, Camet, which is a Canadian marine architectural firm, and J. J. Henry, a firm of U.S. architects, respecting the conversion of the Manhattan for Arctic crude oil carriage.

The scheme under discussion is to have the consortium of Canada Steamship Lines, Hall Corporation, Branch Lines and Fedcom jointly lease the Manhattan and undertake the conversion, leasing it in turn to Panarctic. I am in favour of this and would argue strongly for it. I recognize Panarctic's absolute need to get oil flowing now that they have wells, and to get a cash return on their investment in the north. Indeed as a 45 per cent shareholder, the Canadian government and the Canadian people I am sure also would like to see a return.

The Manhattan is probably the first vessel we can lay our hands on that has a demonstrated capacity in the Arctic, with limitations. I think it is a good idea to push on with that. The timetable I believe for Panarctic to complete its work in the north probably is three or four years. We have the situation where the Saint John Drydock Company in Saint John, New Brunswick, has demonstrated the capacity to handle a ship in its yard up to 250,000 tons.

[Mr. McIsaac.]

Tonight I should like to know whether any discussions have taken place between Panarctic and the departmental officials on the question of conversion. For the record may I say that the Manhattan was converted originally, I believe, at an estimated cost of $40 million, which in fact included not only conversion but also deconversion which was never carried out, because when it ceased to do some work it went to other carriage. I think the total cost of the program was about $56 million. It was never deconverted and the work to reconvert it for Arctic purposes could be done fairly easily and quickly, and well within the schedule of the Saint John drydock.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to respond first of all in respect of whether or not the Manhattan is an acceptable concept to the government, and second whether or not the consortium of Canadian companies interested in looking closely at this matter could be persuaded by a 45 per cent shareholder, the Government of Canada, to do this conversion because we have the expertise and the knowledge. Indeed anything the parliamentary secretary can tell me in respect of my beloved Arctic and the use of Canadian flag vessels to remove our extractive resources is to be recommended.

I shall not continue any further. The parameters and the pieces fit into the puzzle. The work can be done in Canada. The Manhattan is acceptable to me for the time being. I just do not want to see any more after this, but if we can do the work in Canada and can get the Manhattan up there and get our Arctic crude down, then the Canadian taxpayer might see a return on his money which could be used to build Canadian ships to remove extractive resources from other areas of Canada.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to respond to the concerns of my hon. friend this evening.

The last time he and I had an occasion to discuss the matter of Arctic shipping and extractive resources was at the same point in our proceedings one evening just prior to Christmas, when we were on the eve of second reading debate in this House on a very significant piece of legislation, Bill C-61, the Maritime Code Act, in which I know he is very interested. It is a bit of a coincidence that we are back again discussing a similar topic during the course of the same week in which we have seen that piece of legislation, Bill C-61, come to a final conclusion, in the committee stage at least, and have seen it reported back to the House of Commons. So I am pleased to have an opportunity to discuss this matter with him. I hope I might be able to shed some light on the concerns he has raised.

Panarctic discovered oil at Cameron Island, which is north of Bathurst Island in the Arctic Archipelago, and I understand that drilling is continuing to determine whether there is oil in commercial quantities. In the event that there should be oil in commercial quantities in the far northern region, preliminary consideration is being given to various means of transporting it south. Among the options already considered is a pipeline system, the use of ice strengthened tankers, or a combination of these two systems.

As members may know, the regulations under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act divide our Arctic waters into various zones, depending on the ice coverage. Cameron Island is in zone one, which means that there is maximal ice coverage, that is to say, a very short season of open water or none at all in the summer. The only tankers which could be considered for use to and from Cameron Island on a regular basis would be Arctic class ten, that is to say, vessels capable of maintaining continuous momentum in ice of up to ten feet thick. By comparison, an Arctic class six vessel could only operate there for one month a year, August 15 to September 15.

Another alternative which has been considered is the transportation of the oil by pipeline to a port on the south of Bathurst Island, which is in zone six. Zone six could be serviced by Arctic class seven tankers on a regular basis. Some consideration has also been given to the possible use of tankers which are simply ice strengthened as part of this system.

I would emphasize that until such time as it is determined that there is oil in commercial quantities at Cameron Island the consideration of transportation options, whether completely by pipeline, by ice class tankers, or by a combination of these two systems, is still at a very preliminary stage. The Canadian shipping industry is, however, very actively looking into the various options and is keeping officials of the Ministry of Transport abreast of its discussions with Panarctic and the other oil companies. I might add that the Canadian coastguard for some time has been proceeding with development of detailed designs for polar ice breakers in the event that these should be required.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTION OLYMPIC LOTTERY PROCEDURE BE ALTERED TO AGREE WITH ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of false and misleading advertising regarding the Olympic lottery program in that unsold tickets have in fact been picked as winners, thus reducing the chances of those individuals who saw fit to support the Olympic program by purchasing their tickets under false impressions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs be instructed to take steps to have the Olympic lottery program altered in accordance with its advertising campaign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion being pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PREVENT TAX EVASION BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of statements by officials of National Revenue and by the former minister, Mr. Basford, to the effect that under existing tax laws multinational corporations operating in Canada are able to divert funds to subsidiaries outside of Canada, thus escaping paying hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes, and in view of the announcement by Revenue Canada that it has shelved plans to close these loopholes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House condemn the government for its shortsighted approach to government finance as demonstrated by its refusal to close tax loopholes which cost the Crown hundreds of millions of dollars in foregone revenue and, further, that this House instruct the government to undertake immediately whatever studies and monitoring programs are necessary to end this circumvention of the law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF MAKING GREATER USE OF INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVE GRANTS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion devised any new initiatives, such as greater use of loan guarantees, to get more mileage out of industrial incentive grants now that his budget for industrial incentives is frozen at less than the Department of Agriculture spends on research?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the aid formula reflected in loan guarantees or industrial incentive grants is one of the rather interesting formulas the department is applying, however, not as regularly and frequently as it should perhaps do. Surely the hon. member's suggestion to consider this proposition as a way to increase our incentives and our aid could be examined and probably applied more generously.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED PROGRAM OF EXPANSION TO FIGHT INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the Napoleonic retreat last night of the Minister of Finance from the silly and unworkable export tax on resource industries, would the Prime Minister now give an answer to my proposal of December 19 last which I will repeat for him:

> ... would the Prime Minister give serious consideration over the next three or four weeks to re-examining the whole course that the government is taking because I believe it is heading us toward a recession, and would he turn the whole program of the government around into one of expansion so as to give the government time to get at the basic cause of inflation, which this program is not doing?

Could I have an answer to that question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer in terms of the reference in the preamble to the question. The hon. member surely is aware that one of Napoleon's most spectacular retreats, one of several days, ended in the greatest of his victories at Austerlitz and this is the way—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I could remind the Prime Minister that following that victory at Austerlitz there was also the defeat at Waterloo.

Mr. Trudeau: Because he attacked.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister did not see fit to answer the serious proposal I made to him on December 19 about the direction in which he is taking this country, I should like to ask him another question. In view of the fact that current economic indicators show that the recovery of Canada from the recession of 1974 was checked in the last quarter of 1975 by the application of the traditional prescriptions of the mandarins of the civil service, which have been wrong consistently over the last 30 years, would the Prime Minister himself read Chapter 20 of the Porter Royal Commission, particularly the second last paragraph which reads:

> The full growth potential of the economy will only be realized if appropriate monetary and fiscal policies are combined with measures to develop the economy's skills and levels of education, to encourage saving, investment and risk-taking, and to ensure that production is organized efficiently.

Would the Prime Minister commit himself to reading this chapter 20 of the Porter Royal Commission report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

[Mr. Howie.]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—RECONCILIATION OF EIGHTEEN-MONTH AGREEEMENT WITH PROVINCES WITH THREE-YEAR PERIOD FOR PROGRAM

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question also is addressed to the Prime Minister. Since he seems determined to head either for Austerlitz or Waterloo, I should like to give him an opportunity to explain to this House how he has managed to reconcile agreement on an 18-month basis, as adopted by the four provincial governments with which some sort of understanding has been reached, with the three-year duration of the anti-inflation program under federal law? Does this mean that the program can last for no more than 18 months or is there some secret renewal agreement proviso included in the present agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no secret renewal agreement. It seems to me this question is in essence almost as unreasonable as the preceding one. It shows a lack of understanding of the approach of the government to this whole matter. We think three years is the appropriate time. That is why it is written into the law. The provinces in many cases just wanted to sign for 18 months. Surely it was proper for us to say: "Okay, sign for 18 months. There is an effective provision for a re-debate of the question in the House of Commons. We believe you will have to sign for another 18 months, but we will cross that bridge when we come to it." The important thing is to make the program work now, to have the co-operation of the provinces, and this is what is happening in both cases.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—DATE OF SIGNING AND DURATION OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is further to this whole debate. Can the Prime Minister say whether he anticipates early settlements with the other six provinces on either a three-year term or on an 18-month basis and can he feel even reasonably certain that the program will really get under way and be effective even if the remaining six do not sign? What about the 100 per cent rate hikes by the British Columbia car insurance corporation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that the federal government was enjoined by the provinces at two interprovincial meetings of premiers in a row, last year and the year before, to do something very energetic, to take leadership in fighting inflation, and so on, and they indicated that they would co-operate. We took the decision in the month of October last. The provinces and the federal government have been putting together these agreements. Three or so have been signed, and several others will be signed in an interim form. It is possible that we will have difficulties with one or two signatures—they might take more than a few days to get, but the program is in place; it is working; it is the federal law and it is compelling on the Canadian people.

We hope the provinces will co-operate with us in every way, as they have indicated their intention of doing and as the premiers indicated their intention of doing at the meeting at my house at 24 Sussex on October 13. They are taking some time to get around to signing some of the agreements, but the important thing is that the program is in place, the Anti-Inflation Board is operating, and inflation is being tackled in a most serious way.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—SAFEGUARDS FOR SPENT FUEL FROM CANDU REACTOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the House yesterday with reference to negotiations that are going on between Canada and Pakistan concerning nuclear safeguards, the minister said:

> What is of concern to Canada . . . is the spent fuel that comes out of the Canadian reactor and that may subsequently be reprocessed in the facility provided by France.

I should like to ask the minister now whether he will assure the House that no further shipments of uranium from Canada to Pakistan will take place unless Pakistan accepts the point that Canadian safeguards apply not merely to the CANDU reactor provided by Canada but also to the use of spent fuel from the Canadian reactor now in Pakistan.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations between the Canadian team and the Pakistani team are still underway. I had a detailed report this morning about the progress that has been made, and of course one of the items still under negotiations is the very point that the hon. member has raised this morning and to which I referred yesterday. The hon. member is suggesting that Canada withhold its supplies of uranium or fuel to Pakistan in order—

Mr. Broadbent: Unless you get that guarantee.

Mr. MacEachen: —in order to bring Pakistan to the point of cancelling a contract which, I understand, has been entered into with the French government. That is a possibility, but I think the hon. member should understand the implications for Pakistan if Canada at this point withdrew its fuel from the CANDU power reactor and cut off the supply of electricity for the city of Karachi. I believe that is a step which the hon. member and I would like to ponder very carefully before it is taken.

Mr. Broadbent: Notwithstanding the legitimate concern which the minister expressed about the power situation for the city of Karachi, I should like to ask the minister the following question. Given, to say the least, the equal concern from the point of view of everyone in the world to stop the development of nuclear weapons, would the minister not agree that unless we get the most stringent guarantees from the government of Pakistan which would totally inhibit the use of Canadian-provided material for the development of nuclear weapons, we should not proceed in any way with further shipments of uranium material to that country?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, the hon. member understands that there is presently in Pakistan the Canadian supplied power reactor. At the time that reactor was put in place certain safeguards were negotiated between Canada and Pakistan, and at this point the purpose of the Canadian effort is to upgrade existing safeguard agreements which were previously entered into between Canada and Pakistan affecting that particular installation. We are doing our level best, and I believe we will make considerable progress in upgrading those safeguards.

I believe the hon. member should bear in mind as well that, as I understand it, there has been a safeguards agreement negotiated between France and Pakistan relating to the processing plant. These safeguards are of London Club quality and have been approved by the International Atomic Energy Agency, so that processing plant is actually safeguarded under internationally approved standards.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Halifax grumbles, but that is a fact, and it is a very important fact which has to be taken into account. Canada is not supplying the reprocessing plant to Pakistan.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the minister has been quoted as saying that the safeguards agreed to by a number of countries in London were in fact lower than the safeguards expected by the Government of Canada, I should like to ask the minister whether he is now saying that the Government of Canada is prepared to accept what I understand to be the Pakistani position, namely, that the safeguards expected by the Government of Canada for Canadian provided facilities will not be applied to facilities provided by another country, even if that means that those facilities are going to be using spent fuel provided originally by Canada and processed on the Canadian reactor in Pakistan.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has rather ambitious plans for Canada in that he expects Canada to direct the nature of an agreement between two other countries, in this case between Pakistan and France. I believe that is quite a silly proposal made by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Broadbent: That is nonsense.

Mr. MacEachen: The question which is relevant, and which the hon. member has raised, is the safeguards with respect to the Canadian reactor which is presently in Pakistan. It is with respect to that reactor—

Mr. Broadbent: And the use of fuel.

Mr. MacEachen: And the use of fuel. I heard the words of the hon. member, and I will probably return to those words at a future time when it will be appropriate. It is on that point that negotiations are currently under way, and at the moment we are considering what our total approach will be depending upon the results of these negotiations. With regard to Pakistan, we are insisting on the highest possible safeguards. However, please do not ask Canada to determine what arrangements ought to exist between Pakistan and France. Surely, the French government has something to say about that.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I shall spare the minister the official figures concerning the increase in unemployment rate, particularly among people from 18 to 30 years of age. The minister is surely aware of the difficult situation prevailing in Quebec regarding job opportunities. Will the minister tell the House if his department or any other will be able to announce shortly an integrated policy aiming at creating jobs to help those Canadians who urgently require work and must at present depend on unemployment insurance?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has very specific policies. We have general agreements for development with all the provinces, in particular with Quebec. Within the framework of those agreements it is possible to set up developmental programs for specific areas of the Quebec economy. Of course there is the Regional Development Incentives Act which aims at creating more job opportunities. But even so, we still have to wait for entrepreneurs to act because we cannot be expected to take the initiative since we are not given any authority. We can do some research and make suggestions and indeed this is precisely what we have been doing in many areas but we have not always been able to persuade potential employers to avail themselves of those opportunities which would be conducive to some degree of expansion and hence of employment. As for our policy, I can assure the hon. member that we are doing everything possible within the limits of our jurisdiction to bring down unemployment which, we admit, has reached an abnormally high rate.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROGRAM WILL NOT PERPETUATE LOW WAGES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since wage earners in New Brunswick earn up to one-third less than the national average and the decision of the administrator in the Irving case involving New Brunswick workers has caused considerable concern, will the Prime Minister relieve some anxieties and state quite clearly that the operation of the restraints program will not be allowed to freeze New Brunswick wage earners in the position of disparity in which some now find themselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not the purpose of the board or indeed the whole anti-inflation program to prevent various regions of the country from seeking a greater and more fair proportion of the national revenue. On the other hand, the hon. member has to realize it is not the purpose of the board and the program to alleviate regional disparities which have existed in our economy for 100 years and more and which are being tackled, if I can use that expression, by such instruments as the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion. The anti-inflation program itself, however, is not there in order to help or hinder that process.

Mr. Howie: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The point of my question was that New Brunswick certainly appreciates the excellent work of DREE but I want to be certain that the program will not work contra to the avowed purpose of DREE.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF ENTRANCE FEE POLICY

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of past reaction, especially in the Atlantic provinces, to the department's proposed national parks entrance fee policy, will the minister be making a statement in the near future to clarify the policy since the tourism campaign is or will be getting into full swing shortly?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be leaving after the session this morning for the Atlantic provinces, and that is one of the matters I hope to clarify during my visit.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST THAT LOTTERY PROCEDURE BE CHANGED TO AGREE WITH ADVERTISING

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I should like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, particularly in view of its importance. In view of the fact there were not as many Olympic lottery winners as advertised by the lottery program through its now obviously false and misleading advertisements, can the Prime Minister advise the House whether he is prepared to instruct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or others in this government to take immediate steps to rectify this very serious problem in time for the next draw? At the same time will he remedy the unjust manner in which the program has been run vis-à-vis the advertising campaign?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the federal government does not operate the lottery. If there has been some malfunctioning, I am sure it will be drawn to the attention of the malfunctioners. As far as the advertising is concerned, if any of it is contravening federal policy or legislation I will, of course, draw it to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

DATE ON WHICH OPERATION OF LEGISLATION TO ASSIST GAMES WILL CEASE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Because it has become evident that facilities for this year's Olympics in Montreal will unfortunately not be totally completed on time, and in view of the fact that legislation approved by this parliament for the various fund-raising schemes is intended for the games themselves and not for facilities to be completed at a later date, could the minister advise this House whether the various pieces of Olympic legislation and other direct and indirect co-operation will cease by the end of the games on August 1? If not, how can he justify their continuation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we do intend to follow the legislation as enacted by the House. And I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that we should repeal legislation because the stadium will not be fully completed for the Olympics.

PUBLIC SERVICE

BILINGUALISM BONUS—POSSIBILITY OF DECISION BY ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of Treasury Board.

Could the minister tell the House whether he invited the Anti-Inflation Board to make a decision on the bilingualism bonus in the public service and, if not, does he intend to do so?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, first of all that is not quite where the issue lies. It is whether the description of duties for civil servants should account for the additional complexity due to the fact that they must speak both languages. That matter has been referred jointly by the union and the Treasury Board to the AIB and so far we got no information in that respect.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Given the objective of this bonus, to the extent that the government will favour payment of this bilingualism bonus within the civil service, does not the minister feel that this bonus should come under the anti-inflation law?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the government has decided to apply the legislation passed by the House with respect to compensation which must be paid to its employees across Canada.

INDUSTRY

DECLINE IN PRODUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REVERSE TREND

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As Statistics Canada reported yesterday that the index of industrial production took a serious drop in December, the year ending disastrously in this regard, will the Prime Minister undertake next week to outline to the House what the government intends to do to reverse this serious situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member always does his homework, but he must be a slow reader, because he only read half the report. If he had kept reading Statistics Canada, he would have realized that the new business conditions survey covered 5400 firms across the country and showed an upturn in business expectations, indicating that confidence in the economy may be on the upturn in the business community.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister knows well, I read those reports thoroughly. The fact remains that the index of industrial production fell seriously in December, the year ending disastrously in this regard. I ask the Prime Minister again, will he come before the House and outline procedures the government intends to take to reverse this trend? Industrial production was down seriously in December and during all of last year.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my point is this: If the hon. member read the report, obviously he did not understand it all. He is asking us to reverse the trend, but the figures indicate that the trend has already been reversed. If any additional action is needed, I suppose the announcement last night by the Minister of Finance will give further encouragement for increased industrial and raw material production.

HEALTH

CLOSURE OF HOSPITALS IN ONTARIO—SUGGESTED WITHHOLDING OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCE

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Whereas the announcement on Thursday of last week of the closing of Clinton community hospital brought to ten the number of closures by the government of Ontario, and apparently finalized closures for this time, and whereas at least four of those ten hospitals are in western Ontario and all are in rural areas where transportation and adverse weather conditions combine to inflict severe hardships on residents of the areas concerned, will the minister consider withholding from the federal government's health plan contributions to the province of Ontario the supposed $50 million that the closings are slated to save and use that money as direct payment to the hospitals closed, so that they may continue to provide to those rural areas the valuable and economical health services now being provided?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize very much with the problem put forward by the hon. member, especially in his own area, but the hon. member should realize that under the law, the federal government must contribute 50 per cent of hospital operation expenses and that the federal government, and I, as minister, have no authority to do what the hon. member suggests in his question—unfortunately.

INQUIRY WHETHER ONTARIO RECEIVING THE FULL FIFTY PER CENT CONTRIBUTION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Wealth and—

An hon. Member: Wealth and Helfare.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the province of Ontario receiving under the present formula the 50 per cent it was promised when it came into the contract? Is it receiving that amount in respect of present day medicare expenditures?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the province of Ontario receives every dollar and cent to which it is entitled under the law. The money is provided under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act by way of agreements with the province of Ontario. I have never had a complaint about this from the province of Ontario since my appointment as Minister of National Health and Welfare or, for that matter, from any other part of the country.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? Does the minister not agree that under the formula now used, the province of Ontario is receiving less than 50 per cent of its actual cost?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the province of Ontario is receiving exactly what it is entitled to under the law passed by this parliament. The law provides for a cost-sharing formula for hospital operations, under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. The province of Ontario has never complained that it is not getting every penny to which it is entitled.

FISHERIES

DECISION ON DREDGING VEDDER RIVER IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the minister in charge of fisheries? In view of the imminent spring run-off and consequential threat of further flooding in the Fraser Valley, what decision has the minister's department taken with respect to requests for necessary dredging of the Vedder River in the municipality of Chilliwack?

[Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey).]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I thought that, after consultations, this matter had been sorted out. I will check into it and inform the hon. member. I am sure that he will accept that we must protect spawning grounds.

BILINGUALISM

REASON FOR NOT CONTINUING FUNDING OF EXPERIMENTAL PROGRAM FOR SECOND LANGUAGE TRAINING

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State arises from the announcement with respect to the termination of funding to school boards for second language training in the national capital area. As Mr. Spicer, commissioner of official languages, suggested that we ought to emphasize language training in our school system, perhaps as opposed to emphasizing it in the Public Service of Canada, will the minister explain the contradiction inherent in the dropping of this program, when it had been generally agreed by all parties that it was one of the finest programs the minister's department has brought forth? Dropping the program will jeopardize the future of those in the national capital area already involved in the immersion program.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there has been no termination of funding, in the sense that the formula payments will apply to the national capital region, as they apply across the country. This involves the federal government paying 9 per cent of the cost per student in an extended French program. What has come to an end is an experimental program which the boards of education and the province of Ontario agreed, in the beginning, would be a two-year program. Last year they came to me and said, "Listen, we have not completed the experiment; would you help us through a third year?" I agreed. Therefore, the suggestion that we have now terminated the formula payments or payments for the support of extended French training in the national capital region is false.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I concede that it was an experimental program and extended. Judging from the reaction of the boards, there is a necessity for its continuation. As the program will cost about $4 million, whereas the government is prepared to spend $8 million refurbishing the East Block, and as this language program in the national capital area may be the forerunner of similar programs in other parts of Canada if it is allowed to continue, would the minister consider giving the program as high a priority as the government is giving the refurbishing of the East Block?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INCOME TAX

REASON FOR NOT PROCEEDING WITH PLANS TO CO-OPERATE WITH UNITED STATES TO PREVENT TAX EVASION BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. On June 12, 1973, the minister's predecessor announced in a speech to the Inter-American Centre of Tax Administrators that the government was launching a campaign to crack down on multinationals evading taxes. On November 19, 1975, the current minister announced the formation of a joint U.S.-Canada committee to study the same question. On February 23, 1976, the minister's department announced that because of spending restraints, all such plans had been shelved. While a penny saved may be a penny earned, in this case, does the minister feel that the savings in wages and salaries outweigh the loss of foregone corporate taxes?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, within a month after my appointment to this portfolio, I met with Don Alexander, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue Service in the United States. We set up a committee to look into how we might act under the Canada-United States tax treaty to get at multinationals and transnationals which are using the tax haven to avoid taxes. Mr. Alexander will be back here following the report of that committee. We will be meeting again. I, like every other minister, would like to have all the resources necessary. Personally, I do not think it is a waste of money. I think it is an investment to get back the hundreds of millions of dollars. To me, a tax haven is anathema. Within the scope that we have, both the resources, financial and man-years, we will do our best to plug these particular abuses.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of a tax haven. It is a question of transfer of income from the Canadian tax collector to the United States tax collector. Is the minister so naive as to believe that the government of the United States is going to help us reduce their tax collection in favour of Canada?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am not so naive as to think we are going to get any co-operation by the use of this anti-American nonsense we hear from time to time. We are trying to work together in the best interests of taxpayers of both countries.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBILITY OF APOLOGY TO THÉRIEN FAMILY FOR ERRONEOUS RAID

Mr. Denis Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

After a raid in a Hawkesbury home on February 19, 1976, at 4.20 in the morning, even though the RCMP had been misinformed by the local police, can the minister tell the House if he will personally apologize on behalf of the RCMP to the members of Mr. Georges Thérien's family who, beyond all question, have been deeply humiliated, and particularly for the messy condition in which their home was left, as he will find out when he reads the report.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, the RCMP took this action on the advice of the local police. As he said, it was unfortunate that the wrong address had been given. I will bring this matter to the attention of the RCMP and see that a proper apology is made to the people involved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—AGREEMENT TO PREVENT DAMAGE TO ENVIRONMENT BY NUCLEAR WASTE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister assure the House that when Canada sells a nuclear reactor abroad, there is inherent with the sale a moral obligation to assure that nuclear wastes from that same reactor will not harm the international physical environment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are arrangements within the nuclear co-operation agreements covering the security of the plant and the waste factor involved. There are provisions for continuing consultations to overcome such difficulties.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DISPOSAL AND STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WASTE—MEASURES TO PROTECT ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment. Has the minister been consulted regarding the safeguards for disposal and storage of nuclear waste as it relates to the protection of the Canadian environment? Does his department have the technical capacity and expertise to adequately advise the government with regard to the return and reprocessing of nuclear waste from reactors sold abroad?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in that field, we advise Energy, Mines and Resources and the provincial governments. That is all we do. We see that they respect the standards of the government.

Oral Questions

EFFECT OF ABOLISHING NOTICE TO SUBJECT OF WIRETAP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to make this preamble, because from what I read and hear there seems to be some confusion between the peace and security bill, C-83, and the bill to abolish capital punishment, C-84. They are two distinct bills. I would have directed this question to the Minister of Justice, but I will put it to the Solicitor General because I think he has knowledge of the subject as well. This is a serious question. Apart from the report that was filed yesterday, have there been any studies prepared or background information obtained to the effect that the abolishing of the 90 day mandatory notice to the subject of a wiretap has been detrimental to crime detection and prevents law enforcement officers from doing their job? I would also ask another question since there might be a lengthy debate on this bill because of the problem with civil rights. Instead of repealing the notice section, would the minister consider that the police can always apply to a judge to either extend or abolish the notice?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, some of the material on this subject is available in the annual reports on the Privacy Act which were tabled in this House on February 13. In addition, a study was made, following the passage of the Privacy Act, with all provincial governments and police forces on the efficacy of that act. Some of the recommendations and provisions we have in the bill are a result of that study. In a general way, the police advise that it often takes a considerable time, sometimes several years, to investigate the major figures in organized crime. Consequently, they hesitate to request authorizations for electronic surveillance under the Privacy Act due to the short period of authorization and the fact they may have to notify the suspect before the criminal investigation is completed, which would be a counterproductive measure.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Solicitor General's answer. I can see that problem arising. In the face of that problem, does he not feel that he could produce a section in the bill whereby the Crown, on behalf of the police officers, could apply to a judge to extend the time, unknown to the subjects being investigated, or abolish the notice altogether in the case of syndicated crime? That is my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, the question concerns the bill itself which will be before the House shortly.

Mr. Woolliams: May I then put this question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I honestly fail to see how the question is relevant to the question period as opposed to the bill itself which is to be before us shortly.

CATTLE—REGULATION OF INTERVAL BETWEEN FEEDINGS WHILE BEING TRANSPORTED

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is going to have the time limit of 36 hours between feedings for cattle in transit extended so that the total travelling time of the cattle will be less? If so, when will this provision be put into effect officially? This provision may come under the Minister of Justice, but I am sure the Minister of Agriculture knows about it.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that new legislation was passed. The regulations and so on are being put into force. I hope, as does the hon. member, that this will be one of the best systems we have ever had for transporting live animals.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, there has been a problem of cattle having to wait too long on sidings during peak traffic periods. Will more facilities be made available at main points from west to east for cattle that have to stop for feed and water in order that they will not have to wait so long on the sidings during peak traffic periods?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, these matters are all being considered. I hope the hon. member reads the report of the Western Economic Conference which states that all these cattle should be processed at their source. In western Canada there are some of the best processors that we have. Maybe more will be processed there into a finished product and shipped to market.

Mr. McKinley: I am talking about feeder cattle.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR INCREASED BASIC EXEMPTION FOR SINGLE PARENTS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue involving the other end of the income scale. Many single parents supporting children are experiencing great difficulty because people providing day care services will not provide receipts or their social security numbers so that these working single parents can deduct these expenses from income. Will the minister give consideration to increasing the basic exemption for single parents supporting children as a resolution to this rather serious social problem?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think that question may be more properly directed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance. He passes the laws and we administer them. I will bring this to his attention.

TRANSPORT

REPLACEMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER EQUIPMENT—REASON FOR LACK OF GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is in relation to the government's aging rail passenger equipment, some of which is well over 20 years old and is rapidly becoming obsolete. May I ask the Minister of Transport why the government has not made formal commitments to the railways to replace old, outdated railway passenger equipment, which certainly the railways must if they are to provide any kind of credible rail passenger service in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the policy indicated a short time ago assured the railways with respect to the passenger services which are needed and which will be retained in Canada that they will be receiving an adequate return from a combination of passenger fares and a balance subsidized by the government. Therefore the railways will have the incentive to acquire equipment, and as fast as routes to be served are assessed they will be placing orders for equipment for those routes.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Surely, he must know that it takes well over four years at the present time before this kind of equipment can come into service, and the railways have had no indication whatever from the Minister of Transport that they should go ahead. Is the Minister of Transport using this excuse for not purchasing equipment as the basis for the intent behind the rail policy that was announced, and that is the phasing out of rail passenger services in Canada?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not the intent behind the policy. It was stated quite clearly in the policy that it is our intent to have good passenger service where it is retained and to phase out passenger service that simply cannot be supported on any basis because of available alternative service at much lower cost. I hope the hon. member will appreciate that principle and understand its implications. Obviously, it takes time between ordering equipment and acquiring it. The several weeks of time that has elapsed in this process will not make very much difference. Even now, of course, the railways, with assurance of support from fares and subsidy, could be making plans to acquire the equipment they will need to replace aging equipment.

DATE AND PLACE OF HEARINGS INTO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I do not agree at all with the minister and his assumption, but can he inform the House when the CTC hearings into rail passenger service will commence, and can he also inform the House in what parts of the country they will be held?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make sure that as soon as dates and places are known the information will be made available to hon. members. It was not on the basis of assumption that I was asking the hon. member to agree with me, but simply a question of reading the policy statement and understanding it.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

DATE OF DECISION ON INCREASES IN INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary? Three insurance industry executives have criticized the indecisiveness of the Anti-Inflation Board regarding future premium increases in both property and auto insurance. They have stated that: "We anticipated a continued upset market in the short term", adding that they are still seeking clarification regarding the AIB ground rules. Would the parliamentary secretary to the minister inform the House when he expects the Anti-Inflation Board to make a decision regarding insurance increases?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I take the question as notice and I shall ask the minister to reply to the hon. member as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the President of the Treasury Board also get an answer to this question. Does the minister not agree that Anti-Inflation Board indecision and inability to clarify its regulations is generating a serious lack of confidence in the efficacy of the board?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, again I will be delighted to be the messenger of the member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO JORDAN AND BY SAUDI ARABIA TO CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering that the government has established an embassy in Saudi Arabia but that that country has not reciprocated, can the minister advise whether he has any indication as to the appointment of a resident Saudi Arabian ambassador to Canada; and to balance our representation with Jordan, when will Canada appoint a resident ambassador at Amman?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I visited Saudi Arabia a few weeks ago the foreign minister told me that it was the intention of the government of Saudi Arabia to open an embassy in Ottawa and establish a full time ambassador within a few months. That was an extremely welcome development and indicates the interest that Saudi Arabia is taking in Canada.

I believe the hon. member asked about whether we proposed to establish a resident ambassador in Jordan. On that point, we have not yet reached the decision to take such a step in view of the many priorities that face the department; but I can tell the hon. member that, as a result of my visit to Jordan and my discussion with King Hussein and the Prime Minister, I am satisfied that there is expanding opportunity for co-operation between Jordan and Canada.

RHODESIA—POSSIBILITY OF INVOLVEMENT IN SETTLEMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEMS AND AID TO REFUGEES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister please inform the House whether, in view of the deteriorating political situation in Rhodesia, the Canadian government, as a leading Commonwealth influence, is involved in the planning for a constitutional settlement in Rhodesia; and is the government preparing any special contingency plans to help minimize tragic events and relieve an emergency refugee situation in that country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the political developments in Rhodesia, but as a member of the Commonwealth we are not playing any particular role in the direct search for a political solution at the present time. Obviously, if a refugee situation develops I am sure my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration would consider what could be done under the refugee criteria, but it is not apparent at the moment that such a situation will arise.

COW-CALF STABILIZATION PROGRAM—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement yesterday by Gordon Park, president of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, that "consumers may never again see beef prices as low as they are now as producers are reducing their herds", because of low prices for the producer himself, and in view of the fact that there will be a shortage unless something is done to improve prices for the producer, can the minister give us a commitment today that he will very soon be announcing a national stabilization program or some kind of program for the cow-calf operator?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the hon. member would quote the president of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. He did not quote the full text of what that gentleman said because he said he did not want the government to do anything. He did not want any kind of plan at all for the cattlemen of Canada. I must say I disagree with the president of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, because if you followed his philosophy people would not be able to buy beef.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That is precisely why I quoted the president of the Cattlemen's Association. Even he is forecasting a shortage. My supplementary question is to ask the minister to answer my question. Can the minister give us a commitment that there will be a program so that farmers can plan, and when will he make this announcement?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question several times in the House. I said earlier in the year that there would be a program for beef from January 1 to the end of December for the year 1976. We had a meeting with the minister of agriculture from the province of Saskatchewan, I believe—I have forgotten his name right now—

An hon. Member: Whelan.

Mr. Whelan: —but he is having problems with his own provincial treasury board which seem to me to be even much greater than those I am having when it comes to helping the farmers.

REDUCTION BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION IN TIME ALLOTTED TO FARM NEWS BROADCASTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to CBC farm broadcasting, particularly farm news, on CBC radio. In light of the steady reduction in time allocated by CBC radio to farm broadcasting right across the country—for example, there has been a 50 per cent reduction by CBL in Toronto in the last ten years—would the minister advise the House whether this broadcasting time reduction by the CBC has either his acquiescence or support and, if not, what representations he has made to the Secretary of State in regard to restoring a reasonable and acceptable level of farm news broadcasting on the CBC?

● (1200)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps what I said to my colleague the Secretary of State concerning my view of what they are doing would not be considered Parliamentary language. I think it is deplorable that they are curtailing farm broadcasting, especially in the Toronto area. It has been good in a way because now the private sector has started broadcasting farm news and found it is one of the most popular programs they have. They went from ten minutes to 50 minutes in a few short weeks and have a listening audience of over one quarter of a million people in that area, and it is expanding very rapidly. So, if the private sector can do this, and maybe better than the CBC, more power to them.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REDUCTION IN FARM BROADCASTING—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is obviously for the Secretary of State. Does he support the CBC position that farm programs are "ghetto" broadcasting and therefore ought to be eliminated, even though eliminated gradually to avoid the obvious uproar which would occur if such programs were axed overnight?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Of course not, Mr. Speaker. I do confirm what my colleague the Minister of Agriculture said, that the language used in his representations to me on this matter transgress normal parliamentary usage. Nevertheless, this message was conveyed to the corporation. I think this is a question that maybe members will want to raise with the corporation when its estimates are before the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a Friday morning question for the Prime Minister in the interest of historical perspective. Considering that the right hon. gentleman is bolstering his office with those splendid retreads from the Pearson years, Mr. James Coutts and now Mr. Richard O'Hagan, I would ask if Walter Gordon and Judy LaMarsh have been asked to rejoin the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was shown the press clipping which spoke of Mr. O'Hagan joining my office, of which I am very pleased. I noticed that right next to it there was an item concerning one Bill Neville, who had been with Judy LaMarch and who is now being reused by the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR FOR REMAINDER OF SESSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That commencing on March 1, 1976, and for the remainder of the session, Standing Order 15(6) be suspended.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the government House leader for acceding to the suggestion I made under Standing Order 43 some days ago, to which I understand he was personally agreeable at the time but unfortunately someone said "No". Despite our diligent efforts, he and I have not been able to trace down the person who said "No". It is important we recognize that what has happened here is that this particular session of parliament has reached record limits, as you yourself indicated the other day, Mr. Speaker. We have now reached the point where in order to preserve the rights of the private member the government has seen fit, in this long session, to put this motion forward. If there is a message in this, that message is twofold. It is, first, that the private member is important in parliament. Parliament is not just to serve the government's interests, but to serve as well the interests of the private member.

More important than that, I think there is the message here, as well, that it does not sit well for this institution, for the public it serves or for the members who serve here, that a session should go on and on indefinitely with no opportunity in the normal course of a throne speech debate for backbenchers on all sides of the House to engage in an examination, on behalf of their constituents and the country, of the government's handling of all its affairs.

While this motion is welcomed, I think it points up the fallacy of this government's thinking in terms of this parliament. This parliament is not the tool of the government; this parliament is the servant of the people of Canada and the people who send us here. The people of Canada are anxious to have members here, not just in the opposition but on the government side, examine the government's economic record, its statements and the direction in which it is going, as well as how the economy is going and all the other things. Because of this long session, this fundamental right of private members, in our free society under the parliamentary system, is being denied. I want to take this opportunity to protest the tactics of the government in respect of this long, long session, which you yourself indicated a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, had broken all records.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the government and the official opposition are both in support of this motion, there does not seem to be much point in leading a campaign against it. I want to make the point, however, that it is nothing but a sop and I am shocked that the official opposition has bought it so easily. The proposal in this motion is to restore one of the losses that flows from our not, by this time, having begun a new session. The one loss it would restore is that of having private members' hour on Mondays and Tuesdays. That is all it is. It is just a sop. I was surprised that my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), asked for it and I am surprised that he bought it so readily.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I did not buy it readily at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says that by passing this motion we are asserting the fact that this parliament is not a tool of the government. The very opposite is the case. The willingness of the government to present this motion is based on the fact that the government has decided that this session of parliament is to go on and on. Parliament is being made a tool of the government.

As the government House leader knows, whan I had words with him about this matter of the session going on and on his reply was that in cabinet they had wrestled with this issue long and hard, but this was the decision. Was there any consultation with parliament about it? Surely if parliamentary sessions are to become two-year propositions, or maybe three or four years, instead of one, that should be a matter about which parliament should at least have something to say. But we have been completely denied any such opportunity. I doubt whether even the Liberal backbenchers are having any say about it. They are losing heavily by there not being a new session. The decision about the length of the session has been made by the government. Parliament is just a tool in the government's hand so far as the length of this session is concerned.

My main complaint is that we have no input insofar as this decision is concerned. It is a governmental decision which affects the length of the session of the Parliament of Canada. You, sir, pointed out a few days ago that we had reached the number of days that was the maximum number of days for a session up until that point. We have now exceeded it. Today we are in the 254th sitting day. Not only is this the longest session in terms of number of sitting days; it is also the longest session in terms of elapsed time. This session commenced on September 30, 1974. In a day or two, whenever this 29-day month ends, this session will have endured through 17 months. That has never before happened in Canadian history.

Indeed, sir, during the first 30 years of the history of the Parliament of Canada each of the sessions was always within the same calendar year. It is only in latter years that there have been four or five occasions when the length of the sessions, whether in two or three calendar years, has been more than 12 months. I point out that in Britain, where they do not even have a constitution about these things, they nevertheless have rules and traditions which are such that in May's eighteenth edition the reference is clearly made to annual sessions. A session starts in October. The book says that even if there is an election in the meantime, so that a session cannot start in October but has to start later than that, it must end prior to the next October so that there can be a new session commencing in October.

As I say, May points out that this is provided, not by a constitution, since the United Kingdom does not have a regular constitution, but by rules affecting financial enactments, and so on. Indeed, there is a very interesting bit on this in May's in which it is pointed out that even the Crown's prerogative has been circumscribed in this respect. If the British tradition is worth anything, it is a fact that we should get a new session of parliament at least once every year. In our own case it is dealt with in an oblique way in the constitution. Section 20 of the British North America Act provides:

There shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every Year—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I think if it had stopped there we could say that there has to be a session and that indeed a session must begin at least once in every year, but the illustrious Fathers of Confederation went on and added these words:

—so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

I have to say that legally all that guarantees is that there shall not be 12 months between the end of one session and the beginning of the next. I think the reason for that was that in the early days sessions lasted only two, three or four months and the Fathers of Confederation wanted a guarantee that if there was a session in January, February and March of one year, the government could not get away with the one session per year proposition by holding one in October, November and December of the next year. There had to be not only a session every year but those sessions had to be called so that there would not be a full year's absence at any time.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to listen to an argument that perhaps all of this should be changed. I can even imagine arguments being made in favour of having only one session for the whole four or five years. I can think of arguments against having speeches from the throne, speech from the throne debates, and so on, but if the traditions of this place are to be changed, let parliament be in on it. But parliament is not in on it. The government is making the decision and the official opposition is swallowing this sop to parliament which is being offered in lieu of starting a new session.

Mr. Paproski: Stanley, you know we are with you.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good. The idea of the Speech from the Throne is that once in a while the government has to set down its program for the year. We are operating on a program for the year that was given to us on September 30, 1974. The government is bringing things in now that were not in that Speech from the Throne, as well as things that are the very opposite to those mentioned in the throne speech. The whole principle of the Throne speech is being thrown to the wind.

It is also part of the tradition that once a year members of all parties on both sides of the House—I mention particularly members on the government side—should have the right to discuss the government's program in general, and that comes in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. As a matter of fact, my friends on the government side are losing more by this than we are. We have opportunities to speak, but the opportunities that are there for government members in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne are being sacrificed by this. It is being said in the House, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is quoted as having said outside, that this session will go on until June. If it is to be June, why not the fall; and if the fall, why not go on and on? We are completely changing the whole tradition about annual sessions and annual throne speeches without any parliamentary input whatsoever.

I come back to the words of my hon. friend when he said this parliament is not a tool of the government. That is precisely what the government is doing to us. It is using us the way it wants to. The government says it does not have time for the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, that it cannot afford the eight days. I suggest that we might compromise, reach an agreement to cut the eight days to six days, or something like that. But we should not do away with it all together without any consultation with parliament. The government House leader can say that he told us about it. But he did not ask our opinion. He just told us that the government had wrestled with this issue and had made the decision.

I know one of the arguments the government uses at this stage of a session is that there has been parliamentary time invested in some legislation, and that if the session prorogued and we started a new one, some of these things would have to start all over again. About the only bill that that would affect is Bill C-68 which has had a fair amount of parliamentary time devoted to it at second reading. It should be shelved in any event. It has no value, anyway. The government ought to recall the whole business. As we have heavy legislation coming up such as Bills C-83 and C-84, now is the time to start a new session. Let us not start this debate in this session. Let us have a speech from the Throne, a new session next week and then take that new legislation at the start of another new session.

There are quite a few other things. One of the problems around here is the amount of paper we have at our feet under our desks because the session is lasting so long.

An hon. Member: Mine is bilingual.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If it is in both languages, the volume is that much greater. Another thing, of course, is that decisions taken in this session cannot be the subject of motions again in the same session. Some members have private members' public bills or private members' resolutions which they would like to get a crack at once a year. However, they will not get a crack at them once a year but, rather, once a session. Then there is the problem of the budget, and so on. I know there can be half a dozen budgets in one session, but surely there is some sense in the tradition of a session each year and budgets, and so on, being contained within that session. Frankly, I do not like the change that is being made, and this little sop of giving us back an hour on Mondays and Tuesdays does not answer the proposition at all.

● (1220)

Sir, it will be no surprise to you when I say that I have studied the authorities on this quite thoroughly, and if I could find a point of order or a question of privilege on which I could contend that you should tell the government it has to close the session, I would be presenting it to you. I know that neither in our books on procedure nor in the British books can this be found. But the tradition is so clearly established and the years of our history are so much on the side of parliament that I think what is being done is completely wrong.

I am not against getting private members' hour back, although it is not a great deal of help if you have already had a shot at your bill and you cannot get it again in this session, just to get the days back, and there are some problems that arise. What concerns me most of all about this is the high-handed, dictatorial way in which the government is making the decision. When I came in this morning, one of the elevator operators or one of the messengers said to me that he had heard on the radio that such and such was going to happen, that the session would be continued, and so on. I asked him where he heard all that. He told me that it was attributed to the Prime Minister. Who is this Prime Minister? This is parliament. We should have some say about our own operations—and we are not having any say about it; we are not even being permitted to follow the traditions of Britain for hundreds of years, or the traditions of this parliament since 1867, because the government finds it inconvenient to stop for a throne speech debate thereon and inconvenient to have to transfer some legislation from this session to the next.

I think this is wrong, I think this is another example of the high-handed, dictatorial attitude of this government and I protest it as strongly as I can.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words because the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just presented us a fantastic account of all parliamentary traditions concerning the Speech from the Throne. First we were surprised to hear the rumour that there would be no Speech from the Throne, something which has just been confirmed.

I think this is another failure of the government to direct the discussions in the House. As you said recently, this is the longest session ever as a result of the lack of planning of the government business and of its stubborn refusal to accept the decisions of the majority in the House. Once we start rejecting the decisions of the public and then those of the majority of the members, we get the results we have today—we extend the session. I am afraid this extension will last one year, for when the attorney general introduces the same legislation three times because 90 per cent of the population disagree with it, and when he insists on having it passed, such stubbornness, as we know him, will last for a year.

We are talking about the end of this session, Mr. Speaker, and we are sure that it is not near completion, taking into account the government's stubbornness in having these ridiculous bills passed, bills that are anti-social and that are against the will of 90 per cent of the population. We would have preferred a Speech from the Throne to know at least where the government wants to lead us. We now have the impression of running to disaster. I believe that is what is in store for us. That is why we are against the government's motion. All we ask for is that the usages and customs of this House be respected and that people know what the government seeks to introduce in this House and what we will be doing in the next twelve months, in order to plan work and thus take a direction. At the present time, we are completely in the dark and every day the government introduces a new matter. As I said, that is why I am against this motion.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the House leader has brought all the members of parliament into this problem of the length of sessions and the problems which develop from it. It seems to me it would have been much more advantageous not to have raised the subject at all. This gives members an opportunity to object to some of the things that have happened as a result of this long session and some of the problems that this has caused.

Hon. members will remember that when the Standing Orders were changed, they were changed on the basis of the fact that we had had a number of long sessions and many of the changes that were brought in were to assist the government to wind up the business of the House on an annual basis, which was not possible under the old rules. Originally, there was no limit under the Standing Orders as to the number of days when private members' and public business could be brought in under private members' hour.

One of the reasons the 40-day limit was put on private members' hours was to allow the government, in the last two or three months of the session, to be freed from private members' hour so that this extra hour could be used for government business. It was not, as I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, to take any of the privileges away from private members. It worked that way, but that was not the purpose of the change. The purpose was to assist the government. I have been here long enough to know that we never do anything in this parliament to help private members or to help the opposition. But I have never seen the opposition House leader go so far to help the government run its own affairs.

We have always made concessions which have resulted in the cutting down of rights of private members and have been to the advantage of the government. The new rule, under the Standing Order, to put the 40-hour limit on private members' hour was to help the government and it was certainly detrimental to members. It was never anticipated, when the rules were changed, that we would have a five-year session. There is some comment in the press that it may not only be a five-year session but that we may have seen our last election, that we may continue indefinitely until some other justification forces a change in the situation. I do not think that we have gone quite that far, and I doubt whether many hon. members will agree that we have, but if we have a five-year session, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, it is only a matter of degree. When you waive the rules and you make changes of accommodation for a specific purpose, you should look very carefully at that purpose.

The system under which we operate is not just one word for the opposition and two for the government: it is considerably more than that. What are we really saying? We are saying that if we do like the "fighting opposition", which today appears to be a quiet little pussy cat, and if on the part of the backbenchers we agree to this small concession, it seems to me that we will also have agreed, without any discussion, that this session will continue and that there will be no throne speech.

What is the throne speech for? As I understand it, it gives the government an opportunity to come before parliament and to state its agenda for the months ahead, to indicate to him what direction it is going and to outline what kind of program it will have for the future, usually for a period of less than one year. The throne speech originally started out for sessions which were only a month or two long, but that period of time has grown considerably.

If the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had been in the House for a considerable period of time, he would know that one of the greatest advantages a private member once had in this House was his opportunity to reply to the Speech from the Throne. In their replies to the Speech from the Throne, hon. members could air their own views and those of their constituents. I remember that when I first came here everyone was able to go on a tour of the riding of the hon. member who was speaking. They learned how nice the people were, how beautiful the scenery was, what type of industry there was, and in a social sense it was a helpful, geographical trip around and hon. member's riding. That was really the only time an hon. member could make a speech which outlined the direction in which he wanted to go. This has changed, but so have conditions. I think it would be very hard to find a time, with the exception of wartime, when a government has made the major changes in its philosophy that this one has in the last six months.

It is interesting to consider the direction in which the government was going in the last throne speech. At that time it was against wage and price controls, and very much against many of the things which have been implemented since. The country has a right to know what the government intends to do.

We will certainly miss my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The history of parliament follows him back many years, many generations, and sometimes many centuries. He made a very astute observation a moment ago. The government House leader walked between Mr. Speaker and the member speaking.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Between Mr. Speaker and the mace.

Mr. Peters: More than that; he walked between the mace and Mr. Speaker. We have moved so far away from observing the rules of parliament that before very long it will be difficult to run parliament in a way in which we can depend on the rules and regulations. Parliament has in the past always been accustomed to altering the rules by unanimous consent only, but today we are not being asked for unanimous consent. We have a motion before us in which, in effect, the government asks for a very small concession, and in return for that we are to give up the right of having the throne speech. It has been pointed out that there has already been some concession made in this discussion, and I hope that very small concession which has been made will be repeated by the House leader and that he will give us an indication, before this motion is passed, that there is an intention at some point in time of having another session of parliament and another throne speech.

I believe that a throne speech serves a purpose. I believe that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who initiated this concession, will agree that many members of his party would like to raise matters in the House which are not directly related to legislation which will be before parliament. They may be issues which greatly affect their ridings and which they would like to bring to the attention of the nation. The throne speech is one of the few times during a parliament that they have the opportunity to do so. The hon. member may have provided a slim substitute for that type of representation to a very limited number of his colleagues who have private members' business on the order paper, in lieu of the right which he may give to a large number of our members, particularly on the backbenches, who have to use this method to get messages across which may or may not be connected with the legislative business of the House, which may be rather parochial but which are very important to their ridings.

The throne speech used to be followed by a very long debate. That debate has now been cut to eight days. The length of the speeches has been curtailed by the new Standing Orders. There have been limits of all kinds applied to the individual backbencher and it seems to me that in view of the concessions which we have made, a fair and reasonable government should retain for us at least a regular forum; and the elimination of the throne speech and a new session appears to me not to meet that purpose. I am sure there are other factors involved. I am sure there are arrangements which have been made for operations in this House which are still on a sessional basis and which will continue unrenewed as long as this session lasts.

There may be others apart from members of this House who are affected. I do not like to appear, as some of my hon. colleagues may, to be a traditionalist and always to honour some of the traditions which have been built up, but I have found that every time we have given up some traditions, we really have given up the privileges of private members of this House and strengthened the hand of the government. This always happens.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did you hear that, Stanley?

Mr. Peters: I can think of no example in the changes we have made to the rules which has improved the lot of the individual member in relation to his duties to parliament. Where there has been a change, it has been in favour of the government rather than of the individual member. There is no question about that. Our country has grown in size. All one need do is look at the map of my riding to realize there might be a better way of handling some of this growth. However, leaving that aside, the country has grown, budgets have grown, the number of people has increased and so has our wealth. Obviously, the problems have increased. However, I think of many of the traditions we observed, and of which one was an annual session with a throne speech at the opening of parliament and getting from the government a new direction.

We are now getting direction by changes in legislation. Recently a totally new approach to the penal system in Canada was introduced under the guise of changes to the Criminal Code. These did not flow from the last throne speech, but have developed since and do not relate to anything in the past. But they are major changes, Mr. Speaker. The anti-inflation legislation did not relate to social changes indicated in the throne speech for this session. None of the changes we are now facing in legislative procedure flow from that source.

While members always want to co-operate with the government, and while members always want to make it easier for the government to get its business done, we will find that not only are changes being made but we will shortly be asked by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) to lengthen the hours to sit on Saturdays and to extend the hours on Friday evening. These changes will be introduced for the benefit of the government. I am surprised at the "pussy cat" official opposition and their smooth and purring manner toward the way in which the government is going to govern and operate this House.

Mr. Paproski: It takes a cat to know a cat.

Mr. Peters: There are different kinds of cats.

Mr. Paproski: Just different from the pussy cat.

Mr. Peters: There may be some desirable ones that are a little more fighting than others. It just seems to me that a pussy cat can be too quiet, particularly when someone may be near to stepping on its tail—and that may happen at any moment.

Mr. Ellis: You never saw the leopard change its spots, either.

Mr. Peters: That is another kind of cat. If the adjective were applied to me, I would be quite happy with it. I have always been afraid that there are factors that can make one change one's spots after a while.

I have come to the conclusion that many of these rules that we have in this House were designed originally for the benefit of the individual member. As the British system started out originally, it guarded the supremacy of the individual member. It made the individual member paramount in the parliamentary structure. Over the years we have given away some of those rights for cabinet government. Now cabinet government is not really cabinet government; it is run by experts behind the cabinet, and the experts have decided not to spend time on a new throne speech and go through the process of having a new session. Whenever the end of this session does come, it will be interesting to see the picture that is taken. A picture is generally taken each session, and in the next one some members will have long, white beards because of the length of the session. History will be interested in the decline of the Rip Van Winkle attitude of the official opposition to some of the rules they should be defending, but are not.

There is another side to this coin. I hope I am misrepresenting the official opposition and some of the pussy cat backbenchers on the government side as well. There appeared to be considerable objection from the official opposition yesterday to a private member's bill. I would not like to think that IAC Limited had persuaded some members of the opposition and government backbenchers that more time was needed to introduce that particular bill. Obviously, it should have been introduced very early in the session if there was to be any hope of getting it passed. I hope there are no ulterior motives in the introduction of this amendment that seems to get so much support from both sides of the House.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that he had looked through all the rules and precedents and had examined our pseudo constitution—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: My hon. friend laughs; maybe he has never looked at what we call the constitution. It is not a constitution in the sense of constitutions that are written for other countries; it is a statute of Westminster given to us by the British parliament on agreement of the provinces and the federal government. It certainly does not cover many of the things a constitution should cover, which obviously would establish in the regulations for parliament the length of sessions and many of the other rules that are not written into our Standing Orders and flow only from the British practice adopted by us as being applicable to Canada.

Looking back over those precedents, Mr. Speaker, I think there has been a tendency in Canada—and at one time there was a practice—of having a throne speech and then a budget. Both debates were fixed and were held very early in the session. Only in relatively recent times have we had more than one budget in a session, and those budgets do not necessarily follow the throne speech but come at various periods during the session. To some extent they do the same thing as the throne speech; in a financial way they outline the changes of attitude of the federal government, the cabinet and the government's financial advisers.

As conditions changed oftener than once a year, we ended up with a major budget and a mini-budget. Recently we have had more than one mini-budget in one session. While that is not a bad thing, it is a change that has developed without taking anything away from the operation of parliament. In fact, it allowed parliament to know the new direction the cabinet was taking and allowed members the full right of addressing themselves to the financial matters in the budget.

If records are kept, I think it will be very clear that whenever a mini-budget has been produced all parties have been in agreement with reducing the number of days required for discussion. This has been possible by members making concessions to the government. In some instances the government may have felt that some of its own members and the opposition were being conciliatory in considering requests to shorten the speeches and the length of debate when a budget was introduced for a specific purpose that might have limited application. That cannot be true of a throne speech, however.

Major changes have taken place in the direction of this government. The government has moved from one side of the street to the other, adopting a program with which the Conservative party went to the people in the last election. Strangely, the opposition now opposes the implementation of that proposal.

An hon. Member: It isn't in the same form.

Mr. Peters: Of course it is not in the same form. Probably it is worse. But the people gave no mandate for this program: they rejected it. The Liberal party fought wage and price controls during the election, and the people decided to reject controls.

Mr. Howie: Then why are you giving the government a vote of confidence?

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: The hon. member's party is showing confidence in the government. It is saying, in so many words, that the government need not give us a blueprint of its proposals, that it need not call a new session and can continue the present session. In return, the hon. member's party wants private members' hour Mondays and Tuesdays in addition to the Thursdays and Fridays private members' hour allowed in this part of the session.

The NDP say there should be a new session. The opposition has elected a new leader and it may change direction to the right, not to the left. I think the country is entitled to know what the opposition proposes, as well as what the government proposes. If both parties have redrafted their blueprints for action since the last election, the country is entitled to know. In which direction are the parties going? This point is important. It should be debated at length and, as far as I am concerned, voted on. I suggest that the opposition House leader misled his party—unintentionally, because he does not understand what he proposes. Perhaps, on reflection, he and his party will reconsider the proposal. I suggest it runs counter to their philosophy and therefore ought to be reconsidered.

A speech from the throne allows the government to state its position and also allows the opposition parties to set out their positions and criticize government policy. As a rule, the speech from the throne reflects the government's assessment of the situation only a short time ahead. In my opinion, it should look no more than one year into the future. Originally, it applied only to the next two or three months. As I say, it should cover no more than the following year. The opposition has the right to make counter-proposals. Certainly the Conservative party would want to do this at an early date.

The throne speech, apart from allowing the government to tell the country what it intends to do, gives rise to debate in which backbenchers can voice the problems of their constituents. Not for a long time have backbenchers been given this opportunity. At one time backbenchers were given many opportunities for raising the problems of their constituencies. I can remember many fruitful debates on the estimates, sometimes lasting several months, in which private members could speak about the problems of their constituencies. Those debates were wide-ranging. There was a grievance period connected with committee of supply proceedings when backbenchers could raise grievances. I am sure many hon. members would welcome the opportunity to voice the concerns of their constituents and to comment on forthcoming legislation. They will be denied that opportunity unless we decide to begin a new session.

All the machinery for beginning a new session is in being. The Governor General is well, the necessary functionaries are available, the Queen's Printer's department has been enlarged, and speech writers have been hired. No doubt the speech from the throne would be interesting. In recent years it has been the practice of the government to print, along with the speech from the throne, background documents setting out the government's philosophical position. We need to know the government's philosophical position.

The Conservative party and my party were intrigued that certain statements made recently over the broadcast media and heard nationwide could lead one to conclude that this government is leading in a certain direction. Frankly, there is little danger of parties in this House amalgamating. But there may be reason for thinking, on the strength of some philosophical pronouncements made publicly, that the government is going far to the left, in a socialistic direction. Possibly the Liberal party is going far to the left. This could become a socialist government. If so, we should look at its program.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, now that members of the official opposition have had an opportunity to contemplate over refreshment, I am sure they will agree that any concession offered in lieu of a formal throne speech and the beginning of a new session, with a blue print of where this government is going, is not a good deal. I am convinced they will support members of my party who believe it is in the interest of parliament and the country to have this blueprint, and the opportunity for that should be provided in a new throne speech. For that reason, we are opposed to making this concession in lieu of a throne speech.

An hon. Member: He usually has a lot to say.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) to resume his seat so soon. Characteristically, I thought he would take the full time allotted to him. As such, he has another five minutes.

Mr. McGrath: As the hon. member just interjected, he usually has a lot say. He seems to have wandered all over the place today.

I find it a little difficult to understand what this debate is all about. It seems that what we are debating is a move which should surely meet the general consensus and approval of the House. Let there be no mistake about that. I would have expected hon. gentlemen who are distinguished members of the New Democratic Party to be foremost in the advocacy of the rights of private members of this House and the right of private members to have their day. Surely that is what this resolution is all about. Hence, I find it very difficult to understand the position taken today by the NDP, particularly the position taken by the NDP House leader, that great expert on parliamentary procedure, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I suspect that perhaps the position of the NDP with respect to Bill C-68 may have something to do with the debate that is now under way. They might be a little worried that they do not have enough troops here today to carry the debate. In that regard, I wish to assure them that we have no intention of allowing Bill C-68 to pass without proper debate.

I would like to say this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who is an expert on rules and on parliament: surely he should be the first to know that the government not only has the right, but the responsibility to manage the business of the House. If the government decides that the session should be two years long, that, in fact, is the right of the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame!

Mr. McGrath: No one can question the right of the government to manage the business of the House. Consequently, we can have one parliament comprising one session, if that is the wish of the government and their management of the business of the House and the business of the country. Of course, they have to account for that management and stewardship. Let us set the record straight as far as this session is concerned. This has been a long session. Nobody will deny that. However, let us not be hypocritical about it. We have had very useful debates and we have had extended debates.

Let us take Bill C-2, for example. No one can say that we did not have an opportunity to debate the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. We had an extended debate. Indeed, in that regard the government showed great patience. The same can be said for Bill C-58. It was a long debate, and rightly so because it was an important bill. Of course, the same can be said for Bill C-68 which is now before the House.

Let us not get hung up on this nonsense, this hypocrisy about having to terminate the session. What is so special about a Speech from the Throne? The government usually ignores what is in it, anyway. It is usually filled with platitudes that they recycle at the beginning of each session. What is so sacrosanct or special about terminating the session to get another Speech from the Throne? There is nothing special about that at all. I suggest that we get on with this.

I commend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for standing up for the rights of private members in this House and for getting this agreement with the government to restore private members' hour by waiving the provisions of Standing Order 56. I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that many private members' bills have yet to be brought forward in this session, and who knows how long the session may last? Only the government can determine the length of a session. Only the government has responsibility for managing the business of the House. Let me say to the government that we should get on with it.

My principal reason for interjecting in this needless debate is to suggest to the government House leader that he give consideration, since he has already given an undertaking to look again at private members' hour, to providing some kind of mechanism within the government structure whereby private members' bills are vetted by law officers of the Crown to make sure they conform to the laws of the country and are procedurally and constitutionally acceptable as well as in the public interest, so they can receive second reading and be referred to a committee. Then, during examination by the committee, witnesses can give evidence with respect to particular bills.

Many good bills and excellent ideas are put forward during the course of private members' hour. It is generally the case that these bills are deliberately talked out. Every government does that. We did it when we were sitting over on that side. Nevertheless, the time has come, perhaps, when we should reassess the role of the private member in this House without in any way taking away from the principal responsibility of the government to legislate and manage the business of the House.

I believe that a reassessment, indeed a redefinition of the role of private members' hour on the part of the government, would be very productive and useful to the House. I hope the government House leader, who more and more impresses me with his patience—not necessarily with his wisdom, but with his patience—will give serious consideration to having this question referred to a cabinet committee, to a committee of the Department of Justice or to a committee of the House, to see whether the government can come up with a more useful and productive way of handling private members' business. This would be in the best interests both of the government and of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, but I should like to rectify some of the impressions hon. members may have got this morning from hearing certain remarks. There was talk of the unusual length of this session. Still, my own research reveals that though we are breaking all records in terms of the length of the session or number of days on which the House has sat, in fact as far as sessions are concerned, the second, third, fourth and fifth of the 19th Parliament lasted quite a long time.

The second in fact, that goes back to 1940-42, lasted 441 days, that is, over a year, the third of the same Parliament, in 1942-43, lasted 371 days, the fourth, in 1943-44, 364 days and the fifth, in 1944-45, 371 days. Recently, in 1964-65, the second session of the 26th Parliament lasted 411 days. The first session of the 27th Parliament, in 1966-67, 476 days; and there are the more recent examples that were mentioned earlier in the debate. For instance, in 1968-69, the first session of the 28th Parliament lasted 406 days and the third session of the same Parliament, 497 days.

To my mind, we should not be influenced by the length of sessions, or fear them as such. What counts, is that Parliament should continue to work productively as the case has been in this session. There is still much to be done. I feel the argument is totally false whereby we should have a new session because the session has lasted long enough or there is not enough work left to do.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to ask him a question?

Mr. Corbin: I shall try to answer him, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is it not correct that the figures that the hon. member has now given regarding certain sessions relate to the total number of calendar days between the day the sessions started and the day they ended? On that basis, this session is well over 500 days.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely righ . . . I did say that it was the length of the session in days. I refer to the column "number of sitting days". I could have said for example, that in the second session of the 26th legislature, in 1964-65, there were 248 sitting days. Perhaps it is not a record but it is not far from being so and this is quite a lot of days.

In 1966-67, in the first session of the 26th legislature, we did sit for 250 days which was the record until this week. In the third session of the 28th legislature, from 1970 to 1972, there were 244 sitting days. So there is no reason for getting nervous or scandalized by the length of the present session.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of my party in opposition to this motion. We think that all it is is a sop to those who previously argued for the need for a new session. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am not persuaded by the argument that it has been the longest session in history and therefore we should depart from tradition. I have some Conservative elements in my bones, but certainly not to that extent.

Therefore, one has to look at the reasons for having sessions roughly of the order of 12 months; that is the crucial point. Why is it appropriate to have a new session of parliament with a new throne speech? I was amazed by the contention of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that a government could come in with a session lasting five years. Sure, they could from the constitutional point of view; there is no question about that. The question is, is it appropriate, in a parliamentary democracy, to do that? We most categorically say "No". We say "No" because of the changing circumstances in this country, particularly the country's economy, which require a government to come back at more frequent intervals to propose means for dealing with the country's problems. This is precisely why we think a new session is required, and required now. The last throne speech was delivered on September 30, 1974, nearly a year and a half ago. The problems of the country are substantially different now—I shall come to this point in a moment—or at least their manifestations are different. Part of what the government said in its throne speech has been denied—particularly what it said about wage and price controls—by the action the government has taken since then.

I say, with all the emphasis I can bring to bear on this point, that the reason we are opposing this motion is that we want a new session with a new throne speech which will deal with the following pressing problems. There are 800,000 Canadians looking for work. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who need housing in virtually every city, town and small village in the country. There is the shambles that is passing for a nuclear policy. Quite hypocritically, the government has day after day this week pretended to the people of Canada that it is going to introduce a nuclear policy. The purpose of this policy is to control and maintain nuclear technology for peaceful purposes, but in my view the government has virtually made up its mind to embark upon a deal with Pakistan which will lose all control for Canada over nuclear technology and set the stage for the development of a new nuclear weapon elsewhere in the world. There is no nuclear policy at all. The transportation minister has outlined in general form his current views, which in terms of the reaction of many people in western Canada is a potential dismemberment of the national railway system that we now have in this country.

Last, but not least, there have been the philosophical meanderings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on television during the past month when, in typical sophistical fashion, he has raised more questions than he dares provide answers to, and has been interpreted as being everything from a facist on the right to some kind of Stalinist socialist to the left.

The people of Canada have every right to expect this government now to come up with a new throne speech outlining in detail what it wants to do about unemployment, about housing, about nuclear policy and about transportation policy, and putting in more precise terms the framework the Prime Minister thinks he is going to use in developing his new society. We want action on these matters now, and that is why we oppose this motion.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, this parliament has never—

An hon. Member: Now you are going to get it.

Mr. Fairweather: Nobody is going to get anything. This parliament has never really met the issue of reform of its procedures. With the greatest amount of respect to the Pearson years, to which I alluded this morning because I was in a mood of déjà vu and because of certain privileges that have returned to the scene, the requirements of these years really have not been met and, as the British had to do in the 1890s, we must reform the system.

It seems to me that the length of a session is not particularly the problem, though it does obscure the public's perspective of what we are about here. The problem, surely, is that the rules and practices, outmoded as they are, are designed for a 12-month year when you start it up in January and there is a great effort to get home at Easter. I am of an age that I still remember the predecessor in my constituency chugging in on the railway train sometime around May when he had completed the annual task, and then when there was an emergency the train would go out again and there would be a couple of months work here in the fall. The public is slightly confused, despite the interesting statistics of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) because it lives in a calendar year and we seem to have slopped over slightly: we are now into the third calendar year.

It seems to me there are several reasons for really coming to grips with reform. One of them is civility to the staff of this institution, and I like to think that would be very high on our priorities. The second is civility to constituents who to me seem not to have the slightest idea, now, when their member of parliament can be expected in the constituency for any length of time.

In a philosophical political mood, I think the generosity of former of prime minister Pearson's weekly passes cannot be gainsaid; but that generosity brings with it a problem. The problem is that a good many members of parliament are constantly in the air, going somewhere or coming back from somewhere. This has had serious repercussions on their health, if I may say so, to say nothing of their consideration of legislation, and so on. Because of the generosity of our travel arrangements, people expect us to be in our constituencies to open up every gas pump and every hamburger stand. Not to be snooty about it, this means that unless we are careful—

An hon. Member: What have they got in those hamburgers?

Mr. Fairweather: I am probably the product of too many hamburgers. I am not being snooty or stand-offish, but I think we have to be selective in the acceptance of invitations.

I used to feel some compassion for one of the former ministers. He is not here now, and perhaps his travel arrangements are the reason for his absence. I used to watch him leaving on Fridays for one of the coasts of this country and did not know how the man carried on his portfolio from 35,000 feet over the Rockies, week in and week out, year in and year out. I do not think it was a good arrangement for his private life, his portfolio or his participation in parliament.

There are a couple of parliaments which have dealt with this matter, but perhaps not in as dramatic a fashion as I would like. One is Australia, where every third week—and I can be corrected on this—there is a certain length of time off. The system needs time to regurgitate—

An hon. Member: Do something about it, Mitch.

Mr. Fairweather: —which means that all those pieces of paper that flow inexorably—like Tennyson's brook, this "goes on forever"—can be indexed, and so on, and brought up to date. In this way, members of parliament could make arrangements in their constituencies. Constituents would get to know that, say, every third or fourth week would in fact be constituency week. They could lay up a whole series of gas pump and hamburger stand openings and the other things we are expected to do in order to fulfil our heavy responsibilities to the state.

Thank goodness we are still operating on the Christian calendar. With great respect to the House leader, if we did not have the intervention of Christmas, Easter, and perhaps Canada, Dominion, national, or whatever day it is now, we would not stop at all; we would just go on and on like the squirrel on a roundabout. We are still committed to several breaks a year because this is a country that pays attention to Christmas, Easter and a couple of other events.

It happened that just at noon today I had a chance of talking with that estimable servant of parliament, the Chief Electoral Officer. I asked when it would be possible for him to get for us who are democrats; and there are a few left—

An hon. Member: They are old democrats.

Mr. Fairweather: They are not necessarily the same thing. Anyway, I asked the Chief Electoral Officer to make arrangements—and I really wonder why we still fuss about this in 1976—to provide a list, on an annual basis, of those members of the armed forces who put down our respective constituencies as their place to vote. I was talking about democrats. Unfortunately, there are large numbers of people in the armed forces who are not democrats and who guard the list of their members and where their members exercise their electoral responsibility as if it were the key to security in this country.

We have a series of wonderful men and women serving Canada, and I not prepared to believe that the safety of this country is inhibited by the fact that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal knows that 200 of the 78,000 members of the armed forces have their location or their home voting place in my constituency. I said, "My dear Mr. Hamel, can you give me this list? I really resent sending somebody, every election, to appear before the returning officer to copy out laboriously by hand, the 200 or 300 names." He said, "That could easily be done, although the security of the state is involved, so the military people tell us. "He said," there is a private member's bill on the order paper somewhere, and if you could get that bill advanced, and if the committee were sitting, this could be done." I told him that with the timetable we have, and because of the length of the session, that might be pretty difficult to do, but that perhaps he could initiate a bill with the government through the responsible minister.

The reason I am on this track is that I wish to point out the dilemma in respect of this long session. The 40 days might have been very good to spend in the wilderness, although there were certain problems then, I understand from careful reading. But 40 days is a pretty difficult period for members of parliament to get their ideas through to the heads of the government. It might take more than 40 days, for instance, to get the government House Leader to agree with me that the reforms I propose are necessary. Perhaps it would not. Perhaps he would be prepared to initiate these things. I think it would involve a fairly fundamental commitment on the part of all of us.

I think this is a place that needs a few people who are prepared to go to the ramparts of parliamentary reform, and not just settle in in the committee in room 112-N. That is not the issue. The issue has to be made perceptible to the public. I think, fortunately for us—here I am perhaps being a little forthrighteous—most members of the public do not have a clue concerning what we are about, and that keeps us safe. There is a third bit of responsibility in this regard, because I see in the press gallery one in the employ of the great monopoly, the Canadian Press, who will send a message down to Wellington Street to announce to all of Canada what is going on here today.

An hon. Member: One man.

Mr. Fairweather: I wish him well, but it is even better when there is somebody else around. It must be very lonely for him.

An hon. Member: Now we have two.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Keep it up. We might get three.

Mr. Fairweather: Apparently the hordes are at our gates. Anyway, I have enjoyed this minute or two. However, I really would like, before the year is over, to see us come to grips with this matter to see whether there is some way in which the ideas of members of parliament can be sorted out and sent on to committees. Some of them, believe it or not, my dear government friends, are not bad in their concepts and the country would be better off if they were adopted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister is seeking the floor at this time. In accordance with citation 166 of Beauchesne's, he would be using his right of reply, having moved the motion, and therefore would be closing the debate. I wish to inform hon. members of that.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate, but I should like to make two or three comments about the purpose of putting down this motion which seems to have been misrepresented, if not misunderstood. Second, I wish to make some further comments in support of what the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has just said. The purpose of this motion is to restore certain private members' rights that had expired because of the length of this session.

I should like to say to all hon. members, particularly those in the New Democratic Party, that this is not put forward as a concession. This problem was recognized by the government some time ago. I made clear, at a meeting I had with the representatives of the parties, that I intended to introduce a motion for the purpose of restoring these private members' rights that had expired because of the length of the session. My hon. friend, now the House leader for the Conservative party, put forward a motion under Standing Order 43 with which I agreed. Indeed, it was a bit of conspiracy on our part that it might have been put through under a Standing Order 43 motion. Unfortunately, there were some replies of "No" and I took the responsibility of bringing the motion forward.

This is no concession in lieu of a new Speech from the Throne, as has been represented by the New Democratic Party. This is what I think should be done under the circumstances. The question of whether we will have a Speech from the Throne is quite a separate question. I suggest that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would rather have a grievance than have private member's rights restored. This seems to be the situation for which he has argued. He says, for example, that he would rather this motion did not pass the House because he would prefer to have a Speech from the Throne. What he wants is a grievance that the government has not undertaken to start another session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have lots of grievances with this government. I do not need another one.

Mr. Sharp: I wish the hon. member had said that. I am sure members on all sides would like to have these private members' rights restored. Perhaps I might make some other comments. The first concerns the reason for the length of this session. If one looks back at the record of some recent sessions, it will be clear that a great backlog of unfinished legislation accumulated during minority parliaments.

It was the view of the government that, if possible, we should try to avoid that happening again. It has been our wish to clear the order paper of all the bills that had accumulated over a considerable period. This we have been trying to do. There have been some very contentious pieces of legislation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre compared the situation with Westminster. I would point out to him that, of course, Westminster operates under very different rules. He knows this. The British government can put forward a firm schedule of bills to be completed within a session, in the knowledge that it has the rules for the purpose of getting it approved. We do now have these rules.

During this session there have been debates of enormous length which would never have been permitted under the rules of Westminster. So I agree with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that surely in this parliament we should be making a fundamental review of our rules so that this sort of situation does not occur again, and so the government will know that when it puts forward a program of legislation, that program will be substantially completed within a year. We must show some restraint on our side in not encumbering the order paper with too many bills. On the other hand, I am sure hon. members would agree that the bills which have been put down have been important, essential legislation. We did not put down a lot of bills which we did not have confidence would be approved.

We believe—perhaps the NDP does not—that the time has come for some restraint in government spending. On this side I think we have the support at least of the Conservative party. Whenever we bring forward legislation to do this, it is an excuse for holding up the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't clutch us too close to your bosom.

Mr. Sharp: There have been some references to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization covering some of the points that have been raised here. For example, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has been instructed by the committee to bring in terms of reference on private members' hour for the proper use of that hour, another member on the management of time, another on the work of committees. These are the fundamental questions. I do urge upon the House that this committee be allowed to make rapid progress, which is only possible with the co-operation of the House leaders and of the parties concerned, not just of individual members, and that when the report is made it will be dealt with expeditiously.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had information given to me which is relevant with respect to what we have been talking about. I was given to understand that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has announced outside the House of Commons a large wheat sale to the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from raising his point of order, but I thought the point of order was related to the proceedings of the House. If the hon. member wishes to raise that point of order, I suggest that he raise it at the end of routine proceedings just before we go on to government orders, once a vote has been taken on the motion before us. I think at that time there will also be more members in the House.

I will now put the question to the House, and after we have reached orders of the day I will call upon the hon. member. The question is on the motion of Mr. Sharp. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,544, 3,908 and 3,931.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

2. From 1969 to date, for each category of farm operation classified as (a) viable (b) potentially viable (c) non-viable (d) all farms, what is the (i) number (ii) total acreage (iii) average acreage (iv) total acreage under cultivation (v) average acreage under cultivation (vi) total net family income (all sources) (vii) average net family income (all sources) (viii) total farm net income (ix) average farm net income (x) distribution by county?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. The terms "viable" and "potentially viable" are not used by DREE in respect to the agricultural sector of Phase 2 of the PEI Comprehensive Development Plan.

2. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable. (d) Published by Statistics Canada.

3. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable.

DREE—NEW BRUNSWICK FUNDING

Question No. 3,908—Mr. Howie:

Did the Province of New Brunswick request funding from DREE over the next five years for (a) upgrading of Route 1, Sussex to Saint John (b) upgrading of Route 10, Fredericton to Moncton and, if so, in each case (i) how much (ii) how much financial assistance is DREE prepared to give?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is: In response to a request from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the province of New Brunswick submitted to the department an outline of the provincial plan for highway construction and improvement to be undertaken over the next five years. Although the projects listed in this question form a part of the overall provincial plan, there has been no specific request from the province for DREE assistance to them. The question of what assistance, if any, might be provided is being considered in the continuing process of federal-provincial discussion regarding DREE activities in New Brunswick. (i) Not applicable. (ii) Not applicable.

BAYDA REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Question No. 3,931—Mr. Reynolds:

What action has been taken to date on the twenty-two recommendations made by Mr. Justice E. D. Bayda in his Report of the Industrial Inquiry Commission under the Canada Labour Code into the Grain Handling Industry in the Vancouver Port Area dated July 1975?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The findings and recommendations of the Report of the Industrial Inquiry Commission into the grain handling industry in the Vancouver port area, received by the Minister of Labour on July 24, 1975, were carefully considered by the government. The report was tabled in the House and released to the parties on December 5, 1975 and the Minister of Labour met the parties in Vancouver on December 10. The Minister also consulted members of the Canada Labour Relations Council on the report, its findings and recommendations. The government endorses in principle the recommendations aimed at improving the bargaining relationship but rejects those recommendations requiring heavy intervention in the labour-management relationship and a legislative approach. In keeping with the government's position, the Minister of Labour appointed an Industrial Relations Consultant pursuant to Section 197 of the Canada Labour Code on December 23, 1975. The Consultant, Mr. H. Landon Ladd, was appointed to develop in co-operation with labour, management and the government of Canada, an industrial relations program with a view to promoting conditions favourable to the attainment of industrial peace and to assist the parties in the implementation of such a program. The appointment is in the spirit of recommendations #4 and #5 of the commissioner's report but does not use the title "Federal Overseer" as specified in recommendation #4. No action has been taken on the other recommendations contained in the report.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—ANNOUNCEMENT OF WHEAT SALE TO U.S.S.R.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, while we were dealing with Routine Proceedings I raised a point of order. If it is agreeable, and I think I have the right in any event, I will now raise it as a question of privilege affecting all members of this House. I understand that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, made an announcement today in this building, outside this Chamber, about a very large, significant, and happy sale of wheat to the U.S.S.R.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I would be the first to say that we join with members on the government side in expressing satisfaction with regard to that. However, it would have been a matter of common courtesy and in accordance with parliamentary practice if, having regard to the fact that the announcement was made about 1:30 this afternoon, prior to reaching the item on the order paper for ministers' statements, the minister had made that statement in the House.

If the statement was so important that the minister had to rush breathlessly to the television cameras, why did he not rush breathlessly into the House to ask for consent to revert to the order for ministers statements, which the House would have been delighted to do? That would have been following what has been common parliamentary practice for some time.

I can understand the minister's joy and that of the country. However, I hope the government House leader brings it to the minister's attention that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization laboured long and hard in order to come up with a new procedure by which ministerial statements, or that which ought to be ministerial statements, could be made in the House of Commons where there would be an opportunity to reply. That would give us an opportunity to find out the terms and conditions of such an important and happy transaction. I hope that this minister, experienced as he is, will consider that. In failing to give the House that kind of information he breaches the privileges of this House. More than that, he displays bad parliamentary manners. He should know better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the challenge of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Notwithstanding his new duties, one has to conclude that he is far more at home with corn than with wheat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: He has, of course, not had time to examine what he calls the parliamentary practice. If he does examine it he will find that some long time ago I indicated to the House that while sales like this, which by the way was a sale to China and not to Russia—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: —while sales like this are extremely important, it would not be my practice, in this case any more than with regard to any departmental or governmental situation, to attempt to make the announcement in the House. I suppose if there were a kind of bulletin board occasion for that, one might like to do it so that the opposition could properly respond and say that is great, wonderful, and nothing more, instead of taking up the time of the House with a lot of extraneous matters.

In this case, it is not only a case of not making an announcement. While important, it follows the pattern of sales and, therefore, involves no new policy. However it is true this sale had been made possible because of a policy of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: It allows for a guarantee by the government of the credit involved on the part of the buyer, China. However, as I say, that is a standing policy which I am sure was discussed in the House at the time it was first introduced. It is not necessary to indicate its specific use each time it is utilized.

The sale to China represents another kind of government policy, maintaining a good relationship with a country like China. We have maintained that relationship as we have done with Cuba, even though hon. members opposite may argue about specific acts on the part of the government. We have maintained the position of a good trading relationship. An open door is important.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister will agree that he is getting far away from the point of order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think you might find from examining the record that I have not gone much further afield than the hon. member, but I will nonetheless adhere to your good advice and stay with the question of privilege.

Announcement of this 35 million bushel sale by the Canadian Wheat Board with credit terms over an 18 month period was, as a matter of practice, made simultaneously by the Canadian Wheat Board as the selling agent and by myself because of the government policies involved, including the credit. The time for making the announcement is, in fact, determined as a matter of course by the Canadian Wheat Board. I try to accommodate their time as much as possible. I make myself available to the press because of the great interest to the nation in the matter. The House finds out about it immediately as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members will agree that the Chair should not get involved in the debate that had taken place. The question that has been raised may be of importance, but the Chair only has to decide whether a prima facie case of privilege is involved.

The question is of importance to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and other hon. members. It is of great interest to the Canadian people. However, insofar as a breach of the privileges of hon. members is concerned, all precedents indicate there is no way the Chair can make a decision supporting the arguments of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

The Chair has to decide all breaches of privilege regarding the operations of this House or affecting the rights of hon. members in the performance of their duties. In any event the hon. member did not substantiate his question of privilege by a motion that would have required action by this House. Therefore I must reject his point.

Orders of the day.

• (1530)

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would just remind the House through you that none of this great debate would have taken place if it were not for the great productivity of our farmers in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Despite the minister.

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the amendment of Mr. Gilbert (p. 11210).

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, when I was interrupted by the clock last evening you will recall, I was admitting to puzzlement and was asking myself why the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) chose this particular time to renege on the undertaking of a previous Liberal government, the Pearson government, to provide assistance to the provinces in the medicare field, at the same time repudiating an undertaking given ten years earlier by the Diefenbaker government to assist the provinces in the supply of hospital services. Is it, I was asking myself, because the minister feels that the basic infrastructure is now in place, and that in consequence federal assistance can now be withdrawn? Happily for me, my knowledge of the inside of a hospital is very limited, but I am aware of the lack of hospital facilities across the country.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan) on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, it should be drawn to the hon. member's attention that this is not a bill dealing with hospitals. Hospitals are covered by the Hospital Insurance Diagnostic Services Act. The government is not cutting back or setting a ceiling on any kind of hospital costs. This is a medicare bill. The hon. member should be brought to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I merely want to remind the parliamentary secretary that Bill C-68 is an act to amend the Medical Care Act.

As long as the hon. member points out the relation with medical care, it is difficult to call him back to order.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I find it a little difficult to dissociate medicare from hospitals. Medicare is given in hospitals. I would remind the hon. member that hospital services came first under a Conservative government; it took another ten years before his government got around to medicare.

As I was saying, we know that the hospital situation and the provision of medical care in hospitals have not been solved at the present time. Anyone who has any cause to be admitted to a hospital has first to wait for many, many months in any province in this dominion of ours. Of course, happily, emergency cases are generally handled quickly and taken care of, but acute cases, cases requiring an operation, sometimes these must be booked months in advance. For example, in Victoria it can be said that they have to wait six months, and I say this of my own personal knowledge. This suggests to me that there is still a great need for hospitals and hospital beds so that medicare can be properly administered in our hospitals, and nurses and doctors trained. There is also a need for a greater variety of hospital facilities, acute, intermediate, and chronic care.

Is this the time then, Madam Speaker, to cut back on assistance to the provinces, which is designed to help them meet their medical and hospital needs? I suggest quite the opposite is the case. With needs still pressing, with construction costs rising, with a government refusing to eliminate the tax on building materials, this is no time to trim back programs which, however unwillingly, were undertaken in the end in good faith 10 or 20 years ago by the provinces. This is what this legislation proposes to do.

I am at a loss to understand the government's priorities or whether it has any at all. This is certainly no time to trim programs. In a time of inflation when charges for medicare are increasing and the means whereby provinces can raise funds to meet these charges are not increasing, the federal government chooses to draw back on its program. What is needed, of course, is a proper balance between acute, intermediate, and chronic care facilities, all of which cases have to be housed in order that medicare can be administered. If once we can get to that position it might be more rational for the federal government to back out gently on a phased program from its earlier undertakings. But a proper balance is still a long way off.

Because it is a long way off, the existing hospital situation is being aggravated. Chronic care patients and patients convalescing are occupying acute bed space. The truth of the matter is that the government has done nothing to get hospital needs sorted out, thereby reducing pressures that are being exerted on acute bed facilities and permitting medicare to be properly administered to all Canadians, as was the original intention. I say this is no time to cop out. Therefore I am concerned in the first place with the drastic cutback of a needed program. This I find quite unacceptable. The amendment before us proposes a six months' hoist. Perhaps such a period would enable the government to reflect and to change its approach to this whole question, and for this reason I support the amendment.

My second concern about this measure, one closely related to the amendment and the need for a six months' delay before proceeding with this bill, has to do with the manner in which this federal cop out took place. In the minister's opening remarks we heard that lengthy consultations took place. Oh yes, they were well advertised. We had people in the conference centre and many discussions took place between federal and provincial ministers of health. Indeed the matter was raised, I am almost certain, when the premiers met with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

These consultations were presumably designed to reach some sort of consensus. Then without any forewarning whatsoever, in a budget statement on June 23 last year, pop goes the weasel, and a cop out is upon us. Without any warning, without telling the provinces what it was going to do, the federal government decided to back out. This legislation is the implementation of that undertaking in the budget speech.

If one could give credence to the statements of the government, Madam Speaker, it prides itself on its record of consulting before acting. It says it floats notions ostensibly to get feedback. But if we look behind those statements to the facts, we find quite a different situation. It consulted in the Liberal sense, in the sense that this government consults on the matter of price and wage controls. We all remember the discussions that were held before the implementation, the coming, or the appearance of Bill C-73. They presumed to have consultation on these matters and then, having encountered a pretty resounding opposition from labour, management, and the provinces, without any warning, zap—down comes C-73, the anti-inflation measure drafted by Draco himself. Draco, for those who are interested, having been the archon of Athens in 621 B.C., whose code of laws is described—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am afraid that now the hon. member is straying from the amendment.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I was using this illustration of simple draconian measures as one form of consultation to justify the fact that this government pretends to consult but does not.

If I may continue, however, the consultation process, so-called, has taken place in other areas. I have noticed consultation on matters of airports, presumably to strengthen security measures. After full consultation what happened? They dispensed with commissionaires, hired and gave short-term training to recruits who were dressed up to look all the world like RCMP constables. I am sure they are not fully trained RCMP personnel, but this is the form of consultation. It is not consultation. The decision was taken long beforehand. They have consulted on other matters of airports, but in order to spare being called to order again I will continue.

In the final Viet Nam caper there was a form of consultation, if you like. There was the suggestion that there ought to be a group of members of parliament go over to Viet Nam to see if the situation warranted the participation of Canada. I am satisfied that the decision was taken before that delegation set out.

This time on medicare they claim to have consulted à la Libérale. The minister described how often he and his homologues had consulted with his provincial counterparts and with the premiers of the provinces, with all this discussion about a new formula for medicare. Why did they bother to consult? I have asked myself this on other occasions. It is patent now, this is the Liberal way. It is façade, window dressing, cosmetic and spurious, because they know all along what they are going to do. They had decided to get out, and now they are getting out, after all those glowing promises of ten years ago. Would Mr. Pearson approve? Would he have conducted himself this way at this time? Would he renege as this government is reneging, and in this manner, under the cover of consultation here, as in so many other cases, they have followed the course they plotted for themselves before even proposing consultation.

What about motivation; I have wondered about that. I have wondered a lot about the motivation of the government which seems determined, even motivated, to pit one part of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member again, but the hon. member is definitely not speaking on the bill.

An hon. Member: Oh, but he is.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I find it difficult to follow this ruling as I am merely citing examples in which the government claims to be doing one thing yet is doing another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): With all due respect, it claims to have consulted with the provinces on medicare and then it just tears up the consultation and acts. It is quite obvious to us now that the government knew beforehand how it was going to act. Why bother going through the charade of consultation?

I should have thought in this country of ours which has such variety the government in all sincerity would have consulted and obtained a consensus, but not this government. What is the great problem? If I appear to be wandering into other fields, Madam Speaker, it is merely to show that this is not just in the area of medicare, but in all other areas where the government follows this same practice.

An hon. Member: It is a course of conduct.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like with your permission to go back to Edmund Burke, and again the Edmund Burke that so few people quote. Government and legislation, he said to the people of Bristol 200 years ago, and his words are still true, are matters of reason and judgment and not of inclination, but what sort of reason is that in which determination precedes discussion and in which one set of men deliberate while another decides? While ministers are talking, the Prime Minister is deciding exactly what he is going to do, and that is consultation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's a leader for you.

Mrs. Holt: Your leader hasn't been here for a couple of days.

An hon. Member: You want to be thankful about that, Simma.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Here we are by predetermination and farcical consultation under which the government acts. Why has the government decided to act divisively in this case and in so many instances, even on the matter of the death penalty which will come before us? The government does not consult the Canadian people, otherwise there would be no Bill C-83 or C-84. The government decides to act counter to what it ought to know the Canadian people need and want. This is a case in point today.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Trudeau times are tough times.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You were raised in a tobacco patch.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am almost afraid to guess why the government acts in this way. I leave it open because to look too carefully into that grinning maw could produce nightmarish results.

Motives there must be, but for what purpose does the federal government want to antagonize all provincial governments, as it is clearly doing by introducing this measure and by announcing its withdrawal from the scheme in a budget statement, even after certain assurances had been given to provincial ministers that further consultations on the matter could be expected? Then came the bombshell of June 23, 1975, and the bill now before us. Is this an application of the divide and rule principle? If it is, it is strange now because I cannot imagine one single provincial government that is not allied in the assault with every other provincial government to oppose the federal government on its present plans. It may be dividing the federal government from the provincial governments, but is is certainly not dividing the provincial governments among themselves. This then seems to be confrontation, confusion, and antagonism leading to chaos. The government seems to thrive on this procedure.

Why would it not be better to have honest discussion, an open exchange of views, a search for concession, co-operation, and emergent order arising from consensus? The Canadian people have reason to ask themselves these questions. Surely in a country like Canada this is what we need, and it is to an opportunity to attain that blissful state that the present amendment is directed. I therefore support it and urge the government to reassess its stand during the six months' period which acceptance of this particular amendment would provide.

There are several other questions which can be asked. I have dealt only with the basic elements of the matter. Where are the provinces to find the funds to supply the services for which high expectations have been built? Are they to find them through provincial taxation? In the present circumstances of inflation the provinces have only limited taxation capabilities. Can we ensure, given provincial inequalities in respect of fiscal capacities, that even if they could raise the funds that we would have equal medical service for all Canadians which this plan originally was intended to provide. We cannot give this assurance. One of these days soon hon. members opposite perhaps will move to another province where they will require medical care and where they may find that they will not receive as much care as they did.

An hon. Member: Let us hope it will be very soon.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I fear that there will be a deterioration in the quality of health services and in the uniformity of health services across the country with the passage of this measure. The government needs time to look at the whole thing again. The amendment would give the government that time. I plead with it to support the amendment.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, hon. members may have noticed a reluctance on my part to get to my feet to speak in this debate. I have had the pleasure of listening to the whole debate. I have risen at this time to announce that the winner of the study I have been conducting in respect of the most ridiculous sentence in this entire debate is the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). The sentence in his remarks which wins the prize is the expression: "This is certainly no time for the government to trim programs".

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Health programs.

Mr. Kaplan: I wish to quote for the hon. member some observations on whether or not this is the time to trim federal programs. Then I will discuss the programs. I quote:

> The economic condition of this country demands men and women of foresight, courage and sensitivity in the highest of offices. It demands of political parties the highest level of unity, commitment and purpose. The courage to reduce government expenditures has never been more necessary.

That is Premier William Davis speaking at the Conservative convention last week. He said that the courage to reduce government expenditures has never been more necessary.

An hon. Member: He was not talking about passing the buck.

Mr. Kaplan: I will continue:

> In the area of health care, a matter of national concern, we in Ontario have taken the view that no province, no careful and thoughtful society, can afford a system that expands more quickly in terms of cost than that society's ability to pay.

We are proposing under this bill that medical care contributions be increased by 13.5 per cent next year. The hon. member has said that is too little. He says this is no time to trim that program. Well, 13.5 per cent is beyond what the gross national product of Canada will increase next year. It is beyond the rate of inflation we are anticipating, so we are coming within the injunction of Premier Davis that no careful and thoughtful society can afford a system that expands more quickly in terms of cost than society's ability to pay.

In talking about medical care the premier went on and added this:

An hon. Member: He is a great premier.

Mr. Kaplan: He is right about this. He said:

> In simple terms that means for us, and for all Canadians that if we allow a system as critical as health service, for the needy, for the population as a whole, for the old and the feeble, for those who cannot help themselves, to become more expensive than our taxpayers can afford, then it will collapse. And if it does, only the rich and the advantaged will have care and benefit. So we must seek to trim and streamline, not because we want to, but because concern for the welfare of all who are served by the system says we have to.

I wish to deal also with the reference to the closing of hospitals. I want to make the point that the closing of hospitals is not related to the expenditure provided under the medical care bill. All of the costs for the maintenance of hospitals, the salaries, the overhead, the light bills, the heating bills and such things are covered by a statute which is not before the House now. Such things are covered by the Hospital Insurance Diagnostic Services Act. The government is not cutting back on hospital costs. Rather, five years' notice must be given of any intention to terminate the agreements with the provinces.

The hon. member said that the provinces would have to pay more. We continue to pay roughly 50 per cent of all hospital bills, no matter how much they increase. If they increase 20 per cent or 30 per cent our commitment is to pay them regardless. It must be clearly understood that this bill has nothing to do with hospital costs. The closure of hospitals in Ontario or elsewhere is not in any way related to Bill C-68 but is due to the general economic situation as perceived by that particular province and the fact that the province feels it cannot justify the cost of maintaining what it feels to be under-utilized and improperly utilized facilities when there is an ample supply of vacant beds in the same general area. The province concerned has made its decision in spite of the fact that there is no change in the federal cost-sharing under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

I should like to repeat that Bill C-68 contains two features that would facilitate the introduction by provinces of lower cost alternatives to expensive hospital care. This answers precisely the point made yesterday by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). I wish he had read the bill because it contains the very provisions he was demanding. Everyone can see there are patients in general hospitals who do not need to be there and who would not be there if they as insured persons could obtain the care they need elsewhere. While most of the comments of hon. members opposite have been directed to the imposition of ceilings on the medical care program for the next two years, I should like to direct attention to the other amendments the minister announced. If I might call it four o'clock I will do so on the next occasion during government orders. May I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Paproski: On what day?

Mr. Kaplan: Next Tuesday.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order No. 34 in the name of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Shall the order stand?

Mr. Paproski: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid).

An hon. Member: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order No. 10 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). Shall the order stand?

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, may I say I think it has been agreed so far as the business from four o'clock to closing is concerned that we would go to order No. 64.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that all the other orders stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ALASKA-YUKON HIGHWAY AUTHORITY ACT

MEASURE TO DEVELOP CANADIAN SECTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-264, to provide for the establishment of the Alaska-Yukon Highway Authority (Alaska Highway), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Madam Speaker, it was an important decision on the part of the House of Commons to allow this bill to come before us in today's private members' hour, which was to be just about the last private members' hour in this session. I am delighted at the fact that even after this most important measure has been referred to committee it will be possible for other private members to bring other matters before the House which are undoubtedly equally important.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And get the same treatment.

Mr. Oberle: This bill is timely for another reason, because recently certain actions have been taken in the United States which have an effect on the subject which we are discussing this afternoon. The government of the United States has passed a bill, signed by the president, which concerns itself with this great and historic road link.

I have just received a report from my most distinguished counterpart in the U.S., Senator Ted Stevens from Alaska, regarding the federal action of the government of the U.S., which I would like to put on the record. It reads as follows:

> The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1973 . . . authorizing reconstruction work on the Alaska and Haines Cutoff Highways, requires that prior to the expenditure of funds by the United States an agreement must be reached between the United States and Canada covering all conditions under which the highway is to be built. During discussions in January of 1975, Canadian officials advised U.S. highway representatives that Canada could not agree to hold the right-of-way for this highway forever inviolate. This requirement was contained in Public Law 93-87 authorizing the reconstruction project. All other provisions of the agreement were tentatively agreed to by representatives of the Canadian and U.S. governments.
> In order to remove this restriction and get the project moving, legislation was introduced on March 19 which would require that Canada provide "all necessary right-of-way". The bill passed the Senate on September 4, was referred to the House and was passed by that body on December 1. On December 12, President Ford signed the legislation into law.
> With this restriction removed, hopefully the tentative agreement between the U.S. and Canada can soon be finalized. The Federal Highway Administration (FHA) reported that the agreement had been sent to Canada's Public Works Department. The agreement will ultimately come before the Canadian cabinet for its consideration.
> FHA reports that the groundwork has been laid for the environmental impact study. Engineering plans for the project are also quite well along. However, until the agreement is finalized no funds can be committed and construction will continue to be delayed.

Why should the U.S. government be concerned about the Alaska highway? Later on in my comments I will touch on that briefly because, after all, it was the U.S. government which built this great road link in the first place.

The section with which the U.S. government is concerned at present is the section which would tie that portion of Alaska, which is known as the panhandle, with the other parts of Alaska. In other words, residents of Fairbanks, Cordoba and Anchorage will be able to travel to Juneau, and in order to do that they will have to travel through the Yukon territory and indeed through portions of British Columbia, through the constituency represented by the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo). I have great hope that since my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena, is in the House today and, I understand, will be addressing herself to the subject, she will probably allow this bill to go to committee for discussion as I know that she also is extremely interested in achieving the goal which my bill hopes to achieve.

If you will allow me, Madam Speaker, I would like to give a brief history of the Alaska highway. The construction of the Alaska highway had been proposed for many years before the outbreak of World War II. However, it was not until the Japanese occupied some of the Aleutian Islands and threatened the air ferry supply to Russia that a highway was actively considered.

Construction of a pioneer road by engineer troops followed rapidly on the heels of the location crews. Speed was the first consideration and this road detoured around swamps, gullies, rock knolls and other obstructions, resulting in a very crooked road with many step grades. Many of these crooks and crannies are still in the Alaska highway today.

After August, 1942, efforts were directed to getting the pioneer trail converted to a passable road at the earliest possible moment. This road disregarded the public roads administration procedures, where design alignment and grade would delay completion, and followed the path of least resistance. In March, 1943, instructions were issued to complete the work at the minimum possible cost and standards were reduced still further. Road construction ceased in October, 1943, but bridge construction continued until 1944. The resulting highway, while passable and providing a good gravel driving surface, had geometrics of a varying but generally poor standard.

After the responsibility for the highway was transferred from the United States army to the Royal Canadian Engineers, the terms of reference under which they operated did not permit major road relocations. Temporary bridges were replaced by permanent structures at many locations and some exceptionally hazardous areas were reconstructed, but the alignment of the highway is essentially that of 1943.

In 1959-1961 the highway was paved to RAU 50 standard from mile zero to 84. This standard provided two 12-foot traffic lanes and 5-foot shoulders. The British Columbia department of highways has been responsible for the maintenance of the paved section since 1962. The other portions of the highway are still a responsibility of the Department of Public Works and they are having their difficulties with the contractors who have to maintain this road. Certain other commitments have also been made to reconstruct certain sections, particularly in the lower end of the highway.

Over the years the government has studied the possibility of doing major work on the highway and upgrading it to a national highway standard. A report was commissioned. In 1966 the Stanford report was prepared for the government. It recommended that any further action in respect of the highway be shelved for at least ten years. It is now 1976 and that ten year period has expired. That again is the reason why the bill before us is timely.

It was also recommended to the government that it should not be concerned about the development of our northland and the development of our resources since the highway is an outdated mode of transportation for the movement of goods and people today, when we have jet airplanes and other more up to date modes of transportation. The report said that the highway is old fashioned. I wonder who the consultants were who worked on that report. I am sure they must have been those consultants to whom we pay one billion a year.

I am not in conflict with that statement made in the report, particularly when one considers only the need to find, extract and exploit our natural resources, and does not consider the human factor, the people who live there, our first citizens and early settlers, and does not consider that even in that region, with all the modern facilities of transportation, people would be required to develop and to populate that area.

Let us look at the highway of today. It is a road link. Mile zero is at Dawson Creek, and it goes all the way through the great territory of the Yukon and into Alaska. There are stretches of 200 to 300 miles where there are no facilities of any kind. No one ever planned or considered that there would have to be service stations to help people in distress or to supply such amenities as gasoline, tire and vehicle repairs.

No one has ever considered that accidents can happen when people travel, particularly with the climatic conditions which exist in that part of our great country. No one has ever considered that we might have to evacuate injured people involved in accidents, and there is no provision for aircraft to land to evacuate people, or for first aid posts. There are no provisions to help people who travel this highway to meet with the natives who have lived there all their lives. No provisions were made for rest stops, parks, tourist amenities or anything else.

My bill proposes to establish an authority which would consider all these things, not only on the Alaska highway but also along all the other roads which are planned in the north as we are opening up this great northern hinterland. The hon. member for Skeena will understand very well what I am talking about because just a year ago the first vehicle went through yet another great north-south connection on the Stewart Cassiar highway, and there are no facilities for anyone travelling that road. It seems just to be an access to exploit the natural resources and the people who have pioneered and lived there and carved out an existence for generations.

I am also concerned about industries already located in northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory as well as the plight of these industries through not having a proper means of transportation for the shipment of their products and for the maintenance of the work force in their plants. All the resources of the great region of the Yukon must be shipped, or are presently being shipped, by our outmoded transportation system to a port linked to Alaska, and they end up in ports strange to our land. I am very excited about the plans announced for the northern part of British Columbia with respect to the transportation network, and I am hopeful that the government will seriously consider helping industries located in northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory by providing proper transportation facilities.

As hon. members know, the government has never been too excited about doing anything about regional economic expansion in the province of British Columbia. The reason for that has been, unlike other parts of the country, that industry in British Columbia has never asked for any help.

However, it is entitled to expect from provincial, federal and municipal governments that access is provided to the areas in which industry locates, that the infrastructure is considered by these governments, and that a quality of life is established in these northern areas which is in some ways comparable to the quality of life which other Canadians enjoy. That means many things. That means that we will have to look seriously at not just transportation facilities but also the establishment of proper towns, however small they may be.

We must provide communications systems which are much different from the ones which are being extended into these areas now. We have to make it possible for people in those areas to have access to the electronic media. Of course in many of those areas that is not possible today. We must be able to provide them with the communication facilities, telephone and radio facilities which people in other parts of the country enjoy.

I am encouraged by the plans of British Columbia railways. The line has now been extended to Fort Nelson and is enjoying the harvest of that area. It is a paying proposition. Also, the BCR has extended, or is in the process of extending, the rail link to Dease Lake, again in the constituency of Skeena, driving into the resource areas. The great mineral reserves and the great wood fibre reserves in these areas are being opened up, and nobody is giving any consideration as to how the traveller who wishes to go there, whether he is a tourist or a person looking for a livelihood, is to traverse these road links we are constructing.

An ambitious program to extend these lines is planned, and it is hoped that eventually the rail will tie up with some sort of railway in the Yukon and that the resources of the territory will be flowing through British Columbia to the coastal ports or to the eastern industries which are in need of them.

The emphasis on northern development in that region must not be concentrated around the extraction of our resources. Any strategy in respect of the development of that region must be related to the establishment of secondary industries as well. First of all, it must be geared to the development of our renewable resources, our great timberlands, which so richly endow the region. The type of industry referred to will require people. It is not necessary to elaborate on the importance of the development of these industries or on the importance these industries will have in helping alleviate the unemployment crisis in Canada. Furthermore, an immediate result would be a great increase in tourist traffic, which is an industry of prime importance to that area. Traffic surveys, and many surveys which have been carried out by the Department of Public Works underline this statement.

As hon. members of this House will know, a great number of our neighbours to the south use this road link in travelling to the state of Alaska. This is why the American government has expressed interest in helping us with this project. The people visiting our country who share with us the vastness and the beauty of the area of which I speak take nothing home with them but memories of a unique adventure, and pictures which they might have taken en route. However, they are contributing to the western economy to the extent that the tourist industry in British Columbia ranks second only in importance to the lumber and wood fibre industry. I have lived in that area, and I have been involved with the tourist industry for the last 20 years, so I know a little about the highway in question, as I know about other highways as well.

We are concerned about northern development. It is essential that we develop a transportation policy, and a road strategy which does not yet exist in Canada. It would help if the proposed authority could develop this strategy and a general philosophy concerning northern highway travel. This is what this bill is all about. Many people who live in the north and many leaders there have voiced allegiance to the strategy. Some people living up there will have to take a stand sooner of later. They will have to tell the government soon that there should not be more construction of roads or highways and no more development of resources unless a philosophy is developed to protect the way of life they have valued for so many years.

So far as our native people are concerned, the first wars against them in Canada were fought for roads and railways—for the iron horse that traversed our country. Madam Speaker, I can see another battle shaping up.

I had the privilege this morning of taking part in the meeting when the people of the Northwest Territories met with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and presented a brief on how they would like to see the north developed. They are impatient about the signs they have seen recently, and totally frustrated about the hundred years fumbling by a series of governments that have not addressed themselves to the needs and desires of people in the north.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, this morning we were privileged, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), myself and others, to listen to the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada as they presented their land claims to the government of Canada. The tender regard they have for the land they live in is none the less touching for it is the same feeling which we have for our part of our country.

The hon. member and I have the distinction of sharing between us the whole northern half of British Columbia; therefore the principle which he has placed before us today, the bill which would provide for the establishment of an Alaska-Yukon highway authority, is exceptionally important in view of the other aspects that we will be dealing with in connnection with transportation and communication in the northern half of British Columbia, and in the territory as well as the state of Alaska.

It is a rather strange thing that in our part of the world Alaska, part of the United States, seems to us somehow to be closer than the southern part of British Columbia which is, of course, the continguous part of the province we live in. There are often discussions between residents of the Panhandle and residents of our area in regard to road transportation, which are carried on at great length. At times it seems we forget that two countries are talking to each other about the mutual problems of access, information, and communication.

We have in northern British Columbia some magnificent resource bases that we are aware of, and of course we are not the only ones who are aware of them. Over the years we have seen an increasing interest displayed by the mining industry particularly, but also by the forest industry in development in the northern half of British Columbia. Access through this area in part is by the Alaska highway, which the hon. member referred to in his speech. I have travelled that highway many times—in a spirit of non-partisanship of course. I know that the hon. member will recognize that as I travel through what is basically his territory, that he makes up for it when he visits Skeena.

Having travelled this particular road I recognize that it is a vital link between the eastern part of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory, and of course links up with other transportation routes. I know when I have stopped to talk to people in Fort St. John or Fort Nelson their first comment generally is, "When is the Government of Canada going to do something about paving our section of the road?"

I think it would be interesting to state for the record just what the current situation is with regard to the Alaska highway. There have been 25 miles of paving completed in the Whitehorse area, six miles through Watson Lake, and ten miles beyond the present pavement at Mile 83 is under contract. Construction of a major structure, the Mushkwa bridge, is estimated at $2,900,000. This is under way through the bridge replacement program. Under the program of reconstruction of substandard sections, a contract for Mile 206 to Mile 232 is under way. Approval in principle has been received for construction and paving for Mile 93 to Mile 317. This, of course, is subject to some conditions; it will be used as the basis for Department of Transport negotiations of the northern roads program, and as part of the northern roads negotiations an undertaking will be sought whereby the British Columbia government will take over and fully maintain each section of the Alaska highway as it is reconstructed and completed.

This is where the problem lies that the hon. member has exposed for the view of this House today. We are not only dealing with the government of British Columbia, we are dealing with the Yukon Territorial Council, and the Government of Canada; we are dealing with the state of Alaska and the Department of External Affairs which have reference through their contacts with the government of the United States.

When this bill was called today, Madam Speaker, it was rather interesting to see the result. It was given to me as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but jurisdiction for this highway lies with the Department of Public Works. Naturally that caused some confusion because the Department of Transport also has interest in it. I believe the hon. member has brought forward a matter than can be considered. I think the imaginations of members of this House, not only of government members but all members, should be put to the test of finding ways of improving transportation communications in difficult situations such as this. There is no precedent under the British North America Act for this type of authority which would in essence point out that this is a highway which is essential to the good of Canada. That was not thought of when the British North America Act was drawn up.

We are dealing with a topic that is extremely sensitive. We have proposals for railway expansions that go from Prince George at the moment to Fort St. James, to Dease Lake. This will pass over the southern part of the area we are discussing. Hopefully, after preparations have been made and negotiations carried out on land claims in northwestern British Columbia, it will be possible for the CNR to go forward with their linkage to a place called Suskeena which I am sure many hon. members have never heard of. It is another of the tiny places with which the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River and I are familiar.

I sometimes think if it were not for the Oblate Fathers the hon. member and I would have no place to stop when travelling to visit our constituents. There generally are no hotels, no restaurants, no gas stations and no radio stations. Most parts of the area I am discussing do not have television signals. All of these things pertain to the mid-northern part of Canada which for so many years has somehow been overlooked.

As we met with the Inuit Tapirisat today I was considerably surprised to note that many of the non-Inuit people in the room knew a good deal about what was happening in Pangnirtung or Fort Chimo, and what was going on in the northeastern part of Labrador. The names seems to roll off the tongue very easily, but if I were to say "downtown Telegraph Creek" or Iskut, I am sure people would wonder what on earth I was talking about.

I am discussing a land that is not part of the regional economic expansion textbook in the classic sense. We are not a deprived area; we are an area of the future. In the eastern part of Canada the exploitation of resources has taken its toll and these are now depleted in some cases so the government has put in place its successful DREE program, which has augmented the possibilities of economic enhancement of those areas, but in our area this part of the process has never begun.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion recently announced that western northlands roads would receive $10 million for roads expansion in the area we are discussing, $5 million to be paid in this fiscal year.

In addition to these railway expansions there are dreams which go beyond present plans, dreams which will link places I mentioned such as Dease Lake with Whitehorse, and eventually Whitehorse with parts of the south so that we can utilize our own ports. Our Port of Prince Rupert is as essential to the people of this area as it is to the city of Prince George or to Edmonton. At the moment the Department of Transport is doing a very extensive review of the Pacific rim access which will make it possible for the people of this country to have a second trans Canada highway.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: That highway will be Yellowhead 16, which presently goes from Manitoba to the city of Prince Rupert.

● (1630)

I know that the glamour of the Northwest Territories has for long obscured the reality of mid-northern Canada. But we can no longer ignore the mid-north because, fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be, we are the great storehouse of resources. It is a bank of resources which must not be extracted indiscriminately. Too often in the past they were extracted indiscriminately. The people of the area now insist on their being extracted with the greatest care. Before we can utilize them properly, a massive road and communication system must be built and an infrastructure established for the people.

There was a time in the history of British Columbia when the government of the day approached resource extraction this way: "You go in and take out the resource. If the operation is successful, you build a one-resource town, and ultimately put in the infrastructure, like schools, hospitals, recreational facilities, etc." That was the theory, but often the resource was depleted, the infrastructure did not materialize, and the town disappeared.

Now there is new hope. The people of the north are conscious of their environment. It will be to the everlasting credit of this government that it established the Berger commission. Mr. Justice Berger has done much good work in the north. The people of this country, especially the people of the north, insist on having a large say on how resources shall be developed.

Let me tell the House a story which may illustrate my point. When I was a small child and the Japanese threatened to bomb Dutch Harbour in the Aleutians, there was panic in northern British Columbia. The people moved out of their homes and took to the mountains. We were ready for the worst. But, out of that terror something happened which had been thought impossible: within a short time the Alaska highway was built, the highway which everyone said was impossible to build. That shows you what can be accomplished. Madam Speaker, the Alaska highway is built. We must improve it, and improve the network of roads to the north.

Let me tell hon. members a story about the Stewart Cassiar highway, the highway leading to the far north. I often drive on that highway. Once, when I was needed in Ottawa, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) wondered what had taken me so long to come here. I explained that I had been caught between a mud slide and washout on the highway. Fortunately, I was able to get a small aircraft to land on a lake nearby. I boarded the aircraft and came back to Ottawa in time to please the Whip. That shows the adventure which can befall a member of parliament on that highway. We need small airstrips in the area. We need better tourist amenities along the highway to make it more attractive for tourists. But we are talking not only of tourists. We are talking about the utilization of Canadian ports.

At present it is economical to ship resources through the ports of Anchorage and Juneau. This situation could be altered successfully if there were transport access from the Alaska highway to the east and from the Stewart Cassiar highway to the south as well as a railway. Hopefully, access to a railway will transform the outlook for northern development.

One can say much about the area, much about its possibilities. The hon. member mentioned the coal in his constituency. If that coal were shipped through the port of Vancouver it would need to be hauled in a train pulled by ten locomotives, each of 3,000 horsepower. You could haul the coal to Vancouver, at great cost. But if the same coal were to be taken by rail to Prince Rupert, you would need only three locomotives, each of 3,000 horsepower to pull the train, and there would be a cost saving of one dollar per ton with regard to coal delivered at the port for trans-shipment to Japan. Such savings are worth-while. We must establish the infrastructure in the north which is necessary for development along the Alaska highway. I am glad the hon. member has drawn our attention to this aspect.

The Alaska highway itself has proved to be a boon. It has been greatly improved, and the improvements are continuing. Jurisdiction over the road was transferred from the Department of National Defence, which I forgot to mention as it is no longer in the picture, to the Department of Public Works has continued to improve facilities on the highway.

All of the mid-north, in which I include northern British Columbia, the northern parts of the prairie provinces, and even northern Ontario, although I smile when I hear people of northern Ontario calling themselves northerners as most northern Ontario lies south of most of the communities I represent—all of the mid-north of Canada above the 53rd parallel and below the 60th parallel deserves more attention than it is being given now. We need more communications in the area, even though there is a plethora of communications services. We have the CN-CP wire, the B.C.R. wire and the RCMP wire criss-crossing each other but not always helping the non-official people of the area to communicate with each other. These are problems we must consider.

Although I cannot agree with the hon. member's position, I am glad he brought to our attention a significant problem. We cannot deal with it in a committee of this House because it involves many jurisdictions. For instance, we need to consider the position of the Alaska state government and, in the long run, that of the United States government. For this reason there may be difficulty in connection with the hon. member's bill. But I congratulate him most sincerely for bringing this matter before the House so that he, and I, can remind the people of this country what is happening above the 53rd parallel.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, evidently we are carrying on today consideration of Bill C-264 which, if I remember well, was discussed in the House in 1973. It is perhaps advisable to recall that the purpose of the bill is to provide for the development of the Alaska-Yukon Highway as a matter of national and international importance. The bill provides that a non-Crown corporation may be established to take over the development of that highway in Canada. The bill is aimed at providing a national character to the organization taking into account the regional, federal and provincial as well as international interests, to the extent that the United States are responsible for the development of part of the highway and that American representatives are appointed as associated members of the administrative board of the authority.

I will not deal, Madam Speaker, with the appointment of some present or future members of Parliament as members of the authority as suggested by the mover of the bill, but I would say however that such a proposal seems to me at first rather unusual under our parliamentary traditions and practices, whatever may be done in other jurisdictions. Still I might add that the sponsor of the bill seems to have devoted much time to its preparation and that I do not question at all his sincerity, his objectivity and his good intentions. For all that I do not think I am an expert in these questions, and I should be interested in the progress of the bill, if it does pass this stage today. I do feel that the final product will be quite different from the text now before us once the bill has passed through the usual parliamentary sieve.

I hope the sponsor of the bill and his colleagues will forgive me if I refer to the few remarks made in this House by the then Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who has come back to his first designation, namely the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). As I said, I am not so much concerned with the specific value of the bill. I simply say that if the hon. members representing that area of the province attach enormous importance to it, I give them full marks because after all they are here to defend their regional and provincial interests. But I was really startled, I reacted at first timidly, I should admit; I was very surprised by what the hon. member for Laprairie said in 1973 when he proposed as a solution to the problem of the Alaska-Yukon Highway a strange compromise, a strange exchange with the United States. For the information of my colleagues, I shall quote from the original speech of the hon. member for Laprairie; on March 9, 1973, as recorded in Hansard, he said:

● (1640)

My proposition, which I consider sound and has a good chance of success if we can convince a few more people,—

Perhaps the hon. member was referring to people like me at that time.

—involves encouraging the U.S. government to construct a four-lane, high speed highway across the top of the state of Maine, linking the eastern townships—

That is in the province of Quebec.

—auto route with a point in New Brunswick, possibly involving some part of U.S. Interstate 95,—

These are the key words:

—in return for the Canadian federal government spending an equal amount of money on upgrading and paving the Alaska Highway. The arguments in favour of this proposition are obvious. It would promote Canadian unity; it would bring Canadians closer together by reducing travelling time between central Canada and the maritimes by a minimum of five hours. I am not talking from the eastern Canadian point of view.

In addition, it would reduce transportation costs between central Canada and the maritime provinces. It would make possible a large increase in tourist traffic between the maritime provinces—

It goes on and on. The hon. member for Laprairie advanced a number of arguments that, in my opinion, are more fancy than fact. I thought I would discuss that intervention here at this time.

And hon. members will forgive me if I consider quite unacceptable the trade-off proposition put forward by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) during the discussion of the question of the Yukon-Alaska Highway at that time. There was trading-off, Madam Speaker, since the hon. member for Laprairie wanted eastern Canadians to sacrifice their national interests for the benefit of the so-called national interest of western Canadians. As I said a moment ago in my remarks, there is no question of us in the east sacrificing anything whatever for the moment, for on all accounts our region is underpriviledged compared with the west. And I consider quite meaningless the proposition put forward in 1973 by the hon. member for Laprairie.

I consider that such a trade-off as the hon. member for Laprairie advocated in 1973 would require, as I said a moment ago, that we make immense sacrifices. Perhaps it would be fitting to say what would those sacrifices be.

I would mean that for all practical purposes we would abandon the idea of a national highway linking the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast, in exchange for what? In exchange for a highway which would cross a neighbouring state and divert all commercial, tourist and whatever traffic which now uses the Trans-Canada Highway at Fredericton, through Edmundston, which crosses the Quebec border at Rivière-du-Loup, goes through Quebec City and along the St. Lawrence River to Montreal, divert all that traffic towards an American highway. It would be an exchange to thank the Americans, to pay for the construction of a highway in certain areas of British Columbia, Alaska and Yukon, and who would be the losers and the winners in all that?

Well, I can tell you who will be the losers, and I am talking on behalf of my constituency, of at least half of the province, and even the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) who is absent today. I know that he shares my concern in that regard because he already stated his position publicly on that subject. We would be taking money from our pockets to give it to the people of British Columbia. As I said a moment ago, I have nothing against British Columbia, and it seems to me the problem we have been advised of is serious and deserves to be solved. However it should not be solved on the back of another part of the country, the east, the area which I represent here in the House of Commons.

That is what I had to say today, Madam Speaker. I wish the hon. member and his bill good luck. I hope, as he and some of his colleagues do, that we will have the opportunity of studying the bill in committee. I should be willing to sit on that committee and have a chance to dissect it, look into its intrinsic value and, if possible, work with the hon. member towards finding solutions, monetary, administrative or otherwise. I trust that, in return, at a later date, he can give me a hand in the solution of the serious highway problems we have in eastern Canada.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Watson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of clarification because my bill which I have had on the order paper was referred to just now. Remarks which I made on an earlier bill were referred to by the previous speaker, who is a very capable representative of northern New Brunswick. I would suggest, however, that some of the views he has expressed in defence of his own area are slightly parochial, even though they may be well founded from his local constituents' point of view.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. That is debate, not a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker, I feel the hon. member for Laprairie has enough experience in the House not to take advantage of a so-called point of order to attack me personally as he has just done.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am afraid that this is far from a question of privilege.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I do not like to pursue the line of argument we have just heard from my two hon. friends from eastern Canada.

● (1650)

I want to compliment the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) on the bill that he has put forward for debate today. It is one that I know he sincerely believes in and on which he has obviously spent a good deal of time, not only in this debate but on previous occasions, putting forth the ideas and suggestions in this bill.

While I certainly support the thrust of his arguments and the objectives of his bill, I cannot support the manner and method in which he is trying to improve the highway in his part of the country. If my hon. friend would stop to think for a moment of the difficulties that we, as a nation, are continuing to have in repatriating our own constitution, he would realize that there are jurisdictional difficulties in trying to set up the kind of authority he is proposing here, involving provincial, territorial, and federal rights, as well as United States interests and so on. He could spend years trying to get the authority itself operational; in the meantime he would lose a lot of time and energy from the point of view of building and developing the highway. As I say, while I agree with the bill's objectives, I disagree with the route and manner he has adopted.

There are certainly precedents so far as federal participation in the construction of highways is concerned. While highways are a provincial responsibility under our constitution, they are going the route of many other services that have been primarily a provincial responsibility up to the last number of years. We can all think of examples. Social services, hospitalization, education, while under provincial jurisdiction, have received federal support and co-operation. In this respect highways are rapidly joining that particular club.

At the Western Economic Opportunities Conference of only three years ago, highways and other transportation needs were very much a priority item of the four western provinces so far as federal help and participation were concerned. I am sure the hon. member is well aware of the Northlands agreements which have been signed with the four western provinces, the most recent one signed through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion being the one signed in Victoria on February 9, earlier this month. The hon. member will have had the opportunity to see the press release that was issued and to appreciate that funds are going almost directly into his part of the province. I know he will be the first to say they are insufficient, and I agree with him, but at least this is a step in the right direction.

As a result of that agreement federal funds will be provided to continue improvements to highway 97 between Prince George and Dawson Creek, to highway 37 between Stewart and Watson Lake, and further assistance is being provided to other highways in the area. Expenditures on highway 16 between Terrace and Prince Rupert are also being made. So once again we are giving recognition to the need for highways in that province.

May I point out one other very important highway project involving his part of Canada as well as mine. One of the criticisms that I get when I go home is that we are continually funding programs in nothern Canada. My part of the country is not as far north as his, I realize, but nevertheless we require funds for development in mid-northern areas, as the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) said. I think the hon. member was a member of the transportation committee that met a delegation from Edmonton, Winnipeg and other places—

Mr. Paproski: The great Yellowhead route.

Mr. McIsaac: Yes, that is right; the hon. whip is aware of that. That is a route that has already received federal support, and this is one more example of the federal government's support for the kind of project that is being put forward by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

As I say, Madam Speaker, I certainly appreciate the thrust of his arguments in seeking my support for highways and communications in general in that great part of Canada, but the route and method that he is proposing in his bill are not ones that I can support.

Mr. Watson: Madam Speaker, may I ask the hon. member who has just spoken whether he would permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Would the parliamentary secretary allow a question?

Mr. McIsaac: Yes.

Mr. Watson: Would the parliamentary secretary undertake to ask his officials to study the economics, both of the propositions put forward in the bill we are discussing today as well as the possible trade-off of efforts in both east and west which would, as I have argued before in this House, provide highways for residents in Alaska, Yukon, B.C. and Alberta, as well as a highway that would be of enormous benefit to eastern Canada, despite what my hon. friend from New Brunswick has said?

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) has just put a question to the parliamentary secretary. Having already spent several years here, he should know the Canadian government has already made a feasibility study of the construction of a high-speed highway through Maine, and rejected it.

[English]

Mr. McIsaac: Madam Speaker, if I may just reply to the question of my hon. friend from Laprairie, some work has been done by the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport on the projects mentioned by him. I am sure further work will be done in light of this debate and in light of any further bills and propositions put forward by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson).

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I shall only make a brief intervention. I want to remind hon. members—and I never like them to forget—that there is always a woman's angle as well as an age angle to issues of this sort. I can think back to when this highway was first started in 1942. I lived in Vegreville, 60 miles from where it all began. I well remember, when the highway started, and the U.S. Army in Edmonton. I should like the hon. members to appreciate that I well remember that era, because I do like a little respect for my age.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Also for my maturity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I also wish to stress the woman's angle. It was then very much a man's world and still is. Then the Highway was called the Alaska Military Highway, and "Military" then implied an all male club. A woman writer named Gertrude Baskine, of French and Irish ancestry, who had toured all over the world and wrote about her experience, was on a trans-continental tour of Canada. In Regina a reporter asked her what she planned to do next. She replied, "I will do the Alaska highway". That afternoon the papers blazed forth the news, and several hundred women shook her hand and extolled her courage. They said to her, "Are you really going up the Alaska highway? No woman would be given permission to do that; it is a military area and is impossible".

Alaska Highway

That is all you need say to a woman. Let that be a warning to you: don't ever tell a woman—the Gertrude Baskines—or me—that it is impossible. She went up the Alaska highway and was the first woman to do so.

There are many other access routes other than by the Alaska highway—by air, sea, and back-packing I do not recommend them all as the way to go. Nevertheless, this woman hitchhiked all the way over the then military highway.

I should like to make another point. They have mosquitos and black flies up there. Needless to say this creates a very trying experience. The important point about the mosquitoes and black flies is they are symbolic of what happens next. Civilization moves in, and with it repellents, insecticides, death to nature—

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour allotted for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR NEW POLICIES TO PROTECT TEXTILE PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

In view of the fact that the Quebec textile industry is increasingly threatened and urgently needs some correctives to restore a satisfactory economic stability, that most of its problems are due to rising imports and that the industry is comparatively isolated from the remainder of the Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House immediately discuss the condition of our textile industry to provide new policies liable to protect employment and assure Canadian markets and to consider the effectiveness of the suggestion made during the weekend by the Confederation of National Trade Unions for the establishment of the Textile and Clothing Board on a permanent basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED—REASON FOR FAILURE TO SIGN

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Yesterday in British Columbia the Minister of National Defence said that Canada was going ahead with the Lockheed LRPA purchase. Since the Lockheed LRPA contract remains unsigned and the minister tells us this is because of long-term financial problems but declines to say what these are, is it part of this unsigned LRPA contract that Lockheed would provide a line of credit to Canada to enable production to get started?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of negotiations with the Lockheed company, I said to the House that our problem was first of all a financing problem. Of course, events that have developed since then on the international scene prompt us to be more cautious in our negotiations with Lockheed due to the long term financing situation of this company.

Nevertheless, the main problem is one of financing. The Department of Supply and Services as well as the Department of National Defence are trying to find a solution with the co-operation of Lockheed; up to this point, the parties involved have not agreed on any of them.

● (1410)

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, as the minister stated Lockheed is now unable to provide this credit, is it forcing the Canadian government to find the money to get production started? In other words, are we not talking about a short term financial problem rather than a long term financial problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, it is as much a long term as a short term financing problem, according to the place one occupies in the negotiation, whether one is with Lockheed or with the Department of National Defence.

In any event, negotiations are going on and the government will take a decision in the near future, to clear the situation since Lockheed has already begun to plan its production.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTION EMPLOYEES BE GIVEN BENEFIT OF REMOVAL OF EXPORT TAX

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but since neither is here I shall raise another matter with the Minister of Finance. During the past 72 hours, has the minister reconsidered the government's position on the implications of removing the export levy in the anti-inflation program with particular reference to enabling the workers, as compared to the corporations, to get some of the benefits of removing this special tax in the sense of having permission to increase wages and salaries in excess of the minimum guidelines in the program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I would say no to that, Mr. Speaker. We have laid emphasis on the importance of any excess revenues being used for reinvestment in Canada with the consequent job creating effect.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—DATE OF AMENDING OF APPEAL PROCEDURE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, of course the job creation effect does not bear on the salary benefits that may or may not be available. My supplementary question concerns the reference the minister made in his statement about amendments that would be forthcoming with regard to the appeal procedures in the legislation. Following the questions I put to the minister on this subject some two weeks ago, may I ask again when we can expect specific legislation? Can the minister tell the House what part of the appeal procedure the government intends to amend?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the matter is still under consideration. I think it would be more effective to wait until the announcement is made, then the hon. member will be able to see the exact manner in which we propose to proceed.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the minister at least tell the House when we can expect the legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I say, Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. The House will be advised just as soon as the final position is taken.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since the right hon. Prime Minister is not here, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

A report has been made public indicating that negotiations at the official level between Quebec and Ottawa about the constitution would have largely gone beyond the discussion stage and extend to questions dealing with protection of French culture in Canada, legislative primacy in immigration matters, regional disparities, proclamation text of a Canadian constitution, and so on. It even appears that the government of Canada would have made specific propositions on those matters to the government of Quebec. Could the Acting Prime Minister confirm or deny this report to the House and sum up the situation in those negotiations?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the situation at the moment is that some informal exploratory talks have been going on at official levels. There have been no formal presentations or proposals made to the provinces.

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING ACCEPTANCE OF LESS MATERIALISTIC SOCIETY AND POWERFUL UNIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister in Toronto over the weekend that Canadians are going through a period of reflection and redirection and that since the second world war they have been too busy getting richer, can the Acting Prime Minister tell us if the Prime Minister meant that Canadians should accept a less materialistic society?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is probably a view shared by many Canadians, and I hope by most members of parliament, that we could have a better society if it were less materialistic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are a fine example.

Mr. Sharp: We are very fortunate that in the postwar period there has been a very great increase in the wealth of Canada and in the incomes of Canadians, and we all hope that they can be used to better purpose than at the present time.

Mr. Ritchie: The Prime Minister suggested that labour unions as well as corporations are among the big and powerful; does this mean that the many individual union members are amongst the powerful in the country?

Mr. Sharp: On a number of occasions the Prime Minister has made the point that there has been an increasing concentration of power, and, of course, that is just the opposite of individual responsibilities and individual rights.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASON FOR USE OF UNITED STATES COASTGUARD HELICOPTERS TO RESCUE FISHERMEN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and his parliamentary secretary, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It may not be possible for him to answer the question, but I should like to know why it was necessary to call in U.S. coastguard helicopters to rescue Canadian fishermen last weekend, an event which resulted in the loss of another fisherman and another fishing vessel. Do we not have enough helicopters in our own service in order to meet safety needs, particularly when a fishing season is opening?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries as to the reasons for asking the United States for their very generous assistance to us.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO EXAMINATION OF VESSELS BEFORE START OF FISHING SEASON ON WEST COAST

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I think we all appreciate this assistance when it is given, but I feel we should have our own service. In the absence of the Minister of Transport, perhaps his parliamentary secretary could make note of the following question: will it be possible to report that the examination into the events of the last fishing season, which resulted in a report and recommendation, terminated with an examination of all the fishing vessels before they went out on the present fishing season?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member repeat the first part of that question? I am sorry, but I missed it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Last year there was a report prepared by the Ministry of Transport—at our insistence, I might add—and there were a number of recommendations in that report. I should like an assurance that those recommendations resulted in inspections of all fishing vessels before they went out on the present fishing season, and particularly on the west coast.

Mr. Goodale: I am not sure if I can give that firm assurance to the hon. member. I know there were extensive discussions earlier this year in connection with this matter with the people involved in the fishing industry. I will check specifically to see if the precise inspections which the hon. member has mentioned were in fact undertaken. However, substantial precautionary measures were taken by the Ministry of Transport prior to the beginning of this fishing season.

SEALS—INTENTION OF GREENPEACE ORGANIZATION TO INTERFERE WITH HUNT—SUGGESTED ANALYSIS OF GREEN DYE TO BE USED BY GREENPEACE ORGANIZATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fisheries). In view of the fact that the seal hunt will be starting in a few days, and since some 2,000 seal hunters are dependent on the seal hunt for their livelihood or a good part of their livelihood, has the minister yet received an application from the Greenpeace organization to enter the seal hunt in order to cause interference and damage, as they intend?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member that to my knowledge we have not received any application. I have made it clear publicly that if there are people representing different movements which want to observe the hunt but not interfere with it, we would make arrangements for them to do so. We have done this in the past for other movements which have strong feelings on this issue. The regulations which prohibit interference with the hunt are very clear. They have been on the books for a number of years, and they will be applied in the ordinary manner.

Mr. Marshall: In order to avoid counterinterference by many fishermen who hunt seals, and in view of the fact that they are adamant in wanting to avoid any unfortunate incidents, will the minister accept my suggestion to have the green dye which they propose to use analyzed to discover its effect on seals and also the relationship of the mother seal to the pup, and if he has that information would he have this analysis carried out or direct the Food and Drug Directorate through the Minister of National Health and Welfare to carry out this analysis to ensure that the seal population in Newfoundland and the Atlantic region is not destroyed?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I certainly agree completely with the premise of the hon. gentleman's question regarding the income of fishermen. It is for that very reason that regulations of the seal hunt have as their goal wise conservation because seal hunting is an important source of income. It represents in some cases $2,000 to $3,000 to individuals who have no access to other income at that time of the year.

As to the matter of dye, I have said that we have regulations to prevent interference with the hunt. I have asked my scientists to look into the implications of the use of dye, but I believe that the use of dye would not be any more acceptable than the use of aeroplanes or helicopters to frighten the herds when they are whelping.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister who at times is the source of all wisdom. My question has to do with the recent statement of the Ontario government which expects a very bad summer for students, up to a million of whom will be looking for jobs. Accordingly, it is attempting to meet this crisis situation. Does the Acting Prime Minister also believe this will be a bad summer for students with regard to available jobs for them and does he believe that present federal programs are adequate to meet the situation? Is the whole matter under review and will a statement be made regarding this matter in due course?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has been inclined to forecast this sort of situation with regard to students this summer. It has been assigning its resources and trying to direct them toward the alleviation of this problem rather than dispersing them more widely. This has meant some changes in the program. We expect that we will be able to make better use of the money this year than we have in other years in relation to the employment of students. In that sense the matter is under review, but basically we have made our decisions.

Mr. Alexander: I imagine the answer to my initial question is that the government expects this will be a very bad summer with regard to employment for students. The fact of the matter is that Ontario has some one million students looking for jobs. The restraint program is restraining employers, thus reducing student employment in the summer. This has probably aggravated the situation in the provinces. Will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House and the students of Canada that this government will attempt to meet with industry, through chambers of commerce perhaps, and to meet with the colleagues of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration throughout the country so that they can devise steps to attack this very serious problem and thus reduce the high unemployment rate that is expected for Canada's students this summer?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this kind of procedure has been followed every year in the past. We have always encouraged employers to employ students. We have worked with the provincial governments, and that is what we are doing this year. I cannot say whether the problem will be worse this year than it was in other years, but it is always a serious problem.

ADEQUACY OF VOLUNTARY SUMMER WORK PROGRAMS FOR STUDENTS IN VIEW OF NEED FOR FUNDS FOR TUITION FEES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Secretary of State have introduced programs for voluntary summer work, by what stretch of the imagination does this government think that students will be in a position to volunteer for jobs without pay when they need to pay for their university courses, their tuition fees, their books and room and board?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There are some students in Canada who do not have to depend on summer employment to obtain funds to attend school. I know that some of these people are generous and public spirited, so I hope my hon. friend is not trying to discourage them from doing voluntary work.

AMOUNT OF REDUCTION IN BUDGET FOR STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? Are funds for the student program to be reduced from the $35 million level of last year to $20 million this year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the statistics. I will take the question as notice and try to answer tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRIDENT BASE AT BANGOR, WASHINGTON—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister about the projected construction of the Trident base at Bangor, in the state of Washington, on Puget Sound, some 60 miles from the Canadian border? In view of the action of Mayor Arthur Phillips of Vancouver, who has proclaimed Trident Concern Week and states that Trident is the most destructive weapon in history which, in its present location, will make the lower mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver Island part of a retaliatory target, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if representations have been made by the Government of Canada to the United States protesting against the Trident base, in view of the potential danger to a large segment of the population of British Columbia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know there have been exchanges of views about this problem but I do not think the Canadian government has made formal protests about this matter, because I do not think that would be appropriate.

Mr. Broadbent: Why not?

Mr. Sharp: But there have been discussions between the two governments.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Minister of National Defence is reported by the press to have said in British Columbia this weekend that Canadians should welcome the Trident base and encourage the United States to build it because of the deterrent protection it gives Canadians, and as the Trident system, unlike the Poseidon system, is not a deterrent, but a first-strike weapon, does the Acting Prime Minister not believe that the time has come for the Canadian government to raise its voice in protest against this mad escalation of nuclear destructive capacity before it is too late?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I gather that the Minister of National Defence shares my views about the nature of this problem, which we should discuss with the United States. I do not think that we should protest against the construction of an instrument that may help to maintain the peace which has prevailed in the world for quite some time between the great powers.

An hon. Member: Then, you are both mad.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED WARNINGS ON ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTAINERS AND RESTRICTIONS ON ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the minister intend warnings to be placed on alcoholic beverage containers similar to warnings placed on packages containing tobacco products, and does he plan to introduce more comprehensive regulations requiring more meaningful warnings to be put on these products and restricting advertising?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, last year I set up a departmental task force to consider alcoholism and techniques and methods which can be employed to reduce it. I expect a report in the next few weeks from the task force and will be able to advise the hon. member whether specific additional steps are planned.

PETRO-CANADA

POSSIBLE ENTRY INTO REFINING AND MARKETING OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Considering the minister's expressed intention to direct the activities of the national petroleum company to the production, refining and marketing of petroleum products, and away from the less lucrative exploration for natural resources, can the minister inform this House, as he informed an audience in Pittsburgh recently, what form this new intrusion in the free market system will take? Does the government intend to provide Petro-Canada with further public funds in order to carry out that new activity?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I made it clear previously that the priorities of Petro-Canada are the exploration and development of Canada's far north resources.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a short supplementary question? The minister expressed his intention to expand activities. Does the government intend to buy an existing system or marketing company, instead of starting its own activity?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada has already started its own activity, as the hon. member probably knows. The hon. member probably also knows that I stated on previous occasions, as did my predecessor, that at some point in time it may be of advantage to Petro-Canada to make an acquisition.

HEALTH

REASON FOR RESIGNATION OF DR. WIGGINS FROM RESEARCH BRANCH—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE RESEARCH PROJECTS CHOSEN ON BASIS OF MERIT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was the resignation of Dr. Wiggins from the research branch of his department at least in part related to political interference with the selection procedure for research projects under the department's research and development program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it was in no way connected, either directly or indirectly. Dr. Wiggins' resignation was a matter that had been discussed for quite a few months with the previous deputy minister as well as the present deputy minister. It was done purely at the administration level. It is the type of thing that one can expect in the public service once in a while.

Mr. Yewchuk: Since my information is at variance with what the minister has stated, can he assure the House that he has taken all steps necessary to ensure that research projects are chosen purely on the basis of merit and for no other reason?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has any information to the contrary, I challenge him to make a charge on that basis because I certainly would not tolerate political interference with research projects. I have never done so and I do not intend to do so in the future. If the hon. member has any facts, he should have the courage to stand up and make the charge.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is a little sensitive over this. Because of that, he has failed to answer the question I asked him. Can the minister assure the House that all steps necessary have been taken to ensure that projects are chosen strictly on merit and for no other reason?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of sensitivity. The hon. member has made a serious allegation. He lacks the courage to stand up and be very precise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: There was an allegation in the hon. member's question. Therefore, it was quite proper for me to raise this. I am glad to note the hon. member is backing off quite fast. As to the hon. member's question, there have been no steps taken for the good reason that there was no need to modify the previous practice which was clearly that research projects were decided on and carried out purely on the basis of merit.

FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POSITION IF QUEBEC AGREES TO CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with further assistance asked for by the government of Quebec in connection with the large Olympic deficit. The Prime Minister has irrevocably stated over and over again that under no circumstances will further assistance be given. Has there been any change in the oft repeated declaration by the Prime Minister that no further assistance, other than that already provided for, will be given, regardless of any pressure?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I heard the Premier of Quebec make his statement. I have checked with the Prime Minister's office and I have had many conversations on the subject with the Prime Minister. As far as I know, there has been no change in Canadian government policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the desire of the Prime Minister to bring about the patriation of the constitution or a new constitution and as he and the Premier of Quebec will be meeting this weekend, if the Premier of Quebec withdraws his objections to certain elements in the constitutional change that had its elementation in the Victoria Charter, the government of Canada will consider giving further assistance, provided the government of Quebec will agree to the amendments that the government of Canada wishes to make to the constitution?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether the province of Quebec would change its views for those kinds of considerations. Therefore, I am a little surprised at the suggestion being made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

IMMIGRATION

ADMITTANCE OF MEMBERS OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION TO HABITAT CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government continuing to say, even with the authority it now has from Bill C-85, that it will exclude from Canada members of the PLO who are known terrorists? I ask this because the agreement the government signed with the United Nations to hold the Habitat conference here seems to oblige it to admit them if they are invited or designated by the Secretary General to attend that conference. Finally, in fact does not the signing of that agreement mean that to this extent, the government has stepped back from the policy on this stated last fall?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): That is not my impression, Mr. Speaker, but I will certainly check it with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As far as I know, the Canadian government has never changed its view which was that we would admit observers from the PLO, but not known terrorists.

FINANCE

REASON FOR SUCCESS OF ROYAL BANK WHILE GOVERNMENT HAS DEFICIT

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Since the federal government incurred a deficit of more than $3.5 billion last year and since only one bank—the Royal Bank of Canada—saw its assets increase by $3.5 billion during the same period, could the Minister explain this deficit and this increase to the House?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say that for reasons that are well known we do not accept the hon. member's analysis of these matters. This difference in economic philosophy could perhaps be the subject of a debate in the House at some time, but I cannot give a short answer to the question at this point.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting, by his reply, that current interest rates are normal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member please repeat his question?

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting that current interest rates are normal?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker, I think they are very high indeed. That is, partly, because of present inflation in Canada. That is why we set up our control program.

TRADE

REASON GREECE PURCHASED LOCKHEED AIRCRAFT RATHER THAN CANADIAN

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of a call in Greece for an inquiry into that government's purchase of Lockheed transport airplanes rather than those of Canadair a few years ago, and in view of the fact that the Lockheed aircraft was the most expensive to purchase as well as the most expensive to operate, and because several officers in the armed forces preferred the Canadian aircraft, will the Acting Prime Minister, because of jobs in this country and so on, give the House an explanation as to why the Greek government purchased the Lockheed aircraft over the Canadian?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my impression that this explanation was given to the House by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, in which he justified the selection of Lockheed. It was selected purely on the basis of its general advantage to Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: I am talking about Greece, not Canada. I know the Acting Prime Minister is having a little difficulty. There has been a call in Greece for an inquiry to determine why that government purchased Lockheed transport airplanes rather than planes from Canadair despite the fact that Canadair aircraft are cheaper and operate much more efficiently according to air force officers in Greece itself. Bearing in mind the implication for employment in this country, does the Acting Prime Minister have an explanation from the Greek government as to why they purchased Lockheed aircraft rather than our own despite the fact they are much more expensive?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not. But I will inquire and ascertain whether there is some explanation, because we are anxious to sell our aircraft wherever we can.

REQUEST FOR LIST OF CONTRACTS FOR WHICH LOCKHEED WAS IN COMPETITION WITH CANADIAN FIRM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Can the Acting Prime Minister provide us with a list of all contracts in connection with which a Canadian aircraft firm was in direct competition with Lockheed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know whether we would have that information. Most of the companies concerned are private companies and they would not necessarily provide us with that information. However, I will see what I can do to satisfy the hon. member's curiosity.

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary and ask him whether he has any up-to-date information on the proposed residential rehabilitation assistance program which was to be announced. I know we would like to hear about it.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can at least confirm some leaks which were put out last week, I do not know by whom. The maximum amount of money a home owner may borrow from CMHC to rehabilitate a house will be increased from $5,000 to $10,000 under the new RRAP regulations. The maximum amount of grant in the form of loan forgiveness is increased from $2,500 to $3,750. This grant portion of an RRAP loan is determined by various factors, including the size of the loan and the borrower's income. RRAP funds are intended primarily for moderate income persons who want to extend the useful lives of their houses.

Some hon. Members: Speech!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): The program is not universal but is closely associated with the Neighbourhood Improvement Program which is helping many municipalities preserve and improve older urban neighbourhoods in danger of decay or destruction.

ENTRANCE FEES—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL FROM HISTORIC PARKS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It has to do with a subject I raised in the House last week and, particularly, with a statement which the minister himself made last Friday. Now that he has had an opportunity over the weekend to reflect more deeply on the facts, can the hon. gentleman tell the House when he will make a second revision of the fee structure which will remove completely the fee structure presently governing admission to our four national historic parks.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): That is not our intention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Whiteway: Bearing in mind the marked decline in admissions and the reasons given by the minister last year when the fee structure was set up, and taking into consideration, also, the results in terms of revenue versus the expense incurred in collecting the money, would the minister undertake a study to determine whether any admission fee at all should be charged to those entering our parks?

Mr. Buchanan: That type of study was conducted prior to the change which was announced last Friday.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Can the Minister of Agriculture explain to the House how he reconciles the importing of eggs into Canada, as was done prior to Christmas and again in recent weeks, with directions to Canadian producers to cut back production?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am sure the hon. member knows that it has been customary to import eggs into Canada from time to time. A surprising factor has been the increase in Canadian consumption. The other day I used the figure of 9 per cent as representing the increase over and above any other months of January or February. I was wrong. The increase in consumption amounted to 14 per cent.

Mr. Towers: Can the minister tell the House whether or not it is cheaper to import eggs than to produce them in Canada?

Mr. Whelan: It is rather costly. CEMA had to pay the extra cost because the United States eggs coming in at that time were more expensive than were eggs in Canada.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? It has to do with his weekend conferences in the Atlantic regions concerning entrance fees to national parks. Is the minister in a position to advise us whether he has won the support of the government of Prince Edward Island for his new scale of fees and, if not, will he give consideration to the suggestion implied in the supplementary of my hon. friend from Selkirk?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the position would have to be stated in this way: the government of Prince Edward Island is not elated at the concept of fees at all but is prepared, relunctantly, to accept them on this modified basis.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF PLAN FOR PROTECTION OF NORTHERN ENVIRONMENT AND DECISION ON DRILLING PLANS OF DOME PETROLEUM

Mr. J. R. In view of the fact that a senior official in the Department of Northern Affairs monitoring environmental factors has stated that he has never seen an oil spill contingency plan, and bearing in mind the minister's interest in the ecology of the north as expressed by his answers in the House, will the hon. gentleman tell us whether he has developed, or is now developing, a comprehensive environment protection plan and, if so, when the details will be made known to the House?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, since there have been oil spills in the high Seas or in Canadian waters, the Department of Transport, the Department of the Environment and even the companies concerned developed techniques to try to go around this difficulty, and technological studies are now being made on the possibility of extracting oil in the Beaufort Sea for example, where new techniques are contemplated to cope with this threat which can really destroy the environment. So we continue to seek means to prevent disasters of this kind.

[English]

Mr. Holmes: Would the minister now tell us whether or not he supports his department's contention that the offshore oil drilling planned for the summer by Dome Petroleum should not take place?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No decision has been reached on that subject.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): I should like to ask the minister when we might expect a decision on this very delicate issue in view of the fact that our supplies of petroleum and natural gas are so limited?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The hon. member will recall that a few years ago we accepted that drilling should take place in the Beaufort Sea. In that context, bearing in mind the new technology which is being developed in order to protect the environment, I expect we shall find it necessary to reach a decision very shortly, probably during March.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION

POSTPONEMENT OF RATE INCREASE IN YUKON—REASON FOR FAILURE TO TAKE SIMILAR ACTION IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On January 26 the hon. gentleman's department put out a news release or communiqué with respect to investigations into NCPC. In that news release there is an indication that the minister had requested the NCPC to postpone the increase in rates in the Yukon until May 1. Has the NCPC, in fact, frozen the rates to domestic users until May 1 in the Yukon?

● (1450)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that that has been done.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that domestic rates in the Northwest Territories have not been frozen and residents of Inuvik have been informed that the rates have been increased as at February 11, will the minister take some steps in the Northwest Territories to ensure the residents there that the freeze will be put on their rates until May 1?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I would have to check on that. There was to be an increase in the Northwest Territories at the end of February but that was withdrawn, to the best of my knowledge, until next November. Perhaps this domestic increase to which the hon. member is referring flows from the increase last October, but I will have to look into that.

SMALL NUMBER OF INFORMATION CANADA EMPLOYEES FINDING EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board having to do with the closing down of Information Canada and the fact that 383 staff members were asked to look elsewhere for employment. In view of the minister's assurance that most of these would be found alternative employment within the Public Service of Canada, and in view of the fact that only about one-third of them have been found employment up to this point and their termination date is March 31, 1976, can the minister assure the House that every effort is being made to relocate these people within the public service?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my answer is yes.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statistics I have given, and the minister can no doubt check them, will the minister personally undertake to review this placement procedure which has led the minister to give the assurance he gave in view of the fact that up to this point the record is not nearly as good as it ought to appear?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will check to see if the statistics mentioned by the hon. member are correct. I can assure him that every effort will be made to try to accommodate these people within the public service. Perhaps I might also remind the hon. gentleman that on several occasions members of the opposition urged us to abolish Information Canada.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON DECLINE IN POPULATION AND NEED FOR DECREASING QUOTAS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Minister of State for Fisheries will table the report he has received concerning the serious decline in the seal population and the necessity of decreasing quotas for the seal hunt?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, it would help if I knew to which report the hon. member was alluding. If it is the first one which was given to me in early fall, and which was more pessimistic than the data indicated eventually, I can certainly undertake to make it available to the hon. member. The second meeting on the issue was a meeting that I attended, but I do not think there was a written report, but rather a verbal communication. I will certainly look into this because I want information to be available.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, has the minister any studies with regard to alternative employment for persons who would be affected by a stoppage of the seal hunt and, if so, would he make those available at the same time?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid this is a non-starter, because even if alternative employment could be found the competition for the fish between seals and fishermen needing that fish, particularly herring, caplin and cod, would make it necessary for us to cull the herd.

COMMUNICATIONS

CABLEVISION—PROPOSED REVIEW OF DECISION NOT TO ALLOW ACCEPTANCE FOR ADVERTISING

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Communications whether she has had an opportunity to review the decision of the CRTC not to allow small community cable TV systems to accept advertising to offset the programming costs, and I ask this in light of the fact that the CRTC decision not to allow these small stations to continue accepting advertising will result in a deterioration of the amount of community programming available on these cable systems?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the CRTC regulation demanding that cable TV companies broadcast a certain amount of locally produced material can be justified by the money they make through cable operation. As for reviewing the policy to prevent the companies from obtaining advertising revenues, I have not yet had the opportunity to do so. The hon. member should keep in mind that this policy concerning the limitation of potential revenues is derived from the fact that it is important not to separate the viewers on the one hand from the revenues related to the viewers on the other.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for her answer. I am wondering if she intends to pursue this with the CRTC to get further information, and would she ask that the CRTC make public all studies it has done as to the effects of allowing cable television to accept advertising on the viability of other television and other media outlets in the affected area?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered the hon. member's question regarding the rationale for this policy. The important point is not to split the source of income. However, as the hon. member suggests, I can discuss this matter with the CRTC chairman and ask him whether he can release the studies underlying his decision.

FISHERIES

LEVEL OF COMPENSATION TO ATLANTIC COAST FISHERMEN FOR STORM DAMAGE

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in view of the loss suffered by the fishing industry as a result of last month's storms in items of equipment, boats, private wharves, buildings and processing facilities, will the Minister of State (Fisheries) advise the House what percentage of the replacement cost injured fishermen can expect under the present plans of reimbursement of loss?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check into this. I think there are different levels of compensation according to the type of equipment involved. I will look into it and try to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, in view of the rather poor income year which fishermen experienced last year, would the minister explore the possibility of a change in the regulations which would improve this reimbursement formula so it would approach replacement costs, in view of the fact that fishermen do not have enough money to return to business in many instances?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very familiar, I am sure, having served in provincial government circles, with all these agreements between the provinces and the federal government regarding the disaster formula. To bring about a change is extremely difficult. I would say to the hon. member that the problem of the income of the fishermen in the last year, especially in the area of the Bay of Fundy, is one with which I am very much concerned at the moment, but I believe we must not mix the two situations.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that what governments do they can undo. In view of the need, would the Minister of State (Fisheries) consider making very strong representations to the government of which he is a member to reconsider these regulations which are going to impose hardships when the fishermen are reimbursed?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the initiative to trigger this program is very much with the provincial governments, and if the provincial government involved wants a change in the ground rules it should at least make representations to us. I have not heard of them yet.

ALLEGED OFFER TO PURCHASE CANADIAN PETROFINA OPERATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could the minister report to the House on the reaction of the Belgium directors of Petrofina to the approach by Petro-Can to purchase their Canadian Fina operations?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): This is the first I have heard of it, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—MAILING OF INSERTS WITH OLD AGE PENSION AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege the nature of which I gave Your Honour notice earlier today. My question of privilege concerns the mailing out, at public expense, of political propaganda by the Liberal party to all recipients of the old age pension and family allowances. This was done in the form of a self-described "Message from the Prime Minister" and was mailed with the most recent family allowance and old age pension cheques to all recipients right across Canada.

● (1500)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a minister or government department might appropriately send out information directly to those affected by describing either a change in a program or a new program. Certainly it should be factual information. I am prepared to concede there are matters of judgment involved. The point is that it is appropriate, it seems to me, for a minister of the Crown to inform recipients of a particular program or changes in that program and no serious dispute could be entered upon or raised concerning such action.

I submit that the self-described "Message from the Prime Minister" does not in the slightest way fit into this category. It fails completely, in my judgment, to meet this reasonable test. I say this for two reasons. First, it is a general message on the anti-inflation program and has absolutely nothing to do with either family allowances or old age pensions. Second, and of even greater significance, it is, in my most serious judgment, in this form and content blatant political propaganda, in fact, on the government's anti-inflation program. It does not even pretend to be merely providing information on legislative changes. It offers argumentation in favour of those changes. A Liberal member says, "Absolutely". To illustrate my point, I wish to take a few quotations from the self-described "Message from the Prime Minister" to all Canadian old age pensioners and recipients of family allowance. First, in one paragraph in the opening part of the letter he says:

> One problem is our own attitude—how we react to the fears and uncertainties of inflation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is an argument. There are many economists in this country who would say that is simply hogwash. Inflation has everything to do with structures in the economy, and nothing to do with attitudes. Further on he says:

> —powerful groups—

He loves to single out these groups.

> —have gone farther, pushing up their price and income demands an extra notch or two as insurance against their fears and expectations of even worse inflation. That is how Canadian inflation has grown.

Again, that is an argument about which there is serious economic and political dispute. Further on, at the back of the Prime Minister's letter, the judgmental attitude becomes even clearer. He says, on a section allegedly to provide information about the salary and wage controls:

> Now that the law restrains price increases, it is fair and reasonable to expect restraint in incomes.

Could anything be more judgmental or less a mere description of factual change in the law? Later on in the same section he says:

> Furthermore, a federal surtax of 10 per cent will be imposed in 1976 on taxable personal incomes in excess of $30,000.

When that was announced just before Christmas, we indicated that that in itself is not even a factual description and is very misleading. The tax involved is 35 cents—they did not notice that—for people whose income is $35,000 or more. I could go on. The fact is that what we have here is Liberal propaganda. I submit this action is an abuse of the power of the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and constitutes an intrusion of the privileges of all opposition parties all of whom disagree deeply with at least some of the judgments expressed in the Prime Minister's letter. No opposition member of parliament could mail out, at public expense, such a letter. I submit that the Prime Minister is completely wrong in abusing his office by so doing.

This mailing would cost in the neighbourhood of $527,589 for the Liberals to produce on their own. That is a minimum estimate of the cost, based on one cent per leaflet which, considering the cost of paper, is pretty minimal—one cent per envelope and eight cents for a stamp. The cost of this propaganda of the Liberal Party of Canada would have been $527,589.

Mr. Speaker, if you rule that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would move that this most serious matter be referred to the House committee on privileges and elections and that steps be taken to ensure that the Liberal Party of Canada reimburse the public treasury for this expense.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will have great difficulty in taking seriously the matter raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). In effect, I would say this is just another typical case of NDP hypocrisy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: For the last several months this government has indeed sent Canadian citizens inserts with old age pension cheques and family allowance cheques, giving information to these citizens about the programs both in my department and other departments. I could send the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a whole series of them and he would find that they cover the many and various activities of the federal government. This government has always been extremely careful to see that anything being sent to citizens is based on legislstion and programs approved first by this parliament. Here, Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to instances like the Christmas letter sent out in the middle of the election by the former premier of British Columbia.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Lalonde: This letter was sent out on government stationery, at government expense, and had nothing to do with programs. Also, I am not referring to the letter recently sent out by the Premier of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Broadbent: I am not talking about—

Mr. Lalonde: —which was a personal letter from the Premier of Saskatchewan accompanying medicare premium information, mailed to all Saskatchewan residents at public expense. I am not referring to that because, Mr. Speaker, this government does not engage in this type of political propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The anti-inflation program is not the Liberal party's program. It is a government program based on legislation passed and approved by this parliament. It is a program that the hon. member might be pleased to hear has the support of all the provinces in this country. When the hon. member says it has nothing to do with the recipients, he has not even read his own speeches, because during the whole of the debate on the anti-inflation program he argued that the people who would be affected most by this program would be families, senior citizens and the like.

This cheque insert is addressed precisely to those people whom the hon. member said would be most affected by this program, the senior citizens and Canadian families. This program will affect these people beneficially and, as we have said as a government, this program, in order to be a success or to achieve success, will have to have the support of Canadians across this country and will be very much dependent on the role played by the individuals in their activities. This was basically the message from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that we must all, as Canadian citizens, do our share in the current inflation fight that has once more been endorsed by this parliament.

Mr. Lalonde: It is the height of irresponsibility for the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby to raise this issue as a partisan issue when it is a matter that is being faced by the whole country. Our action in this regard is based on the will of parliament itself. He says it is argumentative. Certainly it is argumentative: it presents arguments; it is not purely statistics. I refer the hon. member to all the previous inserts; he will find arguments throughout them. They are fundamentally instruments to inform the public and make the public aware of reasons for various activities and programs.

I respectfully submit that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has no point and no case and that this motion should be ruled out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate somewhat to get into this "lovers' spat." It is probably an indication of the political climate of this country that these marriage partners have at least changed the double bed for twin beds. In any event, I read the document to which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) referred and I was somewhat concerned about the message that it contained for the reasons that have been set forth by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

I am aware of the matters that have been raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) with respect to provincial governments of the political faith of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, but what really concerns me, and where I think Canadian people and members of this parliament have a real beef, is that no one, neither the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, nor anyone else, has come to this House to explain the flip-flop which has occurred since the election of 1974.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If there is any explanation we should have it, and if the Canadian people have any quarrel whatsoever—and if this parliament, therefore, in terms of its privileges, has any quarrel—with the insert in the old age security and family allowance envelopes, then I think it is the absence of any explanation of the flip-flop which has heaped on this government a load of incredibility in terms of the people of this country and of this parliament.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has demonstrated the desirability of this matter being referred to a standing committee so that a comparison can be made of the various inserts that we have had in old age pension and family allowance envelopes for the past number of months.

Mr. Broadbent: With Saskatchewan, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Most members in the House get these inserts either in their old age pension cheques or their family allowance cheques. I accept in general the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that most of the inserts have been based on matters that have been the subject of legislation by this parliament. But it takes an exception to test the rule. I wonder about the insert a couple of months ago which was sent to all old age pensioners, entitled "On Bird Watching". It was a catchy title and those of us who received it took a good look at it, but apparently it had to do with watching a bird, namely, a chicken or a turkey, being cooked. Was that based on legislation?

An hon. Member: Liberals have a monopoly on turkeys.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised initially by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was a question of privilege having to do with a specific mailing over the signature of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with family allowance and old age pension cheques. It did not refer to previous examples, and I would want to make sure that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has raised a grievance, a matter of discussion or a matter of debate rather than a question of privilege. What is happening is that all hon. members who are getting into the discussion on the procedural point are proceeding to debate the matter, which persuades me more and more that it is a matter of debate and not a question of procedure. If there is a question of procedure involved, I would certainly like to hear it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I quite agree with Your Honour that the leader of this party raised a specific point and that is what this point of privilege is all about. I was simply dealing with an attempt by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to bring in these other leaflets. I suggest that the one telling us how to cook chicken and turkey was not based on any legislation passed by this parliament.

The point about this leaflet entitled "A Message from the Prime Minister" is that it does not even pretend to be addressed to old age pensioners or family allowance recipients; it does not pretend to have anything to do with the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Some of the leaflets that have been inserted have had a relationship; this one has no connection at all. As for the argument that it is simply a description of the legislation, that does not stand up at all even when one reads it in cursory fashion. I suggest that the sum of money involved in doing this, and the abuse of the rights of members of parliament being indulged in by the Prime Minister, warrant a study of this matter by a special committee of the House. The real issue is that the government has taken advantage of its envelopes and its eight-cent postage to send out material that is purely propaganda and is not informational material for old age pensioners or family allowance recipients at all.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to speak after having heard the declaration of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). However we, the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, are also members of the opposition but, to be honest, one must say that the message which was sent, and I read it several times, should have informed the people not about the intention of the government, but about its accomplishments.

Lots of people in Canada do not get newspaper and do not know what they are entitled to receive every month, whether $129, or $121, or $138, or $133.40 for their old age security and whatever.

I congratulate the government for its honesty in sending a message to these people so that they know what to expect, what they have left for living.

And I think that the motion presented by the leader of the New Democratic Party is completely out of order in terms of the Canadian people's well-being. What the federal government does by way of legislation, respecting, among others the Department of National Health and Welfare, must be proven particularly in the province of Quebec.

● (1520)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier, it is my impression that the conduct of an individual member in perhaps breaching any regulations which he may come under may be from time to time a matter of complaint, a specific charge, grievance, debate, public comment, and so on. In my opinion, it would take the most exceptional conduct to constitute even a prima facie case of privilege which ought to be referred to a standing committee.

The question of cost has been raised, and there seems to be some initial difficulty with that argument. The fact that the flier was not sent out in a separate envelope, under separate postage and expense, but was something included with something which was going to be sent out any way appeared somehow a fundamental argument as to cost.

My initial reaction is that this is a matter of grievance, debate and comment rather than a question of privilege. However, I feel that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has raised it in seriousness and perhaps I ought to examine the pamphlet and reflect on the matter for 24 hours before making a final ruling as to whether this constitutes a prima facie question of privilege. Accordingly, I will give my ruling tomorrow at three o'clock.

GRADE SEPARATION, NEPEAN TOWNSHIP

Question No. 4,036—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

Did the Railway Transport Committee acknowledge receipt of a letter on December 2, 1972 and advise that the application for grade separation at the CNR tracks at Woodroffe Avenue in the Township of Nepean would be given "prompt attention" and, if so, on what date will the application be approved?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: The Railway Transport Committee acknowledged receipt of application for a grade separation at the Canadian National Railways' tracks at Woodroffe Avenue in the township of Nepean in December 1972. The application under Part II of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act was received February 12, 1976 and is now being dealt with.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO IMPROVE CANADA'S TRADING POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

That this House deplores the lack of any effective government policies to deal with Canada's worsening trade performance and, especially, the government's failure to provide meaningful incentives to increase productivity and thereby strengthen the competitive position of Canada's finished and manufactured products.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in opening the debate on the motion before us today, I suggest to hon. members that there are really three separate questions to be dealt with in today's debate. The first is the worsening trade performance of the nation in relation to our trading partners around the world. The second is the question of the lack of productivity in our industry and the fact that the government has not provided meaningful incentives to increase productivity in the nation. Third, the competitive position of Canada's manufactured products is something that must be constantly before this House in that at the present time our manufactured export trade is deteriorating at an alarming rate.

Before getting into more formal remarks, I should mention that I am sorry the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) is not with us today. I understand he is touring the far east. We wish him well on that trade venture, but I point out that in view of the fact that the government gave us notice only on Thursday that this was to be an opposition day, we had no alternative but to bring on a debate with respect to trade. We think it is one of the most urgent economic issues facing this nation today. In this connection, I am pleased to see that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), is with us. Perhaps he will be joining in the debate, because there are many unanswered questions still on the order paper from when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce. I am also pleased to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is with us. Perhaps he will enter the debate and answer some of the questions which appear to exist with regard to trade itself.

Touching on that question, I point out that only last Thursday I asked a question of the Minister of Finance concerning the export levy and whether it was the intention to continue that levy in view of the fact that it must be discouraging our export trade. The minister at that time answered that he would be making a statement before very long. In fact, that evening—Thursday evening—he announced that the export levy was to be withdrawn. I mention that because surely that little incident in itself illustrates complete disorganization with respect to the government's approach in terms of encouraging trade for Canada. Last fall the government imposed an export levy which had a dampening effect on much of our export trade, and now, because of the difficulties which have arisen, it has to withdraw that proposition and should somehow explain to the nation why something which has caused a great deal of concern is now being suddenly dropped. I am pleased that the export levy has been dropped. I wish the government had had the foresight never to have imposed it in the first place.

I believe that the debate today is necessary, especially if we can hear presentations from government members, because the handling of the problem of our export imbalance is truly terribly vague. We know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been musing about a new society and suggesting that there are certain villains who somehow are causing undue hardship for Canadians. I challenge that statement. I believe the Prime Minister is totally wrong in his assessment of what the problems are and I ask him to start naming some of the culprits he feels are the villains of today.

I say that because if we review the relative income share in Canada between corporate profits and labour income, we find that neither labour nor corporations have been taking an undue share of the national income, certainly since 1972. I point this out because the Bank of Canada published figures only this morning pointing out that in the fourth quarter of 1972, for example, corporation profit, after taxes, as a percentage of our national income was 9 per cent. Labour's income was 73.8 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1972. In the third quarter of 1975, corporate profits, after taxes, were still 9 per cent of our national income, while labour's share went down to 73 per cent. Is it not remarkable that in the United States labour's share of income is 75.3 per cent?

I believe figures of that kind should be cited more often, perhaps to put the lie to many of the statements which have been made by the Prime Minister in trying to avoid the main responsibility for the high unemployment and the high inflation in this country, namely, the responsibility of his government and its inept handling of the economy which we have witnessed over the last several years.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like first to put forth a few blunt facts. Last year, Canada had a $10 billion deficit in manufacturing trade. That compares to the United States which had an $11 billion surplus in its over-all trade position. All in all, in 1975 Canada suffered its first merchandise trade deficit since 1960. Commodity imports exceeded exports by about $1 billion last year. Our over-all current account deficit—that is, the balance of trade in goods and services—was about $5 billion last year. This year it is estimated by the Bank of Montreal that we will be in deficit to the extent of about $4 billion. In two years there will be a total trade deficit of $9 billion.

We have been living beyond our means for some time, yet the government has done very little to correct the problem. Canada's credit rating around the world is being jeopardized as international bankers become alarmed at our increasing trade deficit, our rising foreign debt, our high inflation and lack of productivity in industry. We need, and we have needed, their credit in international terms to keep afloat. The present administration has been balancing their international accounts by adjusting our monetary system so that Canadian provinces and municipalities have become big borrowers in international markets.

Last year it is estimated that Canadian borrowers took down one-quarter of the total amount borrowed internationally by all countries combined. We borrowed, from foreign sources, approximately $4.7 billion to cover our trade deficit of $5 billion. Total world borrowings last year were some $19 billion. Imagine, a country with the resources we have in Canada having to beg and borrow all over the world to balance our trade deficit position! These borrowings have forced up our dollar by approximately five cents in relation to the United States dollar, and the Bank of Canada has maintained a high interest rate structure about 2 per cent to 3 per cent higher than in other countries to make it all work. It is only a few months ago that the Canadian dollar traded at 96 cents in relation to the United States dollar.

It is balanced trade, not foreign borrowing that is needed. By borrowing at relatively high rates outside Canada, we are mortgaging our future to pay for current spending. It is no different, I would suggest to the House, than a merchant who finishes his year and finds that while he sold to his customers some $100,000 worth of goods in the past year, he paid $105,000 for others. By covering the $5,000 deficit he is simply piling up a debt which he must service through payment of interest and repayment of principal in future years.

We have the highest paid mandarins in the world in Ottawa, and they appear to have made a colossal error in judgment. Through a series of misreadings, miscalculations and plain obtuseness they have jockeyed Canada so that we are failing and falling down a slippery slope which month by month will be harder and harder to reclimb. As the Canadian dollar rises in value, our exports become increasingly expensive for others to buy. This puts the lid on any strong economic recovery in Canada. What the nation needs is either a cutback on imports or, preferably, a substantial increase in exports.

There are no easy ways to accomplish this. It would help if the Canadian dollar dropped in value. In that way our exports would become cheaper abroad, making Canadian goods somewhat more competitive, and in turn our imports would be more expensive and difficult to buy. As it now stands, the situation must be handled with care and forethought or we will find Canada's future will be one of rising inflation with a rapidly declining standard of living.

In due course I should like to see Canada tackle a massive export sales program. Canada's future has to be an international future. We must become salesmen to the world, not just of our resources but of our manufactured goods, especially those with a high technology component. Our research and development has fallen behind in relation to our gross national product and to the amount expended by other countries. It must be increased to keep us competitive in world markets.

We are blessed with an abundance of resources that spell optimism for the future. One of our greatest natural resources is agriculture. We have an abundance of good, arable land in Prince Edward Island, in the Atlantic provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario, in the prairies, in British Columbia. Canada has the potential to be one of the world's greatest suppliers of food. But we must think positively. The government must now recognize the importance of the farmer to the security of the future. The world needs food, Canada can supply it. Food power is going to be more significant in the next decade than petro-power.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I was startled to sit in this House and hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) talk about raising the import quota on cheese coming into this country to some 50 million pounds. A constituent in my riding went back to his home town of Bristol, England, and he told me that he could not buy Canadian cheese in the local cheese shop. He was told that Canadian cheese was being rationed, so little of it was available in England. What a ridiculous situation. We are importing more and more foreign-produced cheese at the same time as we are cutting down the export of our product; and we used to be one of the world leaders in the export of cheese.

Let us look at what the Americans did when caught in a situation similar to ours with a significant trade deficit back in 1972. In that year they had a deficit of $5 billion—no bigger than the present trade deficit in Canada. They felt the situation was intolerable, however, and went to their various producers, including agricultural producers, and told them to start producing and their products would be sold around the world. As a result of that activity, the economy was reversed from a $5 billion trade deficit to an $11 billion surplus within three years. Mr. Speaker, the same can be done in Canada. The same can be done with a government of vision, a government of decisiveness, a government that understands how to sell products all over the world.

Speaking of selling products all over the world, let us take one small example of how the United States managed to beat us in the sale of grain. As hon. members know, our grain is held in granaries in Canada and orders are processed after they are received. The grain is moved by our railways, if they are not struck, to our ports, if they are not struck, and eventually on to ships to go wherever the foreign market is, provided the ships are not struck. But what does the United States do? They place their grain in granaries around the world, for quick access, to be transported wherever the need arises. They have virtually put us in the position of being mere wholesalers of grain at the present time whereas they are retailers of the product.

In increasing our export trade it is essential that we increase productivity, especially in the manufacturing sector. It is in manufacturing that we have fallen behind so quickly and so regrettably. Among other western countries we have a lower percentage of our work force employed in manufacturing than any country except Ireland and Greece.

Today we are the largest importers of manufactured goods, importing more than any country in the world. We import, per capita, twice as much in manufactured goods as Europe, four times as much as the United States and ten times as much as Japan. The Canadian International Trade Centre recently reviewed Canada's trading patterns between 1930 and 1973. The centre paid particular attention to our 1974 trade. It said that our trade has deteriorated, especially in group four categories, manufactured goods of higher technology content. Unfortunately, we have been losing ground with the rest of the world in this area. We need to do more research and development, to produce and sell goods with a higher technology content. In short, our technology must be as good as the technology of the countries with which we compete.

In our debate on this motion we must impress on the government how necessary it is for Canada to take a responsible approach to its trading partners. Is it not ludicrous that the leader of this country's Liberal party should have chosen to go to Cuba at this very time, in the name of developing trade?

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: That visit was undertaken despite reaction in the United States, our chief trading partner. Remember, we export to the United States 97 times more than we export to Cuba. While he was in Cuba, the leader of our Liberal party said:

> Leaders must come to terms with reality in the world and accept that they have to deal with countries with different systems of government. Perhaps Canadians, particularly the Liberal party, are a little quicker to come to grips with these realities.

The leader of the Canadian Liberal party is also reported to have described Castro as being a "pragmatic" and "charismatic" leader, a man who, in the ideological context in which he moves, is a man of world stature.

An hon. Member: Did he ask President Ford?

Mr. Stevens: What a contrast to what United States President Gerald Ford said last week. He called Fidel Castro an international outlaw. In my view, the leader of the Liberal party of Canada was foolhardy in his actions and words while in Cuba. Perhaps the Prime Minister intends to drive away United States business with Canada and in that way make us less dependent on that trade. In that way he could diminish our American trade imbalance without increasing our trade with other countries. A year ago today the House will recall that the Prime Minister was in Europe trying to put into practice the so-called third option of Canadian foreign policy, a policy which was designed to lessen Canadian dependence on the United States. The Prime Minister wanted to diversify our export markets and to change our export mix away from the high proportion of resource exports in the Canadian economy.

The Prime Minister was trying to establish a contractual link with Europe in his trip of 12 months ago. Actually, diplomatic negotiations to do with the link began with a Canadian aide-mémoire in November, 1972. Both this aide-mémoire and a later one in April, 1974, were unsuccessful in generating European interest in a contractual link. According to the 1974 aide-mémoire, Canada wanted an agreement that would foster the development of long-term commercial and economic relations between Canada and the Common Market.

The Prime Minister wanted the Europeans to recognize Canada as an entity distinct from the United States. As he said on March 5, 1975, he wanted the Europeans to recognize us as a distinct, advanced industrial society. I emphasize the words "advanced" and "industrial" as used by the Prime Minister. It is obvious from his statement that he wants Canada to become less dependent on the United States, and wants the European community to see Canada as something more than an exporter of resources. He wants them to see us as an exporter of manufactured goods. These objectives may seem laudable on paper or in speeches, but how likely is this government to fulfil them?

More importantly, how do the Europeans feel about the Canadian view of the contractual link? Sir Christopher Soames, vice-president of the EEC commission, has said that he is looking to Canada for resources. To start with, the EEC is looking for deals on uranium, forest products and non-ferrous metals. Europe is not interested in Canadian-manufactured product exports; it is interested in our resources. France would like to participate in the construction of a uranium enrichment plant near James Bay. This would entail heavy foreign investment from a non-United States source. It is true that this project would lessen our dependence on the U.S., but Canada would not be shifting away from a resource-based economy.

The contractual link is far from finalized. I think Canada should know that unless the agreement encompasses manufactured goods as well as resources, our economy will benefit far less than the Prime Minister has been promising. If Canada is to experience continuously deficits of $10 billion or even $7 billion and more on manufactured goods, it matters little in terms of Canadian jobs, growth and income where these deficits are created.

I turn now to the question of free trade. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is reported today to have said that Canada is in for a long-term struggle with yawning balance of payments deficits. I note that he chose to give this bad news from the safe distance of Hong Kong. The minister is trying to arrange trade deals abroad. Although I applaud his efforts to encourage exports, I wonder if the magnitude of our trade deficit can be reduced appreciably by a few deals arranged around the world. Certainly it is a start, but a problem of the size we face must be solved with equally large-ranging solutions. Surely we need to alter how we look at trade. We must make major alterations in that regard. We need a new approach to what we sell, how we sell it and at what price. This is more than just patching up the current system.

The Economic Council of Canada suggested one approach to overcome our trade difficulties: specifically, that Canada should switch to free trade. According to the Economic Council, our manufacturers are producing too many varieties of goods. Because of insufficient specialization, our unit costs are higher and many of our manufactured products would be non-competitive whether or not our wage structures were competitive in the international sphere. The council suggests that the removal of tariff protection on domestic manufactured products would force a radical restructuring of Canadian industry. We would produce fewer varieties of goods but would produce goods of higher quality. Thus, our unit costs would go down and we would be more competitive in selling our products abroad. That is the council's position. Obviously, it is not that simple; nor does the Economic Council try to make it that simple. The ECC's report on free trade provides in great detail an analysis of the problem and a solution for it. Hon. members may or may not agree with the analysis or the solution, but it is worth serious study and debate if only because the council, which was created to advise the federal government, was serious in presenting it.

The report was presented to parliament nearly nine months ago. The government has had time to study it, but has not said so far if the idea is acceptable or if it proposes to make a future policy statement on the matter. Here is a serious proposal which the present administration has treated lightly. Here we see the failure of the government to seek new solutions to an old problem. If it is the policy of the minister to make periodic trips abroad to sell what he can—if that is his idea for creating a new trade—we can expect an even worse export performance and higher trade deficits in future.

Your Honour will recall it was only last Wednesday that I questioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning some of the activities now taking place in the Export Development Corporation. As the House knows, our party endorses the concept of giving financing for the development of export trade in this country. However, we have repeatedly voiced our protest at the activities of EDC which appears in favour of certain selected companies over and above the rank and file businessmen of Canada.

It is most regrettable that 52 per cent of the total financing through EDC in 1975 was signed for the benefit of three companies, namely, Marine Industries Limited, of Quebec, Badcock and Wilcox, a New York-controlled concern, and Hawker-Siddeley, a United Kingdom-controlled concern. Those three companies, respectively, received $129.5 million, $126 million and $109 million of financing benefits in that one year alone as far as signed contracts are concerned. We do not believe it is sufficient for the minister to simply say we should not quibble over who gets the money, it is creating jobs and what more do you want? What we want is equitable treatment of those funds to ensure that all businessmen in Canada have access to them, especially the small businessmen of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If we are to develop our export trade, especially in the manufactured field, it is essential that our small manufacturers get special assistance for such things as export development financing as opposed to the favourite few who can probably look after themselves much better than some of the smaller companies in this country. I wish to emphasize we believe it is necessary that the government co-ordinate their programs and somehow explain to the nation, certainly to this House, what is the interinvolvement with regard to those programs as far as the business community is concerned.

In this connection, on May 28 of last year, at page 6212 of Hansard the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), a sometimes supporter of the government, indicated 20 different federal organizations and related agencies which deal directly with Canadian export trade. He went through each agency, pointing out that it had some bearing on the trade. He specifically stated he had done so because he hoped the then minister, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, would respond and explain exactly how these various agencies work in a co-ordinated way to ensure their expansion in the nation. To the best of my knowledge, the hon. member is still waiting for an explanation from either the former minister or the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. That is not good enough.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may only continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank hon. members for their courtesy in extending my time. If I may summarize, in dealing with the motion before us today it is urgent that the government first announce what incentives they intend to bring in to increase productivity in this country. Second, it is essential that they at least deal with the subject of free trade. Let us debate it. Let us have a meaningful discourse across the nation as to the advantages and disadvantages concerning this subject.

It is essential that the government announce an industrial strategy for the country, which is presumably to be worked out in conjunction with the provinces, labour, industry, business and consumer groups. It is not sufficiant to have the former minister of industry, trade and commerce state as he did on May 28, at page 6208 of Hansard:

—I do not believe it is possible to devise and tailor a great big blueprint which might be called an industrial strategy for Canada. Indeed, I believe, as the government does, that the right way is to deal with each industry on a case by case basis.

The evidence shows that that is just not working. Our trade deficit is mounting. It is time we had an industrial strategy for this nation. It is also time that heavier emphasis were put on research and development to ensure that our manufacturers especially, and all of our businessmen, become more productive as far as their relationship to other countries and companies is concerned.

It is time that all disincentives with regard to agricultural production in this country were removed. No longer should our producers, farmers and fishermen be told that they should not produce. It is the government which should sell their products. It is essential that we develop a trade mentality in the nation and realize that our future is one of international trade. To that end, we must develop a better transportation system so that the goods we produce can be marketed more effectively around the world. The Export Development Corporation must be directed to favour smaller businessmen of this country as opposed to the favourite few, as has been their habit in the past.

Finally, it is time the Canadian dollar was allowed to fall, along with interst rates in this nation. It is unforgivable that this government has fallen into the trap of having high domestic interest rates, 2 per cent to 3 per cent higher than most other countries of the world. It is inflicting a hardship on our homeowners and those who must use credit to pay for their personal needs. It is not necessary. It is only necessary because of the ineptitude of the government which is trying to cover its $5 billion trade deficit by borrowing from foreigners at high interest rates. That can be ended. It must be ended for the sake of Canada's future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect, is it not a tradition of the House that on opposition days the mover of the motion speaks, and then the lead-off speakers of the other parties have a chance to participate before the second speaker of the party that moves the motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) will be the next speaker. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in introducing the position of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) gave the essential figures of the declining trade position of our country. In speaking to the motion, I want to emphasize what I think is the wide perspective of the situation that faces the Canadian people at the present time. There are two main subjects in this motion. The first is the trade performance of the government and second is the question of productivity of our industry, and that includes our government.

I wish to start by saying that a country like Canada, which is so dependent on world trade, has always to make its policies keeping in mind where it stands in the world of the present. To those of us who have been pondering this subject for a good many years, it is evident that the world is moving decisively and very quickly into the age of commodities. Over the last 200 years the world has been dominated by a military preponderance of one nation or a group of nations. We had the age of the deterrent of nuclear striking power. Now we are in an age, not of imperialism but an age where the demands of the people of the world are understood by all the people of all the countries as requesting some form of meeting their ordinary needs. These ordinary needs are the same in all countries, including Canada. The first is food, the second is shelter, and the third, the minimum health requirements of the people of the world.

This means that we as a nation should recognize we are part of a worldwide demand picture. We must realize that the institutions we have used in world trade over the last few decades have to be altered. I do not propose to review those institutions in great detail, but I shall mention a few of the things that have been done over the last 30 years. We were aware of the international demand for commodities during the last war. Shortly afterwards, the nations of the world not only set up the United Nations but, under the aegis of that institution, established the International Monetary Fund, the International Development Bank and the Food and Agriculture Organization.

Through Canadian initiative in 1961, the world food program came into being. But in the whole of that period, the nations of the world failed to establish an international institution dealing with trade and development. The western nations responded to this gap by moving toward an agreement which became the Geneva Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—GATT. This organization could be defined very simply as a union of the wealthy nations of the world trying to improve the terms of trade on which they dealt with the rest of the world as well as their well-being generally.

Some have described these GATT arrangements among the wealthier nations as a rich man's club handing out crumbs at the gate to those who beg there. That may be an oversimplification of what happened in this field after the war, but I do know that there have been three world conferences, known as UNCTAD conferences, trying to set up a wider organization. But they have failed because of the difficulties encountered with international finance, huge amounts of money which were lent by various governments, leading to the horrendous situation in which we find ourselves today in which the developing countries are saddled with enormous debts together with ever-worsening terms of trade which, coupled with higher interest rates, make it almost impossible for them to escape from the impasse in which they find themselves.

I am not laying the blame for this situation upon the federal government of Canada. It is well known that our nation has made efforts, in the Group of Ten and in other groups, to resolve these problems of international finance. But there are things which could have been done and which we should try to do. The difficulty we are facing is not new to Canada. I invite hon. members to go back a few years. I am speaking of the period in which the government of Canada was led by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The same sort of situation faced us then.

I shall be very blunt, as I have been in the past, in saying this. Generally speaking, the advisers to the government of Canada have tended to be restrictive in the advice they give. Some may recall that a recession faced us when we took over in 1957. We fought like tigers to get out of it, and we were getting out of it in 1958 and 1959. Then the advisers to the government handed us a budget calling for higher taxes, tight money and the reduction of public expenditure, a budget which sent us into a worse recession than the one we had just experienced.

At that time, the elected members who formed the government decided they should take a hand in making the decisions. In that period, 1959, 1960 and 1961, we ourselves determined the direction in which the country should go. We were the ones who, in that fight with senior management—I refer especially to the governor of the Bank of Canada—were to turn this country toward expansion. If hon. members look at the charts which tell the economic history of our country over the last 30 years, they will find that the longest period of steady growth upward was between February 1961, and February, 1968. This was because the government decided that it had some right, as representatives of the people, to say how the country should be run.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

I shall not enter upon a long account of past history. I am simply saying that in my view the present government has arrived at such a point now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is always appealing to us to come forward with some ideas. I try to be helpful to him. I am continually standing up here and making positive suggestions; I am not always happy about the results. In 1964, 12 years ago, I pointed out that we needed new trading institutions. In a speech made in October, 1964, I spoke of the need for Canada, bearing in mind our interest in world trade, to exercise pressure to secure the formation of international commodity agreements which would give producers in all parts of the world a fair price for their products, so that they in turn would have the money with which to buy what they wanted to buy instead of depending on handouts from richer nations.

With the support of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) we asked the government constantly from 1963 to 1968 to take a lead in this direction. But history shows that the administration, led at that time by Mr. Lester Pearson, turned its back on the concept of a new institution which would allow producers to receive a fair price for their products and that, instead, it joined with other countries such as the United States in electing for restrictive practices in world trade. I refer to GATT.

There is a further aspect of almost equal importance. Many importing countries need help not only financially but in their trading operations. If we want to sell goods to a country which does not have money with which to buy them, we must help it raise the level of its production and help it sell its goods on the international market. These are not new ideas, but they have fallen out of favour in the last 50 years. We need an international clearing house for short-term and medium-term loans to help finance the movement of goods for short periods, maybe for a few months.

I recall a dramatic moment in this House in the fall of 1963 when the minister of trade and commerce of that day said he was leaving for the opening meeting of the Kennedy round under GATT. My response from this side was, "You are going to GATT, you are taking the best mandarins of the civil service, and you will spend three or four years bargaining over percentages of decimal points. As far as I am concerned, speaking for the opposition, I am going to go to the People's Republic of China," and I used the earthy expression that I believed in going where the pastures were green and the cows were newly freshened. I point with some pride to the fact that in 1960 our total trade with the People's Republic of China was approximately $400 million a year, and today it is around $8 billion to $9 billion a year.

When I rose in this House a few days ago and asked the Prime Minister when he was in Venezuela if he had time to speak to the Venezuelans, thanking them for buying the goods from the People's Republic of China so that the People's Republic of China could get the Canadian dollars the Venezuelans have from our oil purchases to help pay for our wheat, he said, "Yes. I had the time but I did not know about it." This is symptomatic of the complete failure of the government in the past 12 years to face up to the fact that trade is not a two-way street. It is not just a question of travelling around, saying hello and being nice and setting up trade offices. Somebody has to do things to make trade work. You need that type of institution. These things have developed over the years, and the new nations now call it the new economic order. I am saying to the government that if it wants ideas, the ideas have been here for years if it wants to use them. But the performance has not only been nil; it has been negative.

There are other things that should be kept in mind. Our own companies are negligent in Canada. Too many of them have thought their only job was to sell to the local city. Too many of them have never bothered going into the export market. The hon. member for York-Simcoe mentioned that we are now in the age of a need for food.

How many people remember the Favex group of the fruit and vegetable people who set up an export company and went out and peddled Canadian fruit and vegetables under one trade name? What happened to Favex? It stopped operating the minute the Diefenbaker government disappeared, because no one was there to push it. Some will remember the name of Excan where, under the pressure of the people on this side, the four big pools in western Canada formed an export company to sell Canadian grain. How much have they sold? I would think I would be safe in saying nil, because there is nobody there to push it. It is willing to sell if it has the push put to it. I would say simply that if you want to push Canadian companies into action, all you have to do to Excan is say, "Here is a $50 million guarantee. Go out and peddle this stuff. You can meet the Americans with a better quality of wheat, and you can take any share of the market that you want, but get out there and sell it." I summarize that point by saying simply that this world is desperately in need of food and fibre, and that is the challenge before not only our agricultural industry but our forestry industry as well.

I know the present Liberal government, in its defence, will come along and say it has sent trade missions all over the world. I have followed the progress of these trade missions as well as most members of this House. I know they are good things. I have watched the work of the Export Development Corporation and I know it is doing some good things. However, when I think of all the things that could be done, I am just appalled. The basic complaint I have against the government is that it cannot get away from its basic love of restrictions. I remember in 1970, at a time when it was clear that the world was in desperate need for grain, this government believed in the reports of its own experts and applied the LIFT program to all farmers. Ministers stood in their place and said we had to stop all farmers producing wheat that year. Today we cannot even meet the market needs.

Last Friday the minister announced outside the House a 35-million bushel sale of wheat to China. He was overjoyed at this sale. That sale of wheat to China was made under the original agreement of 1961. The Chinese would take more wheat if they could get it, but we do not have it because our reserves are at the lowest point in years.

All I am really trying to ask is, with all these opportunities, what is the government doing? For example, when is it going to get the co-operatives in Canada to go out and visit Chinese trade fairs twice a year and make sure all the goods they can sell in Canada are bought in China in order to help the farmers sell their wheat? Simpson's has moved, Eaton's has moved, but no hardware company has gone out into this area yet. There are lots of opportunities, but somebody has to put the sock to these companies in order to make them move.

We consume about $20 million worth of rice a year in Canada. Where do we buy that rice? I suggest we buy it from Louisiana and California. We can get just as good rice, but cheaper in China. No one does a thing about pushing people out there to bring it in, because all our companies that distribute rice in Canada are controlled by the holding companies that own the rice farms in Louisiana and California. This is why we need national selling and buying companies to get around these bottlenecks that some monopolistic business has set up in this world.

As the hon. member for York-Simcoe mentioned, here we are trying to get our export industries to help save us by getting rid of these deficits, but this government, with its love of restrictions, last fall at Thanksgiving not only put the chop to labour and businessmen but it put on an export tax. I was the member of parliament who on November 4 got up and asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) about this small little item I saw in the Thanksgiving statement on price and wage controls. I warned the businessmen and the labour unions that they had better get together if they were going to save jobs for the people of Canada and give Canadians a chance to compete. Thanks to those labour men and businessmen—and, above all, thanks to the provinces—they showed this government the error of its ways and we had this retreat by the Minister of Finance last week that I described as Napoleonic. The Prime Minister, who indicates his fantasies too openly, mentioned Austerlitz. I just wonder what happens when the Prime Minister lets his fantasies go to the end of the dream. We know what happens to those men who take a revolutionary government or a free government and make it into a dictatorship.

This government is married to restrictions. In 1974, after fighting a campaign across this country against the Conservatives who only advocated a 90-day freeze and only a few selective controls out of which we could get immediately, the Liberals gave their pledge to the people of Canada that they would not go into wage and price controls. They frightened the workingman, got him to vote for them and then betrayed him with these wage and price controls. I know that this love of restrictions the government has is not only unfair to labour and unfair to business but it is unfair to the whole country. It is putting a check on the efforts of the private business sector to get this country out of the recession.

Look at the indicators at the end of last January. Our economy started to move out of the recession in the first and second quarters of 1975. It was checked immediately in the last quarter, and the only thing that keeps us afloat today is the fact that our neighbour to the south, the United States, is still increasing its productivity, which is buoying us up. I know that this price and wage control is also inflationary. It even legislates the amount of inflation, 10 per cent, and it does not do anything to cure inflation.

The basic causes of inflation are well known. This is a posture the government has, and the technique of the Prime Minister is simply confrontation. Confrontation with labour and with business is the key. I would suggest to the government that it should face up to the facts. The country is concerned about the economics of this nation. The government should realize it has put the country into the wrong posture. It should change it toward one of expansion, using an expansionary period to get extra productivity. Productivity can come in many ways. It can come by bringing interest rates down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member may carry on if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I shall not abuse the privilege I have been given, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say there are many ways to increase this productivity. I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has left the House, because the way to get productivity out of labour is not to drive or force it. The same thing applies to business. You do not get anywhere with business, labour or Canadians generally by driving them. The only way a Canadian responds to a challenge is by leadership. Labour and business know they have many faults and they know that their extremes in the past few years have been part of the inflation problem, but there must be leadership of a positive nature.

I had intended to read a long list of ways in which to increase productivity, but I should like to conclude simply by saying that on the question of trade performance, for 12 years this government, regardless of its leader, has let the nation down. What we tried so hard to do under the leadership of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), and to a lesser extent some of the rest of us, was to turn the country into high gear on the manufacturing and resource side in order to obtain world markets. We have watched all our efforts to get this nation enthusiastically behind this drive disappear over the last 12 years. We are in the same situation now.

I have suggested to the government that the answer, contained in recommendations made to the government by royal commissions and people around the world, is in two or three simple things. Turn your tax system around and give an incentive in the form of everything in the tax system to productivity either on the part of the workingman or the man who invests capital; give incentive to the man who saves money. In this way you will get productivity and we will get at this question of inflation much more easily. It is a separate problem, even if it is related. If our country is growing we will know in our hearts we are meeting the real needs of the people of the world and not only of Canadians. At the same time, we will have a feeling that we are getting ahead faster by working hard and growing than by living in a country that is moving toward more and more restrictions.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has put down this motion today regarding trade, because I believe what is happening today in respect of Canada's trade picture, and what we will see happening in the future unless government policies change concerning the borrowing of billions of dollars in capital markets, and so on, is that there will be created for this country the most serious economic problems we have ever had. We have in this country really serious economic problems.

As we know, Canada is a country dominated by foreign investors. In many ways we are nothing but an economic unit and cannot make the decisions we must make if we are to turn this country around and provide jobs for ordinary Canadians. I look, for example, at the latest trade figures which came out in January, which show we had a trade deficit in Canada of $309 million, up from $91 million in December of last year. Importations in this country went up by 7 per cent to a record $3.1 billion. Exports declined marginally to $2.85 billion. What is happening is that we are seeing a trend in this country of exports dropping, and when exports drop there is an increase in unemployment. We have a government program of wage and price controls that is effectively bearing down primarily upon the workers in this country. If we put it all together, we will have in the next year or so an increased unemployment rate and more problems than we have today.

I think the time has come when we must have a reassessment of our economy in general so that we know where it is going. I think we must look at the situation in the long term. Certainly the short term is important and there are things we can do today, but in the long term we need an industrial strategy policy, a national industrial plan in which all parts of the country can play a much greater role. I look, first at what I think is the prime error that has been made in the past, which was touched on by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). Primarily, we are a resource exporting nation. We export our raw materials and import finished goods. That alone means that we export business, which creates more unemployment in this country. When we have this type of branch line economy it means that if other economies are in trouble in the world or are suffering from a recession, we will be hurt because they will cut back on their purchase of our raw materials and unfinished goods.

All the taxation policies of this government in the past have been geared toward helping the resource section rather than the manufacturing groups. We have in this country, as a result, a whole series of small industries and factories which tend to mimic the industries and corporations in the United States. I think, when we talk about an industrial strategy for Canada, we must talk about rationalizing industry in this country and about specialization in certain industries in order to compete abroad.

We in this country must be concerned about independence, because one of the real consequences of an economy that is not controlled by ourselves is that when the other countries run into problems, a branch line economy will be the first to be affected. We see this in respect of the United States. If the United States has a trade deficit or unemployment, then the corporate entrepreneurs in the United States will place their interests in Canada at a level secondary to those in the United States. This is, of course, the natural reaction.

If we are to solve, in the long term, some of our industrial and trade problems, Canada must have independence in respect of its own economy. We must have independence if we want to have research and development in this country and the creation of more jobs and more research with which, hopefully, to spur on Canadian industrial development. I think this is a real problem we must face in the years to come if we are to have a nation called Canada a few years down the line.

What really concerns me in looking at the future is the spectacle of the amount of money that we may borrow in foreign money markets in order to develop certain projects in this country. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is now talking about borrowing some $115 billion between now and the end of this century. This amount of $115 billion is for projects such as the development of the tar sands, the James Bay project, other hydro projects, pipelines such as the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and so on. What will it mean if we borrow $115 billion. I think it will have serious ramifications in respect of the Canadian economy in the future. If we make that decision, first of all we will be spending all the money we can possibly borrow to develop the type of economy that has already given us trouble, an economy that is not based on manufacturing and processing of resources in this country, and an economy which I feel will become more and more foreign owned.

If we borrow these sums of money as a country, or as a province in the case of Quebec with the James Bay project, or any other province, what will probably happen is that the Canadian dollar will increase in value, and when it does it will be even more difficult to sell our exports abroad, whether they be farm products or manufactured goods. That, in turn, will create more unemployment in this country and more of the type of problems we already have. Furthermore, I really question the necessity of going into debt to so great an extent to develop grandiose projects like the James Bay project or the pipelines that are now being talked about in northern Canada.

It is the type of direction in which this country is being dragged, not because the people can or want to go in that direction but because huge, multinational corporations think it is wise that we borrow money, that we explore those resources and sell them and to hell with the Canadian people or with the planning of the future of this country that we call Canada. That will be a real problem in the future.

Another problem we will have, particularly if we start borrowing these vast sums of money, will be to diversify our trade. Already we are putting all our eggs into one basket, the basket of the United States. When the U.S. runs into trouble, it will obviously affect us here very quickly. I believe that one of the objectives of this country should be seriously to diversify our trade. We can do that if we have foresight and courage. The U.S. is a very powerful nation and of course it will be our major trading partner, but they have their own problems. The EEC nations also have their own problems. So we as Canada should be looking at areas of the world that will complement the type of country in which we live.

As Canadians, we have almost everything in this country except a tropical climate and the kinds of things that are produced in that type of climate. It makes sense for us to have stronger trading links with the Caribbean countries or with Latin America so that it would be of benefit not only to us but to them. We should have trading links with countries that are complementary. That is why I think we should trade a lot more with countries such as Cuba. There is no reason why we should not be purchasing sugar and citrus fruits from the Caribbean nations and Latin America, rather than from the U.S. It would be good for us and it would also be good for the country to which I referred. We should also consider greater trade with China. I think our country should spend more time and effort in trying to develop meaningful trade with nations such as China. That will be important if we as a country want to develop our trade in the future.

Much has been said in this debate and other debates about incentives and the lack of incentives. I challenge the very idea of providing incentives as a way of solving trade problems. Last Friday in the House we heard the minister state that the export levy or charge which was to be imposed on companies in this country was being dropped. This will be of some aid to exporters, but I suggest it might distort many of the market conditions in this country by encouraging companies to divert production from domestic to export markets. Two or three years ago vast write-offs for manufacturing companies were introduced in the House, and corporate taxes for manufacturing companies were cut. Despite that, we are now moving into a crisis in our balance of trade. Our trade in manufactured goods has dropped drastically.

Corporations do not respond to carrots or to hand-outs that are given before the fact. There is no real proof that the type of tax cuts that have been given in this country have stimulated manufacturing. I believe the Conservative party is on the wrong track when its members argue, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe did today, that the solution is to provide more and more incentives and tax write-offs to manufacturing companies. Instead of that, what we need is a planned economy, an economy that is planned on behalf of all the people of this country, not planned by the large, multinational corporations.

One of our prime objectives should be to upgrade raw materials and resources prior to export. We do not need an economy that exports solely raw materials for the sake of making a few bucks in the short term. Only the national government can take a lead in providing us with an economy where we manufacture or process our raw materials. We need an economy where public ownership plays a much more meaningful and forceful role as a means of securing more independence for Canada.

I have already referred to an economy where there is more rationalization and specialization of industry. There are many areas in which this country could specialize and which are indigenous to Canada, areas into which we do not venture now because of commitments to certain multinational corporations. Let us look, for example, at the rail policy announced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I see a strong indication that we will be phasing out our passenger trains in this country—which I know interests you, Mr. Speaker—and in their place purchasing more aircraft.

We know that the aircraft we will purchase in Canada will come from abroad and therefore provide jobs in other countries. But if we were to expand passenger service in Canada we could purchase cars in Canada, thus providing jobs for Canadians, because we have that technology here. LRC has a light, rapid and comfortable train developed in this country but it cannot sell its product to CPR or CNR. It will sell its product to Amtrack in the U.S. which has a train that travels at 140 miles an hour, a rapid and efficient service. That type of planning does not occur in Canada. We are here at the whim of multinational corporations. When they ask us to jump, we ask, "How high?" There is no planning here. We are just a reflection in the waters of the huge, multinational corporations. That will have to end if we are to develop a country that is worth living in in the years to come.

The other thing I wanted to mention in the debate today was the growing deficit in the trade pact with the U.S. under the autopact. As you know, the autopact was negotiated a number of years ago and worked to the advantage of Canadians for quite some time until recently when we started to accumulate an increasing deficit. Our trade in automobiles has gone from a surplus position in recent years to a very large deficit. While the autopact made a positive difference for a few years, that of course has taken a reversal from a deficit of over $700 million in 1965 to a deficit that has averaged much less, $200 million a year on average between 1965 and 1973. Our automotive jobs increased at a rate three times those in the U.S. during that period of time.

However, in recent years things have turned around from a small surplus of $204 million in 1970 to $230 million in 1971 and $75 million in 1972. Our auto trade balance has come back toward a more historical and normal position. In 1973 we had a deficit of $440 million in the auto trade; in 1974, a deficit of over $1,300 million; and for 1975 the full year's figures indicate a deficit in the range of $2.5 billion. So you can see in the auto trade, which is very important to a large part of this country, the trade position of Canada is changing very rapidly.

This is the big area of deficit so far as auto trade goes, although we also have a deficit on non-U.S. auto trade of some $500 million. Why is that? There is a tendency to blame this on our deteriorating competitive position. This, in turn, is usually blamed upon the workers, which is not the case. Let us take a closer look at the situation, for the case in the automobile industry is similar to that in a great number of industries in Canada. Let us consider vehicles and parts. I will deal with vehicles today. In vehicle assembly we have a small surplus in trade, but there is a commensurate price differential between Canada and the U.S. and this is usually blamed on our high-cost industry. If this were the case, we would expect that higher prices to make up for higher costs would still result in similar profit levels on both sides of the border. However, in fact, profits in Canada are currently about $100 per car higher than in the United States, and in 1974 the Big Three made 22 per cent of their profits in Canada on 11 per cent of North American car sales, an amount high enough over the last decade to pay for all their new investment in Canada. This is on top of normal profits which have been high in the auto industry in the last decade.

As I have said, profits in this country are very, very high. Wages are at parity in Canada and the United States, and the higher pension costs in Canada are made up for by lower medical costs and lower supplementary unemployment benefit costs. It is not because of greater efficiency in the United States or economies of scale, because with the auto pact all production in North America is rationalized and efficient and there are economies of scale achieved on both sides of the border. Moreover, because of the high rate of new investment in vehicle assembly in Canada after 1965, our machinery is at least as efficient as that in the United States. Transportation costs are also about the same on both sides of the border. So the only conclusion we can come to is that the decision of the big car manufacturers is to wring more profits out of Canada.

When we consider the parts side of the argument, we see the same type of thing. That does not mean lack of productivity in Canadian workers, but it is the decision of the corporations to wring more profits out of Canadian industry. These are things we will have to stop if we are to develop our economy. We as Canadians collectively will have to make the decisions in this country in terms of planning and take the decision-making power away from the corporations in this country. The time has come to do that. The time has come when we should have that type of national development plan, when we the public should decide what are the important things to develop and not leave that process to the large corporations because when we leave it to them it is the ordinary Canadian who is injured.

We have an immense future in this country. We have an educated population. We have the resources, the institutions and the training which we need. We have a transportation system and the means to provide food. All we need now is a government which will put those things together into a policy which will process those resources and create jobs for Canadians. In many cases we have a large enough domestic market to keep going adequately in the manufacturing industry. It makes no sense at all to be importing many of the goods we are importing when we could be developing, processing and manufacturing these goods right here at home and providing jobs for Canadians.

These are things we will have to do. If we do not change our trade policy, and if we do not have an industrial strategy in Canada, I really fear for our future. I fear for a country which will have to borrow over $100 billion for energy projects alone. If that occurs, in my opinion we will be nothing more than a satellite of the United States and a satellite of huge, multinational corporations. We will be supplying more and more raw material and becoming more hewers of wood and drawers of water. I do not think we have to go in that direction, because I think we can change this economy in a really meaningful way.

I hope the minister will speak today and tell us about some real changes in Canadian trade policy which will come about. I hope he will not just say the usual things; that there will be a few more trade missions; that we are trying to sell hard, smiling a lot and trying to obtain new markets. That type of thing is not good enough any longer. I want to see some really concrete changes in direction. Why cannot we say that we do not need the Mackenzie Valley pipeline at this time, that therefore we will not go ahead with it and that we will have a moratorium on making that decision? If we have to borrow money, we could use it in a much more positive way. We could use the resources of this country, plan our economy, process our raw materials and decentralize the industrial heartland of this country so that all Canadians can feel they are a greater part of it.

As a person from the prairies, I get sick and tired, year in and year out, seeing our food materials just being shipped out in an unprocessed state, or if processed in Canada, often being processed in Toronto. That type of thing could end if we had a government which was wedded to planning and redistribution of wealth amongst the regions and not wedded to the idea of pleasing the large, multinational corporations.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to enter this debate this afternoon on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) who, as hon. members know, is drumming up business in Southeast Asia and trying to bring about some of the things which some hon. members here are anxious to see, that is, more export sales. However, as I listened to the debate this afternoon, I must say I had some rather peculiar sensations. First, who called the debate? This is an opposition day; the Tories called the debate. They have a new leader, and they are really concerned, they say, about export sales.

An hon. Member: There is no leader here.

Mr. Gillespie: There is no leader here. The lead-off speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), disappeared as soon as he gave his speech. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) asked if he could speak second—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to bring to the attention of the House that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was delayed on a flight from Toronto or Hamilton this afternoon. He arrived here in time for the opposition motion. He is now preparing himself for committee meetings which will be held this evening, and I do not think that that kind of cheap shot from the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Tory members opposite might feel a little sensitive. They told the Canadian people, through their leadership convention, that they were going to come out swinging as a party. They were going to tell the people what they are for, not what they are against. They are so interested in telling us what they are for that they even leave the House. There are perhaps half a dozen in the House right now, and this is an opposition day.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: We cannot take the Tories seriously, and I doubt very much whether the Canadian people will be able to take them seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I have a very high regard for the Conservative whip. I am not going to say anything more than this: I think we ought to check the list to see what committees are meeting this evening and find out whether the particular meeting he referred to is the kind of meeting which two of the hon. members who have spoken today are likely to attend. I leave it up to him, but we have our own ideas. I believe the committee involved is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

As I listened to the two Tory speakers, I wondered to myself, could those two hon. members be members of the same party? The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was suggesting that we should develop a national trading corporation; more particularly, a national buying corporation which would buy Chinese rice. He was very specific; he mentioned Chinese rice. He felt that the government of Canada should create a national institution which would go to China and buy rice. I should like to ask the hon. member and other hon. members in his party whether this is really the philosophy of the Conservative party today. Would they form a national corporation which would go to foreign countries to purchase their merchandise and then sell that merchandise in Canada in competition with the private sector? In other words, are the Tories entering the massive intervention game? Are they rejecting free enterprise on one side of their party and endorsing it on the other?

● (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) on a point of order.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in defence of my position, I wonder if the Minister would give me his reaction to the organizations I mentioned—Favex and Excan—which were surely not Crown corporations, Liberal-style, but private corporations.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to answer any questions at the end of my remarks. When the hon. member was speaking I resisted the temptation to interrupt him, so I hope he can do the same with me.

If you are going to set up a national corporation which is going to purchase rice from China, you have to ask yourself whether you should not also ask that corporation to purchase textiles from China, and footwear and other products. I put it to you, once you go down that path just a little way, you are likely to find yourself edging out the private enterprise system that the hon. member and most of his colleagues support. It is a very dangerous path.

I would suggest that perhaps it might be more profitable to look at the private sector. Hon. members would find that there are close to 700 trading companies in Canada, most of them small and capable of growing. I would think that is where the emphasis should be placed, and I can tell hon. members that is where the Canadian government is placing its emphasis—behind the small, private sector traders. A number of measures have been introduced to support these trading companies in Canada and I hope to deal with them before the end of my remarks.

Another aspect of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was very interesting. I suppose it might be described as a statement—I do not want to overdo this—to some extent replete with contradictions. I think it was a sincere speech but there were built-in contradictions. I have already mentioned one. On the one hand he was assailing restrictions, and on the other he was intervening through the back door, through a government agency. There was a second straight contradiction in his speech. He said, "You must push"—that was the verb he used—"You must push them", referring to the Canadian private sector corporation. Later, talking about productivity, he used the phrase "You must not drive them". I ask the hon. member, what is the difference between pushing and driving?

I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Since he had so much experience on the hustings lately, I had expected him to give us a real tub-thumper of a speech. I would have thought he would have refined some of his views rather more precisely, but I was disappointed, as were other members in this House.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe has to make up his mind if he wants Canadian exports to increase. For example, why does he attack the Export Development Corporation for lending too much money? We have heard this in the House and we have heard it in committee. If he really wants to support Canadian exports, why does he not support the Canadian Export Development Corporation, a corporation built to sustain Canadian exports? Instead of trying to create the impression that very few Canadian companies are benefiting from Canadian Export Development Corporation financing, why does he not tell the Canadian people that hundreds or thousands of Canadian companies are benefiting from it?

He tries to create the impression that there are a few large contracts and the only beneficiaries of Export Development Corporation financing are a few large companies. Anybody who knows the situation knows that is patently untrue. I should like to give a couple of examples of some not untypical Export Development Corporation financing transactions in the last little while. The average number of Canadian companies supplying over $5,000 in goods and services would be in excess of 50 in most transactions; that is, 50 companies with over $5,000 in goods and services in a typical transaction.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Take the recent Export Development Corporation loan on telecommunication equipment to Turkey. The number of Canadian companies supplying in excess of $5,000 worth of components was 87; not one big company, but 87 companies participating in that contract with a minimum value of $5,000 of goods and services. Eight companies supplied over $100,000 worth of components each, for an aggregate of $2.4 million. The largest subcontract amounted to $971,000. Clearly, there are a large number of beneficiaries of Export Development Corporation financing, and they are spread across the country.

Let us look at another example, the sale of railway passenger cars. The Export Development Corporation loan to Mexico was $51 million. Some 38 Canadian companies supplied in excess of $10,000 each in components, the four largest companies aggregating $9.3 million, with the largest individual company securing $4.2 million of the business. I think this makes it very clear that large contracts are not for the sole benefit of a few very large corporations but are spread through the whole industrial fabric of Canada.

If the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the Conservative party are serious about being able to compete internationally—and I thought this was the burden of the remarks of the hon. member—it would seem to me they would then endeavour to inform the Canadian people of the benefits of Canadian Export Development Corporation financing, not the reverse. I would have thought they would have voted for the government's wage and price control measures as did one of their members, a former minister of trade and commerce.

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you say why we did not?

Mr. Alexander: Why did we not?

Mr. Gillespie: I think it is of some significance that a former minister of trade and commerce, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) alone among members of the Tory party had the courage, the insight to see that a system of wage and price controls was essential in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Tell it the way it is.

Mr. Alexander: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Gillespie: We had a problem of rising unit wage costs and we had to do something about it. We did something about it, and the only member who had the courage to say it had to be done was the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. He understood the problem, but other members of his party had their blinkers on.

Mr. Alexander: Where were you in 1974?

Mr. Gillespie: Let me give some of the numbers that have been referred to. I understand the problem opposite.

• (1700)

Mr. Paproski: Not even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) can stomach what the minister is saying. I see he is leaving.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I understand the vulnerability of hon. members opposite. But they introduced the motion; we did not.

Mr. Alexander: Speak to it, then.

Mr. Paproski: The Minister of Finance has now left the House in obvious disgust.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for York-Simcoe talked about our balance of payments difficulties and export difficulties. It might be useful, for the sake of those interested, to put some facts on record. There is confusion about whether our exports were up or down last year. It depends on whether you look at volume or value. Similarly, there is confusion about our imports, about whether volume or value was up or down and what the trade balance was. Allow me to put on record the situation for 1975. True, Canadian export volume went down some 8 per cent last year, but the value of exports rose by 2 per cent, and export prices by some 10 per cent. This must be considered in the perspective of the general decline in the volume of world trade last year, a rare event, as in most years world trade rises by more than 9 per cent in volume terms.

It is noteworthy that most major industrial countries fared worse in general economic activity than did Canada last year. The official OECD record shows that the volume of industrial activity dropped by close to 9 per cent in seven major OECD countries. This is twice the rate of decline which occurred in Canada in the index of industrial production. The point is that even if our volume was down, we were in good company. The conditions which caused our decline existed worldwide.

Mr. Alexander: How can the minister say that?

Mr. Gillespie: Well, if your customers are not economically healthy, if your customers do not have buying power and therefore cannot buy, you cannot expect them to buy your goods and you cannot expect them to buy other's goods. That happened in the world trading community last year.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Then how do you sell goods to China? They have no money.

Mr. Gillespie: Quite apart from the OECD countries, the United States, our biggest market, was in an economic slump. The slump in that market, which traditionally has taken between 65 per cent and 70 per cent of Canadian output, was particularly difficult. It is estimated that the volume of U.S. imports from all countries declined by 14 per cent in 1975. Yes, Mr. Speaker. The United States, our biggest market, imported about 14 per cent less, in terms of volume, in 1975. Surely those figures tell the story with which Canadian manufacturers had to contend.

Let me now deal with some of the factors affecting our trade. Some hon. members will say that these are short term but others will recognize them as being of a longer term nature. One of the major factors affecting Canada's merchandise trade in 1975 was a swing to a deficit in Canada's trade balance on crude petroleum as exports declined by $355 million. Despite that, despite the decline in commodity prices from previous peak levels affecting lumber, wheat, copper and zinc; despite major strikes affecting the delivery of wheat and newsprint in particular; despite the worst slump in industrial activity in the post-war period among our major trading partners; despite our major market for automobiles, the United States, being worse than it has been for many, many years; despite the slump in U.S. housing activity which in particular affected Canadian lumber prices and volume, Canadian exports in total went up in value by 2 per cent. It is important to see these facts in their proper perspective. One must acknowledge that our imports went up even more, by 9 per cent. But that reflects the comparative strength of the buying power of the Canadian public vis-à-vis the buying power of the public in our major markets.

Our merchandise trade position showed a definite improvement during the course of 1975. All of the $800 million merchandise trade deficit which Canada registered on a balance of payments basis occurred in the first eight months of the year. In the last four months of the calendar year 1975, Canada's merchandise trade was in virtual balance, despite work stoppages affecting particularly our pulp and paper industry. Exports of end products, inedible, fared particularly well in 1975, being up about 12 per cent in value. Industrial machinery exports were up 21 per cent last year, and exports of agricultural machinery by 36 per cent. In January, 1976, Canadian exports of end products, inedible, were up some 21 per cent over the level of exports in the same month in 1975. Over-all, the value of exports went up by about 5 per cent.

I think one ought to bear those figures in mind. Although there is not much satisfaction in knowing that our volume went down, the value of exports went up by about 2 per cent and we should be encouraged by the trend of the last four months. We have made a good start this year. The 11.9 per cent increase in the value of end products, inedible, in 1975 over 1974 is a source of encouragement. Putting it another way, our end products, inedible exports rose at a rate six times greater than the average percentage increase with respect to all Canadian exports in 1975. The net increase of Canadian exports in dollar terms in that regard was significant. The record is not all black, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe tried to paint it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No, it's mostly red.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for York-Simcoe referred to productivity. Certainly, we would have liked productivity in this country last year to be greater, but so would a lot of other countries have liked their productivity to be greater. Our critics opposite forget that you must look at productivity on a worldwide basis, on a country by country basis. It declines in a country when there is slack in the economy. Only when the economy is well out of a slump and bumping, as it were, upper levels of activity do productivity increases become significant. Again, an examination of the record will reveal that all is not black. Generally, Canada's productivity in manufacturing has been relatively favourable. During the decade 1964-1974, output per man-hour in Canadian manufacturing increased by 3.7 per cent per year, compared with an increase of only 3.2 per cent in the United States. In other words, the over-all increase in Canadian productivity has been slightly greater than the increase in the United States, a country with whose productivity we compare our own.

In 1975, Canada's output per man-hour was virtually flat, while output in the United States registered a decline of nearly 1 per cent. We all hope that our economy will pick up steam as the economies of our customers pick up steam. I do not think we can expect our economy to move ahead more rapidly than the economies of other countries; we cannot expect exports to increase more rapidly than the economies of other countries. Productivity will be related to that pick-up, or increase, in business.

I listened carefully to the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I wanted to hear his suggestions as to measures the government might take to improve the productivity of Canadian industry. I found him wanting, just as I suspect his new leader may find him wanting. His leader said that he would tell the Canadian people what the Progressive Conservative party supports. He said they have to get across to the Canadian people that the Tory party is a party that stands for things. He said they must be prepared to tell the Canadian people what those things are. I will be listening carefully in the future for positive suggestions as to what the Tory party stands for, how productivity can be increased—specific, constructive measures and not just more give-aways.

In the few minutes I have left I thought it might be useful to give hon. members a very brief view of the investment situation as we see it at the present time. I can only put it in these terms. If Canadian business was not investing significantly, one could say that it lacked confidence in government policies or lacked confidence in the future. However, if you look at the figures, you will find that Canadian industry is investing. Canadian business spending on new plant and equipment last year rose by 18 per cent in value terms. That, according to national accounts, was in the first nine months of 1975. In the United States, investment in new plant and equipment scarcely rose at all in value terms in calendar year 1975 and little buoyancy is expected in this sector in 1976. Reflect on that, members opposite. If the United States was flat as far as investment was concerned last year, and Canadian investment increased by 18 per cent, surely that tells a story about the Canadian business climate.

In Canada, a survey conducted among 300 large corporations suggested that these firms plan an increase in outlay of 28 per cent in 1976. This is probably not representative of the sector as a whole. But it does seem that business capital spending activity will outperform that of the United States by a wide margin. If we look at the record, that is probably a lot better than the picture some members opposite wish to paint.

Finally, I wish to deal with one or two of the initiatives. There is not a large amount of time left to me, but I think that members opposite must admit that the government's initiative with respect to negotiating a contractual link with Europe is a very important initiative. If they agree, I would like to hear them say so. It would be very useful for the people of Canada to hear that the Tory party supports a successful contractual link. I would like to hear more from the Conservatives how they feel about sector negotiations in the MTN. If they believe, as we do, that sector negotiations are a very important initiative as far as Canada is concerned in this new round of trade talks, I wish they would say so. We would like to hear it. If the Conservatives feel as I do about the government's initiatives with respect to developing a new form of economic co-operation with Japan, one of our largest trading parties, they should say so. However, they seem to be mute when it comes to these matters. They are only interested, at least some of them, when there is an opposition day.

If they agree with us on the kinds of joint economic agreements we have negotiated with Iran, Mexico, Brazil, Cuba and others we are in the process of negotiating with respect to Middle East countries, why do they not say so? These are important initiatives.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be consent to allow the minister to complete his remarks. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their kindness and generosity. I will be concluding in a very few moments.

There are some important questions of Canadian trade policy which are too often ignored. The whole Latin American area is of massive potential as far as Canada is concerned. The InterAmerica Bank is a very important agency for developing trade in that area. The government, and I as former minister, spent a lot of time working on better trade relations in the Americas. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in Cuba, Venezuela and Mexico as recently as the last few weeks.

Mr. Alexander: Forget about it.

Mr. Gillespie: He was there primarily for trade purposes. This is a vast area. I hope hon. members encourage businessmen in their constituencies to go to Latin America to discover for themselves some of those great trade opportunities. I am somewhat amused by the different attitudes toward Cuba and the U.S.S.R. On the one hand we were told that we had not been aggressive in competition as far as the U.S.S.R. was concerned because we lost to the Americans an order that should have come to Canada. In the next breath it was suggested that we seem to be wasting our time trying to write a similar volume of business with Cuba, very much closer to our doorstep. It is time the Tories recognized that Cuba is a major and growing market for Canadian goods, and started to encourage Canadian businessmen to sell into that market. It is totally ridiculous to suggest that we do business with the U.S.S.R. and at the same time hold back from doing business with Cuba.

There are a number of success stories with respect to the program for export market development. It is worth noting that H. A. Simons, of Vancouver, with the assistance of the export development program landed a $50 million design contract for a $500 million pulp and paper complex in Poland last year, by far the single biggest pulp and paper complex in Europe. This was done by a Canadian company in Vancouver with the assistance of the program for export market development, a branch of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Another Vancouver company was successful in putting together a consortium for a sawmilling operation in Iran. Another western company, ATCO Industries of Alberta and Montreal—

Mr. Paproski: A good firm.

Mr. Gillespie: It is a very good firm. They obtained contracts for prefabricated structures in Saudi Arabia to a total value of over $30 million after having obtained earlier multimillion contracts in Libya. They will tell you they got that contract with assistance from the Canadian government. With Export Development Corporation financing and the kind of export market development assistance I have referred to, RCA Canada has been awarded a $32 million telecommunication contract in the Congo.

● (1720)

I have enjoyed taking part in this debate because, as hon. members will recognize, I am familiar with many of the initiatives which have been taken over the past year. I hope very much that members opposite, instead of trying to paint a picture of gloom, will get out and help us persuade the Canadian business community to devote more attention to the export market.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented today is in my opinion most interesting. It reads as follows:

That this House deplores the lack of any effective government policies to deal with Canada's worsening trade performance and, especially, the government's failure to provide meaningful incentives to increase productivity—

To diversify the debate, I wish to discuss two points which particularly concern my area, the first being agriculture. I would also like to draw the attention of the government on that important poultry problem and blame it for doing nothing to protect our producers against the dumping of American poultry on our domestic markets. Consequently, the local market has reached saturation point and the producers are compelled to set quotas to such an extent that their business is unproductive. I happen to know the problem of a poultryman who has been fined for exceeding his production quota and told to reduce his production by half because the Quebec market has reached saturation point. And what is the cause? Certainly not the 17 producers in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean-Roberval area who have to produce at a loss in 1976 because they can use only 50 per cent of their facilities despite the fact they have the same maintenance costs, the same municipal taxes, the same insurance on buildings and the same depreciation to account for. No wonder there are so many bankruptcies in that sector in our area.

I am not asking why there are only 17 producers remaining, who vegetate and try to continue to work for a few more years. And specially let us not ask why in the last few years we have lost 50 per cent of our regional quotas, when cartels grab these quotas to control more securely the production of our area, perhaps with American funds. And what does the government do? It has passed legislation against combines and dumping but these laws remain dead letters. Our wholesalers continue to import American chicken and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) has nothing to say about it. Worse than that, Mr. Speaker, when we try to find out what is happening, we realize he does not know it himself.

As recently as last week, I asked him how many import permits he had granted for the import of American chicken, and I mentioned to him that last year, 25 million pounds of American chicken had been imported in Canada. At least that is the figure known today, besides what goes on under the counter.

The minister does not even know how much permits he has issued. I would even believe he does not know that our Canadian buyers do not need permits to import American poultry for the Quebec market. And as evidence of those allegations, I might quote the question I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on July 24, 1976, which was as follows:

Considering that the poultry producers' quotas will be greatly reduced during the next months, which will in turn reduce their revenue, can the minister tell the House whether his department issued licences or permits for the importation of poultry during 1975? If so, can the minister tell if he did so on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture?

And the minister gave me this answer:

Mr. Speaker, I do not have that information in front of me. I ask the hon. member to permit me to take the question as notice. I will give him the information as rapidly as I can.

Mr. Speaker, I am still waiting for that answer. But meanwhile the producers keep crying for help.

Yet I was sure the government had had its lesson when in February 1975 a group of producers, frustrated by the inertia of the government with respect to truckloads of American chicken, decided to take justice in their own hands. From then on we have been able to read in the press about the battle the producers were waging. I quote from a newspaper article dated February 22, 1975:

Chickens slaughtered in Saint-Damase by angry farmers.

Mr. Speaker, those farmers were from the province of Quebec.

The protesters were up in arms against the local coop buying its chickens from the United States while the producers who held membership in the coop had to comply with the imposition of quotas amounting to 64 per cent of their usual allotment.

Who was responsible for all that, Mr. Speaker? We read further:

The chickens were earmarked for the Saint-Damase coop which operates the local slaughterhouse. The height of irony is that the president of the coop is Mr. Roger Landry who happens to be the president of the Quebec Federation of Chicken Producers . . .

● (1730)

Mr. Speaker, it is astounding to read that. I continue to quote:

... and of the Canadian Council of Chicken Producers. Rumours has it that Mr. Landry is the future president of the chicken marketing agency to be created by Ottawa.

If that is not a conflict of interest, Mr. Speaker, I wonder when there is one. And I also wonder what has become of the anti-combine legislation. Later in the month of March, we could see the procession at the doors of another purchaser and other interested producers. Here is what we could read on March 11, 1975:

Chicken producers "rebelling". They lay siege at the doors of a U.S. poultry importer. They rise particularly against the Maxi Poultry Company which imports millions of pounds of poultry every year, while domestic producers can produce at only 70 per cent of their capacity ...

And further on, we read this:

The case of Maxi Poultry proves to what extent poultry producers in Quebec are at the mercy of the companies that make profits on their backs without, however, sharing those benefits with the consumers ...

While Quebec producers have to set themselves quotas, to avoid finding themselves stuck with surpluses they cannot sell, since January 1 Maxi Poultry imported 1,243,-435 pounds of poultry.

The president of that company said:

I import poultry to make up the shortage.

Can you imagine? "—to make up the shortage."! He has the gall to say further on, and I quote:

Quebec poultry producers are now experiencing difficulties because they are not interested in producing according to the demands of the marketplace, because they do not respect the quotas they set for themselves.

That, in any event, is the opinion expressed by Mr. Joe Freeman, ...

With the Freemans mixed up in this, Mr. Speaker, small wonder there are complications.

... general manager of Maxi Poultry at Ville des Laurentides, ...

Further on, he adds: As for me, I import only three million poultry a year. Another claims he imports two million. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the poultry producers are right. I ask you: What are we to think of a monopoly at the production level, that also controls the meat and poultry market, the level of production and sale. That is what the small independent producers are up against at the present time. It is also the case of the one I spoke of a while ago. Are producers not being robbed glaringly? But that is what goes on. And that is what this government tolerates or encourages.

As time goes by fast, I shall take a few minutes to blame the government and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in particular, with regard to dairy production. Last week, I welcomed some 60 dairy industrial milk producers of my riding of Roberval. Since then, several questions have been asked in the House to find out the minister's intentions concerning his dairy policy before April 1, 1976, so that the producers will know what to do about it. The answers have always been so evasive that dairy producers still wonder what is ahead of them. Indeed, on February 9, I asked the following question:

Since Quebec industrial milk producers and the management of industrial plants are seriously concerned about the government milk policy, which would result in lower income for producers, may I ask the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, whether he will recommend an adjustment to the milk policy to favour better returns for milk producers?

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

The answer was as follows:

... the minister, who is absent for the whole week and is to speak to several agricultural organizations in western Canada, has been examining this question for several weeks already and he will put to the House within a month a new dairy policy for 1976-77.

I did not get any answer other than this one. Then I wanted to know whether the minister could give us an idea of his policy before March 15. I have not yet received an answer.

On February 17, my colleague asked another question on this subject, and I quote:

Considering that for some months industrial milk producers have been suffering financial losses which in turn unbalance many producers' budgets, is the Minister of Agriculture willing to present the government's dairy policy around March 15, in order to give the producer's union enough time to indicate their views on such policy ...

The minister answered:

The program will be announced as soon as possible ... The dairy farmers of Canada know what they must do.

My colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) asked a supplementary and I quote:

As the minister just said to the House that he met with representatives of the dairy farmers, and as representatives of industrial milk producers made representations to some members of Parliament and as it would be in the interest of Canada, of industrial milk producers and of the dairy industry in general that such policy be known as soon as possible, can the minister make a little effort to present this policy before the last day of March?

And here is the answer:

... the main difficulty for industrial milk producers of Canada stems from the world surplus and from surplus production in Canada. We have not cut back subsidies, as some people say. We are still paying the same amount of money for the proper amount ...

I insist on this because when you make a statement, you have to weigh your words.

... for the proper amount of dairy products, including industrial milk. As I said, we will announce the program earlier, if we can.

He probably thinks that farmers are stupid. He says to us: "We have not reduced the price". They have not reduced the price but they did reduce the allowable volume. That is the same thing as reducing the price. Then he maintains very seriously before the House that he did not reduce the price, but we know that he reduced the allowable volume. Same difference! This is why I think that when he says he will allow $2.66 a hundredweight but on only 60 per cent of the quotas, while assistance to transport will be levied at 100 per cent, this is hypocrisy. If only farmers were told the truth: "Indeed, we made a reduction."

This is the motive of the discussions I had during my last meeting with a group of farmers who came to see me. They were saying: He must think we are stupid! However, I realize we must put the cards on the table and explain the situation.

During the meeting I was presented a brief containing a study of the dairy policy during 1975, including what they will get in 1976. We know what happened in 1975. In the chapter on the deterioration of the anticipated net income, it is said that, from April to November 1975, the producers did not receive the $11.02 which had been announced. This indeed proves that, because of the increase in the export price, they did not receive the $11.02 in 1975. Because of the increased cost of exported milk powder, from 15 cents before April 1 to 45 cents and finally to 90 cents, the producers made pressures as a result of which the price went down to 65 cents and a fund was created to compensate for the cost of export.

Then on November 4, 1975 came the crushing news: the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced the basis of the new dairy policy for 1976-77. The total amount provided in the budget to help the dairy industry is reduced from $275 million to $262 million. Warehousing and marketing costs become payable on that sum. If as expected these costs amount to $40 million in 1976-77, the amount of the subsidies as such will go down from $266 million in 1975-76 to $262 million 1976-77. As it is being estimated that the market will require 9.5 billion pounds of milk, it follows that the maximum subsidy will be $2.34 a hundredweight. It is no longer a grant of $2.66 to the producer as compared to the subsidy of $2.66 announced last year. This represents a decrease of 32 cents per hundredweight. It is said further down that the minister and the Canadian Dairy Commission, on November 4, announced that dairy imports will double from 5 to 10 per cent. I realize that the time alloted to me is almost over, but I want to bring to the government's attention these two serious problems for our region. They must be solved in a way that will benefit our poultry and industrial milk producers.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournement this evening are as follows: the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—Airports—Increased landing charges for light aircraft—Request for clarification of basis for increase; the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—Inquiry of the Ministry—Space in Hull.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO IMPROVE CANADA'S TRADING POSITION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That this House deplores the lack of any effective government policies to deal with Canada's worsening trade performance and, especially, the government's failure to provide meaningful incentives to increase productivity and thereby strengthen the competitive export position of Canada's finished and manufactured products.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). I had rather expected a little more from him since he had previously been Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, he ran pretty well true to form. We watched him in his previous portfolio. Our main impression of him was that he was a sort of a nothing minister. He was very much a lightweight. Of course prior to that he had the portfolio of Science and Technology. That was also a mess. Now we see that portfolio being handled along with Public Works by a minister who, we understand, spends about four hours a week on it.

I was rather disappointed in the attitude of the minister when he spoke. He mentioned how many people are in the House. He was very critical of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for leaving the House after his speech. I might say for the information of the Minister that the other evening there was only one Liberal member of the committee present when we had a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The chairman was there and the witness was there, but there was not one Liberal member. Before he starts taking cheap shots he had better look at his own club.

An hon. Member: Where is the cabinet tonight?

Mr. Kempling: The minister also referred to the anti-inflation legislation. I should like to read into the record here the comments of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he spoke in Sudbury in April, 1974, to the Ontario Liberals. The Prime Minister said that there is nothing wrong with our economy despite the doomsday sayers. He said that more Canadians have more money to spend than ever before and that inflation is not destroying our economy but is only having an unequal impact. He said we must fight it by throwing away the phony policy of price and wage controls. He said that prices are going up and therefore we need policies to increase supply. He said that we need to boost production, and if necessary legislate against profiteering. He said we must get after the big guys who are trying to make a fast buck. Then he said that "the government rejects the easy solution of wage and price controls and also the 90-day trial period suggested by the opposition who do not know what to do afterward."

He went on to conclude that controls do not stop inflation, that they did not stop inflation in the United States or in the United Kingdom, and that the rate of inflation doubled after the controls were introduced. In his final sentence he said that controls create changes, social injustice, and even violence. He said they are good for the big guy who can reclassify his position.

Mr. Alexander: When did they flip-flop?

Mr. Kempling: Oh yes! How phony can one be! Mr. Speaker, I do not want to put myself in the same class as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He has, as his colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) says, tunnel vision. That is his major problem. We look at the trade situation and remember that he was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We are in a mess. This seems to be his role. He gets into a department and gets that department in a mess. Then he gets out. However, I wish to reserve judgment in respect of the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) because he has taken over a mess which he wants to straighten out.

Let us look at a small industry in the time I have left. I have conducted a study of the auto pact. I have spoken to some of the manufacturers of automobiles and also some of the parts manufacturers. It is a rather dismal scene. We went in the auto pact in 1964 because we had a tremendous trade deficit in that account. Today it is larger than it was in 1964. I shall not become involved in the statistical game because I know statistics can be made to read in different ways.

I know the market has increased and that 40,000 or 50,000 jobs have been created in the interim. That is very good. However, we have a serious problem facing us down the road. I do not see very much happening. When we had the previous minister before the committee we could program his answers or read them from government releases. He never conveyed any real concern at all. He just gave "nothing" answers in any of his replies to questions. But I am looking at the real facts.

Rockwell Standard, a major manufacturer which had a plant in Tilsbury, had closed down. It has moved back to the United States. Eaton Yale Towne had a plant in London. It closed down and has gone back to the United States. Just last month a plant in Windsor, MGM Brakes, closed down with the loss of 60 jobs. It has gone back to the United States.

Why have these companies suddenly gone back to the United States? I spoke to the president of one company who said that they just do not like the economic climate in Canada, that they do not like the attitude of the government or the taxation system. He said they do not have much confidence in the future, and therefore have chosen to move their plant back to the United States and to export into Canada. Of course this will make our balance of payment problem even worse.

We used to play games with the minister before the committee. We talked about the secondary industry base. What a lot of flip-flopping he did on that! When we would ask him what his program was in respect of a secondary industry base in Canada his standard reply was that he did not think it was possible to establish a secondary industry base in Canada. Later on he changed his position. He said they would take a sectoral approach and rationalize industry. He said they would look at it in sectors.

I recall vividly the release about the footwear industry in 1973 concerning how great the program would be, that the Canadian shoe industry would be straightened out, and so on. What do we have today? I said the other day that the whole shoe industry is right on its uppers. We have a high level of imports. Imports are rising every year and our domestic production is going down. This represents a significant amount of money.

The total wholesale value last year in the shoe industry was about $650 million. We produced $350 million worth domestically, and we imported $280 million worth. Clearly some shoe manufacturers will go out of business. People in the industry tell us that there is no way they can survive. What has happened to this great program that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce started? Where did it go wrong? Is it being up-graded? Why is something not being done about it?

I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether he would look at voluntary quotas. He is on an Asian trip right now. We import the bulk of our footwear from Italy, Taiwan, South Korea, Spain, Poland, Hong Kong, Britain, and the U.S. On his trip he could take a look at voluntary or mandatory quotas to give a reasonable place to the footwear industry. He does not know whether he will go that far, but he does concede that tariffs alone may not be the solution. We started a program. I cannot tell you at this point how many millions of dollars we poured into the program, but it has been a failure and the record shows it.

The minister should get away from his philosophizing and get right down to men in the industry and talk to them. A man came to me on Saturday and related a typical situation. He has a business making clay pigeons. Total consumption is 35 million clay pigeons a year. This fellow produces 21 million and up, and the balance is produced by two other small manufacturers. Now there is a new company which has opened a plant in Canada to produce clay pigeons, but there is no market for them. These new people have been given government assistance to come into the country. The reason they were attracted here is that they will produce clay pigeons for the Olympics. The plant in Hamilton can produce all the clay pigeons that will be used in the Olympics in half a day, yet the government has attracted this foreign company here which will produce clay pigeons and take over the Canadian market even though we already have adequate production. The plant we have is working four days a week.

What are we going to do, and what can we do? I was down to the United States a few weeks ago, to Washington, and in spite of what the minister said about investment in plant and machinery in Canada and how he thought it would outstrip U.S. investment percentage-wise next year, I would be surprised if it does because they have an active industrial program down there primarily because they can get money at 5 per cent and 5½ per cent. They are operating on super prime down there, below the prime rate, at a ¼ per cent or a ½ per cent below the prime rate, while our people are paying 9 per ent and 9½ per cent. That is the major reason why we do not have investment going into our country. It is something that we have to deal with rather fast.

Triple A rated accounts in the U.S. can borrow money at 5 per cent. Why have their rates gone down? If you look at the amount of money that is deposited in savings accounts you see the reason. The same is happening here in Canada. We have an absolute record high of deposits in savings accounts in Canada. In other words the consumer is not spending his money, he is putting it in the bank because he has no confidence in the future. Consequently, banks have a large amount of money available to lend. The result in the U.S. was that they had to reduce the prime rate because money was not going out into the market place.

The other thing that has happened in the United States, and I am sure it is happening here as well, is that a lot of the money is in the short-term money market. Some large borrowers in the U.S. found that they could operate on short-term notes and get better rates from doing that than they could from the banks. Finally the banks had to react to it, and this is why they have gone down to a much lower interest rate than they had previously. This will have to happen here.

Some comments were made about the Common Market and about whether we believe it is a good thing or not. It is silly to say that it is not a good thing. Certainly it is a good thing and we want a good connection with the Common Market. But what we are concerned about is that the Common Market nations want from us our iron ore, uranium, pulp, and oil. They are not talking about our manufactured products. We are looking at a deficit in manufactured products of $9 billion in trade. The minister is pround of his record. I say his record smells.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: What I want to seen happen with the Common Market is for us to get our manufactured products going back and forth. There was a conference of the electronic industry in Brussels. Canada was only an observer at that conference, and yet we have an electronic industry here.

The task which the government has in front of it is to create an atmosphere in which business and the consumer have confidence. The consumer will take his money out of the bank and spend it only if he has confidence that inflation will be contained, that we can prosper, that we will not be looking at high interest rates and a high level of inflation. I talk to business people all the time and they tell me they are putting off their planned expansion because they do not know what the future will bring. I think that if we could put some taxation incentives in place they could be very meaningful in working along with the anti-inflation program.

I would like to see us say to industry, "You can earn a lower rate of taxation if you do certain things such as increase your productivity, stabilize your pricing, maintain or increase your employment, and stabilize your labour situation by having no strikes. Then you can earn so many points, which means you will pay less in taxation and you will have greater profits." But in order to do that we must modify the profit section of the anti-inflation legislation. We could say the same thing to labour, "If your industry is more productive, if you have no strikes and a stable labour situation, then you also can earn a taxation credit." They would respond to that. I think it should be considered very seriously.

In travelling around as I do I talk to business people all the time. I find that our attitude abroad is always to look for special deals. We want special protection for Canada's special status.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the House that since the hon. member has only an extra two or three minutes perhaps we could allow him to complete his remarks, and start after the dinner recess with a new speaker.

● (1800)

Mr. Kempling: We have to be a little more venturesome, but I do not follow the minister's reasoning when he talks about going into Third World countries, forming joint ventures and exporting back into Canada. That will do nothing for our unemployment problem. He says we will get a piece of the action that way, but I do not think that is the real solution. I become concerned when I read the OECD reports and the prospects they forecast for us. It just does not look very encouraging at all. I think this is the time we have to move. We have to be venturesome and aggressive, but in order to do that we must have some changes in our taxation, and some incentives to move people and to get business to become more aggressive.

I want to make one final remark. The minister made reference to his great efforts in South America. Let me point out that we have had a great deficit with South America as far back as one can go. We have never been in a surplus position or even at a break-even point with regard to any of our trade with South America. For the minister to stand up and cite South America is an insult to this House. He should really be ashamed of that effort.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.04 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) acknowledged in a recent statement about his trip to Hong Kong and Indonesia that as well as the auto pact it is the so-called invisible exports that are an essential problem, and the amounts of capital we need and are going to need will mean large increases in interest payments abroad for the use of that money, as well as the dividends that will be returned to the United States and other countries as a result of the trade imbalance.

The following figures suggest the present seriousness of the situation and the threat that is possible if this trend is not reversed in the latter part of the seventies by improvements in our merchandise accounts and/or a devaluation of our monetary unit. In 1970, the combined outlay for interest and dividends amounted to $1,550 million. By 1974 it had gone to $2,296 million. From 1971 to 1974 the total outflow rose by over 35.1 per cent. This is a very serious situation and, as the minister noted, it could be extremely serious for our country in the future.

On the occasion of the debate this evening I want to raise the question of Canada's trade with the underdeveloped world. The most recent figures that I have seen suggest that we are trading only about 11 per cent of our total goods, as exports, with these countries. Further, I think it is obvious to everyone in the House that, while aid is necessary to these countries, we should have long ago, and must not wait any longer, proceeded to improve our trade relations with them both as to our exports and also to allow them more favourable access to our internal markets under preferential treatment in order to improve their own economy and eventually become future customers for many of our goods.

We seem to have here, as in so many other of our economic policies or thrusts, fallen in with the thinking of the Americans as regards our trading relationships with the underdeveloped world. This type of thinking was espoused by Secretary of State Kissinger in his message of the special United Nations session on economic development in September, 1975. Mr. Kissinger's message to the special United Nations session on economic development in September, 1975, was, in my opinion, a profoundly small "c" conservative ideological document.

First of all Mr. Kissinger advanced a standard and utterly unrealistic American theory about how the developing countries will break out of the cycle of poverty. He said:

> We believe that economic development is in the first instance an internal process. Either societies create the conditions for saving and investment, for innovation and ingenuity, for enterprise and industry which ultimately lead to self-sustaining economic growth, or they do not.

Practically every word in that sentence is a free enterprise slogan—and I emphasize slogan. More important, Mr. Kissinger asserts a crucial United States premise: the developing countries will advance just as we and other capitalist powers did, because that is the only way.

Second, Mr. Kissinger posits harmony in the relationship between rich countries and poor, not conflict. He said that the advanced nations have an interest in the growth of markets and production in the developing world. In turn the developing countries have a stake in the markets, technological innovation, and capital investment of the industrialized countries. The world market, as it is now constituted, will facilitate economic development in the Third World, particularly if everyone stops criticizing that great instrument of progress, the multinational corporation.

In his United Nations speech Mr. Kissinger merely warmed over Ricardo's famous theory of "comparative advantage" which, as first stated in 1817, teaches that if every country specializes in what it does best, everyone will benefit. It is a good theory, if its assumption occasionally approximated the real world, for its givens are: competitive markets in the sense of price competition, an inability of capital to migrate, uniform international wage rates, and full employment. Although nothing like these conditions has obtained during the past century and a half, the theory has remained enormously popular because it helps to rationalize the wealth and power of the capitalist world.

Considering the institutional environment of Ricardo's day, and judged by Britain's priorities, Ricardo's theoretical and actual support for free trade seemed justified. In fact Britain used the free trade doctrine to its advantage during the peak of its power as a colonial empire in the latter half of the eighteenth century. Anybody who picks up the most recent edition of Professor Paul Samuelson's best selling Fundamental Economics, the text book that every beginning economic student becomes acquainted with at college, will find the basic argument for free trade summarized as follows:

[Mr. Hogan.]

> Unhampered trade promotes a mutually profitable international division of labour, greatly enhances the potential real national product of all countries, and makes possible higher standards of living all over the globe.

I want to digress for a few minutes on this matter of Canada's trade relations with the Third World in order to comment on the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada affirming its support for Canadian free trade. Needless to say it was following the long tradition of economic thought just summarized. Indeed the various regions of Canada which are geographically diverse are often cited as an example of a free trade area. We know that we, of the Atlantic region, have suffered in the past from this sort of thinking. Actually we have suffered in large part from tariff policies enacted as a part of national policy since 1879.

In making these comments on the Economic Council's affirmation of free trade as a policy option for Canada during the latter half of the 1970's I would not want to fall into the trap of advocating a blatant protectionist policy for major sectors or industries in the Canadian economy during what is obviously a changing international and global economic framework. No. To repeat, we well know in the Atlantic region that high, hidden subsidies, or tariff protection for central Canadian manufacturing, have meant, among other things, that we have had to pay, for generation upon generation, high prices for built-in inefficiencies, in other words for protective policies which have been of benefit to central Canada. The "infant" industry argument for protection has meant that many infants in Ontario and Quebec have never grown up.

In the present general agreements on trade and tariff I hope that the broad trust of Canada's position to the developed countries will be more favourable to the free exchange of goods and services; I do not think we should be in favour of protectionism. The business firms of this country should spend more time on initiating and promoting productivity and efficiency, and less time crying for protection.

Having said that, I believe that the Economic Council of Canada has pushed the free trade argument as a policy option for Canada during the latter half of the 1970's too far. Its modern extensions of Ricardo's 1817 model are based on facts which bear little resemblance to the existing international political and economic order. In addition to the assumptions previously noted, the free trade model requires small, powerless, and passive trading firms, unimpeded flows of labour between countries and within national boundaries, the free flow of capital, and non-managed flexible exchange rates. Only when these institutional conditions are met will the participants in international trade experience any improvement in their real standards of living.

I remind the House that today's world is made up of multinational corporations, trading blocs, tariffs and quotas, immigration and emigration restrictions, and control of capital flows. The realities of the Canadian industrial scene suggest that increased specialization would be important only in the manufacturing sector. It is obvious that our resource sector is already highly specialized and, as far as I can see, those segments of service industries involved in international trade are also highly specialized. The process of specialization would require a higher degree of concentration in the manufacturing sector, which is already highly concentrated. Thus the free trade proposal, paradoxical though it seems, would conflict with the thrust of the proposed competition policy which this parliament will debate in 1976.

We should also consider the serious implications for the Foreign Investment Review Agency—but let us not deal with that at this time.

The process of manufacturing specialization in a branch plant economy such as Canada's will encounter an even more severe problem in the form of United States anti-trust laws since these laws apply to the subsidiaries of U.S. corporations operating in other countries, including our own. We are said to have a comparative advantage in high technology industries yet a cursory perusal of Canada's trade figures throws a great deal of doubt on that statement. These industries seem to be performing poorly in foreign markets, and are only just holding their own, if not slipping, in the domestic market.

We must also consider that a substantial decline in employment in the manufacturing sector, compensated by a sharp increase in the share of aggregate employment accounted for by the service sector, could result in a marked deterioration in the productivity potential of the economy. Indeed it is possible that the initial productivity bonus stemming from specialization as the free trade model predicts, could in reality be completely offset with a time lag involving a lower trend in growth and over-all productivity. The massive industrial restructuring which would be required to maximize the potential benefits of free trade could not, I believe, take place in as orderly a manner as seems to be assumed by the Economic Council of Canada. This could not happen, I submit, even if we consider a relatively long adjustment period. In my opinion the only way to debate seriously the option of free trade is in the realistic context that free trade should be introduced simultaneously by all developed countries. A unilateral move by Canada would be unthinkable.

I now return to the question of Canada and the developed world's trade with the underdeveloped world. This surely is one of the most important matters facing all countries of the world at this time, developed and underdeveloped.

Let us look at what has happened to Third World economies in recent times. The years 1970-73 were favourable to developing nations. High prices stimulated the export of primary commodities and earnings rose 25 per cent a year, while imports increased only 20 per cent. So both corporate and government income in these countries went up; but at the same time Third World incomes continued to fall behind those of the advanced world, as 60 per cent of developing countries failed to maintain their per capita rates of agricultural production.

Agricultural output declined, despite the "Green Revolution". New and greatly improved types of grain need more water, making these societies more dependent on the weather than ever. They also require more petroleum-based fertilizer, which rose in cost 13 per cent per year between 1967 and 1972. Meanwhile the advanced nations were furiously trying to increase their own food output, further squeezing the world fertilizer market. The OPEC oil price increases dealt the Third World's increasingly mechanized agriculture another cruel blow.

So even in good years Third World agricultural production did not prosper. But what about manufacture?

Here the figures show that there was hardly any change in the real relative position of the developing countries in the world market. In 1960 they had 6.7 per cent of the total world manufacturing output; in 1970 they were still at 6.7 per cent, and in 1973 they reached 6.8 per cent. Since then they have been disastrously hurt by the current recession—the New York Times recently put their combined payments deficit at $35 billion for 1975—and have already lost their 0.1 per cent increment.

But these figures, as bad as they are, make reality too pretty. The Third World's share of heavy manufactures is less than 5 per cent and is dominated by a few products—clothes, consumer electronics, shoes—and a few low-wage havens like Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore. Moreover, even during those good years of 1971-1973 the rapid accumulation of reserves in the Third World did not offset their external debts. The former rose from $1.8 billion to $8.8 billion, the latter from $7.9 billion to $15.7 billion.

In sum, even under the best conditions there has been no relative improvement in the position of the Third World in the world agricultural or industrial markets. Those best of conditions seem to be now over for the foreseeable future; the pattern of absolute per capita decline will once again take over.

Why does reality thus violate the Ricardo-Kissinger theory? My answer relies heavily upon the work of some Third World economists, most notably Sami Amin. The theory has been called "the development of under-development." It holds that current forms of economic growth in the poor nations serve to intensify the structural conditions of their backwardness and, under present world market conditions, the Kissinger strategy will only institutionalize, not abolish, the inferior Third World position within the global economy. That could be a catastrophe for all of the free world.

Let us take one country, as an example, Gabon. Its per capita product today is roughly that of France in 1900, but its position clearly is different. France then possessed a developed capitalist infrastructure in which growth generated more growth, and it was competing in a not fully developed world market. Gabon, on the other hand, is a developed underdeveloped country in which the "spread effects" of internal growth are systematically and structurally limited, and whose fate is determined by an international division of labour that puts it at a disadvantage.

Let us look at some of the details. In the developing countries there is a vast labour reserve, either in the rural areas or the shanty towns, while we tourists hide in the hotels or on the beaches so we are not seen. This mass unemployment grew up under conditions of "urbanization without industrialization", which means that wages are low. In Europe, during the transition to capitalism, the artisans who were dispossessed by the new technologies became workers; in the Third World they became the under-employed. As a result the developing countries now lack internal markets, even when they have enclaves of high technology and productivity. "In the colonial model, industrialization employs fewer workers than it ruins artisans," Amin notes. Consequently developing nations must have export economies, which lack the national integration and self-reinforcing tendency to growth characteristic of the advanced economies.

At the Pacific Science Conference this summer, Dr. Moises Behar gave a dramatic illustration of this point. In Guatemala, he reported, the Mayans had built a coherent civilization upon corn and beans supplemented by fruits, vegetables and meat from wild animals. They tilled patches on cleared forest land, and then moved on, allowing the forest to reconstitute itself. But when the Europeans came they cleared the ground to grow coffee and raise beef, thus destroying the old-self-sufficient economy. Kissinger and others would say a productive investment had been made, but it retarded the development of the entire society.

Today similar trends are reinforced by the movement of international capital which sends capital-intensive technology into the Third World, creating enclaves of modernity, disrupting the old order and opening the way, not to development, but to continued under-development and dependence on the advanced economies.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Hogan: I will only be another two minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This can only be done with unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hogan: Of course in the future the Third World will increase its manufacturing capacity. The multinationals are locating more of their plants in the developing nations. One can even expect to see those countries take over what used to be the advanced industrial functions of the west. But this is happening only because new industries—computers, electronics, and the like—are becoming the leaders in the rich countries.

One can be sure that if the poorer countries are given the job of producing, say, more steel, then steel is of declining importance and profitability; more, the production of steel in the Third World will be organized in such a way that it will not lead to integrated development. This is not the result of a conspiracy by plutocrats; it is built into the very structure of both the world market and the various nations which comprise it. How does Canada and the U.S. and the developed world propose to deal with this grim reality?

I have to cut my speech because of the time factor. I want to stress that academic as this may sound in these hallowed halls, what is being discussed tonight is of extreme importance to generations of Canadians now growing up. We think we can live in a world where three quarters of the people control a small part of the resources. We think we can build a little wall around ourselves, the rich people, and say they are not going to get at us. We also have members opposite telling us not to worry about the sale of nuclear reactors, plutonium, and so on. They will need to have another thought with regard to the next generation.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made a three-day visit in order to drum up trade in Hong Kong and Indonesia. If my geography is correct, there is a country called Viet Nam between these two places. It is badly in need of rebuilding. They require building materials of all sorts. During that trip, why did the minister and his trade officials not deal officially with the Vietnamese to open initial talks on prospective trade that would mutually benefit both countries? It is ironic that the Japanese are doing so much trade with the Vietnamese and yet our leaders did not even take time to discuss possible trade with them.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I am happy to take part in his debate on the motion of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

But after listening to the distinguished members who spoke before me, I would like to make a comparison between a centralized economy and a decentralized economy. In a centralized economy, the state is the sole decision-making centre. It tells businesses what to produce and how to produce it. It sets the time required to meet objectives and determines the structure and also the margin of wages. The planified economy co-ordination mechanisms are achieved through a "public plan" which replaces the market. The consumer does not dictate production; businesses produce according to the public plan, not according to the demand.

I think that in Canada we believe in private enterprise. We believe mostly in a decentralize economy. The economy is regulated by the market and not by a central authority according to an objective or a plan.

The administration of resources in Canada is largely determined by market forces. But after listening this afternoon to hon. members of the opposition, the minister said that they seemed to hold diametrically opposed views. I could easily have believed this when seeing the hon. member for York-Simcoe, during the recent convention, join the group which is completely opposed to the principle and the philosophy that he has always advocated in the House, and join the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Clark) rather than Mr. Wagner. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said this afternoon, they are truly divided, they are diametrically opposed. For my part, however, Madam Speaker, I believe that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for York-Simcoe do not hold diametrically opposed views, but are unaware of the same things concerning the same subject.

Because they are unaware of the same things, their opinions did not have the same objective.

It is very difficult for the Canadian government to fix its priorities while meeting the numerous demands it receives. As soon as someone declares that the Latin American market is important and that the government should send there a trade mission as soon as possible, somebody else who might even belong to the same party suggests that the Pacific countries are equally important and that it is as pressing to send a trade mission over there.

This reminds me of the comments which we have heard this afternoon about the Prime Minister's visit to Cuba. I am always slightly disappointed when I hear the opposition criticize our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his visit to Cuba, a country which has started its own industrialization. That country needs the capital, the technical aid and the North American technology which are necessary to its development.

In consequence, I think canadian businessmen will be the first to benefit from this visit if they really want to export and exploit a market open to them.

But I think there is more to it than the simple commercial aspect of the question. For if Canada is to really stand up to its reputation of a country free from any prejudice, and respectuous of the political systems of other countries, without necessarily subscribing to them, this was all the more reason to take the opportunity to do it, although it is something we intend to forget when we consider the benefits of this visit to Cuba.

I would like to continue in the light of the benefits that we reaped from visits or exchanges. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) is now leading a Canadian delegation of several Canadian businessmen who will visit five very important countries with export potential. They will be visiting the South-East Asian countries, precisely to go and study with them to determine what is the potential for Canadian businessmen, industrialists, to go and tap that potential. In fact, in 1974, Canada exported for about $194 million worth to those five countries which are Malasia, Indonesia, Singapore, Thailand and the Philippines. That amount of $194 million of goods and services within those countries represented only 1 per cent of their total imports. Furthermore, if one considers Canadian imports from those countries, they reached $140 million, or 1 per cent of our total imports. That is one of the reasons—very important in my opinion—for those business tours to exchange ideas and techniques between Canada and those countries.

I would like now to assure hon. members that the department acquired an excellent knowledge of the Canadian industry. It compiled information on each industrial sector. In fact, if we want to open foreign market we must first know the technical potential of Canada. With that basic information and continuing to steer the export market we draft our policy for setting up an industrial strategy in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

And I would like deal with to a few aspects of that industrial strategy policy in the area of footwear, for example, to follow up on the question asked this afternoon by a member of the opposition. With respect to footwear an industrial strategy was announced by the department on November 20, 1975, following the preparation of a report that was tabled in the House on December 21, 1973, and the government following a study of various markets took position. Here are a few examples: leather shoes were exempted from the general preferential tariff; on four occasions, the Department of National Revenue realized that shoes from certain countries were underpriced and consequently it applied the appropriate correctives precisely to protect the Canadian shoe industry. On three occasions, manufacturers benefited from tariff reductions with respect to materials not available in Canada.

Several cases are currently under consideration. I want to point out that if at first that sectorial strategy applies only to the footwear, leather and tannery industries the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now considering the possibility of extending the benefits not only to the footwear industry but also the rubber footwear subsector. And that step followed the suspension on August 28, 1975, of the general preferential tariff on rubber footwear and the restauration of the 20 per cent tariff of the most favoured nation. That is in answer to a question asked by an hon. member this afternoon.

About the clothing industry I think the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) outlined this afternoon our policy about the clothing industry. We are aware that small and average businesses today must sustain an increasingly sophisticated competition at the international fashion level and we wish to encourage Canadian businessmen to transfer part of their production abroad and to invade further the American and European markets to take advantage of more propitious conditions. It is by introducing new original styles, by specializing in good quality products for which prices are less decisive that some Canadian manufacturers have succeeded not only in keeping their position on the local market, but in being accepted on foreign markets.

The Canadian industry works on smaller production series than its American counterpart and thus it can be more flexible and adjust more readily to the constant changes and whims of fashion. I feel that the clothing industry will experience considerable expansion in the next few years. Indeed the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has authorized rather substantial investments to enable Canadian manufacturers to break onto the European market.

Now, I wish to add a few words concerning the points raised by the hon. member for Roberbal (Mr. Gauthier) who voiced his concern about cheese quotas which will be eventually announced. I think necessary to say a few words on the background of those imports. On June 6, 1975, we accepted an overall quota for the importation of 50 million pounds of cheese for the 1975 season.

In the light of the present production, if we consider for instance the dairy production, there is a tremendous increase in butter production—about 21 per cent—which contributed to boost milk powder stocks. Consider the following standards: four pounds of butter represent the production of eight pounds of milk powder from a hundredweight of fluid milk. Yet we now have in stock enormous quantities of milk powder as industrial milk processors preferred to process industrial milk powder into butter and step up powder milk production. But on the other hand, there is a decrease in cheese outpout in Canada. The Cheddar cheese production in Canada has slipped by about 6.8 per cent.

The decision concerning the import quota is to be determined after we have consulted farm organizations and considered the present market in Canada and the objective of the department and the Agriculture Department which is to promote cheese consumption in Canada. We believe that importing massive quantities of cheese as we did last year prompted the chain stores to set up and organize cheese displays containing not only 25 or 30 but 100 different kinds of cheese.

We wish to assure dairy producers that the objective of this cheese importation policy will not be in competition with Cheddar cheese now being made in Canada. It will rather be the importation of European cheese from 140 different firms representing 200 kinds of cheese which are not necessarily made in Canada. And we want to give to dairy producers the assurance that no Cheddar cheese production increase will be registered this year. We will definitively protect this Canadian consumption market.

On the contrary, we wish to increase our export sales of Cheddar cheese to England, where we lost a market of 37 million pounds when they entered the European Economic Community. I would like to be specific in this regard. I wish to inform dairy producers that this program does not run counter to their objectives, but that we should rather work together towards a common end, namely to increase the cheese production in Canada with a larger variety and a quality that satisfies more the consumer's taste.

I wish to deal now with the matter raised by the hon. member about the import of broilers in Canada. I would refer the hon. member to the debate that took place on the notorious National Farm Products Marketing Council. If he had attended these debates a little longer, he would know how the mechanism or structure of a broiler production agency or council is set up. At present, two products, eggs and turkeys, are governed by a quota system and sold through a national marketing board.

When he speaks of import permits for broilers, no such permit has been issued and no legislation has been passed in this regard, because producers have refused to become members of the National Farm Products Marketing Council. Only two kinds of producers have agreed to it, that is turkey and egg producers. I would like to assure the hon. Member that no import permit for broilers was issued because producers themselves have refused to get involved in a nation-wide quota system. They preferred having regulations within the province and as a result no permit is required for imports.

If we were dealing with import of turkeys, I would like to answer that question. About 4 million pounds of turkey were imported, pursuant to section 11 to the GATT agreement which states that any country that limits its production must plan its quota. These 4 million pounds represent 2 per cent of the whole Canadian turkey production. That 2 per cent has been established after discussions we had when we created the National Farm Products Marketing Council, more specially 120 per cent of the import average in the last five years. The 4 million pounds, that is 2 per cent of the present Canadian consumption, constitute 120 per cent of the import average between 1969 and 1974 inclusive.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I would like to mention a few points of interest to hon. members concerning departmental efforts, particularly information we issue to better inform Canadian businessmen and manufacturers. I have here samples of all pamphlets published by our department. We should try to keep businessmen and manufacturers better informed about our department's assistance, specially concerning initiative programs, productivity increase, financial assistance for industries which try to export their products, export development, promotion programs and management programs. I tried to promote those programs in my riding last year when I invited businessmen and manufacturers to discuss the possibilities of assistance from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for Canadian businessmen who want to take advantage of opportunities that could open up in export trade.

I therefore call on all members to try and better inform our businessmen and manufacturers of the potential within the department in the form of information brochures of every kind. To conclude, I commend the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for raising today this important question. I believe the statistics referred to by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources fully answered the question raised by the hon. member.

In my view, the challenge is much more in the nature of a long term one than a matter of a single day's discussion. Every year brings new challenges to our society, and governments must play a part in meeting them efficiently. In 1975, unemployment and inflation were the major economic problems in Canada as well as in a number of other countries around the world. And other problems of the same size will be faced during 1976. It must be recognized how complex and difficult those problems are. For example, in order to fight inflation, the federal government had had extensive consultations with many organizations. Today they are asking for very close cooperation from consumers, corporations, trade unions—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please, I regret to interrupt the hon. member. If he is about to close his remarks, perhaps the House would consent to allow him a few more minutes, but his time has now expired. Does the House permit the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How many pages have you left to read?

Mr. Roy (Laval): I thank you, and in conclusion I would once more raise this challenge, a long term one rather than the subject of a single day's interest.

Therefore, consumers, entrepreneurs, labour unions and governments at all levels are requested to cooperate very closely in the anti-inflation program. Programs and policy must be developed with care if both current economic problems are to be solved.

We are all aware of the importance of our export trade, which accounts for more than 25 per cent of the Canadian dollar. These discussions provide the opportunity to exchange views and ideas for the common goal, which is the continued expansion of our exports sales.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I can understand your difficulty. My constituency is Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. I can understand your difficulty because it took me three years here to be able to remember that myself.

I will be quite brief this evening, but at the outset I want to extend my congratulations and appreciation to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for moving what I think is a very important motion which allows this House to debate the whole question of Canadian productivity and our balance of trade problem.

It is not a problem which deeply concerns people back home in our constituencies or one that we hear a great deal about in meetings in legion halls and church basements. However, it is a matter which affects every Canadian, whatever his age or occupation, on a very direct and constant basis every day. It is a matter of vital importance, and it is one which the government now is beginning to recognize will affect our future very greatly. Just this afternoon on the front page of the Toronto Star there was an article under the headline "Jamieson Calls Talks on Trade", the first part of which reads as follows:

> Trade Minister Donald Jamieson has called a meeting in Ottawa next month to discuss Canada's growing balance of payments deficit which he described as "one of the most acute problems" the country faces.
> The meeting will be attended by "40 or 50 of the most experienced people in the capital formation field," Jamieson said in a CBC interview in Hong Kong over the week end.
> Jamieson's remarks came as financiers were warning publicly that Canada's international credit rating is in danger.

This gives an illustration of the problem which the government recognizes, the problem that our economy is suffering from at the present time, and something desperately needs to be done.

We heard earlier this afternoon from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) who, in his former incarnation, was the minister of industry, trade and commerce. He left for the present minister, who is currently out of the country, a great number of unsolved problems. They are problems which will be very serious indeed if the government continues to ignore them.

Many Canadians are aware of what problems are caused by poor productivity on the part of the country. There are three of them which stand out in particular. The first is that a high rate of inflation is often the result of a poor level of domestic productivity. Second, our international balance of trade is affected by our failure to increase our productivity. Third, as a consequence of that, ultimately we are faced with a problem of high unemployment. At the present time we are suffering from all three of these problems, and the indications are that particularly with respect to unemployment the problem may become much worse in the future.

What is the present situation? The following facts will illustrate some of the problems we face right now. First, at present Canada is suffering from a $5 billion balance of trade deficit. If we consider our trade deficit with respect to manufactured goods, the figure is twice that, some $10 billion, but it is offset by the fact that Canada is shipping vast quantities of raw materials abroad. While this does something to reduce our international trade deficit, it means that we export jobs to other countries which would be kept here in Canada if we were to process our raw materials here, as opposed to shipping them abroad and buying them back at higher prices in the manufactured form.

Second, Canada is suffering at present from an endangered credit rating. Over the next few years it will be extremely important that we borrow money abroad to finance new ventures which will be very necessary in the future.

Saturday's Toronto Star featured a large article which outlined some of the problems caused by the loss of confidence in Canada's credit rating at the present time. The Star interviewed a banker-economist named Hans Mast, who is based in Zurich, Switzerland. He explained his feelings about Canada's credit rating at the present time. What Mr. Mast had to say is as follows: "Canada is no longer on our list of favoured countries for long term investment."

If this problem continues to get worse, Canadians will be faced in the future with great difficulty in attracting capital from abroad which it will need for expansion. It is very important to us that we be able to get this money if we are to keep Canadians at work and stimulate growth in our economy. This is why it is extremely important that we keep our credit rating at a very high level.

Third, in 1975 Canada experienced a year of negative per capita growth in our gross national product. That is a very serious situation, and internationally we stand up very poorly against other nations.

Fourth, Canada's productivity increased by an average of just over 2 per cent per year in the years between 1968 and 1973.

Fifth, real growth for 1976 is projected by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to be a figure of only 2 per cent, if we are able to make that.

Sixth, the Economic Council of Canada projections which have been done show that Canada will continue to be near the bottom of the list of industrialized countries registering economic growth in the next few years. This is a very serious situation which the United States shares; this is going to mean that North American manufactured goods will be priced out of world markets, and the effects will be felt on the domestic market.

The seventh problem we are faced with at present is that the sort of growth which is taking place in our gross national product is largely due to the growth in our labour force. It is not due to increasing productivity. Dian Cohen, the excellent freelance economist who writes in the Toronto Star and a number of other newspapers across Canada, pointed out in a recent column that between 1950 and 1955 some 70 per cent of the gross national product growth came as a result of our being a more efficient nation, and our incomes rose accordingly. Seventy cents of every dollar in the growth of our gross national product occurred from 1950 to 1955. At the present time, however, there are great changes being made.

Between 1973 and 1975 the situation was very different. According to Ms. Cohen the situation is that at present increases in productivity have been falling and now contribute only 40 per cent to real gross national product growth. This is an extremely serious problem, and it is one which we must be concerned about over the next few years.

The obvious question, once we can recognize the importance of the problem and that something must be done, is: what is it that governments can do? Obviously the most important thing the federal government must do is begin to show some leadership in our economy.

I have been interested to follow the trend of government growth in Canada over the last few years. Over the past while the trend has been toward increasing government domination of our gross national product. At present about 40 per cent of our gross national product is controlled by government of one level or another, and over the New Year's break Canadians were treated to the spectale of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) condemning the free market system, saying that free entreprise has failed in Canada, arguing that the government had to get yet bigger, and saying that Canadians will just have to live with the consequences of that.

I say to the Prime Minister that the problems we are faced with today, the problems of high inflation and high unemployment, are not the fault of business or labour; they are the fault of the government. This government in particular has shown very little restraint in its activities, and I do not think it serves Canadians well when it seeks to pass the buck and to blame Canadians for the problems created by the government itself.

In recent years when we have faced problems of unemployment it has been the trend to expect the government to try to create new jobs at the government level. When this happens it fuels the growth of government, increases the bureaucracy, stifles individual initiative, and it means that the percentage of the gross national product taken by the government increases.

By its nature government is unproductive and extremely inefficient. If real growth is to take place it will not happen in the public sector but in the private sector. The whole trend of government policy must be to get people back to work but, more important, to get them back to work in the private sector in meaningful jobs at decent salaries, with opportunities for advancement. Instead the government has taken the pessimistic approach to the problems of the economy. Its policy is to discourage the growth of new jobs in the private sector.

In an attempt to stimulate productivity in the private sector the government could start by removing some of the disincentives. I can give three examples of this from my own constituency which illustrate in part some of the problems with government policies.

The hon. member who spoke before me mentioned the problem of the government's dairy policy. In my constituency, which I think is fairly typical of rural constituencies across Canada, a large number of dairy farmers in recent years invested amounts as high as $100,000 in some cases to expand their dairy herds and increase their production of milk. This was done at the insistence of government which argued that Canadian producers must produce more. Incentives were given by federal and provincial governments to encourage producers and now those in my area, having acted in good faith and increased their debts, find that their subsidy cheques for industrial milk have been slashed. As well, the government is considering vastly increasing the amount of cheese imported from abroad. This will only exacerbate the surplus of milk and milk products in Canada today.

I have written and made representations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), and stressed my concern about the effect the government's actions are having upon the livelihood of many dairy producers. I understand the ministers are looking into the matter to determine whether the increase in imports can be curtailed.

I do not think that is good enough, however. If the government is to show good faith to dairy producers it has an obligation to cut back the quota of cheese allowed into this country. Our dairy farmers should have some assurance that it is worth while to continue investing and working, and this is one area where the government could act.

The rationale given by the hon. member who spoke before me, and by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is that Canadians cannot produce a sufficient variety of specialty cheeses to meet Canadian needs. Madam Speaker, if we are ever to develop an indigenous Canadian cheese industry which is healthy and viable we must give our cheese producers the protection we give manufacturers in other sectors of the economy.

In my constituency at Elmira, Ontario, there is an outlet which sells mostly Canadian cheese, and I am amazed at the variety offered. If Canadian dairy farmers were given incentives to produce, and the Canadian cheese industry were given the opportunity to fill the need in the market, new jobs would be created, productivity increased, and the economy strengthened.

Another example of where the government attitude is a disincentive occurred in my constituency last fall. A constitutent manufactures assembling kits for sale to domestic retailers and for export. Sales were so good and were increasing so fast that, having paid salaries and overhead, he had difficulty paying the federal sales tax at the beginning of each month. The area he comes from does not have a great deal of industry and the jobs he provided were desperately needed. His accounts receivable ran 50 days and he was having difficulty making ends meet, especially having to pay the federal sales tax at the beginning of the month. He felt his highest priority was to pay his workers. He proposed to the government that he be allowed to pay the sales tax later in the month, offered a penalty for late payment, and a guarantee of payment before the month's end.

The government's response was startling. One day when he was absent officials from the Department of National Revenue arrived and insisted that his wife—who did not have authority to sign cheques on behalf of the business—sign a cheque immediately for the amount of the sales tax for that month. They threatened to seize his accounts receivable unless the sales tax were paid immediately. This manufacturer was keeping people off the unemployment insurance rolls, Madam Speaker. He was paying federal sales tax and generating wealth in this country which would benefit all Canadians. The government's attitude was not one of encouragement but rather to smother him with so much with red tape that he was threatened with the possibility of having to go out of business.

I am pleased to report that when the matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) he was responsive. An arrangement has been worked out so that payment can be made at a later date. But it should not have been necessary for this man to come to his member of parliament. He should never have run into difficulty with the bureaucrats who just put impediment after impediment in his path.

The third area which affects my constituents, although the plant is not in my constituency, is the situation at the consumer appliances division of Westinghouse Canada. Westinghouse Canada is attempting to sell its operation to another company and there are two bids, one from White Consolidated Industries which is foreign controlled, and the other from G.S.W. Ltd. A number of my constituents work at the Orangeville plant which employs about 200 people and I know the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has raised the matter of the Hamilton plant and the jobs there. The workers at the Orangeville plant are not unionized and are very concerned about their future.

The sale of Westinghouse Canada to White Consolidated Industries was blocked by the Foreign Investment Review Agency and I am not quarrelling with that. What bothers me is that the decision on whether the sale goes through has been delayed so long by the government. We expected a decision last week, but now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is away on a two-week trip to the Far East so the workers still have no assurance about their future. The effect on their morale is bad; they are concerned about their jobs, and they have a right to be concerned. For this reason I recently wrote to the minister expressing concern and saying that an early answer to this problem must be found. The paramount concern must be the protection of jobs of Canadian workers, and guarantees must be given. I know that GSW Ltd. has offered guarantees in its Hamilton and Orangeville plants, but I am not aware of guarantees given by White Consolidated Industries. That is of concern.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt to hon. member, whose time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Does the House agree unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: For not more than one hour.

Productivity and Trade

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, my colleague says that I should speak for not more than one hour. I hope to be a good deal shorter than that.

I am concerned about the sale of Westinghouse Canada. At present the consumer appliance industry in Canada is divided into six roughly equal parts. The company which gains control of Westinghouse Canada will have dominance in the Canadian market, or will dominate the consumer appliance market. This is a matter for concern. The government's previous approach to an industrial strategy for Canada has been to take the sector by sector approach. It favoured control being exercised by a Canadian corporation in each sector. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should look closely at this matter. Of vital importance is the question of the productivity of Canadians, and decisions which could affect our ability to compete abroad. I am not saying that the minister should decide one way or another in this regard. I merely say that one criterion governing his actions should be the protection of jobs of affected workers and the need for Canadian dominance in this important sector.

As members of this House know, the government spends large amounts on big corporations. The hon. member for York-Simcoe mentioned the Export Development Corporation, which makes available hundreds of millions of dollars to large industries. I am concerned about the small businessman. We have paid too little attention to our small businessmen and farmers. They are the most productive. The wolf is never far from their door, and they must be productive in order to make ends meet. The government should pay some attention to this area, instead of making money available merely to big business. Compared to the big businessman, the small businessman is smothered in red tape, swamped by high taxes and must compete with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which is in a dreadful mess.

Unlike the Prime Minister I am a strong advocate of the free market system. It is time to lift the burden from the back of the small businessman. It is time big business carried a share of the load. The government's priorities have been exactly the reverse. If the free market system is dead in Canada, as the Prime Minister suggests, it is dead largely because of government intervention, which protects large businesses but does little for small businesses.

The government should adjust the tax system to provide incentives for productivity. Under the present wage and price program workers may win up to 2 per cent for productivity increases. Many economists feel this figure is too low and that stronger emphasis should be given to encouraging increased worker productivity. I agree. The government should act in this area. I therefore hope the government will re-assess part of its controls program and allow greater incentives for productivity. For example, why not change the tax structure in such a way as to encourage workers to invest in their company? I find that concept exciting. It would give a worker a stake in his job, be an incentive to greater productivity, and give him some measure of security for the future. If our system needs improving the government should encourage incentives for industry, and encourage workers to invest in their firms.

Present day conditions are critical. If the government takes strong action to restore the health of the economy we can prosper in Canada. If it does not, I predict greater inflation, spiralling unemployment, and a continuing decline in our balance of payments. This is not the time to mortgage our future.

The time has come for the administration to show leadership. The Canadian people are asking for it and the economy needs it. It remains to be seen if the government will supply it.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I confess to being relieved at being recognized. Earlier the minister referred to absentee members on my side. Our Whip said that some members are in committee, others in their offices, and still others preparing for committee meetings tonight. The minister seemed to imply that committee meetings this evening had no bearing on today's debate. I assume that members on the government side attend only one committee at a time, whereas members on my side serve on three or four.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: As the minister pointed the finger at us and charged us with absenteeism may I point out, for the record, that the attendance record of British Columbia members on both sides is good. But we are severely affected by weather conditions. Indeed I had some difficulty coming here today. I notice that the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) is absent, as is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), no doubt because of inclement weather. Having set the record straight on attendance in this House, I shall proceed with the subject to be debated.

I am not an economist and cannot speak with the skill of an economist. All the same to my way of thinking, the motion, especially the second half, is of great importance. It speaks of the government's failure to provide meaningful incentives to increase productivity and thereby strengthen the competitive export position of Canada's finished and manufactured products. I agree.

Our economic endeavours often involve various ministries of the government. For instance, anyone who wants to establish a mine in the north, in the Arctic, must seek the co-operation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), the minister responsible for industrial development, and the minister responsible for DREE. Is it any wonder that we have difficulty establishing industry, whether primary or secondary, whether raw materials to be shipped to Canada or from Canada, and whether it is raw materials to be refined or processed here or elsewhere? Is it any wonder we have difficulty getting the show on the road with the very complex bureaucracy the government has established and put in the way of the entrepreneurs?

I wish to give one specific example. How well I remember an address made by the government House leader in the Senate, in Trail in my constituency. He said to the gathered throng, "Give me one example of a Conservative government's efforts toward development that has done anything for this riding. Give me one." Being somewhat of a knowledgeable fellow in that regard, I put up my hand. The government House leader in the Senate did not wish to recognize my interest. He ignored my attempt to be recognized.

That one example is worth mentioning because on it hinges a great deal of the development in this country. That was a program introduced by the last Conservative Prime Minister of Canada, the program Roads to Resources. A classic example of that is the Pine Point development. The government has been very concerned about the Pine Point development. It has felt all along that it has been a rip-off. It never even bothered to equate the cost of that project with the taxes that have been generated in the work force or with the dollars that have flowed into the treasury as a result of the raw materials. It did not even realize that the ore from Pine Point eventually ends up in the smelter in Trail. It has not bothered to look at a map.

That is an example of ignorance. It is not lack of attention, but pure and simple ignorance. Is it any wonder that any entrepreneur has difficulty establishing an industry or business in this nation? Obviously government ministers don't even know where Pine Point is. They would not even know there is a railway there except they thought it cost this nation a hell of a lot of money. They have not thought about how that money has been returned a hundredfold. They have not figured out that it has provided thousands of jobs. There problems that members of the government are faced with have been introduced by themselves because of the weakness in their own system.

Let us get into another area with reference to productivity in our foreign trade that is of concern. It has been proposed time and again, and we have seen some form of response from the government, although nothing very concrete, that tax incentives be provided so that Canadians can invest in their own industries with a reasonable return.

The sad fact is that there are many cases where it is of greater advantage to Canadians to invest in the United States and in its products and stocks than in our own Canadian firms. What a shame! What a sad reflection on the industry and the incentive of Canadians that the government is so insensitive to that particular need. How much this country could move ahead if the government simply recognized the need, and in fact the desire of Canadians to invest in their own country! That very desire is stifled and denied by the government. Then again, what else is new?

Look at the problems we have with inflation. Look what inflation has done to the costs of production. Look what it has done to the costs of labour. The government says it is the fault of labour and management. The government does not say whose fault it really is with any truthfulness. It knows where the fault lies. It proved that to Canadians when it did its flip-flop of a few weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: This lack of action on the part of the government has driven up the costs of production. How does the government think the public feels when they can go across the line to the United States and buy Canadian made products for less than they can buy them in their own backyard?

There is one avenue that has not been examined. I mentioned the fact that there was a lack of co-ordination within various departments of government. One is the DREE program. I would like to ask how often does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce consult with his counterpart cabinet minister, the minister responsible for the program called DREE? How often does he see him?

Mr. Paproski: He hasn't been in the House for three weeks.

Mr. Brisco: Of course the minister responsible for DREE has not been in the House for the past three weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Where did Joe go?

Mr. Brisco: I want the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) to know that God is watching.

Mr. MacFarlane: When did you arrive—ten o'clock?

Mr. Brisco: What a band of restless natives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: To continue with what I have to say, at least on this side of the House it is worthy of some merit even if the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) has not recognized that fact. It takes him a while. He is a slow learner.

To continue, let me give one example of government co-operation. It is an example of how the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce works with DREE. There is a firm called Swan Valley Foods located in Creston. They developed a very innovative, challenging new system of processing certain foods, particularly potatoes and other vegetables. I had the opportunity of taking one of their senior officials to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to open up new avenues and roads of marketing their products overseas. I wonder whether the Department of Regional Economic Expansion would have suggested to this gentleman, this firm, or any other firm that they sponsor and assist with our tax dollars, to contact the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Just this week we received a release from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It makes reference to the fact that they have assisted 13 firms in Quebec. One firm manufactures fibre glass awnings and other metal products. Two firms manufacture kitchen and bathroom cupboards. Another manufactures door frames, and another ultra-fine knitted fabrics. Does anyone in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce know about these firms? If they do, quite frankly I would be very surprised.

I must say, however, that I was very pleased with the response we received in the office of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. His deputy was most cordial and helpful, but we had to seek him out. Surely the government does not think that every small entrepreneur has the imagination or perhaps knowledge of the government structure to know where to go in order to best market his products.

There is another firm in Kootenay West that manufactures a product for overseas markets. What has happened to this firm? It is now in a position to expand. It is in a position to produce a new product which is in heavy demand on the overseas market. What does DREE do? It shuts off the incentive grants for that riding. It cancelled the application by that firm which went in three months before the December 31 deadline. They had every opportunity to employ people, provide jobs, create tax dollars and bring money into this country, but what did DREE do? DREE preferred to cut them off at the pass.

I wish to read into the record the sad commentary of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the fact that that department has nothing to do with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is about time the two got together. This concerned constituent, this concerned entrepreneur has written as follows:

● (2130)

As I mentioned to you, the expiry of DREE designation for this region has been a serious blow to my company as well as to the area. I know you will find the following information to be of interest and I hope you can encourage the proper authorities to give the situation the consideration it deserves.

Right on! What is my responsibility, or the responsibility of any member of this House? It is to write to the minister in charge and plead the case. This I did six weeks ago. Mr. Speaker, I have not even received a reply in the form of a cursory letter acknowledging receipt of mine. That is an example of the co-operation we get from across the way.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Brisco: The gentleman goes on to say:

We have developed, at a direct cost in the order of $140,000, a utility-size gasoline-powered chain saw. Our hope to obtain DREE help to commit it to production was delayed by financial problems. Toward the end of 1975, as a result of corporate reorganization and a general improvement in the chain saw market, we were able to plan a means to produce the saw here, but this would clearly be conditional on a DREE grant of an appropriate amount.

In discussion with DREE officials it was realized that our application would be "tight" in terms of processing time, but optimism was expressed that it could be completed, and if not, that its status might continue as being "in process".

We learned this week that our application expired with the end of the region's designation.

I must observe that on the basis of the previously mentioned optimism we invested $4,875 in the cost of preparing our application and $12,700 in related capital studies costs. I am not suggesting we were misled; indeed, we expect our DREE contacts are as disappointed as we. However, those sums are obviously serious expenditures for a small company and they weren't committed lightly.

The letter continues:

Early in 1975, at the height of our financial problem, we had to investigate the sale of our new product design. It was evident that it could likely be purchased for manufacture in Europe. With this new turn of events, if foreseeably we cannot find other means to finance it here, and we have certainly tried, we may need to recover our money by that route.

Let me underline one of the phrases in that last paragraph—"it was evident that it could likely be purchased for manufacture in Europe." In this new turn of events it was foreseeable, if they could not find other means to finance developments here, that they might have to recover their money in that way. In other words, the company would be forced to move to Europe to manufacture a product which could and should be manufactured right here.

What were the benefits to Canada, present and to come, which might be anticipated? The communication which I received goes on as follows:

Jobs

53 to start, rising to 93 in three years. These would be unskilled people, trained in Quadra, mostly under 25 years, and drawn from area unemployed.

Wages in the area

$4 million over three years.

Exports (excluding the imported content)

$11 million over three years.

Sales

$14 million over three years.

"Lost" expenditure on goods, services in Canada $13 million.

This gentlemen goes on to say:

We were created by DREE and have qualified for two DREE grants totalling $256,000 of which $148,000 has been received to date. Consider what Canada has gained from this investment in 39 months of our operation:

Jobs

120 presently employed.

Payroll

$4 million, of which about $980,000 was remitted to the Receiver General.

Exports (excluding the imported content)

More than $10 million.

Domestic purchases

More than $14 million.

Pay attention, you Liberals on the other side who are not listening: this is what the government's investment through DREE produced in 39 months of operation.

Those concerned may be interested to know as well that Quadra is 45 per cent owned, with shared control, by 222 local people—businessmen, professional people, clerks, secretaries and so on. These are people within my own community, within my own riding, who had the fortitude and, in many cases, the few pension bucks to pay out of their own pockets in order to start a new industry with the assistance of the DREE program. But there is a problem. DREE and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had not been working together.

I would venture to say that if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had an opportunity to read what I have said tonight he would say to the minister responsible for economic development, "Don't you think it makes good common sense to fund that industry and generate more jobs and more dollars for Canada?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House give consent to the hon. member who has the floor to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Mr. Lalonde: We want more!

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister. I wish to continue to read from the letter I have been quoting.

My shareholders are very proud of the fact that not only have they generated a successful industrial development here, but it is also an example of what Canada so vitally needs—the manufacture of an export product in an area which is otherwise totally dependent on resource industries.

Herein lies one of the cardinal problems confronting the operation of any DREE program. If hon. members will look at the news release put out by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) they will find that the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces are frequently recipients of DREE grants earmarked and geared toward the development of secondary industry, manufacturing items for export and so on. But what has happened in British Columbia? What has happened in Kootenay West and the area designated under the DREE program? Development there has simply been shut down by a government which is apparently not interested, if the minister is any example, bearing in mind that I am still waiting for an initial response to my letter of six weeks ago. The government has no feelings of sensitivity toward the needs of these people and the economy of the depressed areas of British Columbia.

On the basis of the above remarks my constituent who writes about this says:

Of course I must plead the case of my shareholders, but as a businessman I must also observe that the federal government seeded, and has been amply repaid for its seeding of the area. It has taken a lot of local time, effort and money to generate an atmosphere for development. What a shame it will be to turn the clock back.

I must conclude by saying that the industrial secondary industry clock in Kootenay West has been turned back by the government.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this area of world trade is an area in which I do not maintain that I have any particular expertise, but as one coming from metropolitan Toronto and as one who was brought up in the metropolitan Toronto area, I often reflect on the days during my boyhood in Toronto when there were about three major manufacturing industries there. As I recall those industries they were Massey-Harris, John Inglish, and possibly the Canada Wire and Cable Company although I cannot remember whether that started off as a wartime industry.

I recall so well that when any one of those two, three of four industries was on strike one always knew that somebody's father was on strike. We always knew the people involved, because in effect in the wartime period there were so few factories and industries in metropolitan Toronto that when any one of them was on strike the entire community was affected. What I believe must be impressed on one is the tremendous change that has occurred over the past 25 or 30 years. Then one could drive from Oshawa around to Niagara Falls and see three or four manufacturing operations, whereas today one can drive past hundreds and hundreds of large and small plants and warehouses as well as the other various aspects of a highly productive region of Canada.

I think it is worth pointing out to members of the House the tremendous change that has taken place in such a relatively short period of time. In my memory, which certainly does not go back too far, I recall when Canada was nothing but an exporter of primary products, as well as of some tractors and a few other relatively minor manufactured goods. The change that has taken place over that 25 or 30 year period is, I believe, a tremendous achievement in the area from which I come.

I think those of us who come from Metro when we talk about the establishment of new industries are somewhat less enthusiastic about it than we are about the establishment of industries in other parts of Canada where jobs are crucial because of the tremendously high unemployment. Those of us from the metropolitan Toronto area are certainly less interested in 1976 than we would have been in 1947. I find it difficult to understand that the government's policies—and of course this goes back to the postwar area—have been so bad when we can have a member from British Columbia complaining about the problems of entrepreneurs in British Columbia, especially when we consider that the concept of entrepreneurs in his area 30 years ago would have been quite unusual.

If we talk about trade I do not see how we can exclude ourselves from the rest of the industrialised world. I think we would be remiss in forgetting that since 1970 the world has been in a state of economic chaos. We should remember that the energy component of every manufactured item and every item that affects our lives has increased eight times since 1970.

A barrel of Arabian light crude, which I think is what is used in the oil business as the base price, in 1970 was priced at something in the area of $1.50 a barrel, while today it is $11.50 a barrel. I should like to point out to members that the cost of producing that barrel of oil is 17 cents, while the cost to have it piped into a tanker in the Arabian Gulf, or wherever most of it comes from, I believe is 27 cents. I do not understand how one can talk about international trade and the terrific disruptions which have occurred in international trade without taking this crucial fact into consideration.

It is clear that this eight-fold increase brought about by mostly non-industrialised countries is the most significant factor since the industrial revolution began in 1770. This is the first time the industrialised countries in fact have not had the power to force their views on a non-industrialised part of the world. This surely has affected Canadian trade patterns in respect of manufactured goods, as it has affected the trade patterns of our trading partners.

I should like to point out to hon. members that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his important trip to Mexico, Cuba, and Venezuela, a lot of attention was given by members opposite to his stop in Cuba. I have not heard a great deal about the visit he made to Venezuela. I think it is important that we have the facts straight. The fact is that 7 per cent of all Venezuelan exports comes to Canada and involves mainly oil. The amount of our exports going to Venezuela is so small that it could hardly be measured on a scale.

The Prime Minister went to Venezuela to assist in that situation, but members opposite are far more interested in making rather ludicrous comments about his stop in Cuba because, to them, that sounds better. They really are not interested in the attempt of the Prime Minister to encourage Canadian industry and Canadian trade with countries like Venezuela with which traditionnally we have not done too much export manufacturing business. I know that hon. members opposite are far more interested in the fact that he stopped in Havana, but they have no interest in the real value of the visit which took place when the Prime Minister continued on to Venezuela.

I should like to point out that we have had this disruption in trade since 1970, and it has been a world-wide phenomenon. I think it is worth pointing out some of the possibilities that some hon. members opposite may be promoting. One of them is that possibly we should cut back on Canadian tourists going abroad; that would have a significant effect on our balance of payments and our trade picture.

For the information of hon. members, Canadians have a wealthy society. I think it could be said that we have the wealthiest society in the world, if tourism is any indication. Canada is the largest tourist market in the world. Canadians spend more money abroad than any other people on earth, which is an indication that Canadians have money to spend and that they have jobs. Many of those jobs are in the manufacturing sector, about which hon. members opposite seem to be so concerned. I do not think it would be a positive step to start restricting the money which Canadians spend abroad. It is good for Canadians to get around, learn things, and benefit from all the other side effects which are associated with the fact that they have become such great world travellers over the past 15 or 20 years.

I should like also to point out that I have never pretended to be an expert on world trade, but I think the credit we extended to the Soviet Union last year was a positive step in selling Canadian goods. The credit to Indonesia which was announced yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) was a positive step toward selling Canadian goods. I do not have the list in front of me of countries to which we have extended credit, but I know that it is a substantial one. It is also worth pointing out the contractual link with the European Economic Community. The fact is that we have taken this kind of step to break away from our close arrangement with the United States and our dependency on one market. To try to extend that market into the European community is a good move. I think it is a positive step which is being taken by the Government of Canada.

As one who drives around to factories and manufacturing areas I cannot help but be impressed, not by the low productivity and the small amount of emphasis which has been put on the export of manufactured goods, but on the contrary, by the fact that on balance our productivity is good. We have made terrific efforts—and they have been successful efforts, as the last 20 years show—to sell our manufactured goods overseas.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the two main points in the motion before us tonight which was moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) are the alarming trade figures and declining productivity. I suspect that the GNP figures to be released on Wednesday will show the worst performance for the Canadian economy in the past 20 years.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) had some interesting things to say about DREE, and I suggest as a start that the government should scrap some of the political gimmickery of regional grants and subsidies and substitute some tax incentives and some new banking controls if it hopes to overcome regional economic disparity. We need tax incentives for investors as an alternative to some of these ad hoc grants, because incentives can vary between industries and regions of this country. An alternative to tax incentives might be for the federal government to vary its reserve deposit requirements of chartered banks according to the type of investments they make. We could use the tax system to help further our agricultural industry by allowing agricultural producers to build up a tax free kitty when years are good and draw it out when years are bad. This would create much needed savings in this country for the investment Canada must have.

Canada's image abroad is that of a country living beyond its means. For example, we are seen paying our workers in some industries more than their American counterparts, even though our productivity is lower. We are borrowing huge amounts to pay our trade bills to foreigners. We have embraced a financial way of life which is endangering Canada's high credit standing in the world's money centres. It is almost impossible now to interest foreign investors in most Canadian stocks.

In dealing with Canada the manager of the international division of Shell International Petroleum Company said the following:

> I have observed some things going on over there that are very reminiscent of what was happening in Britain a few years ago, and it makes me worry.

Some of his concerns are high inflation and the general intrusion of government into business policy making. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says he wants more government, not less, and now we have the complicated prices and incomes controls before us.

From New York we hear that Canada is on the threshold of finding it more difficult to borrow there. The effect of a thumbs down attitude toward Canadian borrowers could be dramatic, because if the foreign money well goes dry Canadian corporations and government will be stampeding for the pool of capital available in Canada, and ordinary Canadians will suffer as a result. There is no question that interest rates on house mortgages and car loans would climb even higher than they are today. Tax bills of all kinds would go up. Needed spending for new hydro projects, roads, hospitals and schools would have to be cut back.

Canada's earnings from exports of goods and services lagged far behind the cost of imports in 1975, to the tune of probably more than $5 billion. Our country's big foreign borrowings enabled it virtually to balance its international books. Nevertheless, Canada's recent borrowing success could be misleading. It was based on good will and a high credit rating built up in earlier years. We have had the benefit of the doubt, but our friends are becoming increasingly concerned. They recall that for a generation in Britain successive governments wrestled with the economic problems created by perpetual foreign trade deficits which inevitably produced heavy reliance on borrowing outside the country.

To encourage the massive inflow of—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—INCREASED LANDING CHARGES FOR LIGHT AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF BASIS FOR INCREASE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last as recorded at page 11271 of Hansard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) replied to a question I put relating to increases in the charges levied against flying clubs for the use of airports. I was not satisfied with the reply for reasons which I shall outline; hence my appearance on the late show this evening. I am glad to see that the parliamentary secretary to the minister is here to provide some answers to the questions I shall be raising.

My calculations are based on figures supplied to me by the Victoria Flying Club in my riding. They show increases in hourly rates of 533 per cent, that is, from 30 cents per hour to $1.90 per hour for flying training. By any ordinary calculation that is certainly over 500 per cent, yet the minister claimed:

> . . . the fee increase over all, if one does not isolate one particular aspect, represents an increase in the order of 5 per cent.

I find that not only difficult to accept, Mr. Speaker, I cannnot accept it. How does the minister calculate an increase of 5 per cent when he has in front of him all the figures from 30 cents per hour to $1.90 per hour for flying? What does the minister mean by "the fee increase over all?" The fee charged on commercial usage? Fees charged for car rental stands? Parking fees charged at airports, and the new fees for flying training clubs? Are they all jumbled together? Does this all amount to 5 per cent? I doubt if you added them all together and put them on the basis of past charges that you would get 5 per cent. You would get something nearer 95 per cent. I should like to know where the 5 per cent comes from, and that is my first question.

Let me produce some figures—admittedly from one particular aspect of the trade, the flying training aspect which is an important area in Canada. It is the area our flying clubs use to produce much needed pilots for our commercial flying industry. It is an important industry and it is being charged out of existence.

In the Victoria flying training club alone the new charges, using the 1975 figures for flying hours, will add $17,600 to the fees charged last year. This represents one replacement aircraft, a Cessna 150, a light training aircraft. From where does this come? It comes from the increase from 30 cents per hour to $1.90 per hour, on the basis of something in the order of 13,000 hours being flown for training in that particular aircraft. On the basis of a $1,000 fee for the first licence, obtained for 70-odd flying hours, this might be between 7 per cent and 8 per cent if you work it out. Is this what the minister had in mind when he talked about 5 per cent?

The Victoria Flying Club is only one of the 39 clubs that are members of the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association. That association alone records some 200,000 flying training hours flown by pilots each year. I ask the minister: if this is where they are going to get their revenue who is to pay these extra charges? This is not the first time that the Department of Transport has increased charges for pilot training. In the late 1960's the pilot training subsidy of $100 per pilot was dropped. It represented something in the order of a 15 per cent to 20 per cent increase in fees. Now the pilot is being asked to assume another load. Over the last 18 or 20 years pilots have been asked to assume an increasing burden, and the clubs even more.

I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary can assure this House that the director of flying safety was consulted in the development of the new fee schedule. I have a feeling he was not, Mr. Speaker, and indeed I have some reason to believe he was not.

How were these levels determined if, as is assumed, they were expected to be calculated on a user-pay basis? Is the pilot in training wearing out the runway 533 per cent more now than last year? How were these charges arrived at when it is known that two more phases of charges are arriving? Why does the Department of Transport not bring out the whole package and discuss it with the flying training clubs that are performing a great service to this country? They are providing the pilots we need for our commercial systems.

Why does the government not publish charges to be levied under phases I, II and III, so that clubs will know what they face? Of course they will operate with outdated equipment for which they will pay. What about maintaining the currency of licences? This will be an added charge for the man who has a licence and must keep it up to date. What charges will the new phases I, II and III involve? Will these charges apply to visual flight rules? Will they apply to visual flight rule approaches, or only to guided approaches? Why does the ministry not spell out the whole package? An additional $2.60 is to be charged for what are called casual landings, that is, when you land at another airport than the one at which you are training. That is an additional fee pilots are asked to assume.

We were unable earlier to get sales tax removed from aircraft, despite arguments showing that they are a cheaper mode of transport than automobiles. Now there is a new levy. When is the pilot training industry to stop being the target of the government's revenue hunters?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raised a number of issues in his remarks. It is difficult, of course, to reply to all his questions in the brief period available, and to provide the mathematical substantiation for the calculations but I hope I shall be able to shed some light on the situation this evening.

Presently, aircraft owned by a flying club or commercial flying school and engaged in flying training are subject to a landing fee of 30 cents for each hour flown by the aircraft. If one assumes, as is the case, that an aircraft normally performs ten touch and go landings per hour of training, the fee of 30 cents per hour is equivalent to three cents per landing. At present owners of private aircraft of 5,000 pounds or less do not pay landing fees at ministry of transport airports except Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

It should also be mentioned that the practice of not identifying aircraft doing local landings except at the three airports I previously mentioned prevents the billing of such landings.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has indicated that he will soon announce increases in user charges to obtain a larger percentage of revenue from users rather than from taxpayers. The minister has already said in the House that the increases would be in the order of 30 per cent.

The increased fees for individual landings will apply to the last landing of an aircraft engaged in flying training, at a rate of $1.30 per last landing, assuming the purchase of a package.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wonder what the Anti-Inflation Board thinks of that.

Mr. Goodale: To make this possible, the first take-off and last landing of all local flights will be recorded with the identification of the aircraft.

The fee of 30 cents per hour of flying training will be replaced as a "landing fee" by a new "service fee" of 60 cents per hour during flying training. At present each flying training landing produces revenue of three cents. For flying training of air crew personnel of a Canadian air carrier the landing fee applicable is 20 per cent of the corresponding normal landing fee. If, for comparison purposes, we compute the discount actually given to flying clubs, they only pay 3 per cent of the actual minimum landing fee of $1. The objective is that the charge applicable to flying training landings should be, on the average, 20 per cent of the normal landing fee. For owners of private aircraft over 5,000 pounds the impact of the proposed fee structure will be close to a straight 30 per cent increase in landing fees.

The case of aircraft owned by flying clubs or commercial flying schools is peculiar. The actual increase in fee would represent an increase of over 500 per cent when compared directly to the 1947 figure. Nevertheless, if we assume that the increase will be passed in the normal course to the customer, the corresponding impact on an hour of flying training would be about 6 per cent. From this point of view it is a reasonable increase.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY—SPACE IN HULL

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question of December 3, 1975, was directed to the government House leader on behalf of veterans for a very specific reason. It has been my privilege to have known the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for a few years, and I know the warmth and depth of sympathy which he extends to those who served their country in the armed forces. He is, indeed, a very sincere person and would extend a helping hand to those who have been deprived of some of their capabilities as a result of enlistment in our armed forces.

The general attitude of the government in respect of these people would indicate to me that government policy has restricted the flow of funds for the proper consideration of the need of veterans. Since the date of my question the estimates have been released for fiscal 1975-76.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has advised the members of this House that the needs of the veterans for pension and for War Veterans Allowance as a result of World War II has not as yet reached its peak, that the demand is increasing as veterans grow older. In spite of this the budget of the Veterans Affairs Department has not been one of those with the largest rate of expansion for financial requirements, but the financial end of the requirement is only one aspect of the problem.

Not too long ago a veteran was advised that he was three hundred and eighty-ninth on the list of applicants for reconsideration of pension entitlement. This man has been in a state of declining health for the last five years, and has had several trips to hospital. If the old system were still in place so that a veteran could get treated by a competent, permanent staff of the department in consultation with specialists, the entitlement of the veteran would be almost automatically reconsidered after discharge from hospital.

Since the War Veterans' Hospital in Saint John has virtually disappeared, and since the veterans are now being treated at their local hospitals by local doctors and local consultants, the review of the case no longer seems to be automatic. The few doctors remaining on staff of the department apparently do not have the authority to rule on the basis of the local family doctor's report, and it seems to cause an unnecessary number of appearances before the Pensions Entitlement Board and the Appeal Board.

I am quite prepared to acknowledge that the responsibilities of government are not always easy to fulfil, but it is imperative that a proper perspective of the requirements of the various groups of citizens of this country be retained, and it is the duty of members of this House to draw to the attention of government the weaknesses as they appear in the system. Certainly the treatment of veterans has developed as one of those weaknesses.

The loss of perspective, of course, is not entirely restricted to the Department of Veterans Affairs. I would like to cite an example to support my case on behalf of the veterans. Let us take, for example, the action of government and its various departments as it would relate to the city of Moncton, New Brunswick. In The Ottawa Journal today on page nine there is an article by Dorothy Dearborn outlining the decrease in employment opportunity in that city. The CNR, a government corporation, has laid off 120 people. CFB Moncton Supply Depot may be eliminated with the loss of another 500 jobs. In addition to this, the construction of a Department of Transport building for which tenders have been called has either been cancelled or delayed, and there has been a reduction in DREE money for highway construction in the area.

This means that in four fields the Government of Canada has reduced employment opportunity from the anticipated level in one city in Canada in moves which were virtually simultaneous, at a time when the same city has just lost one of its major employers. This certainly illustrates a total lack of co-ordination of government programs and planning. I submit to you, Sir, that this is equally true of the attitude taken by the Department of Veterans Affairs toward the need for prompt consideration of pension applications and appeal board applications, as well as toward the need for a general re-assessment of the whole structure which administers this whole aspect of our society.

These remarks really do not need a reply unless the government House leader in his position of responsibility is prepared to undertake a re-assessment of this important social needs. On the day I raised this issue the government indicated that it could spend money where it wanted to by virtue of its new contract with Campeau for rental space to accommodate 6,000 civil servants in the city of Hull. If such a project could be undertaken on a lease basis, surely it is only fair to ask the hon. gentleman, as House leader, to give comparable consideration to means of calling attention to the needs of veterans and to extending to them, as the law of the land requires, the benefit of the "reasonable doubt" principle as extended by the courts.

As things are, the principle of "reasonable doubt" does not seem to be taking into account when a veteran applies for a pension. The letter of the regulations pertaining to his eligibility is a guide; "reasonable doubt" is precluded as a guideline and the veteran is denied his moral rights. This is a matter for total government consideration and I ask the House leader to extend his wholeheated assistance to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and those for whom his department is responsible.

The delay is unnecessary. There are capable people who would accept temporary employment to facilitate the work of the boards. There are doctors prepared to put their services at the disposal of the department. To make things even easier, temporary boards could be established to assess some of these cases—they could visit some of these small communities where veterans are being treated in hospitals. Let us remember the consideration they showed our country when we needed them. Now they need us. Let us consider them in the light in which they considered us when they enlisted for us.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first let me express regret on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that he is not able to respond personally to the hon. member tonight. He would normally do so but unfortunately he cannot be present this evening and he has asked me to reply on his behalf. I appreciate the manner in which the hon. member began his remarks by expressing a sincere word of commendation for the minister who, as we know, is held in high regard by all hon. members of the House.

The minister and the department obviously cannot accept the basic implication in the hon. member's question as worded in Hansard that veterans are being treated with some sort of austerity. I shall not take the time of the House tonight by going into chapter and verse with regard to the various benefits which are provided by the department but I know, upon the advice of the minister and from my personal observations, that Canadian veterans enjoy the most comprehensive benefits in the world, and that the monetary levels of those benefits compare favourably with similar benefits anywhere. Of course we are not satisfied with that standard, but the comparison with other countries is important.

In Canada veterans have, as citizens, access to the benefits of all federal, provincial and municipal programs and, in some cases, something substantially more because of their status as veterans. If the hon. member would bring any specific cases he is interested in to the attention of the minister, I know the minister would be delighted to have them investigated and dealt with promptly.

Mr. McCain: How would you like to be 389th on that list?

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF DELEGATION OF PROVINCIAL AUTHORITY TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF MATTERS RELATING TO ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the decision reported in this morning's press by an arbitrator in the negotiations between the Ontario government and Ontario Public Service Employees' Union that the province of Ontario does not have the authority to act by order in council in delegating responsibility to the federal government for the federal anti-inflation program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government be instructed to refer the question of the constitutional validity of the delegation of provincial authority to the federal government of matters arising out of the federal anti-inflation legislation to the Supreme Court for a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED DISTRIBUTION OF MILK IN SCHOOLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Considering that milk consumption in Quebec is lower than in Ontario and that milk must play an essential role in the feeding habits of our young people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this government take the necessary steps to distribute milk in schools and thus promote milk consumption among young people.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON ESTABLISHING SCHOOL MILK PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Canadian taxpayer is subsidizing skim milk purchases by communist countries in eastern Europe, and in view of the fact that many Canadian children have less than adequate diets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Agriculture to consult their provincial counterparts with a view to setting up a school milk program so that any subsidization of milk purchases benefits young Canadians and not countries whose standard of living indicates their ability to pay the full price of the milk powder; and further that this House instruct the two ministers to report back to this House in one month.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF SIGNING AND COMMENCEMENT OF PRODUCTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I should like to put some questions to the Prime Minister. On February 29 the Minister of National Defence stated that Canada would proceed with the signing of a contract to purchase the Lockheed LRPA. However, Brigadier General L. Morrison stated on March 1 that reports of a government go-ahead were premature. Would the Prime Minister clarify this apparent discrepancy and inform the House when, if ever, the contract will be signed and production of the Orion begin?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the statement referred to, and I would answer subject to any—well, I see the minister has arrived. Perhaps the hon. member could ask him to reply to this question. My information is that it is a matter of cash flow with the company and not with the government. The government has proposed an arrangement, and my information is that the company itself has some cash flow problem.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could put that question to the minister. When, if ever, will the contract for the Orion aircraft be signed and production begin, and would the minister clarify the discrepancy between statements reported to have been made by him and by Brigadier General Morrison with respect to the go-ahead on this purchase?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services gave a very complete answer. He indicated that the difficulties were in the financing during the construction or production phase. At the time it agreed to purchase the Lockheed, the government made arrangements for full payment when the aircraft were delivered, but there has been a difficulty about the financing of the interim payments during the production period, and that is still being negotiated with the Lockheed company.

Concerning the second part of the question, I have not stated that the contract was going to be signed; I have stated that in principle the government had made an agreement to purchase the aircraft and the details were to be negotiated.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR INCREASE IN COST—COMPANY'S POSITION ON OFFERING CREDIT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the purchase cost has now risen to, I believe, $1.06 billion, which is an increase of almost $100 million in the space of three months, can the minister explain how such a massive cost increase was possible? If the increase is in fact the result of rising interest costs, is the minister prepared to tell the House from whom the Department of National Defence is borrowing the necessary capital for front-end financing since only $30 million is allotted for the LRPA purchase for the fiscal year 1976-77 in the estimates? Where does this additional money come from?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three questions there. The increase between the $950 million for the program costs and the estimate of $1.061 billion is made up by the costs of financing or paying interest on these interim financing payments. That has always been part of the proposal. In the statement I made in the House last November, I said there would be charges above the $950 million and those would be for financing the payments over the interim period. That explains the difference between the two figures. We have always intended to have a financing cost because it is cheaper to do it that way than to extend the program which we could have done but it would have cost some $300 million extra. That is why we chose the financing route. I do not know whether there was another aspect to the question.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has Lockheed offered a line of credit to the government to enable production to get started—yes or no? Can the minister clarify that? Unlike what the minister said there seems to be nothing to clarify the situation in his answers today or in the answers of the Minister of Supply and Services yesterday.

Mr. Richardson: That is the difficulty, Mr. Speaker. Lockheed has not been able to finance these interim payments. As I have explained to the House on earlier occasions the problems that have beset that company all around the world have added to their difficulty in helping finance those production payments.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So we are not very close to financing at all.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—EFFECT OF FAILURE OF JAPAN TO PURCHASE THE ORION AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Mr. Shirakawa, the chairman of Japan's joint chiefs of staff, stated publicly that it was unlikely that Japan would now proceed with the purchase of the Orion as a result of recent bribery disclosures involving Lockheed. Since a major proviso in our signing of a purchase agreement with Lookheed was the contracting out of work on Japanese Orions to Canadian companies, what, if any, effect will the Japanese decision have on the signing of the Canadian agreement?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, very little and perhaps I should have said no difference to us because most of the aircraft Japan was interested in buying were to be constructed in Japan. They were not needed in order to complete the 150 ship sets, part of which were to be constructed in Canada. Lockheed indicated they could meet that target of 150 ship sets with or without the Japanese contract.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF DEMAND FOR COMPENSATION IF CANADA DOES NOT SIGN

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, since Lockheed has reportedly acted on the instructions of the Minister of Supply and Services, dated December 2, to commence production of the Orion and since production did in fact begin on January 5 in California, does the minister anticipate that Lockheed will demand compensation from the Canadian government, in the event that the contract is not signed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, production has not begun in the sense that there has not been physical production of any parts of the aircraft. There has, however, been some continuing expenditure to keep together the engineering team that has been working on this program. I expect that if the contract is not completed Lockheed will look to the Government of Canada for payment of some part of those costs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—POSITION ON PURCHASING NUCLEAR REPROCESSING PLANT FROM FRANCE AND ACCEPTING CANADIAN SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the House if Pakistan intends to purchase a French nuclear reprocessing plant, and if Pakistan accepts the new Canadian safeguards requirements? Does that country accept that such safeguards will also apply to spent fuel emanating from the CANDU reactor in Pakistan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, negotiations between Canada and Pakistan on safeguards have not yet been completed. They will not be completed, I understand, at this particular stage and will resume at a later date. To answer the first part of the question relating to the reprocessing plant, it is my second-hand information that Pakistan proposes to acquire a reprocessing plant in France.

PAKISTAN—CANADIAN POSITION ON SALE OF URANIUM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand from what the minister said that negotiations have been suspended, presumably because of some deadlock. Does this mean, in part, that the Government of Canada has not negotiated a further sale of uranium to that country? For clarification, may I ask the minister if we have committed ourselves to selling more uranium to Pakistan in coming months?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not concluded the negotiations. We have not reached agreement on various points, but have made progress in the negotiations, which have not been primarily based upon additional sales of any type. We have not renewed any terms, at this stage, with regard to further supplies.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question? Since, as I understand, the five-year agreement entered into between Canada and Pakistan for the sale of uranium to supply the CANDU reactor in Pakistan has expired or is about to expire, are negotiations continuing for the supply of further fuel from Canada for that reactor; or, if not, does the minister understand that Pakistan is attempting to obtain uranium from some other country?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Canada has been the supplier of fuel for the power reactor in Pakistan. As I mentioned to the hon. member last week, it is open to the Government of Canada to cease shipment. I have already described to the hon. member the effect of such a decision on the power situation and supply of electricity in Karachi. Canada has not taken a decision, at this stage, on that particular point.

PROPOSED DEBATE ON DAIRY POLICY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In respect of the milk policy to be announced in April by the government, could the minister tell us whether the government he represents intends on its own initiative to allow a debate in the House so that members, especially those from the east and from Quebec, may express the views of producers who reside in their riding concerning problems this extremely important industry is faced with and those it will have to cope with in the future if the policy announced in November is to be applied?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the dairy farmers of Canada are coming to meet members of the parliament of Canada. Before we have a debate in the House I think members of parliament should talk directly to dairy farmers and discuss their problems with them. Then, if they feel it necessary to come to the House, I do not think there would be much wrong with that.

● (1420)

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

I do not wait for the minister's advice before meeting the people of my constituency, including producers. I did so many times. He could even take lessons on that subject, but I shall rather ask him if the government intends to allow a debate on its dairy policy, which concerns the eastern part of the country, since the same government gives so much consideration to western producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the dairy policy concerns not only the dairy producers, but all the people of Canada. I am sure they are all concerned that we maintain a healthy, viable dairy industry in Canada. The world situation has been compounded because we have too many efficient producers. We do not have that much money for them to waste products and that is what they are doing. They are producing more than we consume or can sell.

Oral Questions

MILK POWDER—SALE TO EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES—POSSIBLE OFFER TO LEAST DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Agriculture. It is with regard to the report today that the Canadian Dairy Commission is offering surplus milk powder to eastern European countries for less than 14 cents a pound. Did the government give the right of first refusal of this surplus milk powder to the least develop countries of the world where starvation and malnutrition are rampant?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we have, through the normal channels of government, explored every avenue to try to give it away, sell it as cheap as we can—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: We know that after skim milk powder reaches the 90 day stage, many countries will not accept it for consumption. Therefore, it has to be distributed as rapidly as possible. A lot of the product that is going to Europe, or wherever it may be going—we have agents all over the world trying to sell it, push it and do everything else with it—will be for recycling, possibly for livestock feed, in the baking industry and so on.

Mr. Roche: This morning's report stated that the surplus milk powder will be disposed of for livestock feed. That was confirmed by the minister a second ago. Is it the policy of the government that surplus food products in Canada will be disposed of as food for animals rather than shipped by the first available transportation for human consumption to countries facing starvation?

Mr. Whelan: In no way, Mr. Speaker. However, as far as we are concerned, we want to make sure that none goes to waste. If it can be used for human consumption, that is the first preference. If necessary, it will be used for animal feed. That is not new in our history. I remember years ago when we bought it on the farms for three cents a pound.

AIR TRANSPORT

BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In light of the announcement made by the minister in a press release on December 13 that studies and consultations would precede the implementation of bilingual IFR and VFR communications at airports in the province of Quebec, will the minister clarify the press statement attributed to Mr. Walter McLeish of his department to the effect that the bilingual air traffic control program is envisaged to handle commercial air traffic? Does this mean both international and domestic commercial flights or just domestic?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that statement, and the longer statement which I made today, I think clarifies the situation quite fully as far as both the great care we are taking to be sure that safety is being taken into account and also our objective to allow for the use of the French language in the province of Quebec by those pilots who are much more at home in that language. Of course, at all times the English language will be available for international flights.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Not having had the advantage of having read the statement made today—it was made outside the House—I should like to ask the minister if he is now considering the introduction of bilingual VFR communications programs at Dorval and Mirabel despite his undertaking in this House, if my memory serves me correctly, that no extension of this program beyond the five airports originally cited in the province of Quebec would be carried out until appropriate simulator studies had been conducted satisfactorily by the ministry, and even then only after full consultation and agreement with the Airline Pilots Association.

Mr. Lang: We have at all times repeated our intention to test fully all procedures, be absolutely satisfied about safety and have full discussions with all interested parties about the procedures which are in effect. I would therefore ask the hon. member to avoid his phobia of looking for problems where none exist—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: —and his double phobia in thinking I should make an address to the International Airline Pilots Association in this House.

AIRPORTS

OTTAWA—POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Would the Minister of Transport clarify his statement to the press to the effect that he will be looking seriously at the prospect of bilingual communications at Ottawa International airport, and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Obviously, hon. members will be delighted to know that I have asked my department to send a copy of my full remarks this morning to all members of the House, so that they will know exactly what I did say. I did indicate that the intention of our examination was to look at bilingual communication in air traffic control throughout the province of Quebec. I did indicate we were not looking beyond that, with the single exception of the national capital where for obvious reasons somewhat similar considerations might apply.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Could the minister be more specific as to the reasons for which he intends to recommend that bilingual communication be entertained in Ottawa and whether or not the air traffic controllers have in fact been consulted with respect to this move, and further, in times of restraint, whether he thinks the cost involved in training and implementation is worth while?

Mr. Lang: Again, the hon. member is awfully nervous about a statement which simply indicated that I would not close the door on the extension of service to a particular location. I would think members opposite would rather fall back on what has been the traditional position of their party, which is to support reasonable steps for the provision of bilingual services in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF DANGEROUS CONDITION IN QUEBEC AS RESULT OF LACK OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): In view of the minister's statement this morning that the implementation of bilingual air traffic control is in the interests of safety, is he suggesting that there are some bad flying conditions in the province of Quebec now because we do not have bilingual air traffic controllers and pilots there are not sufficiently adept in the language?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): By extending the use of French as a permissible control language for flight operations at five airports initially in the province of Quebec, we met the greatest part of the problem which was to deal with those pilots whose comprehension is much better in the French language than it is in English and we are therefore making it possible for them to communicate with air traffic control in that language to enhance safety. The existence of that facility in the French language at those airports has increased quite remarkably the number of pilots, whose normal language is French, flying into those airports, which demonstrates the purpose that is being served by accommodating pilots in this fashion.

We are therefore doing something which makes sense. We are doing it with safety in mind. We do not have the same immediate problem with IFR flights because it is a fact that almost any pilot with an IFR licence will also have an English capability and will therefore be able to fly beyond the immediate region of his province.

INQUIRY WHETHER AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS INCLUDED IN ESTIMATE OF BILINGUAL POSITIONS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, may I put a final supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the air traffic controllers, who are now supposed to be bilingual, were included in the estimate of 52,000 positions that the President of the Treasury Board announced a year ago?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I missed the question because I was caught between two lines.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the air traffic controllers who are now deemed to be bilingual, or need to be bilingual, were part of the 52,000 positions allocated last year as needing to be bilingual positions?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give a precise answer to the hon. member on that subject, but I shall answer him tomorrow, because of course I do not have those figures with me.

SMALL NUMBER OF INFORMATION CANADA EMPLOYEES FINDING EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this opportunity to answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton concerning the employees of Information Canada. Contrary to the information he gave the House yesterday, I can say that until now we have relocated 216 out of 301 persons. So, instead of 20 per cent, it is almost 70 per cent of the employees who have other positions.

TRADE

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As Statistics Canada stated on Friday that Canada's merchandise trade deficit increased sharply in January to $309 million from $91 million in December, with imports rising at two and a half times the rate of the increase in exports, following a year in which the total deficit was $800 million, does the Prime Minister believe that the Canadian business community should derive the same satisfaction from these alarming trade figures as he said on Friday they should derive from the fact that the index of industrial production took a sharp drop in December, following a total year's reduction of 5 per cent in the index?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Oh no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: Try again, George.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As usual the Prime Minister has not taken the trouble to read the Statistics Canada report on a matter so important as a drastic trade deficit which is going to cost the country a great deal indeed and cause great internal trouble in the country. May I ask the Prime Minister, what is the government's plan to try to straighten out this very serious trade deficit and to put the country back on a sound trading basis?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in the debate which took place yesterday the hon. member will recall that government spokesmen indicated the views of the government on this subject. I should add that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is presently travelling to several countries precisely in order to give Canada a favourable trade balance. As for myself, I travelled in late January to two or three countries with whom we have some hope of improving trading relationships. I understand also that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has planned a meeting of businessmen in April to discuss ways of improving trade in particular.

POSSIBLE FINANCING IN EXCHANGE FOR PATRIATION OF CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the day of the meeting between the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of Quebec approaches, there is an ever more persistent rumour that an agreement would be made on the patriation of the Canadian constitution in exchange for a partial payment of the possible Olympic Games deficit. Could the Prime Minister cast some light on this important matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend at all to link both questions. I think this rumour would offend the government of Quebec which surely would not be corruptible enough to sell some rights in exchange for an amount of money.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the loss of some $200 million in the subsidization of the sale of skim milk powder sold to various countries at prices substantially lower than the support price, and in view of the poor standards of health shown in the survey done for his department by Nutrition Canada, would the minister consider discussing with the Minister of Agriculture and with their provincial counterparts the establishment of a school milk program which would provide half a pint of milk a day to every student attending school in Canada, which program would help eliminate the surplus of milk and improve the health of young Canadians?

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF PILOT PROJECT FOR SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the minister is carrying out, in conjunction with one of the eastern provinces, a pilot project for a school milk program, would the minister consider, if he has not had the report on the pilot project, expanding it to all provinces, thus helping alleviate the surplus milk situation as well as help our children?

POSSIBILITY OF REFUSAL OF PILOTS AND CONTROLLERS TO WORK WITH BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. As a result of his declaration for bilingual controls this morning at the international air safety symposium, what policy will the minister and his government pursue in the event that the pilots and air traffic controllers refuse to compromise public air safety in Canadian air traffic control?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot really comment on a hypothetical question like that. We have been indicating our objectives, our goodwill and desire for complete co-operation and assistance from all concerned in developing proper procedures, and I hope that atmosphere will be the one that prevails.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, Judge Marin will present me with the report next Monday and it will be made public soon afterwards. I might say that the report deals with disciplinary matters within the RCMP and how we should handle complaints of the public against the RCMP.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTEST OF MR. BIBERSHTEIN AGAINST REFUSAL OF RUSSIA TO ALLOW HIS WIFE AND DAUGHTER TO JOIN HIM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which I indicated I would ask him. Is the minister aware of the case of Mr. Boris Bibershtein of Toronto who is entering the third week of a hunger strike to protest the refusal of the Russian government to allow his wife and eight year old daughter to join him in Canada, despite the fact that Mr. Bibershtein himself has been in Canada for 16 months? If the minister is aware of this case, if Mr. Bibershtein makes a formal request to the government to assist by interceding with the Russian authorities, is the minister prepared to help in any way he can?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this case. I heard the gentleman on the radio over the weekend, when he stated that at the present time he was not seeking assistance from the government of Canada. Certainly, we would be ready to assist because it is a humanitarian case involving family reunification.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I wonder whether the minister would inform the House, as a result of certain statements he made in the province of Quebec yesterday, whether it is his intention to produce new legislation to the House or amendments to present legislation relating to his department which will materially alter the course that his department is following at the moment?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I did read a few moments ago the report on what I stated yesterday in Drummondville. There may be exaggeration over the terms I used. Nevertheless, there is no need at all to amend the legislation governing departmental activities so that the department itself be able to carry on the necessary studies and analyses, and to encourage and promote the industrial sector. Finally, that is what it has done so far to some extent, and this is exactly what most of my colleagues here in the House did, even those of the opposition, in respect of representations urging the department to be more aggressive and get better results, particularly in the Atlantic provinces. This is what I intend to do in reply to the suggestions of the House.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Recently in British Columbia considerable controversy has developed regarding the Trident system of nuclear submarines having their refit and overhaul base at Bangor, Washington, since some British Columbians suggest this base would endanger residents in the lower mainland. Would the minister comment on the danger to the lower mainland and whether he feels the Trident program is a positive or negative factor in maintaining the balance of power between the United States of America and the U.S.S.R.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker; as I said in Vancouver I think the Trident base is part of the deterrent and part of the means of keeping a peaceful world. I wish the hon. member and others asking similar questions would ask them about some of the Soviet bases that are being built.

Considering the order of the Canadian Transport Commission allowing the Canadian National to lay off 17 station masters in the province of Quebec, and bearing in mind that some of them have more than 30 years of service to their credit and that it would be hard for them to get used to other positions, would the minister say if he would approach this problem from the human point of view and recommend either freezing the positions of these station masters or the possibility of retiring them on pension?

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO SINKING OF "SAN JUAN"—REASON RECOMMENDATION OF JUDICIAL INQUIRY NOT ACTED UPON

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport and perhaps I can avoid a supplementary by putting it in two parts. First, does the minister intend, in compliance with the request of the Newfoundland government and others, to conduct a judicial inquiry into the sinking of the fishing vessel San Juan and the role of the Canadian coastguard in relation thereto. Also could the minister tell the House whether he intends to cause his own investigation into the reasons the recommendation of the last judicial inquiry into a sinking were not acted upon which had to do with the greater dispersal of the search and rescue units on the east coast?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, the decision on the over-all question of where search and rescue facilities are located and how many are provided is one the government has to take with an eye on the various priorities and how we can accommodate them. It is my intention to look further into the allegations and details of the specific incident of last week, and I would want to do that before I reach any further conclusion as to whether a further inquiry is justified.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DELAY IN SIGNING CONTRACT—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS ABOUT CANADAIR

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to questions asked earlier. It is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Can he indicate whether he or any of the officials of his department have had any representations about Canadair with regard to this prolonged delay in the signing of the contract for the Orion and whether or not any such representations had to do with refurbishing of the Argus or the bringing back up again of the so-called Phoenix program?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, some months or years ago Canadair was one of the contenders during the evaluation phase and did put forward a proposal which was not accepted. Until we have completed the negotiation on the Lockheed contract one way or the other we are not entertaining proposals from any other source including Canadair.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I understand from the minister then that there have been no representations from Canadair along these lines. Could the minister indicate when we might expect a conclusion of the present negotiations in respect of the Orion contract.

Mr. Richardson: Well, Mr. Speaker, in completing the answer to the first question, there have been no representations from Canadair to me personally. I cannot say how long it will take to complete the negotiations with Lockheed.

POST OFFICE

SALE OF STAMPS BY OVERSEAS DEALERS—ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. What steps does the Postmaster General contemplate to stop the sale of Canadian postage stamps by overseas dealers, who are paid a commission of 25 per cent in apparent contravention of the Post Office Act which calls for a commission of 2 per cent, to prevent the return to Canada of some of these stamps for use as postage in Canada, in apparent violation of the agreement with overseas dealers and in apparent contravention of the act which reserves to the Post Office the right to sell postage stamps in Canada.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. gentleman says there is no evidence of any of these stamps returning to Canada. The fact that we are using the facilities, particularly of some countries, is purely an economic matter because we find it less expensive than setting up our own. If the hon. gentleman has any information or concrete evidence that stamps are coming back to Canada, I would be glad to receive it.

MILK—POSSIBILITY TAXPAYERS RATHER THAN FARMERS WILL PAY LOSSES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to the question of the dairy farmers and the figures we have seen in the papers this morning about the huge losses under the CDC program, the program of the Canadian Dairy Commission. Is there any intention on the part of the minister to load part of these costs on taxpayers in general instead of the hard-pressed dairy fairmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

CHEESE—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN IMPORTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the proposal which I understand is before cabinet now to increase our imports of cheese this year from the European Common Market Community by 50 million pounds, I should like to ask the minister whether or not he has been able to persuade his cabinet colleagues to cut back on the imports of cheese because of the over-supply of dairy products in this country.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced there would be no increase in the quota for specialty cheeses coming into Canada and that it would remain at 50 million pounds. Negotiations will take place with the countries which are exporting that cheese to Canada and which are subsidizing it to the tune, in some instances, of 75 per cent. Negotiations will take place with them the same as that took place between them and our big neighbour to the south, which had the effect of taking the subsidies off their cheese coming into the U.S.A. Even if we were to eliminate completely the 50 million pounds of imported cheese into Canada it would not nearly solve the problem.

FLUID MILK—POSSIBILITY OF RE-INSTITUTING SUBSIDY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister on another subject. Can he say whether or not he has had any problems persuading his cabinet colleagues to re-institute the five cents per quart consumer subsidy on milk in order to try to bring up the consumption of milk in this country.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, in some of the provinces which have put on an advertising campaign, the consumption is back up where it was before, because it is still the cheapest bottle of anything you want to buy and it has more food value so far as that goes. I have not even proposed that they put back the subsidy because we are subsidizing skim milk powder to the tune of 34 cents a pound. Consumption of it has gone up over 11 per cent in the last year in Canada. There are adequate supplies on the shelves for anyone who wants to buy it at reasonable prices.

PROPOSAL THAT CONCORDE LAND AT NIAGARA FALLS, NEW YORK—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIAN ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the proposal and invitation of the Mayor of the City of Niagara Falls, New York, to have the Concorde aircraft land at their local airport, and in view of the fact that any such landings and take-offs may very well have to overfly Canadian territory, would the minister undertake to consult with the Minister of the Environment to ensure that such flights will not cause any serious environmental impact upon the very scenic area along the Canadian border; and would he also undertake to ensure that applicable Canadian flight regulations are made sufficient to protect local residents from any increased noise and air traffic levels.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course our ordinary rules would apply and at the present time that includes the requirement that flights of this sort would be at sub-sonic rather than super-sonic speeds. We have not had to face the specific question of whether any variations on these rules would be required or reasonable.

FINANCE

EFFECT ON TRADE OF RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES DOLLARS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. With the Canadian dollar now above par in relation to the United States dollar, would the minister indicate if he feels this is aggravating our trade deficit, bearing in mind that exports become much dearer and imports become much cheaper in the country? If he does feel it is aggravating our trade imbalance, does he see the Canadian dollar falling in relation to the United States dollar in the next few months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would say that in the short run there has not been a negative effect on Canadian exports, although I would have to acknowledge that over a period of time our competitive position could be adversely affected. The remedy available to the Bank of Canada in order to reduce the external value of the Canadian dollar would be substantially confined to a very great increase in the money supply, and for reasons previously set out in the House, we propose not to follow that course. We will, however, be watching the external value of the dollar very closely, reflecting as it does the very high degree of foreign investment in Canada.

POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING OF INTEREST RATES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In relation to the foreign borrowing in this country, the massive borrowing of some $4.7 billion last year which was attracted largely by high interest rates, 2 per cent to 3 per cent higher than in most countries, would the minister indicate if he foresees a lowering of Canadian interest rates in the next few months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I think the interest rate in Canada in relation to the interest rate in the United States reflects substantially the difference in the inflation rates between the two countries. The best prospect for bringing down interest rates in Canada is the success of the controls program.

INCOME TAX

TAX AVOIDANCE BY MULTINATIONAL COMPANIES—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF INTER AMERICA CENTRE OF TAX ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. It is related to a question which was asked him on Friday. Multinational firms have set up foreign subsidiaries and then diverted income out of Canada to lessen their tax liabilities, and according to the Auditor General, the practice is costing Canada hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Is the Department of National Revenue taking any steps to limit this type of tax avoidance by arranging a fuller exchange of information between countries and a closer watch on multinationals?

Finally, the Inter America Centre of Tax Administration, a Panama based organization of 26 countries which promotes co-operation between tax jurisdictions, will consider this approach when it meets in Washington March 17 and 18. My question is, will Canada be in attendance at this meeting, or will we be sending any observers?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we will be in attendance, but I am not sure whether as a participant or as an observer. Most assuredly, we are working in close co-operation, particularly with the United States. With respect to some of the countries which form the membership, I must say that their interests may be contrary to ours in so far as being effective and controlling the amount of money which flows out, but we are ever vigilant and ever alert to that problem. We are meeting on almost a weekly basis, and I will be meeting with Mr. Alexander probably in late March or early April.

Mr. Crouse: Would the minister consider the possibility of evaluation of the cost of goods and materials being shipped in and out of Canada and setting a fair market value on them on which tax could be based in order to save some of this tremendous revenue which is required by our country?

Mr. Cullen: If it were as simple as that, we would not have a problem: it is a little more sophisticated than that, and some day perhaps the hon. member and I will have a discussion about it.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL FUNDING FOR REHABILITATION OF SYDNEY STEEL PLANT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who, despite having been born in Ottawa, has his roots in Nouvelle-Écosse, New Scotland. In light of the statement of Premier Gerald Regan at St. Mary's University that rehabilitation of the Sydney steel plant cannot be accomplished without federal funding, which many of us have been saying for some time, may I ask the hon. gentleman if consideration is being given by the government along these lines, and further, has Premier Regan made a representation to the central government for financial assistance?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting Premier Regan at St. Mary's University and discussing with him this matter along with a number of other questions. My recollection—and I would have to refresh it—is that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is participating in an analysis which is currently under way as to the future of the Sydney steel complex, and I do not believe at the moment that that has been completed. There is a full recognition, at this level of government, of the importance of that particular manufacturing facility for the economic future of Cape Breton Island, which, of course, is one of the most significant parts of this entire country.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER STUDY GOLDFARB REPORT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the minister reclassified any of the 12 confidential 1974 studies prepared for his department, and in particular the $22,000 Goldfarb study into the attitudes of people in the Atlantic provinces toward his department? If not, would the minister read and review the status of this report, as we requested him to do in the committee last year?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as agreed when the committee sat last fall, I asked my officials to review what reports were classified as confidential. I hope to be soon in a position to reach a decision on making some of those reports public which it seems no longer have to be kept confidential. I trust I can then meet the request of the hon. member to a large extent.

INQUIRY WHETHER THERE ARE ANY PLANS FOR PORT OF PICTOU, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Further to our previous discussions, I wonder if the hon. gentleman can say whether DREE has any concrete plans or projects either by itself or in concert with other federal agencies in the province of Nova Scotia for development assistance for the port of Pictou in Nova Scotia?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the hon. member who gave me notice of his question. Today I asked for information to see exactly what was the situation. Unfortunately, since studies were carried out on the port of Pictou, it has been impossible to develop precise programs either with the provincial government or with the private enterprises which operate in this area, as regards the port itself.

The hon. member will certainly recall that, some time ago, a company which operates in the port of Pictou got assistance from our department. Unfortunately, I must admit that since then we have not received any requests for assistance in this area, although several companies of the Pictou area have submitted requests. However, I hope that the assistance which might be extended will give the port of Pictou a revival of activities.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR CORRECTION OF DEFICIENCY IN GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the government telephone network. It arises from my conversation with the operator in the Montreal office of the government telecommunications agency this morning. She asked "where is the House of Commons?"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: Could the minister advise her?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): I would be glad to, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DATE OF PROCEEDING WITH BILL CONCERNING MEMBERS' SALARIES

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. When the Prime Minister made his speech to the nation regarding the anti-inflation cuts by this government, one of the highlights of his announcement was the freezing of the salaries of members of parliament. Would the government House leader inform the House when he plans to proceed with Bill C-81, which in all probability is the only area in which the government plans to exercise any restraint?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to learn of this support for the bill in its present form by the hon. member. I did not think there was any great urgency because our salaries have not been escalated by the 7 per cent, as provided for in the bill, so we are not spending any unnecessary money.

FISHERIES

USE OF REPLACEMENT COST AS BASIS FOR SETTLING STORM DAMAGE CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). In negotiations between the province of New Brunswick and the government of Canada it is my understanding that representations have been made to have replacement cost as the guideline for compensation under emergency measures settlements with regard to damaged property. Will the minister support this principle, and will he present it as a proper term of settlement on behalf of the fishermen of that area?

● (1500)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I have asked for some information on this. I am informed that the items are not eligible for inclusion if they are insurable—that is vessels and items of that type. However, for non-insurable items the intent of the assistance is to restore affected persons to predisaster conditions. I believe if the province wants to support this level they would not have any difficulty.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RUG RANKING OF SECRETARIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Has the government yet reached a decision to abolish the practice of rug ranking in the public service? In other words, will secretaries in the public service now be paid according to the work they do rather than in accordance with the status of the persons for whom they work?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we intend to proceed in that direction. The subject is very complex and requires intensive analyses. We hope to reach a conclusion in the near future, while taking into account the budgetary restrictions which we must face.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will a decision be reached soon enough so that in the current negotiations between the Treasury Board and the ST's rug ranking will not apply?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give that assurance to the hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—MAILING OF INSERTS WITH OLD AGE PENSION AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) raised a question of privilege and I indicated at the time that I would give the matter 24 hours' consideration. I indicated that my preliminary assessment was that the problem was one of grievance with the actions of the ministry for including in the mailing out of family allowance and other departmental cheques some message from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—that that was a question of grievance or disagreement with a course of conduct and ought to be a matter of airing the disagreement as a grievance or a matter of debate.

In examining the clear definition of my distinguished predecessor on questions of privilege, that was taken upon a very narrow limit referring, of course, only to those actions which in some way directly interfere with the capacity of a member to carry out his functions as a member of this House. Accordingly, I must confirm the original assessment and indicate that in my opinion there does not seem to be a prima facie question of privilege.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1975-76

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a message which Your Honour read to the House and by which His Excellency the Governor General is transmitting Supplementary Estimates (B) with regard to sums required for the service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1976.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the government indicated that they intended to proceed with the peace and security legislation next Monday. I wonder if the President of the Privy Council could tell us today what he contemplates in terms of government business for the balance of this week prior to the debate on the other legislation.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with debate on second reading of Bill C-68. This will be the tenth day of debate on second reading, and I am hopeful it is now coming to a close. When it is completed, we will call a number of items on the order paper which I hope are not very controversial matters. We will call report stage of Bill C-61, the Senate amendments to Bill S-10, and the bill on motor vehicle tires, Bill S-8. There have been some changes in the arrangements for handling the administrative side under this bill, and I hope it will now receive quick assent. Then we will call Bill C-86, veterans' insurance. At a convenient time I am also ready to meet the convenience of members of the Progressive Conservative party on Bill C-82. If there is any problem about the timing of a vote on the completion of the debate on second reading of Bill C-68, we are quite ready to meet the convenience of opposition members.

Mr. Kempling: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Regarding Bill S-8, if the President of the Privy Council could communicate to us the contemplated changes, it might expedite passage of this bill as we could discuss the changes with our people.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to do so.

[Mr. Speaker.]

1. Did the government award a $50,000 contract to Woods, Gordon and Company for development of a non-police mobile computer terminal and, if so (a) how was this contract advertised prior to being awarded (b) on what date is the Woods, Gordon study to be completed (c) to whom will it be made available (d) on what date was the contract awarded?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The government has awarded a contract for approximately $50,000 to Woods, Gordon and Company. However, it was for a Study of the User Requirements for Mobile Radio Systems for the Non-Police Market, and not for the development of a Non-Police Mobile Computer Terminal. (a) Requests for proposal were sent to six companies considered capable of completing the tasks. (b) The Woods, Gordon Study was to be complete on or before December 31, 1975. (c) Subject to the deletion of confidential information and editing, the study will not be classified. Four proposals were received as follows: Price Waterhouse Associates, $48,000.00; Woods, Gordon and Company, $57,800.00; Kenneth Logan and Associates, $49,770.00; Bell Northern Research, $49,450.00. The prices indicated were estimates only, calculated by multiplying firm rates by estimated time, and the time estimates were not binding on the companies. The Woods, Gordon proposal was chosen following a joint evaluation conducted by the Science Procurement Officer of the Department of Supply and Services and the customer department Scientific Authority (Department of Communications), as the one offering the best overall value for the Crown and the price was negotiated downwards to $49,550.

3. The main users identified as being potentially interested in Mobile Radio Systems are, for example, taxis and courier services, telephone and gas utility repair trucks, transit vehicles, and railways. The uses this market will have for Mobile Radio Systems are the very object of the study.

4 and 5. refer to the police market and are not relevant to this contract. There is no information on this topic.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Friday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Bob. Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had taken the floor at the conclusion of the business of the House last Thursday and I want to review briefly the points I made at that time. I have listened to all the arguments in the entire debate which have been put forward by members of the opposition. I insist again, on behalf of the government, that you can have restraint in the growth of health care services of Canada without impairing the system. Indeed, if there is not restraint in the further growth of the health care system, that lack of restraint will lead to impairment of the system. It is important to ensure, now that the health care program has had since 1967 to develop, that it is not permitted to grow in future at a rate far exceeding the growth of the national product of Canada.

In the early years of the program, from the time it was introduced in 1967, we wanted it to grow rapidly. Its growth was a measure of the fact that millions of Canadians before had not been receiving adequate health care. Those Canadians were participating in the socialized health system being provided for the people of Canada. But tremendous increases in the program cannot be permitted to continue year after year, and it is certainly no act of bad faith on the part of the government of Canada, after the program has been allowed to mature, as it has been, to assert a ceiling on the future rate of increase of that program.

The Conservative party here in the House has been embarrassed by the recognition of these facts by other levels of government. For example, William Davis, Premier of Ontario, has had to recognize the reality that no program, not even one as important as health care, can be allowed to grow at an indefinite rate. He said to the Conservative convention held recently:

The economic condition of this country demands men and women of foresight, courage and sensitivity in the highest of offices. It demands of political parties the highest level of unity, commitment and purpose. The courage to reduce government expenditures has never been more necessary.

Referring to medicare, the Conservative Premier of Ontario went on to say:

In the area of health care, a matter of national concern, we in Ontario have taken the view that no province, no careful and thoughtful society, can afford a system that expands more quickly in terms of cost than that society's ability to pay.

In simple terms, that means that if we allow the health care system, the system providing health services for the needy, for the population as a whole, for the old, the feeble and those who cannot help themselves, to become more expensive than taxpayers can afford, the system will collapse. If it does, only the rich and advantaged will obtain care. We must seek to streamline the system, not because we want to but because concern for the welfare of all served by the system says that we must.

Without doubt, we must restrain the rate of growth of the health care system. Interest groups affected have agreed that the proposed participation rate of 13 per cent, or 14.5 per cent, depending on the figures you take, for the coming fiscal year is reasonable. They do not oppose second-year figures. As for the third year, the minister said he would discuss this matter when this bill is referred to committee which, hopefully, will be today.

I also want to deal with the accusation made by several hon. members that the government is trying to destroy the federal-provincial partnership in medicare through an alleged unilateral action in imposing ceilings under Bill C-68. When the proposed ceilings on medicare were announced in the June budget, the minister reassured provincial colleagues that the federal government intended to remain full a partner in medicare. We are not asserting that we want the provincial half of this partnership to bear any proportionate increase in costs; we are asking the provinces also to restrain costs so that both sides can remain within the ceiling proposed. A true federal-provincial partnership in the health care field in Canada is essential, and that includes sharing in the consultation and planning process as well as in the costs of implementing programs.

As far as the federal-provincial partnership is concerned, it is evident that the federal government has been an equal partner with the provinces where sharing costs is concerned; but the federal government has not had an equal say in decisions affecting the costs of these programs. For example, the federal government has rarely, if ever, been consulted on the number and distribution of hospital beds which a province intended to build into its health care systems; nor were we, in Ottawa, usually informed if a new hospital was to be built, although we were expected to cost-share the ongoing operational costs the moment the doors were opened.

Similarly, Ottawa has not been consulted about wage and salary settlements or fee increases granted in recent years by provincial hospital and medical care programs, although it would certainly have been a courtesy to consult an equal partner about such important actions which would be bound to make ripples extending far beyond the single province engaged in negotiations at a particular time.

The communiqué issued at the last conference of provincial ministers' meeting in August stated:

A fair sharing of costs is fundamental to the maintenance and improvement of health services in Canada.

With that statement no one can disagree. But I do not subscribe to the view that whatever decisions they make should automatically entail federal sharing. That would simply be the equivalent of saying that provincial legislatures, rather than the national parliament, should control the level of taxes to be paid by Canadians no matter where they live. I do not believe—nor, I am sure, do you—that decisions made by one provincial legislature should automatically decide the level of taxes which must be paid by residents of another province, whether or not they subscribe to or participate in the action. Only the federal government has responsibility on behalf of all Canadians. This is the only level of government which has responsibility for all.

The introduction of ceilings under the Medical Care Act is a responsible action to help to check inflation which, if allowed to continue unchecked, would jeopardize the country's ability to maintain these essential programs and thus would have done more to damage the federal-provincial partnership than any annoyance the provinces may have felt when the budgetary measures were introduced. I completely agree with hon. members opposite, that this partnership is essential to ensure a national minimum standard of service for all Canadians regardless of the province in which they live.

In the Ontario budget announced before the anti-inflation program it was estimated that medicare costs would rise in the three fiscal year 1976-77, 1977-78 and 1978-79 by 22.6 percent, 20.7 per cent and 18.6 per cent respectively. Surely the Ontario government could not have been complacent at such a prospect. Quite clearly, if similar trends were to occur at the national level they could only be met at the expense of other sectors in the economy and to the serious detriment of other essential priorities. Such a rate of growth in costs would be irresponsible. Think of the effect in less affluent provinces.

When the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) was reading from replies he had received from provincial health ministers, he did not mention complaints that we have received from many of the ministers regarding the major problems which result when one province unilaterally gives large wage and salary increases. The other provinces often have problems meeting their share of increased costs under the present arrangement. The federal government is proposing the ceilings both on behalf of the provinces and the federal treasury so that there can be some prediction of cost behaviour to protect the poorer provinces.

If a precedent is set, the "domino" effect carries it across the country. The very large wage and salary increases recently given to the hospital sector in Ontario and British Columbia—for example, in Ontario the 50 per cent increase in nurses' salaries over 18 months in 1974-75, with another substantial increase to come in 1976—put great pressure on the other provinces for matching increases which they cannot afford. No wonder health costs in Ontario and Canada started to rise very rapidly. The wealthier provinces must accept a heavy responsibility. Positive restrain-ing action had to be taken, and the federal government has moved in a responsible manner in relation to its options.

The federal government wants a firm commitment from the provinces indicating what their intentions are over the next five years or so in relation to the hospital and medical fields. We must know what the financial needs will be if we are to be in a position to put more money into the system for lower—cost, alternative methods of service. The federal government cannot put additional money into the system without knowing the long term plans of the provinces.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, that on the last day there was considerable criticism of the federal government for the hospital closing program embarked upon by the Ontario government. I had begun to make the point that hospital costs are not part of the medicare program or of this bill. The federal government has an agreement which requires five years notice on termination, until which it is bound to underwrite half the cost of the hospital program of the provinces of Canada. Whether a particular province increases its hospital bills beyond the 13.5 per cent or within the 13.5 per cent, none of that is relevant to the federal government's responsibility to it. That comes entirely under a different statute.

I must stress that the closure of these hospitals was not in any way related to Bill C-68 but was due to the general economic situation and the fact that the provinces felt they could not justify the costs of maintaining these underutilized and improperly used facilities when there were ample vacant beds in the same general area. I remind hon. members it has not been the practice of provincial governments to consult Ottawa when creating additional hospital facilities. On behalf of the taxpayers of Canada we have paid our share under the agreement. However, we were not consulted by the provinces as to whether the hospital beds were needed. Many are now being found to be not needed and are being closed down.

I would like to repeat that Bill C-68 contains a feature which would facilitate the introduction by provinces of low-cost alternatives to expensive hospital care. Everyone concedes that there are patients in general hospitals who do not need to be there and who would not be there if they could obtain the care that they need as an insured benefit in another way. This point was made by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). He called on us to recognize that low-cost alternatives ought to be provided if we expect high-cost hospital beds to be closed. If he had looked at the statute, he would have seen that provision is made for continued growth in the area of low-cost alternatives. Certain members who have looked at that aspect of the legislation have commended the government for it.

Section 4, subsection 3 of the original Medical Care Act was deliberately introduced in order to permit the government to introduce additional benefits under the medical care program without submitting the act to parliament for amendments each time. However, the disadvantage in using the act as presently constituted is that the cost of such additional services would go into the main national per capita under the act and provinces would benefit from this whether or not they had introduced the new insured services.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Furthermore, provinces not making these new services available on a universal basis to the population would be able to continue to cost-share them under the Canada Assistance Plan. This would have the effect of providing them with the benefit of double-sharing on the one hand at the expense of the provinces which were introducing these services on the other. Quite obviously, this would be an undesirable feature and in fact would be counterproductive to encouraging a rationalization of the health care system through the introduction and expansion of lower-cost services.

Accordingly, a new mechanism has been devised to ensure that any increases in the federal contributions in respect of new insured services will go only to those provinces providing the new services on a universal basis to their residents. Specifically, the modifications provide for a separate national per capita for each class of new insured service if and when such classes are added. The separate per capitas will simplify cost accounting of the respective services and ensure that each cost package will be used to calculate the federal contribution for only those provinces whose costs contribute to the separate national per capita.

I want to conclude at this point. I do so in the earnest hope that hon. members will see fit to send this bill today to the committee responsible for its consideration, to cross-examine the minister and the officials. May I urge on them that the bill has a time limit which has to come into effect by the end of this month, and that the ten days of debate which have already taken place on second reading are adequate. I would say it is more than adequate, but surely hon. members would agree it is adequate. We have had pressure particularly from speakers put forward by the New Democratic Party, a party with an important voice and great interest in medicare. However, surely at this point the members of that party will concede that they have had their say and that prolonged delay and use of our rules to prevent this measure being proceeded with can only be taken by the people of Canada as an effort by a small party to block a measure which, in the view of the government, is very much in the interests of Canadians.

To my Conservative friends opposite, let me urge them not to take the government's advice on this matter but to be guided by the statement of the Premier of the province of Ontario who put the matter very well at their national convention. Some restraint is in order. It is a reasonable restraint. In fact, it is a measured increase. It is an increase which, after consultation with the industry, is generally considered to be acceptable. Let this bill go forward to committee and let us get on with the other very urgent bills that are before us.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I was impressed with the moving appeal we just heard from the parliamentary secretary. I cannot help noting, however, that as parliamentary secretary he is particularly well informed and used his whole 40 minutes. I intend to use far less than half of that time to put forward the point of view of my party.

Normally speaking, I am very much against prolonged debates. I would like to see the time limit on all debates cut down except in very exceptional circumstances. Except where ministerial statements are being made, I would like to see them cut to 20 minutes. When that happens, I will be glad to abide by the rules. Indeed, I am practising already for the day, which I hope is coming soon, when we will have shorter speeches in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: I spoke on this bill on second reading, but I only spoke for about 15 minutes at that time. Adding my two speeches together, I am well within the rule I put forward. Normally I would not speak a second time, but I do not think this is a normal bill and I do not think these are normal circumstances. Members of my party are deeply concerned about what they regard as an important breach of principle involved in this bill. Therefore we are using the rules of the House as they exist at present to make sure that the Canadian people become aware of what this legislation is doing. It is a bill which affects many people across Canada; it affects them today and it will do so in the future.

● (1530)

For me and for members of my party, this bill signals the abandonment of a vision of which parliament and the people have reason to be proud. I refer to the vision of adequate health services as an unalienable right of all the people of Canada. To make this vision into reality is was necessary for the federal parliament to assume a substantial and stable share of the cost of such a scheme as medicare, especially so that provinces with smaller revenues might be able to embark upon such programs knowing where they stood. The objection we have to this bill is that it renders the federal contribution unstable. It is true that it does not provide for an over-all reduction at the present, but it does provide for the gradual lessening of the percentage of the contribution.

Assuming there is a continuation of inflation in medical costs as in other fields, which seems to be a reasonable premise, we gradually find the percentage contributed by the federal government to medicare becoming smaller and smaller. There is also the threat to other federal contributions to similar services; for example, hospital and diagnostic services. I know the parliamentary secretary explained earlier in the debate that the bill before us does not specifically refer in any way to hospital and diagnostic services, but is all part of a pattern which became evident when the former minister of finance announced the termination of the agreement to provide 50 per cent of these costs. So a burden is placed on the provinces and it is all really part of the same field though these services come under different acts, that is to say, the field of provisions of medical services to the people.

We believe this program should be advancing instead of being cut back, and we regret the failure of the government to press forward with discussions with the provinces over the $2 billion worth of services the provinces have provided by way of pharmacare, homecare and other things. The provinces are providing 100 per cent of the costs of these extra services and they look to the federal government to assist. But as far as I can ascertain, discussions are stalled. This is utterly false economy.

People sometimes ask, "If you say this is false economy, where would you make cuts?" I do not intend to discuss that aspect in detail but I do suggest that there are other places which it would be far better to examine, with economy in mind, than the medical services provided to our people. Take defence expenditures, for example. We are proposing to spend $1 billion on the purchase of patrol aircraft from Lockheed. I am informed that these are unnecessarily sophisticated aircraft bearing in mind the patrolling task for which they are needed. I may be wrong, but when you talk about $1 billion of expenditure, and when you are dealing with a company which has sufficient surplus funds to throw around in bribery—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are considering Bill C-68, which relates to the Medical Care Act, and I would ask that he limit his comments to that bill.

Mr. Brewin: Perhaps you did not follow the direction of my remarks, Madam Speaker. It is the purpose of this bill to cut down medical expenses, and it has frequently been stated in this debate that if expenditures are not cut in this field they will have to be cut somewhere else. I am suggesting to the government that it consider cutting expenditure in other fields so that it might not be necessary to make the economies proposed in the bill before us.

I have always been amazed by the interpretation of "relevance" in relation to debates that go on in this chamber. I frankly admit that I have heard many things said in this House whose relevance to the subject under discussion I could not, by any stretch of the imagination, grasp. In this particular case, I believe the points I am making affect the passage of this legislation because the purpose of the bill before us is to curtail medical services in order to effect economy. It is surely relevant to point out—I shall not do so in detail—that there are other fields in which economies might be made. On the shelf now— again, this is an example from the defence field—are proposals to spend large sums of money on a fleet of interceptors far beyond what is needed for defence purposes, at least that is my opinion, and I suggest that this is where we should be looking for savings.

The next point I wish to make has been made before but I emphasize it because of its importance. The bill before us is a blow at Canadian unity. Canadian unity does not just mean symbols of unity, though no doubt symbols are important. A flag is important, an anthem is important, other things are important as symbols of unity. But working together through a program such as medicare to secure equal services, for all the people of Canada, irrespective of the province in which they live, is more than just a symbol of unity; it is the very building of unity in this country. I find that when it comes to cutbacks, to axes applied for reasons for economy, that they fall not on unnecessary luxuries but on things which are basic necessities for ordinary people. I cannot imagine any more important thing for making life livable for Canadians than the provision of adequate health services.

As I mentioned before, I am not one who favours prolonged debate, but I want to make clear to the House how deeply we feel about this particular measure. I hate to admit to this group of younger people around me that I have been an active member of the NDP, and before that of the CCF, for more than 40 years. During the whole of those 40 years one of our major objectives was to secure adequate health services for all the Canadian people. We do not want to be found giving all that up if we can possibly preserve it. We have fought for it, and fought successfully.

I pay tribute to the former premier of Saskatchewan, my hon. friend for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who personally played a major role in getting this service for us. Holding these views, it is only natural that we should object to any proposal which seems to be undermining the work objectives, a work for which the government party has itself claimed—and not without reason—considerable credit in the past as being the architects of this particular plan.

I think the solution to the problem is to be found in a speech made by my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), on October 1 last in Moose Jaw. In his speech he made reference to the best way to cut down expenditures, which is by providing preventive services. If you can prevent illness, eventually you cut down medical costs. My leader had this to say:

> Just prior to the last federal election, the Department of Health and Welfare published a document entitled—A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians. What this document on health emphasized was that if our health standards were to be improved and in the long run made less expensive, we would have to expend more of our money and other resources on preventative medicine, rather than coming in at the last minute and trying to repair the damage long after it has been done.
> Sounds like a sensible approach, doesn't it? Don't wait until a man is half dead from lung cancer as a result of inhaling asbestos fibres every day at work and then try to lengthen his life with surgery. Diagnose his condition early through the use of community health centres staffed to provide this service; treat him; and remove the source of the polluted air.
> This is not an original idea on the part of the federal government. Saskatchewan has long been saying to the federal Liberals that Canadians need more health facilities, not less, and that it is less expensive to catch disease at an early stage, and treat it in health centres or convalescent homes where the costs per bed are not as high as in acute treatment hospitals.

I want to conclude my remarks by making reference to what Senator David Croll has said. As far as I have known him over the years, he has been a member of the Liberal party. When this bill was announced last July he had this to say, and I adopt his words as a summary of the attitude I take and that I think we should all take:

> It is wrong in concept; it is divisive in practice and in my opinion it is wrong, wrong, wrong, a thousand times wrong. As far as I am concerned these matters are sacrosanct.

Senator Croll and I happen to agree on this particular point. He was brought up with that brand of Liberal who believes that medicare services on a universal scale, supported by the federal government making a stable contribution to the expenses, was the very basis of Canadian unity. He put it much more eloquently than I could. The reason the parliamentary secretary finds us speaking in this debate a little longer than he wants is our very firm conviction which we have that this bill is a retrograde, unfortunate and backward move that will be bad for the people of Canada, bad for their health and bad for the unity of Canada.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, after listening to the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan) I think I should change the remarks I had intended to make in opening my speech in this debate. In view of comments I have heard from other members on that side of the House, I was very surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary say that he agrees in principle with the action taken by the province of Ontario in closing some hospitals in line with their restraint program. I should like to draw the attention of the House to a question that was asked on February 27 by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas). As reported at page 11319 of Hansard, he asked the following:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Whereas the announcement on Thursday of last week of the closing of Clinton community hospital brought to ten the number of closures by the government of Ontario, and apparently finalized closures for this time, and whereas at least four of those ten hospitals are in western Ontario and all are in rural areas where transportation and adverse weather conditions combine to inflict severe hardships on residents of those areas concerned, will the minister consider withholding from the federal government's health plan contributions to the province of Ontario the supposed $50 million that the closings are slated to save and use that money as direct payment to the hospitals closed, so that they may continue to provide valuable and economical health services now being provided?

We now have a complete reversal on the part of the parliamentary secretary. He is pleading with hon. members on this side of the House to quit speaking on a bill that we consider very crucial not just for the people of Ontario but for people all across Canada. The province of Ontario was persuaded—I could use stronger terms—to enter into medicare in 1969 in order that the rest of the less fortunate provinces could receive medicare as well. To hear the parliamentary secretary make the plea he has just made leaves me somewhat confused. However, if I may continue my remarks—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Kaplan: In view of what the hon. member says, Madam Speaker, may I make it clear that each province has its own problems and has to find its own solutions to those problems. My remarks should not be taken to reflect upon particular hospital closings or non-closings. I simply reiterate that the principle of restraint in program increases is one that this government certainly supports.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): That is far from a question of privilege. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott).

Mr. Scott: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I thought I had made myself clear in my earlier remarks. Like most of my colleagues, I have to say that I did not expect to have to stand in this House and defend a program that has become so much a part of the social fabric of our country. Medicare and hospital insurance are too deeply entrenched in our society for us even to discuss whether they should be reduced in scope. What we really should be discussing today is how we, the provinces and the federal government, can improve, rather than curtail, medicare and hospital services.

While the federal government maintain that Bill C-68 holds the line on federal participation in medical and hospital cost-sharing, it actually amounts to a reduction in the federal government's participation. When you consider, Madam Speaker, the effect of inflation, the increased demand for medical services and the increased cost of labour, the provinces will be expected to absorb the lion's share of the cost of what is called a federal-provincial cost-sharing program.

It is an established fact that the cost of the medicare program has increased at as fast a rate as the cost of any other services in Canada, yet for some strange reason medicare has been made the whipping boy in the government's so-called austerity program. In effect, the federal government has reduced the size of the Prime Minister's personal staff by three or four positions and put the brakes on medicare. That seems to be the sum and substance of its efforts to hold the line on federal spending.

The plain fact is, when you consider that the increase in government spending for the coming fiscal year could run between 20 per cent and 25 per cent when the supplementary estimates are added to the revised estimates, any talk of restraint has to be taken with a grain of salt. When I think of the heavy fine levied against the Irving Pulp and Paper Company because it dared to award a wage settlement to its workers that exceeded 8 per cent, I have to ask whose example we should really be following. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is saying, in effect, "Don't do as I do, but do as I say". We are told that the ceiling on federal participation in medicare and hospital insurance is to be imposed for only two years, but based on this government's record of broken pledges with the provinces there is no way we can be sure of what will happen next.

The worst effect of this cutback in federal sharing in medicare will, of course, be directed against medical and hospital services in the various provinces, especially those provinces that do not have the resources that we have in Ontario. However, another thing that concerns me is the possible effect it will have on all other federal-provincial cost-sharing programs. In these matters there must be a large degree of mutual trust, and as things are going at present that trust is being eroded by unilateral federal decisions.

As some of my colleagues have said before me, Mr. Speaker, Ontario was drawn into the medicare and hospital insurance programs. We in this province had our own medicare and hospital programs before the federal government got into the act. What has not been stated before is that we were blackmailed into joining the federal program. Since that time Ontario has had to absorb an increasingly larger percentage of the cost of a program that was supposed to be a 50-50 arrangement.

In 1969, Ontario was invited to join the federal program, but the premier of that time was satisfied that we could go it alone and do a better job of providing these services at a lower cost to the taxpayers of Ontario. Ontario asked to be allowed to go it alone, but the federal government came back with a counter proposal: we would be allowed to operate our own medicare program but the federal government would impose a tax on Ontario residents to help pay the cost of the federal program. In the first year of such an arrangement, Ontario taxpayers would have to pay for their own program and in addition would pay the federal government $225 million. As the cost of the federal program increased, Ontario residents would pay more to support the program. In the meantime, it must be expected that our own provincial program costs would rise, so there was no way that we could win: we could only lose—and that was blackmail, pure and simple.

The formula established for Ontario, after we were forced into the federal program, was a complicated one designed to reduce the amount of federal participation in what was supposed to be a straightforward 50-50 arrangement. The formula was tied to the average growth of the gross national product and, as we all know, the GNP has not been rising at anything like the projected rate of growth. For instance, in the case of hospital insurance—which is considered the high-cost area—the federal participation was 25 per cent of the national average, plus 25 per cent of actual cost. It worked out to an actual federal participation in shared costs which was below the actual costs of operating the program. Instead of receiving 50 per cent from the federal government, we ended up with 40 per cent.

At a conference of provincial health ministers in Victoria in August, 1975, the ministers arrived at a consensus that a fair sharing of the costs of medicare between the provinces and the federal government was essential to the maintenance and improvement of health services in Canada. Yet we find that the federal government has been scaling down its own share of the cost of these services and now it has announced that it wants out of medicare cost-sharing. This is a strange attitude on the part of the federal government in view of the fact that this cost-sharing program was imposed on the provinces in the first place, and in view of the fact that most, if not all, of the provinces entered into the federal program reluctantly. At the time of the Victoria conference the ministers called on the federal government to continue discussions of more acceptable financial arrangements with the provinces and to reverse its decision to introduce Bill C-68.

Instead, Mr. Speaker, we find that the federal government discontinued discussions altogether and introduced Bill C-68 without consultation with the provinces. One of the reasons cited for the government's wish to ease out of shared-cost medicare is that the cost of the program has been rising at an unacceptable rate. Last year the cost of the program increased slightly more than 16 per cent over the cost of the previous year: the federal government's estimates last year were 16 per cent over those of the previous year. This year's estimates are 16 per cent over last year's, and could run to more than 20 per cent.

Last year, the professional journal Medical Post warned that the federal government's decision to cut back on its own contributions to medicare could raise the very basic question as to how much influence economics should have in deciding the availability and quality of medical care for Canadians. That question is being raised right now in the form of Bill C-68. The federal government plans to convene a conference with the provincial ministers of health in the near future to discuss the roles of the federal and provincial governments with respect to how medicare programs should be funded in the future. At least, that is what we have been led to believe. The fact is that the conference should have been held before, and not after, Bill C-68 was introduced, and if a consensus could not be reached in one conference then there should have been several conferences.

Over the past year we have heard that the government's position on shared-cost of medicare is not negotiable. I suggest this is the reason for the lack of consultation on this important issue. What the Medical Post warned against has happened. The federal government has resolved the issue of medicare for Canadians to a question of pure economics.

Mr. Speaker, the provinces and the federal government have had enough experiences with medicare and hospital insurance by now to be able to assess these programs on the basis of real data. We have found out where the areas of high cost are and we have already begun to find ways to deal with these high-cost items. But before we can even start to explore these new avenues the government declares the it wants out of the scheme and that its decision is non-negotiable.

We have arrived at a point where it is more important than ever for the provinces and the federal government to sit down and talk turkey about shared-cost medicare. We have learned in the past few years that the major causes of the high cost of medicare and hospital insurance are hospitals themselves and doctors. The high capital cost of building hospitals, plus the cost of maintaining them, is one major area of high medicare costs. We have also found that there are many thousands of people being treated as in-patients in hospitals who can receive the same treatment in clinics and doctors' offices. Some provinces, including Ontario, have already taken steps to correct this situation and thereby reduce the cost of maintaining hospitals, while at the same time maintaining adequate service and treatment.

The other area of highest cost in medicare is doctors. In fact, the cost of doctors' services has been pinpointed as the major item of cost in medicare, and the solution to this problem is much more complex and complicated than in the case of hospitals. We cannot simply say that we are going to limit the number of doctors coming into the profession or that we are going to eliminate a certain number already practising.

It has been estimated that the cost of introducing a trained and qualified doctor into the medical profession is far greater than to introduce a person into any of the other professions. I am talking, of course, about the expense to the public. For instance, it is estimated that the cost to the public for a new physician entering the profession is approximately $50,000 for his services, plus another $100,000 for in-patient hospital care, laboratory services and other services. There is another $100,000 of public expense connected with the training of the physician, which includes internship and specialization in our hospitals.

When we think about reducing the number of doctors entering the profession, we must weigh this against the danger of reducing availability of health care to our people. The problem of too many or too few doctors varies from province to province, and even from area to area within provinces. So we just cannot adopt a policy aimed at reducing the number of doctors in active practice or the number of doctors participating in medicare and say that this is the solution. It might work for a few months or a year, and then we would probably find ourselves with a shortage of doctors at a time when we need more of them.

It has been suggested that the federal government should place some restrictions on the number of doctors emigrating to Canada. It has been proven that in recent years the influx of doctors to Canada has placed restrictions on the number of qualified young Canadians who want to enter our medical schools. In fact, there is a direct connection between the number of trained doctors entering Canada each year and the number of Canadians who are allowed to enter medical school. I do not know whether the restriction on doctors entering the country would be the answer, or even part of the answer, but I do know that this question cannot be answered in any way except by direct consultation between the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the provincial health ministers and experts from the medical profession. We can arrive at a satisfactory solution to this problem, but it cannot be found if the federal government simply throws up its hands and tells the provinces that they will have to go it alone.

I should like to read into the record part of the statement made by my colleague, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), as follows:

> It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that opposition to Bill C-68 is not restricted to the provincial governments, but that such groups as the Canadian Medical Association and the ten provincial medical associations stand firmly against it. The Canadian Medical Association takes the justifiable position that these arbitrary budget controls will produce definite hazards for Canada's health care delivery system. They state that the budget controls will have the effect of restricting the availability of health care to the point at which it would have to be rationed. Obviously such an action could endanger the quality of medical services available to Canadians.
> In a letter to the minister, a letter which has apparently been ignored, Dr. L. C. Grisdale, President of the Canadian Medical Association, says:
> "The permanent cost increase ceilings proposed will result in the rationing of medical care; the cost increase ceilings will inhibit, if not prohibit, the introduction of new medical procedures and make it impossible for them to be made available to all Canadians who would benefit from them. This will be particularly true for those Canadians who live in less wealthy provinces—frequently those areas where improvements in the health care delivery system are most needed.
> The effect on the 'have-not' provinces is particularly significant. Since the introduction of medicare, these provinces with less developed health care systems have benefited from the federal-provincial cost sharing formula. The imposition of a ceiling on federal contributions will deprive these less wealthy provinces of further opportunity to improve the level of medical services in their communities. It will be impossible to evolve a uniform program of equitable availability and quality."

I think those remarks are very significant. We have arrived at a point in medicare where we are all going to have to get our heads together and work out the problems which have come up, and these will have to be solved in a way which will enable us to provide a level of medicare which is at least as good as that we have now, and in some ways we must make it even better. I am disappointed that the government has elected to make a decision on medicare based on economics and without consulting more with the provinces. We in Ontario had medicare before we were drawn into the federal scheme, and if we have to, we can still operate our own system.

However, there are other provinces which cannot provide the same level of service on their own. It is for that reason more than any other that I urge the government to withdraw Bill C-68 until we have had an opportunity to hold discussions among the federal and provincial governments on the problems facing the system, and until we have had a chance to work out a solution to the problem of the escalation of the cost of medicare.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to have this opportunity to make a contribution to the debate today relating to Bill C-68, and also to add a perspective to this debate which I think is somewhat unique from the discussions which have previously taken place. If it is in order to do so, I should like to build a case and to share some of the cultural and historical differences there are between our native peoples and then to come back to show how this bill relates quite specifically to what is happening to the health of the Inuit or Eskimo people and the Indian people. While I respect some of the comments made by the parliamentary secretary—specifically, that the health standards in this country are high—the native community is one situation in which just the reverse is taking place. In fact, the health standards of our native people are becoming poorer rather than better.

As I go along today, I should like to illustrate why their health situation is becoming poorer and why some of the emphasis of Bill C-68 ought to take into special consideration the plight of our native people and the northern communities. I do not take an out-of-hand objection to the desire of the federal government to cut back on its contributions to health care, but certainly one or two questions which ought to be asked with regard to our health standards are: is the present standard satisfactory, and are the provinces in a position to pay? As has been mentioned, for the last two decades conditions in the north have become considerably worse. The native Indian death rate is three times that of the rest of society. In addition, the health of native people is the responsibility of the federal government.

So far, the debate has really dealt with relationships with the provinces, and closely tied to that is the fact that in that unique area where the federal government is solely responsible for health there is the least success. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will agree that the higher the income of our native and Eskimo people, the lower their health standards. I think that it will soon become clear with the realization that the better off natives are beginning to adopt some of our Caucasian lifestyles. There is a considerable difference between the foods of their cultural past and the new foods which are being supplied to them. Far too often, when Canadians in southern Canada reflect on the north, they think of issues such as land claims, offshore drilling and the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. What we fail to think about is the people themselves. Their lifestyle has been established across generations; they have an established diet and standard of health. The very rapid change that is taking place today has but a tremendous effect on their diet and subsequently their standard of health. In building the case for special consideration in this debate, I should like to point out some of the reasons why their standard of health is much poorer today in the north than it was two decades ago.

In the past, the native peoples in the north acquired heat and energy for their bodies from the walrus, the beaver and seal oil blubber which all supplied energy and protein. Today these are mostly obtained through sugar and lard. The growth and repair of body tissue in the past depended on fish, caribou, seal, walrus, moose and bear. Today the source is weiners and commercial brand-name meats such as Spork and Klik. The regulatory functions of the body depended on vitamin C, which came from the caribou. Muktuk was part of the diet. Fish was very high in vitamin C, particularly when it was eaten frozen. Plant and vegetable materials were obtained from the stomachs of caribou and rabbits. When they accepted the white man's diet, the Indian and Eskimo peoples of the north did not adopt his use of vegetables so high incidence of scurvy is beginning to show up.

The method of cooking has contributed to the deterioration of their health. For example, the vitamin C in fish was not destroyed by freezing, but when fish are boiled or made into soup the vitamin C is reduced, and it is almost totally destroyed through frying or baking. When the fish was frozen at 20 degrees Fahrenheit for 48 hours, the tapeworm larvae were killed. One thing we notice today is that the native people have trouble with bleeding gums, an early sign of scurvy. According to Dr. Schaffer, who has been working in the north, between 40 per cent and 70 per cent of Indian adults at the present time are a high risk for scurvy, and between 50 per cent and 80 per cent of Eskimos are a high risk for scurvy as well.

The purpose of the bill before us is to cut down federal health contributions. The native community is an area in which the federal government has sole responsibility, but it has a shameful record regarding the people of the north. In the past, those people ate berries, seaweed, small plants and the vegetable contents from the stomachs of caribou and rabbit which gave them an aedquate vitamin and mineral intake. They had good, solid teeth, as the early explorers observed. From the sources I have mentioned, they got vitamins A, C and D. But today people in the communities, particularly those close to active white settlements, display a vitamin deficiency because of the change in their diet. The government ought not to be talking about cutting back but, rather, increasing its concern. It is of paramount importance that something be done to increase the amount of vitamin C in the diet of our native people. Perhaps we will have to arrange that oranges or other citrus fruits be made readily available for the northern children.

Another change in the traditional customs of the northern people deals with breast-feeding. Two decades ago Eskimo infants were breast-fed and received supplements of fish and meat for as long as three years. This certainly slowed down the rate of increase of the family group. Today, with the introduction of cow's milk into the diet—which is not so easily digestible—they lack the antibodies which come from the mother's milk and there is a consequent increase in the number of childhood diseases. This is another area on which the government should focus. I mentioned the increase in the birth rate. In 1950 the rate was 40 per 1,000. Today this has increased to 64 per 1,000. A study of children raised on cow's milk, compared to those raised in the traditional manner on mother's milk, shows a six to ten times increase in middle-ear infection and a 10 to 15 times increase in the incidence of anaemia.

Madam Speaker, the standard of health of those people, who are the direct responsibility of the federal government, lags far behind those for whom the province has direct responsibility. One of the things that must enter into any discussion of Bill C-68 is the deplorable health standards among our native people. To be constructive, may I suggest that the federal government intensify its efforts to disseminate information on nutrition in the north. There should be more nutritionists who could promote safe diet patterns when people change from their traditional foods. As an example, look at what has happened with the introduction of sugar to the diet of the northern people. Traditionally, they did not use sugar at all, but that has changed markedly.

At present, an average native person would use something like 1¾ cups of sugar per day through sugar in coffee, candy, cheesies, cookies and cakes and all of the sweets associated with the white man's diet. The deplorable fact arising from this is that the once traditionally sound teeth they had are now amongst the worst in North America. Anyone who visits northern communities and sees young children with mouths full of rotten teeth can understand what has happened to their society. They would not have been able to survive in the past had their teeth been in such poor condition. The change has been brought about by the white culture, and the responsibility in a health sense lies with the federal government.

In essence, this bill aims to let the federal government pull back on its health services. I submit that there is every reason to increase health care expenditures, not cut back. For example, in the last 20 years tooth decay in northern communities has increased by 160 per cent. So severe is the incidence of swollen gums and rotting teeth that the 15 dentists serving 1,500,000 miles of the Northwest Territories cannot possibly cope. About all they can do is pull out painful teeth; they have no time for fillings or other treatment. The standard of dental health in our northern communities is deplorable, possibly one of the lowest in North America, and dentists simply do not have time to undertake necessary treatment.

For the native people's poor dental health, is a result of their contact with the white man's culture. We are interested in pipelines, oil, gas and minerals in the north. Unfortunately, our government does not focus its attention on the other aspect of the equation, the health of the native peoples. While we may have every right to be interested in the resources of the north, the native peoples have every right to expect an associated response; in other words, health care for our native peoples of the north. Instead of cutting back money for health services, why does the government not set up a program whereby third of fourth year dental students will do part of their training in northern communities?

[Mr. Malone.]

Even if dental students were to work in far northern communities, the problem would still remain large. It is hard to explain how terrible the situation is. I submit that mine is a reasonable request. Perhaps these young dentists could be called the Company of Responsible Canadians—which would be an act counter to the Liberal tradition.

To summarize, the change of diet, related to the influx of the white man and the white man's culture in the north, has adversely affected many northern communities. For that reason we must give more attention to northern communities. For example, consider the situation with regard to diabetes. The number of cases is up three fold from that of ten years ago. The Eskimo diet changed in the 1950s and 1960s from one containing almost no sugar to one containing between 70 and 130 pounds of sugar per year. Consider cholesterol-related diseases. There has been a fivefold increase in the incidence of calcification of leg arteries and a considerable increase in heart ailments, something virtually unheard of in Eskimo communities when the explorers first came across them some hundreds of years ago. Consider the situation with regard to obesity. This is becoming a problem, particularly among men and women from 18 to 40 years of age living in or near white settlements. It is not a noticeable problem among natives who practice the traditional lifestyles of the Eskimo culture.

Consider the incidence of gall bladder disease. This has become one of the most serious diseases affecting North American Indians and Eskimos. In Inuvik, gall bladder operations outnumbered all other operations in the past five years. Until recently, gall bladder disease was virtually unknown among Eskimo peoples.

Let me summarize the needs of the north. Instead of cutting back funds for medical services, the government ought to increase funds. Certainly, proposing a bill to cut back expenditures in an area where the federal government has sole responsibility is unacceptable. The record of the government has been absolutely deplorable. Here, I wish to make three suggestions which ought to be taken seriously. First, there is a need to increase greatly the number of nutritionists providing nutritional education in northern communities. They could help the native peoples of the area to adapt to the new lifestyle and to the new diet. I say this because their traditional diet gave them a sound body. At present they are inadequately nourished and consequently are among the most deprived people in Canada.

Second, the federal government should spend much more money providing dental care to people in northern communities. Virtually every child is afflicted with cavities, often a whole mouthful, a situation virtually unknown decades ago: cavities were unheard of in Eskimo communities in times gone by. Third, the Department of National Health and Welfare should assume some responsibility in connection with the development of Canada's north. I say this for a good reason. It is irresponsible of the federal government to encourage activities like the building of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline and the drilling for offshore oil in the north without at the same time making provision for the health care needs of native peoples who will be affected by the change of diet resulting from their encounter with the white man. It is irresponsible not to assume the costs of health problems of our native peoples while reaping the rewards from northern resources. We cannot expect to have the advantages of exploration and development without assuming the responsibilities for health. I hope the parliamentary secretary will heed my suggestions and I hope that the federal government will take its responsibilities for the native peoples seriously and implement my suggestions.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I am most impressed by what the hon. member had to say, and I hope that the theme of health care of native peoples will be developed extensively in committee. Would the hon. member permit a question? From his experience, can he judge whether native health conditions are worse on Indian reservations than off the reservations? What is his experience in that regard?

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I am not sure if I can give an adequate, researched response to the hon. member. I assume the hon. member is talking about conditions in the provinces, not necessarily in the north. However, data relating to northern communities shows this: the closer the proximity of native peoples to white culture, the worse is their condition of health. The situation in the provinces is somewhat different. For example, hitherto native peoples seldom ate vegetables. Now, after a somewhat lengthy transition, in many cases they include vegetables in their diet. I am afraid I cannot respond from a researched study, but the data I possess I will gladly share with the hon. member.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Madam Speaker, a few days ago a Liberal backbencher asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) what the minister intended to do about hospital closings in Ontario. That was a worthy question which did the hon. member credit. But the answer did not do the minister credit. The minister replied that he could do nothing since the hon. member knew very well that the matter was within provincial jurisdiction. That illustrates the fraudulent attitude to which we object. Surely the minister knows that cutting back on the federal contribution to medicare will affect the ability of the provinces to provide services. He cannot avoid his responsibilities by saying that something is under provincial jurisdiction. Obviously, the provinces depend heavily on federal funds to carry out their responsibilities. Whether this should be so is beside the point.

Perhaps it would be well to recall the time when this measure was first debated in the House. When the federal government put a very heavy hand on the provinces in order to get them into universal programs, whether hospital insurance or medical care insurance, they in fact made an implied guarantee for the future that those costs would be shared. By taking the position they are taking on this particular bill, they are reneging on their promise to the provinces. They are breaking the word of parliament. I know that legislation is not forever. Taxation is not forever and cost-sharing is not forever. We understand this. However, they asked the provinces with good reason. I certainly supported the program, as did most members, that there should be a universal, compulsory medical system throughout Canada. This is something those of us who took part in the decision can be proud of. However, we cannot be proud of what the government is now doing.

I can appreciate that some of the costs are escalating. Most of the medical program in Canada is very worthy. It is not being abused. In comparison to other countries, our costs really are not high. When you compare the costs in Canada with those in the United States, we are doing extremely well in supplying services to people at a moderate amount of money. There are areas that have to be tightened up. Nobody argues that. However, doing it in this heavy-handed way and with this degree of arbitrariness is wrong, particularly when the federal government and the provinces are going to be meeting shortly and discussing these matters.

In listening to the arguments put forward by the government, one would assume the provinces do not have any interest in the economy. The provinces have a great interest in the economy. Even with cost-sharing, 50 per cent of the cost has to be raised by the provinces. Frankly, with the exception of a few provinces the 50 per cent the province has to raise is far more difficult for them, in terms of their ability to command tax revenues, than it is for the federal government. The provinces want to eliminate some of the abuses in the system and some of the overuse that is taking place. However, they do not want to do that in the way the federal government is proposing, saying, "We are going to put a ceiling on you and you are going to have to live with it." I am sure that given the kind of constraints that are facing the provinces, the expenditures would probably be within those ceilings that the federal government thinks are desirable.

It is not too late for the government to show some common sense in this matter. We already have enough problems in this country. There are situations when the federal government probably has no choice but to confront the provinces. There are probably instances when the provinces have no choice but to confront the federal government. However, surely this is one matter where the provinces and the federal government are not far apart except in a few areas under negotiation.

This is an area where the federal government can back off with grace. Nobody will laugh at the federal government. Nobody will say they did this because they have a minority government, or the opposition or someone else forced them to do it. As the federal government will be meeting with the provincial governments, it would be a gesture of good will and intelligence on their part to defer any action they are proposing in this bill until after the meetings with the provincial governments.

Many of our problems in this country seem to be created by pure pigheadedness rather than any inherent differences between the people involved. One of the reasons the members of my party have kept this debate going for this period of time is to try to persuade the government to see this particular point of view. It would make a great deal of sense for them to accept the arguments being put forward by the opposition—and, I am sure, the arguments of some of their own members—and defer this legislation until they have had the opportunity of meeting with the provinces.

The message from the voters of Canada is certainly clear to all governments in this country. Every expenditure has to be carefully monitored. No matter how worthy a service may be, everyone is becoming quite cost-conscious and efficiency-conscious about those services. It should not be difficult to get an agreement on restraint regarding the expansion of medical services to the extent that some of these things are being abused.

I want to make this quite clear. All of us have experience with various government programs. If there is one government program that is not being greatly abused, it is medical services. On the whole, it is probably one of the finest programs in which the federal and provincial governments have ever engaged. As members of parliament, we encounter abuses of public services. In my experience, people do not rush off for medical services if they do not need them. We have a good program. In my view, it is one of the best in the world. If you look around, you will see that our medical service program stacks up with any country with which Canada traditionally compares itself.

With the possible exception of Great Britain—and there are some flaws and approaches in their system that are not quite as good as ours—our program is as good or better than any. In Japan, the coverage is not universal. Of the 105 million people living in Japan, while they are covered by some kind of health insurance they are covered under systems with important differences. You do not get the universality or the good standard of service that you get throughout this country. Germany was the first country in Europe to bring in a national health scheme. However, in that country there are still eight types of health insurance funds and some 1,800 administrators of those funds. While it may be a very workable system—and I am sure all these systems are workable—it still does not compare with the simplicity of our system. Great Britain does not have a fee-for-service system. While there are some benefits to their system, our fee-for-service system, even with its faults, has proven to give satisfactory service to the people who use it.

Australia is as rich a country as Canada. They can certainly afford a public health insurance program of the same extent as ours. However, you still do not get the universal coverage in the Australian system that is available in this country. In Belgium, not all the population is covered. There is a distinct system for the self-employed and at least 2,000 societies administering medical health services in that country.

As for Sweden, which we often point to as an example for some programs, our own medical system is in many ways superior to the Swedish system, at least from the Canadian point of view. Ours is more appropriate, perhaps, to the Canadian system than to the Swedish system. Switzerland, where there are 23 per cent compulsorily covered, includes in its health insurance about 66 per cent voluntarily, and the scheme is administered by 750 sickness insurance funds. The question of catastrophic coverage is still a debatable and political issue in Switzerland. In Denmark you have counties and communes which are administering the health insurance program. New Zealand has a fine system. I had an opportunity of seeing it years ago, but it still does not provide the same kind of universal coverage as the Canadian system does.

The point of my saying these things is to strengthen the argument I am making. Of all the things we have done in this country, one of the finest has been to bring in the medical insurance program. Why we should take that which is really excellent, which is working remarkably well, despite its problems—there are always going to be problems in any kind of scheme—why we should take this thing which should be our pride and joy and seek to destroy it is beyond me. It will not be destroyed in the sense that it will come unstuck, but certainly the confidence in the system, the great rapport which has existed between the provinces and the federal government, is shaken now. The provinces are angry, and they are angry with justification. They have put forward alternative programs but these have been rejected by the federal government. They argue that they are trying to be reasonable, that they are trying to go along with the general purpose of what the government wants, only to be told in a very heavy-handed manner, "No, we are going to impose these things on you and you can sort of take it or leave it." I think that is wrong and it will not do the medical services in this country any good.

All of us are concerned about nationalism in this country. We are concerned about Canadian identity, and some of us think that Canadian identity is a flag, a national anthem or perhaps, different foods, pea soup or maple syrup, whatever it may be.

Mr. Paproski: Holopchi!

Mr. Saltsman: But that is not what national identity is really all about. Holopchi—a very, very good national identity. The hon. member from the Ukraine has mentioned it. If I digress for a moment, Madam Speaker, the Hansard reporter may wonder how you spell "holopchi." I would sit down if the hon. member would rise and clarify the question of spelling of "holopchi." They are very delicious cabbage rolls—the Anglo-Saxons over there call them cabbage rolls, but we know better. They have imposed an enormous burden on the medical services of this country, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: It would probably make greater sense to restrain the consumption of holopchi than to do what the government is doing at the moment, if they are interested in cutting costs. However, Madam Speaker, if I might proceed in a somewhat more frivolous way than the serious discussion that has just taken place, let me say that nationalism to all of us is important and the Canadian identity is important. While we have been joking about holopchi, it is certainly a very great part of our heritage.

When you consider the phenomenal contribution which has been made to this country by people who have come from other parts of the world, from eastern Europe, from India and from many, many parts of the world, it is evident that they have enriched our country. When we talk about identity we are not talking about setting ourselves apart from the Germans or setting ourselves apart from the French on the continent, or setting ourselves apart from the English in Great Britain. They are far away and their cultural differences are very much their own.

It is the United States that we really are concerned about, that great country to the south of us with a population 10 or 11 times our own and a corresponding proportion of wealth. This makes life very difficult for smaller nations which speak the same language and share many of the same cultural underpinnings but which yet feel themselves different. If you ask yourself what is it that makes us different, or what it is that wants us to be different, you have to look at programs such as medicare. The time you really become conscious of being a Canadian and how valuable it is to be a Canadian—how much nicer it is to be a Canadian sometimes—is when you run into medical costs in the United States and you have to go through the hassle of trying to get payment or trying to get service under their private medical schemes. That is when you say, "I never knew it was that difficult." Of course, those of us who remember what it was like before medicare knew it was quite difficult. It is extremely difficult in the United States in comparison to Canada.

I often listen with pride when an American comes to this country and for some reason or another has to go to the hospital, or has to see a doctor or has occasion to observe someone who is requiring medical treatment in this country, and remarks how wonderfully we have worked out the sharing of the responsibility for health insurance. It is really something that sets us apart from the United States. It is things like that, it is the way we do things, the way we share things, the way we agree on things that establish us as a separate cultural entity.

The United States over all these years, with their greater wealth, have not been able to get agreement about a national medicare program. Out of necessity they have been obliged to bring in programs to look after some of the old, some of the very ill and some of the poor ill, but in many ways you would wonder that a country like the United States would have such an incredible patchwork of medical services and such an unfair and costly distribution of those services. It is for reasons of that kind that I oppose any action which would downgrade medical services in this country and destroy the consensus which has developed about our medical services.

I listened in the earlier part of the debate to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), my former leader, a man respected not only by those of us who sit in this corner of the House but by members on both sides of this chamber. I am sure that every Canadian, no matter what his political inclination might be, is proud of him. One of the reasons he will go down in the history of this country is that the province which he led, a province which is not the richest in the country, brought in a medical care program, the first in North America. We have much for which to thank the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. When he took part in the debate, he spoke to this House with passion and with knowledge, pleading with the government that they should not impede the progress of medicare in this country. If for no other reason than respect for this great achievement of my hon. friend, I believe the government should give additional thought to what it is doing.

I have spoken to health officials in the province of Manitoba. They recognize the need for restraint. They said they are willing to go along with the federal government on that score, though they have proposals which may reduce the federal government's financial contribution to the provincial governments if they are accepted. They have in mind a change in hospitalization from, let us say, a straight doctor-patient relationship to other forms of medical care that may provide far greater benefits for a given amount of money.

The time has now come when, with the medicare program firmly established, we should start looking at other ways of delivering health services for the future. We should begin to anticipate health programs rather than deal with them on an emergency basis. In the early days of medicare we did not have much choice. Before the introduction of medicare a goodly part of the population had not received the medical services and attention which it really needed and was entitled to get. We have had to do a lot of catching up; we have had to build facilities and provide medical services to the public, and we are now approaching the stage where these matters are not as urgent as they once were. Greater thought should be given to the implications of the Hall report concerning the prevention of illness. They envisaged people braving periodic checks that would prevent serious illness developing and having to be treated at a much higher cost and at much greater risk to the patient.

Medicare has done a great deal for the population of this country, but I think it can continue to be improved. I am sure all of us are quite prepared to find a better use for the money that is being apportioned to medical services. I do not think this can be done in the arbitrary manner set out in this bill, that of saying, "This is going to be the ceiling. Operate within it. If you don't, you are in trouble". I am not saying that cutbacks cannot be made in this form, but whether they prove to be the best kind of cutback or whether the highest costs will be eliminated, no one knows. Nevertheless, it is not as good a way as sitting down and discussing with the provinces a more intelligent approach, one that gives the provinces time to work the matter out as well as the opportunity of putting forward some of their own ideas.

I do not anticipate that the federal government will receive much credit for what they are doing. I know it is very easy to attune oneself to the public mood and to say that the public wants us to cut government expenditure. But let me reiterate what many members on the government side said during the last election. Every time a Conservative raised the question of cutting back on government expenditure, you could always find a Liberal who would say, "Okay; tell us which expenditures you want us to cut". He would go on to say, "Do you want us to cut medicare?" The Conservatives would say, "No, we want you to cut Information Canada".

Mr. Paproski: Petro-Can.

Mr. Yewchuk: And the CBC.

Mr. Saltsman: All right. The point being made by all my hon. friends who are helping me out at the moment, the one thing all of us can agree on, is that we did not want to cut medicare. Some of those who now support medicare did not support it initially, or they had reservations about it or some alternative. But the point is that there is really no opposition today to the medicare program in this country. There may be criticism of it, as there always will be on some specifics, but as far as the general value of the program is concerned, and apart from the fact that the federal government should live up to its responsibilities, there is no serious criticism of medicare; and this was true even during the election campaign.

In view of the fact that, of all the programs we have, medicare is one of the most universally accepted programs by all sections of society, this is sufficient and good reason for the government to listen to the views of members of the House, to think again about what it is doing and to wait until the federal-provincial conference takes place before passing this bill. If the government does this, I am sure it will appear to be more sensitive than is the general impression at the moment—and it can use all the good impressions it can garner. As far as this point is concerned, the government is certainly not in the best position at the moment.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave)—National Defence—Possible opening of Suffield range for grazing; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Consumer Affairs—Request for report on investigation of duty-free shops—Reason for warning to consumers about purchases at duty-free shops; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) National Defence—Request for redeployment of air and sea rescue forces in Atlantic region.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to the order made last Friday, February 27, 1976, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CANADA-ALASKA AND MAINE CORRIDORS AUTHORITY ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING RESPONSIBILITY AS BETWEEN CANADIAN AND U.S. GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my understanding that there is agreement on the bill with which we are to proceed at the present time.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I understand it has been agreed to proceed with Bill C-272 at this time.

Mr. Paproski: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): D'accord.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that all other bills preceding this bill on the order paper be stood and that we proceed with consideration of Bill C-272, appearing in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before proceeding with consideration of Bill C-272, I feel I should inform hon. members that the Chair has some hesitation about the procedural acceptability of the bill. Although the mover, the hon. member for Laprairie, might argue that the proposal is more permissive than mandatory or compulsory, I feel that this type of proposal should better be put in the form of a notice of motion than a bill.

● (1700)

It is the opinion of the Chair that if the full purpose of Bill C-272 were achieved, which is to create an authority to advise the government to reach an agreement with the government of the United States, and if such an agreement came about, in the end it would involve an expenditure of millions of dollars. So, indirectly, the bill, although it does not do so directly, could create the need for a substantial expenditure of money and thus be a burden on the Crown.

Because of the agreement hon. members have reached so far as proceeding with this bill is concerned, and also because similar bills have been debated in this House in the past, I am prepared at this time to let the House proceed with the consideration of this bill, but not without registering a caveat about border line bills of this type which to my mind should be in the form of notices of motions rather than bills.

I do not want these proceedings to be taken as a precedent for the future to be used by hon. members for the presentation of similar bills. I think the Chair must become more meticulous in looking at such bills, especially bills which would allow the government, advise, permit or suggest but which at the same time indirectly would have some money implications. This being said, I shall put the motion to the House for debate.

Mr. Corbin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I tend to agree with the reservations you have expressed concerning the content and purpose of this bill. I must say that indirectly it is an attempt to do what it does not have the courage to do directly, which is wheeling and dealing. I do not particularly favour the bill, but I must say, although I agree with your reservations, I am prepared to discuss it. However, I certainly do not intend to let it go through tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that the Chair had decided to let the bill come to a debate, with all the reservations I have given. I do not know that hon. members should be allowed to question the Chair, disagree with the Chair or support the Chair at this time, so I think we should proceed.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie) moved that Bill C-272, to provide for the establishment of a Canada-Alaska and Maine Corridors Authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly to the point of order. If you are shaking your head, I shall not do it; but it seems to me that the bill refers only to the creation of an authority which would not involve the expenditure of money. I would argue this is one method which members of parliament have to bring matters to the attention of the House and the Canadian public which is not limited in the way motions are limited. We are allowed only one motion per session. This is another way of doing it. I really feel there should be no restriction on the format.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to argue with the hon. member. He is entitled, if he can get together with other hon. members, to have the rules of the House revised. In the meantime, I would suggest he proceed with discussion of the bill.

Mr. Watson: Bill C-272, to provide for the establishment of a Canada-Alaska and Maine Corridors Authority, has as its purpose the finding of a solution to a major transportation problem affecting Canada by means of an international pact between Canada and the United States of America. The idea is that the government of the United States would agree to pay the full cost and maintenance of a highway corridor running from the Quebec eastern townships autoroute at the Quebec border across Maine and/or New Hampshire to link up with the New Brunswick highway system somewhere in southwestern New Brunswick.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Watson: That would be left to negotiations between the parties, who would necessarily be the two senior governments as well as the state governments of Maine and perhaps New Hampshire and the provincial governments of New Brunswick and Quebec.

In return for the assumption by the government of the United States of all the costs relating to that highway across the top of Maine, the Canadian government would agree to spend an equal amount of money on upgrading the Alaska Highway which lies within its territory, mostly within the Canadian provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and the Yukon Territory. This suggestion combines the proposal, which has been made by a number of members which involves the creation of an Alaska Highway Authority to provide for the funnelling of substantial funds into that highway, with a formula that would provide for the solution of the eastern problem of transport and vehicular communication within the Canadian maritime provinces.

While at first glance this may seem to be a bit farfetched, I would argue that it is totally reasonable and rational. I cannot understand why the federal government has not given this more serious consideration than it has until now. This is not a proposal, as some members would have the public believe, to have the Alaska Highway paved. The amount of money that would be involved in paving the Alaska Highway is indeed an astronomical amount which far outclasses the amount of expenditure the United States government would be required to spend on the Maine highway.

What is needed on the Alaska Highway now, within Canada, is the rebuilding of approximately 300 to 400 miles of that highway and the paving of portions of it in populated areas. The government of Canada is going to have to do this anyway in the next few years. That necessary expenditure would in itself surpass what the American government would spend on the Maine highway, so all that would happen would be that by making that sort of arrangement with the United States, we would do what we must necessarily do in the way of repair on the Alaska Highway in the next few years and the American government would then have a legitimate excuse to go into Maine, spend money on that highway and build a highway of interstate standards. This would not set a precedent for funding elsewhere in the United States. It would be of benefit in a number of ways, which I will now argue, not only to the tourist-minded public of eastern Canada but it would also be of enormous benefit to a substantial population of the northeastern United States.

Mr. Paproski: It would fulfil the promise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in 1972.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't kill the bill.

Mr. Watson: Probably one of the strongest arguments for this corridor would be that it would promote Canadian unity. Imagine the difference in the tourist business in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland if it were possible to drive from Montreal to Prince Edward Island in less than a day. Imagine the difference if we could drive from Toronto, if we got up early enough in the morning, to Prince Edward Island in one day. This is just not practical now unless we want to drive day and night. If this highway is built across Maine, within reasonable speed limits it would be possible to arrive in Prince Edward Island after approximately a nine to ten-hour drive from Montreal. This is the kind of estimate which is always a guess, but it is reasonable to assume that if people do not have to stop overnight, and if they can be assured of getting down to the beach after one day's drive, not just a doubling, but a tripling or quadrupling of the number of potential tourists would be available to supply business to maritime tourist operators.

Hon. members who oppose this idea represent their areas well when they make their arguments and I respect their judgment when they say that this sort of proposal would be harmful to their areas. My counterargument to those points is simply that 20 years ago people in small towns opposed the building of highways bypassing their towns out of fear that this would cause a loss of general business in the towns. As these people were proven wrong when these highways eventually brought business to those towns and relieved them of traffic congestion, I argue that the suggested bypassing of the area from Riviere du Loup down through New Brunswick by the highway system would be more than replaced in its effect upon the tourist economy of the area by the large increase in the number of tourists that would be brought into the area. And, knowing the uncertainties of maritime weather, once people get down there the good weather is unlikely to last for more than a few days and these people will be breaking off their vacation somewhere along the way and taking their time coming back.

The important tbing is to get people down there. Once they are down there, they will wander all over the maritimes and they will be into northern New Brunswick and Gaspé in much larger numbers than they are now. The entire economy of the maritimes would benefit from a tourist business point of view by the construction of such a highway.

There is now a further argument which has become increasingly important. I would certainly like to be able to produce it here in the House today, but I cannot put my hand on the document. However, a few years ago—I believe it was in 1971—the Department of Transport made a study of the truck transport saving which would result from the construction of such a highway. If my memory serves me well, at that time the potential saving was in the area of $20 million to $30 million per year. With gasoline costs more than double what they were at that time, and with the prospect of their being much higher within the near future, the potential saving in energy to the transport industry in Canada is enormous. That argument is quite apart from the tourist argument, but it would be a sufficient argument for this kind of corridor.

As maritime administrators continually point out, tourism is a major industry down there. Surely a proposal which would double, triple or quadruple the number of tourists going to that region should deserve a much more interested look from the federal authorities and, as a matter of fact, the authorities from those provinces. Everyone seems to be sitting on his hands. I have had a little correspondence recently with the Department of Transport and the kind of reaction I get is one of total ignorance of this earlier report. In fact, according to the most recent information which I received, such a report simply does not exist—although I saw it—and the argument would seem to be that the Department of Transport simply says that such a proposal would not be economic. The kind of reply I got was based on the paving of the Alaska Highway, which has never been part of my proposal. Paving the Alaska Highway over its entire length at this time does not make sense and I doubt if it ever will. As I said earlier, the idea is simply doing what we already must do by way of repair to that highway, perhaps at an accelerated pace, in return for the American government spending "X" number of dollars on the Maine highway.

Presumably there are a few side issues here. Some maritimers conceivably might feel more exposed to upper Canadian commerce, but I argue that competitive maritime business operators would benefit enormously from the decrease in transportation costs to central Canada. There are a certain number of protests in Maine every summer about speeding Canadian tourists, and presumably that source of friction could be eliminated.

Another consideration that I say is a major one for members like the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is the potential of such a system requiring the federal government to sponsor new national parks. If northern New Brunswick were shown to be deprived of tourists by such a project, for example, it would then be incumbent upon the federal government to provide more attractions in the area such as, perhaps, another national park.

The basic fear is that if the traffic is taken off the roads, everybody in the area east of Quebec City down through northern New Brunswick will suffer. I am totally convinced that this would not happen, but that the long-term result would be highly beneficial to all the maritimes. Even those areas immediately affected by the decrease in commercial traffic would benefit at almost the same time because of the large numbers of tourists.

I think all these things could be analysed and we could arrive at definitive answers about how people would be affected. The potential in savings to the touring public and tourist operators, who would have a longer and better season, and to the governments of the provinces, who would reap additional sales taxes, etc., and all the other factors, argue for more serious consideration than the proposal has received.

The state of Maine has had two public votes on bond issues to finance such a highway, which were turned down. Surely if the government of the United States paid the shot, the residents of Maine would have a different view. I talked to members of the United States House of Representatives and a senator from Maine who indicated there would be strong sympathy for such a proposal and that the United States Congress would give it serious consideration.

The province of Quebec undoubtedly has some reticence in the matter. The area east of Rivière-du-Loup may fear the loss of tourism, but I am convinced that this could be overcome. I would argue that the highway would not only engender and push a new national park for northern New Brunswick, but would also open up the national park potential of the whole beautiful area along the Maine-Quebec border which is at the moment one of the most backward economic areas in the province.

The project has enormous potential, Mr. Speaker, but has been given very little consideration by the government. I hope that by raising the matter today we can persuade provincial and federal bodies to bring the idea to fruition. It is practical, it is economic and it is becoming more economic all the time as transportation and energy costs rise.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I hear some hon. members opposite asking for the question. They are the same members who complain about the so-called excessive expenses of the government. They do not really know in what they are engaging in tonight by asking for the vote, because the cost of the proposal contained in Bill C-272 is certainly not one we can afford, if we consider for one moment the scope of regional disparities in this country. And in my opinion, it is not a corridor-highway that will help, even partly, to solve this problem.

The sponsor of Bill C-272, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), wants the creation of a Canada-Alaska and Canada-Maine Corridors Authority through an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America. And the result, again according to the hon. member for Laprairie, the sponsor of the bill, will be to solve two major land transportation problems in Canada. Obviously, the sponsor of the bill wants to solve problems which seem to me to be the fruit of his rich imagination. I shall come back to that later in the debate, but right now I can ask this question: Does he not in fact create more problems than he pretends to solve with this bill? And I shall follow with this second question: Would he not be better to concentrate his resources, his energies and his ideas on the problem of urban congestion which is faced by his own metropolitan area of Montreal, instead of trying to solve the problems of my region? For I am a little wary about those who come to us under cover of consummate nationalism and I dislike those advocates of Canadian unity who are ready to sacrifice one leg, and perhaps even two, but not theirs, those of their neighbour. And as I shall demonstrate during my remarks, this is precisely what the bill before us is aiming at. And here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear to every one that I do not have a grudge against the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). He is an excellent colleague and a good liberal thinker but in this case with which we are rightly concerned I cannot associate myself with the proposal he puts forward tonight.

I come back to the objectives of the bill as set forth by the hon. member. He suggests that the U.S. government support the building and maintenance costs of a highway crossing the northern part of Maine and linking the Quebec Eastern Townships autoroute with the New Brunswick road system. And the funniest part of his proposal is that, on the other hand, the government of Canada would spend an equivalent amount for the improvement and maintenance of the section of the Alaska Highway crossing certain areas on the Canadian territory. The net result would still be unacceptable to me. It would be trading off the interests of one area of this country against those of another. It would be robbing Peter to pay Paul. It would be a trafic of political influence at the expense of less privileged areas.

Indeed, the sponsor of this bill himself admits that the federal US authority should impose this so-called Maine corridor, if it should ever see the light, because on two if not three occasions, Mr. Speaker, the voters of the State of Maine themselves objected to this spending of state funds in a general referendum.

Suffice to say that the matter simply deserves to sink into oblivion and that it is not even necessary to make it a matter of debate in Canada since, however you slice it, the decision to build or not to build the Maine Corridor is basically a matter which rests with either the voters of Maine themselves or the federal government of the United States and no proposal from Canada could make the American elephant move if it chooses to stay put. It is as simple as that. The problem from a Canadian standpoint is a non-problem. But the sponsor of Bill C-72, as indeed certain promoters of the Atlantic region or the Quebec Eastern Townships, invented the problem altogether or at least got mixed up.

What are those people saying? That they are prepared to sacrifice the national interest, that they reject a priori the soundness of a national highway, a first class highway linking together all Canadian provinces. That there would be in this country areas that could be sacrificed, people who could be stepped on, areas consequently that would be less Canadian and that may be forgotten for a highway corridor that would cross a neighbouring state. I am sure they will all protest, saying that such is not their intention. It never entered their mind that they might want to punish the people of north western New Brunswick, those of the Grand-Portage between the New Brunswick border and Rivière-du-Loup, and the hundreds of thousands of Canadians living along the Trans-Canada Highway from Rivière-du-Loup to Montreal. Such is definitely not their intention!

Yet the effect would indeed be to punish that service industry which invested millions if not billions of dollars all along the Trans-Canada Highway to accommodate in such a beautiful way tourists, commercial trucks and everyone who uses that road. That would indeed be the result of building a corridor-highway in the State of Maine. It would mean ruining people who, for hundreds of years, Mr. Speaker, remained faithful to their Canadian tradition, who believed in a united Canada. They look indignant, the promoters of the Maine corridor, Mr. Speaker. They point their finger at the member for Madawaska-Victoria and accuse him of parochialism. Oh, I know that old game.

My forefathers have also known those offended maiden, those disguised wolves that lick you the better to eat you up. The problem of a major highway connecting the Maritimes to the central area of Quebec is not properly set, identified and upheld by the protagonists of a Maine corridor.

If I wanted to pray the Holy Spirit tonight, I would ask Him to enlighten the member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), to shed some light on him, so that he may first and foremost show himself a Canadian and uphold the interests of Canada. The protagonists of the Maine corridor have always maintained, and continue to do so, that the distance between Moncton, which is for all practical purposes the hub of the highway system in the Atlantic area, and Montreal would be substantially reduced by the Maine corridor, instead of taking, as at the present time, the traditional and historic Trans-Canada Highway. It is not true, Mr. Speaker. And it is obvious to anyone who takes the trouble of having a look at a map of Maine. Indeed the area is dotted with lakes and mountains and any proposed speedway will have to go around them. It is completely wrong to assert that the distance could be shorter.

This has been demonstrated by a spokesman for my area at the annual meeting of the chambers of commerce of the Atlantic region, in 1967 or 1968, I do not know the precise date. With maps, with diagrams, with chains, it has been possible to demonstrate that if Moncton is taken as the starting point, the distance is 635 miles through Fredericton, on the Trans-Canada Highway, Edmundston, Rivière-du-Loup, Quebec, Montreal. On the other hand, if the starting point is Moncton, through Fredericton, and the proposed Maine corridor, we see that the distance is 633 miles. This is 2 miles less than the present road followed by truck drivers, tourists and anyone you like.

I think that the then Minister of Transport, the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, tabled in this House the result of a voluminous study on transportation problems in the Atlantic region in 1967. This study commissioned from The Economist Intelligence Unit Limited and volume X referred specifically to a proposed Maine corridor. What was the conclusion of the study? Well, here it is, and I quote:

● (1730)

[English]

There are large areas of the Atlantic region's infrastructure in general, and transportation systems in particular, where returns far in excess of those to be expected from a Maine corridor highway can be achieved.

There, Mr. Speaker, is knowledgeable conclusion, a serious and intelligent conclusion, that defeats all the arguments of the promoters of a corridor, which is the main aspect of the question we are debating today. And that is what the promoters of the corridor refuse to see. How, indeed, can anyone justify a Canadian corridor in the State of Maine when I know full well that every single hon. member from the Atlantic region, barring none, can rise in this House today and enumerate at least a dozen very important priorities in the field of road construction alone in their respective ridings, Mr. Speaker. And some would lull us to sleep with beautiful corridor projects.

Priorities are altogether different in the Maritime area. Every hon. member from New Brunswick remembers a five year road construction and renovation program, with an estimated $400 or $500 million tab, presented last spring to the federal government. It contained only the provincial government's priorities. Such is the problem we should try to solve. Requests must be met within Canada and even within each of the Atlantic provinces. Once we have set up—or patched up, whichever the case is—the infrastructures needed for the day-to-day lives of people in the Atlantic region, then and then only can we consider a corridor highway construction project in Maine.

New Brunswick has so many priorities within its boundaries that it cannot afford the luxury of "flirting" with a corridor project for the time being, nor even for the next 10 or 20 years. It has learned during the last two years that "flirting" with lofty projects such as the Bricklin automobile is costly.

Personally, I would have preferred that the corridor road promoters had shown as much energy, during the last 10 or 15 years urging better development of a Canadian highway, at home in New Brunswick as well as in certain Quebec areas traversed by our national highway.

If such had been the attitude of my fellow citizens, if they had thus shown their sincere wish to solve a real problem, and if they were still so inclined, they would concentrate their efforts and energies to the betterment of the Trans-Canada Highway. Then the problem would be solved, and we would not be hearing of a Maine corridor or a highway exchange with the Americans.

What concerns me is not so much being accused of having a parochial approach since I have first been elected here eight years ago. I do not mind that. My constituents may also be accused of parochialism. As a matter of fact, these people want to live, Mr. Speaker. I am deeply disappointed that we cannot find a solution, a typically and really Canadian solution to a Canadian problem.

Where is the sagacity of the Macdonalds, the Lauriers? What happened to resourcefulness in this country? What has happened to the venture spirit of the Maritimers? This is disappointing to me when I read a proposal like this Bill C-272.

I would not be satisfied, I would never be content to hand this matter over to Americans whom I respect, whom I admire, whom I must necessarily call my neighbours since the division of the territory—I was going to say the territory of the Republic of Madawaska—under the Ashburton-Webster treaty of 1842.

And that is exactly where lie the irony and the sordidness of Bill C-272. Today, 134 years ago, a territory that should have remained wholly Canadian was dissected. It was surrendered to the United States of America under the Ashburton Webster treaty. The same region through which it is proposed today to build a corridor, supposedly to connect two parts of the Canadian nation. We do not need a corridor, but the repatriation of the north of the State of Maine. But unfortunately, the history is written down, and for a long time I am afraid. We can only blame the shortsightedness of the colonial administrators of that time who yielded a territory which should have remained Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, let us be realistic, let us be proud of being Canadians, let us be proud of the Trans-Canada Highway on Canadian land, connected now and then in the Atlantic region by ferries, under the confederation agreement.

We did not lack imagination at the time of the design and of the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway. And if it is true that this system cannot meet present demand, let us roll back our sleeves once again and get to work. Let us go on building this nation, let us try to find solutions in our country before bowing to our southern neighbour.

Mr. Speaker, I reject Bill C-272, I cannot support it on behalf of my constituents and on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of other Canadians for whom the Trans-Canada Highway must be upgraded if they are to survive. Our government is now inviting us to show restraint, and the times are particularly difficult for the eastern provinces which have urgent needs in all economic sectors, especially that of infrastructures and means of communications. It seems to me that it is much more important to help the provinces in these areas than to implement corridor-highway proposals.

As everyone knows, a four-lane highway now connects Ottawa to another highway coming from Toronto and both highways become one just before the Island of Montreal and this four-lane highway goes on as far as Rivière-du-Loup, and even further in the direction of the Gaspé peninsula. But from Rivière-du-Loup to the New Brunswick border, this magnificent national highway is reduced to two lanes and, as we know, over nearly all its length, except for two sections, bypassing two cities, this highway has only two lanes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is now expired.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, this is my first intervention in debate and my first opportunity to address myself to a bill in this House. I at first contemplated waiting to participate in the debate on the bill with regard to capital punishment. I thought I might have had an opportunity to speak for the first time in the House on the occasion of a Speech from the Throne. However, when I had occasion to read Bill C-272 with respect to the proposed Maine corridor authority and saw that it would adversely affect my constituency, I decided I should participate in today's private members' debate.

I am opposed to this bill. During the course of the debate I will explain my reasoning and my views that bring me to the position that I take today with regard to Bill C-272. As I started out to say, I never dreamed that my first intervention in the House would be with regard to spending money for negotiating with people south of the border with a view to constructing a highway to take people out of our country. This is the indication that I get from the bill. I do not understand the logic or reasoning behind such a joint agreement which would do nothing but bring adverse effect to the region I represent, indeed to the entire northern part of New Brunswick.

The establishment of a Canada-Alaska and Maine Corridor Authority could only be supported if it could be proven that the construction and maintenance by the United States government of an inter-state highway through the state of Maine joining the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, and improvements by our governments to parts of the Alaska Highway that lie between Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon Territory, would be of very great benefit to Canadians as well as being a sound proposition in financial terms.

There are many questions that come to mind. Who are the promoters of this corridor proposition? Who will actually benefit? In my area we have been experiencing problems for decades in an endeavour to achieve some measure of success with regard to having the provincial government accept its responsibility under the British North America Act, a responsibility it likes to refer to from time to time in retaining its authority and autonomy. While it pleads that the Province is autonomous, we often find that it is lacking in action in carrying out its responsibilities. I refer specifically to the completion of highway No. 11 between Moncton and Campbellton, New Brunswick, and highway No. 17 between Campbellton and St. Leonard, New Brunswick.

As a result it becomes quite obvious that I could in no way support this bill when in fact in our region of New Brunswick we have been waiting for years to have the proper priorities placed by the provincial government on utilizing those millions of dollars which have been provided to it by the federal government, and to fulfil the many promises that have been made by the provincial government to complete this highway between Campbellton and Moncton.

In the latter part of October or the early part of November there was a regional meeting conducted in the city of Bathurst where some 125 elected representatives were brought to a joint meeting between the federal, provincial, and municipal people to consider the completion of route No. 11. The premier of New Brunswick was in attendance with an entourage of deputy ministers and other ministers and officials of the department of highways, as well as the minister of national resources. After a full day's session of discussion about the completion of this all important route No. 11 we were at no time successful in getting one indication of agreement from the premier of New Brunswick that he would even give it consideration as being a matter of priority to complete this highway. This was his position notwithstanding the fact that our federal government has provided that province with some $55 million over the last number of years, money which, we were told, would go toward the completion of this highway. So while the present Hatfield administration in New Brunswick takes this attitude I cannot sit here and allow consideration of a bill which would shift the priorities to a corridor road in another country.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) we have many other priorities. The present provincial administration is cutting back on schools, cutting back on hospital beds, cutting back on practically every front in the province, including my riding, and I can see where with the position the Hatfield administration has adopted there will be a continual dragging of feet with respect to the completion of the construction of route No. 11 between Campbellton and Moncton.

The explanatory notes attached to this bill state that the voters of the state of Maine have twice voted against the expenditure of money for highway projects which would principally benefit Canadians. When one reviews the material, information and statistics with respect to the financing of this project, and the material contained in this bill, one can quickly conclude that this type of project should not be allowed to go any further than the stage at which it has now arrived. I mentioned the attitude of the New Brunswick government at the moment, not forgetting the importance of the province of Quebec where my riding borders on the province on Quebec through the interprovincial bridge at Cross Point.

The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) has mentioned the importance of tourism. Of course we all know the importance of tourism. That is one of the reasons why I am speaking with regard to the importance of completing this highway between Moncton and Campbellton, New Brunswick. But with the completion of the new highway between Quebec and Gaspé, route No. 20, there is a much more comfortable and convenient way for people from Ontario, Montreal, or from the Quebec region to get to the northern part of New Brunswick driving through route No. 11 to visit the Fundy park area, the Kouchibouguac park area, or indeed, beautiful Prince Edward Island.

I heard a question asked as to whether people would be able to get there conveniently, and I should like to assure the hon. member for Laprairie that with the excellent condition of the newly constructed highway, route No. 20 in Quebec, this should not be a worry for him at the present time because of this high speed modern highway. But we must at all times keep in mind the priorities in hand and should not be getting into discussions and negotiations with governments in another country to construct highways, when we have proposed highways that have yet to be constructed in our own provinces, and indeed throughout Canada.

So, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, from the figures and from the research I can come to no other conclusion than that the United States has more to gain from this joint venture as proposed in Bill C-272 than does Canada. Bear in mind, too, what I have stated about the serious problems which face us now in my area and northern New Brunswick—the high unemployment, the cutting back of hospital beds, the cutting back of educational facilities, and all the other negative actions or programs that are being imposed on our people at the moment notwithstanding the millions of dollars that are being pumped into our province by the federal government.

In this context it just makes no sense to be debating or to be discussing the pros of Bill C-272 when we should be concentrating on working together—I have in mind specifically the members from the Atlantic region—in a concerted effort to see that these moneys are spent in those areas where they have been designated to be spent, and that priorities are indentified and supported by all to ensure that we can develop and grow in our region at the same pace as Canadians hope to do in all other parts of our great country.

I certainly did want to take the opportunity this afternoon, albeit in my first intervention, my first opportunity to deliver remarks and address a bill in this House, to oppose a private member's bill, but I felt the subject was of serious magnitude and important enough to the people that I represent and indeed, as I have mentioned, to all the residents of New Brunswick, to justify my rising in my place today and speaking against Bill C-272, in the hope that we may be able to develop some planning whereby we can reach a joint agreement between the various representatives of the Atlantic region and the members from my province of New Brunswick. Thus, we might all work together to insist that the federal moneys that are going to the province of New Brunswick are spent in the way they are designated to be spent. Once again I emphasize the importance of the completion of the highway between Campbellton and Moncton, that being route 11.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight. At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Harquail.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the amendment of Mr. Gilbert (p. 11210).

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention when calling it five o'clock to conclude my remarks at that point, but I thought the better of it. It occurred to me that there are some hon. members in the Chamber this evening who might not have been here earlier and therefore are unaware of some of the important truths I was putting on the record.

Mr. Sharp: Thank you, Max.

Mr. Saltsman: Particularly the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp), who I know is very much concerned with hearing what I have to say on the question of his government's proposed cutback on medical services, so I have set aside my own selfish interests in favour of the national interest and decided to continue the remarks that I commenced before the dinner hour.

I also thought there would probably be some hon. members who might have some questions to raise with me. I would be very happy to answer any questions that arise. I see the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) rising to ask me a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Certainly.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I must say it is very thoughtful of hon. members to permit me to ask this question. Would the hon. member in all seriousness inform the House whether these cutbacks are part of the general approach of the government to cutbacks during a period of deflation?

Mr. Saltsman: In reply to that question, I would hate to think that the Liberals are that insensitive to the needs of the country, but unfortunately one must come to the conclusion that they are. When looking at the various areas in which they could cut back or raise revenue, it is appalling to think that they would start with something so vital as people's health. For instance, when one considers the very generous attitude of the government toward the corporations of this country—the depreciation allowances that have been granted, the reduction in corporation tax—one would have thought that before making cuts in medical services the government would have introduced in its budget at some time in the past, or would have indicated it intends to do so in its next budget, some way of collecting more revenue in order to ensure that essential services like medicare are continued. This it has not done.

There are, of course, many benefits that the government provides to industries. These kinds of welfare payments are not being reduced in any fashion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one must conclude that Liberals have their priorities somewhat wrong and are to be criticized for lack of sensitivity and understanding of what the true national priority should be. I hope that answer satisfies the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: A very good answer.

Mr. Kaplan: Will you take it up tomorrow morning?

Mr. Saltsman: I would be very pleased to take it up tomorrow morning. If I could get unanimous consent of the House to continue beyond 40 minutes, I should be very glad to take it up this evening; otherwise I will do so tomorrow morning. I would much have preferred to speak 10, 15 or 20 minutes.

● (2010)

I am sure there are others who would have agreed with me that I should have spoken for a shorter period had I felt that, in that period, the sense of what I was saying and the importance of maintaining a commitment to medical care had gotten through to the government or at least to the acting Prime Minister, that very distinguished gentleman. If he would rise in this House, say he has listened to the arguments put forward by the opposition, say he understands what we are saying and that he is prepared to defer the passage of this legislation and indicate to the House that he will wait until he meets with the provinces, then I would be glad to sit down with the feeling that I had accomplished something of value in putting forward these ideas. However, there does not seem to be any intention on the part of the government to engage in this debate or to rebut any of the points put forward by the opposition. I guess the word is out to the backbenchers that they should not offer any encouragement.

I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) was so generous with me. He is a very able fellow. I think he deserves to be in the cabinet, but I wonder what this will do to his chances of being in the cabinet.

An hon. Member: You are a constituent of Pontiac as well.

Mr. Saltsman: If I were a constituent of his I would be writing to him every day.

An hon. Member: Telling him to smarten up.

Mr. Saltsman: I would be more polite. In Waterloo we are more straightforward; we say things straight. I would have told the hon. member for Pontiac that I understand the whip has told him not to do anything to delay the passage of the legislation but that I would think a man of his intelligence would not go along with that and would rise in the House of Commons and would point out that medicare is one of the best programs that has been introduced in this House.

I would tell him that I think he should take some pride in the fact that the Liberal Party introduced it, after some prodding over a period of 35 years by the NDP. I would tell him that nevertheless this is something for which he should take credit. He should say that this is good legislation and that they intend to honour the commitment made to the provinces at the time it was introduced. I might, even under those circumstances, vote for him as my member—it would be very unusual for me to do a thing like that—because under the circumstances this would be justified. I believe there are many members on the other side of the House who do not feel very comfortable with what the government is proposing.

Mr. Nystrom: Like Gus MacFarlane.

Miss Nicholson: Pick on me for a change.

Mr. Saltsman: I would not pick on the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson). She has had a distinguished career in the field of social services. I am sure she has a deep concern for the people who will be affected by the cut-back in medicare because she knows that while we have not really been able to close the gap in income between those at the bottom and those at the top one of the things we have been able to do is give at least equal medical services to every person in this country.

The only real advance we have made in this country in the fight against poverty has been in the provision of services to people. Medicare is an equalizer. In order to obtain medical services in Canada today one does not have to have a great deal of money. Everybody is covered in respect of medical services, and to that extent this is an area in which we have total egalitarianism. I think the hon. member for Trinity would agree with that. I would certainly welcome her participation in this debate so that she could give us the benefit of her advice in order to reinforce the points we are making on this side of the House.

It seems that my comments have satisfied the members of the House. There does not seem to be any desire to ask any further questions. I think I have satisfied my commitment to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in respect to the 40-minute limit, and therefore I shall thank hon. members for the careful attention they have given my remarks.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this bill takes me back a few years to the time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was revising old federal-provincial programs and inventing new ones. At that time the clarion call was for medicare. The provinces were asked to opt in but they were told that they could opt out. They had a choice. The shoe is now placed on the other foot. Now the Prime Minister is saying that the government wants to opt out.

It would have helped a bit if the Prime Minister had called for consultation with the provinces before tabling this bill. But typically the provinces found out about this proposed cut-back by the government only after the bill was finalized and tabled in the House. There have been many federal-provincial conferences. One should have been held regarding this serious matter before the bill was tabled or before it was even written. But that was not the case. This is an example of the way the Liberal government imposes its will or whims on the people. This is the Prime Minister's way of consulting with the provinces. He does so through the medium of the press.

There is now a new axiom abroad in this country about which we will hear more. We will hear more and more of it in the future. "Trudeau times are tough times." These are times of unemployment, inflation poverty and discontent. Now we have the refusal of the government to honour its national health obligations. Liberalism, which was so free with the people's money in 1969 when federal medicare was brought in now withholds money from the people through the curtailing limits of Bill C-68. Government inefficiency and waste of the taxpayer's money in many other federal fields are the direct reason for the cut-backs contained in this bill. They are the direct reason for the embarrasing position in which the government finds itself today.

The government is bankrupt in respect of policy and purpose. It is severely financially embarrassed. Despite its precarious position the government has the nerve this year to ask the Canadian people for more than $42 billion, yet it cannot honour its medicare commitment for public health care across our country. I have said before in this House that Liberalism is the greatest deception that has ever befallen Canada. The government certainly is running true to form at the present time in respect of its policies. The federal government is opting out; more than that, it is copping out. What a sham this makes of our federal-provincial relations in our main shared-cost project, medicare.

Some of my hon. colleagues have already documented the sorry story of how my own province of Ontario was bludgeoned into joining the federal government's medicare plan when it had a better one itself. We had Blue Cross and Physicians' Services. In spite of the fact that we had a better plan already in operation, if we had not joined the federal plan the taxpayers of Ontario would have had to pay a disproportionate share of the federal plan, as well as the full cost of our own plan. That is the main reason why Ontario joined. That is the main reason why other provinces which had made a start on their own medicare joined this plan. I wonder what the Prime Minister would have done if Ontario at that time had said it would not join the federal plan and that it would not pay any part of the cost of the plan.

What is the background of this matter? In 1969 Ontario had its own private program—and it worked well—PSI and Blue Cross. Ontario was forced into joining the federal plan, as Ontario residents were taxed by the federal government to help pay the national cost of health care. In 1969 $225 million was the estimated cost to Ontario taxpayers. Ontario suggested it should be able to keep this money and its own plan. The federal government of the day rejected this; thus the federal plan led directly to the province building facilities in the high cost area, some of which now must be cut back because of the federal government welshing on its contract. Thus also the ceilings just imposed have affected Ontario's decision to cut back. In 1968 the federal government wanted to get all the provinces into the one scheme. Ontario hesitated, as it had a good plan of its own. The premier of the day was concerned that if Ontario entered, its costs would grow at too high a rate, and this has been the case.

Our Ontario premier of that time suspected that the federal government could not be trusted to honour this or any other agreement, and he was right. But our premier took the federal government's proposals, or veiled threats, on faith at the time, and we have kept up our end of the bargain. Now we learn that the government has imposed this ceiling on increases in federal participation in spite of the fact that, like everything else, the cost of medicare has been rising.

We have also learned, and again without prior consultation with the provinces, that the present medicare arrangement will run for only a few more years, and we will be back to square one. We in Ontario will be able to adjust to this new situation, I hope, but here again we cannot really be sure that the Prime Minister will not be back again in a year or two telling Ontario and the others that we have to get back into a federal medicare scheme. In fact, as we all know by now, where this government is concerned we cannot be sure of anything.

It has already been pointed out that the Province of Ontario has been getting the short end of the so-called 50-50 arrangement with the federal government. Now, with the ceilings which have been imposed and with the inflation which is rampant in our country, most of which can be laid at the doorstep of federal spending, we have been getting about 43 per cent of shared costs for medicare and about 40 per cent of the shared cost of the high cost item, hospital insurance.

The government of Ontario must have smelled something in the wind last year when Bill C-68 was first being kicked around. At that time the government was deluged with complaints from the medical profession that Bill C-68 would be a backward step in the concept of medicare, and here it is, like a knife between the provincial shoulder blades, and that applies to every province in Canada. Ontario has suffered doubly in the shared-cost deal with the federal government because of the fact that the government's lowest area of participation has been in such things as home care, nursing home care, preventive medicine and other areas where the province has been trying to cut down on the need for hospital admissions. Knowing that something was going to happen, namely, this federal Bill C-68, the province was forced to assess the real needs for hospital beds and balance these against the available beds.

In the early days of the present medicare scheme the government's largest share of costs was in the field of hospital construction and operation, and every town and hamlet in Ontario seemed anxious to have its own hospital. Many of those were needed, but there was a certain amount of over-building. This situation is being adjusted now, but according to the provincial opposition the province is yanking beds out from under the people who need them most. The plain fact is that there are now and will be adequate hospitals and hospital beds to meet the needs of our people. In the process of bringing hospital beds in line with actual need the province stands to save about $50 million per year, and this has to be done, in view of the decision of the federal government to abandon the commitment it made to all the provinces several years ago.

I join with my colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), in drawing attention to the shameful tactics of the NDP in this matter. That party has tried to subvert this dereliction of responsibility on the part of the federal government into a provincial election issue. I was pleased with the response from the provincial premier when he challenged the NDP to force an election on this question. As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said earlier, the NDP has been dangling imaginary corpses before the people of Ontario and clouding the issue, instead of directing the blame where it rightfully belongs, right here in Ottawa at the doorstep of a government which has its priorities all mixed up.

It is a strange paradox indeed when the federal government complains that the money it is spending on medicare shared-cost programs must be redirected to more important programs and projects. Where in our country do we have anything more important to our people than public health. Last year I believe the federal government's share of medicare costs amounted to less than $1 billion and it is complaining now that since the cost of medicare has risen by 16 per cent it must re-examine its role in this vital program.

I suggest that the federal government re-examine its program of capital construction of buildings which are not needed at this time. They are not needed as much as the Canadian people need a medicare and hospital insurance program. I see in a press release from the Department of Public Works that that department is planning to spend $312 million on new construction for 1976-77, more than half of which is to go to the province of Quebec. The press release neglected to mention the new $88 million language school to be built in St. Jean, Quebec, and when this is added to the other capital construction projects it comes to over $200 million in public works in the coming year for that province alone.

I suggest that surely we could find the money in this year's estimates of over $42 billion to finance an even better medicare and hospital care program. Medicare is part of the fabric of Canadian society, as important to us now as any program we have, and far more important than such programs, for example, as the extravagant, wasteful and divisive official languages program. If the current social policies of the Trudeau government were properly circumspect regarding the needs of the people, and if the government were as responsive to public need as it is to its phony, expensive and divisive policies of bilingualism and biculturalism, we would not be confronted with the present social discontent and troubles which perplex us.

It has been suggested that, rather than scaling down federal government participation in medicare, we should be consulting right now in an effort to find ways to improve the situation. It is well known to both the federal government and the provinces that the high cost of the program can be attributed to two factors, the construction and maintenance of hospitals and the maintenance of an adequate cadre of doctors. We know that some parts of the country have a surplus of doctors, and we know that some provinces have a surplus of hospitals.

Now that we have gained several years' experience in operating a federal-provincial medicare program we have learned enough about how such a system works to be able to sit down and compare notes, and to devise ways of getting the same level of care at lower cost. During the life of our medicare program we have had an advantage that other countries, namely, the socialist countries, have not had in running such programs. We have had the advantage of the free enterprise system working side by side with governments in trying to get a maximum of care and services at the lowest possible cost.

If we had not had this distinctive character in our medicare system I shudder to think of what the cost would be today. In addition we have had the dedication and devotion of our scientific community, working at a disadvantage sometimes in government funding, seeking cures for diseases and seeking ways to shorten the treatment time for other diseases. With each discovery by our medical researchers we find that the requirement for extended hospital care is reduced and we find that the useful life of many of our citizens is extended.

I cannot accept the logic in the government's scaling down of federal participation in medicare, and I cannot accept the reverse logic of reducing federal support for medical research. That is probably the spot where we lose the most in setting these limits on federal spending.

I have to wonder how the federal government establishes its priorities. On the one hand we have the government reducing federal subsidies for medical research, and, on the other undertaking almost half a billion dollars in capital construction that could be postponed. We see the government holding the line on medical research, which is the same as reducing its participation, and then we hear that the government is building an $88 million language training centre. Mr. Speaker, I place a much higher priority on the health of our citizens than I place on language training. It is almost like giving people a choice of what language they choose to die in. I place a much higher priority on medical research than I place on unneeded new public buildings.

Medical research has a vital role to play in the over-all concept of universal medicare. If it had not been for the discovery of insulin, for instance, tens of thousands of Canadians would be subject to every-day treatment in order just to survive. Because we do have insulin those people can look forward to longer and more useful lives, at little expense to the medicare system.

It has been pointed out on numerous occasions in this House that the United States government spends ten times as much each year on heart research as we spend on all medical research. The United States government spends ten times as much each year on cancer research as we spend on all medical research combined.

An hon. Member: How about the population?

Mr. Alkenbrack: I know their population is ten times ours, but in the first case I said they spend ten times as much each year on heart research as we spend on all medical research.

It is little wonder that many of the top medical researchers in the United States are Canadians, trained in Canada but working in the United States because they have ready access to research funds. Every year more of our best researchers find positions south of the border and I am getting sick and tired of the government policy, or lack of policy, that is causing us to lose the fruits of their research.

More than one of my colleagues in this House have called on the government to withdraw this bill and enter into meaningful and open discussions with the provinces on the state of medicine in this country and to work out the direction it should take from here. That is what we should be doing, working with the provinces rather than trying to welsh on the commitments made to them. I join with them in saying to the government that we cannot accept such an attitude on the part of the government on such a vital issue. For any minister of the government even to suggest that this matter is not open to discussion and negotiation is despicable. This is not Cuba. I know what the Prime Minister's attitude is toward our parliament and I know full well what his attitude is toward federal-provincial relations. But I suggest that the Prime Minister and his Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) should adopt a different attitude.

We need more, not less, federal participation in medicare. We need more, not less, federal participation in medical research. Medicare and medical research must work hand in hand to meet the standards of treatment and to find cures for the diseases that immobilize our citizens, fill our hospitals, and occupy the time and efforts of our doctors and nurses. Every discovery by medical researchers frees more of our citizens for productive activity. Every discovery reduces the demands on our medical people and facilities.

I call on the government to convene a conference of health ministers and abandon its current excuses. They should get together to discuss a policy that will be honest and fair to the provinces and the people of Canada.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member said the government should spend more, not less, on medicare. I wonder if he is aware that this bill proposes a very substantial increase in the cost of medicare, not a reduction. It proposes 14.5 per cent for next year, which is more than the anticipated inflation and more than the increase in the gross national product. Does he realize this when he criticizes the government's approach to such expenditure?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked that question. The rate of federal input is still reduced by the ceilings. Moreover, the ceilings that the hon. member mentioned are not even pro rata with the total rate of inflation under this government, nor do they keep in pace with our increase in population.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in speaking at this stage I want to try to put Bill C-68 in a somewhat broader context in terms of the Liberal party's philosophical approach to governing in this country.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

The Liberal party never does anything unless it is kicked into it, either because of a marked shift in public opinion or because of some electoral happening that results in a minority government situation. It then suddenly becomes very progressive. When it has a majority it goes right back to its true tradition which is to maintain things as they have always been, particularly the distribution of wealth, or it tries to move marginally to the right so that the rich can get somewhat richer. That, precisely, is the effect of this bill.

● (2040)

A society can solve maldistribution of income two ways. The first method is by dealing with the problem head on, dealing directly with the hourly wages or salaries paid to people. The tax system can be used to redistribute income. In the alternative, the government can implement programs, or services, paid for by the general community. These free the people in the community from the obligation of paying directly for goods or services provided by the programs. Medicare is a good example of the latter situation.

The government, by providing a tax supported medical service for all people of this country, has been redistributing part of our wealth. We have enabled the poor and people of average income to obtain services which, if left for the open market to provide, they never could have afforded. That precisely is why Canada and other societies provide that kind of universal service.

Bill C-68 would limit the federal contribution in years ahead to medicare. What is wrong with the measure? First, it reneges on the government's obligation to virtually every province in this country, of whatever political stripe. Each province feels that the government has reneged on a profound commitment to share on a 50-50 basis, without ceiling, the cost of medicare. Therefore this bill represents a betrayal of a principle, the reneging of an agreement entered into some years ago.

Second, it will increase the degree of inequality in Canada. If the provinces, particularly poor provinces, are forced to pay higher cost they must obtain revenue which the federal government would have provided from other sources. It is difficult for provinces, particularly poor provinces, to do that. They will need to introduce regressive measures such as deterrent fees or sales taxes to pays for programs their people require. Therefore in terms of Canadian federalism this bill is a step backward, a step which, on balance, favours richer provinces more than poorer provinces. That is the first major implication of this bill.

But even richer provinces will have less money to pays for medical services. When richer provinces like Ontario feel the pressure and are forced to cut back their share of spending on medical programs, the poor people and average income earners even in those rich provinces will experience a relative decline in their position in society. That is the implication of the Liberal party's approach to medicare at present. The immediate result of this bill will be an increase of inequality in our society. The rich will never suffer; only the poor and average income earners will get the boot in the pants from this action.

An hon. Member: The government will argue that suffering is good for the soul.

Mr. Broadbent: That is right.

As I said at the outset, this action is not an aberration on the part of the Liberal party; it is typical of the Liberal party's attitude, an attitude it has shown ever since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office in 1968. Contrary to Liberal party propaganda, inequality in our country since 1968 has increased, not decreased.

In 1974 the bottom 40 per cent of our population had a smaller share of the national income than they had in 1968, when the Prime Minister first took office. By contrast, the richest 40 per cent of our population have acquired a bigger share of the national income between 1968 and 1974. Since the Prime Minister has been in office inequality in Canada has become worse, not better. Some may say that the government by providing benefits through government agencies has mitigated this inequality; the evidence does not support that view.

Look at the cutbacks the federal government announced late last year, as part of its bizarre and, from our point of view, immoral approach to dealing with inflation. Those cutbacks clearly show the government's bias. Why do I say it is immoral? I say it because those cutbacks bear most heavily on people of average and low income.

First there was the family allowance change. The government said that it would not index family allowances, and those allowances would not rise accordingly in 1976. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) announced the great surtax on the rich just before Christmas. If I recall correctly, he announced the surtax the day before the cutbacks were announced. That is when he brought forward his marvellous, progressive, innovative, imaginative and egalitarian surtax on the rich in Canada. And what did marvellous, radical Liberal move amount to? It meant that the tax increase for a man with two kids earning $35,000 a year would be 35 cents. I know it does not take much to convince a Liberal that a minimum program is progressive. Yet surely some in the Liberal party must think that is going a little far. Can they honestly say that by imposing such a small tax they were ensuring that the rich will bear their share of the burden of fighting inflation?

I thought that, given the reaction to the announcement made just before Christmas, it would be a miracle of miracles if the tax did not put the Liberals to shame. But no, it did not. Let me tell the House what happened. Just the other day all the recipients of family allowance in Canada, and old age pensioners, got a personal letter from the Prime Minister in which he mentioned the marvellous, progressive steps the Liberals were taking in making sure that the rich bore their share of the tax burden. Unfortunately he neglected to mention that the extra tax was 35 cents for a man earning $35,000 a year.

Once it has a majority, the Liberal party feels no shame.

An hon. Member: Come, now!

Mr. Broadbent: I would welcome the hon. member's intervention in the debate. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, I will gladly sit down.

An hon. Member: No, no, you cannot answer my question.

Mr. Broadbent: I see. I suggest that, even with minimal intellectual resources, I might attempt an answer.

I have illustrated the approach of the Liberal party when it has a majority. It fights inflation by hitting at the poor and average income worker. Just look at the cutbacks it announced before Christmas. It removed indexing from allowances, cut back the crop insurance program, cut back the Farm Credit Corporation program which affects farmers from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, B.C. It even announced cutbacks in financial assistance for the CNR. The CNR of course is particularly important to Canadians in northern Ontario, eastern, and western Canada. But the government announced those cutbacks.

● (2050)

The government announced cutbacks in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which, of course, was set up to deal with poverty in the regionally depressed parts of Canada. It announced cutbacks in medical research, which the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack). It announced cutbacks in those programs that are trying to come to grips with poverty in Canada and which are making some real progress. I think in particular of the Company of Young Canadians.

That was the government's general approach to dealing with inflation. It did not cut back, of course, on expenditures in the Prime Minister's office, which is surely a give-away. That is an important symbolic thing. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in that office in the last few years which, on a per capita basis, is not all that much, but in terms of its symbolic significance would have meant something. It did not cut back there. I am being perfectly serious.

The government did not cut back in the area of grants to corporations. This does not make any economic sense. Last May the then minister of finance had a report presented to him assessing the impact of the rapid write-off tax provisions which the same minister of finance had presented in the budget one year preceding. The assessment by people appointed by that minister, not by the New Democratic Party or members of other opposition parties, was that the tax concessions, in the neighbourhood of $1.7 billion, were economically not necessary. Surely that says something. Over half the recipients of those financial benefits indicated to the government in that survey that they were not motivated in their financial decisions by these particular tax concessions. In short, they were windfall profits. They would have made the same decisions if the program had not been in existence.

If over half the recipients indicated that, and of the rest a good number did not reply, I suggest to the government, which was responsible in terms of spending, that it should have scrapped that program right off. This past Christmas when it was considering cutbacks in government expenditure, instead of cutting back in all those areas that I listed which affect average and low income people from coast to coast, it should have done this with the corporate sector. However, the Liberals know who their friends are and they did not do so.

The other thing they might have done, shock of shock, is bring in a progressive income tax structure. They could start taxing those who earn $30,000 or more per year in a significant way in order to do something about narrowing the gap between the affluent in our society and the poor. They did not do that either. The Liberals turned to the average and the poor in terms of programs that affect them, and made the cutbacks there. Bill C-68 does precisely the same thing.

The real significance of this bill is that it goes against the principle that a national program shared by the federal government on a 50/50 basis and providing a service to all, means by definition that the average and the poor will not have to pay directly for that service at market price which, prior to this coming into being, was substantially higher.

The point was made, but little noted in this debate, that as a percentage of our gross national product we are spending less now on medicare than when the program was first introduced. When it was first brought in we were spending more. It is true that in absolute dollars we are spending more now on medicare, but of course we are spending more on virtually everything. That is what inflation has been all about. The real test is how much we are spending in terms of our gross national product. I repeat the point that we are spending less on medical services now than when the program first came into being.

If the government were serious about effecting per capita reduction on over-all costs over a longer period of time it would have been encouraging provinces such as Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia, and indeed Quebec, which in recent years have introduced preventive medical programs in which the federal government has not shared in the paying. It should have been encouraging expansion of this kind of program so that down the road we would have fewer sick people to deal with and, therefore, a reduced medicare cost. That would have been a more imaginative approach. It might well have involved spending more money now to achieve those objectives, but in the long run the per capita costs could be brought down.

A number of my colleagues, in fact almost all of them, have spoken on this bill and on the amendment. We have done so because we think medicare is a profoundly important social principle, that medical service should be taken out of the market place, that this kind of program introduces an element of equality in society which all of us should participate in, and because the government, via Bill C-68, is taking a regressive step. It is taking us back to the kind of society that existed before universal medicare was introduced.

We have opposed this bill. We did not expect the government would renege on its commitment some months ago to the provinces by proceeding with the bill. We did not expect the government to go back on indications it had given to a number of provincial ministers as recently as last Christmas by re-introducing it. Having done so, the New Democratic Party has made it clear that we are opposed to it. We are going to continue opposing it. We hope, even at the last instant, the government will see the light and change its mind. I hope so.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would entertain a question.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can only be done with the consent of the hon. member who had the floor. Does the hon. member give consent to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) to ask a question?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Saltsman: I must say I listened with great appreciation to the words of wisdom from the distinguished leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: The question I would like to ask the hon. member is: in view of the fact that the future is going to call for a great deal of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments of this country and that there are many problems that will have to be solved by agreement between the two levels of government, is it the view of the hon. member that the federal government reneging on its promise to medicare is going to jeopardize that kind of co-operation for those important programs of the future?

Mr. Beatty: This sounds like an NDP caucus meeting.

Mr. Broadbent: I am glad that question was asked. I suspect my answer will not surprise the hon. member. One of the inevitable consequences of this kind of action, particularly since the minister had indicated to a number of his provincial colleagues from all parties that this bill would not be introduced, whereas in fact of course it has been introduced, is that there is no reason for the provinces to expect the government or the minister to be any more reliable with respect to any other commitments they may make.

● (2100)

Mr. Saltsman: A further question, if I may. Can my hon. friend tell the House whether any of the provinces have received this bill with any degree of enthusiasm—whether any of the provinces think this is wise legislation, including those which have Liberal governments?

Mr. Broadbent: That too is a good question. The evidence is that none of the provinces agree with the government as to the wisdom of this legislation, even those provinces which have Liberal administrations. I would be interested to hear the private views of the premier of Nova Scotia with regard to it. I am sure he would be very much opposed.

Mr. Saltsman: A further question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members may ask questions for additional information but this is not the time or the place to enter into debate or to ask questions of a general nature. The hon. member knows that this is the second reading stage. However, I am ready to allow him one final question.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments you have made. Nevertheless I wish to follow this important question through because it is most desirable that we should obtain the views of someone who is also known as my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Saltsman: In view of the fact that the federal government made a great point, in connection with its prices and incomes policy, that it really needed the consent of all the provinces for the program to work, and has carried out enormous propaganda aimed at getting the provinces to help it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will understand why I hesitated to allow a further question. He appears now to be affirming something. If he wishes to ask a direct question he may do so as far as the Standing Order permits, but this is not the time or the place to make affirmations and ask an hon. member to comment on them.

Mr. Saltsman: One of the difficulties about being here any longer than two years is that the boundary between statements and questions becomes somewhat blurred. However, I will try to restore the distinction and ask a question directly. Can the hon. member explain why the federal government should have insisted on co-operation in one area while refusing to extend that co-operation in the area of medicare?

Mr. Broadbent: The answer is clear. The Liberal party has a long history of duplicity.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is essential that hon. members consider Bill C-68 through which the Canadian government is amending the present medicare legislation. Mr. Speaker, although this legislation is not very extensive, it is meant to alter substantially the universal medical protection scheme in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is important for two basic reasons. It questions again the sharing of responsibilities and powers among the various levels of government in Canada, both federal and provincial; it also questions the cost sharing of those programs. This means that since we live in a federal system, this sharing must be done after many intensive and effective negotiations between both levels of government directly concerned in such a bill.

Before talking about the substance of this bill, I would like to say to the government and to the minister who introduced this bill that I cannot support its approach which aims at imposing unilaterally a new cost and responsibility sharing formula, and I would like to emphasize the word unilaterally.

I am well aware that the minister and the government spokesmen say that there have been numerous discussions at the provincial level, but with what results, Mr. Speaker? Can the government table tonight copies of the agreements that have been made to support the administrative aspects or the principles of Bill C-68?

Mr. Speaker, in the past, when we had such debates in this House, government members emphasized the advantages of federalism and especially the importance of the great social philosophy of the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, without the Liberal policy, we would not have the social assistance programs that we have in Quebec, we would not have medicare, and many social security programs would not exist if it were not for the wonderful Liberal party. I am sorry to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I say so in a non-partisan manner since it is the truth.

Tonight, we are asked to pass a bill which aims at reducing the federal financial responsibility towards a program which the federal government itself forced us to accept originally. How can the government ask us today to contribute less to a program that it implemented itself when, at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, Ottawa and the provinces had not agreed that there would be subsequently a unilateral revision and cost distribution?

This is the constitutional aspect of Bill C-68 which can certainly cause vigorous protest in the House by those who are more provincialist than federalist. The fact remains that this little ball game, this constitutional game is being played and varies according to the political situation of the day, whether it is profitable or not. Mr. Speaker, this is being conducted on the back of Canadians. A great truth which I believe everyone agrees with is that regardless who pays for medicare costs, whether it is Ottawa or the provinces, it always comes out of the taxpayers' pocket.

In the financial system in which we live and which is protected by the present governments, they have only two sources of revenue—loans and taxation. In the case of loans, again Canadians have to pay a surtax to reimburse capital and interests, in the case of taxation, again the citizens have to pay. Finally, this bill says if it is passed, that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of certain costs mentioned in the explanatory notes. It is not the federal government that will do that. The federal government is only the medium; or very often the government thinks it is God; thanks to it, we have grants and without it we would have nothing.

Mr. Speaker, that is not true. It is a falsehood politicians put in the heads of people. It is not the federal government, no matter how big, powerful and Liberal it is, that pays for medical care. It is taxpayers. Let us stop once and for all that constitutional game which divides Canada and which raises the provinces against the federal government and the federal government against the provinces. And finally, what everybody forgets to say is that it is always the taxpayer, no matter who administers him, the province of Quebec, Ottawa, Toronto or Edmonton, that finally foots the bill and receives the care that is very often inadequate in some hospitals.

Mr. Speaker, medicare is not such a wonderful thing. It is a tremendous thing, a step forward, of course. But everyone will agree with me that it is very costly, and that it did not necessarily improve the quality of the services.

It merely allowed services to be more accessible to people to whom they were formerly denied because of prohibitive prices. But that did not improve the quality of the services. I know many a citizen in Victoriaville or elsewhere, in Drummondville as well as Quebec, who has to queue at the emergency of large hospitals waiting for quality care, and who continue to wait. The doctors do what they can. The nurses and hospital staff also do what they can, but money does not necessarily buy quality services.

In any event, I feel that it is important to stress that with the type of administrators we have in our Canadian federal system, we will always have conflicts because we take provocative stands. This evening, the government introduces a bill in which it states that from now on the federal government will pay 50 per cent of the costs. It is lying when it says this, because it does not pay: Canadians do. Canadians could not care less whether medicare is paid by Ottawa or the provinces: what they want is quality services, which suit them and to which they are entitled.

But our politicians, in Ottawa as well as in the province of Quebec, brag about their achievements. How often have my hon. opposites heard members and ministers of the Union Nationale brag about having built such or such a stretch of road. That has been heard. And I have heard it as well among the Liberals as in the Bourassa government. Thanks to the Bourassa Liberals, such and such a stretch of road was built; medicare was kept, social welfare is paid. The same thing goes on in Ottawa: we hear ministers say that thanks to minister so-and-so, such and such a subsidy is paid. Such thing has been done thanks to the Liberal government. Mr. Speaker, politicians who have this kind of attitude contribute to divide Canadians and make them confused when it comes to constitutional priorities. This is so true that on several occasions the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and some of his colleagues complained that the federal participation was not mentioned in some projects.

All this, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate how important it is to politicians, both in Ottawa and in Quebec, to give information on the source of money, but politicians conveniently forget that the money comes from the taxpayers' pockets. I would be curious, Mr. Speaker, to ask the citizens whether they think they have their money worth with the taxes they pay.

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to dwell on the subject but I think this kind of attitude is revolting.

Tonight the government asks us to support its position, to limit or put a maximum to its financial contribution to 50 per cent of the costs. What will happen after that? This is law in Ottawa and it puts the provinces in a position to accept it unconditionally. They no longer have the choice. Then they will come and praise the merits of federalism, they will tell us that separatists are wrong, whether they come from Quebec or from other provinces. In fact, it must not be forgotten that there are separatists outside Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I think the government makes a very serious mistake by imposing this bill on us, by urging us to adopt it rapidly without the question being thoroughly discussed. This government cannot give us tonight the firm assurance of the participation of the provinces. It cannot either tell us where the provinces will get the money to make their contribution. Mr. Speaker, when they do not want to answer our questions on that sort of issue, they talk about equalization. They say equalization will settle the problem. Equalization is the kind of road roller which comes along and fashions justice and equality between the provinces. Mr. Speaker, this is quite an easy argument, because it is superficial and very few people understand it. All this is so fuzzy for the ordinary mortal that, finally, politicians can once more shove anything down our throats.

I wish to make it clear that I want no part in that kind of legislation. In my view, the government tonight should take a positive attitude. We did not contrive medicare, I am sorry to say. One day the government rose to its feet and cried out: Long live medicare, long live the government which had the kind thought of giving you medicare! To vote for us means to vote for medicare.

I recall having heard that kind of things in Quebec, in my own riding. The people swallowed it up in good faith. They really are gullible to believe all they are told. Now, Mr. Speaker, the government on seeing rising costs cannot tell us that we are getting better services, so it simply moves one step backwards and says: From now on, we are going to pay only 50 per cent of the costs, kids, you take care of the rest by yourselves. You are on your own! The government says further: But it is a cost sharing program. It being so, Mr. Speaker, it means that the provinces agree to pay the remaining 50 per cent. It means that the provinces have evaluated their capacity to pay the missing 50 per cent, if it is a cost sharing program.

It is either a provincial program or a federal program or a cost sharing program. The government is not prepared to let the whole jurisdiction in the hands of the provinces. The provinces are not prepared to leave it to the federal government either, and yet both want it to be a cost sharing program. They do not agree. There are no discussions between them, because there again is a money problem. This is the reality of Canadian politics, Mr. Speaker. Much as we want to bury our head in the sand, refuse to admit it, it is again a question of money. You can say that Social Crediters talk only about money, but what is the subject of the bill the Liberals are pushing tonight? Money. And why does the federal government want to cut back to 50 per cent? It is because it needs money. And who pays, Mr. Speaker? The Canadian people do.

On behalf of all my fellow citizens of Lotbinière, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I disagree with this bill, that I will certainly vote against it because it is contrary to Canadian unity. This is not how we should negotiate with our partners, the provinces. If Canada exists, it is because of the provinces. In fact, Canada is merely the union of the provinces. The federal government is not the first government in Canada, contrary to what the Liberals may believe, but the provincial governments are, and our confederation will be strong as long as each province is. It is not with this kind of oppressive legislative measures that we will achieve a strong unity. Mr. Speaker, no wonder we have complete splits in the country about such measures. I see the hon. member for Laval (M. Roy) in front of me. I shall remind him of an illustration. The Liberals, and I must apologize for referring to that this evening, the Liberals were most happy to see the Conservatives fight each other at their leadership convention. I myself heard a number of them making ugly remarks. I must also say that as far as the financing the Olympic Games is concerned, a large number of French-speaking Liberal members from Quebec want the government to pay a share of the deficit, because they come from Quebec and suggest this is not only Quebec games but Canadian games. But I also know a number of English-speaking Liberal members who have no desire that we share in the financing of the games. Therefore, this is not a partisan issue, but rather a question of whether one believes in Canada, or whether one does not.

As far as I am concerned, whether on the matter of the Progressive Conservative convention, the Olympic Games financing or Bill C-68, all that raises the question of our faith, our belief, our proundness in our country or again in our regionalism, our chauvinism, all that which will prompt unilateral action, independently from the province. And at the end, Prime Minister Trudeau and his government will be astonished that this country's unity is jeopardized. The main problem is not bringing back the constitution in Canada, but starting to unite the country.

Mr. Speaker, I invite members of this government to review their positions concerning Bill C-68, I urge them, before second reading and referred of the bill to committee, to give us a formal and earnest assurance that the federal government's partners, the provincial governments, fully participate in and are in total agreement with this kind of distribution. If such were the case, if the government could tell us this evening that the provinces accept that kind of fiscal sharing, then as a Canadian I would easily join in passing Bill C-68.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like to move blindly. But this is exactly what the government are trying to make us do this evening with Bill C-68. They are asking us for a blank cheque. "Give us a blank cheque, so they ask, take unilateral action, and then we will complete negotiations with provinces."

Mr. Speaker, I am too Canadian and I believe too much in Canada to accept and take such a gamble.

Mr. Roy (Laval): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Laval on a point of order.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker I want to remind the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) that in the opinion of Liberals sitting here, from the province of Quebec as well as other parts of Canada, we have never called upon members of the Social Credit Party of Canada to express our views and we never needed them, be it about the Olympics or anything else, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière, but it is not on a point of order; it is on a point of debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) for whom I have much esteem still has not understood a word of what I said. I simply gave an example of the way in which as Canadians we part on specific subjects. I know full well that I am not a spokesman for the Liberal party, and God save me from ever being one! However, Mr. Speaker, I do know he would very much like to become a spokesman for the Social Credit Party but we do not agree on that either.

Mr. Speaker, had it not been for our friendship, the fact still remains that it is a typical example that I gave not out of malice. He knows I am right, he knows what I say is true. Mr. Speaker, I know he is just teasing me. The fact still remains that the principle which I emphasized is Canadian unity and this is too serious a subject to kid about it.

Medical Care Act

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I have had some opportunity to dwell on this bill and to discuss it in the House. I am pretty concerned about the attitude of the minister in introducing a bill which, quite frankly, if I were to employ legal terms would indicate that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) probably has some type of disorder best described as a fecalith in the Circle of Willis which is giving him a rather disturbed outlook on life. Having said that I think it is important to ask why the people to my left have asked for a six months' hoist.

Is it some type of legislative trick we see pulled here in the House of Commons on the government from time to time for one reason or another? Of course it is, but I think the very basic reason it has been introduced, the very reason there should be a six months' hoist, is to give an opportunity to the provinces to develop a proper dialogue with the government to sort out what can be reconstructed from the proposal introduced by the minister in this bill.

Certainly there is not a member from the opposition side at least who has spoken on this bill who has not referred to the fact that this is again an example of confrontation with the provinces. We are simply asking that the normal process of dialogue, or arbitration if you like, or debate, be introduced between the federal government and the provinces instead of this continuing confrontation with the provinces. It is no wonder the provinces and the public are becoming increasingly suspicious of the attitudes and actions of the government.

The government promises one thing and gives another. How long can this continue? How long does the government expect to continue this particular program? I think this whole damned process will grind to a halt in 1978 or, hopefully, sooner. I think when we speak about promises and priorities we must reflect for a moment on the examples.

I think it was the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) who said that they were going to monitor the effect of the introduction of the 5 per cent or 6 per cent tax that was taken off building materials.

An hon. Member: What about medical care?

Mr. Brisco: Hang on; do not be impatient. I am making a point and I will get to it. The minister indicated that he intended to monitor building supply stores across Canada on a selective basis to make sure that this reduction was being passed on to the consumers. When he was asked a question about this he gave an evasive answer. We have never heard another word from the minister on the subject.

The same situation applies to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). He took up the case of boots, shoes, and clothing, and when he responded to questions in the House he said that they were monitoring the effect in order to be sure that the consumer would not be ripped off. What has happened? The consumer is being ripped off.

What do we have in Bill C-68? We have the same vague promises which lead to an eventual cost to the consumer, How will that cost be passed along? It has already been said. We know that the cost in respect of the priorities of this program will be borne by the provinces. That is the avowed intent of the government.

The government said to the provinces in effect that it would suck them in during 1968-71, and now the government is saying it will cast them off. Now it asks the provinces to increase their taxes. One of the members on the government side said the other day this would increase the cost of taxes to the federal government, that it would cost the federal government more. He did not express any concern about the provinces. Quite frankly, when it comes to the health of Canadians I am really not disturbed about the increased cost, because this increased cost is not reflected in terms of the physicians themselves and those who deliver health to Canadians but is reflected in the cost of construction, maintenance, and operation of the institutions where patients are housed, treated, and cared for. These are the areas to which we must address concern.

The government has acknowledged that it has had 377 different reports and proposals dealing with possible ways to cut health costs. Where are these reports? As I said the other day, they are in the archives. They are never referred to any more. My dear members on the other side of the House, all I ask you to do is a little home work. Why does the minister, with all the expertise he has in his department, not ask his people to go to the archives to find out what reports the government commissioned some years ago, at which it has never bothered to look? Do you not think it is about time you did some of your own home work?

I can just see that right after this bill we will be faced with a new one from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I will be called some glorified term like guaranteed annual income. Imagine what effect that will have on Canadians. Whoopee! And then what—some kind of deterrent fee or some kind of increase in taxation five years down the road because all of a sudden we will find that the entire program has been mismanaged and will cost more than anticipated? That is the road we will probably take. That is the traditional road we have been taking for years.

Let us discuss the cost of health. Where are we faced with the increase in the cost of health? Why are we facing an increasing cost of disease? I think it would be a very noble gesture on the part of the government if it started encouraging amongst the physicians of Canada the attitude of promoting health and treating healthy people to ensure that they remain healthy, rather than waiting until they are diseased and treating them at that time.

I do not pretend to be an expert in this field, and perhaps I should not comment too extensively, but certainly we are aware that now we are dealing with new diseases which cost more money. The other day the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) complained about the cost of equipment for the treatment of the sick. He said that we have all these fancy X-ray machines, exotic laboratory equipment, and diagnostic tests, and that they cost so very much. Dealing with one specific example, that equipment is one reason why the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is with us this evening. If that equipment had not been developed and was not being used, Dr. Fitzgibbon and Dr. Keon would not have been in a position to have done anything for the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. That is why the so-called exotic equipment is so necessary today. Is there an hon. member in this House right now who would not be prepared to submit himself to that exotic equipment if he thought he had an enormous aneurism in his aorta, or some other heart diseases? Of course not. He would be rushing to it, and why not?

Much of this equipment has been the dividend returned by the government investing in Canadian researchers who have developed the means to treat the diseases which we face today and diseases we will face in the future, which we probably know nothing about. If hon. members bothered to look at the annual report of the National Research Council they would find it to be a most challenging and interesting document. Perhaps the words are big and strange, and perhaps the descriptions sound so scientific that there might be difficulty understanding them, but if hon. members had an opportunity to scan that document, they would realize what the tax dollars of Canadians, spent by the government on research, have achieved for Canadians. However, how much better it would be if that volume were twice as thick. Why should it be necessary for the government to change its priorities and move away from the health field into other areas? That is the wrong direction in which to travel.

Mr. Alkenbrack: They want to build more buildings.

Mr. Brisco: That is right. The priorities seem to be the construction of more buildings and the creation of a greater, better, bigger and more expensive bureaucracy. Today more than ever before we are becoming aware of new industrial diseases which challenge the imagination of researchers, physiologists, physicians and others. These industrial diseases were not really known to the scientific community a generation or two ago. They are the result of new, exotic chemistries which have been introduced into industries, particularly into the petro-chemical industries. There are various types of plastics, foams and fibres which are creating disorders which we have never seen before.

Of course we still have the older industrial diseases which we have recognized but which we have not been in a position to treat before. We are just now learning to treat them, and we are just determining now the effect they have on the system and how dangerous is that effect. Diseases such as silicosis have been around for years. There is asbestosis and lead poisoning, and of course there is another new one on the medical scene and on the environmental scene, mercury poisoning, in at least two existing forms. When it occurs naturally it is environmental and we really know nothing about that. We do not even know how that mercury gets in to water, whether it is leached out of the soil or in what fashion it is ingested by fish. This final form comes to the human being who eats that fish.

We really do not know very much about the chemical induction of mercury other than that we know its source in the form of the leaching process in pulp mills. These are new disorders, yet we are talking about cutting back on the health care delivery system. We are talking about pushing these costs for all these new disorders, let alone the old ones, on to the provinces. How can we expect the provinces to function with a fine health delivery system when that type of situation is forced upon them?

Let us look at the changes in our entire lifestyle, in our aging processes and in our youth today. Geriatric disorders are relatively new on the medical scene, and more and more I find—

An hon. Member: Make a valid criticism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I am waiting for the rabble to stop rabbling.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I would not mind if they were contributing something constructive, but most of their contribution is destructive or ineffective.

When I was so rudely interrupted I was speaking about geriatric problems and the increasing number of geriatric physicians or specialists who are now on the medical scene. I am sure many here have experienced the very sad and unfortunate situation of aging parents who must be placed in nursing homes. We find that the nursing home type facility is very costly in many cases. They are being constructed in increasing numbers because there is a demand. Why is there this demand? There is a very simple reason. There are more and more old people. Perhaps we will hear an inane complaint from the other side of the House that physicians are being too effective and that they are curing too many people so that people now live too long. It would not surprise me to hear that comment.

One of the other effects upon the provinces is that of the health delivery systems which they would like to develop, improve, and advance, the community clinics, where a variety of health disciplines can work in harmony and unity for the better health care of Canadians. Another effect is the utilization of further training of the paramedics in ambulance service. Let us give credit where credit is due. In British Columbia the New Democratic Party government did a fine job in developing a better ambulance system than the province ever had, but it could still be improved by having qualified paramedics working in harmony with community clinics and hospitals.

All of these things cost money, of course, and who is going to pay? Will it be the provinces, the federal government, or will it be a 50-50 cost-sharing agreement with this government honouring the agreements it laid down when it obliged the provinces to participate in the health delivery system?

I have indicated that there are probably two ways in which the individual would be affected; either through a deterrent fee established by the provincial medicare system, or by increased taxation at the provincial level. If it were the deterrent fee it is probable that the poor pensioner and all the poor would be affected because it is they who are most often ill. What would the deterrent do to those patients, and to dedicated physicians such as those in my riding?

A physician in my riding was told that he would have to cut out house calls because of the cost to medicare. The official in Vancouver who was telling him this was out of touch with reality. If he had looked up the record of every physician in Kootenay West he would have seen that they are dedicated enough that they work late into the night on house calls. It seems we mostly find this sort of dedication in rural areas nowadays; there is an occasional physician who is prepared to see his patients after hours.

Mr. Alexander: Don't forget M.P.s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Yes, we are another dedicated lot. In the past I have had an opportunity to visit one or two universities where medical research is taking place. In talking to the researchers one of the biggest concerns is that they are perhaps four or five years into a project when it grinds to a halt because of the government's policies. Research projects have been cut. What kind of an effect would it have on a member who has been saving for years to buy a home, who has accumulated several thousands of dollars and is ready to purchase the home, when overnight the cost doubles due to the stock market, or somehow the money is lost? Just think of the frustration of those researchers who have worked for three or four years on a project which would only take another year or two to complete, and then they see the whole thing grind to a halt because of this insensitive government.

What is wrong with the government that it would rather deal by frustration than consultation? In the question period when asked to cut spending the reply often is, "Would you like us to cut health costs? Is that what you have in mind? Tell the public you have asked us to cut health costs." Mr. Speaker, we do not have to ask the government to cut health costs; it does not need any urging from us and it does not understand where priorities are. It does not recognize the sincere concern of members on this side that the health of Canadians be of paramount importance.

I had an opportunity to express my concern and that of my constituents on the two occasions I have spoken on this bill. The determination expressed by members on this side indicates that I shall probably have another opportunity, as they will too. I should like to conclude my remarks now, and indicate that I will welcome the opportunity at any time to speak on Bill C-68, the brain child of the Liberal government.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how qualified I am to reply, but I shall try.

Mr. Yewchuk: As the hon. member is a prominent member of the executive of the Canadian Chiropractic Association I wonder if he could inform the House what effect this bill will have on his profession. Certainly it will be affected, but no one has explained how.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I have studiously avoided mentioning my own profession because I do not think it a good idea to grind one's own axe in this House. If I were to speak on behalf of my profession, however, I would say first of all that the federal government does not contribute to the cost of chiropractic care, the cost of dental care, the cost of optometric care, physiotherapy care, or podiatric care. The government would lead you to believe that this is a 50-50 operation but it is not. It does not cover the cost of administration either.

When the cost of medicare is increased to the provinces as a result of this bill, in all likelihood what will happen to the paramedical professions is that the provinces which provide those services through their own premiums will have to reduce the services in order to maintain a lower level of cost to the public. In the paramedical field, my own included, we will see a reduction in the services offered for the health of Canadians. It happened in 1968, and it could happen again if the bill passes in its present form.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, may I participate briefly in the debate on the motion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) that Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act, be now read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert).

We have listened with interest to the debate on this measure. I was somewhat alarmed and amused by the intervention this afternoon of the parliamentary secretary who made an extensive speech and suggested that this debate should be concluded speedily because the measure had been discussed for a number of days. I assure him that we would continue debating this measure for a considerable time if there were hope of changing the government's mind. But the government does not usually change its mind.

An hon. Member: What mind?

Mr. Patterson: The present situation is remarkable. No matter what is done, the government maintains its bull-headed attitude and says, "Let the opposition talk as long as it wants; we will go ahead and do what we want." Government members look on themselves as experts in all fields and cast aside opposition contributions as irrelevant or useless.

The following words appear on page 5 of the pamphlet "A New Perspective of the Health of Canadians", published in 1975:

> Good health is the bedrock on which social progress is built. A nation of healthy people can do those things that make life worth while; as the level of health increases, so does the potential for happiness.

In presenting this bill, which will have consequential effects on the health of Canadians, the government is not moving in the direction of better health for Canadians; it is moving in the direction of poorer health. I do not expect that the government intends this to be so, but that will be the end result if this bill is passed.

I should like to emphasize for a few moments the importance of health and physical fitness to our nation. I think the government in some ways has taken an admirable stand in its attempt to encourage Canadians to become physically fit. Canadian television is regularly broadcasting commercial messages concerning the importance of physical fitness. As well, I feel the government ought to be commended for its program of education, including television messages, to encourage people to stop smoking. This is necessary and effective, and I hope it continues.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that there is a growing awareness among Canadians that participation in activities such as smoking, drinking, over eating and wrong eating habits exact a terrible toll on the individual's health and well-being, as the minister has emphasized in his pronouncements.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Patterson: I hear a colleague interjecting. Perhaps he thinks my remarks relate to him.

An hon. Member: The hon. member's remarks are pretty close to home.

Mr. Patterson: Many people may even be able to see the relationship between these activities and the increase in the cost of hospital care and medical care. There are, however, not enough people in this class, and our efforts should be directed toward further education of our people in the importance of preventive medicine. Canadians must become more responsible for their own health. I agree with the old adage that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

In some cases the responsibility for these preventive measures will be assumed by individuals who want to change their eating habits and their drinking and exercise habits. However, as parliamentarians we must be aware of the fact that if enough people do not voluntarily assume the responsibility for corrective measures in their own behaviour, governments may be forced to legislate further in the behavioural field. For instance, I wonder just how long the non-drinking segment of society is going to put up with the added cost of health and medical care that can very readily be traced to the drinking segment of society. How long, for example again, will society let the drinking driver who is involved in a car crash exploit the non-drinking drivers by receiving benefits under medicare? There is a growing number in society who feel that a drinking driver should not receive free medical and hospital care if he is involved in a car crash.

There are millions of others in our society who may not drive cars while drinking alcohol but who increase the cost of medical and hospital care considerably because they abuse alcohol. I suggest that some thought should be given to imposing an additional tax on the liquor industry in order to pay the bills of those whose illnesses or injuries are attributable to the consumption of alcohol.

The same may be said of those who smoke. There is a great list of diseases afflicting the human body, and requiring treatment, which are attributable to the inhalation of cigarette, cigar, and pipe smoke. I suggest that smoking imposes an incredible, added cost to medical and health care services. Would it not be fair, for example, to charge a non-smoker a lower medicare premium than we charge a smoker? That would be fair. The same could be said about those with a disposition to over eat and those who are careless in the use of a motor vehicle. Canadians should be prepared to shoulder the responsibility for better preventive health care. If they do not I suggest that governments will necessarily encourage or even force them to do so.

A few years ago a former minister of national health and welfare said that the cost of health services has risen so rapidly in Canada in recent years that three alternatives are imminent. First, the standard of health care now available can be reduced; or, second, taxes, premiums or deterrent fees could be raised ever higher; or, third, ways must be found to restrain the growth of cost increases through the better operation of the health service structure now in existence.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—POSSIBLE OPENING OF SUFFIELD RANGE FOR GRAZING

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the topic of my adjournment debate speech relates to the Department of National Defence and to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), but I hasten to point out that in no way does it relate to current Lockheed aircraft contracts. It relates to the minister's ultimate decision that grazing should not be permitted in 1976, and possibly for several years thereafter, in the Suffield PFRA community pasture near Medicine Hat, Alberta.

In my question to the minister of last February 17 I suggested that this decision means that approximately 5,000 head of breeding cattle will have to find new pastures in the coming months, or be put on a badly depressed cattle market. New pasture arrangements at this late date are almost impossible to arrange. Therefore the market alternative will very likely be chosen—not a pleasant prospect.

I am convinced the minister received very bad advice that originated from environmental, wildlife and fish and game interests in Alberta, both federal and provincial agencies, which in turn advised the Suffield base commander that grazing should cease. In accepting this questionable advice from his Suffield staff, the minister has chosen to ignore and reject a very well prepared and practical report with recommendations from PFRA who, of course, report to the minister's colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard).

I submit most sincerely that wildlife and fish and game enthusiasts are not practical agronomists and, further, that no authority on this continent is more knowledgeable and competent on this subject than Alex Johnston and Silver Smoliak of the federal research station at Lethbridge, the Alberta department of lands range management staff, and especially the staff of PFRA in Regina, particularly Dr. Bob Lodge and Walter Thompson.

PFRA have been managing many pastures over all of western Canada for almost 40 years. I have personally watched them perform. They are exceedingly competent managers and, further, are well aware of the need for conservation and environmental respect.

The recommendation of PFRA respecting this Suffield pasture is that the terms of reference that relate the use of this pasture only to "emergency drought conditions" are entirely unsatisfactory, and that the Suffield pasture should operate on a permanent basis. Improved and permanent stock watering conditions can only be developed under such terms. It is only in the vicinity of the present less than adequate water holes that there is some over grazing. This is normal during the months of August and September when our native grasses ripen, growth stops, and the brittle grasses are subject to tramping around cattle water holes.

The 141,000 acres of this Suffield pasture carry approximately 5,000 head of breeding cattle for six months. The carrying capacity, determined by many years of research at the Manyberries federal research station, for 1975 was 60 acres per mature animal unit, with one field of coarser sand grass at 80 acres for a 12 month season. That is approximately 11 head per square mile at the 60 area carrying capacity, and eight head per square mile at the 80 acre one. For a six months' season this means 22 head and 16 head respectively per square mile. That is not very many cattle. I submit there is no way there can be overgrazing as charged by the wildlife people, except around the too few water holes.

This Suffield pasture area is short grass ranching country where our grass is the result of ten to 12 inches total precipitation per year and an evaporation rate of four times the precipitation from a free water surface. I know. My summer grazing range is just the width of the South Saskatchewan River from this pasture. During the 1930's I sometimes rode over much of this same pasture area looking for some of our cattle that had crossed over the river ice in winter and had to be returned by swimming the river in the spring, a very dangerous experience I can assure you.

I want to express my appreciation to the minister for his courtesy in meeting with Mr. Jim Musgrove and myself last February 20. Mr. Musgrove was in Ottawa representing the Suffield PFRA pasture advisory committee. I am sure the minister was a little better informed as a result of that useful meeting.

I suggest that environmentalists, Suffield military staff, and wildlife enthusiasts are in no position to be critical of how cattlemen harvest grass with their cattle when the same kind of grass over the bulk of the Suffield area, excluding the PFRA pasture, is burned off with prairie fires and ploughed up by target tanks being dragged over much of the range, plus soil damage by tank tracks.

Cattlemen ranchers are by nature the very best conservationists. Their long-time livelihood depends on their understanding of and co-operation with nature. Production of this short grass is the highest and best use of these lands, and the multiple use concept of these lands by cattle, wildlife, including rattlesnakes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the subject raised by the hon. member tonight, that is, the question of the use of the Suffield range for grazing cattle, is one we have discussed together; we have debated it over a number of years. In answers that I have given during the question period and in personal conversations with the hon. member I have tried to make my position quite clear.

The Suffield range is held by the federal government primarily for military training purposes. The range can, however, be of very real benefit to cattlemen in the area, particularly in times of emergency and in periods of drought, as it has been in the past. It seems to me it would be best for all concerned, including the cattlemen, if the range is kept as a reserve for emergencies, as in the past, and not used for grazing on a continuous basis. If the range is used each year for continuous grazing there will be no extra pasture available during periods of drought.

There are other factors related to the ecology and the protection of wildlife which clearly point to the desirability of not using the range on a continuous basis. For these reasons it is not planned to open the range for grazing in the current year, but I see no reason why we should not give full consideration to re-opening it in future years in special circumstances, as we have done in the past. We are ready to use the range as a reserve and I think this is in the best interests of the cattlemen in the area. This, I believe, will meet the views of those who are interested in the ecology, and I think it will also meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF DUTY FREE SHOPS—REASON FOR WARNING TO CONSUMERS ABOUT PURCHASES AT DUTY FREE SHOPS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on February 18 I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) a straightforward and non-contentious question about duty free establishments—I emphasize the words "establishments". I wanted to know what progress was being made in investigating complaints. I made no specific reference to which ones, or to why the minister's own departmental magazine entitled Consumer Contact, published under his authority, had stated:

> Some articles, like brand name cameras, can sometimes be obtained at Canadian department stores at lower prices than at duty free shops.

Imagine my surprise, Mr. Speaker, when the minister reacted, not like a tiger—for which I might have respected him—but like the angry pussy cat which Canadians have seen he can be in defending the rights of consumers, saying I was more interested in publicity than I was in the results of any investigations and that my question about the contents of his magazine relating to duty free shops seemed to question the good faith and integrity of those who had prepared articles for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of good clean fun may I remind the minister that on occasion cabinet ministers and even he, I venture, have been known to prepare press releases, or cause them to be prepared for publicity purposes. So I concede that I was indeed interested in bringing to the attention of the public my desire to see the minister do his job and protect the consumer. Which brings me to the point of asking once again what is going on.

Why is the department not willing to justify the basis on which it cautioned consumers against duty free shops? Or is it willing, and the minister was not sufficiently informed?

I received a very gracious letter from Robert J. Bertrand, the director of investigation and research, on January 19. In the letter he mentioned a complaint previous to mine which was being examined. It came from a member of the public and was presently being examined under the misleading advertising provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. Then Mr. Bertrand confused me a bit by saying two paragraphs later that the confidentiality requirements of the act did not allow him to indicate whether or not an inquiry under the act was in progress—although he had just so stated. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I am sure Mr. Bertrand is doing his job, and I am confident that whoever wrote the article in the October issue of the minister's publication did so in good faith, and frankly I resent the minister's juvenile attempt to infer that I suggested otherwise.

Does the minister really want me, I wonder, to make public letters that I have received illustrating some abuses that his department is supposed to be investigating? Since the minister chose to treat my questions on February 18 as relating to my letter of January 9 regarding Sky Shops, let me remind him that it will soon be two months since he received it, and I now have many more letters from the public which I can pass along to him. However, judging by his performance so far, it looks as if there is little point in doing so.

I want to close by asking my friend, the minister, to answer my question and to do his job—to refrain from going into a snit and to inform the House what research was done by the author or authors of this article previously mentioned, and what is the current situation on the investigation of complaints against duty free establishments. I also ask him to keep in mind, in assessing pricing practices of establishments like Sky Shops, that not only ought he to concern himself with comparative prices available to consumers in Canadian department stores, but also with the prices that these goods can be purchased at the destination of those leaving the country. If a traveller can buy a camera for $100 at a Canadian duty free store, for $90 at a Canadian department store, and get that same camera at the foreign city or country to which he is proceeding for $80, then this is also very pertinent.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I find it, and I know the minister finds it, very unfortunate that the hon. member chose to take a statement in the October, 1975, issue of Consumer Contact out of context. The sentence in question appeared near the end of a two-page article entitled "Importance of Planning a Vacation" which was directed at those Canadians contemplating a vacation.

If the hon. member had read three lines further in the Consumer Contact article in question he would have seen the following:

You can only bring specific amounts of any given item into Canada without paying customs duties, however, and it is wise to find out these customs regulations before you leave on your trip.

By his question, however, the hon. member appeared to be comparing the prices in Canadian duty free shops with prices in Canadian department stores. This is clearly an invalid comparison as Canadian Consumers are unable to purchase goods in Canadian duty free shops.

I am advised that officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, prior to writing this article, received suggestions from various sources within the travel industry. Several of these sources indicated that there appears to be an almost automatic expectation on the part of travellers that goods normally associated with a particular country can be obtained less expensively in the duty free shops of that country than in Canadian stores. While this may be a reasonable expectation it would appear that some goods may be purchased in Canadian retail outlets at a price lower than that charged in the country being visited.

The sources for the article indicated that true bargains are to be found in liquor and cigarettes. There is a valid reason for this. We all have a pretty good idea of what these items cost. On the other hand, how many people know the prices in Canada of brand name cameras, watches or perfumes?

As to the hon. member's question on the progress of an inquiry into duty free establishments, I am advised that the director of investigation and research did write to the hon. member explaining the confidentially requirements of the act. I am therefore unable to give any details of the member's request for action under the Combines Investigation Act.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REQUEST FOR REDEPLOYMENT OF AIR AND SEA RESCUE FORCES IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for bringing the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) back so late at night, but the combination of questions and motions I and other of my colleagues have brought to the minister indicate our concern with regard to the lack of capability of the air and sea rescue unit in the Atlantic region to react to problems being faced by the fishermen in the province of Newfoundland and off the coast of Newfoundland, and its inability to take the necessary action to save those who, unfortunately, were lost over the past two or three months.

I can understand the minister's dilemma and the fact that it is not easy to redeploy forces at little or no cost. However, it is very obvious from the experience I have had in the military that the element of the air and sea rescue unit in Halifax or Summerside cannot react to the problems which exist because of the particular conditions in the province of Newfoundland.

I feel, even with the depressed state of the economy, that consideration should be given to enlarging the element of the air and sea rescue unit so that we would be assured that precautions could be taken so that we would be in a position to face these problems. Even from the point of view of the economy, and more particularly from the point of view of the fact that hopefully the Canadian government will extend our fisheries zone 200 miles, we must start the planning so that we can participate and carry out surveillance measures after the Law of the Sea Conference.

I have suggested to the minister, and thankfully he said he would look into it, that if we are not able because of restrictions on the economy to enlarge the Canadian forces a simple solution to the problem would be to employ the reserves which are supposed to be a back-up for the Canadian forces. Over a year ago the minister indicated they would expand the auxiliary reserves and that he would consider the establishment of a unit of the reserve forces in Newfoundland. I can tell him, from my estimation of the situation, that we have at the SAC base on the west coast of Newfoundland at Stephenville a radar base that is vacant—the minister knows about the situation there—which would be a good training ground and a good place to establish a base in that part of Newfoundland so that we could train personnel to perform the surveillance activities for back-up to the Canadian forces.

The most important thing is that we appreciate the problem which exists and prepare for it. While I can understand the difficulties the minister faces, the fact remains that in the past two months we lost six fishermen. It is amazing to me why they could not be located and saved. It would seem this was because of the lack of capacity of the air and sea rescue unit of our Canadian forces.

What I am doing is asking the minister to look at it a little more closely, to make a study, which I will help him with, and to look at the three strategic locations involved which could be available. Hopefully he will direct the Chief of the Defence Staff to direct people within the Canadian armed forces to look into three areas: the logistic support which is there, the infra structure support which is there, and to try to determine the mission that they are going to have to look after in the near future when we extend our 200 mile fishery zone, and to consider it realistically. Hopefully in a spirit of comradeship they can accept the suggestion I have made in a spirit of co-operation and expertise.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to compliment the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) on his very obviously deep concern for the welfare and safety of the fishermen in his region. That is a concern I share, and I think it has been demonstrated over recent months and years that the Canadian armed forces have played their part in protecting or helping fishermen in the region who have got into difficulties for one reason or another.

However, I think it is important to emphasize once again that in marine rescues the prime function of the Department of National Defence is the co-ordination of activities through the rescue co-ordination centres. In each of the recent marine incidents on the east coast mentioned by the hon. member the rescue co-ordination centre has responded promptly, as soon as it was made aware that vessels were in distress.

I am certain that the hon. member is aware that it is primarily vessels from other government departments and agencies which are used for marine rescue. A number of these vessels are on continuous patrol throughout the Canadian east coast area, and they are prepared to assist immediately, on notice.

There are also a number of vessels belonging primarily to the Ministry of Transport based at various harbours of Newfoundland, whose prime function is marine search and rescue.

Although my department's main responsibility and primary function is the co-ordination of marine search, we also provide an air search capability, but we can only do that whenever weather conditions make this possible. A review of events in the past three rescue attempts shows that the search by air was delayed on two occasions by weather, and on one occasion by darkness. The fact that the aircraft were based at Summerside had no bearing on the time they joined the search.

As I mentioned before, Canadian Forces Base Summerside appears to be the optimum location for search aircraft as it is the hub of the area of responsibility. In a previous adjournment debate the details of the search for the vessel San Juan were recorded in Hansard for February 26, 1976, and a review of events of that search will show that the department's rescue co-ordination centre acted in a prompt and responsible manner, as it has on many previous occasions.

I believe that the hon. member will agree with the statement made recently in the House by the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) when he was speaking of the Department of National Defence and of the work of the Ministry of Transport in search and rescue. He said that on many occasions these departments have helped and have in fact saved lives. I hope that that will be recognized and reflected back to the constituents of the hon. member. I should like him to look more often at the times airmen have gone out in adverse weather conditions and have in fact achieved rescues, rather than point out—I know it is his main responsibility to do so but unfortunately it does not reflect favourably or fairly on some Canadian forces personnel—those times when we are unable to effect a rescue. On average the work of our Canadian forces is, I think, of a very high standard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED ROYAL COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. There can be no matter more urgent and nothing more necessary than that the public be assured beyond all doubt or suspicion that justice in Canada is duly and impartially administered, and that the judges charged with this duty are free to perform it without interference or the merest suspicion of interference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: A challenge against the freedom and independence of the Canadian judiciary is equally a challenge against this parliament and the constitution. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That subject as hereafter stipulated, the Governor in Council forthwith appoint a royal commission with full powers to inquire into and report upon allegations of interference, by the executive authority or other persons, with the due and impartial administration of justice, with particular reference to the report of the Honourable Mr. Justice Kenneth C. Mackay to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada of February 20, 1976, but that such terms of reference be first submitted upon government motion within the next five sitting days to this House for debate and subject to amendment, such proceedings not to exceed one sitting day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, while we certainly would have supported that motion, and we so indicated, the motion I intend to move is different because it is under a different law, and I hope the government side will not react in the same way.

I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering the seriousness of the charges made by Judge K. C. Mackay of the Superior Court of Quebec that there has been prevalent political interference with the course of justice by members of the cabinet, and considering that three specific incidents were cited by him, in order to clarify this situation and to assure the public that there is no political interference in our judicial system I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to establish forthwith a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act to investigate these serious charges.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED CONSULTATION ON TERMS OF REFERENCE AND NATURE OF INQUIRY INTO ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Since I am speaking in this rarified atmosphere, as my hon. friends said, possibly I am a pink Tory.

I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The foundation has been well laid for me by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken ahead of me. I therefore move the following motion, and I am sure it will be acceptable in the terms given, bearing in mind the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

In the light of the circumstances and the relationship of the ministers concerned to the government and the imperative need to have an unbiased, open and completely objective inquiry into the facts, and as Parliament is the highest court and original fountain of justice, this House urges the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to consult with opposition parties in the House as to the nature, terms of reference and character of the inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR SUBMARINE BASE AT BANGOR, WASHINGTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent and important matter.

In view of the decision of the American government to build in Bangor, Washington, a Trident nuclear submarine base whose power may suggest that the United States intend to establish there a first-rate striking force, which threatens to give a new impulse to the dangerous escalation of the arms race, and since the Canadian Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) has just stated that he was in favour of such a decision which, in his opinion, would prevent a nuclear war, when studies indicate that world-wide military expenses to ensure peace are expected to reach $300 billion in 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House examine right now the position Canada should defend on disarmament in accordance with the attitude already taken by our government on many occasions and particularly at the disarmament conference so that our country continue to play honestly an important role in the matter of disarmament, as the Canadian Association for the United Nations has just urged.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, therefore the motion cannot be put.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

SUGGESTED HOLIDAY FOR EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that today is the 100th anniversary of the parliamentary library and this occasion will be celebrated tonight with a sitdown dinner and ball, and in view of the fact that, at a time of restraint, this "Freebie" is by invitation only to all M.P.s, Senators, and top echelon bureaucrats—easily recognized as the lowest paid workers in Canada, and in view of the fact that those who serve in making the library of parliament the successful tool it is, namely the library workers, are excluded from this bash, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House authorize one paid holiday, apart from those already statutorily granted for 1976, for those library workers not involved in tonight's bash to honour them for their role in making the library of parliament the success it has been in the last 100 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to put the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED CONSULTATION WITH OPPOSITION BEFORE ESTABLISHING NEW DAIRY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to put forward a motion on an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since the new dairy policy this government intends to announce has been established without any consultation with any political party of the opposition in this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

That the Department of Agriculture and the minister concerned take stock of the new dairy policy to be announced in April by systematic and serious consultation with each party of the opposition about the dairy policy, considering that the same minister said yesterday that all Canadians should give their opinion on this question and that not only the members of the Liberal party but also those of the opposition parties represent the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

PROPOSED REGULATION OF ADVERTISING WHICH ENCOURAGES SPENDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

Since advertising represents one of the most important factors of the cost of living increase in Canada, and since advertising through television, radio, newspapers and magazines encourage consumers to buy ever more and thus incite them to live beyond their means, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House take forthwith every necessary action to provide for some restrictions to apply to advertising urging to spend.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, while the manner in which the enthusiasm displayed by government members in turning down those three successive motions which were made this afternoon lead one to believe the government is so self-satisfied—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that it does not intend to answer any questions concerning this matter—

Mr. Sharp: Ask the question and you will get an answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I hope the Prime Minister may think otherwise. I ask him whether or not he believes in the complete independence of the judiciary from influence of cabinet ministers or members of parliament either directly or by subtle indirectness constitutes a cornerstone of the heritage of the administration of justice? I ask him, therefore, four ministers having been named in a press article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of today, will he be prepared to set up a judicial body, I would think of three judges—

Mr. Trudeau: Why not of five?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the Prime Minister say?

An hon. Member: Why not of five?

Mr. Trudeau: Or, why not of four?

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought I would keep the number smaller, so that the Prime Minister would understand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Or, what about one?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and not compose of judges in the province of Quebec, because it would embarrass them to be on such a commission.

Mr. Trudeau: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are these interruptions of the Prime Minister? He is the protector of the rights of parliament, and he is interrupting on this matter.

Mr. Trudeau: What is wrong with judges from Quebec?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he afraid of an investigation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Assuming that he is not, for the sake of argument, I ask him, will he set up such a commission at once, to clear away this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not basing my answer on what the right hon. gentleman says. I think what he said about the judges of Quebec is not relevant to this subject. I am not basing it, either—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to embarrass them, by asking them to try a matter affecting one of them.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. member wants to ask a supplementary question before I have finished answering, let him ask it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am just pointing out that the interruptions are not one-sided.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister started the interruptions a while ago.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about what has been rumoured and stated, and because of that, I discussed with the Minister of Justice the substance of a letter which he received from Justice Mackay, and I am satisfied with the attitude he has taken.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I have to repeat the question. Naturally, the Minister of Justice desires to agree with anything, in order to protect his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Basford's getting up. Sit down, Basford. Three o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is obvious that the Minister of Justice is seeking the floor, to intervene on a question of privilege. The implications contained in questions and answers, at this stage, relating to what is a serious matter will only invite these kinds of interventions, which

I cannot consider until three o'clock. I would be grateful if both those hon. members putting questions and those answering would stick as closely as possible to factual remarks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I could not be more in agreement with you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE OF MINISTERS BEARING ON ALLEGATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I ask the Prime Minister, now, will he request all the ministers in question to produce all correspondence, office diaries or other records of events that bear on these allegations, and will he table such material?

An hon. Member: Innuendo.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret the innuendoes against the Minister of Justice contained in the question, just as I regret the innuendoes against judges of Quebec in the previous question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Against the judges of Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are no innuendoes. I am concerned about a different matter. I made no innuendo.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: What did the right hon. gentleman say?

An hon. Member: We heard what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have, on the basis of what I heard, discussed the matter with the Minister of Justice. A letter has been sent from Justice Mackay to the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice has looked into this matter. He has discussed it with me. I am satisfied, at this stage, that there is no need for an inquiry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: No allegations, substantiated allegations, were made, although some were made which were not correct in fact, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And which are they?

Mr. Trudeau: No substantiated allegations cause me to call for such an inquiry. If it can aid the House, I would ask the Minister of Justice to state what attitude he has taken.

● (1420)

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is a procedure in the rules with regard to ministerial statements. We would be delighted to hear a ministerial statement after the question period in the usual way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not an extraordinary practice for one minister, particularly the Prime Minister, to refer all or part of an answer to another minister. However, it is not a practice I want to impose on the House.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTERS MENTIONED IN ALLEGATIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Prime Minister turned down a request for an inquiry. Has the Prime Minister discussed the allegations made by Justice Mackay with the Minister of Public Works and the former Minister of Finance? If so, will he confirm that they were approached by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the contempt proceedings, what was said and what the purpose of the approach was for?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): If I may answer that, Mr. Speaker, I have, as the Prime Minister indicated, received a letter from Mr. Justice Mackay which contains some allegations. I would point out to the House before commenting on the correspondence that it is important to me and I have considered my position very carefully. If I may, I would refer the right hon. member for Prince Albert to Edwards on the Office of Law Officer under the Crown. He will find that the position of Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada is a particular and unusual position within our parliament and parliamentary system, one which is not subject to the kinds of influence that the right hon. member has implied.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: I have considered this position very carefully. It seems imperative for the independence of the judiciary and the proper maintenance of relationships between judges and chief justices and the office of Minister of Justice that letters from them to me should not embroil them in public debate. Therefore, I am going to be very limited in my comments on this or any other correspondence in this or any other case. I think that is essential for the administration of justice and the independence of the judiciary of Canada.

With regard to the three instances on which the hon. member for Calgary North has commented, I would point out that one relates to an incident in 1969 about which no complaint was received then or thereafter. The second involving Mr. Justice Aronovitch, apart from Mr. Justice Mackay's letter, I have received no information or complaint from the judge involved. Of course, the President of the Treasury Board has taken action relative to that. With regard to the third suggestion concerning the associate chief justice of Quebec, again no further information is in my hands than that contained in the letter and no complaint has been received by me.

Because of the letter in my hands, I have asked for explanations from my colleagues who, I may say, are outstanding members of the bar of the province of Quebec and know the laws of this country as well as any other member of the bar of the province of Quebec. I have, however, asked for explanations. On the basis of information supplied to me, I am not persuaded that any action should be taken by me at this time, except to communicate with the chief justice of the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: That was a Freudian slip, because I see him in the gallery, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: But I am communicating with the chief justice of the province of Quebec who, as you realize, Mr. Speaker, is the person principally responsible for the management of this court and for the maintenance of its independence. On the basis of the information I now have, I think it appropriate that I communicate with the chief justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the strangest answer to that question!

Some hon. Members: Oh!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I will turn, now, to another member of the cabinet, and address a question to the Minister of Public Works. In a letter to the Minister of Justice on February 20, Mr. Justice Mackay stated:

After Mr. Ouellet asked Mr. John Turner to intervene on his behalf with the judge presiding over the contempt of court proceedings and was promptly rebuffed, he approached Mr. Drury with more success, but, as it turned out, without the desired effect.

Would the Minister of Public Works tell the House whether he was approached and what kind of assistance he rendered?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): My comments on this particular case will, of necessity, be rather limited—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: —in that the case in question is currently under appeal. I think it would be only an irresponsible member who would try to persist in having an effect or influence on a judgment on appeal. As to the discussion I had with my colleague, both of us are lawyers, both of us are members of the Privy Council, and I think the House will understand that conversations of this kind are privileged; they always have been and I shall continue to regard them as such.

I had a conversation, also, with the association chief justice of Quebec, along, as I discovered, with a great many other public spirited citizens who had taken part in trying to effect a solution to a rather difficult and, to some degree, unprecedented problem. The hon. Mr. Justice MacKay has suggested that my intervention, whatever it may have been—and he does not make any suggestion as to what it was—did not have the desired effect.

An hon. Member: What was it?

Mr. Drury: I may say for the benefit of those who are prepared to listen that in my opinion the integrity, the independence, of the judiciary is critical to the successful running of a country such as ours and I both respect and admire this principle. If it were not for the fact that I consider the association chief justice of Quebec, whom I have known for a number of years, to be uninfluencible, in a pejorative sense, I would have refrained from intervening or from having any conversation with him. Indeed, the only intervention that would be contemplated by me would be one to see that he was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty. I did not attempt to influence the decision.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REASON FOR REFUSING PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Earlier, in his answers, the Prime Minister said that what we have been dealing with so far were unsubstantiated statements. I ask the Prime Minister, in all seriousness, whether or not he has considered the fact that the charges which have been made were made by a judge and that they are quite specific. In his original letter the judge in question wrote that there was "interfering with the course of justice", and then went on to say that it was "all too prevalent." He said that with specific reference to members of the cabinet. Considering that he made this general reference in his first letter and then, when asked to be more specific by the Minister of Justice in response, the same judge attempted to document this general claim by referring to three specific instances, I ask the Prime Minister, in the interests of seeing that justice be seen to be done in Canada, does he not think it appropriate to have a public inquiry into these three very specific charges made by the judge?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as in other cases where the opposition have demanded inquiries, I have not excluded them as a matter of principle. I have always answered that if the facts cannot be ascertained otherwise, and if it is in the best interests of the country and of justice, then we will have an inquiry. In this particular instance the hon. member is right; there have been some allegations. I have discussed them with the Minister of Justice. The House knows that, at least in the case of one allegation, it has given rise to a suit, or to a demand for retraction. I do not see it to be in the interest of this House or of justice at this time to set up an inquiry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or ever.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker. I think the course we are following is the correct one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is all wrong, and you know it.

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of Justice has investigated these charges and he has answered them in part in a letter that was published, without the minister being responsible for that. He has now taken the course of consulting with the chief justice of Quebec, through whom these matters should properly go. If the chief justice of Quebec finds he wants to pursue the matter, then we will pursue the matter in whatever way he suggests. At this stage I think the initiative taken by Justice Mackay has been dealt with by the minister in his answer in a way that satisfies me. However, I repeat that if the courts of Quebec, through their chief justice, have other views, we will be glad to hear them. I, personally, do not believe that an inquiry such as suggested by three members on the other side would be in the interests of justice in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will try to make my question brief. I want to make it clear that, speaking for my colleagues, we have not prejudged this case in any way. The issue is one of extreme seriousness. Following from what the Prime Minister has said, since one of the implications of Justice Mackay's letter is that there is continuing interference with the judiciary—I repeat that I am not necessarily agreeing, but that is the allegation—does the Prime Minister not think that by leaving the matter internal, even after careful consideration by the Minister of Justice and himself regarding an inquiry that presumably the Prime Minister is implying will be made by the chief justice of Quebec, keeping the matter internal like that and possibly reaching a negative conclusion, rather than establishing that innocence is beyond question, will result in everything remaining under a cloud of suspicion?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the suspicion certainly would not be what we would have wished. I agree that the charges are serious. I think I have indicated that I regret the way in which they have been made, and the way in which they have been made public. I believe these charges are a matter for the chief justice of the province of Quebec. It appears from the published correspondence that this is also his opinion. I repeat that the Minister of Justice, presumably through his officials, will communicate with the chief justice. Certainly, I want to make sure that we hear all sides of this matter before considering it closed.

Mr. Broadbent: You are judging your own case, aren't you?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not the chief justice, Mr. Speaker. We are asking the chief justice to look into the matter, which is the proper course for any judge who has a complaint of the nature and seriousness of the one that has been made.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister why he would not consider appointing the chief justice of the province of Quebec himself to head this inquiry and to conduct it in public, so that if innocence of all the people who have been charged turns out to be the case, which I genuinely hope will be the case, then it will clearly be seen to be so. Why will not the Prime Minister ask the chief justice of Quebec to conduct publicly such an investigation, instead of keeping it, I will not say secretive, but certainly private?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer that, it is because there is nothing in front of me that indicates there are any private communications to a judge for the purpose of influencing his decision, or that there have been actions to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice. There are certain procedures. If there is that sort of information, and if such attempts have been made, the person who would be in possession of those facts would be the chief justice of Quebec. That is the purpose of communicating with him.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY OF OTHER INCIDENTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, let me direct my question to the Prime Minister since we have become bogged down with only three instances. When one reflects on the letter of Mr. Justice Mackay dated February 20, one sees that he wrote "I can think of at least three incidents which in my view are unwarranted attempts to interfere with the judicial process". The obvious implication from that is that more than three such incidents may exist. Accordingly, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the House if he intends to direct or has directed the Minister of Justice to investigate the possibility of further ministerial interference with the judiciary?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the person in the best position, of course, to advise on that, in line with our tradition of the independence of the judiciary in this country, is the chief justice of the province, who is responsible for the management of his courts and for their independence and protection. If, of course, the chief justice has indications of that kind of influence from his judges, I have every confidence in the chief justice of Quebec to report those to me or to the proper authorities.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—PRIME MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope the Minister of Justice will be specific in directing his question to the judge in order to determine just what other instances he has in mind, if any. One last supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the Prime Minister's then principal secretary has been mentioned in this article, has the Prime Minister had a discussion with his then principal secretary as to whether there were any other interventions made by him, and has this discussion been since these revelations have come to his notice?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had a discussion with my former principal secretary. I did not ask him whether there were any other cases such as that alleged in the newspaper this morning.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—AWARENESS OF PRIME MINISTER OF VISIT TO JUDGE BY HIS PRINCIPAL SECRETARY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Justice Mackay has alleged in his letter to the Minister of Justice that in March, 1969, during the trial of the Trinidad students, he received a visit from the then chief executive assistant to the Prime Minister. Let me quote Mr. Justice Mackay: ". . . to put the trial off for a few weeks . . . He then told me to postpone my charge". Is the Prime Minister aware that representations, or if that is too strong a word, if a visit was to be made by his chief political aide?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware such a visit was to be made. I was informed after the fact that such a visit had been made but not with the purpose described in that letter which I am informed is not in conformity with the facts.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I think we are all hoping to accept the words, but I think we would be derelict in our duty if we did not try to clear up this matter. So I will ask why it was thought to be a wise course of action for the chief political aide—I like the expression "political aide"; it is an honourable combination of words—to see fit to visit a judge rather than have representations made on behalf of Trinidad or any other country through the normal channel of external affairs or the Department of Justice. Surely, this was an unusual course.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the visit was made without my knowledge. I was informed of it afterwards. In consequence, I discussed the subject with my then political aide. I am informed by him that the nature of the visit was not as described in that letter. I agree with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that these are serious allegations. I do not intend to just have a unilateral explanation of it either from one side or another. I think it is a fact that some allegations in Justice Mackay's letter have given rise to a denial. One at least is known—a denial by the President of the Treasury Board. I think the matter is serious enough for us to have it looked into by the chief justice who is in charge of the administration of justice. So far as we are concerned the matter is not ended until we hear he is satisfied.

I think it is important to underline, as the Minister of Justice said a few minutes ago, that he has received no complaints from two of the three judges who are mentioned in Justice Mackay's letter. Neither the minister nor his officials have received any complaints. If Justice Mackay has a complaint and it has been made public I think it should be investigated, but I am anxious to have it investigated in the proper way. The hon. member opposite says "my way". I would suggest that is perhaps an unwarranted slur on the chief justice. Whatever he does will not be my way.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY OF COURT ACTION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the disturbing allegations by a judge regarding certain ministers of the Crown and the statement by the Prime Minister and his government colleagues that no investigation will be held to clarify this matter, and that some ministers appear to be implicated by the release of those facts, will the Prime Minister advise the House whether he, himself, or a member of his cabinet will soon take legal action to clear those allegations which have been published in a rather regrettable manner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Once again Mr. Speaker, I have never stated there would not be an inquiry. I did say that, so far, serious allegations were published in the press, and the Minister of Justice of our government investigated those allegations and is satisfied at this stage that no action is called for on his part except consulting with the chief justice of Quebec who is responsible for the administration of justice in that province. I am sure he will want to decide for himself whether he should take further action and prevail upon the judges concerned to give him their sides of the story. It is important to point out, as the minister did, that two of the judges to whom Mr. Justice Mackay referred have never complained about anything, either to the minister or his officials or, as far as I know, to the chief justice.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Since there have been very serious allegations, to quote the Prime Minister, my question deals with a very specific point. Can the Prime Minister inform the House whether legal action will be or has now been taken by any of the ministers, and especially the President of the Treasury Board?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in this specific case, I have written a letter to the Prime Minister, and I would like to table it at this point in order to inform every member of the situation.

In 1971, I discussed with Mr. Justice Aronovitch the date of a judgment. Yesterday I spoke with him and he confirmed to me that at no time did I try to influence his decision. He confirmed it to one of my assistants. Before sending my letter to the Prime Minister I read him a copy of the letter I had written, and he confirmed that it was true to fact. Therefore, this morning I asked my lawyers in Montreal to advise Mr. Justice Mackay to kindly withdraw, to apologize, because I feel he has been misled voluntarily or involuntarily, and I hope that within three days he will make the appropriate retraction.

At no time, Mr. Speaker, did I try to exert influence on a judge. I have been a member of the bar for 15 years and I practiced law during a number of years. I exercized every caution to find out whether in the circumstances I could act as I did. What was involved there was an industry shut down in Grand-Mère affecting 350 employees. I was trying to get people to replace the jobs lost in my constituency. I acted in my capacity as member of parliament for a constituency faced with a 16 per cent unemployment rate, and I do not believe I have to apologize to anybody for trying to fulfill my responsibilities as a member of this House for Saint-Maurice.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister seeks, I take it, to table a letter to which he has made reference. The Standing Orders permit a minister of the Crown, of course, to table any document to which he has referred in the course of debate or discussion in the House which relates to his particular administrative responsibility. This probably would be an exception. I presume, however, that the House might want to give its consent to the tabling of the document. However, it ought to be sought. Does the minister have the consent of the House to table the letter in question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would like to say that I also asked my legal advisers to consider the possibility of instituting proceedings against the newspaper that published allegations based on hearsay rather than on specific charges.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman not take into account the fact that the issues have already been clearly drawn in this matter and either the allegations made by Mr. Justice Mackay are wrong, in which event there is some doubt about his competence to continue to hold his position, or they are right, in which case there is some doubt as to the propriety of the three ministers to remain where they are. Will he take that into calculation and do something to remedy this intolerable situation, because after all the public are more important than the right hon. gentleman and myself. They are entitled to have a full, unbiased and quite open examination of the allegations.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right; there is this choice to be made. If the decision comes on one side, indeed, it will not be a good thing for the ministers. If it comes on the other side, it will not enhance the reputation of the administration of justice, and that is why I am not certain it is in the public interest at this stage to have a full inquiry.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Trudeau: Because I am trying to indicate to the House that in our view the proper course would have been for Mr. Justice Mackay to speak to the chief justice who would have communicated with the deputy minister of justice, and he would have looked into these facts in the proper way. Already there is a demand for withdrawal by one of the ministers. The House knows that I was mentioned in one of those letters, and since there has been no question to me about my involvement, I suppose the judgment of the House is that Justice Mackay did not have any great cause to put me in his letter, even though it did warrant a picture of me on the first page of the Globe.

I think it should be obvious to hon. members that there may be more which should be looked into by the chief justice before the government makes a decision on this, and I know the House and the country will not forget about this incident. It is just a matter of following the proper procedure, which we are convinced we are doing.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY ADVICE OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE SOUGHT BEFORE PRIME MINISTER'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY VISITED JUDGE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, surely now that we have had one minister's piece of correspondence tabled, we should have them all tabled.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lawrence: However, bearing in mind that while the Prime Minister is right that the judiciary has a role to protect our fundamental freedoms, surely this parliament has a primary role over that, not only to protect our fundamental freedom, but also to protect the freedom of the judiciary itself, which is something it may not be able to do.

Getting back to the 1969 incident, Mr. Justice Mackay stated further in reference to the alleged intervention in the trial by the present hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde)—this is in relation to the Trinidadian students—that the then minister of justice, John Turner, and I quote: "was apprised of the Lalonde incident" and that "he too, being a staunch defender of judicial independence, was deeply shocked."

Mr. Alkenbrack: Was that before his intercession on behalf of Sky Shops?

Mr. Lawrence: Can the Prime Minister inform the House if the opinion of the then justice minister was ever sought by any member of the Prime Minister's office before Mr. Lalonde contacted Mr. Justice Mackay?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lalonde, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, informed me that he did not discuss the matter with the then minister of justice. I understand that Mr. Turner has also denied that he had been consulted about it, and I fail to see why the hon. member would repeat in the House an allegation relating to a former minister who has denied that it ever happened.

Mr. Lawrence: The answer is simple: because we don't know the facts, and we are not getting them today either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: However, if that is the case, as the Prime Minister has just indicated—and I am not denying it—can the Prime Minister then explain to the House why the contacting of a superior court judge on a matter such as this by an aide within his own office was authorized without first seeking the authorization of the then minister of justice?

Mr. Trudeau: It is difficult to see how it was authorized if no authorization was sought.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Lawrence: I merely wanted to ask him why it was not sought.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY VISITED JUDGE ON OWN INITIATIVE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a question directly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I think in a statement he has made it absolutely clear that at the time of the trial of the Trinidadian students he did, in fact, visit Mr. Justice Mackay for some purpose or other. His account varies a good deal from Mr. Justice Mackay's account of what happened, and I also understand the Prime Minister to have said that he did not go on his instructions, although he was working in his office.

I ask the minister to tell us now if he went entirely on his own initiative, or who instructed him to go to see the justice at that particular time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think previous practice has shown us that for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to attempt to answer that question at this time would be infringing a clearcut rule of this House that he was not at that time acting in his current capacity as a minister of the Crown at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question can be quite properly directed to the Prime Minister, under whose responsibility that office was then and is now.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the question I put was a question of fact directly within the knowledge of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I suggest that this House has the right to hear from him on whose instructions he made the visit which he made. With all due respect, I fail to see why that question is in any way improper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister may seek to make an answer to that question, or as has been the practice in the past, to suggest that he might refer it to the current or former minister. That is the privilege of the Prime Minister, but the question clearly cannot be put directly to the minister in his former capacity.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add much to what I said earlier, but it is true, as the present minister says, that he did seek Mr. Justice Mackay to talk to him at that time about a trial of students of Sir George Williams University in Montreal—

An hon. Member: Who authorized it?

Mr. Trudeau: —and that he did it at the request of a foreign government which wanted to know something about the trial and how it was proceeding. Mr. Lalonde informed me that the only matter which arose between him and the judge was as to the date at which the judgment would be rendered and that no other matters, such as those alleged in Mr. Justice Mackay's letter, were raised between them. It was merely a question of knowing at what approximate date the trial would end.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS RETURN FROM HOLIDAY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that some of these extraordinary allegations involve the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), may I ask the Prime Minister if he, his Minister of Justice or any member of his cabinet or staff have been in touch with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who I understand is on vacation in Mexico? Have the views of the minister been determined, and in view of these extraordinary allegations is it the intention of the Prime Minister to order the immediate return of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Public Works indicated a moment ago, the contempt of court case in which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is involved is now being appealed. There are no allegations of which I know made by Mr. Justice Mackay beyond the fact that there have been contempt of court proceedings. I do not know if the minister has been apprised of the contents of this morning's newspaper. I know of no need to apprise him of that. There are no new facts alleged there. I am sure somebody at some point will tell him what is going on and what has been written in the newspaper, and he probably will be informed. Perhaps the new Leader of the Opposition who is also taking a vacation in Mexico, I understand, might tell the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DECISION ON PAYMENT OF LEGAL FEES OF MR. HOLDEN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will get back sooner or later. May I ask the Minister of Justice if he has been in touch with his colleague on this matter?

May I also ask him at the same time if a decision has been reached with respect to the legal fees of the special prosecutor, Mr. Holden, or does the minister hold to the view of his deputy minister that he should look to the sugar companies for his fee?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yes, the decision has been made. It was made some time ago. It is contrary to the Financial Administration Act or the Department of Justice Act to pay those legal fees in the way that is being suggested.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please—

Mr. Basford: I am sorry. There was another part of the question which I forgot. No, I have not been in touch with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs this week on the matter. There is no reason for me to contact him with regard to the contempt proceedings which are before the court at the present time, and he is not involved in these three other allegations.

● (1500)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the question period, when the Prime Minister suggested a statement might be made by the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton objected to such a statement being made during the question period. A moment later the hon. member for Calgary North asked the Minister of Justice a very specific question about a conversation between the Minister of Public Works and the Hon. John Turner. The reply of the Minister of Justice was not a reply to that question at all; it was a reading of a prepared statement that dealt with the three cases referred to in the letter of Mr. Justice Mackay.

I suggest, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that during the question period we had a statement by the Minister of Justice. I also suggest that when the President of the Treasury Board answered a question, he dealt with a matter that had nothing to do with his responsibilities as President of the Treasury Board and, added to that, it was a statement. The Minister of Public Works also made a statement about the whole matter. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the rights of the opposition have been interfered with by this practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In fact, we had three or four lengthy statements by ministers during the question period, and when we reach the point in our proceedings for statements by ministers, replies by the opposition should be allowed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice on the same point of order.

Mr. Basford: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I appear to have transgressed the practice of the House and the rules that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred to. I regret that I have been labouring under the impression that the purpose of the question period was to elicit information. I regret that my answers apparently have contained too much information for the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton on the same point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was the one who raised the question of ministerial statements. I would ask the Minister of Justice whether in the course of consideration of this matter over the next 24 hours he would consider very carefully the answers that have been given by the ministers involved or on behalf of ministers involved. I refer particularly to the Minister of Public Works who indicated that he had made the Justice aware of the full facts of the case. I think that is as close a quote as I can get. By any stretch of the imagination, lawyer or layman, that is an interference with the course of justice. Will the Minister of Justice examine all these questions overnight and be prepared to come to this House tomorrow and make a full and frank statement on motions, when there will be the complete right of this House to properly examine the matter in a way far beyond the question period?

Just before we finish this part of our proceedings, I would think it is incumbent upon the minister as well to inform the House what his intentions are with respect to any investigation that may be made by the Chief Justice of Quebec. I hope it is not the decision of the minister that the Minister of Justice or this government are necessarily bound by the results of any investigation by any person outside this House, whether or not that person is the chief justice of any province of Canada.

The Minister of Justice, as he said himself, has a very big and very important responsibility with respect to this matter, and a duty to report to this House that the Chief Justice of Quebec or of any province does not have.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on the same point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I am going to conclude by most seriously urging a couple of ministers to use the rules as they exist at this time in our proceedings to make statements on motions as they are entitled to do. The course of action that the Prime Minister has indicated the government is going to take in this matter makes it clear that at this point he has decided it is not going to be publicly discussed or publicly investigated. I think that is rather a mistake, but that is his decision.

Mr. Trudeau: It is not my decision.

Mr. Broadbent: By not having statements made in the House, particularly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and also the Minister of Justice, to explain on the one hand their past actions and on the other their present course of action is a mistake, I think, and is a disservice to the House and to the public. In speaking on this point of order, I urge these ministers to make a statement on motions for the following reasons. The Minister of Justice has indicated that he is looking into the allegations made by the judge, and on the basis of some kind of consultation he has concluded that the only course of action that is proper is to refer the matter to the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec. I suggest that the only ground I can see for his reaching that conclusion is that he has accepted the word of the Minister of National Health and Welfare over the word of the Justice who made the original allegation.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Broadbent: That is an extremely important point. Surely, as a minister of the Crown in a political party whose integrity in this case has been questioned by a particular judge, he has a responsibility to explain to this House how he reached the conclusion that all he had to do now was refer the matter to the Chief Justice of Quebec. I think this is extremely important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Second, I think it is important that the Minister of National Health and Welfare—and I understand Your Honour's previous ruling on this matter; he was not a minister at the time he took the course of action that the judge said he took—as a minister of the Crown now would have a right under the rules of this House to get up and make a statement clearing up for the record the role he played and under whose instructions he acted; if he did not issue instructions to the judge in question, what he did; what was the nature of his position; if he acted under the request of a foreign government and acted on that request to interfere with the judicial process in this country. It seems to me he should have an explanation to present to the House to justify that course of action as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Finally, then, I think ministers should get to their feet and make a statement to the House that would provide a clear explanation of the conduct of those charged.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you move on, I simply rise to say I was quite serious in my point of order that statements of ministers have been made and at this point, whether they are prepared to make further comments or not, the rules should apply and opposition members should have a chance to reply to those statements.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the original point of order concerned with the answers given by ministers during the question period today. I am sure he knows full well, as do other hon. members, that there may be comments on the length or nature of replies given by ministers during the question period. That, surely, cannot be translated into surrounding them with a nature that makes them into a statement by a minister during that period of time. If such an attempt were made by a minister during the question period, I am sure the objection would be loud and long and what constituted a statement would have to be deferred to an appropriate time during orders of the day and would not be permitted during the question period.

Certainly no such objection was forthcoming during the question period. I cannot now place upon those answers that kind of character, any more than I could on other occasions make those kinds of rulings during the question period to change the character of an answer or in fact of many of the questions that are put.

The other point of order is one urging that ministers come forward and make statements on this subject. That point has been well made, but there is no ruling that can be made by the Chair in respect of this kind of representation.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I fully support the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am one of the members involved. I put my first question as well as my supplementary directly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) already mentioned, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) thought it proper to answer with material he had on hand, just as if he was making a declaration under the Standing Orders of the House. I was allowed to speak on two occasions only, and after the President of the Treasury Board made his declaration, which I do not contest, I was no longer entitled to put a supplementary concerning an answer given by the minister, when I did not even ask for it. Mr. Speaker, I feel that our rights are violated on this matter, that both the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) were absolutely right. The ministers try to evade the issue by making statements when and where they wish, thus preventing the opposition from shedding light on such questionable issues as those we are discussing today. Either we are allowed to ask questions, or we are not.

● (1510)

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is not an answer period; it is a question period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think I have the right to point out that early in the question period several members tried to raise points of order. I got up myself. Your Honour said you could not entertain points of order until three o'clock. Then, when I raised my point of order at three o'clock, you said it should have been raised previously, which is what I had tried to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should be fundamentally clear on what has taken place. Extensive, lengthy questions were put to ministers from the beginning to end of the question period. In every case, questioners were permitted latitude to ask lengthy, detailed questions. Similarly, latitude was allowed to ministers in making their responses to lengthy questions. If I were now to make the interpretation that such lengthy replies ought to have been made by way of statements on motions, that might constitute a criticism of the ministers. To go one step further and say that they in fact constitute a statement on motions would, it seems to me, fly in the face of our Standing Orders.

Question No. 4,115—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,891, what are the (a) names (b) addresses of the head offices of companies which are in tax arrears?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): The provisions of Section 241 of the Income Tax Act with respect to the communication of information do not permit the Department of National Revenue to provide an answer to this question.

LIP—MONEY RETURNED FROM CONSTITUENCIES

Question No. 4,125—Mr. Whittaker:

1. Was money returned to the Local Initiatives Programme from constituencies and, if so, from which ones and, in each case, in what amounts?

2. Did any constituencies receive additional funds from the Local Initiatives Programme and, if so, which ones and, in each case, in what amounts?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1 and 2. Please refer to the L.I.P. 75/76 Allocation Process tabled in the House of Commons by the Hon. Robert Andras on February 9, 1976.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 80, 81, 82 and 83?

COPIES OF ALL DOCUMENTS RELATING TO SUBSIDY OF BOAT CONVERSION

Motion No. 80—Mr. Marshall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of minutes of meetings, letters, telegrams between the government and the Province of Newfoundland as it relates to federal-provincial cooperation to subsidize the conversion of boats for other fisheries.

[English]

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, almost every activity the government is involved in includes some sort of discussion with the provinces during the formulation, development or implementation of policies and programs. The release of documents exchanged during the preliminary discussion phase related to policies and programs would very probably be detrimental to the future conduct of federal-provincial relations. I would therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Marshall: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

COPIES OF ALL DOCUMENTS RELATING TO REGULATIONS OF THE FISHERIES LOAN BOARD

Motion No. 81—Mr. Marshall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all minutes of meetings, letters, telegrams between the government and the Province of Newfoundland as it relates to amending the regulations of the Fisheries Loan Board to reduce the down payment required to purchase new engines, electronic equipment and used fishing vessels, arising out of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Inshore Fishing.

[English]

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the government has no papers as they relate to this motion. The committee referred to was a committee of Newfoundland House of Assembly and the recommendation dealing with amending the regulations of the Fisheries Loan Board is identified in the report as a policy recommendation within the provincial domain. I would therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, for the reasons stated with regard to motion for the production of papers No. 80, and as the matter involves the maritime provinces and Newfoundland and the question should have been changed to involve the Atlantic provinces, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, for the same reasons stated in motion for production of papers No. 80, I would ask that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

FILING OF OBJECTION RESPECTING PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), Battle River (Mr. Malone), Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), Red Deer (Mr. Towers), Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustement Act, chapter E-2, RSC 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Alberta.

If the House agrees, I would suggest we follow past practice and print the text of the objection as an appendix to this day's Votes and Proceedings. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which really relates to the business of the House. I am referring to the electoral boundaries matter. I understand there is some question about the interpretation of section 20 and an amendment to that law. I do not have it in front of me. There is a question as to whether debate shall commence within the time set forth in the subsection and if certain rights are to be preserved thereby, or if debate must be commenced and completed within the time set forward in the act.

I understand that opinions will be obtained as to the interpretation of the matter. I raise it now because it is of concern to the government House leader and may affect the programming of government business. I wonder if this matter could be taken as notice. Perhaps we might look into the matter, particularly into the interpretation of the relevant section, as this matter may affect greatly the business the hon. gentleman opposite may put before the House. It could also affect the petitioners who signed. There is some question about the matter.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thank the opposition House leader for bringing the matter to the attention of the House. I am aware of the uncertainty, which is being investigated. I hope to have an answer soon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ANNUAL INCREASE IN PER CAPITA COST OF INSURED SERVICES UNDER MEDICAL CARE PLANS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-68, to amend the Medical Care Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock yesterday evening I told the House that the previous minister of national health and welfare said the cost of health services had risen so rapidly in Canada in recent years that three alternatives were imminent: first, the standard of health care available could be reduced; second, tax premiums or deterrent fees could be raised even higher; third, ways had to be found to restrain the growth of cost increases through the better operation of the health service structure in existence.

I know the government will probably say that Bill C-68 achieves the last goal, to restrain the growth of cost increases. I am equally sure the members of this House who have spoken on this bill and others who will speak are convinced that Bill C-68 leaves open the potential for the other two options, reduced health services and increased taxes and premiums. Let us look at what is happening in Ontario, for example. The government announced last June that ceilings would be put on federal involvement in medicare. Bill C-68 has been introduced and the government of Ontario has found it necessary to begin a program of hospital cutbacks, including closure of a number of the smaller rural hospitals.

While on this point, it has been brought to my attention that the leader of the provincial Liberal party has been moving across the province speaking about the heartless actions of the present Queen's Park administration. If he were really honest and sincere in this matter, he would be making his appeals here and launching protests with his confreres regarding their cutbacks in medical costs. This has a vital bearing on the whole question of the provision of health care including hospital care in the province of Ontario.

I would like now to question the basic premise of Bill C-68. The government has admittedly introduced Bill C-68 in order to encourage economies in medical and health care. This bill, however, has no way of ensuring this. Nothing in the bill stops the provinces, for example, from improving their health care services and nothing stops doctors from demanding salary increases. Actually, all this bill does is ensure that if either of these two events should occur, the provinces will have to pick up the extra cost either in the form of increased premiums or from provincial revenues. In short then, if costs still continue to rise, and they probably will, the provinces will be faced with three alternatives: first, to set aside other necessary programs so that the provincial treasury can cope with the extra burden; second, to increase premiums to offset increased costs; third, if they cannot meet the budgetary restraint, medical services will have to be reduced. These are three very unhappy alternatives, to say the least.

Bill C-68 is following basically the 1969 task force recommendations concerning the need to face up to rising health costs. Unfortunately, the government's action has put Canadians in a situation where they are faced with the two alternatives that the minister's predecessor rejected outright as not alternatives at all, that is, reduced health care services or increased premiums and/or taxes. In other words, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has put the provinces in a position where if medical costs increase at a rate greater than that allowed by the 1975 ceilings, the provinces will be forced to seek those very solutions that the federal government foresaw as unacceptable and undesirable in 1969.

[Mr. Patterson.]

As we are all aware, the British North America Act does not make any provision for cost-sharing practices between the federal and provincial governments grounds for being in the health field, except possibly under the peace, order and good government residual clause of the BNA Act. Both cost-sharing and federal involvement are the result of convention and the ongoing process of developing Canadian federalism. The practice of cost-sharing, not only in health but in education, welfare and other areas, has helped to maintain national standards. As well, the very principle of co-operative federalism has become one of the unique and distinguishing features of our nation's federal structure. The government's five-year notice for its withdrawal from the present hospital insurance plan, and the imposition of ceilings on contributions to medical insurance threaten both the principle and practice of co-operative federalism.

I would draw to the attention of the House that in the initial move in this direction the federal government insisted on introducing the plan. I well remember the controversy at that time. The rumors, and I do not think they were ever refuted, were that the government was just about at the point of letting the whole plan drop. It was suggested that they make a try with one province. The premier of that province came to Ottawa. Almost hilariously, the government announced that approval had been given and the program would proceed. Therefore, it was at the instigation of the federal government that this plan was initially put into operation.

As far as I can understand, the promise was given without any qualification that the federal government would pay an average of 50 per cent of the cost. I do not think it was an over-all 50 per cent for each province. It was more of an average, with the result that some provinces did not receive 50 per cent while others did. In any event, the federal government promised, without qualification, to pay an average of 50 per cent of the cost. In view of the fact that the federal government instituted the plan and placed pressure on the provincial governments to participate in it, they should be duty bound to continue the formula until a program is in place which is mutually satisfactory to the federal and provincial governments.

Lower cost service programs should be in place before we contemplate any reduction in present medical services. This can only be accomplished by adequate consultation and effective co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. This consultation and negotiation is absolutely necessary in the circumstances existing at the present time. In conclusion, the federal government is duty bound to co-operate with the provinces until a satisfactory solution is found. When the provinces agree on a formula that is fair and equitable, possibly then the federal government can move in the direction proposed in this legislation. However, it is morally wrong for them to do so before this takes place.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in support of my colleague's amendment which calls on this House to hoist Bill C-68 for a six-month period. This is a very reasonable amendment. It would give the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his provincial counterparts time to get together to discuss the whole question of how best to deliver health care services to the people of Canada.

We have heard a lot in this House about federal-provincial co-operation and about how the consultative process works. We have hear very often in this House about the consultative process at work. That is co-operative federalism, my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) tells me. We in this corner of the House support that concept. That is the nature of confederation; it is getting together and agreeing among ourselves. That is the way we govern ourselves in this country. There can be no other way. When one party acts in a high-handed manner and makes decisions which place the second party to the relationship in a bind, what results is confusion and conclusions are reached off the cuff which interfere, in this case, with the proper delivery of health care.

I should like to take a few moments to deal with the situation in one province, the province of Manitoba, which believes that Bill C-68 is an insult because of the lack of consultation. Manitoba believes the bill to be fatuous and unnecessary because of the existence of the government's anti-inflation program. Surely the anti-inflation program ought to handle the problem which hon. members opposite are trying to solve by means of this draconian measure, Bill C-68.

In Ontario, as the minister well knows, we find decisions being made by the Tory government and by the minister of health of that province, Mr. Miller, who is going about the province trying to tighten up the health services in response to the threats implied in Bill C-68. We see headlines in the newspapers such as "Civic vows to fight cutback", "Exodus by top psychiatrists is seen after health care cuts", "Cutbacks worry mental health officials". Then we find Mr. Miller saying that for the time being there are to be no further hospital closings. Nevertheless, he held out the prospect that there might be more closures next year.

All this should concern us here because we have a responsibility to make sure that Canadians receive proper health care services. The actions of Mr. Miller have served only to estrange the community. They are resulting in high unemployment among workers where hospitals have been closed or beds eliminated. This is no way of dealing with any escalation in hospital medicare costs. The federal government stands condemned because by its actions it is encouraging the provinces to undertake these harum-scarum closures.

What is the government doing in the field of preventive medicine? What is it doing in the areas for which it has a responsibility for providing leadership—for example, in the area of industrial safety? I want to quote from a speech made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to the Mining Association of Canada on Wednesday, February 25, 1976. In that speech he had this to say about industrial safety particularly in the mines:

> We could, justifiably, improve mine safety. Our record is not good. According to a study by Labour Canada, there are more man-days lost through work-related injuries than through strikes. As well, on an all-industry basis, the number of fatal accidents as a percentage of the labour force has not only increased but is significantly higher—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hon. member is straying from the subject, which is an act to amend the Medical Care Act. Perhaps he could confine his remarks to the subject of the bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: With all due respect, Madam Speaker, I am thinking of what the minister himself said in the speech in this House on this particular amendment.

Mr. Lalonde: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that I have not spoken in this House on the amendment.

Mr. Rodriguez: I should have said I was thinking of what the minister had to say on the motion, Madam Speaker, not on the amendment. In the course of his speech, the hon. gentleman stated:

> On an all-industry basis, the number of fatal accidents as a percentage of the labour force has not only increased but is significantly higher—1.6 per 1,000 employees in 1974—than the all-industry average which is less than 0.2 per 1,000 employees. It has also been shown that about 85 per cent of these accidents result from human error.

If the government is so interested in controlling the cost of medicare, it should obviously be embarking on a program of industrial safety. As I say, the government has a direct responsibility for safety in the uranium mines of this country. We have known for a long time that the uranium mines at Elliot Lake have allowed the safety limit to be exceeded, that workers in the mines have been exposed to radiation, dust, and so on, to such an extent as to make conditions hazardous to their health. The government knew this, the provincial health minister knew it, yet they permitted those workers to continue to work in a hazardous environment, with the result that the men came down with silicosis, or in some cases lung cancer.

What I am pointing out, Madam Speaker, is that this resulted in a great burden to the taxpayer. It seems to me that members who sit on the other side have no excuse. They have done nothing about industrial safety in the mines over which the government has jurisdiction. Instead, they bring forward a bill such as we now have before us and say, in effect, "You fellows will have to cope as best you can."

The amendment which my hon. friend has put forward proposing a six months' hoist is a good idea. It will allow a cooling-off period during which the provincial and federal health ministers can meet once again in a spirit of co-operation, in a spirit of seeking a compromise which will allow for the better protection of the health of Canadians. Hiding behind this bill reducing federal participation in increased medicare costs amounts to an avoidance of the major issue. The government is failing to live up to its responsibility. The minister ought to take our advice and approach the provincial health ministers once again in an effort to arrive at a better solution to the problem. As I say, even in the area where the government has jurisdiction, namely, the uranium mines, it has failed to live up to its responsibility.

Even in the area of workers who work for the federal government, according to the latest report of the public service, 1974-75, there were 22,218 accidents, with a direct cost of over $7 million, not including the cost to medicare.

Of this figure of 22,218, over 10,000 were injuries in the Post Office Department, and almost 7,000 of those 10,000 injuries were disabling in nature.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. Again I must remind the hon. member that this bill is not a bill on industrial safety. The hon. member may make occasional references to industrial safety, but this bill is to amend the Medical Care Act.

Mr. Rodriguez: With all due respect, Madam Speaker, this bill deals with medicare and the participation of the federal government in the increasing cost of medicare. It seems to me that any kind of protection for workers which adds to the cost of the medicare program of this country is very relevant. I am saying the government has a responsibility to provide some kind of industrial safety program for their own workers so they do not become injured on the job. I am pointing out that in the Post Office Department there were 10,000 accidents in 1974-75, of which 7,000 were disabling, which means that the taxpayers of this country, through medicare, had to foot the bill.

I am suggesting that if the government were to embark upon a preventive program, we would not have to pay out of medicare this kind of expense. The government stand condemned by their lack of any program in this area. I say this is very relevant, Madam Speaker. The 7,000 disabling injuries in the Post Office Department had a direct cost of $3.5 million, not including the cost to medicare.

If the government does want to cut back on medicare costs, there are other ways of doing so. I mentioned previously that we do not have to put chronic care patients in active hospital beds at $200 a day. Surely it is not beyond the imagination of the government to find a less expensive way to treat chronic care patients. In northern communities like mine it is not necessary for a doctor to see every single patient who has suffered a scratch or a bite, or whatever it may be. We have never developed paramedics in this country so we can take care of that kind of thing. It seems to me that this whole business of slapping plasters on sores, of sticking your finger in the dike whenever you have a problem, as in this instance we have a problem with medicare costs, cannot be solved by bringing in a bill cutting back on the federal contribution to shared-cost programs, which forces everyone else down the line to do all sorts of stupid things and make illogical decisions regarding medicare.

It seems to me that this kind of legislation is not in the best interests of the Canadian people. Once more I suggest that the amendment of my colleague is a very wise one, one that would recommend itself to any logically-thinking person in the House. Therefore, I call upon the House to support the amendment that calls for a six-month postponement of this monstrosity known as Bill C-68.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, this bill will impose a particularly heavy, unfair and unjust burden upon the poorer provinces of Canada, upon the underprivileged and those in low income areas. When one speaks of the poorer provinces of Canada, my own province comes to mind. There is no way we can afford to maintain the level of health services we now have, which have been achieved under the existing legislation, if the present bill becomes law. It may be helpful to reconcile that statement with a few interesting statistical facts relating to the province of Newfoundland. For example, we have the highest birth rate, the lowest death rate and I believe the second lowest, if not the lowest, per capita income of all the provinces of Canada. We have taxed our people to the very limit of their capacity to pay. This is why I cannot conceive of the government bringing in a bill such as this.

When I look at the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who pioneered in this area when he was premier of Saskatchewan, I wonder what must be going through his mind. He knows the difficulty he had to introduce the program and to get acceptance of the principle of medicare in Canada. The arbitrary action that will flow from this bill will impose great injustice upon the people of Canada, because the government is drawing from this bill the authority to make arbitrary decisions. In so doing, Madam Speaker, the government is completely destroying the very concept of equality of health care services which, to the credit of the government, under the existing legislation is a model for the world, certainly for the western world. Only a few months ago the very distinguished United States senator, Senator Kennedy, came to Canada to examine our medicare plan and at that time he referred to the program that we have in Canada under the existing legislation as a model for the free world to follow. By arbitrarily imposing ceilings on the limit that the federal government can spend, this bill is imposing restraint upon the poorer provinces.

Perhaps one could argue that the best ceiling that could be imposed upon the lower income provinces is their own capacity to meet their 50 per cent share of the cost. No one knows better than the minister of finance of the province of Newfoundland, who has to bring in a budget within a few days, that he must place restrictions on medical care payments in Newfoundland in order to keep our own health care costs under the 50-50 agreement within line. I think that fact has been lost sight of.

In talking about restraint, Madam Speaker, we call to mind the current program of the government to cut back on spending generally, with the co-operation of the provinces. We talk of restraint within the federal government itself and about eliminating expenditures on Information Canada. Similarly, the provinces are asked to show restraint in their spending. As a contribution to the fight against inflation we have cut back on our hospital building program. We have eliminated the program to provide additional hospital beds. We have cut back on our program to provide additional roads. We have cut back on our program to provide additional schools.

In some provinces these matters are taken for granted. But in the low income and underdeveloped provinces of Canada the fact of the matter is that when restraints are placed on spending, it is not on the kind of extravagances we refer to and which are being cut back in the federal government's budget. Rather, we have to put restraints on the kind of essential services that the other provinces of Canada take for granted. Let me point out, for example, that the ratio of hospital beds per thousand population in the province of Newfoundland is by far the lowest in the country and considerably lower than the national average: it is 5.8 beds per thousand population.

The doctor-patient ratio in the province of Newfoundland is the second lowest in the country. I think perhaps it is lower in the Northwest Territories. In Newfoundland there is one doctor for every 937 people. Even these statistics are misleading because of the very wide dispersal of our population over an area of 153,000 square miles and the additional expenses that are imposed upon our province in its effort to provide minimum health care services for this widely scattered population. Naturally, the doctors tend to drift toward the large urban areas, leaving the people in the smaller outport, such as the fishermen on the coast of Labrador, without health care services apart from those provided by the provincial health nurses and, except in the more northern regions of the province, those provided by foundations such as the world renowned and well respected International Grenfell Association. As I say, these statistics are in fact misleading.

This bill gives the province a great deal of misgivings and a very deep concern about its ability to continue to maintain the level of services it has been able to achieve under the existing national 50-50 cost-sharing program. If this bill should become law, we will not be able to maintain the present level of health services because of certain indisputable facts such as the continued growth in population. Newfoundland has the highest birth rate of any province in this country. There is also the continual erosion caused by inflation and the escalation of our costs as a consequence thereof.

As I say, we have already taxed our people to the point, or perhaps even beyond the point in certain instances, of their capacity to pay. At the present time we have the distinction of having the highest sales tax in Canada. It is the highest by far. We also impose the highest gasoline tax on our people. We impose among the highest, if not the highest, income taxes on our people. Of course, there are other taxes as well which are not imposed elsewhere, such as taxes on fuel oil, and municipal taxes which have to be imposed by our smaller municipalities and, indeed, by my own city because of the very limited industrial base we have there. We have additional taxes such as those on fuel oil, entertainment, and so on.

I have already referred to the fact that unemployment continues to escalate. We continue to suffer more than any other province from the consequences of the recessionary situation that is now plaguing our economy. I dread the thought, but as this year progresses I believe our unemployment situation will become worse. There will be an even heavier burden upon the province in providing social assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan, because when we talk about these cost-sharing programs we are talking about a 50-50 situation whereby when costs escalate so far as the federal government is concerned, the same escalation takes place so far as the province is concerned and it has much less capacity to meet the escalation than the federal government with its substantial tax resources.

I hope there may be a disposition on the part of the government to reconsider the consequences of this bill. I find it very difficult to understand why the minister has not deemed it necessary to sit down and meet with his provincial counterparts, the provincial ministers of health, or failing a full-scale federal-provincial conference of health ministers why he does not hold a series of meetings across the country on a one-to-one basis so that the minister may have some idea of the inequities of the legislation now before the House?

This legislation will create problems for the greater provinces of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta, but it will create horrendous problems and injustices for the developing provinces, the low income provinces, especially the four provinces of the Atlantic region. That is why I hope the minister will reconsider this legislation. I certainly commend to the House the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to the effect that this bill not now be read a second time but that it be read a second time six months' hence. This would give us the opportunity we need to measure more accurately the impact of the bill upon the slow growth regions of the country, the poorer provinces of the country.

In closing, I should like to place on the record the position put forward at the last federal-provincial health ministers' conference by the province of Prince Edward Island, which is also the position of the province of Newfoundland. We did not participate in that conference due to circumstances beyond the control of our minister at that time. I refer to the August 18, 1975, conference held in Victoria. The following is the position of Prince Edward Island:

> The implementation of Bill C-68 would have a very serious effect on the level of health care services in P.E.I. . . . Our resources are severely strained to meet the rising costs with federal contributions under the present arrangement. Under the Turner proposal, the strain would very quickly pass the breaking point . . . Under the new proposal it will be difficult to maintain the present standards of health care services with no hope for ever attaining the national standard.

That is the position of Prince Edward Island and it is also the position of Newfoundland. I suspect it is also the position of the province of New Brunswick, the province of Nova Scotia and the Northwest Territories.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make some restatements which seem to me to be necessary. I must point out that the colleagues of my party who have taken part in this debate have already clearly indicated their basic objections to that bill. I will therefore state the essential points which seem to me to be so important that they should be brought forward.

We must understand that when the House considers such a bill the difficulties which are experienced are greater when there is a basic defect and I will explain. Since the provinces are mainly responsible for health, social welfare and family matters, it is always difficult and complicated to try to coordinate and plan matters and we can only get to their core if we consider them from all their angles and under their regional aspects.

And thus, having interfered for a long time in matters which should not properly be under its jurisdiction, the federal government sometimes gets tied up in quite inappropriate legislation. In my opinion, this is the case with this legislation, for in fact, Madam Speaker, why do not we give back to whom they belong the responsibilities in the matters under their jurisdiction. And if the federal government is collecting too much money through income tax and other levies, if it feels it has to interfere in issues which would normally be under the exclusive authority of the provinces, then let us make the necessary amendments and give back to the provinces the appropriate sums of money to help them meet their own responsibilities. That is what we should be speaking about rather than try to plan or coordinate the health services for the whole country.

Another point which I feel has been forgotten and on which we are not dwelling, or at least not enough, is the fact that by the very nature of the amendment proposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), a fundamental and obvious principle is questioned: Can we play with health? In this area more than in any other, should we not rather insist exclusively on the needs, and in no way limit ourselves to medical care, most of all under the fallacious pretext of material and financial considerations?

I find it abominable to suggest that expenditures can be curtailed in this area and potentialities of improvement must be limited in as essential a field as health. I believe the minister has not adequately considered the implications of such a move. Will it not result, for instance, in the fact that people will say: Well, it is too bad, but we cannot get the medicare we need because the law prevents us from spending such an amount of money in this field? Will this type of reasoning not lead a great many individuals of this country to wonder whether this inflation control does not finally mean the suppression of a number of citizens?

Madam Speaker, one can reach all sorts of conclusions when one questions as basic a principle as people's health. All the more so that I do not really believe that in a country as large as Canada, in an impossible country geographically speaking, we could find ideal formulas? How could we possibly settle in exactly the same way health problems in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, Quebec, British Columbia or Ontario? To think it possible, is in my view, to make the following judgment: We must leave it to each of these areas to administer efficiently the field of health and all we need do is favour each of these areas in the country so that they can provide adequate, appropriate and efficient care. Several hon. members in this House have mentioned for example that there is a lack of physicians in some regions. Elsewhere there is a lack of hospitals or clinical centres for example. One realizes there are so many disparities and there is so much diversity between the different areas that it is impossible to establish financial and monetary standards according to which the quality of care to be provided to ill people would be the least restricted.

This is why I am urging the minister and the federal government to consider the possibility of continuing negotiations with the provinces to come to an agreement which would enable them to get better organized rather than forcing them through financial control to go as far as to reconsider the expenditures to be made in this area. Can the province of Quebec for instance afford to prevent the increase in the number of physicians which should provide better service to all the areas of Quebec? This is an example but of course all other areas in the country face the same problem. It seems to me the federal government cannot allow that. Some people say that this is not what we are aiming at, that we are simply trying to prevent squandering and abuses. That is all very well but shall we forget in the process what is the very purpose of health care? I do not think so and this is why I believe this bill may bring health care to a standstill and impede the progress which should constantly be made in that field. In other words, it may jeopardize national health, nothing less.

That is why I am against this bill and I would of course have preferred an announcement by the minister that a formal agreement has been drawn up with the provinces, which would give them much more leeway to settle all the health problems for the benefit of all areas throughout the country. Solving these problems should not entail economic cuts but on the contrary applying to the field of health care the exceptional policy of unrestricted expenses to meet the public need and not to beat inflation. In other words, if there is an area which should not be affected by the fight against inflation, it is definitely health care. Since this bill is an anti-inflation legislation, I believe we are on the wrong course and the minister should seek another solution.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, it will have been of some use. I see that even now some of my colleagues across the way seem to be in great shape. I hope to hear them speak to Bill C-68 later on, Madam Speaker. I have already had the opportunity of speaking to this bill so I shall be rather brief.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. La Salle: I feel this is one of the best opportunities we could have of inviting the minister to reconsider his bill, to reconsider his position. What is important today is not the resignation my colleagues speak of, but Bill C-68. That is what is important!

So, Madam Speaker, having already spoken to this bill, and deplored the attitude of the government which seems to want it passed on the double, and knowing full well that, even as I speak to you now the provinces feel that this bill is anything but interesting for them, I believe that in the context of federalism whose advantages we tend to laud so readily, meeting the needs of the provinces and finding an equitable solution to allow them to co-operate fully with government are a matter of principal. But that is not the situation at the present time.

Yesterday, the parliamentary secretary, and I say I take advantage of this amendment, among others, which requests a six months' hoist. I have already asked the minister whether it might not be wise for him to have the unanimous agreement of the provinces, and a solution which may not be easy to imagine. I do not infer that the minister made no effort to get a positive reaction from the provinces,—but as he did not yet get their agreement, I think that as a representative of a political party, as a member of parliament, it is important to request a six months' hoist from the government and the minister responsible, to allow the minister and the provincial ministers of course to reach a fair agreement for all eleven governments. Moreover, the parliamentary secretary was saying yesterday that the federal government wants the provinces to indicate clearly what they intend to do in the next five years as regards medical and hospital care. We ought to know what the financial needs will be if we want to invest in less expensive services, and we cannot expect the government to supply money without knowing what are the long term projects of the provinces.

I think the federal government is fully justified in wanting to know how much the provinces are prepared to contribute, no doubt about it. I think it is the very reason why we request and support this recommendation to the House for a six months' hoist in the application of this legislation, in order to allow the minister to get what the provinces have apparently failed to give him, and to find a solution that the provinces need to know. I know very well that on April 27 and 28, I think, a federal provincial conference will be held, gathering the provincial ministers around the same table; the province of Quebec and other provinces will certainly make propositions and, considering the increasing costs, I wonder to what extent this issue was discussed.

The provincial ministers recognize that the cost will increase, so it is unthinkable to accept that this legislation freeze the federal government's share when we all know, and there is no need to repeat it, that the federal government invited and, in certain cases, forced the provinces to participate in this plan. Obviously, for a long time the provinces have been establishing goals, getting organized in the firm belief they could count on very generous assistance from the federal government; I would think they planned their objectives counting on the 50 per cent share which, until today, was unlimited. To what extent does the federal government have to correct abuses and waste? Maybe it did in some provinces. But to ratify a legislation which takes away, or rather allows the federal government to freeze its involvement, which leaves to the provinces the task of paying these increasing costs for reasons which may be beyond control, is unacceptable, we say, and it is for this reason that we ask the minister to reconsider his position and his decision.

Madam Speaker, I do not want to prolong the debate, but I feel that when we find that the agreement is not accepted by the provinces, in my opinion it is inconceivable, I would even say it is indecent that the government refuses to listen to the provinces and to find a solution. I wonder how the members of this government can refuse to listen to the provinces at this stage. We know perfectly well that the citizen's health is something essential. We agree that the government makes some efforts. We are aware of it. We recognize it, but we also recognize that it is impossible in such a short period on the one hand to prevent these eventualities, and on the other to embarrass the provinces and abandon them in a bad situation for which they are not alone responsible.

The involvement of the federal government was welcome by the provinces and by all Canadians, and we do not think, for the reasons mentioned by the minister or the government, that this legislation should be applied in the short term. We recognize however that the provinces are being placed in a very difficult position and, for that reason, I take the liberty of making my comments this afternoon, because I think the government should respect the desires and needs of the provinces. I suggest this government could cooperate more and coordinate the efforts of the provinces in order to ensure public health.

Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that I will support the amendment, because I am convinced it is imperative to wait a few more weeks, that is until April, when the provinces, with the federal government representative, will have a very special opportunity to reopen discussions on this matter.

And this is the question. Why does the government refuse to wait for this conference to discuss the matter and try to reconsider this federal government proposal? Why does the government want to call upon us to agree to this legislation whereas the provinces are quite willing to return to the bargaining table here in Ottawa, to renegotiate these agreements, trying to correct abuses that have taken place, one must admit. Subsequently, it would be necessary to assess in the light of discussions a formula that is acceptable to the provinces and that will provide the maximum of medical services to those who need them in this country.

This is, Madam Speaker, what I wanted to say in an attempt to bring the minister to these negotiations, to this opportunity of discussing with the provinces, by calling upon him to think seriously of the respect his government must have for the provinces. I also urge hon. members to ask their own government to consider the arguments put forward by opposition members in this House, who try to serve the interests of the Canadian society. This legislation is not more discriminatory for one category than for another, but we are looking for equity and justice for all Canadians as well as respect for the provinces that make up our country.

In these circumstances, Madam Speaker, I will conclude by asking and pleading with the minister to at least postpone the debates in order to enable the provinces to discuss the matter with him, to give them the opportunity to provide the minister with as much information as he may need, and his parliamentary secretary did outline this need. The provinces should be able to answer the federal government when it states its intentions. It is also the federal government's responsibility to be prepared to listen to the provinces' needs and obligations and not to reject its involvement that is required to provide good services to the Canadian people.

Madam Speaker, I hope the minister will take the time to reconsider his position, and in light of the arguments made in the House and those that will follow, I think this amendment aimed at delaying the application of this bill for six months is quite valid. Even if it were only two months, this would at least allow the provinces to come back and make the proposals they want and thus hope that the minister will pay more attention to the recommendations of the provinces. The opportunity is there at the end of April when the meeting could accomplish the objective we seek—refrain from placing the provinces in a straightjacket, as Bill C-68 will do, but rather being as open as when we had the participation which was certainly very generous on the part of the government, which was accepted by the provinces as a whole and by all Canadians. This allowed the provinces to provide better services, more generous care to Canadians. I think we cannot thus reduce care and services for selfish reasons.

I do not think that the government is prepared to do this, and I hope that my appeal and those of my colleagues will be heard by the minister and that provincial ministers who still expect a lot from the minister in charge in Ottawa will lend an attentive ear and the provinces will finally have the opportunity to be heard at the end of April before this legislation is passed. I, for one, will oppose it as much as I can as long as the provinces do not receive that answer to which they are entitled and as long as the federal government will not take its responsibilities vis-à-vis the people of this country.

[English]

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-68 as medicare in the area I represent is an important issue. Mine is an area of high unemployment. Its people are not the wealthiest. Before 1948 there was medical service for many areas of the north only when the minister's wife visited, when the visiting Hudson's Bay manager's wife or the service officer's wife applied a dressing or when a doctor accompanied a treaty on its annual visit to pay treaty dues to the Indians. At the same time they would X-ray people to see if they had tuberculosis. The doctor or nurse accompanying the treaty party would examine the people and the critically sick were flown to hospital. Families lived on the trap lines and it was a case of survival of the fittest, which explains the high mortality among people of the north, especially the children.

In 1948, after the churches and people in the north exerted pressure, nursing stations were established in some of the more isolated communities. Then, when the government paid people of the north family allowances, the people left the trap lines to send their children to school. This exposed them to illnesses which needed medical attention.

Community pressure made the government install radiotelephones. Without them it was impossible to summon help when someone was sick, it was impossible to get people from isolated communities to hospital, and medical service was irregular. Few aircraft served the north in those days and sometimes it took days, even weeks, to bring a person medical attention.

In 1966, Manitoba instituted the emergency landing airstrip program. It was not meant for aircraft in distress but for people who needed emergency medical help. Remember, these northern communities are not connected by a network of roads; they are mostly isolated. For some years we have tried to convince the federal government that the people of the north come under federal responsibility. The federal government says to the provinces, "Those people live in a province; you should look after them." I am not talking about treaty people; I am talking about all the people of the north.

Nursing stations set up in the north could provide only interim medical services. They were equipped with a couple of beds, were manned by nurses and were graced by a doctor who might visit once in six months. The situation has changed completely. Medical services provided at nursing stations have brought down the mortality rate of Indian children in the north. I pay tribute to those who serve at these nursing stations. Often, nurses at the stations do the work of a doctor.

Whenever I see a city ambulance rushing someone with a broken leg to hospital, its sirens blaring and lights flashing, I think of the people in my area of the north. Often it takes days for word to get to the outside world that a person is critically ill and needs medical help. So I think the government's cutting back on medicare contributions to the provinces is a step backward. The people of my area do not live next door to a hospital. There is not even a road on which you can drive a car or ambulance, if there is one. Some communities of 3,000 and more were not served by a doctor. The people of the north are now accustomed to medical service. We cannot take it away from them. We must provide medical service to people in remote areas; if we do not, mortality rates among northern Indians will again rise.

I am sure the people of the remote areas will not stand idly by and allow the federal government to do what it is trying to do. I hope this bill is defeated. I hope we can continue to supply medical service to the people of the north who must depend on the government for these services. It is the responsibility of the federal government to provide these services to the people of the north in general and the treaty people in particular.

I have spoken about the airstrip program. These airstrips were set up for emergencies in order to take people out of the area for medical treatment. However, along came the federal Department of Transport which said the airstrips could not be used for scheduled runs of aircraft. This meant that nurses in the nursing stations in many cases—I have mentioned this in the House before—actually had to pile up their patients until they could charter an aircraft to take them out. They did not have the funds necessary to transport a single person to hospital. This actually happened. I raised this matter in the House. Fortunately, someone took up the matter and before long money was provided and an aircraft could be chartered to bring out a person when sick.

This puts a great deal of responsibility on a nurse living in a remote area 250 miles away from a doctor. She does not have proper communication or other facilities. She has to decide whether a person requires emergency medical service or can he held for a couple of days until an airplane she must charter can be filled. This is asking too much of the nurses who man these nursing stations. They are doing a commendable job. However, they are not being paid as doctors; they are being paid as nurses to look after the sick until such time as they can be transported to hospital. This bill will cut back the contributions to the provinces. That cutback will be felt right down the line to hospitals in remote areas in the far month: they will also be cut back.

Over the past 20 years we have begun to see that there is a future for medical services and medical supplies in the north. It is hard to explain, but there is a feeling in the north that what we have accomplished in the last few years we will lose in a matter of two years; we will be right back to where we started. People are asking whether we can do something to upgrade our services rather than downgrading them.

I will not get into the other areas; they have been very well covered by my colleagues. I wish to emphasize again that we should not pass this bill as it will hurt our people, especially those in the remote areas where facilities are not now available. As Canadians, they deserve these services as much as anyone living close to medical facilities.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this amendment that the bill be not now read this day six months' hence, which is the same as killing the bill: and we make no bones about that. Before getting into my speech, I want to refer to some remarks I made in my first speech at second reading. I neglected to check Hansard. The Hansard reporters were probably accurate and I was not clear in what I said. On that occasion, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) asked me if I remembered the answer that Tommy Douglas, a former premier of Saskatchewan, used to give for the reason he did not introduce medicare from 1944 until 1961. In the course of that reply, in which I thought I was magnificent, I said:

> Mr. Speaker, I am glad my good friend the Solicitor General asked that question because he will need to rely on the history of Tommy Douglas and his fight with his own caucus and his own cabinet over not only medicare, but also capital punishment, and a few other items.

What I meant to say, and should have said, is that I wanted the Solicitor General and all members of this House to rely on the history of Tommy Douglas and the fact that he did not have to fight with his own caucus, cabinet and party, not only over medicare but also the abolition of capital punishment. I want the record to be clear that Tommy Douglas, as premier of Saskatchewan, did not have to fight with his own cabinet, caucus party over medicare, and certainly not the abolition of capital punishment. I suspect that is not the case with the Solicitor General and his cabinet colleagues over medicare, capital punishment or anything else.

I also want to refer to an interruption in the speech of my good friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), by a member of the official opposition. I think it was the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga). It could have been the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday); I am not sure. In any event, the interruption came from a member of the official opposition. When the hon. member for Broadview was speaking about the closure of hospitals in the province of Ontario, the hon. member from the official opposition made assertions about the province of Saskatchewan under an NDP government closing hospitals. I whispered to the hon. member for Broadview at that time that none had been closed under an NDP government. The hon. member from the official opposition then asserted, on a point of order, that one had been closed in 1972 and three had been closed in 1973, or something to that effect.

I now wish to advise hon. member of this House that since the return of health, welfare and prosperity to Saskatchewan under an NDP government in June, 1971, the Saskatchewan government has not closed any hospitals. I repeat, it has not closed any hospitals. As might be expected from a Liberal government, they always talk a good fight, saying how they have been in favour of medical and health care since 1919. However, when in power they forget their words, and their actions spell out what they do, as in this bill.

Under the late Mr. Thatcher, the Liberal government of Saskatchewan from 1967 on closed eight hospitals. On the return to power of the NDP in that province, all those locations were reopened as community health and social centres, attended by visiting physicians, health region nurses, social service workers and serving as a focal point for clinics, prenatal care, ambulance facilities, and so on. So those facilities have been reopened by the Blakeney government in Saskatchewan since 1971, though probably not on the same basis as before. Those are the ones that were closed under the Liberal government of premier Thatcher. I hope I have set the record straight in that regard.

Before I proceed to make further remarks upon the stupidity of the bill before us, I want to remind members of the official opposition as well as members on the government side that whereas Liberals have closed hospitals in Saskatchewan, hospitals providing eight or ten beds. I was intrigued to learn that a 61-bed hospital was being closed in Paris, Ontario, by a Conservative government. I always thought a 61-bed hospital would somehow be viable, to use a free enterprise term. I am awaiting an explanation of this from spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative party or their colleagues in the Ontario provincial government.

One of the results of this bill will be to force hospitals to reduce the number of personnel employed and curtail the number of beds available. This could mean the downgrading of what we all agree are already inadequate services being offered in many instances. The average cost of a hospital bed can range anywhere from $70 to $175 a day, depending on the care a patient needs, and I suspect these figures are on the low side. If there is to be any saving in that direction, and that is the main purpose of this measure, I am not aware of any proposals by the federal government to assist the provinces in augmenting the number of paramedics or other kinds of service—home nursing care, for example—which would reduce what we all know to be the high cost of running hospitals and, consequently, high expenditures by hospitals.

It is sometimes said there are too many people using hospitals and too many people occupying beds they do not need. I do not accept that proposition, but even if it is true, one can hardly blame the people who are in the beds, because patients do not put themselves into hospitals beds—it is doctors who put patients into hospital beds.

An hon. Member: Who makes them sick?

Mr. Benjamin: It could be the Liberals or the Tories.

Mr. Oberle: No. It is the NDP that makes them sick. We are all sick right now.

Mr. Benjamin: If those experts and oracles who operate in the Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as others outside government, who complain that hospital beds are being occupied by people who do not need them really have evidence to support what they say, I suggest they should urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take up the matter with medical practitioners.

Mr. Oberle: The minister looks sick now.

An hon. Member: Yes. He is throwing up.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not think he should take it up by way of a bill such as this and lay the onus on the provinces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He shouldn't take it up with a judge, either.

Mr. Benjamin: If the minister had been more thoughtful about hospitalization and medical care, he would have done a lot better if he could have persuaded his cabinet colleagues and his hon. friends in caucus that in a time of restraint, efforts to cut back, and so on, the very last item that should receive that kind of attention is the care available to those who are sick. There are many other areas which could be examined with a view to making cuts in expenditure.

I agree with government members who have derided the official opposition for the attitude it so often takes towards these matters. Members of the party to my right moan about too much government spending, but when one tries to pin them down to what they want to cut back, they don't come up with very much. Well, the Minister of National Health and Welfare could have about $200 million for sharing health costs with the provinces if he could persuade his colleagues in cabinet and in caucus to get out of the nonsense of NORAD, an organization which serves no useful purpose and is totally obsolete. One could go even further and suggest that the minister might try to persuade his colleagues, if not to withdraw totally from NATO at least to bring back to Canada the sitting ducks, the members of the Canadian forces presently in Europe—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Benjamin: —and give them a mobile capability which would permit them to be used in the proper way in the event of some nut pushing a button in Europe, or be used in a better way in connection with peacekeeping or to aid countries which suffer natural disasters. If this were done, the minister might be able to benefit from the saving of several hundred million dollars more which could be used to provide health, medical and hospital services for the people of Canada.

I will make a further suggestion. Whatever the total expenditure amounts to for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the seven years during which I have sat in this chamber, despite all it was supposed to do for the depressed areas of Canada, unemployment and poverty are even worse now—after seven years—than in 1968 and 1969. I suggest we should simply cancel that whole department. I would take some of that money to share with the provinces and compensate for money spent on hospital and medical services. The rest of it could be used at local, regional and provincial levels to combat poverty and unemployment much more efficiently than at present. Mr. Speaker, I think if we follow the three suggestions I have just made we could probably save $500 million or $600 million which the minister could share with the provinces so as to provide something which is a basic right for every human being, that is to say, good health services.

Let me select a few other items. I am not interested in the picayune ones of my hon. friends to my right, such as cancelling Information Canada. Out of a $31 billion budget, $14 million is not very much. The few odds and ends selected by the government make no difference whatsoever. My quarrel is not with how much is being spent but, rather, with how the money is spent and what the government's priorities are. Surely delivery of health services, the availability of hospital treatment and beds and such things as pensions should be the last item of expenditures that the government should attack in order to get maximum benefit out of the taxpayer's dollar.

If this legislation passes we will defeat the objective of another bill we shall be dealing with shortly, Bill C-83. This bill has to do with additional facilities for rehabilitation, psychiatric and psychological care, all of which play a goodly part in the crime prevention program and come under medicare. Quite often psychiatric and psychological services are the most expensive form of health treatment, so it would be logical to assume that this part of the security provisions bill is going to suffer if we pass Bill C-68.

Then I see the doctors are asking for a raise. Poor fellows! Since the government wants to hold down funding, who will have to pick up the deficit? Obviously, the taxpayers, particularly those who are sick, ailing and disabled who make use of medical services. The doctors of Ontario are seeking an 8.1 per cent raise effective May 1. That is within the guidelines. But one thing that the doctors or the administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board fails to tell us is that 8.1 per cent for a doctor earning $70,000, $80,000 or $100,000 represents a very nice increase. Since 8.1 per cent is within the guidelines, I bet my bottom dollar this increase will be approved. The worker, whether organization or unorganized, earning $8,000 or $10,000 a year, will be told—he will be rolled back, if necessary—that 10 per cent or 12 per cent is plenty for him. An increase of $800 is fine for the working stiffs under the guidelines. An increase of $8,000 or $10,000 for a medical doctor under the guidelines is also fine.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare wants to set a ceiling on spending and has served notice on the provinces that sharing by the federal government of the cost of these services has now reached its limit. Manitoba was not consulted about cost-sharing. In fact, that province makes the point that Bill C-68 has been superseded by the anti-inflation legislation and therefore this bill should be withdrawn.

In Saskatchewan, the federal government participates in the cost of hospitalization and medical care. Nevertheless, Saskatchewan is left to bear by itself the $6 million denticare program. The program is in its infancy, we do not have all the kinks out of it yet, but it took almost three years of hard work and planning and co-operation from the dental profession to get the plan under way and provide dental care for children up to 12 years of age. We hope to increase it by one year each so that eventually children up to 16 or 18 will be covered.

Then there is the Saskatchewan hearing-aid program which put an end to the chicanery and outrageous operations of some of the hearing-aid outlets. This program will now be borne by the people of Saskatchewan alone, through their government, to the tune of another $12 million. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, I am mistaken there. The pharmacare program is costing $12 million. There are so many good programs in Saskatchewan that I am getting my list out of order. All that any citizen of Saskatchewan pays for drugs is the dispensing fee of $2 under the pharmacare program. We are carrying the cost of this program without any sharing on the part of the national government.

The hearing-aid program in Saskatchewan will cost another $600,000 a year, and we estimate the cost will quickly climb to $1 million. In any event, there is upward of $20 million from those three programs that the province of Saskatchewan, historically leading the way for all Canada, is paying for itself and which the federal government should be sharing, not only with Saskatchewan but with all other provinces in this country.

Allowing for a 1.5 per cent increase in population, I say this is unfair to Saskatchewan, with its growing population. People are moving to Saskatchewan from other provinces. One of the principles behind cost-sharing between the federal and provincial governments is that no matter where a Canadian lives, his fundamental right to the best possible hospital and medical care should be available, whether he be living in a poor province, a rich province or a territory.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare says that the provinces should better the health of the people by introducing legislation covering seat-belts, industrial safety, control of alcoholism, drug addiction, and so on. While I invite the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take a look at the program in Saskatchewan, I also speak for the other provinces and programs such as Aware, the programs on alcoholism and drug addiction, and the amount of money that has been spent on these programs through the media, through lectures and meetings and whatever else that province is doing which I expect they are carrying on by themselves.

The minister can urge the provinces to do all these things in order to improve the health condition of the population, but in the meantime, what does he do? He goes on his merry way, defeating everything. Nothing is done about arsenic poisoning in Yellowknife, about mercury poisoning at Grassy Narrows, or about mining accidents. There is the misuse of dangerous gases and other substances that are federal rather than provincial offences. In addition, the minister does not say what the government is doing to enforce stringent measures in respect of many corporations in order to bring them to account. Instead, he tells the provinces to do more about improving the health condition of their populations. There he sits, I suppose counting his money.

Let me return to the situation in the province of Manitoba. That province is unalterably opposed to this bill. The province has not been consulted in respect of cost-sharing. In the spring of 1975 the minister made statements about a review of the cost-sharing formula and negotiations which were to take place. Then, without warning along comes the budget of the previous minister of finance with the notice of intention to withdraw from hospital care and to place limits on the governments' medicare contribution. The provinces, bless their hearts, wanted to have a meeting of ministers in order to find out how the federal government could possibly reconcile the position of the Minister of National Health and Welfare with the position of the former minister of finance.

Mr. Nystrom: It is impossible.

Mr. Benjamin: I guess it is impossible, because no such meeting was called. The deputy minister attempted to call together his provincial counterparts last fall, but the provinces have taken the position that there will be no meeting of staffs until the federal government has explained its position to the ministers. We are still waiting. In fact, Manitoba makes the point that Bill C-68 has now been superseded by the anti-inflation program and that therefore Bill C-68 should be withdrawn. In fact, Manitoba was even surprised that this bill was introduced in the House. In the past, the federal government went around encouraging the provinces to get into health programs, but now when the going gets tough the federal government wants to get out of its share of the responsibility. I repeat, the feeling of Manitoba in respect of Bill C-68 is that it is an insult because of lack of consultation. That province believes it is fatuous and that it is unnecessary because of the so-called anti-inflation program.

I should like now to talk about the province of Saskatchewan. We in that province believe this action by the government is a case of bad faith. The budget and Bill C-68 are an example of bad faith. There has been a lack of bargaining on the part of the federal government. In 1975 the plan was that the federal and provincial governments would come to an agreement concerning the control of doctor and hospital costs. This was the plan until the budget of June 23. The federal government, without consultation, changed the rules.

Because of wage and price controls—or wage controls, which is what we have in effect—the effect of the government's reneging on its contribution to medicare is not as severe in respect of the provincial budgets as it would have been. But what happens when the controls come off? Saskatchewan agrees that, given the federal government's control program, Bill C-68 really is unnecessary. This happens to coincide with the position taken by the province of Manitoba. Why is Bill C-68 being introduced? Has the federal government no faith in it? Saskatchewan doctors, for example, are willing to limit their incomes to conform to the guidelines so long as they are sure that prices will be controlled. Even the doctors are saying they will abide by the controls. In Saskatchewan they are limiting the increase in income to the $2,400 maximum allowed by the controls.

We can imagine how bad it is if even the doctors agree. Since even the doctors are saying they will conform to the controls as long as prices are controlled, does the federal government really believe it will be completely unable to effectively control prices? That is an answer we have not been able to get. Certainly there have been no results in spite of the statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) over the last few days to the effect that the program is really working. It may be working in respect of incomes, but it certainly is not working in respect of prices.

In September the minister refused to give the province an answer in respect of what new programs would be eligible for cost-sharing. Since September the provinces have received no word from him on this point. There is mention in Bill C-68 of arrangements for federal sharing and contribution in this regard. When will the minister tell us what programs he is prepared to negotiate with the provinces relating to cost-sharing? Saskatchewan would be very interested to know from the minister what the situation is in respect of pharmacare, denticare, hearing-aids and many of the other things that should have been in effect for many years. There are also things such as home nursing, expanded ambulance service and much more that we want to do and which need to be done.

The minister has been having talks with the provincial health and welfare ministers and their staffs. He has told them he favours shifting part of the cost of home care and nursing homes to the health budgets, but he has not said that he is prepared to cost-share such programs. The provinces want to know what is to be shared by the federal government. The provinces are still waiting to hear from the minister.

Even more important than medicare, in terms of money, are hospital and diagnostic services. When will the minister make clear what he has in mind for funding these programs, or does he simply intend to let the five years run out and leave the provinces holding the bag? It will be interesting to hear about this from the minister. At present the federal government participates in substantially less than 50 per cent of health care programs across the country. Of these, it pays approximately 50 per cent. In provinces like Saskatchewan it participates in approximately 60 per cent of all health care programs, leaving the province to pick up all of the cost of programs such as denticare, pharmacare, hearing-aids, and so on.

When new programs are introduced, the federal government often withdraws whatever little support it may be giving in that area. For example, when Saskatchewan brought in its hearing-aid program the federal government withdrew its support in respect of hearing-aids for Indians. Here we have these great humanitarian Liberals who wanted to share in the cost of a program on health care for Canadians taking this position. Talk about Mr. Scrooge at Christmastime! These are nothing but a bunch of cheap, inhumanitarian chisellers. As soon as Saskatchewan brought in the hearing-aid program, the federal government withdrew its support for hearing-aids for native people. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare so hard up that he has to resort to that kind of two-bit chiselling?

● (1710)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Chief Big Chiseller.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Benjamin: He does that and says that the province's universal program which it paid for itself could cover Indians as well, and they are a federal responsibility. I have heard proposals from hon. members of the official opposition regarding this business of universality and deterrent fees. In my most friendly and kind way I should like to warn my good friends in the Progressive Conservative party to be very careful about anything their leader or former aspiring leaders say about the implementation of deterrent fees, because I should like to refresh their memories about what happened to a Liberal government in the province of Saskatchewan with regard to the implementation of deterrent fees. Deterrent fees are nothing more than purely and simply a tax on the sick. Politicians are honourable people, and politics is an honourable and worth while profession.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: However, politicians are not perfect, and I want to remind my hon. friends in the Progressive Conservative party that deterrent fees killed the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. That is one of the major things which killed it. I am trying to be friendly in urging my colleagues to my right that if their present leader or other former aspirants for the leadership open their big mouths about deterrent fees, their colleagues had better step on them quickly.

One of the basic principles of a hospital and medical care program, and all the ancillary services which go with it, is that it is universal. I was saddened and distressed when I read in the leaflets, statements and quotes of the new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that he questions the universality provision in social programs. I think that is a direct quote.

Mr. Epp: Are you sure?

Mr. Benjamin: If I am not accurate, I am certainly very close in my paraphrasing. If I am totally inaccurate about that, I am confident some of my colleagues will rise in their place and set me straight, but I think I am very accurate on that. I remind the official opposition and the government that it was during the 1972-74 period when we forced the government to restore universality with regard to family allowances, which is one of the specific items the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party happened to mention in questioning the universality of social programs.

In addition, I remind my hon. friends to the right and across the way that it was the official opposition, the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party which forced the government to keep universality in family allowances. I just hope there will not be a 180 degree turn by the Progressive Conservative party, because I remind the House that we finished straightening out the Liberal party on that only a couple of years ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Some hon. Members: Let him go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene in this debate and express yet another view but one which is similar to those expressed by some of my hon. colleagues who have already spoken, and there have been many. I represent a constituency in one of the "have" provinces. My province is one most of the people from Saskatchewan move to when they get sick and tired of the type of programs the previous speaker was espousing. However, the constituency I represent is of a rural and isolated nature and Bill C-68 affects that kind of area as much as it does the have-not provinces, for example, the maritime provinces about which my colleague from Newfoundland spoke earlier.

The provinces are worried about this bill for the same reasons they were worried in 1968 when they told the then minister that they did not entirely believe the federal government was serious enough to carry on an equal partnership in this arrangement forever. The way the economy was going then, they did not think that the federal government had the resources to carry on this equal partnership or even to embark on it. However, the essential ingredient which finally made the provinces change their minds was the assurance that the federal government would at no point renege on the program and on the responsibilities it entered into.

The provinces were worried for the same reasons they are worried about other schemes of extravagance the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has been talking about in recent times. The guaranteed income program which the minister wanted to have implemented by July of 1975 is another universal program the responsibility for which must be shared equally by the provinces. But the provinces repeated the arguments they made in 1968, saying that the time was not right to embark on schemes of extravagance without solving some of the other problems inherent in our society.

I begin to wonder when it will ever be possible for the minister again to sit down with the provinces and work out a program of equalization of opportunity in our country. The universality of a program may be in the field of education, health or any other social service. When will the provinces ever be able to sit down with that minister again and have faith in anything he tries to sell them?

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Oberle: It is terribly important that we have some form of co-operative federalism in this modern day and age. The very diversified regions of our country have moved closer together through better transportation facilities and better communications systems. It is important that opportunities are equal, wages are equal and incomes are equal in various regions and, indeed, that social services and quality of life are equal in all parts of our country. It is for this reason that the federal government has to assume an ever greater role in providing and managing some of these services in the fields of health care and social administration, socioeconomic development and education.

● (1720)

That is why it is so important for the federal government to develop a much better relationship with the provinces and a much better trust between it and the provincial governments so that these services can be spread equally across the country. However, it is important that the "have" provinces continue to share their wealth with those that are deprived of some of the fortunes of natural resources and benefits of our heritage.

Mr. Speaker, the government has decided that in the first year the program will have a 13½ per cent ceiling on increases, and the following year a 10½ per cent ceiling. The anti-inflation program, however, wants to hold cost increases to 10 per cent this year and reduce them to 8 per cent or less the following year. This indicates to people who will be affected by this bill that the government does not have faith in its anti-inflation program. The government is doing what it has always done, that is, telling people in business and labour, "Do as we say, not as we do." Obviously the government is showing no intention of living by its own anti-inflation program nor to insist that the provinces do so.

I have had arguments with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacDonald) about increases in rates and fees that have affected the cost of living of many Canadians due to certain actions taken by provincial Crown corporations. When the minister sold us the anti-inflation program he said that Crown corporations, since they are affected differently by the Income Tax Act and other government services, would have to live by the federal anti-inflation program and that the federal Anti-Inflation Board would have jurisdiction over them. That is not the intention of the government now, however; it seems it does not intend to insist that government agencies or Crown corporations be tied to the guidelines of the anti-inflation program. This is a very significant point, and my colleagues in this House should think about it. They continue to tell Canadians, "Do as we say, not as we do." We are no better than other Canadians, Mr. Speaker. They should not worry about increasing our own benefits and services by 16 per cent or 20 per cent; after all, we are doing it for the good of society, and the rest will have to look after themselves!

The other thing that worries me about the minister's decision to place ceilings on these programs, without consultation with the provinces, is what comes next? After the third year, will the minister take the same step that the then minister of finance took on June 23 when he announced that yet another program which participated in the hospital insurance program would be phased out over five years? That is what the provinces are afraid of and it is what they are expecting.

All my colleagues who have spoken in this House—and, indeed every Canadian—agree that costs have risen at a rate which is not acceptable in light of the reserves and resources available to feed these programs. No one would argue that we do not need better social services in the future. It is not right that a province like Saskatchewan should have a dental care program, or a union should have achieved a program of some form of health or dental care that is not available to all Canadians. What we are establishing is a system of class distinction, Mr. Speaker, a system of inequality. Equality, after all, has to be the basis of these programs. It is the responsibility of the federal government to make sure that whatever benefits are derived from the gross national product and the sale of our resources are distributed in a manner more in tune with the needs of the various regions.

What has the federal government offered or done to earn the respect of the provinces and slow down the increase in or halt the inflationary cycle? Has it met with the provinces? Has there been any consultation, any offer to share a lower cost program? I should like to refer to the program of intermediate care facilities. My colleagues and I have spoken about this before and have asked the minister to offer the provinces a 50 per cent program to establish a system of intermediate care facilities. One of the minister's officials wrote to me and said that as early as May, 1973, the federal government was having discussions with the provinces about the establishment of such a program. Certainly the provinces would like an intermediate care program. It would relieve the shortage of acute beds in hospitals and would cut the cost of patient care in nursing homes or under a home care program by 75 per cent.

It is argued that 40 per cent of patients occupying acute hospital beds should live in some other environment. We have some intermediate care facilities for senior citizens. They are known as chronic care hospitals, institutions where a patient might occupy an acute bed for five or six years and then is sent to a chronic care facility to live out his last days.

During the election campaign in 1972 I visited some of these chronic care hospitals and talked to patients. It was a rural area, a deprived area but rich in human resources. I remember a little old lady who told me that she had lived with her husband in the city of Prince George all her life. They had run a business and brought up five children. The children moved away and she and her husband, then in their mid-seventies, were living in the old folks' home. The husband contracted a terminal illness, and there was no bed for him in the acute hospital so it was decided to move him into one of these chronic care facilities.

There was then no such facility in Prince George. It was decided that this poor old man would be moved either 200 miles north or 350 miles south to a chronic care facility. He had no option but to go. He chose the southern location, Penticton, British Columbia. But in Penticton there was no provision in the chronic care hospital for his wife to be with him. Can you imagine that? This poor old man was moved to Penticton but his wife had to stay in Prince George, where she still lives, her husband having passed on. She came to me and said, "Mr. Oberle, for the past two months I have been crying myself to sleep. My husband, too, is crying himself to sleep every night." Indeed I, too, find it hard to fight back my emotions when I describe this barbaric way of implementing a health care program in our country.

Can the minister say why it has not been possible to establish, with the co-operation of the provinces, a program of intermediate care, a program to serve people who do not require acute care hospital beds or the attendance of a doctor every morning and afternoon? Why has this not been done?

[Mr. Oberle.]

Mr. Lalonde: The question was answered in my speech.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the minister's speech did not impress me. He tried to put the blame on the provinces and said in so many words that health care is a provincial responsibility. The provinces cannot trust the minister. He says one thing one day and another the next. The government said one thing in 1968 and another four years later. The same can be said of other programs in which the provinces have participated with the federal government. The provinces are afraid that the federal government will force them to participate in other programs and will then get out of the picture. No, the answer is not in the minister's speech. It does not explain the lack of intermediate care facilities. The minister must re-establish the confidence of the provinces, a confidence which has been eroded in recent times, particularly since the minister assumed responsibility for this portfolio.

Mr. Lalonde: Of course, you are laughing when you say that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The provinces are not laughing, according to what I hear.

Mr. Oberle: The federal government, using the resources at its disposal, has taken upon itself to meddle in all aspects of our national life. The Minister of Finance is right in saying that the government does not control all expenditures included in the estimates. Some expenditures represent transfer payments to provinces. At one time such payments were transferred differently. This government considers itself as the major tool for distributing all benefits, all the wealth in this country. Everyone is to pay money into the central coffer and the government is to pay it out to the different areas of this country according to its own priorities.

We are not overly enthusiastic about the government's priorities. We do not much like the manner in which much of our money is spent. It occurs to me that, having established the medicare program which is now functioning well, the government will implement another program in which it will try to involve the provinces. I am thinking about the guaranteed income. I serve notice on the minister that the provinces will not go along with his schemes unless there are much stronger guarantees that the federal government will not pull out. The provinces are unwilling to participate with the government in programs involving so-called cost-sharing. Some day, when we can afford the guaranteed annual income, the minister may be surprised because the provinces will not run after him like little boys, eager to sign on the dotted line, unless there are better assurances that the federal-provincial partnership will last longer than in the case of medicare. The minister had better consider taking up faith healing.

Mr. Lalonde: Is that a branch of medicine?

Mr. Oberle: He had better heal the faith of the provinces in the federal government. Right now they lack faith. He had better consider how to re-establish the sort of co-operation federalism which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says is necessary if this country is to compete with the world's advanced industrialized nations. I remind the minister that other nations have established programs well attuned to meeting the needs of their peoples, and we can learn from them.

I plead with the minister to reconsider this bill or, at worst, to accept the hon. member's motion and delay second reading for six months. In those six months he could consult the provinces and say, "Look, this time I will tell you the truth." That's the Prime Minister's favourite trick. When something goes wrong, he says, "Well, last time we tried it, the anti-inflation program did not work. This time, it will." Perhaps the minister could approach the provinces and say, "Look, fellows, this time we will tell you the truth for a change. Let's get together." In the next six months the minister could examine the entire program and consider alternate ways of reducing the high cost of medicare. It might be possible to reduce costs by more than 13 per cent. He could work out an agreement with the provinces whereby nursing and intermediate care facilities would be available for those in acute, active treatment beds and perhaps save a good portion of the cost. The minister would have breathing space, and the reduced cost of the program would eliminate the need for expensive hospital construction.

We need improved facilities for native peoples. In the broad picture, we must consider the needs of native people who live in subhuman conditions in the bush. Sometimes a native child enters hospital with a common cold or minor illness. Doctors are reluctant to release such children from hospital until they are fully satisfied there will be no recurrence of the illness or that there is not some more serious, underlying sickness which has been caused by the child's home environment which, more often than not, does not meet acceptable standards. We need more intermediate care and nursing home facilities adjacent to reservations and in northern communities to serve both white people and native peoples, who often live in subhuman conditions. Or, if the nurse could visit a patient at his home, his $200 a day hospital bed would be available for others. The doctor would not have to make daily visits and bill the minister for them.

These are serious proposals. They have not only been discussed and studied by members of this House but by municipal, regional and provincial governments. If the minister were really serious, he would not have had to expose himself to the extent he did in allowing the trust that was once the essence of federalism in Canada to deteriorate further than it has in the past few years as a result of some of these unilateral opting out exercises in which the federal government has been engaged.

There is still time. Let us hoist this bill for six months so that we can get together and seriously talk about this problem. I assure the minister he will end up with a result of which he will be proud and delighted. It would be much less than 13½ per cent or 10 per cent. I ask the minister to take this matter seriously. Give us a chance to sit down and find a solution to this very serious problem that is more attuned to the needs of our time.

Medical Care Act

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say I am reluctant to enter this debate at this time. I have as much interest in medicare as anyone in this House. I had intended to leave the discussion of this bill to my colleagues who have more knowledge and expertise in medical matters. There have been some excellent presentations on the substance of Bill C-68 and the amendment. A number of sound proposals have been made which would make this legislation more meaningful and pertinent to the concept of medicare. I have, however, been dragged into this debate because of what this bill is doing to the people in my constituency, and to the federal minister, allowing that some provincial decisions have been made. The people in my area will be adversely affected in the future if this bill passes in its present form.

Although this bill has been stripped bare by other members of the House, my colleagues in particular, and has been exposed for what it is, a cop-out on the part of the federal government, we have not seen any sign that the government is prepared to withdraw the bill, or greatly alter it, at least until after consultations have been held with the affected provinces.

As some members have already pointed out, Ontario entered the federal medical scheme with a great deal of reluctance and even some apprehension. Our provincial government was not under any illusions as to the advisability of entering into a federal program of this nature. We knew at the outset that the provincial medical care program was superior to the federal program that we were asked to join. We also knew what we were dealing with in this case. There was no way we could be sure that the federal government would honour this agreement. We, like the other provinces, knew that this government's record of keeping its word was hardly conducive to placing very much faith in this particular federal-provincial agreement. In short, Mr. Speaker, we were conned into joining the federal program, and now we see in Bill C-68 the first step in the federal government's plan to opt out of a program of which it was the chief architect.

Back in 1966 when he was minister of national health and welfare, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) said health is not a privilege tied to the state of one's bank account but, rather, a basic right which should be open to all. The minister would have been closer to the point if he had said that health care, not health, is the basic right of all citizens. Much as we would like, no government can guarantee good health to any of its citizens, but certainly we can guarantee good health care to all our citizens, and in plain fact we cannot do any less than that.

The conviction that universal medical and hospital care is the right of all citizens, regardless of their financial capability, was the basis of the medicare system that we had in Ontario when the federal government came along in 1969 and forced us to join what was touted to be a better system. We know now that it was not a better system then, and we know that it is not a better system now, but we entered into the federal medicare program in good faith and it is not we who are reneging.

As far back as 1968, Mr. Speaker, the treasurer of Ontario asked, when discussions were taking place between federal and provincial officials on the joint medicare plan, what guarantee we had that the federal government would not cut us loose if it decided that it wanted out of the program. Well, we have found out what guarantees we had. We had the government's word, and we all know just how much this government's word is worth. Betting that this government will keep its word is the best way I know of losing your money.

One effect of this bill is to force the government of Ontario to make a complete assessment of the provincial medicare and hospital insurance programs. In one way this is a good thing, because over the years it is inevitable that a certain amount of fat and duplication will develop in even the most efficiently administered programs. However, the hospital closing program now under way in Ontario has hit my riding. It is getting too close to home for my comfort, because my constituents are up in arms over the closings, especially the closing of the hospital at Clinton. I have a call in right now for a conference with the premier and provincial minister of hospital services. I hope to be able to convince them that the closing of the Clinton hospital should be reviewed and, hopefully, reversed.

My constituents are just as angry with the federal government, though, because they are beginning to realize that the government of Ontario is being forced into this move by the announced intention of the federal government to squirm out of the federal-provincial medicare program. I cannot blame my people for getting up in arms over this matter, Mr. Speaker. In recent years I cannot remember a single issue that has aroused as much public indignation and public hostility in my riding as the announcement that Clinton hospital would be closed. My file of letters on the Clinton closing, letters from concerned citizens as well as from those whose jobs will be eliminated by the closing, is growing each day and I suspect that it is only the beginning. As the date for the closing gets closer, I can foresee a concerned public effort to head off this threat to the well-being of the people of Huron county.

The program of hospital closings in Ontario was predicted long ago, even before Ontario was drawn into the federal government's ill-starred medicare and hospital insurance programs. Many people at that time expressed doubts about entering into a cost-sharing agreement of this type with the federal government. We were warned of the possibility that the government would some day decide to back out of the agreement and turn the provinces loose as if to say that this is the way things are done. We know that this is the way the present government does things, but we also know that it is not the right way.

I now wish to turn to some of the attributes of the Clinton hospital and some of the methods used by the provincial government. In a meeting with the hospital board on Thursday, February 19, Mr. Miller, the provincial minister of health, stated that the basis for closing the Clinton public hospital was, one, it was comparable to one other hospital and, two, geographically it was central in Huron county and that users of the hospital could go to other hospitals for service.

We strongly protest that stated rationale for closing the Clinton public hospital. The minister seemed to use the word "comparable" to mean equal, on a par, similar, or having the same facilities. We cannot conceive how the ministry, in using the data available, could possibly conclude that the Clinton public hospital is, by any of the above definitions, "comparable" with the hospital named, let alone with others in Huron county.

Statistically, in terms of average cost per patient day, average cost per patient stay, wages paid, length of stay, per cent of occupancy and paid hours per patient day, we believe that the Clinton public hospital compares very favourably with the other hospitals in Huron county. We believe the ministry also has data to indicate that the degree of activity in surgery, pediatrics, obstetrics, laboratory, radiology, physiotheraphy and emergency service is in no way less than the two smaller hospitals in Huron county and probably equal to the larger hospitals in Huron county. From a medical staff brief, the minister ought to be aware of the fact that Clinton public hospital has quite a few services that many other hospitals have; for example, coronary care, surgery, and dialysis.

Has the minister examined the age population of the patients in the Huron county hospitals for 1975? No fewer than 32.9 per cent of the patients in Clinton public hospital are from 15 to 44 years of age. Only 22 per cent are 65 years of age or over, and 23.1 per cent are 45 to 65 years of age. Clinton public hospital is not an under-active hospital. We submit that Clinton public hospital is comparable in that it is providing more services than most community hospitals, for less cost and equally efficiently to all our citizens, especially to those with years of productivity ahead of them. We do agree with financial restraints, better management and best use of health dollar, but we cannot comprehend the logic of a ministy that proposes to cut costs in health care by choosing to eliminate the hospital that seems to us to be giving the people excellent use of the health dollar.

The minister's second argument is one of geography. He reasons that the users of Clinton public hospital would go to the other hospitals of Huron county. We know that at present these surrounding hospitals have been told by the ministry of health that there is to be no increase in inpatient activity. How, then, can Clinton patients go to the surrounding hospitals to be serviced if they are not allowed to increase their service? How can one go to a facility for a particular service if that facility does not have the staff nor equipment for that particular service? Is the minister expecting that one or each of the four remaining hospitals will obtain the staff and equipment from Clinton public hospital for these services? There have been no plans for such moves. The minister has not indicated that there will be funds for this but, rather, has indicated that the surrounding hospitals will have considerable restraints imposed on them. Is the minister assuming that Clinton public hospital's equipment and staff will be graciously given to the surrounding hospitals, remembering that it was the citizens of the community who raised the funds for this equipment?

How long will it take for these services to be available in other facilities and for staff to be trained in their use? It has taken years to develop coronary care, just to name one service. It cannot but take months or years for these same services to once more become available to citizens of Huron county. We wonder if they really will become available in our present time of restraints. Will other hospitals place these services on top priority if they involve additional costs? How can they hire Clinton nursing staff to provide the nursing care for these services if they already have sufficient staff but are limited in funds to hire, train or develop?

Has the minister examined the referral system in this county and seen that patients, if referred, usually go to London rather than to other hospitals, or that they come to Clinton for service? They do not go from Clinton to other local hospitals because the service and the care is not the same. Is the minister assuming that the feelings and patterns of people in the district about the surrounding hospitals are going to change so that they will go to the doctors using these hospitals, even if Clinton doctors' privileges are granted elsewhere, and be content with the services they provide, when you deny them the hospital, staff and service they have built and developed?

If the minister's argument really is on the basis of geography, then he ought to recognize that persons in the outlying areas of Huron county could, and do, more readily come to Clinton than travel across country to these outlying areas. It is for this very reason that Clinton public hospital has in the past few years continued to improve service rather than stagnate, and has provided increased service at reasonable cost.

If people have to travel across-country for service, for example, from Clinton to Exeter or from Clinton to Seaforth, they might just as well go a little bit farther on to London or Stratford, where comparable services are found. But these latter areas are to have restraints imposed upon them as well. These facilities also cost more. Where, then, is the dollar saving? Clinton is now providing the needed services at far less cost per day. How can the minister justify deleting this facility if the alternatives he proposes cost more?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is all provincial.

Mr. McKinley: I take off at anyone I think is doing wrong.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinley: We submit that by closing Clinton public hospital the minister is promoting a decrease in service to citizens of Huron county. By not planning for alternatives or ways to maintain these services he is abdicating his responsibility to provide service and the best use of the health dollar to the people of Huron county. At the same time he prohibits the citizens of Clinton area from contributing toward making the best use of their health dollar by closing their hospital—not on the grounds of inefficiency, mismanagement, overstaffing, lack of service, but on the grounds of geography.

The minister has a responsibility to prove to us that we are mismanaging and deserve to be closed, and that other hospitals are not mismanaging and deserve to be left open. But the ministry has not, neither privately nor publicly, stated this. We also submit that the minister has little considered the economic impact that this closure, the second in Huron county, will have on the people in this community. The minister has forced this upon us, yet has made little provision for the community to retain these employed citizens or to relocate elsewhere in this province where needed.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. McKinley: I shall just be one more minute, Mr. Speaker. Nobody desires to go on unemployment to impose an extra drain on our coffers, yet this is what many will be forced to do. This is unfair financially and morally. The minister has stated that the people of Huron county should provide alternatives to the closure of Clinton public hospital between now and the date of an appeal. Yet he is well aware that at present there is no district health council to present such a proposal that is acceptable to all of Huron county. In order to remain, the minister has stated that our only apparent recourse is to prove that we are better and that other facilities should go rather than Clinton public hospital. By so doing, Clinton would be forced to become a villain in the eyes of the public and our colleagues in health care.

The citizens of Clinton community are very loth to declare that other facilities in Huron county are inferior to theirs. It is insufferable that in this day and age the government should indicate to us that this is the tactic we must adopt in order to survive and provide what we believe is quality service to the people of Huron county.

I have one suggestion to make to the minister. Instead of closing down hospitals like Clinton completely, I believe sufficient money could be saved, without a shocking decrease in the availability of health care, by cutting back some beds in all hospitals or by charging a user fee or initial fee to those using hospital and doctor care. I hope the provincial government will reconsider its decision to close the Clinton hospital, and I reiterate my willingness to attend a meeting with the Premier of Ontario and Mr. Miller, if it can be arranged.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nystrom: I was going to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is already past six o'clock. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF FISHERIES MANAGEMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter that is quite urgent and pressing. The application of a retroactive quota on red fish or ocean perch, as announced by the minister will seriously affect the economy of Atlantic Canada.

The continued restrictions being directed at Canadian fishermen, while foreigners are still permitted to phase out their operations, requires a thorough investigation of fisheries management. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House orders that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and that the minister appear before the committee to explain his policy on fisheries management as it applies to the Canadian fishing industry.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF CHIEF JUSTICE OF QUEBEC CONCERNING ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and if I could get the government's attention I would hope the motion I move will not elicit the automatic "no" that comes from the government side.

Given the refusal yesterday by the government to establish a public inquiry into the serious allegations made by Judge Mackay, and assuming that the government does not change its mind later today on the need for a public inquiry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to make publicly available its terms of reference to the Chief Justice of Quebec and also to make publicly available the written report submitted by the Chief Justice of Quebec concerning these important allegations.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

POSSIBILITY OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF EMPLOYMENT POLICY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the startling increase in unemployment, especially in Quebec, considering also that such unemployment affects more particularly the young people in spite of their education, and that according to the latest statistics over 424,160 unemployed were less than 34 years of age, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

That at his earliest convenience the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) state to the House the intentions of his department concerning any job producing program or any other step to assist young Canadians willing to work in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SUPPORT FOR CELEBRATION OF ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF TREATY NO. 6—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that 1976 is the 100th anniversary of the signing of Treaty No. 6, and in view of the historic nature of Indian treaties and the fact that the various treaties are the basis of native relationships with the federal government and the Crown, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

That the federal government lend its full support to the native people in order that their planned celebrations will be such that the Canadian people will appreciate more fully the importance of these historic treaties.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Number 43 has special significance today, this day being your forty-third birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House wishes you a Happy Birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion of exceptional urgency.

I would like to support the hon. member who has just resumed his seat and wish you Happy Birthday. At the same time, that reminds me of a song that we often sing on occasions such as this one. I am sure I speak on behalf of all hon. members in this House by moving:

That your life be filled with success and happiness, peace and joy.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, just to show that we are unanimous, I wish to make it clear that if the other hon. members had not presented their standing order 43 motions, I would have done so, to wish you the very best on your birthday number 43.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I cannot resist saying that it is a sufficient crisis to encounter one's forty-third birthday. I hoped to keep the connection between Standing Order 43 and my age on this birthday secret. Obviously, I have not done very well. I am grateful for the sentiments expressed; thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the Prime Minister. While the chief justice of Quebec may be responsible for the management of some courts, the Prime Minister must accept responsibility for the management and impropriety of this government. In this light I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the serious admissions made yesterday by certain of his ministers, including, particularly, the admission of intervention by the Minister of Public Works, the Prime Minister is now prepared on reconsideration to appoint an independent commission, to conduct the kind of full, open inquiry which these admissions of ministerial intervention make necessary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree, of course, with the premise to the question, as stated by the Leader of the Opposition. I explained to the House yesterday the basis of my decision. I shall repeat it briefly. It was that, in the case of two ministers, Mr. Speaker, their alleged intervention was directed toward judges who have not, to my knowledge, complained about it. I have the statement of my ministers, made publicly here, that they in no way tried to influence the judge. I take their word. Of course, I am prepared to hear the other side of the question. I think it is proper for the chief justice of the Superior Court of Quebec who is entrusted with the administration of these courts to hear the views of the two judges who, to our knowledge, did not complain. Therefore, until they complain we are faced with the word of honourable gentlemen here who say that they did not interfere nor in any way try to influence judgments.

In the third case, which had to do with my then first secretary, the judge in question, Justice Mackay, is the one who is stating that there was an attempt to influence. I have the word of the minister that he in no way did that, that the limit of his talk with Justice Mackay was to ask when the judgment would be rendered. I have looked into the circumstances under which this was requested. I find it a perfectly legitimate intervention in those circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I say this only after some thought, Mr. Speaker, because I realize that it does not appear prima facie good when somebody talks to a judge. However, the House knows the circumstances of this. We had a friendly government saying that there might be riots as a result of a sentence. They wanted to know when the sentence would come down so that they could prepare to meet such riots, if they happened. I think it is perfectly justifiable in such circumstances to elicit that information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Here again, I repeat what I said to the House yesterday. It is possible that the Chief Justice entrusted with the administration of those courts would have another version after hearing from his judges about something that happened seven years ago and which had not caused any grievance since then. I am prepared to hear the other side of it and then I will judge—we will judge as a government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): "I will judge."

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, obviously I have to judge. I am being asked if I will grant an inquiry. If members opposite do not want me to make a judgment on that, they should not ask me the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S VIEW ON SEPARATION OF POWERS BETWEEN JUDICIARY AND LEGISLATURE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what is at issue here is that contact was made, admitted contact by ministers and representatives of the government of Canada, with judges of courts in Quebec concerning cases then before those courts. In light of that fact, does the Prime Minister accept as a matter of very basic principle the traditional doctrine of absolute separation between his ministers and the courts or does he instead take the position that his ministers and their aides have a right to intervene—and that is the word deliberately used yesterday by the Minister of Public Works—with judges and with courts regarding questions that are before the courts? Does he accept that there should be, as a matter of fundamental principle, a separation between the political cabinet and the courts of the land, such as has been broken in this case?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a discussion of theory—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see that members opposite are not very interested in theory. If they are interested in this particular case, Mr. Speaker, my answer still stands.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this unfortunate kind of stonewalling on the question of a public inquiry has marked the life of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I again make direct reference to the statement yesterday by the Minister of Public Works and his use of the word "intervention". I want to refer the Prime Minister to the language used by the Minister of Public Works who said his intervention was for the purpose of seeing that the judge was in possession of full knowledge of the facts and did his duty. My question to the Prime Minister is this—I am not asking a question of theory but one of direct, immediate fact—

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Clark: Does the Prime Minister intend to continue to tolerate that kind of intervention of ministers in the conduct of the courts of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: I think it was established during the question and answer period yesterday that there was no attempt by anyone to influence the court. Obviously, Justice Mackay does not share this view. But Justice Aronovitch does not agree with Justice Mackay, because Justice Aronovitch, who was brought into the issue by Justice Mackay, has said clearly there was no attempt to interfere.

An hon. Member: In one case.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, when we have one judge, Justice Mackay, on hearsay, contradicting what the judge who was supposed to have been interfered with is saying, there is obviously something wrong there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Here are two judges who are contradicting themselves, one who is talking from hearsay and who was blaming our ministers, and the other who is talking from personal knowledge. In such circumstances I think we are justified in asking the Chief Justice of the Superior Court to look into this matter to see which of the judges is telling the truth.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we in this House do not have the opportunity to question the Chief Justice of the Quebec Court. What I am asking the Prime Minister relates to the statement made yesterday in this House by the Minister of Public Works, a statement from which he has just attempted to divert attention. I am asking whether he accepts as a matter of continuing practice the intervention by ministers of his cabinet in cases which are before the courts. The Prime Minister is the man to whom that question should be put. We do not want the matter shunted off to the courts of Quebec. We want to know whether, if he refuses an inquiry, the right hon. gentleman will allow this kind of practice to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry the Prime Minister did not want to answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Three o'clock!

Mr. Woolliams: I see, Mr. Speaker, that he refuses again to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The last question by the Leader of the Opposition was clearly a repetition of his previous question.

Oral Questions

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—TYPE OF INTERVENTION REQUESTED BY MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to put this question, then, to the Prime Minister. While the Minister of Public Works seems to think his conversations with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are privileged and believes he has the right to dictate the duties of judges, I assume the Prime Minister believes we have the right to know what happens, and knows what happened, as alleged by Mr. Justice Mackay, did the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs ask the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance to intervene on his behalf, and what kind of intervention did he want?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the preamble to the question is just as misleading as the hon. member's attempt to represent the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I see the Prime Minister is up to his usual tricks; he is trying to work another snow job on the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Yesterday the Minister of Public Works admitted to the House that he had contacted the associate chief justice with regard to the contempt of court proceeding in a way that can only be described as irresponsible interference. Did the Minister of Public Works advise the Prime Minister of his intention, and did he report to the Prime Minister on the conversation at any time before the story broke in the press on Tuesday with reference to the matter that is now before the House in this question period?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, again I do not admit the preamble to the question which already prejudges the issue which I think the chief justice has something to do with. I do not admit it is irresponsible, but I am prepared to listen to objective argument on the matter. As for the question itself, the answer is no.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—PRIME MINISTER'S VIEW OF NEED FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. While no one will dispute the appropriateness of the Prime Minister making general inquiries and looking into two sides of an issue as a general proposition when his own ministers or government are not involved as one of the two parties, and he does this before he reaches a decision about whether a public inquiry is needed or not, does the Prime Minister not see that the present circumstance is in fact fundamentally different from that in the sense that his own ministers are involved, being one of the parties in question, and also that the judge who is involved, the chief justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, has already reprimanded a junior judge who is centrally involved in the case as well. Does not the Prime Minister see that this circumstance makes it absolutely essential that we have a public inquiry now so that he absolves himself from making the decision about the appropriateness or not either of ministers' actions or the judge's actions?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may attempt in my answer to refer to the theory of separation of powers, as expounded by the Leader of the Opposition and upon which hon. members did not want me to comment, may I simply state at this stage that if the theory of separation of powers makes any sense at all we should ask the courts to look into this matter and not attempt to run the courts for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is running roughly 12 minutes behind time, so would he now answer my question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: He did the same thing with the Leader of the Opposition and when he gets to the Social Credit party it will be too late. Let me ask the Prime Minister this most serious question. Since his own ministers are involved, is he not putting himself in a conflict of interest position in passing judgment about the need for a public inquiry after he gets the report, presumably filtered through the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Leader of the New Democratic Party did not understand that my reference to the separation of powers was in answer to his question, not a comment on the question of the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member is asking parliament, the legislative branch, to inquire into the judicial branch.

Mr. Clark: Not at all.

Mr. Paproski: Stop playing games.

Mr. Trudeau: Let the judicial branch decide whether any wrongdoing has been done to them. If it has, it will have been done by us presumably, unless they have done it to themselves; but that is what we would like the chief justice to ascertain.

● (1430)

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF CHIEF JUSTICE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I know the Prime Minister has always had difficulty seeing when a conflict of interest principle was involved, but I am sure it is abundantly clear today. Does he not see that he is telling the people of Canada he will make the decision about whether or not a public inquiry is needed and, if so, he is basing it on a report to which we do not have access or in respect of which we do not even know the terms of reference made to the judge. The whole thing from the public point of view is totally obscure and therefore clouded with suspicion which will inevitably remain even if the Prime Minister in all his known modesty concludes that the people are innocent. I see him shake his head. I should like to ask if he would not at least make the terms of reference to the Chief Justice of the Superior Court public, what specific request the Minister of Justice made to the Chief Justice and, secondly, will he ensure that the public will have access to a written report from the Chief Justice when he looks into this situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will defer to the Minister of Justice whose officials I believe communicated with the Chief Justice of the Superior Court, but consistent with my earlier answer I am not trying to be a judge in this particular case. I am trying to ascertain for the satisfaction of the opposition and ourselves whether or not the courts feel aggrieved. I do not take the hon. member's word for that. I would like to know if the court feels aggrieved?

An hon. Member: One judge does.

Mr. Trudeau: I would suggest it would be in the interest of all in this House, including ourselves, that the estimation by the courts be made public. I think I would have to leave it to the Chief Justice himself to say whether what he says will be made public but I state that the government certainly would have no objection to it; but we are respectful of the separation of the Powers and I think the court should make the decision on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW TEXTILES POLICY TO PROTECT EMPLOYMENT AND DOMESTIC MARKET

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Quebec textile industry is now experiencing serious problems due in part to the increase in goods imported from various foreign countries and to the fact that the federal government textile policy of 1970 has not reached its goal on account of foreign competition, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to introduce a new policy to ensure greater protection for employment and the Canadian market, especially the Quebec market?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this policy is now under review by the Textile and Clothing Board and a report will be tabled soon.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REFERENCE TO PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Apart altogether from the novel, precedent-shattering and dangerous principles just enunciated by the Prime Minister, may I indicate that there are at least two justices who feel aggrieved at the moment because apparently yesterday Judge Aronovich stated that, although he did not feel the President of the Treasury Board's call to him constituted an interference in the judiciary, nevertheless it was improper. For the benefit of the Minister of Justice may I quote the actual words.

Mr. Speaker: Order; if the hon. member has a question would he put it?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Justice has to do with the words of Mr. Justice Aronovich yesterday, and I quote:

> If any lawyer would call me up about a case that I have under judgment, I would, to say the least, be annoyed because a lawyer knows or should know that he does not—is not supposed to do that. Among other things you know that Chrétien is a lawyer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER TO CABINET MEMBERS WITH REFERENCE TO APPROACHING JUDGES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister advise the House what policy directive he, during his stewardship as Prime Minister, has given to the members of his Cabinet and senior civil servants regarding approaching judges about matters that are before the courts.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): None, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: None! Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Does the Prime Minister then not see how easy it is, because he has never given them any instructions in this regard, to see why his officials have carried out actions which obviously should never be participated in by members of any government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I assume that every minister in my Cabinet feels it is his duty not to try to influence the course of justice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that when the hon. member was a minister this directive had to be given specifically to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not realize that when I was a minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: All right; just wait a minute—the Prime Minister of the day was a man who took these matters very seriously indeed—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: —and he made sure that all members of his Cabinet understood that there should be a separation between the activities of his Cabinet and the operations of the courts. That is one of the many reasons the government of which he was Prime Minister did a hell of a lot better job for the country than this government.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hope it is not because the right hon. gentleman took these matters so seriously that the hon. gentleman who asked the question had to resign from the Cabinet.

An hon. Member: Where is Turner?

Mr. Hees: Where is Gray and where are all the others?

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REASON PRIME MINISTER CONCLUDES INTERVENTION BY HIS PRINCIPAL SECRETARY LEGITIMATE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister failed to explain why the contacting of a superior court judge by a political aide within his office was considered proper procedure without first consulting or seeking the authorization of the then Minister of Justice? Today there has been the very startling revelation that the Prime Minister has concluded that the intervention at that time was a legitimate intervention. I now ask the Prime Minister, was the Justice Department at the time of that intervention asked for its opinion in that regard, has the Prime Minister since the matter has been brought to his attention in the past day contacted the Minister of Justice in order to determine whether in fact that is a legitimate intervention, or is the Prime Minister just philosophically being involved in his usual way? Would he kindly explain that to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the hon. member I will try and reduce my philosophy to a minimum.

● (1440)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: You had better reduce more than that. Try reducing your arrogance.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Hees: You are reducing your term of office by a long, long time. Any more observations?

Mr. Trudeau: I am interested to hear that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings assumed that I would be re-elected for a long, long time. Now, he is having doubts about that.

Mr. Hees: Not since that convention.

Mr. Trudeau: If I may turn away from the interruptions to deal with this question, I want to emphasize that there was a matter of urgency here. There had been riots in Montreal, and there was real concern that there would be riots in a friendly country as a result of this judgment. This may have been a misapprehension by the friendly country, but the fact is that they did ask us when the judgment was coming down. They did not, to my knowledge, try to influence the court. They wanted to know when the judgment was coming down, presumably in order that they could make preparations.

It is possible that Mr. Justice Mackay found this to be an improper intervention. If so, it is surprising to me, to say the least, that he should at that time have given an answer as a matter of, I would say, almost public duty to one who was asking a question on behalf of the Department of External Affairs, and second, that he should have taken seven years to find himself aggrieved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: With all due respect, the Prime Minister has evaded my question. I am trying to determine how it is that the Prime Minister can come to this House, as a lawyer knowing that that type of conduct—approaching courts, and judges in particular—is wrong. All I am asking is how the Prime Minister was able to determine, given those facts, that this was a legitimate intervention. Keeping in mind that lawyers in particular do not approach judges at any time, and in particular when there is a case going on, on what does he base this? Where does he get his information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, that is precisely the question the hon. member just asked and which the Prime Minister just answered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REASON FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Yesterday the minister indicated to the House that his conversation with this colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, was privileged as between two lawyers and two cabinet colleagues. Following that conversation the minister admitted intervening or talking to the associate chief justice of the province of Quebec to see, and I quote: "that he was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty."

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister tell the House why he found it necessary to intervene to see that the associate chief justice of the province of Quebec did his duty, and what facts did he feel it was necessary to bring to his attention?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think a careful reading of Hansard would indicate that I did not communicate with the associate chief justice with a view to conveying information to him, but rather to obtain information from him.

An hon. Member: What was it?

Mr. McGrath: The record indicates that the minister felt it necessary to talk to the associate chief justice, and I quote from Hansard: "to see that he was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty." That is the quotation on the record. There is no qualification to it.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is on page 11457.

Mr. McGrath: In light of this extraordinary, admitted intervention by the minister, is he now prepared to tell the House and the country what facts he felt it was necessary to bring to the attention of the associate chief justice of Quebec, bearing in mind that this is the responsibility of the prosecutor and the defence attorney?

Mr. Drury: I think the hon. gentleman has one view as to the appropriateness or otherwise of the action taken, and I have another.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I am sure you have.

Mr. Drury: I would suggest that the course being followed by the Prime Minister, namely, to have this referred to and looked at by the chief justice of the province of Quebec, is the appropriate course.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—KNOWLEDGE OF JUSTICE MINISTER OF INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is to the Minister of Justice, who has the ultimate responsibility here. In view of the admission by his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, that he in fact intervened in a case before the court involving the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I want to ask the Minister of Justice if the Minister of Public Works acquainted him with the fact that he had spoken to the associate chief justice of Quebec, and would the minister tell the House what his reaction was to that admission.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the time, no. I think I should make it clear to the hon. gentleman and possibly to the House that there are two areas covered under the law. One is clearly stated in the Criminal Code as obstructing, perverting or defeating the course of justice.

Mr. McGrath: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Basford: I am answering the question. It is clear, under the Criminal Code, that it is wrong to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice. It is also clear that it is criminal contempt to have a private communication for the purpose of influencing a judicial decision. Those on this side of the House are bound by that law just as much as those on the other side of the House and all the people in the country. As I indicated yesterday, there is nothing in front of me which would indicate that either of those provisions of the law have been violated.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—VIEW OF PRIME MINISTER ON PROPRIETY OF INTERVENTION BY MINISTERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Public Works just said that he has a different view with respect to his responsibilities in the matter of intervening in the judicial process, I want to put a question to the Prime Minister. I want to ask the Prime Minister what his view is with respect, not to what two different judges have said, but to what his own minister has said in the House as recorded in Hansard at page 11457 where he admits that in a matter involving one of his colleagues he had a conversation with the associate chief justice of Quebec and said that the purpose of that conversation—and I quote it in full so that there will be no suggestion of misrepresentation—was as follows:

> . . . the only intervention that would be contemplated by me would be one to see that he was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty.

I was under the impression that the judge got his facts from the legal counsel in open court or from meeting in chambers with counsel for both parties to a dispute.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And the witnesses.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am asking the Prime Minister is it, in his opinion, the right of his ministers or any other ministers to get in touch with a judge to give him the facts and to order him to do his duty, which we take it for granted he would do without the intervention of the Minister of Public Works?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is making the case very forcefully and very correctly, and it is because of the seriousness of this that I am concerned with having the judges decide whether or not they have been aggrieved. I am simply answering to the hon. member that the associate Chief Justice has not to my knowledge complained about being influenced in any way. I do not expect him to make his complaint to me; I would expect him to make it to the Chief Justice of his court or perhaps to the Department of Justice.

● (1450)

An hon. Member: Or the council.

Mr. Trudeau: Until I have some knowledge of that complaint, surely, the hon. member would not blame me for taking the word of my minister that he has not attempted to influence anybody.

An hon. Member: We had his word.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that even if the judge does not complain that in his opinion there was intervention, surely the statements by the Minister of Public Works yesterday and again today show there was intervention.

In view of the seriousness of this situation and the effect it will have on the people of Canada generally as well as their respect for this parliament and the judiciary, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if instead of having this cozy "All in the family" arrangement by which he and the Minister of Justice are going to discuss the matter with the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec and then decide what if anything they will do, does he not feel he would be in a better position, Mr. Justice Mackay would be in a better position and the judiciary generally would be in a better position if he agreed to a public investigation? That way the public would not only know that justice has been done but it would be very clear to the public that it has indeed been done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add. I just see something objectionable in the hon. member's suggestion of a cozy arrangement with the Chief Justice of the Superior Court.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I assume that the Chief Justice of the Superior Court will not be influenced or indeed annoyed by the opinion of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister if he would not consider that a report being made by the Chief Justice of Quebec to the Minister of Justice and the latter reporting to the Prime Minister without any commitment from the government at this time that the report of the Chief Justice would be made public—how can one consider that to be anything but a cozy arrangement?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member did not hear the answer I gave a few minutes ago. As far as the government is concerned, we would welcome the Chief Justice making his report public. I am just indicating, because of the separation of powers which is held so highly on the other side, that I would not order him to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

HEALTH TESTS FOR PILOTS—REPORTING OF NEAR ACCIDENTS BY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the importance of ensuring airspace safety in Canada and the doubts raised in the public mind as a result of the statements made by groups and organizations involved in air transport, can the Minister of Transport tell the House whether the rules of his department require commercial pilots to submit to the breathalizer test before flying, whether it is mandatory for pilots and air controllers to report to the department all near accidents which may occur, and whether his department publishes the results of its inquiries and the causes of the near accidents?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are rules on the subject of the physical condition of pilots and their consumption of alcohol and drugs. It has not been necessary to follow these rules with any express advance testing. We have no reason to believe there is any interference with the application of these rules. In the case of accidents, there is a requirement for reports but it is certainly not easy to identify specific accidents by cause.

HEALTH

ALLEGATION MINISTER ASKED DR. CONNOLLY TO WITHDRAW CHARGE AGAINST WHITEHORSE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, when a person rises to ask a question my hon. friends opposite act as though they were about to say "Viva Cuba".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with the recent case in the Yukon where a charge was laid by Dr. Connolly of the Department of National Health and Welfare against the municipality of Whitehorse for permitting raw sewage to be dumped into the Yukon river. This was one of the minister's own officials. Did the minister ask Dr. Connolly to withdraw that charge and when he refused to do so did the minister have one of his most senior officials get in touch with Dr. Connolly and advise him that the minister had asked him to inform the doctor that unless he carried out his direction he would be dismissed?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I have given no such instructions. However, I have heard of the matter, but I should like to refresh my memory as to the facts. I gave no specific instruction to that effect.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. Whether they were specific or not specific did the minister advise the Regional Director of Health Services in Edmonton to inform Dr. Connolly that unless he withdrew the charge he would be dismissed?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, did he know that such directions had been given on his behalf?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would think he would be able to recall this case.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare has given three very direct answers to the questions asked by the right hon. member. If he has another question I will be prepared to permit it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if you have been listening you will have noticed the desire of government members to howl down anyone from this side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Castro never had more obedient supporters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister refresh his memory, and will he table the correspondence in connection with this charge as well as the refusal of the official in the Yukon to carry out instructions, so the action went ahead and instead of the fine being $5,000 the town of Whitehorse pleaded guilty and the fine was $100?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. member that I would look into the facts; I shall be pleased to examine the correspondence that may exist on that subject.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am well aware, sir, as I know you are, that this House has appointed you as the servant of the House, and not its master, with very wide discretionary powers with regard to deciding what is in order and what is not in order in the question period. May I merely say to you, sir, that we are all aware that this discretionary power in your hands has to be exercised with fairness and equality toward all members.

● (1500)

May I put my point of order this way. All members, including the Prime Minister, ministers and opposition members, participate equally in the rights, duties, responsibilities and privileges accorded to hon. members. This afternoon the Prime Minister on four occasions referred to his interpretation of a single judge's word. When I stood up and by way of preamble to a short, simple question to the chief law officer of the Crown attempted to put on record the actual words of the judge, Your Honour cut me off at the knees.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not propose to enter into a dialogue on this matter. I will simply say this as I was compelled to make a decision in respect of the hon. member's question. After being given the floor, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham put what I consider a more than adequate preamble to his question. I intervened, and I always intervene reluctantly, to ask him to put the question forthwith. I did this at the very moment he was about to quote something. In other words, I was saying directly that I thought he had put a long enough preamble and ought to put his question. The hon. member began asking the question and then began to read the quotation I had asked him directly not to read. In the circumstances, I do not see what other choice the Chair had.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On October 14, 1975, Your Honour informed the House that on September 3 you had issued your warrant for a by-election in the constituency of St. John's West. As the statutory six months have expired, I wonder if Your Honour can say why the date for that by-election has not been announced.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if I may anticipate the answer even though I do not believe you have called for ministerial statements on motions, I have something before me which may satisfy the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Too late.

Mr. Trudeau: Why am I too late?

An hon. Member: Time has expired.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister, I presume, is indicating his intention, on tabling of documents, to perhaps table a document which may be of some interest in this regard.

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL COVERING BY-ELECTION IN ST. JOHN'S WEST

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 41(2) I am tabling copies, in both official languages, of order in council No. 1976-507 ordering the issuance of a writ for a by-election in the electoral district of St. John's West, Newfoundland, on my birthday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the President of the Privy Council if there is to be any change in the announcement he made the other day. May I also thank the Prime Minister for the opportunity to present him with a birthday present later this year.

Mr. Paproski: On his sixtieth birthday.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when I last announced government business I said that Bill C-68 would continue to be the business before the House, to be followed by several relatively non-controversial bills. Because of the prolonged debate on Bill C-68 the order of business is to be changed. The next item of business is to be the Senate amendment to Bill S-10, followed by Bill S-8, Bill C-86 and Bill C-61.

On Monday we intend to call the first of the bills dealing with amendments to the criminal law. I should like the opportunity, as I told the House leaders, to discuss how we shall deal with that bill and the bill following to do with capital punishment. It is the desire of the House to have full and adequate discussion of these measures; at the same time, I am sure the House does not want discussion on these bills to occupy the time of the House to the detriment of other urgent legislation. I hope we can reach some accommodation on that matter and on the question the Conservative House leader raised for discussion of the petitions regarding redistribution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, a week ago today the Minister of Veterans Affairs made his welcome announcement concerning legislation respecting Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war. It was indicated that the legislation would be before the House in a few days. When will that bill be on the order paper, and can it be taken for granted that, since it will be dealt with quickly, we can interrupt the discussion on other bills to deal with that legislation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The matter is urgent. We are preparing the bill and it will be on the order paper in due course. But other matters also have priority. I hope we shall have his co-operation on them in the same way that he will have our co-operation on the matter in which he is interested.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,312, 3,650, 3,697, 3,781, 3,914 and 4,022.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Landlord provides all services, including janitor, heat, electricity, taxes etc., under lease-back to Crown.

SURVEILLANCE OF COASTAL WATERS

Question No. 3,650—Mr. Herbert:

1. What are the specific responsibilities in connection with the surveillance of coastal waters of the Department of (a) the Environment (b) External Affairs (c) the Environment (Fisheries) (d) National Defence (e) the Solicitor General (f) Transport?

2. Are any such responsibilities overlapping and by what means are the activities coordinated?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) The specific responsibilities of the Department of the Environment in connection with the surveillance of coastal waters include enforcement of all acts and regulations governing fishing activity, both Canadian and foreign, under the Fisheries Act, the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, North Pacific Fisheries Convention Act, Pacific Fur Seals Convention Act, North Pacific Halibut Fisheries Convention Act, Pacific Salmon Fisheries Convention Act and the Whaling Convention Act; the conduct of fisheries and oceanographic research; conduct of hydrographic charging; observation of ice; and the monitoring and surveillance of all activities in coastal waters that might lead to the impairment of the marine environment, including enforcement of the Ocean Dumping Act and regulations thereto, as well as other acts and regulations governing the protection of the marine environment. The department is assisted in the conduct of fisheries enforcement by air and sea surveillance undertaken on its behalf by the Department of National Defence. (b) The Department of External Affairs has no specific responsibility in connection with the surveillance of coastal waters. The department has a general responsibility for the international recognition and respect of Canadian sovereignty, and of the laws and regulations which are aspects of this sovereignty. The department is also responsible for the orderly development of international law, taking into account Canada's objectives relating to jurisdiction in coastal waters, and for the communication to foreign governments of the Canadian position based on information obtained from surveillance activities over Canadian coastal waters. (c) See (a) above. (d) The Department of National Defence is charged with the general responsibility to ensure that, overall, an adequate surveillance and control capability exists for the protection of Canadian sovereignty and security. Specifically, the department is responsible for the surveillance and control of Canadian coastal waters and their approaches to determine if there is any foreign military activities in these waters and if necessary to counteract such activity. In addition the Department of National Defence supplements and supports other departments in maintaining surveillance and control of non-military activities that might be prejudicial to Canada's sovereign interests. (e) The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is not primarily responsible for the surveillance of coastal waters. In the enforcement of federal statutes, however, patrols are made over coastal waters. (f) The Minister of Transport is generally identified as the minister responsible for maritime matters. Such responsibility applies with respect to navigation and shipping within Canada, and outside of Canada where Canadian ships are involved. Such administrative responsibility is legislatively provided for under the Canada Shipping Act, and relates to registration, certification of seamen, pilotage, wreck, salvage, safety and investigation, as well as the maintenance of lighthouses, buoys, and beacons, public harbours and a host of other matters related to marine safety and navigation. For the purposes of enforcement of the maintenance of ship-source pollution prevention standards, as well as search and rescue, the minister, through the Canadian Coast Guard, provides the marine element of Canada's activity in these areas, routine surveillance patrol included. All vessels when at sea are required to provide rescue assistance and to generally report all signs of environmental pollution. Rather than an overlap of activities, a better view would regard the activities of government and private shipping as being coordinated for the purposes of rescue assistance and environmental pollution control.

2. (a) Co-ordination of all government coastal surveillance activities is achieved by a) aerial and b) surface surveillance. Responsibilities in aerial surveillance overlap with: (a) DND for sovereignty and security. (b) DOE for fisheries. (c) DEMR for continental shelf exploration. (d) DINA for seismic vessel surveillance. (e) DOE for ecological and environment protection. (f) MOT for pollution from vessels. (i) annual consultation between DND and other departments to determine their forecast surveillance requirements and the programming of Canadian Forces' ship and aircraft operations to ensure these requirements are met; (ii) utilizing the Operational Co-ordination Centres at Halifax and Esquimalt for special-case surveillance missions. (iii) rescue and environmental pollution control operations are co-ordinated in any given case by the Rescue Co-ordination Centre (DND) and the Canadian Coast Traffic Centre (MOT) respectively. (b) Furthermore, there are regional and national coordinating committees administering the Ocean Dumping legislation chaired by the Department of the Environment which allows cooperative arrangements with the Department of National Defence and the Ministry of Transport.

BEAUFORT SEA STUDY COMMISSION

Question No. 4,022—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. What were the (a) names (b) duties (c) salaries of (i) the Chairman (ii) other members of the study commission that prepared the report entitled Offshore Drilling for Oil in the Beaufort Sea — A Preliminary Assessment?

2. Did the study relate to the dangers of pollution of (a) water (b) air and, if so, to what degree?

3. Did the oil companies financially contribute to the research and, if so (a) which companies (b) to what extent in each case (c) were (i) multinational (ii) national companies involved?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): 1. The report was the result of the work of many scientists both from the federal and private sectors. It was edited by A. R. Milne, Project Manager and B. D. Smiley, Project Biologist and incorporated the comments and observations of many departments. The final authority for the preparation of this report rested with a Steering Committee consisting of the following three members of Environment Canada. Dr. R. W. Stewart, Chairman, SX-2 $31,500-41,500, Director-General, Pacific Region, Ocean and Aquatic Sciences, Fisheries and Marine Service. Dr. J. Clodman, REM-3 $29,000-37,200, Director, Meteorological Services Research Branch, Atmospheric Environment Service. Dr. A. McPherson, SX-2 $31,500-41,500, Director-General, Western and Northern Region, Environmental Management Service.

2. The study considered that the pollution caused by oil in the water environment posed the greatest threat and the report concentrated on this aspect. The pollution to the air either by the natural escape of gas from a blow-out or by the burning of oil and gas in a countermeasure program was not considered to be as significant.

3. The oil industry contributed a total of $4.1 million to the Beaufort Sea Project through a direct transfer to Treasury Board. The industrial input was co-ordinated through the Arctic Petroleum Operators Association and also included the input of scientific and technical knowledge. There were eighteen companies involved and their respective contributions are as follows: Hunt International, multinational, $826,560, 20.16 per cent; Imperial Oil, multinational, $539,560, 13.16 per cent; Canadian Superior, multinational, $494,460, 12.06 per cent; Aquitaine, multinational, $319,390, 7.79 per cent; Dome Petroleum, national, $300,490, 7.34 per cent; Elf, multinational, $252,970, 6.17 per cent; Sun Oil, multinational, $241,490, 5.89 per cent; Mobil Oil, multinational, $214,840, 5.24 per cent; Gulf, multinational, $214,430, 5.23 per cent; Hudson Bay Oil & Gas, multinational, $173,430, 4.23 per cent; Pan Arctic, national, $120,950, 2.95 per cent; Shell Canada, multinational, $100,- 040, 2.44 per cent; Arco, multinational, $84,460, 2.06 per cent; Canadian Export Oil & Gas, national, $63,960, 1.56 per cent; Global Marine, multinational, $63,140, 1.54 per cent; Union Oil, multinational, $43,050, 1.05 per cent; Amoco, multinational, $37,310, 0.91 per cent; Tennaco, multinational, $9,020, 0.22 per cent.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEEDS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN DEFINITIONS AND CONTROL OVER MANUFACTURE, SALE OR IMPORTATION

Hon. Eugene F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of an concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not like the manner in which this bill was presented to the House originally and I do not like how the other place amended the bill. It was first amended in the standing committee of the House of Commons.

In Votes and Proceedings of December 19, 1975, the following is printed:

A message was received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate concurs in the first and second amendments made by this House to Bill S-10, an act to amend the Feeds Act, but has amended the third amendment, as follows:

Strike out the third amendment—

I suggest that the Senate amendment before us is in an unintelligible form. The Senate refers to lines 7 to 30 on page 3 of the bill. If the suggested wording is substituted for the lines cited, the clause does not read properly. The amendment appears to refer to the bill as originally passed by the Senate and not to the version sent by this House to the other place for consideration.

If the error in the amendment had been made by a committee of this House, the correction could be made by the Law Clerk or by unanimous consent. Since this amendment comes to us in imperfect form, contrary to our Standing Order 69—not from any member, minister or committee here, but from the other place—I suggest we do not have the power to alter the Senate message and the amendment must be returned there for correction. I leave the matter for your judgment.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I, too, am confused as to the amendment. I agree with the previous speaker that the amendment appears to strike out subsection (3) and substitute therefore the section that appears in the reprinted bill which came from the Senate. Reading the minutes of the Senate and Votes and Proceedings, it is very difficult to assess exactly what they did. The effect is fairly obvious, but it seems that the form of the amendment and the description in Votes and Proceedings do not bear much relationship to the reprinted bill. There is some fault in it.

The House should give consideration to the form in which it is presented, rather than discuss it when it is not clear what took place in the other place in relation to the amendment that had been made and incorporated in the original bill as it was returned from the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this matter is rather complicated and it may require some time for Your Honour to consider it. I submit that the point made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) is well taken. We are prepared to accommodate the Chair with respect to time. I understand that the next order of business is Bill S-8. If it is appropriate, we are prepared to proceed with debate on Bill S-8. That may be helpful to the government in the dilemma in which they find themselves.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, the Senate amendment to the bill referred to it by the House contains only one modification of substance to the bill as amended by the House on November 26, 1975. That modification is to remove the penalty limit of $2,000 that may be applied to a corporation if found guilty of an offence and convicted on indictment. The limit is replaced by provision for a fine in the discretion of the court. The legal advice given to officers in my department is that this is within proper procedures.

Mr. Speaker: It is obvious that the Chair will need some time to examine the documents and consider the point of order that has been raised and contributed to by hon. members. I think the wisest course of action would be to consider the next item of business and leave this matter with the Chair until such time as I have had an opportunity to look at it. Perhaps prior to five o'clock I will be in a position to make a definitive ruling on the point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the course that you propose is acceptable to the government. I might indicate my willingness, after reviewing the points that have been raised, to provide Your Honour with any wisdom I am able to muster.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this matter will stand for consideration later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTOR VEHICLE TIRE SAFETY ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH SAFETY STANDARDS FOR TIRES

The House resumed, from Monday, June 16, 1975, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Transport), that Bill S-8, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicle tires and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicle tires imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) had the floor at the time of the last debate. Unfortunately, he cannot be there today.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there was considerable concern over Bill S-8 with regard to the government wanting to have extensive records kept of tires being sold. However, the government has since changed its mind with regard to having this extensive recording system. It is indicated in a letter to the official opposition from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) that this section will be removed. Similar legislation was passed in the United States in 1966. Studies show that the record system was only 25 per cent to 35 per cent effective. There is a move on foot in the U.S. to abandon this scheme and simply require the tire consumer to fill in the details of the purchase on a card supplied by the dealer and mail it to the tire manufacturer or importer. I understand the government will be introducing a similar scheme for Canada.

In order to allay any fears with regard to tire safety, I wish to point out that Bill S-8 follows essentially the same outline as its predecessor, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, in its methods for instituting a single, unified set of government-regulated standards for motor vehicle tires. Out of the 20 million tires sold annually in Canada, six million are covered as original equipment of new motor vehicles by the regulations of the Motor Vehicle Safey Act. The remaining 14 million, however, are not covered by this legislation and may be manufactured and sold without having to conform to any federal set of standards.

There is a recall system. The establishment of a government-regulated recall system based on so comprehensive a set of records would cause much concern among tire manufacturers and distributors who see it as an unnecessary and extreme measure not worth the trouble and expense of its implementation. Between 50 million and 60 million transactions are involved in tire sales each year and it will be very costly for the manufacturer if he is held responsible for tracing each one. The expense of the proposed system would be reflected in an estimated 30 cents to 60 cents increase in the price per tire or a total of over $4 million annually to the consumer.

It is the opinion of the tire manufacturers that there are not enough incidents of recall or occurrences of defective tires leaking into the market to justify the cost and paperwork of the proposed record system when they already have efficient recall systems in effect. Tire companies, by the necessity of maintaining quality control, devote a large amount of time and capital to research and testing, along with recall systems which although rarely used are as effective as any possible. Therefore, there is an excellent system now working in Canada.

Canadian manufacturers have had to initiate very few recalls. Firestone of Canada, for example, has had to recall a series of tires that had reached the customer only once during their 53 years as a company, and this was because there was a possibility that they had not been properly installed on new 1973 Ford Mavericks. Because the cars themselves were registered, there was little difficulty in contacting the owners of these tires and the notification campaign was considered to be 100 per cent effective. Goodyear of Canada has had occasion to recall only one series of tires in the past five years on account of a very minor defect.

In conclusion, if the bill passed in its original form it would serve as a precedent for government meddling in the affairs of private industry on the pretext of acting for the public safety.

• (1520)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is not the bill in the minister's name, and would he not be closing the debate if he speaks?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion I have before me is in the name of Mr. Sharp, so the minister is speaking for the first time.

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the debate was opened by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale). I shall not devote time to stressing the clear objective of safety which is the purpose of this bill. The need for action in this regard was emphasized in the course of a coroner's inquest into an accident in Ontario during last summer, on June 27, at Cornwall. One of the recommendations made by the coroner was that tire manufacturers, in conjunction with the Department of Transport, should adopt more stringent testing procedures and that these tests should be enforced. This is what we are attempting to do as we apply safety standards to replacement tires as well as new tires.

I would simply confirm the comments made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. It has never been our view that an unnecessary burden should be imposed on those engaged in the manufacture or sale of tires, nor has it been our intention to incur unnecessary expense in the form of engaging extra inspectors to act on behalf of the government.

My parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Assiniboia, has written to the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) confirming that it would be our intention, in the course of the consideration of this bill in committee, to look favourable on amendments which would change the recording procedure so that a card procedure could be used on the basis of the purchaser having the burden of returning the card, rather than imposing an elaborate record keeping system on the seller. In addition, we would propose an amendment which would designate inspectors under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act as inspectors under the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act as well, thus avoiding duplication of inspection services.

With these changes, I commend the bill to hon. members and trust it may go speedily to committee for further consideration there clause by clause.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to commend the government for this general move. Let me say simply that the many coroner's reports I have read over the last 15 years point directly, and sometimes indirectly, to the fact that overloading of tires and tire defects are the cause of many highway deaths and injuries.

I hope that, in addition to allaying the fears of hon. members who have already spoken, the government will take this legislation very seriously, because aside from the odd case of tire defects being responsible for specific accidents it is my view that the overloading of tires per se by individual motor operators is the cause of many more accidents than we care to believe. As I say, leaving aside the question of obvious defects in the course of mass tire manufacture, it is my view that at least 35 per cent of the Canadian driving public are overloading their tires, and no amount of sophisticated investigation can tell the minister or the House to what extent overloaded tires are responsible directly or indirectly for motor vehicle accidents.

The overloading of cars on weekends or, for that matter, on any day of the week is a serious factor bearing on highway deaths and injuries, so anything the government can do to enforce the regulations in relation to this bill will play only a part in reducing what I call the worldwide epidemic of highway fatalities.

I realize we are verging upon a philosophical debate here when we talk about consumer protection. Do I have the right, when I go to a tire dealer, to look for a bargain? Certainly, I want to get the best possible tire at the best possible price. But we have to look at this very carefully. There are those who say we do not have the right to interfere with the free market; that a man should be able to buy whatever tire he chooses to put on his car. I can understand that point of view, but to my mind the only right I have when I go to buy a tire is to buy the safest tire for my car that modern technology can produce. I do not have the right, on a Friday night, because I can get a monetary bargain at a tire shop, to go out the next day and wipe out a whole family travelling to the country simply because I have saved a few dollars by putting cheap tires on my car.

We need to be clear about the rights of the individual in terms of what he can or cannot do when he goes shopping for a tire. I am not suggesting the minister should build up a bureaucracy, nor am I suggesting, as was done by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), that because the recording system failed in the United States it will fail in Canada. I am getting a little tired of that way of thinking. Our system does not necessarily have to be the same as the system used in the United States.

I believe the minister is willing to take a good initiative. I know all about the lobbying and the bureaucratic mess in the United States; I have been in touch with Mr. Nader on many occasions and I know in detail why the system failed in the United States. But there is no reason why it should fail in Canada. I have faith in the minister and his philosophy. Modern-day consumerism does not necessarily mean interfering in the marketplace. I believe that government, the public and the manufacturers have to work together, and if we do this in a sensible and adult way, goods can be produced at a reasonable price while yet being of a quality which ensures the protection of the individual.

I think we can find reasonably priced tires in the marketplace and at the same time be sure that they are the best tires that modern technology can produce. The public has a right to expect no less, whether the tires in question are new tires or replacement tires. With a minimum of expense and a maximum amount of modern-day surveillance, we can make sure that the individual buyer gets a good deal and the public gets the protection it deserves.

● (1530)

At the risk of being repetitive, while the minister quoted a specific coroner's report it is impossible to be specific about the number of death and injury-producing accidents that have occurred because the wrong tires were on a vehicle. In terms of manoeuvrability and handling, in terms of fatigue on a long journey, it is essential that a driver has the right tires on a vehicle. I think the minister will agree that no amount of specific investigation by a coroner would disclose that the tires were defective and caused an accident because one blew out, or something of that nature. In my view, the fact that the driver did not have the right tire on his vehicle during a long trip is a definite factor in the cause of a death or injury-producing accident.

Therefore, I commend the government for introducing this legislation and I hope the public and the industry will co-operate in playing some small part in reducing the worldwide epidemic of slaughter on our highways.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say only a few words on this bill. I want to echo the remarks of the previous speaker in saying we welcome the legislation, which provides some better standards in the area of safety, particularly of automobile tires. The legislation deserves the support of all.

May I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that if the minimum safety requirements and safety marking of tires results in reducing the multiplicity of sizes and qualities of tires with which the consumer is presently faced, then we will have accomplished a good deal. While I agree with many of the remarks of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), one thing I am sure he appreciates as well as the minister is that when Joe Consumer goes into a tire store and he is faced with a multiplicity of makes, sizes and qualities, he is thoroughly confused and does not know what he is buying.

Further, I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) will work very closely together in the area of false and misleading advertising of tires. If you were to believe all the ads you see in the newspapers, Mr. Speaker, you would be able to buy the best tire in the world for almost nothing. The consumer is being harassed or confused in two ways: first, by the multiplicity of sizes, qualities, makes and names of tires; secondly, by the kind of advertising of these tires presented to him.

Another matter that the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should look into relates to what are called standard tires. If a person makes the mistake of forgetting about the quality of the tires on a brand new car, he will automatically get tires on his car that are in fact unsafe and unreliable. The last time I ordered a car, Mr. Speaker, I ordered it with Oshawa delivery. It was a compact car and I picked it up in Oshawa. I had forgotten about the tires. The tires on my car were called standard tires, 4-ply, and then in brackets "2-ply rating". If you can get 15,000 to 18,000 miles out of these tires, Mr. Speaker, you are lucky. They are very cheap tires and you get cheap performance out of them.

I submit that that kind of standard for a so-called standard tire is totally inadequate. The tire is unsafe, yet it is automatically placed on a new automobile unless you specify that you want a higher ply rating, a higher quality tire. As a result of this, tens of thousands of brand new automobiles take to the roads in Canada with substandard, unsafe tires. It seems to me that this sort of nonsense of calling a tire a 4-ply tire, and then when you read the fine print you find it has a 2-ply rating, should cease.

I hope the result of this legislation will be that the standards are high enough that consumers, whether they purchase a new car without specifying a particular brand of tire, or whether they purchase new tires to replace worn out ones, will not have to try to work their way through the maze of tire sizes, qualities, names, kinds of tread, whether steel belted, non-steel belted, radial, nylon, rayon, polyester—everything but wool. I hope the legislation will require a sufficiently high standard that a good number of these sizes, makes and treads will have been eliminated from the market.

I also think the consumer should be much more realistic in purchasing something like an automobile tire. In trying to save a buck it may cost him his life or a limb. Cheap tires are cheap; you get exactly what you pay for. They are unsafe. Their quality is such that you cannot trust them at speeds of 60 or 70 miles an hour or on rough roads at slower speeds. There is a much greater tendency for them to break down under such conditions.

So far as advertising tires at cheap prices, special sales, and so on, is concerned, I am often amazed that one year a tire that I want of the size and quality I want will cost $40 or $45, and a year later, because they have developed some new size or tread, or a tire with a wider or narrower white wall, the tire is out of production and all of a sudden can be purchased for $15 or $20. This calls into question the kind of pricing practices used in selling tires which mislead the consumer if not falsely direct him.

If the safety requirements in this legislation raise the standards sufficiently high to reduce not only the massive number of sizes, kinds of tread, makes, and so forth, but also make it possible for the consumer to have a fair degree of confidence in the product he is buying, then the legislation deserves not only the support of all members of the House but the maximum of enforcement. How many times has our parliament passed legislation placing a better standard on a certain sector of our economy, and when the regulations come down or when instructions go out to the civil servants responsible for enforcing the legislation, the government's heart is not in it?

The tire manufacturers, just like the automobile manufacturers, plead and beg and go to whatever other lengths they have to in an effort to get the government to take it easy, to spread the regulations out over a period of several years so that they will have time in which to retool their plant. They will go to great lengths in order to get the government to lay off, with no consideration for the welfare, comfort and safety of the users of the tires. Suddenly the urgency concerns the welfare, the capital and the wishes of the manufacturer of the tires.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

We, the government, and those in the public service responsible for the enforcement of the laws should keep in mind that tire manufacturers are very adept at retooling very quickly when they come up with a new kind of tire. In that situation there is no problem. However, when regulations are involved, suddenly they need all kinds of time. They say they must have time to recover their capital costs, and so on. In such cases the legislation is not enforced for a period of many months, and sometimes years. We have seen this happen in many other areas such as packaging, labelling, and so on.

I hope this is not the case in this instance. I hope the minister and his officials will not allow the tire and automobile manufacturers, as well as the dealers, an inordinate length of time in which to abide by this legislation. That is not necessary. I hope it is mandatory at a very early date. I hope also that the public will realize that tires may cost a few dollars more but consumers will get a better quality tire. I hope they realize that in fact they will get their money's worth, because until now, on too many occasions and in respect of too many kinds of tires, even when people bought the best tires they were not getting their money's worth but, rather, were being conned into cleaning out the tire inventory of some manufacturer and were receiving inadequate and unsafe tires.

I hope not only that the bill passes quickly, but is enforced quickly and that we do not move in the way we have on many previous occasions and allow these people to make excuses and request an inordinate length of time in which to abide by the legislation. They always have been able to move quickly when it has suited their purpose. Now we want them to do so in order to suit the needs of the consumers of automobile tires in Canada.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the tire distributors in my area have expressed up until just recently very serious concerns and reservations concerning the very heavy onus and responsibility that would be placed upon them. I am pleased to see that the government has withdrawn the pertinent sections which would place the responsibility for registration and recording upon the small businessmen who already, as hon. members of this House know, are overwhelmed by the daily pressure to provide bureaucratic information that must cross their desks and which subsequently ends up in some remote area of Ottawa. So certainly there was an enormous sigh of relief or of well-being from the automotive dealers and the industry concerning the subject of registration.

I recognize the advantages involved in the registration of tires. I recognize the fact that now the responsibility will be on the consumer to fill out the proposed registration card and send it to the tire manufacturer. I wonder how many Canadian consumers will in fact bother to fill out the registration card. I suppose it will be similar to the situation in respect of the filling out of warranty cards in relation to electric frying pans, toasters, and some of the other commodities on the market which have a warranty. Some people are very assiduous and faithful in sending in the warranties—they protect their investment—while others simply ignore the warranty. The peril is then with the individual. The responsibility is on the individual to respond by sending in the registration card to the tire manufacturer.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) when he expressed concern about drivers who overload their cars. He referred to the high percentage of people who drive on the highway with overloaded cars. I suppose this is a matter of public information, just as is the matter of seat belts. There are those segments of the public who readily appreciate they have four objects on their cars which sometimes revolve at a very high rate of speed. These people realize that their tires can be responsible for their ultimate destiny instead of their ultimate destination. On reflection, however, I think it will be found that the majority of Canadians simply do not worry about how much air pressure they have in their tires. About the only time they have their tires inflated is when they switch from summer tires to winter tires, or from winter tires to summer tires, or if a tire becomes soft and this affects the steering of the car.

A person driving a car rarely looks at his tires. Possibly if he takes the car in for an oil change or a grease job the service station attendant, if he is interested, will draw the attention of the owner to a bad cut in his right front tire, or a developing bulge, or whatever the case might be.

When we review the statistics of automobile accidents and the contributing causes, and when we read about a serious accident, it is not uncommon to find that the owner of the automobile has been fined for driving with bald tires. Let us not lay all the blame for faulty tires on the manufacturers. It does not matter whether the owner of an automobile buys the most expensive tires or the cheapest; if he does not look after the tires, that is his fault and is certainly not the fault of the manufacturer.

The driver of a car tends to take the tires for granted. I can speak with some measure of authority on this subject because for some ten years I enjoyed the hobby, which turned out to be a rather expensive hobby, of amateur racing. To me and to my fellow drivers the tires were vitally important. I am amused by the advertising I see today concerning radial tires. I can remember the time when the general public did not know what a radial tire was, although at that time they were readily available, particularly to those involved in racing.

Although I do not wish to give a commercial at this point, I might say that the Englebert, Pirelli and the Michelin tires were excellent. Although I shall not give a commercial for the manufacturer, I can recall one set of tires on which I never succeeded in wearing out the tread. The sidewalls finally gave out before the tread. After hours of continuous racing I inspected those tires and they looked as if they had never been off the showroom floor. It is possible for a manufacturer to engineer tires, not for eternity but certainly of a very high standard and quality, just as it is possible to engineer tire obsolescence. It is the same thing with any other product on the market.

Finally, there is a concern which has been voiced today by one hon. member with reference to the quality of the tires installed on new cars. I have another concern which I think at some point down the line needs the attention of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and that is with reference to the advertising we see for automobile tires. Is the tiger claw better than the rain tire? What is a tiger claw tire? Is the tire which costs $49.95 much better than the tire costing $39.98? One can go into a service station and find a variety of prices for a variety of qualities of tires with a variety of trade names. One can drive up the street to another service station which is handling another line and be confronted with the same thing.

I hope the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or perhaps the tire industry itself, will decide not to try to confuse the public quite so much and will tell the public that there is a good tire worth so much and a cheaper tire worth so much, which is not recommended but would be all right for a little old lady who drives around at 20 miles an hour. I hope they will tell the public that there is a medium priced tire which is fine for lighter automobiles and small compacts. There is such a variety of choices that it must boggle the mind of the consumer. Surely they must think about the cheapest and go for the lowest quality, or about safety and go for the highest quality. I wonder sometimes if the most expensive tire is really the best tire, in terms of quality, handling and being best for a particular automobile. The radial tire is a great innovation, but there are certain cars which do not handle as well with radial as with conventional tires.

There are many areas which could be examined by the industry. It should not have to be done by the government. Perhaps Senate Bill S-8 will act as a guideline and an incentive to industry to address itself more seriously to the matters of which I have spoken. I note that the bill will be going back for possible amendments. I have noted a couple of clauses which I have some reservations about, for example, the one dealing with the degree of latitude for inspectors. The bill is a little overgenerous with regard to the actions of inspectors and how much freedom they may have. However, the basic thrust and intent of this bill, together with the amendments of which we have been assured by the government, make it acceptable. I compliment the minister and the government on its introduction, and that is something I am not very often inclined to do.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to give credit where credit is due, and when speaking about Bill S-8 we ought to compliment the members of the other place for the work they have done in bringing forward this legislation. Many times that part of the institution is discredited and maligned across the country, and I think this is an appropriate time to give it the credit which is due.

I am reminded of one of my favourite columnists of the Vancouver Province, a man by the name of Eric Nicol who, when he was reflecting on the appointment of the latest member of the other place, said: "This appointment gives new stimulus to the debate on whether there is life after death." However, when he referred to this chamber he said: "The House of Commons, in contrast, raises the question whether there is life before death." I suspect that that is a relevant question every once in a while.

This legislation gives us some heart and some encouragement with regard to the good, productive work that is done in the other place. In conjunction with that, I must compliment the members of the other place on the background work they carried out in order to make this bill as relevant and meaningful as possible, and on the fact that they conducted hearings in order to bring forward the evidence necessary for the drafting of this legislation and for making sure it is in line with the needs of the industry and the needs of the economy.

While I am not usually the first to compliment the government, in this case I compliment them for having broadly consulted the industry regarding what ought to be included in this legislation. We on this side and, I am sure, hon. members opposite have often tried to encourage the government to seek more advice from those who know best with regard to what kind of legislation would be helpful to the economy and to the benefit of the consumer in this area. There have been a good many who have already raised the issue of the kind of bureaucratic paperwork which would have been involved in the administration of this legislation should it have passed in its original form. That kind of discussion and debate brings me to a second point. I should like to pay a compliment to the government for listening to opposition from within its own ranks and from across the chamber to the extent that it is now willing to introduce an amendment which will, by and large, eliminate that kind of bureaucratic paperwork.

I have received representations from the retail industry in my riding. These people were very concerned about the onerous work which would have been involved in processing the registration of tires as outlined in this bill in its original form. I shudder to think of the great amount of paperwork which would have been involved and the cost which would have been passed on to the consumer had the legislation passed in its original form. So I sincerely compliment the government on the way it has responded to criticism in this regard.

However, there are still two areas I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the government in which they could help the industry; and by helping the industry I believe they would help consumers. I think it would be helpful if the government gave some sense of assurance and security to the industry regarding its own future in relation, for example, to tariff duties or import duties. I have some statistics regarding the net balance of the import and export of tires. I note that between 1967 and 1974, a period of eight years, the import of tires increased fourfold. Granted, the export has also increased.

However, it seems to me that if the federal government really wants to help indigenous industry in Canada, it could do so, not by wholesale protectionism and raising tariff walls around the country, but by at least making sure that the industry knows where it is in terms of the tariffs which would exist. If the tariffs are going to fluctuate between 17 per cent and 12 per cent, the industry will never know where it is and will never know how to plan the future. The government would be doing our economy a great service if it gave the industry some kind of assurance that it could anticipate the level of protection it will receive in the way of tariff duties.

I should like to refer to another area which has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), and that is advertising. I am sure it is common not only to the tire industry but to many other industries that a great deal of misleading advertising goes on—not so much outright lying about the quality of the product as the creation of a climate of "buyer beware". Some years ago I worked in a gas station and I was confused about the quality of tires I was selling to unsuspecting buyers. The company had a premium tire which was the top of the line, but not many years later it came out with a deluxe tire. It was up to the sales agent to make sure the buyer understood that the premium tire was no longer the top of the line, but the deluxe tire was. Then they produced a super deluxe tire. Again, it was a case of "buyer beware". Was the super deluxe the top of the line, or was a radial or steel belted tire better than the super deluxe?

I know the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has done a considerable amount of work to try to stop this kind of misleading advertising in all industries. There should no longer be a "buyer beware" atmosphere in the marketplace. I realize we cannot always take the buyer by the hand and make sure he is not going to get hurt; he has to exercise some intelligence and independence in the marketplace and be responsible for his own purchases—but he should not be subjected to misleading advertising.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I commend the government for introducing amendments that I believe will greatly improve the tire industry. I should like the government to entertain suggestions that in my opinion would give the industry a better sense of security in planning its direction and providing the kind of industry that Canada deserves. Also, the unsuspecting consumer should not be left to the devices of the advertising agencies of tire manufacturers when faced with the classification of tires.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the other place introduced this bill concerning vehicle safety by designing a trademark for Canadian-produced tires. I am pleased to see that on the "Canadian approved" label there will be included several other pieces of necessary information. One is the ply rating and what it means, and the other is the class of tire—premium, first-line, second-line or whatever. Thus, the buyer will have a yardstick and will know whether he is getting a bargain.

I agree that it was not fair or reasonable to leave the registration of tires in the hands of the corner service station but, rather, to leave it with the manufacturer. The information will be on the warranty returned to the manufacturer, and recalls can be made in an orderly manner. Changes of address and other things will be recorded by the manufacturer, who will have on hand the machinery to check vehicle records and ascertain who owns the tires if recall should be necessary.

The legislation covers two points of prime importance. In many cases I do not think the manufacturers were very honest in the manner of advertising tires. A few years ago most tires were classed as equal; the 4-ply rating was listed as a 2-ply tire. Two-ply tires were put on almost every new car in the country by the manufacturers of automobiles. In my opinion, that was risking the safety of everyone who drove on those tires. It was all very well in the city to use a 2-ply tire, although if you ran over a broken bottle or a small stone it was disastrous. In rural areas, however, with gravel roads the tires were a hazard. They lasted for only 10,000 or 12,000 miles. In my opinion, the public was being cheated by manufacturers who indicated that a 4-ply tire rating was being provided with a 2-ply tire. Under most off-highway driving conditions that was not true and the tires had to be replaced in a short time.

I know that some large companies in the automobile business sell tires which are classed as seconds. Perhaps there is a flaw in the tire which is repaired to meet certain standards, but still they are seconds. It will now be very difficult for a manufacturer to put a label on those tires that will tell the consumer they are second-hand tires, repaired tires or seconds in terms of some defect. As I read the bill, there are no provisions covering the sale of those tires. A large number of tires are culled by the tire manufacturers and sold through hardware stores or automobile stores. They are sold as loss leaders. However, this legislation will not guarantee that they will meet safety standards.

I shall now deal with radial tires. Long before domestic or North American manufacturers produced radial tires, European manufacturers of good reputation were making high quality radials. Now they are available in this country. You can get ordinary radials or steel belted radials. At one time, domestic manufacturers pretended in their advertising that non-radial tires were better than radials. We know that this is not necessarily true. For a long time North American manufacturers were reluctant to admit that the manufacturers of other countries made tires superior in safety and over-all quality to tires made in North America. I suppose Canadian and American manufacturers want nothing to do with a process they cannot control.

Now, of course, we manufacture radial tires. It is generally agreed that for certain drivers, certain automobiles and certain driving conditions, steel belted radials are best, as their performance is sometimes superior to that of other tires. Not all drivers like radial tires as they react differently and do not corner like conventional tires. Some say that the safety record of radials is superior to that of conventional tires. Personally, I do not like steel belted tires; this is just my own preference. I am not used to the way a car corners with them and find that a radial tire equipped car handles somewhat differently. But that is by the way.

I suggest that the government should institute a method for rating the safety of tires imported into this country. Foreign tire manufacturers ought to meet safety specifications laid down by the government, and consumers ought to be made aware of those specifications. As new tires are developed, new standards and specifications will also need to be developed to protect consumers.

This bill will not affect retreaded tires. It says nothing about the state of casings or when tires may safely be retreaded. Often a small manufacturer retreads tires in a small factory. The provincial motor vehicles branch exercises little control over him. Surely we should introduce standards for retreads. For instance, how does one know how well the retread will stick to the casing? The retreading process involves great heat and in my opinion no tire should be retreaded more than twice. The original casing should not be used for a third retread. Unfortunately, buses in my area use tires which have been retreaded three or more times. They ply the public highways on unsafe tires, often at unsafe speeds, and constitute a hazard.

Commercial vehicles also use retreads. How many members of parliament have driven behind a truck loaded to the limit and bouncing all over the road on retreaded tires? You know that it will not be long before some of those tires are spread all over the road—and you hope you are not behind the truck when it happens. I sometimes see two or three of the eight or ten wheels of a commercial vehicle out of alignment and out of balance. Sometimes these trucks are driven in a way not conducive to safety.

As retreads play an important part in truck operations, the government ought to establish standards governing the safety of retreads. I suggest that there should be stamped on such tires the original date of manufacture and the date of subsequent retreads. Then anyone could tell at a glance the history of the tire and judge how safe it was. Tire manufacturers should be made responsible for their tires. There is not much point in asking service station operators to report on the conditions of tires; they have enough work to do. As for the average motor vehicle inspector, unless the truck is 15 years old and needs a paint job, he is not likely to look at the tires.

Provision should be made for records of tires to be kept as many commercial vehicles drive coast to coast on retreaded, revulcanized tires. I suggest the government ought to consider this matter. I have never thought manufacturers should be the arbiters of safety standards and I am not willing to allow them this decision. I am, therefore, pleased to see language in this bill whereby manufacturers and the federal government jointly will establish standards for Canadian and imported tires. Standards will be arrived at in co-operation between the industry and the federal government. This is essential, because there are many new cars on the road today that are not very safe. Many of them I would not consider buying or even accepting as a gift. I could name some of them. However, anyone who drives them knows their defects and unsafe condition; they are fairly apparent. In some cases the motor is too big for the body, or the tire size is too small for the weight of the vehicle.

As the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) mentioned, this problem with regard to safety has not been met by the manufacturers. Tires installed on new cars are overloaded. One need only go back a few years when 2-ply tires were installed on new Chevs and Fords. You endangered your life by driving on a gravel road. I am sure many members could state unfortunate experiences they have had with 2-ply tires in rural communities. In other manufacturing fields as well, certain standards were set which the manufacturers considered safe, but they did not pass the standards of anyone else. The work of the motor vehicles branch should be extended considerably. This bill is a worth-while start.

No member should leave here thinking we have solved the automobile tire safety problem without considering the other two problems to which I have referred, retreads and substandard tires rejected by the manufacturer as top line tires. They are repaired and put on the market as seconds even though they are in new condition as far as the tread is concerned. Hopefully, all members, including those in the other place, will pursue this matter of safety and give consideration to these other two fields. Anyone who has driven an automobile is well aware of the fact that if you do not have safe tires, you not only jeopardize your own safety but that of everyone else.

I congratulate the Senate for the work they have done in this field, and the members of the committee who studied this matter in depth and suggested these changes. I hope those considering the question of safety will continue their vigilance and will provide the manufacturers with more stringent safety standards which they can and must meet, thereby ensuring a higher degree of safety for the motoring public of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I must commend the Senate for putting Bill S-8 before the House because it is a very important bill.

Nearly everything has already been said on the matter but I want to support the arguments made by those who spoke before me, particularly on the aspect of road safety. Statistics tell us that 16 to 18 per cent of road accidents are explained in part by the fact that a tire manufacturer recommends a certain size of tires, a certain type of tires guaranteed for so many miles, for example, in all safety, but after half of the mileage announced in the papers the tire is nearly worn out, that is the tire is no longer safe.

I am talking here about the category of tires that sell for $20 to $60 depending on the place where you buy them. That is quite amazing. As to a similar tire, of the same size, you do not know whether it is a tire that was repaired or retreaded, and it is sold for $20 to $60. Those who cannot afford to buy a tire at $60, or who are misinformed, could pay a tire $20, $22, $23 or $26, particularly in those retail chain outlets. I have no grudge against chain stores but I want to point particularly at the manufacturers who supply those chain stores, when they put ads in papers which mislead the consumer by offering him a $60 tire for $23 or $24 and alleging that it is of the same size and the same quality as the $60 one.

We also have that category of tires, the same category of tires that we would call reinforced nylon. Those types of tires are not balanceable. The evidence is there. I used some from different groups and those tires are very difficult to balance and they need to be balanced every 10,000 miles. If you do not have the time, the steering mechanism becomes disaligned. Yet those tires were paid a high price, about $55, $58 a tire depending on the company, and the consumer is misled on top of that. I was misled like others. That is why I think this bill comes at the right time and I would urge the government to be increasingly strict in this regard.

Also, I would not want to end my remarks before drawing the attention of the House on that question of retreaded tires, particularly on commercial vehicles. Mr. Speaker, many members have driven on highways like me. Certain tires have treads that come from trucks or buses, large treads up to two, three or four feet long and quite large. That tread comes off the carcass of the tire, and I think this is a cause of accidents, particularly if it is raining. If this tread comes off the casing of the tire, I believe it only means that such a tire should not be put back on the market. Either the company which retreads it is incompetent, or there is not enough control in the matter.

Those are the comments I wanted to make to the House; they show that there are more road accidents and, consequently, increases in motor vehicle insurance costs, not to speak of the many injuries and inconveniences.

I would also like to congratulate the sponsor of the bill. I know that the Senate made the first steps and that the government keeps heading in that direction, which I believe is the right one. Since cars are faster and faster due to the increasing number of horse-powers, tires must ever be stronger. We must also take into account the sudden changes in temperature that we have in this country.

I think the government is heading in the right direction and they should make it more and more difficult for a manufacturer to put tires on the market, so that consumers should not be deceived.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I had not originally intended to take part in this debate, but I felt moved to address a few remarks to this legislation for a couple of reasons, one which is personal in the sense that I should establish the fact that the member for Saskatoon-Biggar has been in his place trying to be recognized in the question period for a couple of days, and just to remind Mr. Speaker that it is possible to recognize me even in the course of an important debate such as this one. The second one is, of course, the fact that the minister responsible for this particular piece of legislation is my friend and colleague from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), and somehow I feel compelled to stand and address myself to legislation for some reason whenever he is involved in it, because of my friendship and admiration for him.

The fact of the matter is that I am not addressing this particular legislation as an expert on tire manufacture, as is the case with some of my colleagues, but rather as a consumer with some interest, which I am sure is shared by many members in this House, in the area of automotive and automobile safety, motor vehicle safety, and in this case motor vehicle tire safety.

Mr. Speaker, I think this piece of legislation is complementary to existing legislation on the books now, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. In other words, there is great similarity between the provisions of this particular bill and the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act itself as far as certification of acceptable safety standards, in this case tires, and, in the case of the act, motor vehicles generally. I would like at this time to commend the minister for his flexibility with respect to representations that have been received in connection with this legislation.

I would also like to commend my colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), for the particular initiative he has taken in this case to try to bring forward some amendments, some changes to the legislation that are rational and reasonable. The result, I think, will be to remove a very heavy obligation on the average, small, tire businessman and to place that obligation with respect to tire safety more in the hands of the tire manufacturer.

I think we are all in agreement that this is a worth while and very valid point that has been taken by my colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth, and the ministry has seen fit at this point in time to accept the suggestion and to indicate by correspondence to the member its intentions to bring forward amendments to the legislation.

I would like to address myself to two aspects with respect to this legislation because of the similarity that I see between this bill and the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. Possibly when the minister is closing the debate on second reading and responding to the inquiries and suggestions made during this debate he will also be good enough to elaborate on whether or not my apprehension is well founded, or whether provision has been made to avoid a pitfall which may be contained in the bill. I have been in correspondence with the minister in respect to some complaints on particular defects that I have received with reference to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, of which the minister, I am sure, is aware.

I raised with the minister at that time an inquiry as to the operation of that act because it was, quite frankly, not clear to me whether the act was being interpreted in accordance with my reading of it. The complaint I raised with the minister was that the only motor vehicle defect which is considered by the Ministry of Transport or the appropriate agency of the ministry was of such a nature that the operator of the vehicle would not have reasonable warning of the defect.

In other words, if I understand the correspondence which I have had with the Department of Transport in this area, it was the case that the defect was one which must make itself obvious or apparent and of which the driver or owner was or should have been aware, before the agency of the department involved in defect investigation would be seized with jurisdiction and responsibility. The extent to which this interpretation might apply is rather questionable. The example I presented to the minister was one of alleged defects in the steering mechanism, and the response I received from the Department of Transport was that because of the fact there should have been, and from their investigations usually was, a cracking sound in the steering mechanism, this should have put an operator on guard for defect. Therefore, this was not the kind of defect they would normally concern themselves with.

It seemed to me, on the basis of that response from the department, that I should first get clarification from the minister of the interpretation and, second, if that in fact is the case, I had made a representation that I thought the department should concern itself with defects regardless of whether or not a prudent man might in fact have noticed something wrong with the vehicle. The same questions would apply with this tire standards bill. If there is any defect at all with respect to a tire or a motor vehicle, it seems to me there should be an investigation. If a defect is reported to the department, there should be an investigation and appropriate action taken, regardless of whether it is the kind of defect an operator might have prior notice of in the normal operation of a vehicle or, in the case of a tire, in the way in which the tire seemed to operate on the vehicle.

I would appreciate very much at this point in time, and possibly in anticipation of a letter which I will receive in due course—or if the minister is going to address himself to this bill on second reading to close the debate—if he would simply clarify that point which I now raise and possibly enunciate the department's official policy with respect to the reasons for such interpretation, or his concurrence that some change should be made to this legislation and the legislation respecting motor vehicles.

I want to go back, if I may, to the amendments that are apparently being suggested to this legislation by the minister. It seems to me there is no complaint about the standards and the certification aspects of the bill. Apparently they have received the approbation of the Rubber Association of Canada which speaks on behalf of the tire manufacturers in our country, and therefore there seems to be general acceptance of the main part of the bill. As I say, I am glad to see that there was a reasonable amount of flexibility shown by the department by agreeing to change the provisions of the bill whereby every dealer would be required to keep detailed records of sales and certification requirements.

This would, of course, place a very substantial burden on the small businessman and there are many thousands of small entrepreneurs across our country who, Lord knows, have enough facing them as it is. I think those amendments are worth while and are worthy of our support, in effect providing for the consumer a form that can be submitted to the manufacturer. The matter of registration can be taken care of in this manner, as is done in the case of many other appliances, utensils and commodities of every description.

I want to indicate, on second reading, that I fully support the intent of this legislation. Anything we in parliament can do to increase the safety aspect of motor vehicle operation will receive our almost unanimous support. Our comments here are meant to be of a constructive nature so we have the best possible legislation, and I trust suggestions from the opposition will be accepted from time to time since we have such outstanding and vigilant members as the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth, who has brought forward rational and sensible proposals for the government on each occasion I have heard him speak.

In conclusion, may I indicate to the House that my investigation of this matter has indicated that we have a very good record as far as the Canadian tire manufacturer is concerned. That is to say, there is very little evidence of a serious tire defect problem affecting the safety of our motor vehicles, and the industry is to be commended for this. But that is not to say that we should not in fact be vigilant in the interests of the average citizen who operates a motor vehicle. A growing number of our population drive motor vehicles. Apparently something in the vicinity of 80 per cent of all travel in Canada is by motor vehicle.

I understand it to be the case that these standards will apply not only to our own domestically manufactured tires but also to tires that are imported. I also understand that tires imported into Canada account for something in the vicinity of 50 per cent of all tires sold in Canada. I think another reason the bill should be supported is that it is desirable that we have a uniform standard of tire regardless of the place of manufacture, a responsibility which is placed upon those who bring tires into this country for sale.

Certain members on the other side are now indicating that they wish me to speak for another five minutes. I am hesitant to do so as I feel I have made the contribution that I wished to make. I close by commending my colleague from Halton-Wentworth, and also the Minister of Transport for his approach to this particular legislation. May I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence in hearing my point of view on this very important matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT AND THE RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE SETTLEMENT OPTIONS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-86, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to move second reading of Bill C-86, an act to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. These two acts are perhaps less familiar to hon. members than some of the other statutes embodied in the veterans' charter. Because of this, Mr. Speaker, it may be useful for me to describe very briefly their purpose and scope.

Parliament enacted the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act and the Veterans Insurance Act to provide access to life insurance coverage primarily for veterans not able to secure this form of economic protection for their dependants through commercial carriers. Eligibility under the legislation, however, was not restricted to those faced with that difficulty and insurance coverage was available to all veterans.

The Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act provided coverage of up to $5,000 for veterans of World War I. Approximately 48,000 policies were issued between 1920 and 1933, representing a face value of just over $109 million; 2,500 policies remain in force with a face value of $5½ million. Some 18,000 contracts have been settled as death claims and a similar number for their cash surrender value; 9,000 contracts have been terminated for other reasons.

The Veterans Insurance Act, which applies to veterans of World War II, received royal assent in August, 1944. This act provided coverage of up to $10,000. As with several other legislative provisions for veterans, October 31, 1968, was established as the closing date for applications for the issue of policies; 56,000 contracts were entered into, providing $185 million of coverage; 19,000 policies, for a face amount of over $60 million, now remain in force; just over 9,000 policies have been settled as death claims; 23,500 were surrendered for their cash values and 4,200 were terminated for other reasons.

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the bill before us. Its purposes are, first, to change the manner of insurance settlement as policies mature through the death of the insured and, second, to bring the two insurance statutes into harmony with other social legislation concerning common law unions. Some hon. members will recall that they have received representations about these matters from constituents who are either policyholders or beneficiaries. I am pleased to have had these representations brought to my attention by those hon. members. Similar representations have been made directly to me and to officials of my department. These proposed amendments are the government's response to that very clearly identified need.

Specifically, the first amendment provides an option in the manner of settlement of insurance claims which is not available now to the insured veteran or to his beneficiary. It permits a policyholder to elect to have full policy proceeds paid in a lump sum to his beneficiary or beneficiaries on his death. This option is also extended to the beneficiaries who will also have the choice of taking proceeds in a lump sum or as an annuity at the time the policy becomes payable. As the legislation now stands, immediate death benefit may only be paid up to $2,000, with the balance paid as an annuity. The only exceptions to this manner of settlement are those cases where policy proceeds are not greater than $3,000 for each recipient. Under these circumstances, proceeds may be paid in a lump sum at the request of the beneficiary and with the consent of the minister. It will be clear to hon. members that this amendment recognizes that policyholders and beneficiaries are the best judges of the type of policy settlement which meets their particular needs most effectively. The government considers that the current legislation inhibits the freedom of choice of those directly affected by it.

● (1650)

The second amendment permits the recognition of a common law spouse as the beneficiary of an insurance contract. As hon. members know, similar recognition of common law unions has already been incorporated into other social legislation, including the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. The bill provides that a common law spouse designated by the insured as the beneficiary of his insurance policy may be paid the proceeds of the policy if the couple have resided together and have publicly represented themselves as man and wife for a period of at least three years where there is a bar to their marriage, and at least one year's duration where there is no such bar. This change in the legislation enables compliance with the expressed wish of the insured with respect to disposition of the proceeds of his insurance policy. This is not possible under the present legislation.

If parliament approves the bill now presented, my department will inform all policyholders and annuitants under both acts of the implication of the changes and will provide ample opportunity for present contracts to be adjusted as desired.

Mr. Speaker, before I close may I say, as has been said on previous occasions, that all hon. members of this House have consistently shown a high level of interest in veterans' legislation and in ensuring that the contribution made to the national interest by those we refer to as veterans is adequately recognized. I believe that the bill before us reflects that concern of this government and of this House. I hope the House will ensure speedy passage of this bill for early incorporation in the veterans' charter.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure, on behalf of the official opposition, to speak in support of Bill C-86 as presented by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). This is a routine bill to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. It will allow insured persons and beneficiaries to opt for certain variations in the manner of payment under contracts of insurance. It will also deem designated beneficiaries, under prescribed circumstances, to be surviving spouses of the insured.

As the acts now stand, payment to a beneficiary under an insurance contract is as a lump sum not exceeding $2,000 with the remainder, if any, payable in some form of annuity as decided on by the insured person. The amendments in Bill C-86 would give the insured person the option to decide that the beneficiary should be paid the full face value of the policy or a lesser amount with the remainder to be paid in some form of annuity as decided on by the insured person.

Additional amendments in Bill C-86 give the beneficiary the right, after the death of the insured person to opt to be paid the commuted value of all future annuity payments in a lump sum or to opt for some other combination of lump sum and annuity payments. In other words, the beneficiary can, after the death of the insured person, alter the terms of payment of the policy. I think this removes the rather paternalistic way in which the act has had to be administered in its present form. It has been sort of a "father knows best" situation, a situation in which only the department knew how these benefits should be distributed. I think a realistic approach has been taken in respect of this change. I think it is a realization of the fact that the veteran's beneficiary has better knowledge of the financial situation in which he or she may find themselves after the death of the insured.

Clause 4(2) and clause 6(6) amend the acts for the benefit of common law spouses. We know the officials of the department have run into some difficult situations where the surviving spouse has perhaps lived with a veteran for up to 30 years as man and wife, but on the basis of the present legislation was deprived of benefit under the act. These amendments, as I say, provide that an insured person may designate as a beneficiary, as if that person were his spouse, someone with whom he had been living immediately prior to his death for a period of not less than three years if a previous marriage of one of the persons prevented their remarriage, or not less than one year if there was no prohibition against their marrying. This provision—I think this is an important aspect—is subject to the discretion of the minister who must be satisfied that the two lived together and represented themselves as man and wife. A new amendment to the acts would allow payment to be made to the deemed spouse even if the insured misrepresented his relationship to that spouse.

I think this clause which gives ministerial discretion is a mechanism to correct any obvious injustices arising out of a common law relationship and greatly changes the position of a surviving spouse of a legal marriage. There has been some question about this, but it seems to me that the ministerial discretion here is most important. I am sure the minister will exercise the proper discretion should some dispute arise between the spouse by a legal marriage and the common law, surviving spouse. It appears that nothing in this legislation affects the validity of any payment of insurance money made to a beneficiary under the terms of the Veterans Insurance Act of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act prior to the coming into force of this new act.

This bill allows greater flexibility to both the insured person and the beneficiary in respect of how insurance should be paid. It also meets the case of common law spouses. We in the opposition see no reason to oppose passage of this bill. The members of the official opposition who are interested in this legislation have discussed it with veterans. I can indicate to the minister that there will be no opposition to its passage. I assure the minister we will give third reading to the bill this day or, I might say, at this hour.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment this evening are as follows: The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre)—Government Administration—Alleged discrepancy between item in estimates and in pamphlet "How your tax dollar is spent"; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Research—Suggested reconsideration of freeze on funds; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Penitentiaries—British Columbia—Request for report on seizing of hostages.

Before proceeding with private members' hour, I indicated earlier that I had hoped, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) concerning the difficulty with regard to Bill S-10, I would be able to come back at this hour with a decision. It will not, regrettably, be possible to deal with this matter until tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When I called it five o'clock, I hope it did not sound as though I were disagreeing with the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) when he suggested that we could dispose of this bill in this hour. If the House would like to suspend private members' business in this hour to deal with Bill C-86, I should be quite happy.

● (1700)

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to surrender private members' hour if the House would set another time to provide me an opportunity to proceed with my bill, Bill S-30.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, yes, we agree.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have all the ingredients of a very incomplete agreement. Everyone seems to be agreed that this hour might be used to proceed in the suggested manner, provided the hon. member be given another hour to proceed with his bill. I do not know how that can be agreed with any degree of certainty. The battle lines having been very clearly drawn on this matter one week ago, it is evident that private members' hour today should, and will, be used to discuss further the bill regarding the bank incorporation which was before us a week ago.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA

The House resumed from Thursday, February 26, consideration of Bill S-30, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: We are now resuming discussion on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) which, at the request of the Chair, was held over until today and on which the hon. member gained the floor at about three or four minutes to six last week.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) has placed on the order paper a series of amendments for discussion at the report stage. I want to discuss the impact of those amendments as a whole because in point of fact their net effect is to express an expanded negative to the general principle of the bill before us, Bill S-30.

The point I want to make is that the purpose of Bill S-30 is to take an already existing financial institution lawfully operating under the jurisdiction of provincial authority, and to transform that institution into a bank which would conform to the laws of this parliament and this jurisdiction. In order to be able to change the operations and the structure of that organization, operating lawfully under a particular jurisdiction, to one which could operate under the jurisdiction of the Bank Act, it is necessary to provide certain changes in order to bring the organization known as IAC into conformity with the Bank Act.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The amendments proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge go to the heart of this change. If it were possible for the people behind the proposal to create the Continental Bank to proceed by way of a model bill as outlined in the Bank Act, they would have been most happy to have done so; but because they were taking an existing organization and wishing to transform it into an organization operating under the Bank Act, it was necessary for them to engage in long discussions with officials of the government and the regulatory agencies in order to be able to work out a transference of this organization from one jurisdiction to the other.

Therefore, the purpose of Bill S-30 is to take an already existing institution, operating under provincial law, and transform it into a financial institution operating under the Bank Act, a law of this parliament. What the amendments do, I submit, in whole and in part is violate specifically and directly the total aim of the bill, and as such can only be considered an expanded negative or an attempt to do by the back door what cannot be done by the front door.

If Your Honour wishes, I can run over the amendments and explain individually and collectively what their effect would be. I do not know whether Your Honour would like me to proceed in that way, or to deal with them all to show what their collective impact would be. It is in their collective impact that I believe the point can be shown to the greatest degree and with the least amount of doubt. If Your Honour could indicate in which way the Chair would like me to proceed, I would be delighted to comply.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member is one which is usually raised with respect to each individual motion, and dealing with a point of this sort in respect of all the motions in their collective effect puts the Chair in a very awkard position. It is a rather unique approach to this kind of point of order. I think the point of order raised last week by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was of a more general nature, that is, whether there ought to be a report stage in the form it is now before the House.

However, what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) is saying is that each motion, in its impact, has the effect of being an expanded negative vis-à-vis the particular subject area of that motion and technically it probably ought to be argued individually; and I suppose there ought to be a counterargument, individually, as to whether that is in fact the case. I presume, however, that if we were to do it in respect of one motion, the same argument and the same judgment would likely prevail in respect of the others.

I think, to keep the matter clear on the record, we really ought to consider, before taking the argument of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that we are really dealing with motion No. 1 and than he can put his argument in respect of that motion, I can allow counterargument and further discussion on that particular motion, and make a ruling. Then presumably my ruling, having had application to motion No. 1, might be expected to have similar application to the others, and we can lay the point aside. However, I am open to discussion.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the problem which faces the Chair, yet in some ways we have to deal with this as a package; although if Your Honour prefers, I can deal with each one separately. However, what has to be said about each of them really applies to the entire group of motions, although with somewhat different impact.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) accuses the mover of these motions of trying to do something through the back door which would not be permitted through the front door. I think the accusation is more appropriate to the sponsors of this bill. The fact of the matter is that the Bank Act quite clearly does not permit this kind of change to take place. There is no law which permits this kind of change to take place, and therefore they have taken the model bill of the Bank Act, twisted it, turned it and distorted it, in order to create a very special set of exemptions which the Bank Act was never intended to accomplish.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Saltsman: We are not opposed to IAC turning itself into a bank. We have not even taken a position as to whether the Bank Act itself should be altered in order to permit things of this nature to take place. What we are saying is that we do not think it is appropriate for the sponsors of this bill to drag it in through the back door in the guise of the Bank Act with amendments to the Bank Act. It seems to me that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is arguing that it would not be possible for IAC to transform itself into a bank if these amendments went through, and the result of these amendments would turn the present bill into the model bill which is called for by the Bank Act.

I should like to make a technical point which Your Honour will certainly want to check into. There is nothing to prevent IAC from becoming a bank if all these amendments are accepted by the House. What is at stake is not whether IAC can become a bank, but under what conditions IAC can become a bank and whether the long-standing traditions and practices outlined in the Bank Act are to be upheld. The question is not whether IAC can become a bank, but how big a bank it can become. The assets of IAC are now of sufficient size that they can remove sufficient of those assets, convert them into a bank and continue their present operation under IAC. The difficulty, and what IAC does not want, is to break its corporate structure, the interlocking directors, and all the holds it now has.

Nothing in our amendments prevents it from becoming a bank. We have agreed to the formation of banks in the past. If IAC were to take part in those aspects, it could easily have a corporate structure, as does the Unity Bank and other banks. That is a technical issue that it seems to me Your Honour would want to take under advisement.

I would hope Your Honour would see the amendments as being a way of preventing debate on what is really a very important issue, or cutting short debate on what is a very important issue and a very critical question for this House; that is, whether this kind of conversion of assets, which is strictly prohibited by the Bank Act, and a fundamental change of this kind can be made through the back door by these outlandish changes to the model bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Edmonton West, I want to recall to the House that we are dealing with one rather unusual point; that all of these motions ought to be ruled out because their effect as a package is to negative the purpose of the bill. With respect, I would think the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge goes right to the heart of the matter in the remarks he just made; this is, the point of decision would be that so long as the effect of the amendments is to leave this bank incorporated in some way, shape or form, I could scarcely accept the argument that the effect is to negative the bill.

If it is generally agreed it remains some kind of bank under some kind of conditions, what those conditions are would remain a matter for subjective and procedural argument on the motion. If I considered all motions should be ruled out of order at the same time, the only question in my mind would be whether that would leave an incorporated entity as a bank in some way, shape or form. If it does, I would have to set the hon. member's motions aside.

The hon. member for Edmonton West was interrupted in his remarks when he asked for some direction, so I will return to the hon. member for Edmonton West and then to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would have been happier if the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) had spoken to the point of order rather than to the substance of an argument in principle that he was advocating. In so far as IAC turning into a bank is concerned, that is totally immaterial to the point of order. On the point of order, if it is the allegation of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge that Bill S-30 is a derogation of the model bill, then I would point to amendment No. 2 which strips the bill of any provisional directors, does not substitute any provisional directors, and therefore is in direct contravention.

Bill S-30 cannot qualify under the Bank Act. The Continental Bank could not thus be incorporated at all, in any way. Therefore, I think it is the answer to the interim argument put forward by the Chair that is the point at issue before the Chair at the present time, and that whether there is a bank incorporated, in whatever form, is not for the Chair to decide.

All I say is that the effect of motion No. 2 is not to have a bank at all. In its attempt to remove every reference to IAC it is, in effect, an expanded negative. If the desire expressed by the hon. member a moment ago is that the Continental Bank be not incorporated, then the only thing to do is to vote against the bill. That is all the question of an expanded negative is. Whether I vote one way or another is immaterial to the objective of these amendments. All I say is, what is the effect of such amendments?

I am putting myself strictly on the point of order, very narrowly on the point of order, not as the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge did, who argued some philosophical argument about a bank and a financial institution having grown so big it is going to do something with its assets. That has nothing to do with the point of order, in my respectful submission. He can hold his philosophical viewpoint, and that is fine, but it is for some second reading speech which I did not hear him make, nor was that point put forward in committee. Again, it is a strange campaign to strip IAC. I say, on the point of order, every one of these amendments goes to the question of being, in effect, an expanded negative.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself to the very narrow point which Your Honour raised, that is, even by the carriage of all of these amendments taken as a group, with which position the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge and myself are in agreement, I would direct Your Honour's attention to motion No. 3 which calls for the deletion of clause 6 of the bill which reads as follows:

This act shall be construed to confer upon the bank—

That is, the Continental Bank.

—all the powers, privileges and immunities, and to subject it to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in the Bank Act, except as provided in the Bank Act or in this act.

If that particular motion were to carry, then there would obviously be no bank possible as a result. As the hon. member for Edmonton West has pointed out, this is perhaps also the case with motion No. 2. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge raised the question dealing with the transformation of IAC Limited into the Continental Bank and the way in which one can proceed. That is another point of order which I should like to argue, because there are certain problems with IAC being incorporated in one jurisdiction and not being able to make changes under the law of a further jurisdiction to submit itself to the provisions of the model bill as outlined in the Bank Act. It is simply an impossibility for IAC to be able to do that. That is a further point I should like to argue in conjunction with the general argument as to the inadmissibility of these motions as a group, if Your Honour should take that position.

I have just addressed myself to the narrow point of what would happen if this motion were carried. My submission would be that no bank can exist were motion No. 3 to carry.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the preliminary opinion that Your Honour gave from the chair, it is not necessary for me to make one of my long dissertations because I strongly agree with the preliminary view that you stated. Like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), I believe at this point we should confine ourselves to the narrow issue of whether this series of amendments constitutes an indirect form of negating the bill and therefore should not be allowed.

I hope Your Honour will not be cross with me if I remind you that earlier today you indicated to some of us that a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux was always a great help, because I have in my hands a ruling by your distinguished predecessor. It was given on February 13, 1969, in connection with a report stage amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman).

● (1720)

The main issue on that occasion was the right to move a report stage amendment to a private bill. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux ruled in favour of that, and you so ruled last week, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux pointed out that under certain conditions he would not have been able to allow several of such amendments. He said, specifically, that if there were before the House a bill with three clauses, and if there were three separate motions moved by three hon. members to delete each of the three clauses, the Chair would have to rule that the three motions, the consequence of which would be the loss of the bill, could not be accepted. We have before us a 24-clause bill and we have not put down amendments seeking to delete every one of the 24 clauses, but only 11. The matter therefore, does not come under the ban indicated by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on February 13, 1969.

Your Honour's predecessor distinguished, in that important ruling, between the committee of the whole stage and the report stage. He said that in committee of the whole we deal with individual clauses and a motion to delete a clause is simply an expanded negative, and therefore is not allowed. We simply vote on the clause. But at report stage we are dealing with a bill, and motions put down are motions to amend the bill. It has been clearly said, first, that report stage amendments to amend private bills are in order; second, that provided they do not constitute in themselves the total negation of the bill, they are in order.

As has been said, this is a bill of 24 clauses, but there are only 11 proposed report stage amendments. Some of the clauses are left intact and some of the clauses are to be altered. In the result, even if all the report stage motions carried, there would still be a bill. It might not satisfy the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) or the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), but there would still be a bill.

An hon. Member: But no bank.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says, "But no bank." That is a point of substance, perhaps, which can be debated later. Does the status of the bank depend on this bill, or could it be a bank under the Bank Act? I am ready to admit that perhaps some of the report stage motions go too far in that they seek to wipe out quite a few clauses. For that reason Your Honour made good sense by saying you could hardly make a blanket ruling on all report stage amendments. You might decide some are out of order. Yet to be taken in by the views of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and arguments that these motions should not be allowed because they involve expanded negatives would be a mistake.

As Your Honour said in your preliminary views, if these motions were put and carried there would still be a bill. That being so, it seems to me that the right of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge to present these motions is established. Perhaps he would not object if you found two or three of them out of order in terms of how they fit into the total structure of the bill. I submit that he has the right to move a series of report stage amendments. Bear in mind that this is the report stage where we are dealing with a bill, not committee of the whole where we deal with clauses. The rule concerning expanded negatives does not apply and I hope, therefore, that your Honour will allow this series of report stage motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I believe the remarks you just made were quite to the point, but if I may, I would simply add that these amendments were brought in to preclude so to speak the establishment of the bank. I would add this in support of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). With due respect, I would not wish those amendments to be considered collectively.

For instance, when we met the promoters of that bank, called Continental Bank, they were somewhat reluctant to name the bank's shareholders, because already there were people holding a good number of IAC Limited shares. This was violating from the start the Bank Act. They told us they would comply with the Bank Act if there were chances the bill would go through in the House of Commons. All this speaks well for the research done by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge. Amendment No. 10, bringing a new facet to his criticism, provides, and I quote:

d) by striking out lines 35 to 47 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"The persons who are the directors and officers of IAC Limited on the coming into force of this Act shall be considered to have been duly elected or appointed in accordance with sections 19 and 21 of the Bank Act."

The officers now working for IAC Limited, who promoted the bill, want to protect the sponsors of the bill or the persons holding IAC shares. They did not state clearly whether they would comply with the question.

I believe all this has been partly clarified in committee, and the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge saw fit, because there had been no thorough clarification, to introduce this pertinent amendment which, in my view, certainly must be discussed separately.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I return to the original difficulty, the proposal of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that these motions should all be ruled out of order at the same time because their combined effect would be an expanded negative at this stage of the bill. Having listened to argument, I am not persuaded that that ought to be done. The question is: If these motions pass, will there still be a bill and a bank? There is considerable difference of opinion about that, which is exactly the point. Whether the bank survives in the form which the proponents of the bill want, or in some other form, is a matter for debate and discussion. I must be persuaded absolutely that there would be no bank as a result of the combined effect of these motions.

Bearing in mind that individually each motion ought to be considered, I do not say, because all these motions ought to be considered one at a time, that I am ruling all of them as being in order. Far from it. Some of the motions may clearly offend our procedures in being expanded negatives in respect of the particular clauses to which they refer; that may be the case. But, because one, two or three motions may fall into that category, that does not lead me to conclude that I have power at this stage to so rule on all of them. To carry the argument further, if three or four motions are out of order for the reasons stated, presumably they will be set aside by the Chair for discussion and argument. That means that the remaining motions are in order within our procedures.

If the effect of this process is to reduce on the order paper the number of motions, some of which are out of order, to a smaller number all in order, then obviously that is the right course for the House to follow in this procedure. For example, to consider motion No. 1 I can hardly accept the argument that the bill would fall to the ground, or the bank cease to be a bank as envisaged by the proposer of the bill if motion No. 1 were to carry. It is in fact an excepting provision which is being taken out. That being the case with one of the motions, it is obvious that argument ought to proceed on each motion individually. Of course procedural arguments can be raised as we go.

I may say at the same time there has been a suggestion that a point of order will be put forward on the opposite point of view. That is because of some regulation concerning the bill vis-à-vis a pro forma bill respecting the incorporation of banks. I may give advance warning. I will hear argument and discussion on it, but I must say that if there is any merit to the argument, and I have not examined the details to see whether there is, there seems to be a fundamental difficulty with that argument in that this is an improper stage of this legislation on which to raise that kind of argument.

This bill has gone though all stages in one House and all but the last two stages in this House. It certainly seems to the Chair to be totally improper to raise general objections now to the form the bill is in. If that was a valid argument at any time it ought to have been made at some other stage rather than now at the report stage. I would certainly have to be persuaded there is some reason why this bill ought to be stopped at this stage when that argument either was not advanced at all or not advanced at an earlier stage when that kind of argument should have been considered.

Having said that, if there is any further contribution to that or any other point of order, I will be pleased to receive it. Otherwise the House ought to move on to the consideration of these motions seriatim.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the point you made is one that was made to me in private by our consultant on these matters. Therefore I am not totally unaware of what Your Honour might be saying on this matter. I sometimes suspect our consultant of having clairvoyance in these matters. Nevertheless it is an important enough point that it should be raised in order to get a definitive ruling from the Chair on this matter. I regret that I did not have an opportunity to raise this at the introduction of the bill. However, it is of such importance that I want to raise it at this point and to elicit a ruling from Your Honour.

Standing Order 94(2) reads:

Every bill for an Act of incorporation, where a form of model bill has been adopted, shall be drawn in accordance with a model bill (copies of model bills may be obtained from the Clerk of the House). Any provisions contained in any such bill which are not in accord with the model bill shall be inserted between brackets or underlined, and shall be so printed.

Continental Bank of Canada

Standing Order 94(5) reads:

A brief explanatory note giving the reasons for any clause of an unusual nature or which differs from the model bill clauses or standard clauses shall be printed opposite the clause in the bill.

Schedule B of the Bank Act is, it would appear, such a model bill. It provides a blank form consisting of six sections, with blank spaces where the particular names and information which identify the particular bank which is seeking incorporation can be inserted.

If one looks at the bills incorporating previous banks such as, for instance, the Unity Bank in 1972, we find that they correspond to the model bill in Schedule B of the Bank Act in every particular.

Bill S-30, however, the act to incorporate the Continental Bank of Canada, differs from Schedule B of the Bank Act in several ways. It contains 24 clauses rather than six, and a good many of these clauses have the effect of giving the Continental Bank and its directors a series of exemptions for a considerable period of time from the normal provisions of the Bank Act. For instance, section 8(1) of the Bank Act reads:

The name of the bank, the additional name under which it is authorized to carry on business, the authorized capital stock of the bank, the par value of its shares, the place in Canada where its head office is to be situated and the names, addresses and occupations of the provisional directors shall be declared in the act of incorporation of the bank.

This is a reasonably clear statement of the requirements. However, when we turn to the bill in question, S-30, we find clause 2(1) states:

Subject to subsection (2), the persons who are the directors of IAC Limited on the coming into force of this act are the provisional directors of the bank, and this subsection constitutes a declaration of the names, addresses and occupations of those persons for purposes of subsection 8(1) of the Bank Act.

Nowhere do the actual names, addresses, occupations and so on appear in the bill. Does this not constitute a departure from the model bill, as discussed above? Yet we find nowhere, either in the bill as passed by the Senate or in the bill as amended in committee, any explanation for this lack of specific names, addresses, and so on. Does this not mean that the bill is an imperfect bill? Standing Order 69, which applies to private bills as well as public bills, reads:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

There is the question of whose responsibility it is to detect it at an early stage. In some ways there is a question of privilege involved as to whether it was raised immediately or at this point. That is why I am proceeding with this particular point.

Moreover, does not this lack of specific names and so on constitute an amendment to subsection 8(1) of the Bank Act? Standing Order 94(3) reads:

Where a private bill amends any section, subsection or paragraph of an existing Act, such section, subsection or paragraph shall be repealed in the text of the bill and re-enacted as proposed to be amended, the new matter being indicated by underlining; and the section, subsection or paragraph which is to be so repealed, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed in the right-hand page opposite such section, subsection or paragraph.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Standing Order 94(4) reads:

When a private bill repeals an existing section, subsection, or other minor division of a section, that section, subsection or division, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed opposite the clause.

Bill S-30 does not appear to meet these requirements, either in the bill as printed in the form in which it was passed by the Senate or in the report stage version. Does this mean that it is not in proper shape to be distributed or discussed?

It should be noted that this is an extremely complex bill. The sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainey River (Mr. Reid), noted this fact in his second reading speech in the House. As well, the bill it seems will set several precedents. As Mr. Read, the superintendent of banks, noted in committee, the fact that a large finance company is now attempting to have itself converted into a bank is the result of government policy which has been encouraging competition in the banking system. This is the first instance of a functioning finance company attempting to incorporate itself as a bank, but we can expect, if Mr. Read's words mean anything, that there will be more.

Moreover, since this is the first instance of this particular type it will inevitably have an effect on future instances, and may have an effect on the Bank Act when it is revised in the near future. Since government policy seems to be encouraging this sort of conversion it would appear likely that some regular provision would appear in the new Bank Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I made some preliminary remarks. I do not want to stop the hon. member, but I really feel that his presentation ought to be abbreviated and not really direct itself to the basic argument. The simple proposition is that this bill is not in the pro forma type envisaged by the Standing Orders to which he referred. That is well known, well understood. It is not necessary to expand on that proposition. The question before us is, if that were in fact grounds to stop the bill at the proper stage, should it stop the bill now? If the hon. member has anything to add on that particular point I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add something on that particular point. Limited attention is paid to these private bills. This is probably wrong. Greater attention should be paid to them. There is a tendency not to pay too much attention to them when they are introduced. There is more than just a point of order involved. There is a question of privilege.

If a bill is introduced at some time, an hon. member may not be in his place or not aware of the bill, particularly if it is a private member's bill. Perhaps he should be, and Your Honour may rule that way. Does he then forfeit the right to call attention to an imperfect bill? We know that hon. members would be in this House on every occasion if it were possible for them to do so. But you have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that you are not being asked to rule on whether it is imperfect or not but on whether at any point an hon. member can rise and say, "This bill is in the wrong draft and therefore I have a right to point this out and have it altered at any stage."

I appreciate Your Honour's courtesy in allowing me this rather extended period of time in which to explain my point of order, but I do think the conclusion you are called upon to reach will have important consequences and that it will affect not only the point of order but also the question of members' privileges.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the point which has been raised about the proper timing in relation to this question is a very valid one. I do not wish to take any particular pride in what I have said in this House, but if you would look at page 9989 of Hansard, December 12, 1975, I think you will recognize that I devoted at least half my remarks on that occasion to calling attention to the perplexities of this bill, to the fact that it would create a precedent, and that it was an extraordinary measure. I recommended to hon. members that they should spend considerable time studying it in committee. My reason for doing so, as the sponsor of this bill, was to ensure that hon. members might have an opportunity to raise any valid objections they wished to raise at the proper time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With great respect to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), his argument that he was present at the committee hearings when the bill was being voted on is self-defeating. If it had been an improper form and if he had been in possession of the written argument he is now trying to impose on the House—contrary, I suggest, to our custom because he is reading a text which obviously had been prepared by somebody else—then I suggest action should have been taken in the committee itself. We all know very well that it is possible to raise a point of order at any time with regard to the acceptability or otherwise of an amendment or a bill, or indeed of any motion which might have to be considered in debate.

If the hon. member is able to carry his argument with the Chair it would be possible for a member to rise immediately prior, say, to taking a vote on third reading and in effect to declare that the bill has been out of order all along and that the Chair has been deluded or misled into regarding it as acceptable. It would be strange, indeed, if that kind of argument could carry in the House.

The bill has been accepted by the chief Clerk of Private Bills. Moreover, the version of the bill before us in our files is not the one originally presented in the other place. I do not think the hon. member can make reference to that, because I do not think he is in possession of that form of the bill. Therefore the argument that it does not conform to a model bill when it is impossible, in any event, for a bill of this kind converting an existing financial institution into a chartered bank to follow slavishly the form of a model bill designed to apply to a bank which is starting from square one, cannot possibly be solved. Therefore it would seem to me, first, that the argument advanced by the hon. member is out of time, and second, that it fails inasmuch as this kind of bill need not slavishly conform with a model bill designed for a different situation.

Mr. Saltsman: Perhaps I might comment on the observations made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The argument I am making is that where those departures from the Bank Act exist they should be underlined so that all members, not only those who studied the measure in committee, may see the extent to which this bill departs from the model bill. That is the purpose of the underlining and explanatory notes which appear in other bills; where there is a departure from standard procedure it is clearly marked in the bill so that members may be aware of that departure and use their good judgment as to the wisdom of the alteration. Nothing of that kind has been done in the bill before us. It is as though it was designed to hide and obscure rather than to enlighten.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why did you not say so in committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all respect to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) he grossly underestimates the effectiveness of his opposition to the bill. I can scarcely now conclude he has in any way been limited or prejudiced in his resistance to this measure by the failure of the proponents of the bill to conform with the Standing Order to which he refers. If this suggestion were seriously advanced I might perhaps come to a different conclusion, but in fact I do have to return to the original point, which is that though his argument might have had application at some stage of the bill I am setting aside the point of order at this moment on the very narrow ground that it is now too late in the progress of the bill to raise an objection which should have been made earlier as to the original form of the measure.

Again I say that I see no indication—as a matter of fact I see every indication to the contrary—that the hon. member's objection and resistance to the bill are other than detailed and thorough. I have not examined the committee proceedings, of course, but certainly with respect to the motions which have been put down at this stage there does not seem to have been any restriction on the hon. member's ability to bring forward effective opposition. Accordingly it would seem to me that, all points of order having now been discussed and set aside, the House ought to move on to the consideration of motion No. I standing in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order in connection with motion No. I and its effect on the bill, and perhaps this would be an appropriate moment at which to do so. The point I wish to raise is that motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) deals with clause 2, which says the requirement that bank directors should hold qualifying shares in the bank should be waived, and a substitute requirement be inserted that they hold the corresponding number of shares in IAC Limited. The amendment would delete this provision, which would therefore force the bank directors to hold shares of both. This would prevent the bank from being a wholly owned subsidiary of IAC. It is interesting to note that if this could be complied with—I use the word "could"—it would confer a significant benefit on those bank directors at the expense of IAC shareholders.

The point I want to make about this amendment is that because of the structure of the transformation of the bank from a finance company, with leasing operations and whatnot, because of the difficulties there has to be a development to provide for an orderly transfer. The reasons for that transfer were four-fold. The first is that the security indebtedness of IAC would not be permissible in the case of a chartered bank. It is impossible for an ongoing institution to be able to convert that kind of indebtedness to the type of indebtedness permitted under the Bank Act. Secondly, IAC has outstanding convertible securities which would not be permissible for a chartered bank under the Bank Act and these could not be immediately redeemed. Thirdly, the leases IAC has entered into are held for a certain time and could not be eliminated immediately. Fourthly, there are other aspects of IAC's capital structure and operations which would create serious difficulties with this procedure.

● (1750)

The form and development of the transformation that was looked at I cannot describe in detail, but basically they are to set up a chartered bank as a sister company of IAC; this was found to be impossible to accomplish. The second was to organize the chartered bank as a parent of IAC and then convert the business to the bank. The third was to create a situation where the business of IAC is funneled to the bank, the bank becomes a subsidiary of IAC and over a ten-year period absorbs the whole company so that the surviving institution is the bank. This is the only way that technically a conversion could work within the terms of the Bank Act. If the amendment were permitted its effect would be to strike the whole structure of the bill to the ground, because then IAC could not have a bank that is a wholly owned subsidiary owing to the difficulty of having directors hold shares outside.

I know that this is a technical matter, but it is one that would put the company in conflict with the provisions of the Bank Act. I therefore request that this motion be struck down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put my argument in the form of a simple question. If this is a point of order, what will the hon. member say when he gets to the substance of the motion?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members recognize that the question to be asked about the orderliness of the amendment is not really what type of corporation this is going to be and what its business and restrictions will be. The intent of the amendment, on the face of it, is somehow to interfere with that description of the privileges and powers that is envisaged in the bill. Surely that is the power of a motion at this stage, or at least the capacity of a motion at this stage.

Whether or not that turns out to be to the convenience or to the preference of the proponents of the bill is a matter for discussion on the substance, and it may be a matter for division in this House in this individual case. There may be other instances in these motions which in fact, by deletion, run an expanded negative, but in my opinion motion No. 1 does not fall within that category.

We are now approaching six o'clock and obviously hon. members have their basic right to make a speech on motion No. 1. However, may we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Subject to the effect of motion No. 1, Mr. Speaker. There again, this could in effect be an expanded negative in that if the effect of the hon. member's amendment is to remove ownership of shares which are a condition precedent in the bank, the bill would not provide for the ownership of shares. After all, clause 2(1) is subject to subsection (2). The hon. member's motion seeks in effect to eliminate subsection (2), and therefore this would mean that the directors of IAC are named as directors of the bank but would have no shareholdings in the bank. That is contrary to section 10 of the Bank Act. There is a requirement in section 10(2) of the Bank Act that a provisional director of a bank be a subscriber to stock of that bank. With the greatest respect, it would make nonsense of the whole bill because some of the provisions of the Bank Act are negated.

I find that this is the consequence of almost every one of these amendments. Your Honour has pointed out, quite rightly, that you are not concerned with the form of the bank, but it must be a bank within the general framework of the Bank Act. There is nothing that says that amendments cannot be made to the Bank Act or that the shareholding must be this or that. The bill provides that the directors of IAC will be the provisional directors, and their shareholdings in IAC shall be the qualifying shares for their directorships in the Continental Bank of Canada, pursuant to section 10(2) of the Bank Act. The hon. member would be eliminating the qualification of those provisional directors, and if he wants to do that his only clear course in this House is to vote against clause 2, and not amend it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has gone directly to the procedural question. If it were to turn out that the effect of the motion meant that the bank could not in fact be incorporated at all, then that may transform the question of procedure. However, it being six o'clock, I will give the matter very careful consideration during the 14 days that presumably will elapse between now and the next time the bill is considered. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock later this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT AND THE RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE SETTLEMENT OPTIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan) that Bill C-86, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, as the minister pointed out shortly before five o'clock this afternoon when he moved the second reading of Bill C-86, this is a relatively simple piece of legislation. It makes similar amendments, two of them in each case, to two different acts that are part of the veterans' charter. One act is the insurance legislation that was made available to veterans after World War I; the other is the insurance legislation that was made available to veterans after World War II. I suppose I could say in passing, for the enjoyment of my colleagues, that I was not here to vote for the first one but I was here to vote for the second one. That was in 1944. I simply recommend to hon. members that they stick around; the place becomes more interesting as the decades go by.

I appreciate the desire of the minister to give us the bits of information he put on the record this afternoon. I think it was important to remind this generation of what was made available. I think we are all interested in the statistics which tell us that there are still 2,500 policies in force from the first world war program and that there are still 19,000 policies in force from the second world war life insurance program.

As the minister says, the amendments being made to each of these acts are very simple. On the one hand the appropriate change is being made so that the benefits from an insurance policy at the discretion of the insured or of the beneficiary may be taken out entirely in a lump sum instead of only up to a certain amount. That seems to me to be acceptable. I know there have been a number of requests for this and we are happy to approve that part of the bill, namely, the amendment to both the acts which are before us at this time.

The other part of this bill, as already has been pointed out, is one that brings these insurance acts into line with other veterans' legislation in that common-law spouses are recognized under certain stated conditions for purposes of this legislation. The Department of Veterans Affairs has been realistic, practical, and I think humane in this area for many years. We certainly have no quarrel with this effort to bring these two pieces of legislation in line with other veterans' legislation in this respect.

I hope I will be forgiven if I again make the comment I suppose I have made just about every time we have done the right thing for common-law wives. I wish we would be equally generous and equally quick in moving on behalf of married wives and widows who were legally married. I shall not go into it at this moment, but the minister knows that we are looking forward to another piece of legislation having to do with prisoners of war which I hope will be along in a few days. Some of us are disappointed that our recommendation to improve the position of the widows of veterans on disability pensions is not to be included in that legislation. That is what I mean by the comment I now make.

I wish we could extend this generosity, this decency, this humane approach we offer, to a common-law relationship to improve the position particularly of widows of veterans where there is no question about the marriage relationship. I hope at some point in this session, either on the bill regarding prisoners of war or before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, we can move a little further in that area. That is really all that needs to be said at this time. The bill is one which corrects a couple of anomalies and we are happy to give it our support.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am very happy indeed to take part in this debate on Bill C-86, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and also the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. My comments tonight really will focus particularly on new subsection 6 and section 3 of the act.

I should like to quote section 3:

> Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:
> "(6) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, where, at the death of the insured, any insurance money is being paid or is to be paid as an annuity to any beneficiary, such money shall, upon the request of the beneficiary, be paid in a lump sum or in any other manner provided for in subsection (3) as the beneficiary may request."

● (2010)

In this regard I should like to say that in, my opinion, the $2,000 maximum death benefit appeared to be ample in the days when the act was framed. However, this amount is completely unrealistic today in view of the cost associated with a death.

Mr. Marshall: Put it in an amendment.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I agree wholeheartedly with the minister, if the hon. member wants to know that is the reason I am making this comment. I believe the government has made a fantastic advance and has been very realistic with this particular aspect of the law benefiting veterans, and I think it would be remiss on the part of hon. members on this side of the House if they did not bring to the attention of the House, and to everyone in the country, the fact that the government has not only adhered to the committee report but also it has recognized that a change must be made now and has been made, and this is the reason I am speaking on this subject this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Many beneficiaries, particularly the widows of world war I veterans are now at the age where they are unlikely to live long enough to benefit from compulsory annuities. So therefore the $2,000 limit on immediate death benefit was undoubtedly regarded as protectionism for the widow at the time the act was passed a number of years ago. However, it is out of keeping with the role of women in today's society, so over the years many representations by insured veterans and their beneficiaires have been made to the minister and to his colleagues to have the full value of the policy paid as an immediate death benefit. So the current legislation denies the veteran the right to determine the best method of having his policy paid to his selected beneficiary.

This amendment lifts a restriction imposed many years ago on a veteran's right to decide modes of payment of his insurance policy. The bill will bring veterans into line with a practice followed by commercial insurance companies in that the insured has the full right to decide the method of payment on a policy.

This amendment will also allow a beneficiary who is currently receiving an annuity to receive the full settlement of the annuity if he so desires. This amendment in no way affects the veteran's right to designate the proceeds of his policy as an annuity if he considers this is indicated.

I also mentioned that I had other remarks to make, primarily with regard to clause 6, and I should like to—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), but he is not supposed to refer to particular clauses at this stage. He will be allowed to do so when we will go into committee of the whole.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I should like to add to your suggestion by saying that it is also very important, somehow and somewhere, that someone should mention some parts of the legislation with which we are faced. One thing I cannot be criticized for is not being able to speak about the bill before us at the present time.

Perhaps I should mention this clause, but in a few words. This would give a person who is designated as a beneficiary by the insured the right, subject to the discretion of the minister and to the furnishing of the required proof to be paid under the contract of insurance on the death of the insured—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. Again I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he must not refer to nor read any particular clause at this stage. We have to discuss the broad principles of the bill and not specific clauses.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Marshall: Madam Speaker, I could not agree with you more, and if the hon. member had been in the House before when there was unanimous consent to have second reading, he would know that we could get into the committee of the whole and that he could bring up clause 6 and say anything he wants about it.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In that case I am one of those who will not unduly delay any legislation in any way, shape or form, and I wholeheartedly agree with that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Morin in the chair.

On clause 2.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Chairman, I want to thank all hon. members present here this evening for allowing me to continue with some of the comments I wanted to make. I know that there could have been some objection, so I wish to thank hon. members in the opposition for allowing me to comment at this time.

In accordance with your suggestion, Madam Chairman, I will now quote clause 6, and a part thereof which I wanted to mention.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Again I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but we are discussing clause 2 at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Chairman—

An hon. Member: Now you've forgotten what you were going to say.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I believe that by now hon. members will know the clause to which I wish to make reference. I believe I do not have to quote it again, and there is no doubt that I will be very brief.

Mr. Marshall: I think we all agree that we want to pass this bill quickly, and I hope the hon. member is not trying to filibuster it.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I should like to bring to the attention of the House this evening the fact that if the loyal opposition is concerned about passing this bill in the limited time in which we are discussing it at the present time, it should be more willing to do so with regard to all other bills, including Bill C-68. If they are willing to do this, they can rest assured that I will sit down right now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We are on clause 6, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): All I want to say is that I am wholeheartedly in favour of this bill. I had something to say about clause 6. I am very happy that the minister and the government saw fit to bring in this legislation despite the fact that some may believe that I am trying to delay it, even in three minutes. I will now sit down in order to allow the bill to pass.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 1—Short title.

● (2020)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, there are just a very few observations I want to make about this bill. As one of the declining number of veterans in this House I can understand the motivation of the department in putting forward this particular bill. The minister full well knows my attitude, and I am sure his officials do as well, toward what in effect is one of the main thrusts of this bill. It is one that I have felt was a retrograde step in the total thrust of government legislation over the past few years.

It had been the rule that in order to recognize a certain status for concubines of seven years, or common law marriages of seven years, this would be equated to a legal marriage and that any benefits flowing to survivors under superannuation or compensation schemes of whatever nature under general federal legislation would apply to such concubines and common law wives.

We know there were some cases of hardship here and there, but I would say that the mood of the Canadian people in the late 1960's had tolerated a change from this status; now in the mid seventies that has changed considerably. Most of us in our generation believe the moral and the legal effects and consequences of marriage lie at the root of our social structure, in this country and in most other countries, and we do not think that this should be lightly cast aside. Somehow or other it got to be a popular idea that a shack-up of three years was enough—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the hon. member just contemplate. Look at this legislation and I will tell the hon. member, who is pretty junior in years, of scores of cases of the wives of veterans—

Mrs. Sauvé: Junior but smart.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. minister has no knowledge of this because she has never been over the track. Perhaps the hon. lady has not had an opportunity of having—

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): You should write your speeches, it would be quicker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let the hon. member for Laval mark my words. I shall not put up with lessons in the House.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Please, read your speech.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, I won't. You do read your speeches. I wish to add this, Madam Chairman: I hope that those hon. members who are jeering tonight and think this issue is a big joke will receive telephone calls or visits from middle-aged ladies.

Miss Bégin: I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary rise on a question of privilege or on a point of order?

Miss Bégin: On a question of privilege, Madam Chairman. With your permission, Madam Chairman, I would like to ask if the hon. opposition member has accused hon. women members on this side of the House of being middle-aged. I did not quite understand. I fail to see how this is related to the veterans' legislation.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, I wish to tell the clever Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss Bégin) that had she followed the debate, she would understand that I am referring to veterans' wives. If she is touchy about her age, that is her problem not mine. But there are women who call and tell us about their husbands who deserted them because they were attracted by younger and more attractive women. They have raised children, a family, and their husbands are veterans who are receiving a pension or certain benefits under the veterans' program. In such cases, the problem arises as to who is to be considered as the surviving spouse of this veteran. Previously, if there had been a broken home, if there had been not a divorce but a legal separation from bed and board or simply voluntary separation between husband and wife, the right of the common law wife could be established only after seven years of living together. Nowadays, three years are enough. That is not very easy to buy oneself a pension! And what about the wife who has been deserted, tossed on the scrap heap of society? Should we tell her as I had to tell somebody: Listen, Madam, your fate is to rely on welfare. For so many people here in the House, the eventual answer is: Madam, go and apply for welfare. Yet this woman has raised a veteran's children, she has shared his home as well as his joys and miseries for 20 or 25 years. But she is put aside after barely three years. And what are three years? The wife is not entitled to the survivor pension, it is his mistress, his concubine who will get it. It is very simple!

But what did we read in this legislation? Do we know it? What is the principle proposed by this government? It is the same principle that we adopted and I voted last year against amendments to the legislation concerning several programs for veterans. But I think—

[English]

I make a plea to members of this House: why do we have to sap the social structure of our society?

● (2030)

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Times have changed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. parliamentary secretary tells me that times have changed. Listen to see if she is in favour of concubinage—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Boniface on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Chairman, I rise on a question of personal privilege. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, in the interests of seeing this bill passed speedily, suggested that I should not speak on it. I have not spoken; yet here is the hon. member for Edmonton West speaking on the bill for the last 15 minutes and delaying passage. I have forgone the opportunity to speak, and I think members of the opposition should also be willing to make short speeches. It would assist matters greatly if the hon. member for Edmonton West would consider this matter and allow this bill to pass immediately.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, I told the hon. member personally that I do not approve of this type of legislation. Perhaps it will take a few knocks for this message to get through.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Madam Chairman, I rise on a question of personal privilege—

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is not a question of privilege, but a point of debate. I shall now recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If, under threats from the chief government whip, we must consider the bill—

An hon. Member: Say something.

Mr. Flynn: If you have anything to say, say it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I tell the hon. member from down in Ontario that I have something to say, and I will say it, on my feet.

Mr. Flynn: If you have something to say, say it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member spends a good deal of time sitting in his seat, opening his mouth and showing how wide is the cavity between his ears.

Mr. Flynn: We are still listening. Say something, if you have anything to say.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The parliamentary secretary may say, "But these are modern day mores". Yes, they are among certain people. Surely to goodness, people of a contrary view have the right to express that. I am prepared to listen to the parliamentary secretary explain why certain social and moral values, as between marriage and the right of common wives or spouses, should be relaxed. I would be pleased to listen, to hear what kind of case she could make. I regret this legislation. I do not think it is right in the present day context, and lots of people support me in this view.

I am exercised that this bill has been brought forward in the present manner, that it has been before the committee on veterans affairs, been before the legislative committee of the cabinet, and that it appears on the order paper, when in fact the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee regarding prisoners of war were before the cabinet and the department last year and the year before. I have exhorted the Department of Veterans Affairs and various deputy ministers over the years, only to get the brush-off.

An hon. Member: You need it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who said, "You need it?" Somebody said the prisoners of war need the brush-off.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who was that gutless individual on the other side?

An hon. Member: It was Munro.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No. Munro is not here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I find it passing strange, and I speak on behalf of thousands of prisoners of war—I was one of them and I have declared my interest and position in this—I find it passing strange that the department and the cabinet should give greater priority to common-law wives than to the claims of prisoners of war and their entitlement. That is why I object to the bill.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Madam Chairman, will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I trust it is pertinent to common-law wives of veterans, about whom I have been speaking.

Mrs. Campagnolo: My question is most relevant. The hon. gentleman referred tonight to mistresses, concubines, those who have been shacked up, and so on, ad infinitum. He has not observed the facts of life. Some veterans who came home from the war and became parents undoubtedly are the parents of young children around today. I have had personal dealings with women who are second wives or, if you will common law spouses. They have young children to raise, while the first, legitimate wife's children are over 30 years old. I feel that the question is relevant and a most important point for consideration.

An hon. Member: Put that in your pipe.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, the hon. lady has had no more contact with those persons than I have. I assure her that there are more veterans and wives in the city of Edmonton than in her part of British Columbia. Working through the Legion, I can assure her I have seen all kinds of people.

May I say this: the woman in her fifties, who has raised her family and is tossed on the scrap heap of society by a husband who picks somebody else, is defenceless. You will find far fewer young women who have taken up with a World War II veteran. I am not talking of the man who has been discharged from the forces recently. After all, the man who was in World War II is probably over 50. It is not likely that he will have a young, common-law wife. There are not many who will have a young, common-law wife, and children.

An hon. Member: What about an older common-law wife?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are far more of them. I will wager with the hon. member and meet him afterwards. I will say that there are far more veterans of his age and mine who, unfortunately, have cast aside their wives and picked up, shall we say, with someone else. There will be far more in that category than in the hypothetical category put forward by the hon. member for Skeena. That is the case I make. How does this happen?

What do you do with the woman who has been cast aside? Do you tell her to collect social welfare? That would be the solution, shall we say, that some would put forward.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Madam Chairman—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is raising a point of debate. If she wants to participate, she will be recognized afterwards.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, I have finished.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Madam Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Edmonton West has imputed that somehow I fabricated the case to which I drew the attention of this House. That is not so. The person in question lives with five small children, and I think the possibility that five young children may be put on the scrap heap is far more serious than the matter the hon. member brought forward. I ask the hon. member not to forget this and allow us to get on with the business so that we can pass this bill.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Does the House agree to grouping motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 for debate, with a separate vote being taken on each motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Maritime Code

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Environment and Minister of Fisheries) (for Mr. Lang) moved motion No. 1:

That Bill C-61, An Act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in Clause 8 of the French version by striking out lines 16 to 18 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"a) le transport par eau, ou par eau et par voie de surface, des marchandises ou des passagers, ainsi que le remorquage, directement ou avec escale à l'étranger,."

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved motion No. 2:

That Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in Clause 8 by deleting line 20 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"Canada: and, for better ensuring the attainment of the said purposes, any port or place in the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon shall be deemed to be a port or place in Canada, and the Governor in Council may, by order, provide that any other port or place not in Canada shall be deemed to be in Canada,".

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved motion No. 3:

That Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in Clause 8 by deleting line 30 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"whether directly or by way of a foreign port or place and when carrying passengers whether or not the passengers leave the ship at a port or place in Canada and if the passengers leave the ship at a port or place in Canada whether they do so definitely or merely for a temporary period;".

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the first of the amendments, which you have just read, is in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and relates to Clause 8 of Bill C-61. The other two motions stand in the names of hon. members opposite. I propose in my initial remarks to direct my attention exclusively to motion No. 1 proposed by the Minister of Transport.

May I say in a general way that certainly we on this side of the House, and I think I speak for members in this Chamber generally, are very pleased to see the progress of Bill C-61 to date. We are glad to see that on this occasion we are back before the House of Commons at the report stage considering a relatively small number of further amendments to the legislation. I hope this indicates the House may very shortly give this additional degree of approval to Bill C-61.

There is some work to be done yet, but I think it is fair to say that very good progress has been made, particularly the work done before and since Christmas in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communication.

I want to express a word of thanks to the members of that committee who worked very hard and conscientiously on this legislation in an effort to give it fair consideration and, in the final analysis, to improve certain aspects of it. I want to thank members opposite for their co-operation and, in particular, members on this side of the House for their constant attendance at the committee and the good work they did on this particular bill.

I should also mention the many witnesses who appeared before the committee in the course of our deliberations on Bill C-61. A great many of the ideas, suggestions, and specific proposals put forward by those witnesses were very helpful. They contributed substantially to the measure before us in this form this evening.

To deal specifically with motion No. 1 being proposed by the Minister of Transport, I believe this can be considered and disposed of rather quickly and simply. The change is a minor correction in the technical wording of the French version of clause 8(3)(a). There is no substantive change. It is merely a technical correction. I commend it to all members for speedy adoption.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I see we are not going to get very much co-operation this evening from the parliamentary secretary. We anticipated a rather lengthy introduction on this, the most massive public statute in the laws of Canada.

The parliamentary secretary is quite right with respect to the technical amendment he proposes on behalf of the government this evening. It is not controversial. It is just a matter of tidying up some language in the act.

Our challenge this evening as we consider report stage of a bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act, entitled the Maritime Code, cannot be treated nearly as lightly as the parliamentary secretary would lead us to believe. In the first place the importance of the subject requires the presence here of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). We heard and saw so little of him in the standing committee that at times we were somewhat frustrated. I might add that if the minister had found it possible to be present more often during those meetings there might not have been need for the six amendments we are proposing to put forward at this time, not to mention the technical amendments which I understand are being proposed to the French version of the bill and with which I myself am not particularly qualified to deal.

In connection with what the parliamentary secretary had to say there are one or two observations to be made on the subject of the translation of bills. Under the old principle a draftsman wandered into the Department of Justice armed with the knowledge of what he intended to propose, singled out a person in that department, and communicated to him his requirements with respect to the legislation. That person, with his knowledge of legal terms and so on, which most of us barely comprehend, was expected to turn out the required document. That was the practice accepted in this Chamber for a long time, perhaps for 100 years.

In recent years, however, concern arose about the ability of translators to make a precise rendition from one language into the other—from English into French or from French into English, so we adopted a system of which most of us approved. This involved the director of drafting in the Department of Justice addressing himself to an English-speaking person and communicating to him the import of what he wished to convey, and then moving over and addressing himself to a person conversant with the French language, but never the twain shall meet, the principle being that the drafters were able to communicate the content and the spirit intended in the act.

The assurance given in the House by a former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) when he was a very effective and acceptable House leader, was that these versions would be interpreted equally before the courts. That was fine, and it expedited the use of the two languages in legislation.

What do we find today in connection with Bill C-61 which leads to the amendment brought forward by the parliamentary secretary? What happens is that the director of drafting wanders into the office of the Minister of Justice, looks around, very often finds that it is understaffed, and says, "Who is available to do some work?" He may get a French drafter or an English drafter. It doesn't matter. Whoever gets the drafting chore is then responsible for getting a verbatim translation made into the other language. So we are back where we started.

My criticism of the amendment is that we find in Bill C-61 a mixture of the old system and the new. There is, in fact, a combination of two systems. The danger of this is that when an action is brought before a court, whether in English or in French, widely differing interpretations could arise. The practice of the English courts is to refer to common usage and the common understanding of a word.

The French approach to this problem is to have recourse to historical documents where possible. And if those documents do not follow a consistent pattern it is likely that judgments will be inconsistent.

That is the burden of the message which will appear in a number of places as we go through this bill, because the parliamentary secretary, the minister, and the representatives of the department who were largely responsible for drafting this bill have given us an assurance that essentially the two languages used in it will be interpreted by the courts in the same way. God help counsel whenever they have a case involving what is the most massive piece of legislation on the statute books of Canada.

As to the technical matters involved, perhaps there is not much point in my dealing with them in detail. I am sure most hon. members will understand the dilemma which faces some of us when it comes to addressing ourselves to a fairly narrow point of this kind. I take the time of the House to raise this question because I believe it to be fundamental to the administration of an act which we on this side, with two major exceptions which I can think of immediately, are prone to support.

Our reservations have to do with the very clause the parliamentary secretary seeks to amend. They have to do with the protection of primary users of transport in Canada and, as others will point out while the debate goes on this evening and for the next few days, they have to do with the movement of every single item of commerce in this country, bar none. The conflict which arises when you have a Railway Act bound in statutes to adhere to compensatory arrangements, spells out in essence our fate for those of us who live in the extremities of the country.

For those of us who have to compete with the railways through water borne traffic it tends to impair, as pointed out by the council of maritime premiers, the ability of people such as farmers to import grains at a competitive rate. It tends to play havoc with the shipment of west coast lumber, with the movement of flour, indeed with every commercial activity requiring some form of transportation from one part of Canada to another.

Basically the parliamentary secretary is attempting to amend the most important section of Books I and II. It is the section that will close exclusively to Canadian ships the coastal waters of Canada. Some years ago we closed the Great Lakes to Canadian registered ships and had great fears about it. Fortunately, because of growing technology, those fears were not realized. However, as the report stage debate continues, Mr. Speaker, you will be hearing members on this side of the House setting forth for consideration in absolute detail the very vital principles that are at stake if this section is passed without something other than the assurance, written or verbal, of the Minister of Transport which will be required by the council of maritime premiers. Indeed the government of British Columbia may require such assurance since Mr. Jack Davis, a distinguished minister in the present British Columbia government, was a former minister in the federal government when the principle of closing coastal trade to Canadian ships was under active consideration. He himself was actively involved in a department that could not itself understand the consequences of this particular section.

What we require to have built into this legislation at some point is a written assurance that nothing that the legislation chooses to do will in any way impair the competitive position of shippers, be they on the west coast, the east coast, or in central Canada. Nothing must impair their ability to move goods and services at the lowest possible rate.

We are concerned about this question from a variety of viewpoints. We know the shellacking that the Atlantic provinces are going to take on April 1 after the Minister of Transport brings in amendments to the Railway Act, particularly to section 272 which controls freight rates, freight rate subsidies and so forth for the movement of goods in our area. We are also concerned about bearing the loss of a level of subsidy on the movement of goods and services by a Canadian fleet which today can only operate at a cost equal to or higher than the existing statute provides for, inasmuch as it does provide for licences and the use of other than non-Canadian ships for the movement of goods and services between one Canadian port and another, or between two Canadian ports by way of a foreign port.

The department has gone a long way to upgrade a bill that essentially arose out of the old British merchant marine act going back to the middle 1800's, and indeed much earlier. We have consolidated the statutes, brought them together and added to them, and they have affected virtually every law on the books in Canada. We are now engaged in updating Victorian attitudes which underlie the old act.

We on this side are grateful that we have got this far. Books I and II, as we will learn when we go through them, deal with some of the general aspects, such as coastal trade and the definition of what is a Canadian ship, what are Canadian waters, what are territorial waters, what is a Canadian registered ship, who can own a Canadian ship, what a foreign owner is, what his responsibilities are, and so on.

We have the basis of a good bill here, but it is weakened by two things, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it is weakened by the point that I outlined earlier regarding translation and the approach used in drafting the legislation before us. To Your Honour's deep and continuing concern, most members on this side feel that the one language does not necessarily conform to the other. If you read the legislation in the French version and you ask your colleague whether the English corresponds, you are not likely to get an affirmative answer. The same is true of the other language in certain parts of the bill. In other parts if you were to ask your colleague whether the English translates properly into French, he would say it does exactly. But if you were to ask a judge to give his interpretation he would come up with a different interpretation based on whether an action is brought under the act en français or in English.

The second matter, requiring a minor technical amendment which we will support, has to do with the shortcomings of the legislation under this particular section. I trust that some of my colleagues will speak in a definitive way on this matter. I refer to the impact on shippers of the consequences of this act if we take water borne transportation out of its presently highly competitive posture vis-à-vis the railways and place it in a posture that allows the railways to increase their rates. God only knows how the railways set their rate structure other than through competition.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the maritime council of premiers was concerned about this question. We have members from New Brunswick and also members from the west coast who are concerned about it too. It is a matter that must be dealt with by the minister before we go too far on this stage of the bill.

We intend to introduce amendments on this aspect and when we reach clause 12, so that we might have a little more time to consider certain amendments, I will ask that it be stood in order to give the government time to consider ways of incorporating in the bill the type of assurances that are absolutely necessary if the government has any desire to get this piece of legislation out of report stage and into third reading during the present session.

We have six amendments that will follow. We intend to debate all six, although not at any great length. We believe these amendments are stronger than the wording in the bill and tend to give the legislation the type of strength, spirit, and intention of the act. We have indicated publicly that in general we are very much in favour of the bill. I believe in the development of our own Canadian merchant marine.

I might go back to the reference by Judge Bell to the need for a framework or consolidation of the old Canada Shipping Act into a maritime code for the orderly development of our own Canadian merchant marine. This goes back over a period of 15 or 20 years. If he were here this evening he would welcome this. I refer to him because he fought long and hard for it. Although he is no longer in the partisan sphere I indicate his concern for the protection of the security of transport in the maritimes, in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada, and his concern about anything that imperils the livelihood of the thousands of Canadians who rely on competitive transport for their survival or economic well-being.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the leeway you have given me with regard to the very specific amendment the parliamentary secretary has brought in. We have no serious objection to the amendment. We merely wish to indicate in a general way our caveat or reservation concerning the general drafting of the bill. I would hope the parliamentary secretary, or the Minister of Transport personally would give this House the assurance that they are satisfied that the drafters of this bill have done a piece of work which will lead to an equitable interpretation by the courts in Canada, whether it be in English or in French.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would be lacking in full Canadianism if I did not support the basic thrust of this bill. I have often stated, and my words on the record in this House have made abundantly clear, that in my view Canada requires its own merchant marine.

Canada is a nation which is involved in international trade. We have three coasts. Much of our trade is carried by ships. We will not be able to expand our trade until we are able to command the bottoms in which it is carried.

Basically this is a piece of legislation we have been awaiting. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), who has just spoken, mentioned some of the shortcomings that we see in the amendment proposed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and spoken to briefly by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale). One of the shortcomings is in respect of something that appears in the French text compared to what appears in the English text. I should like to direct attention to two portions. One immediately strikes the point.

Although I do not think one can push this too far, generally speaking there is an equivalence in the English version of the protracted text in the French version; because of the precision with which the French language defines itself the French version normally is a little longer than the English version. When I see a French version that is shorter than the English version it immediately jumps at my eye. I immediately think that something must be omitted somewhere. Then I examine it more closely. There may be other examples, but here I find at least two. This is a long complicated bill which requires a great deal of examination, even having just this in mind.

I should like to cite an example on page 14. Mr. Speaker, if you look at the top of page 14 you will see subclause (2) which is almost twice as long as the French version. One might say to oneself that the French version is concise here. However, I do not think this can be so. I looked a little more closely. I find that there is one expression in the English text which really is not carried over into the French text. One of the expressions in subclause (2) is:

... in the twelve month period immediately preceding September 24, 1973...

[Mr. Forrestall.]

The French version says simply:

A régulièrement et légalement fait du cabotage au Canada depuis le 24 septembre 1972.

That is a different version of the whole thing. Perhaps we should shorten up the English version to correspond with the French version. Instead of saying, "for the twelve month period immediately preceding September 24, 1973" we should say "regularly and legally having been in the service of cabotage in Canada since September 24, 1972." Perhaps this is one aspect of the free translation or free interpretation.

Another example I would cite is on page 50. Here again we have a counteraction in the French. Here the meaning of "cabotage" is narrowed much more in English than in the French. In French it is very large:

Utilisé pour faire du cabotage au Canada.

It refers to "other than a Canadian ship in the particular aspect of the coasting trade". The coasting trade, roughly speaking, one can say is cabotage. There is reference to the particular aspect of the coasting trade of Canada in which the applicant proposes to use the ship to which the application relates. I do not think "faire du cabotage" can be translated with this lengthy expression or that the lengthy English expression can be translated into French by simply saying "faire du cabotage" because cabotage does not cover a definition of a particular form of cabotage when one looks at the definition. In fact "cabotage", if we look in the definition under this bill, is not defined at all. So I support the remarks of my colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax East who mentioned this aspect of the bill. Again I agree with him generally that this is a bill that Canada has long needed.

There is another aspect of the definitions here that I feel is worthy of bringing to your attention, Mr. Speaker. That is, we have two definitions of a Canadian ship, one appearing on page 2 under the definition of Canadian ship. It is on page 2 as item 6. Then on page 4, the third full definition is that of navire canadien. That corresponds with item 6 of the definition in English. Having got there we see that a Canadian ship means a Canadian registered ship or a Canadian registered small craft. Then we go to page 12, and we find that "for the purposes of this section and sections 11, 12 and 14" a Canadian ship means something else.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend, and I say that sincerely, but I think we have had a bit of a misunderstanding as to our way of proceeding this evening. It relates to the original grouping of motions in terms of debating purposes and voting purposes for this evening's discussion. It seems that both my hon. friends across the way and I misunderstood what Madam Speaker earlier had concluded on this matter.

With the consent of the House I propose a new arrangement for dealing with the various motions on the order paper in terms of the clauses that we group together for discussion purposes. I think, just as an aside, that all of us who have spoken so far, including my hon. friend whom I have just interrupted—and I apologize for that—have restricted our remarks so far to the question of the correspondence between the English and French versions, so I do not think we have caused any difficulty for the Chair in that respect.

I propose that motions Nos. 1 and 5 be grouped together for the purposes of discussion and voting because they both relate to a similar subject matter in connection with the two versions of the bill, that is, the English and French versions. I think we could conveniently deal with motions Nos. 2 and 3 together. Motion No. 4 should be dealt with separately. I think motions Nos. 6 and 7 could be conveniently grouped together. Motion No. 8 should be dealt with separately, and motion No. 9 should be dealt with separately. I think there would be a disposition in the House to deal with the clauses in that fashion.

Mr. Forrestall: The observations of the parliamentary secretary are correct. We apologize to the House and trust that we have not caused any great inconvenience. Before we get too deeply into this, I think the groupings the parliamentary secretary has outlined, namely, grouping motions Nos. 1 and 5, and Nos. 2 and 3 No. 4 separately, Nos. 6 and 7 together, No. 8 separately, and No. 9 separately, is the general course of action which would best meet and facilitate the House in getting on with the debate and in any subsequent voting which should take place. I simply support the parliamentary secretary in this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that a vote on motion No. 1 will dispose of motion No. 5; a vote on motion No. 2 will dispose of motion No. 3; motion No. 4 will be a separate vote; a vote on motion No. 6 will dispose of motion No. 7; motion No. 8 will be a separate vote, and motion No. 9 will be a separate vote. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for any misunderstanding. I did confine myself within these limits up to a point; I recognize that. Then I got into two definitions in English which I found just a little difficult to follow, and I am sure that if I had followed the French versions I would have found navire canadien appears in two places with two definitions, so I think in those circumstances I am not entirely out of order.

However, I think these remarks are still worth making because, although I am not a lawyer, I feel there is some role that a definition section in a law of this complexity should play. Then having found out through the definition section what something means, I have to pull myself up with a bit of a jerk as I come a little further along in the legislation to find that that term does not mean the same thing there; it means something else again. As I say, it is not a matter of translation from one language to the other, but the use of the same term in the same language in different senses in different parts of the bill.

My remarks concerning the abbreviation in some portions of the French—and perhaps there is a lack of consonants in the English version—certainly stand, and dealing simply with motions Nos. 1 and 5, I reiterate at this point, that to my way of thinking, when we reach clause 12, there will be a need for a little more assurance. Agreed, this is not covered by these motions, but when we reach clause 12 on page 16 we will need something a little more positive in the way of an assurance. For example, I should like to think that the regulations in both languages will be ready for us to look at before this legislation is finally given third reading, and also that these regulations will have met with the approval of the Maritime premiers who, I understand, expressed some grave reservations, for good economic reasons, about the imposition of this legislation.

I have no quarrel with the amendments which have been put forward, motions Nos. 1 and 5. I think this does illustrate, however, a fact that we have been trying to bring out. I should also like some clarification from the parliamentary secretary, or from the minister himself when the time comes, that the interpretations in one superior court or another will be based on the same sort of facts.

Again I admit that I am not a lawyer, but I have been given to understand that in English speaking courts one relies entirely on the precedents and definitions which are written in the law, whereas—and this again is my understanding, subject to correction—in the French speaking courts, and the superior courts particularly, the judges have access to and they use the historical documents building up the definitions, and even the discussion we are having tonight might very well constitute part of the desiderata of a judge when he is considering the meaning of some term, phrase of clause. This would introduce some quite different elements in the judgments, so I should like during the course of this debate, or later, to have a definitie assurance on these matters.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to speak to clause 8 of the bill in order to express the concern of the shippers of British Columbia about its inclusion in Bill C-61. Everybody in British Columbia welcomes Bill C-61, and those of us who have sat on the committee understand the tremendous amount of work that has gone into it. This is a technical bill and pertains to the new transportation policy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is the hon. member speaking to motion No. 8? Only motions Nos. 1 and 5 are before the House at the moment.

Mr. Huntington: No, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking to the amendment to clause 8, which is motion No. 1.

We realize that the bill is needed to put into shape much of the legislation which is necessary for the implementation of the new transportation policy for Canada. But clause 8 is of real and serious concern to the shippers of British Columbia. This clause would implement something new. We are not continuing with the housekeeping nature and improvement nature of Bill C-61, we are moving into a restriction of coastal shipping to Canadian bottoms.

In British Columbia we are completely capable of building equipment that is entirely suitable in advanced technology for the movement of goods on the coast. We are also capable of building equipment to move goods and service the Arctic from that coast. The problem that shippers in British Columbia have with clause 8 is in regard to its inter-coastal nature, that is, the movement of goods from the west coast to the east coast. This clause puts shippers in British Columbia into the same condition that the Jones Act puts the Pacific Northwest State shippers in the United States—a non-competitive position.

It is a fact of life that British Columbia shippers enjoy a lower rail rate on a mileage basis only because of their ability to move goods across this country by water through the Panama Canal. The recent Canadian National-Canadian Pacific increase in rail rates has caused shippers in British Columbia to look again at the water or ocean movement of British Columbia products to the east coast of the United States and Canada.

What we are doing by insisting that we move merchandise from British Columbia via the Panama Canal in Canadian bottoms is creating a monopoly situation that will either be owned by single interests or by the railroads of Canada. Such a monopoly situation would make the products of British Columbia more expensive to eastern markets and would reduce the take-home pay of the workers in British Columbia. It is absolutely essential that this be understood, and the point was made to the former minister of transport in October, 1974.

In his opening remarks the parliamentary secretary mentioned that we had heard from many committees. It is interesting to note that the steering committee did not see fit to bring back to the transport committee the points made by the Council of Forest Industries of British Columbia. In the discussions in committee I was not made aware that the Council of Forest Industries had made a presentation to the Minister of Transport. I think that was an oversight that has not worked to the advantage of British Columbia shippers.

It is a known fact that limiting the movement of British Columbia products to the east coast of North America via the Panama Canal in Canadian bottoms only would raise the cost, and the limited volume of freight would leave us pretty much in a monopoly situation which would work against our interests. I have been advised that clause 8 can only work extreme adverse hardship on British Columbia shippers.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) pointed out that the same fears existed when Canadian bottoms were limited to the Great Lakes. I should like to point out that on the Pacific rim and in the port of Vancouver we have been serving the hinterland with overland common point rates of the railroads. Much of the service which comes through that port has been due to that classification of freight rate which recognizes the competition of the Panama Canal.

I also point out that the fears of my colleagues about the Great Lakes mentioned by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East did not come to pass. I would suggest that the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway system are a heavily subsidized system for which you could not get an honest comparison of rates.

The Welland Canal alone requires a subsidy of from $33 million to $38 million a year over and above its revenues. The total St. Lawrence seaway system accumulated deficit is approaching $800 million. With that type of subsidy I suggest there is no argument left to allay the fear in British Columbia that Canadian bottoms moving British Columbia goods via the Panama Canal to eastern Canadian coastal ports would do anything but increase the cost of moving those goods to markets. As we are dealing on a delivered basis that increased cost can only come out of the payroll and revenues of British Columbia.

[Mr. Huntington.]

To give an idea of the volumes unvalued I will take two commodities, Mr. Speaker. In 1974 the lumber moved by rail and truck from British Columbia to eastern markets totalled 471 million cubic board feet. At 50,000 cubic board feet to a carload we are talking about nine to ten thousand carloads of this one commodity.

Another product is plywood. In 1974 we shipped 650 million square feet. At 55,000 square feet to the carload we are talking about some 11,000 or 12,000 carloads of this product. That all moves into these eastern markets and the rail rate has to be competitive with water rates that are available from other flags attending the west coast market.

I think the government should be very careful with this clause of the bill because it carries most serious economic consequences for the people of British Columbia. As I have said, we are very capable of designing and building efficient equipment to service the coastal areas and the north into the Arctic. Our main concern is the intercoastal movement of British Columbia products via the Panama Canal. We do not criticize the need for a Canadian merchant marine; if fact, we on the west coast would like to see a Canadian merchant marine, but perhaps with a broader reason and use.

Canadian consumers suffer a very serious disadvantage and deficit when dealing with members of the Ocean Conference. Because we in Canada do not have a Canadian merchant marine we are not party to the Ocean Conference. It is difficult for the port of Vancouver to compete with Seattle as U.S. shippers are members of the Conference. For instance, containers are delivered by the ship slings to the ships at Vancouver and the cost thereafter of moving the container to rest at Vancouver dock or shed is charged to the account of the shipper or receiver. In Seattle, a port which is part of the Ocean Conference, the container is delivered from the ship to "at rest" in the shed, at the expense of the ship. Therefore shippers or receivers in the port of Seattle do not have to meet this additional cost. That is not the case in Canada, as we are not part of the Ocean Conference.

There is no Canadian Marine Industry. I do not think anyone would criticize attempts to establish such an industry in this country. I think the inclusion of clause 8 as worded in the bill shows that the Minister of Transport and the ministry have not given due consideration to the needs of British Columbia.

Another matter to do with clause 8 concerns Canadian bottoms, or the lack of them, involved in coastal trade. I am concerned about trade via the Panama Canal. Canada faces tremendous capital needs for energy, and in the immediate future for modernizing its transport system. Why should we involve ourselves in pouring capital into Canadian bottoms when other bottoms are available to serve us, and take B.C. products to east coast markets? I should like to see this aspect of clause 8 corrected, in order that there may be due consideration of the factors I have mentioned. All regions of Canada must be considered in the matter of transport.

Another concern is this: it has been my personal experience that it is extremely difficult to find crews to man ships. At present we in British Columbia are building a highly technical vessel to serve the oil rigs in the North Sea. Canadian companies are leasing these vessels to the exploration companies. Not long ago I witnessed a launching of one such vessel.

I learned that Canadian companies could not man these ships with Canadian crews. The pay was between $20,000 and $30,000. You would be three weeks on and three weeks off. Your family would live in Spain, and you would be flown back and forth if you served on such a ship. The working conditions and quality of employment were the best I have seen. Yet it was difficult to man that ship. A crew could not be found in British Columbia. The company searched across Canada for personnel to man the ship. That again is another factor to which the government has paid insufficient attention by including clause 8 as worded. For that reason I should like to see this aspect of clause 8 not included in the bill.

In October, 1974, the former minister of transport promised the institution of an efficient waiver system which would allow the use of foreign ships if Canadian ships were unavailable at suitable rates or were unsuitable for the task at hand. If the government intends to include clause 8 in this housekeeping bill I should like to see some guarantee being given with regard to that promised waiver provision.

Again I ask, if you insist on Canadian bottoms moving B.C. products, primary and secondary products, to eastern Canadian markets, who will own the bottoms and will they operate at competitive rates? I suppose they will be owned by Canada Steamship, or a consortium involving Canada Steamship, or one involving the railroads. If the railroads are involved in the ownership of Canadian bottoms serving British Columbia we shall lose the last vestige of hope for obtaining competitive rail rates for moving our products efficiently to consumers in the east.

It is my judgment that it is better to tackle this problem by giving tax incentives in place of subsidy incentives. If you provide tax incentives, industry will find the most efficient answer. Industry will be more efficient than the bureaucracy. I am opposed to this bureaucratic meddling in B.C. industry. It restricts the freedom of our industry.

I was interested to note that the B.C. transport minister has expressed the same concern I have expressed in the House this evening. He said that the Jones Act has worked to the disadvantage of industries in Oregon and Washington competing with British Columbia. We shall neutralize that advantage if we include clause 8 as written in Bill C-61. There can be only one result for B.C. shippers;—increased cost of delivering B.C. products to eastern Canadian markets.

As an alternative we could continue using other countries' bottoms. We could discharge the goods at non-Canadian ports, then ship them by rail or truck to eastern Canadian markets. But that makes no sense. For that reason I contend that the government has not deliberated enough on the need for a rewording of clause 8. It works to the disadvantage of the industries and people of British Columbia. I am glad that Mr. Davis, the B.C. transport minister, now sees the producers' point of view. He was not concerned, I understand, when this subject matter was considered in 1973. He at that time raised no objection to the inclusion of clause 8, as presently worded.

In closing I urge the Department of Transport, the Minister of Transport, and the parliamentary secretary to delete clause 8 in its present form from the bill as it will work a disincentive to the industries and people of British Columbia.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Originally it was agreed that motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 would be voted on and discussed together, under certain conditions. In the light of the later agreement is there unanimous consent to withdraw motions Nos. 2 and 3 from the grouping?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. James Richardson (for the Minister of Transport) moved motion No. 5:

That Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in Clause 11 of the French version by deleting subclause (2) at pages 14 and 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) La Commission canadienne des transports ne peut délivrer la licence prévue au paragraphe (1) que si le requérant la convainc

a) qu'il est dans l'intérêt public d'utiliser un navire autre qu'un navire canadien compte tenu de l'usage particulier auquel le navire visé par la demande est destiné;

b) que le navire visé par la demande présente les caractéristiques nécessaires à cet usage."

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the comments I made on the first motion apply to this motion also. The principle is the same, no substantive change is being made in the effect of this clause. This, simply, is a technical amendment, to make the French language version of the bill correspond with the English version. Comments made with regard to the importance of making both versions the same are relevant here as well.

● (2150)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Do I understand that the remarks that were just made were directed to motion No. 5 and that we have up until now been discussing motions Nos. 1 and 5 together, or were we just discussing motion No. 1? I am really confused.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Motions Nos. 1 and 5. We withdrew motions Nos. 2 and 3 from the grouping. Is the House ready for the question? The question is on motion No. 1 and motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motions?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was wondering whether the government House leader was paying any attention to us tonight. Possibly we can defer any and all results until some point in the future because there will be votes. It might be easier to dispose of this at one time and now move to motion No. 2.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Could we not now agree on division?

Mr. Paproski: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the said motions will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it. Do the motions carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motions Nos. 1 and 5 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House will now proceed to motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, these motions have already been formally moved. We are now starting to get into the meat of the content of Bill C-61, the Maritime Code. We are still dealing with clause 8 with regard to the coastal ports of Canada. My two colleagues have in a general way pointed out some of the fears we on this side have with respect to it.

The amendment I put forward seeks to strengthen the intent and spirit of the act as it relates to cabotage. What we have been attempting to do since we lost the Canadian merchant marine through what can only be described as carelessness by Liberal administrations of 15 or 20 years ago is to re-establish a framework for a Canadian merchant marine.

This House has heard me talk about the role of Canada in the north, for example, that we should be the ones to control our extractive industries, build the boats, find the crews, and provide the technology and planning. My amendment seeks to close one of the major loopholes in the bill. Fears have been expressed by my colleagues from the west. My colleagues from the east will be a little less restrained than those two hon. gentlemen and will put in a forceful manner some of the fears we have.

For those who have bothered to read my amendment it is not put forward with tongue in cheek. I will read it because I am sure most members have not bothered to look at it. I am attempting to close a very serious loophole in the act. If we pass this bill without giving consideration to and doing some thing about this, we might just as well not have bothered in the first place. I have moved the deletion of line 20 at page 12 and the substitution of the following therefor, and I quote:

"Canada: and, for better ensuring the attainment of the said purposes, any port or place in the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon shall be deemed to be a port or place in Canada, and the Governor in Council may, by order, provide that any other port or place not in Canada shall be deemed to be in Canada."

[Mr. Paproski.]

We are trying to get at closing the damnable practice of foreign ships coming into our country and engaging in business that could well be carried on by Canadian entrepreneurs. This is not being done by Canadians because parliament will not give them a change to invest in developing a tourist industry.

As an example, Russian ships enter the port of Montreal and take on passengers who have paid $300, $400 or $500 for a trip. The ship flies a foreign flag. There is a foreign crew. They are not subject to the Canada Labour Code, the Immigration Act, the Income Tax Act, or any other Canadian Laws. We permit them to come here, pick up passengers, steam down the St. Lawrence, up the Saguenay and get off at Quebec. They can clear the Saguenay or Diamond Point at St. Pierre and Miquelon, a foreign place. It does not matter whether they go into that port. They simply have to clear "foreign" and then return to drop off their passengers. They can do so at rates the Canadian industry cannot afford. It is to correct this that we have introduced this amendment. I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I will resume when this matter is next before the House.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION—ALLEGED DISCREPANCY BETWEEN ITEM IN ESTIMATES AND IN PAMPHLET "HOW YOUR TAX DOLLAR IS SPENT"

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 26, I endeavoured to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) respecting the veracity of a statement contained in the document "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" which was tabled by the minister at the time he tabled the main estimates for 1976-77.

I feel that I must have worded the question badly since the Chair ruled that it ought to be put to the minister when he is before the standing committee. Certainly any questions dealing with spending by the Treasury Board should be put to the President of the Treasury Board in committee. And of course any questions dealing with the details of spending in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources should be put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) in committee.

However, the question I had was not with regard to the estimates or the spending by these departments, but rather with regard to a statement in the pamphlet "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent". In particular, on page 24 of this pamphlet in the final paragraph, indeed the final sentence of the section describing Energy, Mines and Resources, there is the statement, and I quote:

Main estimates for this ministry are higher in 1976-77 mainly because of the requirement for increased payments under the oil price subsidy program.

Well, looking at the estimates at page 5-4 I see that spending under the oil price subsidy program will, in fact, decrease by the amount of $250 million between the fiscal years 1975-76 and 1976-77. I realize that detailed questions regarding the nature of these expenses ought to be put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in committee, and I intend to do that. But this booklet, "How your Tax Dollar is Spent" was not referred to the committee. In the words of the President of the Treasury Board in his introduction, the booklet was designed to be—of considerable use to taxpayers and members of the House of Commons and the Senate because of the way it summarizes the voluminous details of the Blue Book, and because of additional information provided to show the economic context in which the government planned its expenditures.

Surely that is the case only if the information contained in the book is correct. A casual look at the estimates with regard to the statement to which I referred earlier shows that it is clearly not correct.

On February 12, Mr. Speaker, this house spent a day debating a motion put forward by my hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants dealing with the question of freedom of information. During the rather high level debate which took place that day members on both sides agreed there was a need for more and better information to be supplied by the government, in particular in connection with spending programs.

In his contribution to the debate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) said the government was in fact providing more information. He gave us an example. He said that much more information was being provided by way of white papers and documents prepared to support the budget. He might have talked about this document, "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent". It is a relatively new edition to the procedure when tabling estimates. Anyway, this, we were told, was an example of the way the government was moving, and it is a desirable direction. But it must be acknowledged that there are statements here which are exactly contrary to the facts, as one is able to glean them from that awfully complicated document, the Blue Book of main estimates.

I do not intend to rehash old pleas about the necessity of better information, particularly for members of the House of Commons. This is so obvious that it should not require any elaboration. It is necessary for the functioning of our system that there should be less secrecy and more openness about spending.

The President of the Treasury Board has been moved to tell the House how difficult it is to curtail government spending. Well, Mr. Speaker, the C. D. Howe Research Institute gave some excellent advice when it stated that the first place the government should start in its program of restraint was by providing the public with better information as to how money was being spent and the problems the government was encountering in trying to hold down growth in government spending. Part of that is a requirement for more openness and honesty.

This might be an honest mistake in the document, it might not. As I read the document it is less information about how your tax dollars are spent and more of an apologia for the government's inability to control government spending along the lines that were promised the Canadian people in the budget and many times since.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the booklet to which the hon. member refers, entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", provides comparisons between budgets printed in the Blue Books of main estimates of two consecutive years. In this case, the 1965-76 Blue Book displayed oil import compensation payments as $1,300 million, and the 1976-77 Blue Book displays these payments as $1,410 million.

Mr. Andre: What book are you reading?

Mr. Francis: When the hon. member reads my statement I think he will understand what I am saying. I just ask him to hear me out; I think it will be self-explanatory. Therefore, comparison of these figures identifies an increase of $110 million, as the hon. member pointed out.

However, the amount printed in the 1975-76 Blue Book was supplemented during the course of the fiscal year by $385 million, bringing the total program up to $1,685 million. This was displayed in supplementary estimates "A" of this year and is displayed as total 1975-76 program cost in the 1976-77 Blue Book. It is because of that supplementary estimate that the program, as it appears in next year's Blue Book, shows a decrease of $275 million. The hon. member is perfectly right in calling attention to the difficulty of getting documents printed on a basis that includes the latest information, including supplementary estimates tabled in the House. That is the explanation of the particular discrepancy to which he points.

RESEARCH—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF FREEZE ON FUNDS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): On January 27, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Acting Prime Minister whether in view of protests that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the minister of state in charge of science and technology and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) were receiving from all sectors of the scientific community regarding the virtual freeze on research funds provided to universities, the government would reconsider its position. The Acting Prime Minister replied that there would be no change.

I have refrained until now from pursuing the question further because I hoped that the protests, which I knew were continuing to flow into the Prime Minister's office, might give the Prime Minister some understanding of the horror which the government's freeze has created for the scientific community.

Let me put on the record some of the comments that have been made. The President of the National Research Council, Dr. W. G. Schneider, said among other things:

Canada will not be able to hold its own in the international market for new and improved manufactured products in a few years time because of these research cuts.

Dr. Gerhard Herzberg, one of Canada's new Nobel prize winners, charged in Ottawa in February that government bureaucracy and cost cutting have stifled the creativity of Canada's scientific researchers. He said:

● (2210)

. . . that pure, not applied, science had suffered most from government cutbacks. Basic research funds increased minimally in the past five years, he said, at a time of high inflation. As a result, actual government spending in pure science declined by about half.

What this means can be seen very quickly if one looks at a letter written by the President of the Medical Research Council, Dr. Malcolm Brown. I shall quote just a few sentences from his letter in which he outlines what the Medical Research Council is doing in order to meet the constraints put on it by the government:

The Visiting Scientist, Research Professorships and Summer Undergraduate Research Scholarships programs have been suspended for 1976-77.

The June 1976 grants competition has been cancelled. General Research Grants have each been reduced by one third for 1976-77.

A 3 per cent cut will be made in the operating component (exclusive of support provided for approved trainees and professional assistants) of all MRC grants for 1976-77 except term grants in their third year and terminal awards, . . .

Let me place on the record a few quotations from some of the letters which have gone to the Prime Minister. Here is one from my province from Professor J. C. Haworth, Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Manitoba Health Sciences Centre. He states:

Reduction of our research programs will have the following results:

1. Since about 70 per cent of our research funding is used to pay salaries, the reduction in the value of research funds will inevitably require the discharge of some technical staff. Quite apart from the personal hardship this will cause, it must be recognized that many of these people are highly trained and skilled in their work and it will take years to train others to the same level of competence when research funds again become more plentiful.

Here is a letter to the Prime Minister from Dr. D. G. Scraba, Associate Professor of the Department of Biochemistry at the University of Alberta. He says:

While I support your government's intention to control its spending, I seriously question its priorities for restraint. Surely the saving of $7,000,000 from the total federal budget cannot justify the harmful immediate and long-term effects upon medical research in this country.

He concludes by saying:

The net result of these restrictions will be to retard progress now, and to seriously imperil the future of medical research in Canada. Once momentum and enthusiasm has been lost in this field a substantial period of time will be required to regenerate it.

I could go on, but I just want to say that when the government restricts scientific research to the few millions of dollars it has this year, when we have a budget of well over $30 billion, to say the least it is being pretty stupid about priorities, particularly when one keeps in mind the kind of criticism of government spending the Auditor General made in his last report.

Let me put on the record a few of the comments of the Auditor General. He points out that rental costs for unoccupied space in Ottawa were $487,000 in 1974-75 and will probably be $4.5 million in 1975-76. Let me point out that the Department of National Defence is to construct a language centre at its base at St. Jean at a cost of $88 million.

Let me point out that we are spending something in the neighbourhood of $1 billion to construct the Olympic facilities for a three weeks' spectacular. Let me point out that we spent $10 million on the Pickering Airport which has been abandoned. Finally, in the last six years when the government has been talking about restraints, the number of executive employees has grown from something under 400 to over 1,000, an increase of two and a half times. I am talking about senior civil servants who earn from $30,000 to $65,000 per year. It seems obvious to me that when the government talks about restraint and imposes the kind of restraint which it has imposed on the scientific community, it is not only stupid but, to say the least, criminal.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who has expressed a sincere and genuine concern about the amount of money which is available at any time for scientific research.

The hon. member is an experienced parliamentarian and has been in this House for a good long while, and he knows full well that the government has been fully committed and remains committed to the maintenance and development of a national capacity to perform research when that research is in the field of natural, medical, or social sciences. Research leads to new knowledge, and hopefully that knowledge will become available for applications which can be useful to the human condition. We all recognize that. Most of our basic research over the years has been directed toward the universities because we know that there is the greatest freedom and stimulation for a very high quality of basic research.

Hon. members know what has been happening in the universities, particularly in the 1960's. During that period of time undergraduate enrollment in universities doubled, and post graduate enrollment increased five-fold. During this period we only need to ask ourselves what was the participation and the role of the federal government? The budget of the research council for grants and scholarships during that same period of time increased annually by the amount of 20 per cent.

Mr. Orlikow: What has happened in the last couple of years?

Mr. Penner: Every member of parliament with an ounce of fiscal commonsense knows that this pattern of expenditures simply could not go on indefinitely. A change in emphasis in government spending was bound to occur, and that is the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time. We realize now, somewhat painfully, that we are in a time of fiscal restraint, and every segment of our economy must bear its share of the burden in this effort to reduce inflation. That includes the scientific community.

Unfortunately, scientific research cannot be an exception. There are budgetary restraints and there is a budgetary discipline, and I believe that the scientists and researchers in Canada can learn to live with that because it certainly does not mean that there will be a dismantling of our research teams. It does mean learning how to live within the present constraints. That is a challenge all of us are facing, but I for one have a great deal of confidence in our Canadian scientists and researchers and I believe that, despite these financial restraints which have been imposed on them and other segments of the economy, they will continue contributing to the pool of knowledge which we expect and need.

PENITENTIARIES—BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SEIZING OF HOSTAGES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on February 19 three well known desperadoes in the New Westminster penitentiary managed to find themselves in a place where they could capture three hostages and hold them at bay while they entered into negotiations with federal authorities. On that day I rose in the House and asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) whether there were any weapons of any type involved when these hostages were seized, whether it happened during the time when the prisoners were being transferred, and what the circumstances were.

First I should like to thank the Solicitor General for his candid answer on that day at a time when he was under severe tension because the hostages were still being held at knife point in the B.C. penitentiary. However, there has been nothing said by the minister which would shed further light on this incident, and the whole case brings into question the administration of the federal penitentiary system in Canada. There are some very serious unanswered questions. I have been through that penitentiary at least twice and have seen the former security area and at one time the solitary confinement area, popularly known as "the penthouse"—an impregnable area.

As soon as the supreme court judge issued his judgment on the matter of cruel and unusual treatment the administrator of the federal penitentiary in New Westminster almost fell over himself to remove prisoners from the maximum security area and establish a new section known as the administration segregation unit.

The first question I should like the parliamentary secretary to answer is why the administrator was in such a hurry to move those prisoners from the maximum security area to the new area which had been so recently constructed. I am very certain no court order was issued commanding the administrator to transfer them to the new unit. Who authorized him to do that, and why was he in such a hurry?

Second, when these men were known to be such desperate criminals, why were three of them in such close proximity? Why were three of them in a position to remain in the exercise area that day so that they could hold three hostages until their demands were met? Why were they all free at the same time?

I would point out to the parliamentary secretary that one of the prison guards, Mr. Crawford, opened the door for Mr. Lucas, who was one of the three men who held the 15 hostages last June. Mr. Jarvis opened the door for Mr. Lowe. Who opened the door for Mr. Bruce? All three desperados were free at the same time.

These questions have not been answered, Mr. Speaker. If we are to have a secure prison system why were those three men free at the same time? Where did they get the knives? Is there no security system to check knives and all the other prison utensils when prisoners finish their meal? What kind of administration allows such loose surveillance of the utensils the prisoners use?

The final question is the fundamental one. It would seem that the routine order transferring these men, or allowing them to exercise, allows only one person to exercise at a time. That seems an obvious and sensible policy, but it would appear that the routine order had been changed that day so that three of them got out at the same time. I wonder if the Solicitor General would agree to table in the House the routine order for that day so that members could see what had been done so that three men were free to exercise in the court at the same time.

We are about to debate a measure dealing with peace and security. That type of legislation becomes somewhat of a mockery if, at the same time the government puts it before us, there is sloppy administration in the prison system. How is it possible to pass further legislation in this House when the laws of the land are being violated with impunity?

I simply pose these questions to the parliamentary secretary, Mr. Speaker. Why was it that Mr. Maurice Ford, who went in to help the men for whom he was responsible, was not given support by the administration of the penitentiary when he was held at ransom? What man in his right mind is going to work in the penitentiary if he gets no more support than Mr. Ford got on that day? I think the Canadian people and the House deserve some answers about the administration of our penitentiaries by officers appointed by the Solicitor General. I would hope the Solicitor General will answer these questions so that we will see he has a responsible attitude toward the administration of justice in the land.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) is concerned and that many of the questions he has asked tonight cannot be answered until the commission of inquiry ordered by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries has been completed.

At the time the initial question was answered the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) was able to provide some particulars, and I may be able to provide further at this time.

As a result of a judgment rendered by the hon. Justice Heald of British Columbia, changes were made in the conditions of segregation at the British Columbia penitentiary. The inmates who were involved in the recent hostage taking incident, namely, Messrs. Lucas, Bruce, and Lowe, had been transferred from the special correctional unit on the top floor of the British Columbia penitentiary to a special area isolated for the purpose of segregation, but located in the main dome area of the British Columbia penitentiary. This area was especially isolated for the purpose of holding inmates in segregation. They were accommodated in the same type of cells as provided for the rest of the inmate population. That particular range of cells in which the incident took place was under the control of the correctional officers.

The Solicitor General earlier stated in the House that the incident occurred at approximately 0820 hours Pacific time. The three inmates seized three correctional officers and held them in one end of the administrative segregation area, B-7. They had five kitchen knives which they had filed down, and what officials believe to be a container of acid. The incident ended shortly before 2300 hours on the same day. Neither staff nor inmates were injured.

Some of the demands of the three inmates were related to minor problems of administration which the director, after consulting with the commissioner, agreed to take action upon. Another demand was that changes be made with respect to the procedures governing inmate disciplinary courts. The director could not agree to this matter as it was beyond his jurisdiction. However, this demand was referred to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries for his consideration. The commissioner declined to make any comment on this matter except to state that this matter had been looked at in detail by the Vantour report. The penitentiary service will be giving their official reaction to this report in the near future.

The inmates further requested that they be transferred to the Dorchester penitentiary. This request was agreed to, and at this time the transfer of two of the inmates is completed. The third inmate involved appeared in court in British Columbia on March 3 and was subsequently transferred to Dorchester penitentiary.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General, to take this opportunity to commend all these persons in authority who were involved in this incident for having been successful in obtaining the release of the three hostages without any injury or loss of life to either personnel or inmates. He also wants to thank Miss Winfield, Mr. Hogan, and Mr. Siegfried for their most valuable co-operation in this matter.

An inquiry has been convened into these incidents and it is the minister's intention to inform the House of the results of this inquiry in due course of time. For this reason the minister would be most reluctant to comment on the details of the incident and risk prejudicing anyone involved in this case. May I again thank the hon. member for his extreme interest in the matter.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—FREEDOM OF CHIEF JUSTICE OF QUEBEC TO INTERVIEW MINISTERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? Without accepting the position of the government that the chief justice of the province of Quebec should be asked to act as conscience of the government in place of the Prime Minister, may I ask if the chief justice will be completely free to interview ministers and obtain ministerial papers, documents or other permanent records?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the hon. member's question, may I say this: the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec has been asked, as I think is proper and in line with my view of the independence of the judiciary and separation of powers, to indicate to me any information that he feels it is appropriate to give me relating to unwarranted attempts to interfere with the proper administration of justice in his courts.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my question. I was asking about the position of the government. For example, the Minister of Public Works raised the matter of privilege with respect to conversations he had with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I ask the minister if the chief justice will be given the opportunity to interview the Minister of Public Works and other ministers with respect to any intervention, alleged or otherwise, with the judiciary.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the chief justice of the Superior Court wants to do that, the ministers and members of the government will co-operate fully.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REFERENCE TO INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works? On Wednesday the minister is reported to have said, on page 11457 of Hansard:

> I had a conversation, also with the associate chief justice of Quebec, along, as I discovered, with a great many other public spirited citizens who had taken part in trying to effect a solution to a rather difficult and, to some degree, unprecedented problem.

My question is this: does the minister admit that, along with others, as a minister of the Crown he attempted to effect a solution by acting on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be particularly helpful if one were to try to anticipate what may be the views formulated by the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—RECOMMENDATIONS OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE CONCERNING INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice, the chief legal officer of Canada, with regard to the confession of the Minister of Public Works. That minister, when answering me on Wednesday last said, in part, as reported on page 11457 of Hansard:

> Indeed, the only intervention that would be contemplated by me would be one to see that he was in full knowledge of the facts—

Meaning the judge, the minister having been in touch with the associate chief justice. I continue—> —and did his duty.

My question to the chief law officer of Canada, Attorney General and Minister of Justice, is this: has the minister, in view of the confession made by the Minister of Public Works that he intervened, and tried to tell the judge how to do his duty, made recommendations to the Prime Minister? Has he made any recommendations relating to the impropriety of the executive engaging in that kind of intervention with the judiciary?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works went on to say, again as reported at page 11457 of Hansard:

> I did not attempt to influence the decision.

As I indicated on Wednesday, although Mr. Justice Mackay's letter asked me to take no action I felt it incumbent on me to ask my colleagues for an explanation, which I received. The information indicates no attempt on their part to interfere with the course of justice.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That's a whitewash.

Mr. Basford: Therefore, as I indicated previously, I do not intend to make a further recommendation to the Prime Minister or government until I have followed what I regard as the proper course of allowing the "chief" justice of the Superior Court to give me any information and details which the chief justice deems proper to give me in the circumstances.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING LEGAL OPINION ON INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Yesterday the Minister of Justice answered a question put by the hon. member for St. John's East. He pointed out two matters that would be crimes under the Code, one of which would be and I quote from page 11489 of Hansard: —to have a private communication for the purpose of influencing a judicial decision.

It is easy for a fellow to say he did not influence the jury. It is similar to defending someone for murder. I have never heard anyone tell his counsel he was guilty. The facts determine whether he is guilty. In light of the two points of law raised in the minister's answer to the hon. member for St. John's East, has he referred those two matters to his legal officers in view of the self confession of interference by the Minister of Public Works?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the words I was using yesterday are from Halsbury's definition of the nature of private communications, which amounts to criminal contempt. As the hon. member knows, that is a proceeding to be taken by a judge. In all three instances, no such proceedings have been taken.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Minister of Justice will want to answer this question. Is he prepared to refer the matter to his legal officers? I respect Halsbury's Laws of England. However, as the chief legal officer of Canada, is the minister prepared to refer the matter to his legal officers to get an opinion rather than just refer to certain precedents and come to his own decisions without an opinion from his legal officers?

Mr. Basford: As an eminent lawyer in Calgary, I think the hon. member knows that contempt proceedings are not taken at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada, but at the instance of the judge himself. No such proceedings have been taken. In answer to the hon. member, I may indicate that in the course of my duties, I have many communications with chief justices throughout Canada on a whole range of matters relating to salaries, retirement, workloads and work with the judicial council. In no instance has any chief justice ever brought to my attention an attempt to interfere with the course of justice by members of the ministry.

SPORTS

SUMMER GAMES AT ST. JOHN'S—FAILURE TO CALL TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF MAIN SPORTS COMPLEX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the summer games that are to be held in St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1977. As the Acting Prime Minister is aware, the federal government will be spending several million dollars as their share in the financing of these games. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware that the contract involving the principal expenditure of some $4.5 million for a main sports complex has been granted to a company without going through public tender?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. Broadbent: Both local councillors and a local newspaper have raised this issue with particular reference to the fact that the company which got the contract without tender is in fact owned by Mr. Andrew Crosbie who is chairman of the summer games association. Is it the Prime Minister's view that this procedure is appropriate, bearing in mind the fact that in the past public tendering for the summer games has been a condition insisted on by the federal government, as I understand it?

Mr. Sharp: I will inquire into the circumstances. I understand it is not suggested that the federal government is awarding this contract. Do I understand correctly that it is some other authority which was awarded the contract?

Mr. Broadbent: The minister is correct in that assumption, according to my information; the contract has been awarded by the local committee. Nevertheless, a substantial portion of the money is coming from the federal government, approximately one-third, hence the reason for concern on the part of the federal government. Would the Acting Prime Minister undertake to make an inquiry and ascertain why calling for tenders was not insisted upon by the federal government, though this was the case in the past, and, more specifically, will he investigate the possibility of a conflict of interest in view of the fact that a contract was awarded to a company owned by the chairman of the summer games committee?

Mr. Sharp: I will undertake to make those inquiries, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—INQUIRY WHETHER LEGAL OPINION SOUGHT ON INTERVENTION BY PRIME MINISTER'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice dealing with the Prime Minister's conclusion that a lawyer, who was also principal secretary to the Prime Minister, made a legitimate intervention.

The minister realizes that there is a cardinal rule that there should be no intervention by anyone, particularly by lawyers, during the course of a trial by a judge. Was the then minister of justice asked for an opinion as to this course of action by a lawyer and in particular was the hon. gentleman's opinion sought before the Prime Minister concluded that this was a legitimate intervention, and, if so, what was the advice given?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): With respect to the first part of the question, because all this was seven years ago, we are endeavouring to determine the answer to that question. With regard to the second part of the question, the explanation by the then principal secretary, now Minister of National Health and Welfare, was provided to myself and to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister explained yesterday, it was a request on behalf of a foreign government which was concerned about matters in its own country and wished to know the date when a judgment would be made, and that was the purpose for the communication with the judge.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST THAT OPINION OF BAR BE OBTAINED ON RULES FOR INTERVENTION BY LAWYERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In the light of the dangerous precedent set by the Prime Minister in terms of his calling the intervention a legitimate one, would the hon. gentleman contact all bar associations and law societies throughout the country to get an opinion on interventions of this sort and to determine whether there is one rule for lawyers who are members of parliament or who work in the Prime Minister's office or for the government and another for lawyers not so engaged?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I think the Prime Minister made the position very clear yesterday, both inside and outside this chamber, that all ministers and members of the House are expected to obey the law just as any other citizen.

Mr. Alexander: Would the minister kindly answer my question? This is an extremely important matter. Bar associations throughout the country will be extremely concerned. I ask him again whether he will take this matter up with the presidents of the bar associations and law societies so as to make sure there are not two rules affecting lawyers?

Mr. Basford: I would be happy to receive any views the bar or the law societies might wish to send me, but with all due respect to the hon. member's question I do not need the advice of the bar to know that members of this House and members of the government are expected, like other citizens, to obey the law.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO IMPROVE GROWTH OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since it appears that the worst GNP growth performance since 1954 indicates a complete lack of confidence in the economic management of the federal government, may I ask the minister whether he can explain what steps the government is taking to improve the growth performance in the economic sector, or is the government committing the country to zero growth for the forseeable future, or certainly for the next few months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. gentleman to read with some care the Statistics Canada analysis of March 4 of the figures for 1975. He will note, as I have stated many times in the House during the past several months, that the principal underperformance of the economy has been in the export sector, particularly because of the slow recovery of the major export markets such as the United States, Japan and western Europe from the much deeper recession that they went into than did Canada.

We notice that in terms of domestic products, for example in the durables sector, and indeed with the recent spectacular increase in the housing sector, the economy in Canada itself is very clearly responding to the measures that my predecessor put forward and that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in charge of housing put forward to assist the domestic economy. However, we have to be concerned at the recovery of world markets upon whose success the economic success of Canada is so dependent.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The most significant news in that the pace of growth in the last quarter was only one-third the pace of the growth in the previous three months, so certainly I would question the minister's statement of a few moments ago. Since it seems to indicate that Canada is having a very difficult time coming out of its own recession, is the government contemplating the updating of its spring budget in order to deal with the serious matter of Canada's very sluggish economy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best I can do is to read to the hon. gentleman what Statistics Canada had to say about the fourth quarter:

> The fourth quarter weakness was reflected by a very moderate 1.6 per cent increase in wages, salaries and supplementary labour income, which is by far the largest component of gross national product.

Then, reading on:

> However, to some extent this weakness is misleading, since it follows the payment of large cost of living allowances in the third quarter; these payments had the effect of raising the third quarter growth rate at the expense of the fourth, and, if they were excluded, the fourth quarter growth would have been a much more normal 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Murta: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has not answered my question. The real gross national product rose by only 0.2 per cent in 1975, which Statistics Canada has indicated is the worst GNP growth performance since 1954. Is the government intending to continue on the same course it has followed over the past few months, or is it contemplating bringing in an earlier than anticipated budget to deal with the very sluggish performance of the Canadian economy at the present time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I can only state to the hon. gentleman that he might study more carefully the Statistics Canada report. I think he would have a better understanding of the current state of the economy, and indeed of the circumstances under which fiscal and economic policy will have to be made in the coming year.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF INFORMATION SUPPLIED TO INTERPOL BY FORCE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

Since the RCMP may unconsciously break section 4 of the Official Secrets Act by providing Interpol with information on Canadian citizens, which are likely to be referred to the police in communist or fascist countries, would the minister order an inquiry into this matter to make sure the RCMP does not forward information to Interpol which might harm the reputation of Canadian citizens?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, as Acting Solicitor General I am not familiar with the possible effects that lie behind the question of the hon. member. I will draw it to the attention of the Solicitor General immediately and will see he receives an answer.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN CROWN LIABILITY PROVISION WHEN INJURY CAUSED BY RADIOACTIVITY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Is consideration being given by the government to amending the limitation period under which the Crown and Crown agencies can be sued to make it crystal clear that in cases of physical or medical injury to persons arising from radioactivity the limitation period only starts running when knowledge of the damage becomes known and not when knowledge of the radioactivity or cause of the injury occurs? Am I making myself clear? In other words, will it be made certain that a lawsuit need not be started until it is obvious that injury has occurred as distinct from having to sue when knowledge of the exposure occurs?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question or the issue is clear to me. I indicated at a meeting of Attorneys General in Halifax last October that I was considering revisions to both the Federal Court Act and the Crown Liability Act. That consideration is still underway. I am not in a position to say at this point when I will be able to make recommendations to my colleagues or when legislation might be introduced. However, the issue the hon. member's question raised is under consideration.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it would be possible for the minister to put this on a rather higher priority than it obviously is at the moment, because the issue is very topical in certain areas of the country.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, certainly I recognize the importance of the issue, and particularly its importance to the people the hon. member represents in this House. I regard it as a priority, but of course we seem to have an immense number of priorities in this country and in this House. It is a case of when the recommendation by me can be finalized and when it can be dealt with by Cabinet or by this House.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF ROOSEVELT DOUGLAS—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the Sir George Williams incident and the case of Roosevelt Douglas. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he could inform the House whether the Minister of Manpower and Immigration received any ministerial representations regarding the deportation of Roosevelt Douglas from Canada who was convicted in the Sir George Williams incident?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries, but I should have thought any communication between ministers was privileged.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Acting Prime Minister the following question: Would he inform the House whether the former principal secretary of the Prime Minister, now Minister of National Health and Welfare, made representations to immigration officials to either accelerate or delay deportation proceedings which were initiated against Roosevelt Douglas and which still have not been completed, especially in view of the fact that the Prime Minister said yesterday that intervention had taken place by his principal secretary at that time as a result of the request of a friendly government because if the deportation and the trial carried on difficulties could occur in that friendly country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries. I am not quite certain, however, what the purpose of the inquiries would be. The government did take action against Rosie Douglas with the intention of deporting him. That was done by the minister and supported generally by the Cabinet.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR DEFERRAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON TAKING RED FISH IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fisheries. In view of the profound effect of the restrictions placed on the taking of red fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and in view of the concern on the part of the fisheries industry and the provincial governments of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland which have requested that the restriction be deferred until they can review its impact would the minister indicate whether he has agreed to that representation and what action he will take on it?

● (1130)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for having been absent when the hon. member first rose. This matter of the red fish had been made known in 1973 at a meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland and it produced then fairly dramatic headlines. At the time it was indicated that by 1975 the stocks would be depleted. Better management, with the help of the industry, allowed us to stretch the stock into 1976. However, we are now looking at the spawning stocks and no one in the industry wants us to destroy that part of the fishery. The quota limitations that were announced were hinted at very clearly in December of last year.

At the request of the industry, a scientific report was produced on February 11. When it was brought in, it was very pessimistic and therefore action had to be taken. The industry knew that there would be serious limitations in the quota this year. The large trawlers which were fishing in the gulf went to the level of their percentage of the quota in comparison with the previous years. Had we not intervened to close the red fish fishery now, there would have been nothing left for those vessels which are based in the gulf. They do not have the capacity to go outside the gulf and therefore would have had nothing left at all when their time came to fish in May.

Mr. Marshall: As the minister stated, the fact is that everybody knew that this fishery was being seriously depleted. As a matter of fact, in 1973 it amounted to 163,000 metric tons and in 1974 it went down to 63,000 metric tons. Would the minister explain why action was not taken at that time, action which would have been less severe, and would he also explain why Canada agreed at the ICNAF meetings to 90,000 metric tons quota, 60,000 metric tons of which went to the Russians? Is this reasonable with regard to Canadian fishermen and the future of our fishing industry?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will be patient with me because my explanation might take longer than I would like. The 1973 information was based on the class 1956-58 fish which were by then mature and which had to be caught, otherwise they would have died of old age.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is what the Liberal government is doing.

An hon. Member: The geritol age.

Mr. Speaker: Lest the explanation might die of old age as well—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —I wonder if we are not starting a series of questions that should properly be asked of the minister when the estimates are before the standing committee. I think an expanded explanation is in order and I do not wish to interfere, but if we are to pursue the matter vigorously, it might be done there, unless there is a brief explanation.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): These fish were competing for food supplies with other fish and everybody accepted they had to be taken until we had reached the level of the spawning stock. This level has now been reached, and that is why we had to apply conservation measures. This is a gulf of St. Lawrence quota and is a strictly Canadian managed fishery. Foreign fleets are not fishing directly for red fish in the gulf, and it has no immediate relation with the IGNAF quota.

Mr. Marshall: Regardless of what the minister says, the fishing industry in Newfoundland is almost obliterated and it will mean the loss of hundreds of jobs to fishermen. Is the minister taking into consideration the depressing effect on the economy of Newfoundland, and has he consulted with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in order to provide some input or is he himself considering any compensation to the fishermen?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): It must be pointed out that although the red fish fishery is closed, the fishermen can fish other species in the gulf, such as cod. The industry has known about the coming reduction and it certainly can adjust to it, as fishermen in Nova Scotia have adjusted to the three months closure of the haddock fishery at spawning time. We have an assistance program for the fisheries, including some assistance which will be announced in the next few days. The industry at this point has caught its share of red fish and it simply must adapt itself to others having their share, too.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO REDUCE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the report by Statistics Canada that last year the Canadian economy recorded its worst growth performance since 1954 with an increase in real GNP of only 0.2 per cent, and since the average rate of unemployment for 1975 was over 7 per cent during the entire year, would the minister indicate what steps if any the government proposes to take to deal with the undoubtedly higher rate of unemployment which we will face in 1976?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I have said a number of times in the House, we intend a little later in the spring to make a budgetary statement. It seems to me that that kind of comprehensive statement is best made in the context of the budget.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that provincial and municipal governments are following the example of the federal government in instituting programs of restraint, as exemplified by lay-offs by municipal governments, hospitals and provincial governments in the hundreds of thousands, even in the minister's own city of Toronto, will the minister tell the House what suggestions he has for those governments or for those hundreds of thousands of people who will be laid off as to what they might do in the year 1976 to take care of their problems?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think one might want to look a little more closely at the assertion of hundreds of thousands that the hon. member makes. I will only say that an integral part of the fight against inflation, in which all provincial governments and the federal government are engaged, has been to try to restrict the growth expenditures in the public sector. I think this is generally recognized, except by the hon. gentleman's colleagues, as an integral part of what has to be a national effort to take part in solving the problem.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF CLOSURE OF BASE OF MONCTON—REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister please inform the House whether he or his staff have had any discussions whatsoever with the provincial government, the municipal authorities, the chamber of commerce in Moncton and the labour organizations in Moncton with regard to the economic impact of the possible and rumoured closure or reduction of the Canadian Forces Base Moncton resulting in lay-offs and serious economic effects on the community generally and the whole area of southeastern New Brunswick, and will consideration be given to the fact that already hundreds of people have been laid off by CNR and several hundreds of people have received lay-off notices as a result of the closure of the Eaton's catalogue department?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to respond directly concerning any bases while the infrastructure study is underway. I have made that clear on a number of occasions. I am certain, however, that my personnel who are examining the whole infrastructure will be familiar with some of the problems affecting the economy of Moncton, particularly the closure of the Eaton's catalogue office and the other points mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again addressed to the Minister of National Defence. What I am concerned about is whether any discussions will be conducted with the authorities I have mentioned.

Mr. Richardson: If it is necessary to do so, of course there will be discussions.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

ELECTIONS

VIEWS OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER ON LENGTH OF CAMPAIGNS—LENGTH OF TIME ST. JOHN'S WEST WITHOUT REPRESENTATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, Friday is my day to clear up anomalies so that they will not hang around over the weekend. I want to put a question to the President of the Privy Council. Does he not think it curious that the government's announcement about a by-election in St. John's West next October 18—which I think is the diamond jubilee of the Prime Minister, although I have not checked it—was made at the very time when the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada was before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with recommendations to substantially shorten the time of national campaigns?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I hope it is the hon. member's expectation, as it is mine, that the recommendation of the Chief Electoral Officer will be accepted so that when this happy event occurs, when the by-election is called on the Prime Minister's birthday, it will be run more efficiently and take less time.

● (1140)

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Does the President of the Privy Council, whose responsibility it is to have the government participate in its so-called participatory democracy, realize that by waiting until the Prime Minister's birthday this will be the longest vacancy in the 109 year history of parliament and is he proud of this?

An hon. Member: Shame!

REASON FOR DELAY IN CALLING BY-ELECTION IN ST. JOHN'S WEST

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Notwithstanding the importance of the Prime Minister's diamond jubilee, can the Acting Prime Minister explain to the House why it was necessary to put off this by-election until October 18 which will mean that the people of St. John's West have been without representation in this parliament for 13 months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government made its decision to call the by-election with a full understanding of all the facts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—GUARANTEES SOUGHT PRIOR TO RESUMPTION OF TRADE IN NUCLEAR MATERIALS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Because of the manner in which India has violated agreements on nuclear detonations in the past, and because a member of the Prime Minister's staff is presently in India to discuss a resumption of Canadian nuclear assistance to that country, what kind of guarantee is being sought in order to ensure that a repetition of the Rajasthan explosion of May, 1974 does not occur?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was because this Indian government did not accept our interpretation of the agreements that we cut off nuclear co-operation with India and also reduced the amount of our aid. Both of these subjects are still under consideration. Our objective is to try to avoid any more nuclear explosions by the state of India, but of course this is a decision over which we do not have control.

INDIA—POSSIBILITY SIGNING OF NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY CONDITION PRECEDENT TO RESUMPTION OF TRADE IN NUCLEAR MATERIALS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary I should like to clear up two points. Is the government of Canada making India's ratification of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty a condition to the further export of Canadian nuclear supplies to that country and will members of this House of Commons be provided with an opportunity to examine in detail and debate the merits of any proposed resumption of nuclear shipments to India before any agreement is finalized?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if any decision is made to change the course upon which we are now engaged there will be many opportunities for discussion in this House. A motion could be put down on an opposition day; there could be discussion on the estimates and perhaps there are other ways. The government has every reason to want full disclosure of all the facts. Our purpose like the hon. member's, I hope, is to persuade India to change its course.

INDIA—REASON FOR SENDING REPRESENTATIVE FROM PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE TO DISCUSS TRADE IN NUCLEAR MATERIALS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Acting Prime Minister is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. It being understood that there is of course a Canadian diplomatic mission in New Delhi headed by a high commissioner, I wonder why it should be necessary to send a non-specialist in this particular matter and not a member of the Department of External Affairs who is particularly charged with matters relating to nuclear energy? In other words, is there no trust in Canada's foreign service that someone is sent from the Prime Minister's office?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is every confidence in our diplomatic mission in India. I believe that a visit by a member of the Prime Minister's staff indicates that there is even more than usual concern about the matter.

An hon. Member: Oh, sure.

Mr. Sharp: There are occasions when it is desirable that there should be communication between the heads of the governments of two countries. It is done by every country in the world, and I do not see why Canada should be an exception.

An hon. Member: We want Ivan's "head".

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Of course, contact between the heads of governments is necessary but a high commissioner is accredited to the government of India. For further and higher representation, would it not be more proper for a minister of the government to attend on this mission and not a public servant who does not rank with the high commissioner who is already in India?

An hon. Member: Are you not going to answer that?

NATIONAL PARKS

CAPE BRETON ISLAND—REQUEST FOR EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF PROJECTS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is in charge of the national parks. In view of the abnormally high unemployment rate in the Island of Cape Breton, the highest since the 1930's, may I ask the minister if he and the government would consider implementing immediately a special winter works program on the Cape Breton Island National Park to help out the situation, not a make-work program, but a program under which projects would go ahead as soon as possible?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to consider the representations of the hon. member and look at the projected capital spending for the area to see if we can make some changes in it.

FISHERIES

SEAL HUNT—MEASURES TO PREVENT VIOLENCE

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fisheries. In view of the potentially explosive situation on the east coast of Canada with the Greenpeace Foundation's stated purpose of disrupting the seal hunt and the very well known feeling of the seal hunters, can the minister advise the House what special precautions are being taken by his department or any other government department up to the Department of the Attorney General in order to avoid violence off the east coast?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, there are certain regulations within the seal protection regulations to prevent interference with the hunt. We are also making sure that our fisheries officers are well briefed and the legal implications of the situation are being looked into now. I should like to make two very brief comments, however. Ice conditions are extremely dangerous. The ice is very light and those inexperienced people on ice floes 40 miles at sea should understand the dangers of the situation. The other point that has to be made is that I hope the fishermen, in spite of some of the provocations they may have, will keep their cool.

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON FOR NOTICE TO PILOTS TO EXERCISE CAUTION WHEN FLYING OVER QUEBEC

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I shall direct my question to the parliamentary secretary. The Canadian Airline Pilots Association has posted a statement on all pilot bulletin boards in Canadian airports. Briefly, the statement is as follows:

> In view of the critical situation that has arisen in the Montreal air traffic control region, the situation that the federal government appears incapable of controlling, the Canadian Airline Pilots Association has directed its 3,000 members to exercise extreme caution when flying into or within the province of Quebec.

Would the parliamentary secretary ask the minister to investigate why such a notice has been posted, and if it is due to the government's implementation of bilingualism in air traffic control?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept some of the implications in the hon. member's question but I shall be glad to inquire why the association felt it necessary to post such a notice.

FISHERIES

LOBSTER LICENSING PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION UNTIL APPEALS PROCEDURE ESTABLISHED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fisheries. So that our lobsters will not die of old age, would the minister inform the House whether the guidelines for the appeals board in connection with the licensing program this year have been completed? If they have not, and in light of the imminent season in districts 5 and 7(b), would he consider deferring implementation of the program for one year until appeals can be filed and dealt with?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the last detail. Certainly the guidelines are in the hands of the appeal board and some boards are already functioning. Some cases have already been processed and fishermen told their licence would not be withheld and would be returned or issued. As far as deferring, I would have to look at the implications of this in relation to other areas but I think the program is working as well as can be expected under the circumstances.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING EXPLORATION FOR OIL AND GAS IN THE NORTH

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. An answer given by the minister in committee on March 2 led members of the committee to believe that oil and gas regulations would be announced early this spring. As a report in the Globe and Mail, presumably based on an interview with the minister, indicates that the regulations will not be made known until fall at the earliest, will the minister now give a firm commitment as to when the regulations will be announced?

● (1150)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, both aspects of the question contain an element of correctness. We intend to make known the regulations in the spring, in a month or six weeks. However, we are going to have difficulty getting the legislation put together and brought before the House in the fall. Both aspects are correct.

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The oil and gas regulations having been suspended about six or seven years ago, and, considering the importance of new regulations for the future of oil and gas development north of the sixtieth parallel, how can the minister justify the six or seven year delay in bringing forward new regulations?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, this matter has been discussed at length, and raised in committee. We are aware of the concern, have met with the industry and hope to act in the next month or six weeks.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PENTICTON, BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED DISCREPANCY IN AMOUNTS PAID FOR LEASES IN SAME BUILDING

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and relates to the answer to my question on the order paper. In yesterday's answer the minister indicated that the government had leased a building in Penticton for $6,500 per year. In view of the fact that the Department of Manpower moved out of this building just prior to entering into this lease and in view of the fact that on May 1, 1971, another lease was entered into by the Department of Manpower for the building for $41,186.23, can the Minister of Public Works say why there is this discrepancy?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think it was made clear in the answer to the question that the lease, which expired, was for a relatively small amount of space. Subsequently, the Department of Manpower took over a substantially enlarged amount of space.

Mr. Whittaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the amount of space taken is less than the entire amount the building contains, I ask the minister if the government condones this type of business and if that is the way the Department of Manpower conducts its business?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK PROFITS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Public reports have said that bank profits in the present quarter are up by 37.3 per cent over profits in the same quarter one year ago. I ask, if monetary policy is the responsibility of the federal government, which acts through the Bank of Canada, is the minister prepared to allow the banks to continue on their high profit kick and not take action while others, particularly wage and salary earners, are being restricted to 12 per cent increases? Also, is he prepared to re-impose the surtax on profits which he recently took off as the removal of the tax has accounted for some increase in bank profits.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. gentleman that we recently published the criteria which will apply to the banks for restraining their profit levels. The preliminary results indicated in today's press appear to indicate that the chartered banks are ahead of the position in which they should be. They will have to take steps to reduce the levels of profits in the remaining quarters of this year, or they can expect the levy provisions of the anti-inflation program to apply to them.

To answer the hon. member's second comment, he referred to the removal of the surtax. Obviously, he was referring to removal of the export levy. That does not apply in this case. Over all, the restriction provisions of the Anti-Inflation Act will apply to the chartered banks. If they continue to run ahead of the basis which has been established for them, they can expect to have their profits reduced by that much.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RESTRICTED COVERAGE IN ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Does he find it acceptable that in a large area of east central Alberta and west central Saskatchewan radio and television communications are restricted? The people of the area have protested to the CBC that they can only receive signals during the daytime. The CBC responded that the coverage was for daytime only. It is unfortunate that the people of the area do not receive signals at night.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, without commenting on the particular case, because I am not familiar with it, may I say this: I think the hon. member and his colleagues should consider that the accelerated coverage plan I announced two or three years ago is moving ahead. It is an expensive program, involving additional capital cost in the realm of $25 million over and above amounts needed for the coverage plans we had before. It will take time. I think hon. members should explain this to their constituents.

Mr. Malone: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain to my constituents why television service promised more than one year ago is still unsatisfactory.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is not capable of explaining to his constituents, I will be pleased to explain.

INCOME TAX

FAILURE OF T-5 FORMS TO REFLECT CHANGES IN LAW—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PREVENT PENALTIES BEING IMPOSED ON TAXPAYERS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. As the current T-5 forms, related to the summary of investment income paid, do not reflect the 1971 changes in the Income Tax Act and are in conflict with the law, the result being that certain taxpayers are required to pay a penalty for failure to comply with regulations which are not on the forms, will the minister take steps to prevent the continuation of this practice, so that taxpayers will not innocently fall victim to penalties?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we are a compassionate department.

Mr. Muir: Where is your halo, Jack?

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONSTRUCT GUY FAVREAU COMPLEX

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Considering that the construction of the Guy Favreau complex in Montreal, a very interesting project was announced four years ago, that the minister advised the press last week that the project which was originally supposed to cost $140 million would probably cost twice more now and that a profitability study was still in process to reassure all concerned, would the minister tell the House whether this project is still an important objective of the government or whether it will be abandoned? If not, will the work start shortly?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can say that the government intends to proceed in due course with the construction of the Guy Favreau complex.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

DATE OF REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON POLICY RELATING TO FILMS SPONSORED BY GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Some time ago the former secretary of state asked the President of the Treasury Board to set up an interdepartmental committee to examine the policy with regard to films being sponsored by government departments under the provisions of sections 9 and 10 of the National Film Act. Has he received the report of this Treasury Board committee? If so, will that report be tabled in the House or will the Minister be making a statement on it?

● (1200)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the report, but I have been told I am about to receive it.

Mr. Friesen: In view of the government's intention to cut expenditures, and in view of the minister's announced commitment to help the film industry in the private sector, can we expect a policy change that would delete Sections 9 and 11 of the National Film Act and thus bring about competitive enterprise among the government departments?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to explore this question further with the hon. member when we get before the committee. There is no question in my mind that one of the objectives of our film policy today should be to ensure that the public sector in film is complementary to and not necessarily in competition with the private sector. The reason this development has taken place is that the private sector today is infinitely more strong than it was ten years ago. We can pursue that.

AERO-MAGNETIC SURVEY IN BOTSWANA

Question No. 3,892—Mr. Huntington:

1. Did Canada provide Botswana with a $2 million loan to carry out an aero-magnetic survey in that country by Terra Surveys of Ottawa and, if so (a) is the loan to be repaid (b) what are its specific terms?

2. If the survey results in the discovery and development of mining in Botswana, what are the relative advantages to Canada that would justify CIDA's participation?

3. What are the names of the (a) companies (b) principals of the companies that tendered bids on the project and in each case, what was the amount of the bid?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada provided Botswana with a $2 million loan to undertake an aero-magnetic survey and interpretation of the survey. (a) Yes; (b) Zero per cent interest, 10 years grace, 50 years to repay.

2. CIDA's participation in developing countries such as Botswana is not predicated on the advantage that might or might not directly accrue to Canada. Canada's support for projects in developing countries is based on a determination of whether or not such financial support will contribute to the social or economic development of the recipient country. However, insofar as Canadian companies are employed to carry out the survey and interpret the information, Canadian businesses will benefit.

3. (a) and (b) Contractors: The flying and data processing portion of the project is being carried out by Terra Surveys under terms of a contract signed by Terra and Botswana on July 18, 1975. The contract limitation is $1,300,000. This contract was awarded by the Government of Botswana under CIDA loan financing in accordance with CIDA's normal criteria and supervision. In this case, the methodology and approach of the successful firm, Terra Surveys Limited, were judged to be superior to those of the other firms who submitted tenders. Below are the details of the tenders:

Firm that Submitted Tenders	Principals	Tender
Aero Photo Inc.	M. Gaudreault, President and Chairman of Board Y. Pigeon, Vice-President G. Lavoie, General Manager J. Hugghe, Assistant General Manager J. M. Gagnon, Comptroller	$1,021,750
Northway Survey Corp. Ltd.	J. S. Farrel, Chairman of Board W. H. Godfrey, President W. A. Dymond, Executive Vice-President D. A. MacFadyen, Vice-President P. L. Grant, Vice-President D. C. McMillan, Treasurer	$1,426,470
Sander Geophysics Ltd.	G. W. Sander, President L. Sander, Secretary Treasurer P. Pavlik, Director	$ 682,460
Terra Surveys Ltd.	Roy Depper, President T. M. O'Malley, Chairman of the Board M. S. Reford, Director G. M. Mervyn, Director R. C. Brooman, Treasurer	$1,202,730

CONTRACT BETWEEN DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT AND SQUARE ONE MANAGEMENT

Question No. 3,962—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Was the contract between the Department of the Environment and Square One Management for the "Cultural Paradigms" project cancelled and, if so, for what reason?

2. How much money has been paid to Square One Management for their services towards the project and is this a result of completed negotiations?

3. Did Mr. Nelson of Square One Management and Ms. Cathy Starrs (a free lance consultant) have offices in the Department of the Environment's Advance Concept Centre, while working on contract?

4. Were they listed in the Spring (1975) Government phone book and, if so, for what reason?

5. Did the "Cultural Paradigms" project disappear at the same time as the Square One Management contract was terminated and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): 1. The contract contained a clause permitting termination at any time by the Crown subject to the payment of specified claims. This contract was terminated under this clause for the convenience of the Crown. Negotiations on the contractor's termination claim are currently underway and are being handled by the Department of Supply and Services. In view of the pending negotiations it is felt that no further statement on the termination should be made.

2. The total amount paid to Square One Management for their services towards this project was $61,894.34 under the terms of the contract.

3. Mr. Nelson, Ms. Starrs, and Professor McCall were working on contract with the Advanced Concepts Centre, and occupied offices in Environment Canada.

4. Mr. Nelson, Ms. Starrs and Professor McCall carried out studies that required contact with a number of individuals across Canada and in other departments and agencies of the Federal Government. They were listed in the Spring (1975) Government Telephone Directory to assist communication in carrying out their contracts.

5. The "Cultural Paradigm Project" was the title of the study being carried out by Square One Management, so it ended with the termination of the contract.

USE OF POLYURETHANE FOAM IN CANADIAN NUCLEAR INSTALLATIONS

Question No. 3,985—Mr. Brisco:

Is polyurethane foam, used to seal air leaks and insulate electrical cables, or other combustible material being used in Canadian nuclear installations and, if so, what is the name and location of each plant?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows: Polyurethane foam has limited use in all current CANDU designs. It is used in a limited number of applications where a high quality vapour barrier is required and in some cases this includes openings through which electrical cables pass. In no case is it used as a seal at the main containment boundary. It is not used as insulation for cables or equipment. The potential hazards of its use have always been recognized and precautions taken to minimize the risk of fire.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEEDS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN DEFINITIONS AND CONTROL OVER MANUFACTURE, SALES OR IMPORTATION

On the order:

Resuming consideration of an amendment by the Senate to amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, to amend the Feed Act—The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: I indicated yesterday that I would attempt today to resolve the question of procedure that was raised yesterday with respect to Bill S-10. As I understand it, it is more a mechanical matter than one of substance. I understand that consultations are taking place in the hope that the matter can be resolved. Perhaps it can be left at that stage until Bill S-10 is next called before the House.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 4, consideration of Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House is resuming debate on motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), and motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, when we concluded last night I was trying in my own quiet way to give the government a bit of hell for ignoring the maritime code and the opportunity to strengthen that portion of the bill dealing with cabotage. In the event that I did not put it on the record last night, and in order to refresh the minds of hon. members, my amendment is as follows:

"Canada: and, for better ensuring the attainment of the said purposes, any port or place in the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon shall be deemed to be a port or place in Canada, and the governor in council may, by order, provide that any other port or place not in Canada shall be deemed to be in Canada,".

In committee, the departmental officials assured us there is protection with regard to foreign ships coming into Canada, picking up tourists, travelling to other ports, touching at a foreign port, in this case St. Pierre and Miquelon, and returning to Canada. In our opinion, that assurance is not clear in the act. The amendment is to clause 8. It would delete line 20 at page 12 of the bill. It is our submission that this particular clause could be construed or interpreted in more than one way. I quote from the clause:

For the purposes of this section and sections 9 to 14, the "coasting trade of Canada" includes

(a) the carriage of goods by water or by land and water, the carriage of passengers by water, and towage,

(i) from one port or place in Canada to the same or another port or place in Canada,

(ii) between a port or place in Canada and any marine structure that is engaged in exploration for or exploitation of natural resources in accordance with a permit or licence issued pursuant to an act of parliament or of the legislature of a province . . .

whether directly or by way of a foreign port—

It is that which gives us cause for concern. There are ample precedents in other statutes of Canada: it is spelled out very, very clearly. This amendment and the parallel amendment of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) would state in no uncertain terms what we understand to be the intent of parliament, the drafter and the act. By using the gimmick of stopping at a foreign port en route, foreign cruise ships—Russian, in the case of the east coast—can get around that section of the marine code directed to the closing of the coasting trade of Canada for Canadian ships with Canadian crews.

● (1210)

The amendment, as I say, is in two parts. What we seek to do is simply to declare that for the purposes of the act, St. Pierre and Miquelon are parts of Canada. It has become obvious that the Canadian cruise industry has been destroyed by the operations of Soviet cruise ships carried on without regard for any normal commercial considerations. Cruises are carried on in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, on the Saguenay River and out to the coastal waters of Newfoundland with stop-offs at St. Pierre and Miquelon. Soviet ships are permitted to do this by reason of the loophole in the existing law.

We submit that the code is vague to a degree unacceptable to us in this regard. What these vessels do is make a 10-hour or 12-hour stop-over at some foreign port. All they have to do is sail from a Canadian port to a foreign port; this enables them to satisfy the letter of the code and we regard it as a way of getting around the requirement of this particular section since, technically, the voyage has become an international voyage.

Comments were made by other speakers last night with respect to the carriage of goods from the east coast to the west coast of Canada. Certain problems were envisaged. Mr. Speaker, the amendment changes only slightly the definition found in the old Canada Shipping Act. We suggest that the present provisions are not adequate to provide the type of protection the code should contain. The amendment would simply eliminate any ground for dispute.

The second part of the amendment gives the governor in council authority to designate other foreign ports or places to be, for the purposes of the act, ports within Canada. This would enable the cabinet to intervene with respect to certain situations which arise on the Great Lakes when ships picking up Canadian tourists are able to take Canadian dollars from our own tourist industry. It would also enable the cabinet to intervene in the case of similar practices on the west coast.

To illustrate the seriousness of the situation, I would put on record the statements made by various witnesses who appeared before the committee. It is estimated that in the tourist industry alone, between 300 and 500 jobs are lost to Canadian sailors, suppliers, shipbrokers, and so on, because Canada cannot compete with offshore companies which operate in our waters without regard to the profit motive. The president of the Seafarers' International Union had this to say when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, as reported in the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence for December 11, 1975:

> Cruises in Canada, even if they include St. Pierre and Miquelon or U.S. ports, should be explicitly reserved for Canadian ships.
> In recent years, foreign cruise ships have increasingly been operating in Canada. On the west coast, this has resulted in the replacement of vessels manned by Canadians. In the east, Danish and U.S.S.R. flag ships are operating St. Lawrence River cruises. They leave Montreal and sail to Quebec, Bagotville, Percé, with a perfunctory stop at St. Pierre and Miquelon. The passengers disembark to sightsee at the various ports. We have contended that there are violations in the present laws regarding the coasting trade . . .

The emphasis he placed on the lack of Canadian jobs is significant in light of the amendment. As I say, several hundred jobs are affected directly and indirectly. I can see no reason why such a simple amendment should not be taken into serious consideration by the government. We are not attempting to impose upon that French colony or, indeed, on any other foreign port, the laws and regulations of Canada. We are simply saying, for the purposes of this act, that those ports should not be designated as foreign ports, thus getting around the loophole in the old Canada Shipping Act and in the new Maritime Code.

I maintain the amendment should enjoy the support of all hon. members and is a necessary one if we are to lend to the act the spirit which I am sure it is intended to reflect. This question has been before us for a long time. I might add that the amendment has been carefully drafted with regard to the uncertainties and fears felt by the council of maritime premiers and by representatives of British Columbia ports with respect to the impact it might have on freight costs.

We need further assurances which will satisfy the council of maritime premiers and the government of Newfoundland as well as British Columbia interests. We need a forthright statement from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to the effect that the assurances given by his predecessor to the council of maritime premiers in Charlottetown some 18 months ago are, in fact, being carried out.

We would much prefer the government to have imported something in written form into this particular clause so as to give statutory authority to the type of protection required. Failure to do so has caused us some difficulty with respect to legislation which otherwise we on this side generally support. We reserve our right to make a final decision with respect to the attitude we shall take toward third reading. I may say it will depend to a large degree upon the type of assurance the Minister of Transport is able to give us. The issue is an important one to the thousands of men and women whose lives are directly related to maritime activity, as well as to the country as a whole. The Maritime Code is too valuable a piece of legislation to allow to go by without our calling attention to the fact that it contains major loopholes through which Russian cruise ships can take away dollars and cents from Canadians.

● (1220)

What we will be attempting to do by this amendment is to strengthen and clarify the legislation and remove uncertainty respecting the intent of the act, which is to provide the framework for the establishment of a Canadian merchant marine, one that will be slowly developed and will pay regard to the requirements of the competitive transportation of goods in this country. We do not suggest exclusively closing our waters in any place. We have always recognized that there will be situations where Canadian vessels are not available or where for one reason or another a specialized type of ship is required. This might be a cruise ship, an ore carrier, an ice strengthened bulk carrier for operations north of 60, and so on.

Canadian businessmen and entrepreneurs require ships when they need them, not six months afterwards. When the need arises, they require access to adequate means of transportation. So we do not interfere with the rights or principles that protect users, the governor in council can always consider the granting of a special permit. Were that not in the legislation, we would insist upon it.

Canada should have its own merchant fleet and I suggest that starting with the coastal trade is the right route. We are not going to see the development of a Canadian merchant fleet next year or within five years, but if we do not start somewhere we will never achieve this goal. The thousands of potential jobs in our shipyards, on board ship and in related industries are too important for us to permit legislation of this significance to go through without the assurance that it is tight, that it is not full of loopholes but reflects our desire to provide the framework within which Canadians can redevelop their merchant fleet, and lending institutions engaging in maritime activity can approach without fear those entrepreneurs prepared to invest their talent and credit in achieving this end.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address myself to motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). In this particular part of the act we are dealing with what amounts to the core of this legislation, the definition of "cabotage". We must be sure we mean what we say and that Canadian shipping is assured the right to cabotage.

During my remarks on second reading of the bill I went into the use of that term to a considerable extent, and I suggest we briefly review its meaning here. It originated, as I mentioned at the time, from the business of going from cape to cape. "Cabo" is from the Portuguese or Spanish, but it has been translated in much more definitive terms in air law. In air law we never accept that a non-Canadian carrier can pick up passengers in Canada, call at a U.S. port, drop them off, pick up additional passengers bound for Canada and call this a domestic flight. These flights have to be worked out very carefully in agreements.

We insist that between Canadian ports we will not have foreign carriers picking up passengers in Montreal and dropping them off in Toronto. This is reserved to Canadian carriers. This is the basic principle we are seeking to define much more rigidly in cabotage or, if you like, in the coasting trade. We are transferring it from air law back into maritime law from whence it came. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that without a full definition of "cabotage" as defined so precisely in air law and translated into maritime law, there can be no encouragement given the Canadian maritime industries, Canadian mariners, shipbuilders, provisioners, victuallers, and our steelworks as well, to provide Canadian bottoms for the carriage of Canada's coastal trade.

In connection with motion No. 2, it is easy to make a pro forma call at St. Pierre and Miquelon, saying that your voyage plan requires a stop-over or route stop, to convert a voyage from, say, Montreal, up the Saugenay via St. Pierre and Miquelon, from a Canadian trip in which cabotage should be the rule into an international voyage and therefore open to any carrier.

I cannot help wishing there were greater awareness in this chamber of the significance of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I was greatly helped by reading a book by a very prominent Canadian historian who is now attached to the University of Carleton at the Institute of International Affairs, Professor Douglas Anglin, who wrote a book entitled "The St. Pierre and Miquelon Affair". I commend the book to all members of the House. It relates the manner in which the Free French occupied St. Pierre and Miquelon during the Second World War and the problems this created for the then prime minister, which he faced in one particular way. But it also drew attention at the time to the significance of St. Pierre and Miquelon to Canada's geography and sovereignty.

We are now seeing a further significance in dealing with the law of the sea and the extension of our territorial and fishing limits out from our coastline. The mathematical and cartographical problems of extending southward from St. Pierre and Miquelon their claim to territorial jurisdiction, in which French law will predominate, is a most complex question for anyone who has thought about it for more than two or three minutes. Recognizing that St. Pierre and Miquelon is within what would ordinarily be Canadian waters, recognizing that it is a blob of foreign territory within what are otherwise our territorial waters, we must consider that a call there will not convert a voyage from Montreal or Quebec, up the Saugenay with just a formal call at St. Pierre and Miquelon, into an international voyage but will be for all purposes a voyage in Canadian waters.

This same sort of operation occurs in the Great Lakes. It permits non-Canadian carriers, foreign carriers, to exploit an industry which, with the encouragement of a very strict cabotage rule, permits some carriers to enter the luxury trade, if you like, the summer cruise trade, simply by enabling a ship to call alternatively on one side of the St. Lawrence River or the other and convert that particular trip into an international voyage rather than a voyage through strictly Canadian waters.

Even a trip, let us say, from Thunder Bay to Sault Ste. Marie could be converted by making an intermediate call at Duluth. This is the sort of thing we would like to see closed in order to encourage Canadian ship-owners, shipbuilders and the whole maritime industry to build Canadian ships and give a start again to a Canadian marine industry so that we again will be a maritime power which our position, our coastline and our whole tradition dictates for us. We must do this before it is too late.

We have heard that there are difficulties in obtaining crews for Canadian vessels because of the cost. I have thrown out a suggestion to some of our marine architects. I have suggested there is a way perhaps to deal with this admittedly difficult problem of having the breadwinner away from home at sea for many, many months. I think the matter has been greatly facilitated by the introduction of the container ship. I suggested to this particular marine architect that it should be a simple matter to have standing on most container ports trailers which could be hoisted aboard in the same way a container is hoisted aboard. These could be fully equipped trailer camp homes. The crew could live in them. They could even take their families with them. There would no longer be the need to separate the breadwinner from the other members of the family, because the other members of the family could go on the voyage. The families would have the advantage of the education overseas which travel conveys. If enough of them were on board, it is conceivable that there could even be correspondence classes carried on for any children who might be there.

It might be of interest to know that in addition to this particular suggestion I was told by the naval architect with whom I was speaking that there is a movement among those industries in Canada which are concerned about naval architecture to establish at the University of British Columbia a special course in naval architecture. Such an institute of naval architecture at my alma mater would be a further sign of the intent of this country to proceed with the purpose this bill attempts to display, namely, the creation, as I understand it, of a Canadian merchant marine.

I commend this notion to the government and suggest that if some application for assistance along these lines is made, it be favourably received. We must tighten up clause 8 of Bill C-61. We must have a definition of "cabotage" which is meaningful even, if necessary, by borrowing those concepts from air law and translating them into maritime law. We recognize that at least as an interim measure there is under subclause (5) the authority vested in the governor in council to permit exception, to carriers for specified purposes and for a specified time by way of an interim measure. That particular clause need not be there for all time, but only until such time as Canada's merchant marine is capable of standing on its own feet and carrying out the trade which is so important to the Canadian economy and to Canada as a trading nation.

This particular amendment, motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, deals with the trade on the east coast particularly, the cruising trade if you like; but there is also the merchant trade, the carriage of goods on the east coast, which has caused considerable concern, I understand, to the first ministers of the maritime provinces. They want assurance that if we tighten up the cabotage provisions in this particular legislation, there will still be competitive bids on the carriage of goods between the provinces, between the mainland and Newfoundland if you like, and up into Labrador. This is most important. We have mentioned it in other contexts and we will mention it again on many occasions.

We want assurance from the minister that the first ministers of the maritime provinces are in agreement with the regulations which are to be drawn up, I believe, under clause 12 of this bill. We mentioned in committee, as well, that members of parliament would like to see the regulations before this bill becomes law. I found it altogether surprising that so much of the legislation that is brought before us, legislation of a fundamental and basic kind such as this, contains provisions for the eventual appearance of regulations. I would like to think that we would get away from this practice. We have schedules I and II, and I believe there is also a schedule III here. Schedule III provides for Book I of the Maritime Code, and I suppose schedule IV provides for Book II. Why could there not be a schedule which contains the regulations?

● (1240)

The provisions of the code are fundamental. They are the ground rules under which Canadian ships and foreign ships will operate in Canadian waters. I think it is important that the regulations be published before this bill becomes law. For the time being I will reserve my comments on the amendment which stands in my name. There may be others who wish to comment further on this motion which has a bearing on the waters in the mouth of the St. Lawrence and on the east coast trade.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is a point of procedure which it might be worth while bringing to the attention of the hon. member. Motions Nos. 2 and 3 have been grouped together. This means that the hon. member is entitled to speak once on both of them, not once on each of them. There is only one debate. Therefore, if the hon. member has some comments to make on motion No. 3 now would be the time to make them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, up to now my comments have been confined exclusively to motion No. 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I also bring to the attention of the hon. member that since he is the promoter of a motion, he is entitled to 40 minutes, so nothing prevents his carrying on. He is permitted to speak again, but this would necessitate the consent of the House. I leave the decision up to him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I will continue my remarks now, but will direct them to the motion which stands in my name and which is of a more general nature but still deals with the cruising industry. It could also deal with the merchant industry on the west coast. I do not know how many members in the House have done the trip from the top of the island, from Kelsey Bay, up to Prince Rupert through the inland passage. It is a trip which is reminiscent of the Norwegian fiords for those who have travelled through the narrow waters with mountains coming right down on both sides. You feel, as you go through some of the passages, that if you stretched out far enough you could touch the shores on either side. The same applies up the coast beyond Prince Rupert. I am sorry that the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) is not here because I am sure that she would like to describe some of the beauties of this area.

Because these areas are so attractive they are great summer cruising areas which are being invaded by ships conducting international cruises. Therefore, we must have some provision within our definition of "cabotage" in this act to enable Canadian ships to get into the trade in this area as we were describing it on the east coast. It is a very simple matter which can be done in a variety of ways. A ship can load its passengers in Vancouver, let us say, go down Pugit Sound to Seattle to pick up some more passengers, then come up to Victoria. It is then involved in an international cruise, whether passengers have gone down and got off in Seattle or gone for a day's shopping and come up to Vancouver. Then the ship might go on through the inland passage, up through Johnson strait. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) is not here either, but he also knows this area. Instead of going from Vancouver directly to Prince Rupert, they could go on to Ketchikan and convert this interCanadian port cruise into an international cruise. This is exactly what has been happening and the trade on the west coast has been taken over.

My first sight of the Pacific was from a ship travelling from Vancouver up the west coast to Vancouver Island and to Zeballos for a summer job. This is one of the delights of the summer in that particular area. You can run into some rough weather, but in good weather it is a splendid trip and I commend it to anyone who can afford the time. But those trips are no longer possible. The Canadian ships have been taken off those particular journeys, unfortunately, because of the simplicity with which it is possible to convert a trip into an international voyage and therefore bring in a non-Canadian or non-American carrier to do the trip. At present it is the Norwegians and the Dutch who do this, if I remember correctly. There are a few others.

Sometimes some of the world cruise trips do part of the journey, but basically, on a back and forth deal between the extremities, it might be San Diego, San Fransisco, Vancouver, Ketchikan, Prince Rupert, and out farther into Alaska and then back down. This has been turned over because of the absence of a firm, solid definition of what cabotage is to foreign vesels. We see vessels coming in, as was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, which are not even required to fulfil the standards of work within Canada. The workmen are not subject to our Workmen's Compensation Act and they are not paid the wages that Canadian workmen demand.

We should close the loopholes in this definition of "cabotage" so as to encourage Canadian shipping to resume those trips up the west coast, whether it be up the Pacific or up the inland passage. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) had done some of these trips from Vancouver, and he can testify to the great beauty of the trip and to the relaxation which a trip of that sort on a good ship can provide to anyone who is a little weary of life in the city and who seeks some way of being carried back to nature. But we will not do this on Canadian ships unless we close those loopholes in the law. That is the whole meaning of the amendment which I am putting forward.

I have used the word "cabotage" too much, but I think it has a meaning in English to which we should get back. The coasting trade is one thing, but it does not carry that connotation of "cabotage" which it does in air law. I think we must get it back into the maritime law where it came from and where it belongs. It is with that view in mind that these two amendments have been drafted.

● (1250)

There is one caveat here, Mr. Speaker, which was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). There is a problem in intercoastal trade in Canadian bottoms. Let us say there could be a problem unless we have provision for competitive bidding, because when you load at Nanaimo, say, and offload at Dartmouth or St. John's, the quickest way of making the journey is, through the Panama Canal, winter or summer. I do not think you can do it the other way with a load of lumber. The Panama Canal, of course, means a call at a foreign port, which turns it into an international trip and therefore it is open to non-Canadian carriers.

We have to find some means—and we have not found it yet—of encouraging Canadian bottoms to get into that lucrative trade. It is a part of the Canadian business. I am sure it is still true that it is cheaper to carry goods by water than any other means, over long distances. Wheat, of course, cannot be carried any other way than by ships, but the carriage of goods by sea has historically been cheaper than carriage by any other means. Time is involved in going from the west coast to the east coast though the Panama Canal, but it should be cheaper to carry lumber, minerals or whatever commodity from the west coast across the continent by water than by rail.

There was some mention in the debate yesterday that if ships were in the hands of one of the railways, the water rates would be increased to match the rail rates. Perhaps we should ensure there is encouragement to shippers, independent of the rails, to build Canadian ships and enter Canadian coastal trade from the west coast to the east coast.

Perhaps it is looking a long way ahead, but there has been mention of the trade that could develop in the Arctic. I was shocked to hear that consideration was being given to having ships built in German shipyards to take ore from the Canadian Arctic to Canadian refineries in the St. Lawrence. This is cabotage in its pureset form from the Canadian Arctic to Canadian mills and foundries whether they be in the St. Lawrence or up the Great Lakes. This trade should be carried by Canadian ships, manned by Canadian crews. We are not going to have that opportunity until we give encouragement with law and with subsidies. I think we must face the fact that subsidies will be required to encourage a Canadian maritime service to get Canadian vessels back into the trade, particularly in Canada. From there we can expand to the wider, lucrative trade of carrying Canadian goods to international ports.

The Norwegians do not lose money in this type of trade. They have very high standards of seamanship and shipbuilding, and are making money. Why should the Canadian industry not be doing the same? This is the reason we have been seeking to tighten the meaning of clause 8 so that the need to invoke section 5 will become less and less frequent as the years go by. In the course of time we would like section 5 to be no longer necessary because cabotage would mean exactly what it ought to mean, namely, reserving to Canadians the right to carry goods from one Canadian port to another. There are strange anomalies in our geography, in the history of the development of our continent such as we see in St. Pierre and Miquelon, and in the geographic and diplomatic anomaly of the appearance of the Alaska Panhandle, which cut off a great part of the north of our provinces from the sea by an award in the nineteenth century. Those anomalies exist and we have to accept them. Since they exist, we should be able to provide the appropriate wording in the law to overcome them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will call it one o'clock.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of points that I should like to make briefly in response to some of the comments which have been made by the hon. members who have proposed these two motions, but I see it is one o'clock. If I may, I should like to call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, just before one o'clock I rose to respond to the comments of the two hon. gentlemen who spoke between twelve and one o'clock, in the hope of allaying their reservations about clause 8 of Bill C-61.

First, however, may I thank the House for allowing last evening a procedural modification which will facilitate the consideration of Bill C-61. In error, we had grouped motions 1, 2 and 3 together for discussion, whereas motions 1 and 5 and 2 and 3 ought to have been grouped together for discussion. May I extend my thanks to the House, to the Chair and to the Table for their assistance in this, which will help in the consideration of this bill.

Last evening hon. members commented about the brevity of my remarks at the beginning of the report stage, and about the minister's absence. Let me make two points. First, my initial comments dealt only with the technical accuracy of the French version of a particular clause vis-à-vis the English version. That concerned motions 1 and 5. I am happy to see the confusion on that point resolved. I did not mean to imply last evening that I had nothing else to say about the other substantive portions of the bill. I welcome today's opportunity to comment more extensively on substantive aspects of this legislation and proposed amendments to it.

Hon. members also commented last evening on the minister's inability to be present. Let me explain why the minister was unable to be present when we began the report stage discussion. The minister was in the House yesterday until late afternoon waiting for Bill C-61 to be called. It was called only late in the day, unfortunately after he had been called away on business. Any inference to the contrary is misleading. I think it important to indicate the reason for the minister's absence. To those hon. members who want an assurance, I am able to say that the minister intends to participate in this debate. He would have done so last evening if he could have been present. He will at the first opportunity during our consideration of Bill C-61, address himself specifically to concerns which hon. members and people outside the House have voiced about various aspects of the bill.

It is apparent that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), in whose name stands motion No. 2, and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), in whose name stands motion No. 3, are concerned about the provisions of clause 8. As has been mentioned, clause 8 involves the basic principles of the Canadian coasting trade. The establishment of such provisions for Canada is, in the opinion of many in this House and outside, long overdue. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich argue that clause 8 is not strong enough, should be tightened or strengthened or made to speak more loudly, if I may say this. Meanwhile, other hon. members opposite are not so sure. Last evening the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) went so far as to say that in his opinion clause 8 should be deleted from the bill altogether. I draw attention to that point not only to illustrate differences of opinion or a division of view among members opposite, but it also illustrates the complexity, delicacy and fundamental importance of coasting trade provisions and of the general question of the coasting trade with which clause 8 deals.

That question is not to be easily, neatly and simply resolved. The issues on both sides of the question are of concern to the government. Having consulted the industry, labour, professional groups, provincial governments and others interested, we have tried to meet the problem. The result is this bill. I trust that in the final analysis all the work undertaken in the attempt to reach an accommodation will bear fruit.

Dealing specifically with the second motion on the order paper standing in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, I want to assure him that the concern he has raised is not an issue which has escaped the attention of the government or the draftsmen who did the technical work in putting the legislation together.

There is a good argument that relates more particularly to the next motion that also applies here. The wording as presently drawn in general terms covers the situation adequately. The hon. member argued in committee, and I believe in the House, that it would not be an uncommon step for us to give the governor in council the power to make a declaration from time to time that a certain foreign area, territory, port or place would be deemed to be a part of Canada. It may not be an unprecedented move to do that, but it is an unusual step, particularly in the terms in which this amendment is phrased; that is, virtually giving to the governor in council the authority to declare a foreign territory in its entirety to be a part of Canada. That is a fairly extreme and drastic power.

Mr. Forrestall: For the purposes of the act.

Mr. Goodale: Yes, but it is still a power which I do not think we should exercise casually. I do not mean to imply that hon. members should take the matter casually. Quite to the contrary. I know they do not. However, it is important to recognize that it is an extensive step for us to take. It has international implications. Even though you limit your wording to the purpose of this legislation, it has implications, viewed in its international context, that go beyond that. We must be careful before taking that step. At this moment in time I would not be prepared to recommend adoption of that particular measure by the House because of the international implications it might have.

The other point relating to this motion is also interesting and should be borne in mind. I refer to the extent of the power that this amendment would give to the governor in council. The power is not circumscribed by anything. It would give the governor in council the ability to declare any place or any territory anywhere in the world to be Canadian for the purpose of this legislation. That goes a little bit far. Perhaps that is something that may or may not be implied as a matter of necessity by the hon. member who proposed the motion, but it is a fact we have to bear in mind.

This amendment, to accomplish the purpose to which the hon. member has addressed himself, would give to the governor in council a rather sweeping and unlimited mandate. It would have serious implications for our international relations. We would want to be more cautious about it than maybe we have had the opportunity to discuss in the course of this particular legislation.

I will return to my original point that I passed over rather briefly before getting into the more technical argument. I believe that the legislation as drafted adequately deals with the concern my friends across the way have raised. I would urge the House to approve the legislation as it has been reported to us from the committee and not go to the extent of amending it as my hon. friend has suggested.

Motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is, as he indicated, in the same vein or spirit but approaches the problem from another angle. I might say that this particular idea was also proposed and discussed at length and ultimately turned down during the course of our committee proceedings. I want again to assure the hon. member that the principle for which he is arguing is not one to which we take exception. Indeed, it was indicated during the committee proceedings and previously in this House that the very points which he made in his statement on the motion are ones with which we fully agree, and I would argue that the legislation as presently drafted accomplishes the objectives he has in mind. From a technical and procedural point of view we would accomplish those objectives in better fashion than the wording proposed in motion No. 3.

The technical answer is a matter of drafting. As it is presently worded, the clause is designed to cover the situation in general and all-encompassing language. You get into some difficulty when you try to reduce that language specifically to deal with certain circumstances. You may cover a particular circumstance very well, but as the situation changes from time to time you may find that the specific wording chosen fails to include or to cover situations which arise later down the road that really were not thought of at this moment in time. We would be further ahead and would cover the concern more adequately if we were to use the broader, all-encompassing language that we have in the bill and not restrict ourselves to more specific language that may at some time in the future leave out something.

On this point I would refer hon. members to evidence given to our committee when this particular issue was before us. The evidence appears in issue No. 34 of the committee reports. The witness being questioned was Mr. J. J. Mahoney, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Justice. The particular quotation I want to refer to is on page 28. I will read one brief paragraph.

Mr. Paproski: Did you say Justice Mahoney?

Mr. Goodale: No, Mr. Speaker. For the benefit of the chief opposition whip, the witness was Mr. J. J. Mahoney, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Justice. I want to make that absolutely clear. After Mr. Mahoney had given some indication of the technical and drafting problems involved, he went on to say:

—it is felt that by using these more general words, it is possible then to tie down the situation more tightly than if one uses rather specific language, but either events change or some new system is developed which has not been taken into account in that very specific use of language. It is the same old legal problem you have in contracts or in incorporating companies and in many areas of the law where it is often better to use general phraseology and so encompass all of the objective than it is to be very specific and forget something.

That is the opinion that Mr. Mahoney offered on that occasion. I think it is the right one. It is a pretty basic principle in the sense of technical drafting of statutes. We have there an assurance that we cover the situation more effectively by using the broader wording as it presently stands in the legislation, rather than reducing ourselves to more specific words which may result in our omitting to cover a situation which may arise at a later time.

● (1420)

In concluding what I have to say about these two amendments let me once again stress that we appreciate the spirit and the thrust of the amendments, but it is our view that the statute as presently worded covers the situation in a fair, reasonable and adequate fashion and that it is not necessary to add the additional words proposed either in motion No. 2 or in motion No. 3 and that these motions should not be accepted by the House.

Mr. Forrestall: Would the parliamentary secretary permit a brief question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: Would he not agree with me that the basis of our concern is to be found in his very words of a moment ago? If I am paraphrasing them, I apologize, but I hope I reflect the intent of what he was saying. He said, "I think". He didn't say, "I know". He was not able to give us an unqualified assurance. He simply said, "I think" with regard to the assurances given by Mr. Mahoney, a man for whom all members of the committee have a great deal of respect. The parliamentary secretary reflects his own doubt. The existence of that doubt gives us cause for concern with respect to his reassurances on this point.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I think it is my style of phraseology and not my particular words which are concerning the hon. member. When I said "I think", I did not want to imply doubt on my part.

An hon. Member: You said it again. You began by saying it.

Mr. Goodale: It is too bad that the recording processes of the House cannot take into account the tone and emphasis in a speaker's voice. There is a great difference between saying "I think" with a rising inflection, and saying "I think" with a more firm inflection in one's voice.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Goodale: In any event, I want to allay the fears of the hon. member by saying I did not mean to imply by using the words "I think" that I entertained some doubt on the particular point. I suppose that until any statute has been adjudicated upon by the Supreme Court in the event of final recourse thereto there would, in a strict legal sense, always be some legitimate room for argument. We can only do our best by phrasing the legislation in the most effective way we can, and I think the legislation as written accomplishes that objective.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Perhaps I, too, could direct a question to the parliamentary secretary. This question relates to the discussion we had yesterday and also to the discussion we are now having in seeking to tighten up the incidence of cabotage. Part of our discussion yesterday concerned altering the French text to correspond more closely with the English text. There are two places, one of which I think we might accept as showing conformity between the texts, but there is one absence, to my way of thinking. I have gone over it again. I said to myself, "It must be there." Yet I cannot find it.

Again it comes down to the French text being so short. It is in subsection (iii) of 3(a). It says in English—and the preamble is about the same—"from one port or place in Canada to the same or another port or place in Canada". This is translated on the French side as, "Entre des ports et lieux du Canada". I think that probably does carry the sense. The other section in the English text is there, yet I cannot find its meaning in the French text. Following the (iii) under section 3 we find the words "whether directly or by way of a foreign port".

We might go back to the notion which was floated yesterday, the suggestion, concerning which we seek clarification, that in the Superior Court before French-speaking judges there is a practice of using historical documents and then they would realize what we were getting at—that the English version said one thing and that in the absence of that particular clause in French we intended that it be in the French version. But surely in a country such as ours we should make sure that it is in both texts. There is nothing I can see in the French text which conveys the message conveyed by the final phrase of section 3(a), namely, "whether directly or by way of a foreign port". It is there implicitly but not otherwise. Why does it have to be explicit in one language and implicit in the other?

Mr. Goodale: I do not profess to be an expert on translation, and I appreciate the concern the hon. member has raised. But I think, if I am not mistaken, that this particular issue was dealt with in motion No. 1, standing in the name of the minister, where clause 8(3)(a) is amended by adding a phrase which to my way of thinking specifically covers the point which the hon. member has raised. I think that motion should resolve the problem. The amendment was designed to cover the very point which has been raised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there is agreement that this and two other votes should be deferred until five o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Mr. Forrestall: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I am not sure what procedure we are attempting to follow. You have just put a very specific question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Chair has to ask for the yeas and nays, and then we shall defer the vote.

All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it. Pursuant to standing order 75(2) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

● (1430)

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the vote is to be deferred until Tuesday of next week at five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will five members please stand.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section (2) of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-61, an act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in clause 10 by deleting lines 31 and 32 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"renewal or terminating later than September 24, 1978".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will see if it is possible to get another 35 or 40 minutes out of a one-liner. Years ago when I was working for the Halifax Herald, being taught by a now distinguished deputy minister of the government of Nova Scotia, I would be called into the newsroom because it was my job for a long time to make an eight or ten paragraph story out of some little news release. I do not know whether I learned my lesson well.

The purpose of this motion is to attempt to give some recognition to the notice given by the government under the former minister of transport to our member Commonwealth countries of our intention to withdraw from the Commonwealth shipping arrangement. The act calls for a termination date in April of 1980, and I am suggesting that it be on September 24, 1978. Notice of this intention was formally served on the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth nations which participate in the Commonwealth shipping arrangements in 1973.

We suggest that we withdraw from these arrangements on September 24, 1978, for a variety of reasons. It is many years since those interested in the redevelopment of a Canadian merchant marine initiated the action that we are discussing in parliament today. There can be no occasion for any shipping company operating under a Commonwealth flag to complain that they were not adequately forewarned of our intention, of which notice was served in 1973. We are fully in accordance with the five-year notice and we went through the one-year period before formal notice could be given. Formal notice was then given that we would subsequently withdraw from the Commonwealth shipping arrangement.

In support of my argument I should like to quote briefly from the evidence given to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on December 11, 1975, at page 30:7. These words were introduced into the record by the president of the Seafarer's International Union and were also endorsed by the CBRT:

Third, grandfather rights set out in clause 10 should expire on September 23, 1978.

In 1973, the then minister of transport announced a policy restricting the coasting trade of Canada to Canadian ships and indicated that there would be a five-year period of grandfather rights in favour of the British ships then engaged in the coasting trade. We think the five-year period should commence from September 24, 1973, which was the date of his announcement, or at the very latest, from the date on which notice was given to the Commonwealth countries that Canada was withdrawing from the Commonwealth Shipping Agreement, which was on April 26, 1974.

He then went on to urge the committee to give consideration to this matter, and I think the committee did give it consideration. I appreciate the arguments that have been put forward on the matter by the parliamentary secretary, bolstered by their expert witness, Mr. Maloney, that from the point of view of formality the later date was the best date to follow. However, our reaction is somewhat different. We have been trying for 15 to 20 years to re-establish the framework within which we can redevelop not only a foreign deep sea fleet but strengthen and bolster the existing coastal shipping capacity and capability which Canada has.

Most of Canada's trade is now carried in Canadian ships, so there is not going to be any great problem here. I think 75 to 80 per cent of our export trade, not only today but traditionally, has always been carried in Canadian ships, so not too many ships are going to be affected. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) yesterday expressed to the House fears he had about interference or intervention with competitive rates for the movement of goods. That aspect is present and we do not treat it lightly, but what I am saying is that so far as our coastal trade is concerned the matter is not significantly important. A relatively small percentage of our coastal trade is carried in other than Canadian registered and crewed ships.

Where this does have an impact is that it affects, morally—and, I suppose, philosophically—our approach to the development of a Canadian merchant marine. Canada had some 452 registered ships serving in liner conferences alone in and out of our country last year. If we went to the UNCTAD arrangement and the new code of ethics for liner conferences, in terms of securing forever 40 per cent of our incoming and outgoing export traffic it would mean 175 Canadian ships. Under the UNCTAD arrangement, 55 per cent of the major carriers of the world have already endorsed this particular proposal, but this is getting a little far afield from the date of withdrawal from the Commonwealth shipping arrangement.

I am attempting to draw to the attention of the House that we are talking here about at least 7,000 new jobs for Canadians. For example, the Halifax shipyard in my own constituency will come to the end of the offshore oil drilling rig construction and development program some time within a year. What is going to happen to the 600 or 800 men who are going to be laid off? We are trying to create work for our shipyards. We are trying to create jobs for our seamen, merchant service officers and Canadian suppliers. We are talking about hard-earned money. A total of $2.7 billion is being given away to the cartels in Toyko, New York, London and Athens. I want this to come home to Canada, not in 15 years or in 10 years but as soon as it can be done in an orderly fashion. I want us to hold strong to this point.

Someone might ask what difference it makes whether the anniversary date is 1978 or 1980. Probably the only difference it makes is that it points out to the people of the world that we are serious in our intention to keep some of this amount of $2.7 billion for our own use rather than give it away. A number of recommendations were made by the somewhat scholarly report of the Darling commission in respect of an international shipping structure for Canada. I am sure members of the House have read this report. Some interesting comments were made in respect of Canada's position if we continue to rely on foreign shipping.

There are some interesting comments and observations about our procrastination in this regard. It is pointed out that we must not only be doing these things, but we must be seen to be doing them. We have the situation of our wood being shipped from British Columbia to Japan in Japanese ships. Our lumber from the west coast is being shipped on vessels of foreign registration. Our potatoes are being shipped from New Brunswick to the United States, to the Caribbean and to Europe in foreign registered ships. Why? By taking the extreme end in establishing the anniversary date beyond which the grandfather rights will not apply, except in the absence of a suitable Canadian ship, we are seeming to say to these countries that they can carry on and use our dollars because we need their vessels. We have heard the argument that we really cannot compete offshore in respect of exports because of the cost of a crew. That was true 40 years ago, but it is an insignificant factor now in respect of today's highly automated vessels and ships. It really is not an argument.

I come back again to the position in which we find ourselves. We are saying, in effect, to the countries of the world that we will do this even if it takes 100 years. We should tell the world we intend to do it as quickly and efficiently as we can, and that the delay will only be for two or three years. This probably is a relatively minor point I am making. However, what is at stake is a substantial Canadian industry. Every other significant transport industry in Canada today is protected and subsidized. But this industry for a long time has been treated as an accident of circumstance, while in fact it is an integral industry; it is a major industry in Canada. We are talking about 14,000 seamen and another 3,000 to 5,000 officers and engineers. Any industry which employs 14,000 people is a substantial contributor to the Canadian economy. Let us tell the people around the world who are hauling our exports because it costs them a few dollars less for a crew, with the exception of the Russians and one or two other countries, that we intend to do it ourselves, not at some point in the future but at the first possible opportunity.

I suggest that notice was clearly given to the countries of the world, particularly the Commonwealth countries which are members of and were participants in the Commonwealth agreement, that we want to see that amount of $2.7 billion which we lose in the form of transportation costs revert to the Canadian consumer and come back to the government which can squander it, if you like. We want it to come back to Canada so that it might be the basis upon which we can build our own Canadian merchant fleet and develop it in an orderly fashion so that it will not disrupt or disorient the competitive movement of our goods.

I commend these points to the chamber because they are important. I suggest this amendment is a simple attempt to make known to the foreign cartels which operate at our expense, and who make it difficult for us to get on with what we intend to do, that we are serious and intend to move in as quick and orderly a fashion as we can. I hope other members will have observations to make in this regard because it is important that people understand we are serious and intend to move.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). Again I would say to the House that we had the benefit of very substantial argument on his particular points during our committee hearings. He has read into the record some of the proceedings in respect of this matter. Clause 10 of the bill refers to what we call in shorthand the "grandfather rights," the rights which exist in respect of certain vessels which have been in the coasting trade of Canada to continue in that trade.

I was happy to hear my friend across the way agree with the basic concept of those rights continuing for a five-year period. There does not seem to be any dispute about that. I gather his argument is for a stronger appearance or a stronger impression. His only argument seems to be that somehow we should go back to an earlier base date in calculating those five years than the one which may be the more proper formal date. Perhaps, for the information of members, it would be useful to explain the difference between the two dates. I think the date to which my hon. friend refers is September 24, 1973. This is the date upon which the former minister of transport issued a statement in conjunction with his colleagues from the Atlantic provinces following a meeting at Summerside, Prince Edward Island.

On that occasion the minister indicated that the government of Canada would be withdrawing from the British Commonwealth merchant shipping agreement. That was a general indication of intention at that particular moment of time in 1973. I would say to the members of the House that in my view that falls substantially short of what in law and justice would amount to formal notice.

● (1450)

At some time later, on April 26, 1975, the formal notice was served by Canada, as is required under the agreement which I have just mentioned, the British Commonwealth merchant shipping agreement, of our intention to withdraw from the terms of that agreement. So in the first instance we have a general statement of principle or of intention issued in the form of a press statement or a communiqué in September of 1973, followed by the required legal or international action which was necessary on our part in 1975 to accomplish in law what we indicated we would eventually be doing after September of 1973.

The fact remains that the necessary legal steps could not be accomplished until a later date, that is until 1975, and it seems to me that it is far more than just a formality or perhaps the more polite way to proceed; it is, indeed, the legal and proper way for us to proceed to look at the later date, that is, the date in 1975, as the basic date for the calculation of those five years for the purposes of the so-called grandfather rights preserved in clause 10. We should not, and indeed cannot, go back to the earlier date in 1973 for the basis of that calculation. For these reasons, I think it is necessary and important that the House not accept this particular amendment which would terminate those rights in 1978, but in fact leave the statute in the words in which it is now phrased where those rights would expire in 1980.

Mr. Anderson: Would the parliamentary secretary allow a question?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Anderson: Could he perhaps clarify a statement he made, that the British Commonwealth merchant shipping agreement requires a formal notice from a country five years prior to pulling out of the agreement? Is my understanding correct?

Mr. Goodale: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said. I was commenting on the reference which the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East made about the general consensus that the grandfather rights, as they are called in shorthand, in this legislation should last for a period of five years. The formal notice required to withdraw from the agreement is only one year. The five-year period is the period of existence of these rights as specified by the legislation, but the formal period of notice which is required before withdrawing from the agreement to which I referred is a notice of one year. As I have said, that notice was formally given in 1975.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the motion of hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

Maritime Code

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We now go on to motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-61, an act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in clause 11 by

(a) deleting the word "and" in line 6 at page 15

(b) striking out line 9 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

coasting trade of Canada; and

(c) while the ship is operating under the licence, the employees aboard will be Canadian or landed immigrants, and the operator of the ship will comply with the Canada Labour Code, the Immigration Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act and, in general, with the laws, regulations and standards that are applicable to a business or enterprise operated in Canada under federal jurisdiction.

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in clause 11 by adding immediately after line 48 at page 15 the following:

(6) Any person having an interest therein may make oral or written representations to the Canadian Transport Commission in respect of the issuance, suspension, cancellation or renewal of a licence applied for or issued under this section.

He said: Mr. Speaker, here, again, I think perhaps we erred a little. I draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that these two motions bear no relationship whatsoever. They deal with entirely different aspects of this section of the bill. I will deal with motion No. 6 first.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I gather that the hon. member is proceeding to discuss these two motions. I should like to have a ruling on the point. It is my opinion that a vote on one motion should not automatically be a vote on the other one. Personally, I object to these two motions being grouped together. One motion involves people working on ships and the protection they are given under a number of acts, and the other motion evolves around the problem of licensing, the obtaining and renewing of licences. Therefore, I should like to suggest that these two motions not be grouped together because a vote on one should not affect the other. Unless someone convinces me that there is some relationship between the two, I think they should be put separately and voted on separately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It was my understanding that a vote on motion No. 1 will dispose of motion No. 5, a vote on motion No. 2 will dispose of motion No. 3, motion No. 4 will be voted on separately, a vote on motion No. 6 will dispose of motion No. 7, a vote on motion No. 8 will be taken separately, and motion No. 9 will be voted on separately. I also understand that there was agreement to that.

Mr. Peters: Whether or not it was agreed upon, I should like to make the point now that there is no relationship between the two.

Mr. Harquail: Do you not respect agreements?

[The Acting Speaker.]

Mr. Peters: The hon. member, who knows nothing about the bill, probably, does not know either what bill we are discussing. He should be aware of the difficulty of taking a vote on a subject which has no bearing on another subject. This is a very complex bill, but I think even the parliamentary secretary who appears to have responsibility for the bill will agree that there is no relationship between the two motions. Although an agreement may have been reached by members who are not too familiar with the bill, there is a legitimate reason for raising this point.

● (1500)

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I just want to inform the hon. member and the House that I happen to be a member in good standing of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Apparently he is not aware of that.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, that really does not tell me anything. The hon. member may well be what he says. However, I attended several meetings of that Committee and met a number of members who really did not know much about it.

The point raised by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) should be considered. It would seem to me that in taking those votes we should be able to make a decision on a fact, rather than have two separate facts involved where the votes may be contrary on both facts.

Mr. Forrestall: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just resumed his seat is quite correct.

For the benefit of hon. members, the amendment proposes adding after line 48 at page 15, new subsection, (6). This proposes to include in the act the procedure whereby an affected person may have the right to appeal or declare his interest to the regulatory body, the Canadian Transport Commission, in respect to the issuance of a licence.

The other amendment deals very clearly with the working conditions and rules and regulations under which ships operate in Canada—the waters, the crews, etc.

I apologize to the Chair and the Chamber because it was my understanding that we could discuss the two lumped together but that a vote would be called on each.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the comments made by the two previous speakers about the lack of substantial connection between these two particular motions. While it was agreed yesterday, as Your Honour read just a few moments ago, that a vote on motion No. 6 would dispose of motion No. 7, with all deference I think we should reconsider this. Let us say we dispose of motion No. 6; that could not possibly dispose of motion No. 7.

My early recollections of political science are that parliament could do practically anything but make a man a woman! It can agree to something one day, but surely there is a procedure by which it can "unagree" what we agreed yesterday in respect to the voting procedures on these two motions. It is inconceivable that disposing of one will dispose of the other by a procedural device of that sort.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we debate both motions and vote upon them separately. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Forrestall: Thank you for restoring some order to the proceedings, Mr. Speaker.

We will deal first with the absence from the bill of a procedure by which an affected person could make his views known to the Canadian Transport Commission where a permit or licence had been granted. I am not sure whether it was an oversight in the bill. In committee I had intended to introduce it as part of a larger amendment dealing with publication of notice by an applicant seeking a permit or licence to operate in Canadian waters under the terms of the proposed Maritime Code. In my concern to make sure the notices were published in the two languages in the official Gazettes of Canada and the provinces and so on, I drafted but neglected to instruct my secretary with respect to this particular amendment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is very important in the context of the practice in recent years. A lot of people view the practice of the Canadian Transport Commission in issuing special permits and licence as a rubberstamp operation—a buddy system. Somebody wants to charter to move potatoes to the Caribbean and says "I have such and such a motor vessel. I will fix it here and be in Halifax on such and such a date. How about it? How are you Dave? How's the wife and kids?" And that is the end of it.

It is a rubberstamp operation and always has been. The practice is likely to continue, and there have been many instances of it in recent years. There is the matter of the seismographic work in the north in connection with the search for oil. The government chartered an offshore ship while there was a Canadian ship that could do the job. The owner of the ship had no recourse except to go to the newspapers and make a noise, or go to his member of parliament. None of the remedies were satisfactory and he had no appeal, nowhere to turn.

My amendment proposes that:

> Any person having an interest therein may make oral or written representations to the Canadian Transport Commission in respect of the issuance, suspension, cancellation or renewal of a licence applied for or issued under this section.

What that does is make it possible, where the owner of a Canadian vessel finds his vessel lying idle while a foreign owned vessel is working in Canadian waters, for the Canadian owner to state his case to the Canadian Transport Commission. It would then act according to the degree the affected person was able to demonstrate injury.

When I introduced this amendment earlier I introduced with it a substantially longer amendment which called for a procedure by which the public would be notified that a special permit or licence was being sought by a particular operator. The notice was to be published where the shipping community would normally expect to see it. In other words, people would not have to buy the Vancouver newspapers to find out whether a ship was coming here under special licence. That required four weeks' notice and was not accepted because it was felt to be unduly restrictive. I accept that, as I accept the admonition of the council of maritime premiers that we must be careful not to interfere with the need to move quickly in some instances. This is simply a procedure by which somebody who feels the commission has gone outside the terms of the statute can appeal his case and tell his story.

I have not heard the view of the parliamentary secretary with respect to this rather simple amendment but I would appreciate hearing his comments. I see the parliamentary secretary busy with a pencil. I hope that is an indication the government will accept our suggestions. It is important to have these matters spelled out clearly in statute form.

Next I shall speak of something fundamental to our Canadian way of life. It is basic to our sense of propriety, of fairness to those who work for us, and to our sense of dignity. I should like to see foreign registered vessels, operating in Canada under special licence for one or more permit periods, come under Canadian law totally. I am not talking of the vessel which you charter quickly to move one cargo of grain from Saint John to the Lakehead. No, I am talking of specialized ships which operate in Canada for prolonged periods. We should require such ships to comply with the Canadian Maritime Code and with all Canadian law.

It is grossly unfair to our own shippers and our own sailors to allow foreign ships working in Canada to comply with standards completely different from those we impose on our Canadian seamen. It is only fair to require foreign crews working in Canada for extended periods to comply with all aspects of Canadian law. They should comply with the labour code, the Immigration Act, and other laws. While here they should assume the status of landed immigrants. If they refuse we should hire Canadian seamen to work on those ships.

It is a myth to suggest that Canadian crews are not available. We have all kinds of seamen available in this country. The ships should be covered by the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. We do not want foreign seamen in this country to work under conditions worse than those which we accept as decent for our own seamen. When I make these remarks I think of ships like the Traveltol, and the ro-ro—roll on, roll off—ships which operate out of Saint John, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Halifax, and carry cars and other vehicles. They are specialized ships and operate here for extended periods with foreign crews. At present I do not think those crews come under Canadian law. That is not fair. It is wrong. Either our laws apply to all who work in Canada, or they do not.

No person should be entitled to work in this country unless he conforms to the Canada Labour Code. We do not allow people in this country unless they meet the conditions of the Immigration Act. Why allow them to work here if they do not meet the conditions of the labour code? Apparently seamen are the exception. That is not right and I suggest is not what parliament intended.

We shall be more humane, show more concern, and be more highly respected if we ensure that all foreigners who work in Canada are protected by and conform to Canadian law and enjoy the benefits and protection of that law. I commend this course to the House. I hope my colleagues will support my suggestions. One suggestion relates merely to a certain procedure which can be used for the redress of grievance. I am thinking of procedures with respect to the issuance of licences. The second suggestion is that we should make foreign seamen working for extended periods in Canada conform to and enjoy the protection of Canadian law.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, although I have not participated much in the deliberations of the transport committee one thing is apparent to me. Many Canadians are in favour of establishing a Canadian merchant marine. It is argued that passage of this bill will lead to the creation of a Canadian merchant navy. Well, I have been interested in a Canadian merchant navy, ever since C. D. Howe gave our ships to Onassis. Apparently we could not use our Liberty ships, but Onassis could. With them he built a shipping line and made himself extraordinarily rich. At one time we had the fourth or fifth largest merchant navy in the world.

I suggested in previous remarks that only four blue water ships are of Canadian registry. An official of the department said I was wrong, that there are 300 or 400 such ships. Perhaps he was thinking of rowboats, dories, small ships of 100 tons or so, and so on. The fact is that although we have one of the largest coastlines in the world, export vast amounts of raw materials, and import commodities from all over the world, we have to hire foreign ships. When we wanted to move oil from the west coast to the east coast, the shortage of shipping was so severe that we were forced to hire a ship so run down that nobody else would hire it. The ship was unsafe and there was a danger of losing the oil. That did not matter. In the crisis we were forced to hire that ship, to carry oil from the west coast to the east coast.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Was her owner Onassis?

Mr. Peters: I don't know. She was not under Canadian registry but she was the only ship available, shipping being in short supply.

Obviously we need a Canadian merchant navy. An hon. member speaking last night said he was afraid that Canada does not possess the wherewithal to build a merchant navy. I suggest that Canada may need to treat the merchant navy as it treats its railways. The Canadian public and the government perhaps need to be involved directly with the payment of subsidies. We shall need to decide if a Canadian merchant navy is worth our while. If it is we must provide the means to make it possible. That question is relevant to clause 6.

Some think that by establishing the Maritime Code we are embarking on a new program which will ultimately lead to the creation of a Canadian merchant marine. They think that we shall control our waters with our own ships in much the same way as we influence events in our portion of the Seaway. I suggest that is not correct.

An archaic, backward-looking department would be involved with our merchant navy. They are so far in the background they will never get into this industry. They do not believe in having a merchant navy. They believe in meeting all the considerations involved in a system of licensing. They use as a basis for their licences the economic factors and take into consideration the operation of their bureaucratic control over the issuing of licences and permits. They have been doing this for some time. As long as they continue it will be cheaper to hire foreign ships under licence than Canadian ships. Why? Read the amendment and clause 6 and you will see why.

A shipper on the east coast shipping from one port to another can hire a convenience flagship from Panama, the Bahamas, Libya or any other country flying a convenience flag at lower cost. They have the labour costs that apply in those countries rather than Canada. We must supply the kind of food they eat. Their conditions are very substandard to ours. The wages are very low. Safety and health standards are almost non-existent. That is why these ships can be hired at very low cost. As long as that continues it will be impossible for Canadian entrepreneurs to compete.

What happens with our ships? We in this country own ships. Some are owned by Canadian National Railways. They operate under flags of convenience with crews that, in the main, are recruited in countries where the wages are very low. It is also true that CP and most other Canadian owned ships operate under flags of convenience.

If we want to develop a Canadian merchant navy we must do a number of things. If the Department of Transport is going to give licences to all the friends it has established over a long period of time, they will have to agree to operate under the conditions we now have and our economic circumstances. We must apply the criteria under this amendment. If we applied these criteria, Canadian entrepreneurs would be able to build Canadian ships and hire Canadian crews. If the Canada Labour Code applied, and immigration officials applied the immigration law to these ships from one port to another in Canada, as well as our safety regulations, Canadians could compete. They are as smart as anyone. However, if only Canadians have to abide by the Canada Labour Code and operate under Canadian safety regulations and other regulations, we cannot compete.

I am aware of a simple fact the department has been aware of for a long time. Officials have been giving top priority to it. I refer to the economics of the operations of the department and the economics of the trade in the maritime provinces, and the added cost that will obviously be passed on to those making the transfers and the arrangements with the shipping companies.

I am aware that it would cost more to ship from Halifax to St. John's, Newfoundland, if Canadian crews are used. However, it is also a fact that when you apply those regulations to shipping by rail it costs more. There have been concessions made through subsidies and the Crowsnest Pass agreement, and special arrangements with regard to the shipment of coal, potatoes and so on. We have made these exceptions. However, we have not ensured that those who work in these transportation facilities are paid a reasonable rate of pay, observe safety standards, and become landed immigrants. There are two problems. First there are the people in the area who want to ship from one point to another and, second, Canadians in general who want to establish a Canadian merchant navy.

If we accepted the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, we would immediately eliminate the great need for permits being granted at this time. Most of our shipping is done by permit. It is true that some shipping is done on small ships, but quite possibly this is only on a part-time basis. In the main, however, it is safe to say there is no Canadian merchant navy.

If we want a Canadian merchant navy we will have to pay for it. If we were unable to ship our wheat in foreign bottoms, we would have to supply Canadian bottoms to move the wheat. With the amount of wheat we have been moving to other countries we could well afford to support a large grain moving fleet. We would be able to control that fleet as to availability, and relate it to the operations of our ports and our rail transportation system. In fact we would have real control over it. We would be in a much better position to guarantee delivery on certain specific dates and not have to renege on our contracts, as in now often the case.

There is a desire on the part of Canadians to have their own ships with their own flags moving their merchandise around the world. Most people will agree that our international trade is important. We have to do something about it.

The second motion, in my opinion, is different with regard to developing a Canadian transportation facility by insisting on Canadian crews and Canadian working conditions. It involves Canadian entrepreneurs who will be competing with the permit system which is mainly operated for foreign or exemption ships. Is it unreasonable to tell that archaic department which issues these permits that a person should be able to appeal? There must be some justification for a permit being granted. One would think that permits are the exception. However, they are not. The licensing system covers most coastal shipping. Most of it is done under the permit system. Is it unreasonable to ask for an appeal against a bad decision by the department?

The Canadian entrepreneur must hire Canadian crews. He is unable to meet the competition because he has to carry other liabilities involved in our law. That should not be taken into consideration is assessing whether one ship is providing as economic service as another, although the end result per ton may be considerably different. The Canadian entrepreneur may be operating much more efficiently and providing a less costly transportation service, taking into consideration his requirements under the law as opposed to those given a licence and exempt from all these conditions.

There has been considerable argument in recent years about seamen under Canadian registry and the demands they have made over the years for better safety standards, higher salaries, and improved living conditions. They have been aggressive, in some cases more aggressive than they should have been, but they were not only fighting the ship owners in this country they were fighting the Department of Transport as well. They have always had to fight the Department of Transport.

I can remember attending a meeting with a former minister of finance who was then parliamentary secretary to the minister of transport of the day. Another hon. member and I, together with that gentleman who is no longer with us, put up a fight, and that fight was not against the steamship owners or the pilots' association but against the Department of Transport. The department had made up its mind at that time the certain radio facilities would not be provided because no allowance had been made for them in the budget. The companies were willing to make the necessary changes in their structure, and so were the unions, but the Department of Transport was not.

With regard to licensing and the appeal procedure, as well as labour standards affecting workers in this trade, they are backward, they are not progressive. In my opinion this is the type of department which should be disbanded and started over again, because no matter who goes into it he seems to fall into the same mould. I have never met anybody in the department who has been progressive to any degree. The minister and the parliamentary secretary should take a close look at the people they are dealing with and the advice they are getting.

Fortunately there are those who are concerned about the development of the Canadian merchant navy, people who are concerned about the future of the Canadian shipbuilding industry, people who want a fleet under Canadian registry capable of moving our goods between one port of this nation and another, and eventually, if this is at all possible in an economic sense, capable of carrying our goods to countries abroad in the course of international trade.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary would agree that even in Saskatchewan where he comes from people were quite happy to enlist in great numbers in the navy during the last war, as well as in the Canadian merchant navy. They did so because they had an understanding of our necessity to deal by sea with other countries across the world and they were willing to make a contribution to that end.

The situation has not changed. The Canadian people are still waiting to make a contribution of that kind, and when the parliamentary secretary declines to accept motion No. 6 he is really saying to the department "Go ahead, operate on the basis of the exemptions, operate with foreign crew between Canadian ports, operate with cheap labour, operate in such a way as to accept conditions which do not conform with Canadian labour standards, operate in the same way as you would if this were a banana republic." If this is what he wants let him go along with the department and oppose this amendment. Those who really want a Canadian merchant navy will support motion No. 6.

Motion No. 6 means that sailors, even those operating under licence, will have to be paid Canadian wages and enjoy Canadian safety standards, besides having to meet other requirements which have been mentioned during the debate. If the Liberals are stupid enough to vote against this motion the Maritime Code will be set back for at least 100 years.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I, too, wish to speak on this amendment. May I say I agree that the motions to which Your Honour drew attention are not related substantially, but we can, for purposes of discussion, talk about them together and we appreciate the thoughtfulness of the Chair in allowing us to vote on them separately.

The first of these motions relates to the application to a ship under licence of certain of the laws in Canada, for example, laws regarding employment, the Immigration Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, and so on. This may very well highlight one of the comments which was certainly made from this side of the House, and possibly by one or two members on the other side as well, about the introduction of only Books I and II of the Maritime Code, books which deal only with certain aspects of the subject. Book No. III is tremendous, as my hon. friend remarks, but there are portions of it still to come. Only Books I and II are scheduled in connection with the bill before us. There might have been no need to have come forward with an amendment of this sort had the full Maritime Code been brought forward at one time, and I think the minister should have worked toward that end. Then we would have the full code before us and be in a position to know what issues are covered. I am thinking of inspection service and ship building standards.

Here we are talking about crewing and the law which should apply to ships operating under licence. I feel that, at least pending the introduction of the rest of this code, we should adopt a section of the kind proposed to make sure there is jurisdiction over ships engaged in the Canadian trade. We must not allow that trade to be carried on by ships which refuse to recognize the laws of Canada in this area. This is a theme eloquently expounded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Motion No. 7 provides for an appeal procedure or a chance to object to a licence being issued. I am afraid I shall have to revert to an earlier discussion on interpretation from one language to another. It is conceivable that someone could take exception to a licence being issued to another party on the understanding that he would be able to exercise the licence under the second column in the law, which is the French text.

We are back again to the interpretation of the word "cabotage". I am sure someone will put a third initial in my name and call me Donald W. Cabotage—not John Cabot. I am sure the name will stick with me in some way or another.

In looking at the English version on page 15 of the bill I cannot help but be struck again by the particularization in the English text and the generalization in the French text that would provide a person who felt he had cause for appealing the issuance of a licence with just cause to do so. If I may quote the comparative texts, the clause provides:

(2) No licence shall be issued by the Canadian Transport Commission pursuant to subsection (1) unless the applicant for the licence establishes to the satisfaction of the Commission that

(a) utilization of a ship, other than a Canadian ship, in the particular aspect of the coasting trade of Canada in which the applicant proposes to use the ship to which the application relates—

This might involve the carrying of passengers, the carrying of coals, the carrying of general cargo. It might be specifically the carrying of petroleum products. Now, the French version provides:

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

(2) La Commission canadienne des transports ne peut délivrer la licence prévue au paragraphe (1) que si le requérant la convainc de ce que le navire, autre qu'un navire canadien,

(a) est destiné à être, dans l'intérêt public—

That is covered only in the English version.

—et

(b) présente les caractéristiques nécessaires pour être utilisé pour faire du cabotage au Canada.

The words "pour faire du cabotage" are so general that they could mean anything—carrying passengers, carrying lumber, carrying general cargo, carrying coal, ore, petroleum products. However, in the English version it is particularized. Therefore I feel there is some cause for us to ask that this particular method of interpreting from one language to the other be examined most carefully over the week end.

I understand it is not possible at this stage of our procedure to introduce an amendment, but there is surely some corrective device which can be applied between now and final reading that will clear up the uncertainty that exists, at least in my mind, and the uncertainty that I think would be in the mind of any judge who had to decide on an appeal that a person might make against the issuance of a permit under the provisions of this legislation.

The amendment proposed by my hon. friend for Dartmouth-Halifax East may simply be a temporary one pending arrival of the other portions of the code, but until those portions of the code become law the amendment deserves to be accepted. It provides protection and for authority to extend Canadian law to those ships working in the coastal trade of Canada. Secondly, as I say, grounds for an appeal might very well arise simply because of the uncertainty and unclarity existing between the English and French versions of clause 11(2) of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the proposed amendment is important, and several hon. members have said so before me. We are dealing with an area where the policies implemented up to now have been far from adequate. Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, Canada has always neglected shipping, so much so that we do not even have a merchant marine. In fact, we have acted somewhat childlishly in this area and have always left foreigners a free hand in all such matters. Of course, this has been a basic mistake, but we do not have to go on making it if we are intelligent enough to realize it.

Therefore, since we now have before us a bill to provide a maritime code for Canada, why should we not take this opportunity to make more truly Canadian a piece of legislation which is clearly inadequate? Although we do not have a truly Canadian merchant marine, we should at least have the decency to have a maritime code with specific sections to protect the interests of Canadians.

That is why I unreservedly support this amendment to clause 11 of Bill C-61. The motto of Canada—which is vast—is "From Sea to Sea" but that motto seems to me to be only symbolic since we are not all that interested in shipping operations. It remains obvious that a country washed by two oceans must monitor the shipping operations being carried out in its waters.

We previously experienced circumstances that were to say the least ridiculous and stupid, if not premeditated. For example, we saw ships in the St. Lawrence in Quebec City carry out coastal trade without any authorization. There is nothing in Canadian legislation to force a minimum of respect for our territorial integrity.

Mr. Speaker, we know that existed and will continue to exist. And when we have the possibility of providing in a code in a very specific way terms for having a licence. It seems to me that there is no mistake, that members of this House should understand this excellent amendment before us and it ought to be accepted immediately. Whether it be said that it is implicit in the fact that we are talking about coastal trade in Canada, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that considering the situation that always existed in this area it is important to dot the i's.

And that is why is added as proposed in the amendment the following:

—the employees aboard will be Canadian or landed immigrants, and the operator of the ship will comply with the Canada Labour Code, the Immigration Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act and, in general, with the laws, regulations and standards that are applicable to a business or enterprise operated in Canada under federal jurisdiction."

Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said earlier. It is not possible that we should not agree on that because that would be showing very little national or patriotic feeling. Consequently, I think this amendment should be passed, and there is absolutely no shame to doing so. It is only a motion to strengthen our national pride a bit.

● (1550)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with these two motions I intend to be rather brief. There are short yet substantive answers to the specific points raised, particularly by my two hon. friends in the official opposition.

I have some substantial difficulty, however, with the address made to the House earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). I shall quote him rather loosely, but I think fairly. In the latter part of his speech he said that we should take a close look at the people with whom we are dealing. I think in hearing his remarks we had an opportunity to take a close look at him. I do not think many of us were pleased by what we heard or saw. I think we saw a negative, non-specific, unfair, irresponsible, and inaccurate attack against people, past and present, who work for the people of Canada through the Ministry of Transport.

The diatribe this member delivered in the House today unhappily is all too typical of the kind of unfairness and irresponsibility we frequently see across the floor on the part of members of the New Democratic Party. I think it is terribly unfortunate that the member has injected into this discussion a note that is totally irrelevant, unfair, and which has detracted from the substantial good work done by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) in connection with this bill. As I say, it is unfortunate that the member for Timiskaming had to inject such an unfortunate and unhappy tone into the debate. He has detracted from the good and constructive discussion we were having prior to his intervention.

May I deal specifically with motions Nos. 6 and 7. In connection with motion No. 6 I have some initial difficulty. I think it is just in respect of the arrangement dealing with the removal of the word "and" in the first part of the motion. I think there might be a technical problem in indicating we are going to an "either/or" situation instead of "and". I think that is a technical problem and is not a substantial problem. There is another point I should like to mention in connection with the major portion of motion No. 6 which has been discussed rather extensively this afternoon.

I see the time is approaching four o'clock, so rather than go into the detail I would simply point out that the second part of the motion deals with the application of the Canada Labour Code and other standards to the operation of unlicensed foreign ships in the coasting trade. Hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, have indicated that this kind of provision might well be one we would look at very seriously down the road as further books are added to the Maritime Code, but I do not think it would be appropriate to consider it at this stage.

Dealing with motion No. 7, the purpose of clause 11(5) is to expedite proceedings by making the issuance of the licence an administrative act rather than a quasi-judicial act. The right of appeal, however, is retained by the provisions of clause 12. The proposed motion could, I suggest, lead to rather onerous delays in the processing of the applications. With those few remarks, Mr Speaker, I would conclude my comments on these motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question now is on motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to Section 11 of the Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands adjourned.

Mr. Forrestall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since it is not quite one minute to four o'clock I wonder, in light of the serious reservations the Chair might have in respect of the next amendment, and since the government has no further amendments, whether it might facilitate the business of the House if that amendment could be dealt with and disposed of now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Chair has strong reservations about the procedural acceptability of motion No. 8. This motion seeks to amend a statute which is not presently before the House, namely, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. It seems to the Chair that motion No. 8 goes beyond the scope of Bill C-61 as adopted by the House at the second reading stage, and therefore it cannot be put to the House. I would refer hon. members to Citation 406 in Beauchesne.

Mr. Forrestall: Very briefly on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, we recognize that this objection was raised in committee. That is the reason we accept the ruling. It is unfortunate that I did not personally have the opportunity further to commend to members of the House the necessity of closing our Arctic waters to foreign ships and retaining them for Canadian ships with Canadian crews, operating within the parameters of Canadian law.

● (1600)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It seems to the Chair that motion No. 8 goes beyond the scope of Bill C-61 as adopted by the House on second reading stage and therefore cannot be put to the House.

Order discharged and Motion No. 8 withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

ENVIRONMENT

SUGGESTED INSTITUTE OF HUMAN ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

The House resumed from Friday, October 18, 1974, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLean:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an Institute of Human Environmental Studies to determine, among other matters (a) the degree of air, soil, water and noise pollution the human species can tolerate without serious effects on physical and mental health (b) the type of environment which stimulates the most desirable qualities of physical and mental health in the human species (c) the type of national development which would give satisfactory environment to the greatest possible number of Canadians (d) the minimum of modifications to the present day indiscriminate and largely unplanned growth of our metropolitan areas necessary to put within reach of the inhabitants of these areas a quality of environment which would provide (i) adequate housing (ii) adequate recreational facilities including parkland (iii) adequate social infrastructure, such as transportation, education, hospital and recreation facilities.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I take real pleasure in resuming debate on this motion which was put forward by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). It is a sad fact that this motion is not in the form of a government bill so that we could give it the due consideration which it deserves.

This motion refers to the setting up of an institute of human environmental studies in co-operation with the provinces. The whole motion, when viewed in clear perspective, shows that it is a positive motion which refers to the analyzing of human behaviour and forces which affect the behaviour of human beings both positively and negatively.

I think it would be of interest for the House to note at this time that we are about to enter into a debate on Bills C-83 and C-84, both of which deal with how and why we should punish human beings. Bill C-83 recommends a minimum 25 year prison sentence and Bill C-84 discusses whether or not this country should apply capital punishment. Both these bills are punitively orientated. For far too long our society has been hooked on the notion of cure rather than prevention. That is true so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned, and also it is true of the whole of our legal system. To deal with human behaviour is to set out to punish those acts that are deemed undesirable, as proposed in the bills which we will be debating in a few weeks. The motion before us, however, recognizes the importance of the environmental, physical and social aspects in shaping the human condition.

Thomas Edison thought he was constructing a better candle when he invented the light bulb. History proved him to be quite wrong because the light bulb did not just produce a better form of light, it changed our society. The effect of the light bulb was to bring in shift work and to transform the lives of men and women in North America. Likewise, the women's liberation movement is not a product of women per se but rather the aftermath of technology and technological development. The new role of women is brought about largely by the dishwasher, the automatic laundry, drip dry fabrics, instant foods, flush-a-bye diapers, contraceptive devices, television, and many other products of technology.

Similarly our hope for human happiness lies in our understanding and control of our physical and emotional environment. We watch television programs such as "Untamed World" and "Outdoor Canada" and we learn about the space requirements for the Canada goose and the travel patterns of the red fox, but we fail to concern ourselves with the crowding in urban areas, the lack of daylight in many of our apartments, the lack of green areas and places for children and adults, the harshness of noise. We note that the places we allow for children and adolescents are largely restricted to places where an adult is necessary to organize the child's play.

Simply put, Canada today is quite a different Canada from that of 100 years ago. One hundred years ago 80 per cent of Canadians lived in rural communities. Today more than 80 per cent of Canadians live in urban areas. It is predicted that 95 per cent of all Canadians will be living in urban areas by the year 2,000. In the single decade fm 1961 to 1971 over 179,000 people left the rural communities on the prairies and migrated to cities.

Let us take a look at some of the changes that are taking place in our society as a result of the tremendous emphasis on urbanization. U.S. studies indicate that cities of 100,000 people cost an X number of dollars to police. Therefore, a city with one million people would cost 10X dollars to police. It would seem mathematically correct. The fact of the matter is that it costs 60 times as much to police cities with one million people as it does those of 100,000. What that illustrates is that the more dense our population is in the cities, the more negative is the behaviour of the population.

The increasing density of our population results in the increase in murders, suicides, robberies, and rapes, in fact an increase in the incidence of behaviour which we assume to be negative in our society. We could ask then, why do we continue to debate the issue of capital punishment, the issue of punitive measures, without at the same time focusing on preventive measures and looking for conditions which would induce a more positive human relationship in the country.

We have debated capital punishment previously, but this time the difference will only be in the speakers. I am referring to the speeches made on the private members' bill in 1924, in the joint committee in 1956, on the private members' bill in 1960, on the Criminal Code amendments in 1961, on the private members' motion in 1966, on Bill C-168 in 1967, on Bill C-2 in 1973 and 1974, and on Bill C-84 in 1976. It is high time that our society began to focus intelligently on what are the environmental conditional changes which can be made that can lead to a more positive kind of behaviour.

We know, for example, that when rats are crowded together they stop breeding and finally resort to eating one and other. We know that horses on a wild range land have a conception rate of nearly 100 per cent but under domestic conditions they have a conception rate of only 30 per cent. What we are really talking about is the biochemistry of our environmental changes We also know that architecture and architectural changes in the styles of our homes and apartments have an effect on human behaviour.

Let me give the example of what happened in an Italian village following World War II. In the 20 years that followed the destruction of the village by bombing during the war a whole new community arose and all the negative behaviours in society, such as murders, rapes and suicides, increased to an abnormal rate. It was discovered through psychological probing of that community that what was fundamentally wrong was that the community had been rebuilt under the Marshall Plan and architects and engineers from the United States were employed in the rebuilding. The building was done without any relationship to Italian architecture. It is simply an example to point out the importance of design and architecture and space relationships to human behaviour. We can give a large number of examples of how we design and put together the world in which we live and how in fact it changes the biochemistry of people, and subsequently their behaviour.

All the following animals will show aggressive or adverse behaviour due to crowding. The sika deer will abandon its young, canines will fail to nurse their young and commence fighting, the Norway rat will begin to eat itself or to eat others, and fight. Those things are all due to crowding, yet on the North American continent today we find that almost 95 per cent of our people are clustered into large urban areas without respect for the full consideration of what might happen in terms of human behaviour.

Over and over again throughout the century we have been contemplating the question of capital punishment and whether we should have stiffer jail sentences, but obviously one of the things we should be focusing on is whether we ought to be concentrating on our real relationships with one another as a result of the environment which we create.

Let us look at pollution. I should like to quote from the book "The Crisis of Survival" by William Steiff, which deals with the city of Los Angeles "where the birds cough". Mr. Steiff writes:

> . . . Or consider the experience of the 22 men working the toll booths at either end of the Brooklyn battery tunnel—all but one in their twenties and thirties. More than half were found to have dizzy spells from a higher than average concentration of carbon monoxide in their lungs. Over the one month period in which the 22 were studied, five of the men had blackouts.

Later he writes:

> The death rate from bronchitis and emphysema in the United States is nine times as high as it was 20 years ago. At the present rate of increase, 180,000 Americans will die of these lung ailments in 1983.

Let us look at noise now. One thing we can say for sure is that we are up to our ears in noise in Canada. Some of the problems that come from noise relate to the eyes—the pupils dilate blood vessels constrict, stomachs turn, and nerves jump. Yet for many people in this society there is no escape. Some experts claim that the noise level in Canada is increasing at a rate of about one decibel per year. Most people feel extreme discomfort at 115 decibels. If loud sounds persist, undoubtedly permanent hearing loss will result.

Noise can also affect the cardiovascular system. Research in both the United States and Europe indicates that noise increases the level of cholesterol in the blood and raises blood pressure. German and Italian medical researchers have found that even moderate noises cause small blood vessels to constrict. This vasoconstrictive reflex is the body's automatic way of responding to the stress of noise. It also occurs during sleep, as is shown by Dr. Gerd Jansen of Essen, West Germany. He measured the vasoconstriction that occurs in the fingers of sleeping subjects when he played recorded noise at only 55 decibels, the level of nearby traffic. The vasoconstriction took place even when the noise exposure lasted only a fraction of a second. Even with this limited exposure the blood vessels took minutes to return to normal. Dr. Jansen concluded that the sound of traffic at night heard by sleeping individuals can endanger their hearts and arteries.

In Italy Dr. Giovanni Straneo found that noise not only causes the blood vessels in fingers and eyes to constrict, but also has the opposite effect on the blood vessels of the brain. The dilation in the brain could be a reason why noises cause headaches. He also found that noise threatens the heart itself by directly altering the rhythm of its beat. In addition it makes the heart work harder by thickening the blood while constricting its flow in peripheral vessels. One of his associates at the university of Pavia found that noise also increases the stomach's flow of acid.

We are only trying to point out that unless we give due consideration to the whole environment then obviously society is making a wrong judgment if it simply decides how to punish people for what is held to be abnormal behaviour. We create the society, Mr. Speaker, and we create the kind of situation that causes people to behave the way they do.

To give another example of the effect of noise I would like to quote from the 1973 edition of Psychology Today which states that children living at street level on busy streets had significantly lower reading and language acquisition levels than those who lived above the fifth floor. In controlled experiments in the laboratory it was discovered that noise levels as low as 55 decibels could negatively affect a testing program requiring concentration and manipulative skills.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that noise can cause distress, irritability, and abnormal human behaviour. But here we are just a few weeks away from talking about bills that will deal with capital punishment and whether to put people in jail for 25 years or longer. What we ought to be focusing on is how to build the kind of Canada in which minimal negative behaviours are elicited.

Let us look at the space relationships on this continent. In the city of Los Angeles 60 per cent of the land area is devoted to the automobile. If we look at our spatial needs in a diatic situation we find that from one culture to another there is a difference in spatial needs. A person who has come here from England usually will communicate with another person by focusing on that person's both eyes. In the French culture there is a closer spatial relationship. We note the Italians do considerably more touching than the English, while we find that the Arabs get right into the breath stream of the other person, and even in business relationships speak only a few inches from the other person's mouth.

In Canada we build cities where the parks are miles away, where picture window looks into picture window, and then we tend to blame the abnormal behaviours of society on those who commit them, irrespective of the fact that we have in our culture done a great deal to cause those behaviours. The question should not be how to punish or not to punish, but how to focus on what we can do to create a society which is happy.

We can make any species of animal act abnormally simply by controlling the following factors: the amount of light or darkness, the increase or decrease of temperature, space limitations or crowding factors.

The motion reads:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an institute of human environmental studies to determine among other matters (a) the degree of air, soil, water and noise pollution the human species can tolerate without serious effects on physical and mental health (b) the type of environment which stimulates the most desirable qualities of physical and mental health in the human species (c) the type of national development which would give satisfactory environment to the greatest possible number of Canadians—

Today we should ask the House to consider that if as a nation we consider we have the right to punish people who act in some form extraneous from those mores outside the law, then surely we bear an obligation to reshape the kind of environment that causes that behaviour. I think we have ample information to illustrate quite clearly that environment definitely has its effect on all of the animal species and in many cases, as is clearly demonstrated, on the human organism.

We know how high noise levels can affect children and their ability to learn, how pollution can affect health, and how lack of living space can give rise to aggressive and abnormal behaviour. The motion asks the federal government, in conjunction with the provinces, to take seriously its obligations and responsibilities to those who act outside the law but, at the same time, to recognize its responsibilities for creating an environment which will stimulate a positive and constructive response. Let us create an environment which will elicit from people positive and constructive behaviour. I commend this motion to the House, Mr. Speaker, and wish to tell hon. members that it has been a pleasure to participate in this debate.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted, on behalf of the government party, to respond this afternoon to the motion calling for the establishment of an institute of human environmental studies. First, let me say this. We are in a period of restraint. Despite that, hon. members opposite propose motions in private members' hour calling for the expenditure of money. Is not that strange, considering that hon. members opposite plead that the government should cut costs here and there, and criticize expenditures on government programs? Notwithstanding such criticisms, an hon. member opposite presented the motion now before the House.

This afternoon I should like to address myself particularly to that part of this motion concerned with creating an environment which is likely to provide, among other amenities, adequate housing. First, Canadians by and large are adequately housed. There are individuals who need public help to obtain suitable housing and there are excellent programs in operation to help them. Legislation is now before parliament to make these programs even more effective. Canadians are, as a general rule, among the best housed people in the world. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are not complacent about our accomplishments. Certainly we need to be continually striving to improve our housing stock and to anticipate our changing needs in the years ahead.

From what I have been able to discover, Central Mortage and Housing Corporation is doing a very good job in its field. In so far as housing is concerned I do not see pressing need to create another institution, be it an institution of human environmental studies or any other. We should resist the temptation to create a brand new organization each time a new challenge appears on the horizon.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about the work being done under CMHC's demonstration and development program which is to ensure that housing and the community environment will adequately meet the needs of our present population and of generations to come. I am satisfied with government directives and policies relating to CMHC. We are concerned not only about bricks and mortar; our main concern is to meet the real needs of the people of this country. Canadians are concerned about the environment in which they live; they are concerned not just with their own individual houses; concern extends to their physical and social environment as well.

The demonstration and development programs are directed toward developing and demonstrating attractive and affordable alternatives in housing and community. The government hopes to share with the building industry the results of these demonstrations and development projects. The builders will have to produce these structures at market prices, which means fair prices, and we will see what the Canadian public feels about them.

We want to build communities that better meet the needs and aspirations of all Canadians. The Woodroffe demonstration project here in Ottawa is one example. This will be a new community of about 14,000 people on 425 acres of land. The first task, of course, is to find out what people want. They ultimately decide whether a community succeeds or fails. People should be brought into the planning process at the very beginning, to work with the designers and the various levels of government.

At Woodroffe there is already a citizens' program to provide for the participation of citizens in the surrounding area affected by the project and for that of future residents or their representatives. A forum has been established to help identify and resolve controversial issues which might otherwise hold up the planning process. The object of these programs is to provide people with a satisfying environment and with the full range of possibilities for enhancing the quality of their lives.

Woodroffe will demonstrate that a totally planned community is better than piecemeal development. It will set standards for improvement of social, physical and economic arrangements for community development. CMHC will underwrite the pre-development and research costs. CMHC will be the developer and will use whatever techniques are necessary to build successfully. Then the corporation will transfer the ideas, products, and knowledge gained, providing an incentive to the building industry in this country to follow suit.

This work concerns the whole realm of human settlements in the suburbs as well as inner city. It concerns rural areas, new communities and metro satellites, and the aim is to improve living conditions. One of the objects is to reduce the pressure on the suburbs where, at present, most housing development takes place, and to restore balance in access, distribution, and choice of housing in urban as well as rural areas.

CMHC is examining ways to revitalize the inner city by recycling old buildings such as warehouses for residential and related uses. It is continually searching for alternative solutions to housing needs which will provide variety in order to broaden choice of housing accommodation and ensure sensible use of available physical resources. For example, it is studying the feasibility of building housing and community facilities over existing shopping centres.

At present the choice of housing accommodation is too limited. At one extreme we have low density single family housing eating up the land. At the other extreme we have high rise, high density housing developments. There is little doubt that between these two extremes there is an opportunity to build medium density accommodation, and CMHC is trying to fill this gap by developing new housing forms to increase choice, provide more amenities and save on land, services, and agricultural land.

As I said when I began, we are in a period of restraint. I am surprised that an hon. member opposite would introduce a motion asking the government to involve itself in the control of environment right across this country. If the motion were to succeed we should be forced to assume a substantial financial burden. Members on the government side are only too familiar with the attitude of opposition members who criticize and attack the government for spending money in the carrying out of various programs and policies the government has adopted.

I feel that existing government institutions, including CMHC, the ministry responsible for urban affairs, and DREE, are effectively improving and managing our built-up environment. I share the concern which is evident in the motion about the preservation of our living places but cannot support the motion because I feel that the institute which it proposes to establish would be an inappropriate and unnecessary response.

Human Environmental Studies

● (1630)

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in Canada certain environmental problems such as poor sanitary conditions and accompanying communicable diseases are no longer the greatest cause of mortality and morbidity as they still are in many other countries. As a result of progressive measures introduced by the federal government, the provinces, and municipalities, conditions such as inadequate, unsafe water supplies, and poor or non-existent waste disposal have been eliminated in many regions, and are being brought under control elsewhere.

As these classical causes of human suffering and death have been eliminated, other environmental hazards to human health have become apparent. These often exert their effects in a more subtle way. Many are the direct result of man's social and economic development, notably as a result of industrial development and urbanization. Well known problems of this type include the release of mercury from chlor-alkali plants and the emission of lead from automotive exhausts or from industrial smelters.

Even our increased opportunities for leisure bring environmental hazards to health; for example, amateur pottery has brought hazards of lead poisoning from incorrect glazing techniques, and the pollution problems associated with cottage development around many of our lakes are well known.

I believe we have recognized the importance of environmental factors in relation to human health. Much of the emphasis in the Department of Health document "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians" is concerned with the importance of preventive measures as a means of reducing human illness, death and suffering, and perhaps as a more cost-effective way of maintaining good health than the traditional medical approach of diagnosis, treatment and cure. Environmental factors, and the need to control their influence on human health, figure prominently in the propositions set forth in the "New Perspective" document which proposed courses of action to identify and bring under control those physical and chemical factors and psycho-social influences that, together with microbiological agents, make up the ecosystems that most directly affect human health.

Toxicologists of the Health Protection Branch are conducting research on a number of chemical agents in our air, soil, and water in order to determine the degree of pollution that people can tolerate without serious effects on health. The results of these investigations will continue to be used, together with all other available relevant scientific evidence as part of the ongoing monitoring of the indications for control of the environment, including the workplace environment, in order to safeguard health.

The influence of physical factors such as heat, light, noise and ionizing radiations on health and well-being is also being studied by the Health Protection Branch.

Several of these programs, such as that relating to ionizing radiations, have been in existence for many years, but others are relatively new or have recently been greatly expanded. For example, in recent months research to identify potential toxic chemicals in drinking water has been intensified. As new concerns arise, the Health Protection Branch has responded by adapting its research priorities.

[Mr. Harquail.]

Perhaps a good example of this is provided by the present concern over asbestos fibres in drinking water.

The identification of significant amounts of asbestos in drinking water was first accomplished by scientists of the Health Protection Branch a few years ago. The health significance of the discovery that water supplies in certain areas contain relatively high levels of asbestos was, and remains, uncertain. Officials of the branch have worked closely with their colleagues in the United States to design extensive investigations that may be expected to resolve this question; these officials continue to receive and evaluate the results of these studies as they become available. At the same time other scientists in the branch are involved in the development of methods that could be used to monitor drinking water for asbestos fibres if it should become apparent that there is good reason to develop regulatory standards because of a health hazard. Others are studying the possibility that asbestos fibres in water could become airborne and consequently available for inhalation through humidifiers.

These are some of the ways in which the Department of Health is addressing the problem of identifying risks to human health from environmental agents. Of course the work directly carried on by the department is augmented by research on the influence of environmental agents on cells, tissues, and organisms, undertaken mainly by university laboratories sponsored under the national health grants' scheme by the Medical Research Council and by the National Research Council.

Having defined the nature and degree of environmental health hazards it becomes essential to control those agents that pose a threat to human health and well-being. At the federal level a number of acts of parliament may be used in particular cases, depending on the nature of the hazardous agent, the medium, whether air, water consumer products, in which the agent occurs and on the nature of the population at risk, be it general population or workers. We must recognize also that the provinces have significant responsibilities in relation to health matters.

In the context of environmental health issues there is a good deal of federal-provincial co-operation in order to co-ordinate programs and to attempt to get results which will lead to a more uniform standard of health protection across Canada.

Under the aegis of the Subcommittee on Environmental Health of the Advisory Committee on Community Health, a federal-provincial committee reporting directly to deputy ministers of health, the Canadian drinking water standards and objectives are currently being revised. Another working group of this committee has recently completed an in-depth study of the incidence of asbestos-related disease in Canada and has recommended steps that ought to be taken by the appropriate authorities at the federal and provincial levels to confer a greater degree of protection for workers who come into contact with asbestos as a result of their employment.

Another group is at present considering a number of occupational health problems including the development of model legislation for use in Canada, and an assessment of occupational health manpower needs and training.

The interrelationships between environmental factors and health are highly complex ones. This results in appreciable uncertainty on many issues on which judgments and decisions are required. It is important, therefore, that any regulatory actions be followed up by monitoring and surveys to determine if these actions have indeed achieved the desired effect. This may involve analysis to determine the quantities of toxic agents present in the environment, and much is already done by the Department of the Environment to provide just this type of information.

In some cases it may be preferable to assess the health status of target populations either by intensive studies in high risk groups or by more general surveys such as the Canada Health Survey. In conjunction with the provinces, this type of investigation is now well established in the Health Protection Branch's programs. It seems to me that many of the matters proposed for an institute of human environmental studies are already dealt with in the Environmental Health Directorate of the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Co-operation with the provinces is being achieved through consultative mechanisms that are in place; a number of joint investigations have already resulted from these arrangements. Other aspects, inferred in the motion, are already addressed by ongoing programs of the Department of the Environment and by other federal agencies. Again, consultative mechanisms, formal and informal, exist to ensure co-ordination of programs.

● (1640)

In summary, the scientific and medical expertise already exists within the federal and provincial governments to achieve the aims suggested for the proposed institute, and while there is always room for improvement in the co-ordination or development of existing programs I find it difficult to persuade myself that we need yet another structure when there are existing structures in place.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join the debate today on motion No. 5 which proposes the establishment of an institute of human environmental studies.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) for bringing forward this motion. The subject is a noble one. It harks back to the more idealistic concepts of the sixties and the stress which was laid then on education, culture, science, and the preservation of the environment. It is certainly a contrast to many of the more hard-nosed subjects with which we seem to be preoccupied in the seventies—economics, law and order, and so on.

We have already heard about the government's role in environmental concerns. Some age old problems have been brought under control in countries like Canada although not in many less advanced countries, problems such as poor sanitation, inadequate and unsafe water supplies, poor or non-existent waste disposal systems, communicable diseases, insect and animal reservoirs and vectors of disease. These have recently been replaced, however, by other environmental hazards of modern industrial society—heavy metal poisoning often involving mercury or lead, and our leisurely, sedentary lifestyle. The latter is being attacked by the federal department of health through a modern approach which may prove more economical as well as more effective than health care.

Research and control programs are being conducted with respect to many chemical and physical agents in our surroundings which might affect our health, agents in the air, the soil and in the water. But there is a further approach apart from the considerable and fine work which is going on in government. I became aware of this other approach to the environment in 1974, and indeed I became involved in it.

I should like to refer to some correspondence. The subject involves the concept of a United Nations university with headquarters in Tokyo, Japan, and departments scattered around the world. Perhaps there will be one in Canada. There is a certain interest in having a department of the environment in the UN university in Canada, perhaps in Toronto.

On February 4, 1975, I received a letter from Professor Alfred P. Bernhart, Chairman, Environmental Health, University of Toronto. It read:

Dear Dr. Philbrook:

The United Nations General Assembly, as you probably know, has passed a resolution to form a United Nations University. Japan has taken the initiative to secure the United Nations University headquarters in Japan, yet several centres will be spread throughout the world.

As Toronto citizens, we feel strongly that Canada, and Toronto in particular, should be the location of the centre for environmental problems.

We feel that in Toronto there are many of the intellectual resources which are needed for such a centre and we feel that the support of such an undertaking would fall very well into Canada's external aid program.

The Mayor of the City of Toronto has set up a committee under the chairmanship of Alderman David P. Smith and this committee has reported to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We respectfully request at this time that you support this endeavour in discussions with the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A little later, on March 31, 1975, I received a second letter from Professor Bernhart as follows:

Dear Dr. Philbrook:

Thank you for your encouraging response to our request to support the United Nations University concept in discussions with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Allan MacEachen.

I am sorry that it took us so long to answer, but there were some important developments during the last two months, which clarified matters relating to the head office of the United Nations.

The Secretary General of the United Nations, after receiving advice from a selection committee, has appointed Dr. James Hester (President New York University) to be rector of the United Nations University effective September 1975 for a 5 year term, once renewable. Also appointed were 24 members of the governing council of the United Nations University, the council then elected Dr. Roger Gaudry (Rector University of Montreal) their chairman.

The rector will establish the United Nations headquarters in Tokyo, Japan. Japan has pledged an endowment fund of $100 million. The fund will be payable in 5 yearly installments, but only if that amount is less than 25 per cent of money given to the United Nations by all countries. In other words, they expect other countries to allocate $300 million. Only one country has so far responded: Senegal with $23,000.00.

In its charter, the United Nations University states as objectives the betterment of mankinds conditions, co-existence, human rights, social justice, quality of life environment and resources. The charter outlines a head office (now decided to be in Tokyo) and several (ten to twelve) centers located in various countries of the world, each for one "Mission" (for Canada we suggest the environmental center).

Human Environmental Studies

Our association suggests that Canada's interest is twofold: first to make a contribution towards the UN University as a whole; and second to establish a regional center in Canada, preferably in Toronto.

Canada's contribution towards the UN University as a whole is expected to be about $12 million, payable over several years. This is 3 per cent of the estimated total requirement of $400 million,—(Canada's share of the overall United Nations budget is 3 per cent).

We believe, that if budgetary difficulties should occur, the required funds could come from the already approved allotment for the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), which is about $730 million.

A draft of our associations proposal for a Canadian international component on environmental "missions" is attached. I like to stress that our proposal entails an all-Canadian thought input, even though we like to see the office of the component in Toronto. The financial requirements for this proposal would be $45,000.00 per year.

That letter certainly establishes the interest in this country, particularly in Toronto, in this United Nations environmental centre.

Finally we had the response by our own government through the then minister of the environment, as follows:

Dear Dr. Philbrook:

Environmental Centre for the United Nations

I have studied the letter which you received from Professor A. P. Bernhart in which he seeks your support for the establishment in Toronto of a centre for environmental problems associated with the United Nations University.

In 1972, Canada voted for the principle of the establishment of a United Nations University. Since then, a Canadian position with respect to our participation in the project has not been determined. An interdepartmental task force, under the chairmanship of the Department of External Affairs, currently bears the responsibility of establishing a Canadian position.

As indicated by Professor Bernhart, the headquarters of the university has been set up in Tokyo. A few months ago Dr. Roger Gaudry, former rector of the University of Montreal, was elected as Chairman of the University Council. The location, throughout the world, of centres associated with the university will be a function of the Council of the University, for which the Council will be responsible to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

● (1650)

With respect to your specific question I am advised that, in terms of intellectual and physical resources, the location of a centre for environmental problems in the Toronto area is feasible. There are, as you know, a number of universities and associated specialized environment institutes in the area. Of these, a number, among others in Canada, receive federal assistance. Further, federal environmental activities in the area include the Canada Centre for Inland Waters in Burlington and the headquarters of the Atmospheric Environment Service of the Department of the Environment.

It should be noted, however, that the desirability of establishing such a centre in the Toronto area may be another question. The interest in such a project and the willingness of the various groups to collaborate in the development of an intergrated program and to accept the additional influx of students will require careful planning and cooperation amongst the institutions involved.

Furthermore, because of the administrative costs, it is almost certain that the Province of Ontario would have a direct interest in the matter and should be included in any further consultations.

I imagine that it is questions of this sort which are being dealt with by the interdepartmental task force considering the whole United Nations University question. In any event, I will ask my officials to pay particular attention to the possibility of establishing a United Nations University centre for environmental problems in the Toronto area.

Yours sincerely,

That is signed by the present Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé). It was dated July, 1975.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

In conclusion, I suppose one wonders why this is not going ahead faster since it certainly seems to be a worthy project for Canada. It would seem to be in line with motion No. 5 proposed by the hon. member for Malpeque. I suppose the obvious answer is simply economics. We have a tight money situation and most countries seem to have restraint programs at the present time, so I think it is a reasonable answer to the hon. member's proposal for this worthy institution. Personally I think it should go ahead. There are several alternatives, and it would be reasonable at this time to accept the necessary financial restraints for such an institution.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to contribute to the debate this afternoon. The part of the hon. member's motion of prime interest to me is his reference to the growth of our metropolitan areas and the largely unplanned aspects of that growth which are having an increasing effect on the living conditions of a very large number of Canadians.

The thing that really frustrates me more than anything else about parliament is that over a number of years, having made representations almost since the time I arrived here, I have yet to convince the government that it should be utilizing one power that exists, at least indirectly, as a lender under the National Housing Act. Our cities have grown and expanded enormously since the second world war largely, at least initially, as a result of money lent, to individuals and companies building homes, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the provisions of the National Housing Act. Had we wished to use this power and not been so fearful of upsetting provincial sensibilities, we could have avoided many of the errors in planning that characterize the suburbs of every city in Canada. Even now the minister is talking about one million new homes, so it is not too late to act.

We should be using these lending powers of ours to insist on basic standards of planning, basic minimums for green space and minimums for recreational facilities. Although we are told this is being done, we are not really doing this yet. There is now a move afoot to apply more pressure on municipal and provincial recipients of lending funds to provide basic standards of planning, but we have a long way to go, it seems to me, before achieving the kind of minimum planning that will guarantee to the future population of Canada the kind of cities and suburbs that are possible if properly planned.

We have heard a lot over the years about quality of life. Quality of life means to me the quality of the living conditions in the places where we spend most of our lives, that means our homes, our communities, and the access between our communities and the places where we work, shop, and are educated.

As far as housing is concerned, I agree that Canadians are probably the best housed people in the world, but what about the communities in which their houses are situated and the access of these well housed people to their work and schools? Ask the people in my constituency who have to wait and choke for two or three hours every morning in the fouled atmosphere of traffic jams to cross the St. Lawrence River into Montreal when they are sitting beside an unused rail line what they think of their quality of life.

As for the communities that have been built since 1945, communities that were expanded usually every time the economy needed a boost, will they stand the test of time? How many of these suburbs will our children point to with pride and say were built with foresight and with long-term human objectives in mind?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Watson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe another hon. member has an intervention to make, and although I have many more things to say I will concede to him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not only a filibuster, it is an organized filibuster.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I realize time is very short. I think we on the government side are very gratified that the hon. member has brought this motion to the attention of the House, which looks at environmental problems in a comprehensive way, not just as an isolated problem of polluted air, water, or waste disposal.

Mr. Paproski: You don't care about the problem; you just want to talk it out.

Mr. Anderson: There is ample evidence that high quality is necessary to sustain high biological productivity, with the best and most efficient use of resources on which we depend for prosperity.

Mr. Paproski: Question.

Mr. Anderson: I think the hon. member on the other side may have some interest in this subject, though perhaps it does not affect his area as it does my area in British Columbia. For example, if much more pesticide is put into the ocean we will have a dead ocean.

Mr. Paproski: You are talking it out.

Mr. Anderson: I am sorry that the hon. member does not feel that this is a subject for his attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO IMPROVE STATUS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering the fact that today is International Women's Day and despite the fact that many years have passed since those female garment workers demonstrated for better working conditions, the economic status of women has not changed sufficiently, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare take steps to ensure that all working mothers have access to day care facilities, that the government accept the concept of equal pay for work of equal occupational status and further that the minister consider the proposal of wages for housework.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST THAT CONSUMER MINISTER REVEAL CONVERSATIONS WITH MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS AND MR. TURNER

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with extra-judicial activities in connection with the contempt of court proceedings; both the former minister of finance and the Minister of Public Works have confirmed that they discussed those contempt of court proceedings with the judge involved. Would the minister tell the House about the substance of his conversations with the former minister of finance and the Minister of Public Works relative to the conversations those gentlemen admitted having?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, last January 30, my counsel, Mr. Gabriel Lapointe, registered an appeal from the judgment made against me by Judge Hugessen in a case of contempt of court. At the same time, he also presented and obtained a request of appeal from the sentence. This case will be heard soon by the Quebec court of appeal. Under the circumstances, I cannot and I will not make any statement related to this matter.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Will the minister tell us—and this information could in no way affect proceedings before the court—whether he invited the former minister of finance and the present Minister of Public Works to intervene in any way with the judge who was in charge of those proceedings?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have no further comments to make.

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBLE REQUEST BY CONSUMER MINISTER TO PERSONS OUTSIDE HOUSE TO INTERVENE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): We regret very much this refusal to put before the House information relating to the conduct of ministers of the Crown. I wonder whether I might make one final attempt. Having regard to the admission of the Minister of Public Works in this chamber—and the minister appeared to show none of the reluctance exhibited by his colleague today—that he and a great many other public-spirited citizens had spoken to the associate chief justice, could the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell us whether he asked persons outside this House to intervene on his behalf?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Leader of the Opposition is not a lawyer. If he were, he would certainly understand that when someone is involved in a matter before the courts, that someone has certain rights, and I trust that in this case the hon. member will respect them.

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REPLY OF CHIEF JUSTICE DESCHÊNES TO REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Could the hon. gentleman tell us what information he has received since last Friday from Chief Justice Deschênes with respect to alleged contacts with justices of his court by ministers of the government, and what role, if any, Chief Justice Deschênes feels it is proper for him to take in determining the propriety of ministerial conduct in connection with the matters mentioned in Mr. Justice Mackay's letters?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have not received any information from the Chief Justice of the Superior Court except that he anticipated replying to my letter early next week.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF THOROUGH INVESTIGATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Should Chief Justice Deschênes not intend to conduct interviews with members of the government, what assurances can the minister offer this House that a thorough investigation of conversations not only between members of the government and judges but between ministers themselves will take place? Can the hon. gentleman indicate what safeguards exist there for the elucidation of information for the people of Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): As I said on Friday, I thought it inappropriate, having regard to my view of the independence of the judiciary and the separation of the judiciary from the government, for me to make further recommendations to the government on this matter until I had had an opportunity of inviting the chief justice of the Superior Court to draw to my attention any information he deemed it appropriate for me to have in the circumstances.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since the matters contained in conversations between some of his ministers do not appear to fall within the jurisdiction or purview of Chief Justice Deschênes unless the Chief Justice were given special powers of inquiry, has the Prime Minister reconsidered his initial policy of not having a public inquiry into this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree that Chief Justice Deschênes of the Superior Court would not normally be called upon to look into conversations between members of my cabinet. I think that is quite proper.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REASON FOR CLAIMING CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN CONSUMER MINISTER AND MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS PRIVILEGED

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and is on the same subject. Being a lawyer, I am sure the minister will understand that those conversations will not affect the question before the court. In answer last week the Minister of Public Works indicated that those conversations were privileged because both persons participating in the conversations, the minister and the Minister of Public Works, are both lawyers. Would the minister advise the House whether he is invoking a solicitor and client privilege with regard to those conversations as a protection?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has certainly not listened to the answer I gave to the first question of the Leader of the Opposition. I therefore invite him to refer to the remarks I made at the beginning of the question period.

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY EVEN IF CHIEF JUSTICE DESCHÊNES FINDS NOTHING IMPROPER

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. In a letter dated February 10 the chief justice of the province of Quebec, in writing a letter to Mr. Justice Mackay, said that "your letter to the Minister of Justice is couched in terms which, were I the minister, I would find unacceptable". In view of the fact that the Chief Justice has already rendered a verdict of sorts in his letter of February 10—I realize the Minister of Justice has not ruled out a recommendation for a full inquiry—would the minister still consider a full inquiry even if the Chief Justice of Quebec finds nothing improper as a result of his investigation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that on Wednesday last I said that, as a matter of practice both in this case and in future matters, I did not intend to comment at large on correspondence passing between myself and members of the judiciary. I would advise the hon. member that the letter to which he refers from the Chief Justice of the Superior Court was not apparently written when the Chief Justice had in front of him the letter of February 20.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR TABLING CORRESPONDENCE WITH CHIEF JUSTICE DESCHÊNES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister in any event table the piece of correspondence that he had with the Chief Justice so that this House and the country can at least determine the specific terms of reference given to the Chief Justice in terms of his own investigation into this matter, and can judge whether the minister is conducting a full inquiry into the matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Again, Mr. Speaker, I indicated last Wednesday that I did not think it proper to divulge correspondence between me and members of the judiciary. However, I realize this is an important matter and I will consult with the Chief Justice of the Superior Court on that point. I have indicated in the House that the purport of my request to the chief justice is to bring to my attention, if the Chief Justice deems it appropriate, information that may be in his possession and which he considers appropriate to pass on to me.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since the alleged dispute between the provincial Liberals of Quebec and the Liberals of Ottawa will provide an excellent theme for the next election in Quebec, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether Quebec Liberals have undertaken to do the same kind of favour to their federal friends and invent another artificial crisis in the event of a federal election?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON COMMUNICATION BETWEEN MINISTERS AND JUDGES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise this House if it is the policy of this government that it is satisfactory procedure for a minister of the government or a senior civil servant to speak to a judge about a matter that is before the courts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it is in order to influence the judgment of the court the answer is no. I should add—

An hon. Member: Go back and read your law books again.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, what page and what chapter?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Is it the view of the government that it is satisfactory procedure to speak to a judge about a matter that is before the court? Is that correct?

Mr. Trudeau: My answer was no, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is a little—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Public Works who is not in the House, so I would waive my right and ask it later.

INSTRUCTIONS TO MINISTERS AND GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL CONCERNING COMMUNICATION WITH JUDGES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings of the Prime Minister. As a result of the episode involving federal cabinet ministers and the judicial system, and in view of the great concern and doubt expressed by the general public that the administration of justice is being undermined, casting a detrimental reflection on the integrity of all members of this House and understandably creating embarrassment and indignation on the part of the judges, has the Prime Minister instructed all Cabinet ministers as well as senior government officials to not, under any circumstances whatsoever, contact judges directly or indirectly on matters before the courts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe if I gave those instructions they would be quite incorrect. The minister has just given some examples of necessary contact between the judiciary and the executive. I myself have had occasion to talk to judges on various matters many times—on the initiative of the judges who would phone me. The important rule is that there be no attempt to interfere or influence the course of justice, but there are naturally communications between the judiciary and the executive on such matters as, for instance, the fact that some judges have to be appointed to courts and we want to know what area the Chief Justice thinks should be strengthened, would it be civil law or commercial? There are many factors between the ministers and the judiciary. The important rule is that it not be made with an attempt to influence the course of a trial.

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As a result of this fiasco what are the plans of the Prime Minister to allay the fears of Canadians, because nothing he has said up to the present time has accomplished that?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps what we said today will accomplish that. I shall ask the hon. member to report tomorrow on what the Canadian public is thinking.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER IN RETURN OF CONSTITUTION TO CANADA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if I might draw the attention of the House in another direction I should like to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister on his successful escape from the second battle of Quebec with not too many visible wounds. I should like to ask him who speaks for the government on the question of bringing back the constitution to Canada—the Minister of National Health and Welfare who said in his inimitable way that the Prime Minister was kibbitzing or joshing or the right hon. gentleman who, from what I saw of him on television for at least the benefit of English Canada, did lash himself into an awful rage?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question was too serious, but if I could be allowed to deal—

An hon. Member: Oh yes it is.

An hon. Member: Ask the premier.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, three were not two battles of Quebec, there were three. Apart from mine there was one in 1759 and one in 1760.

Mr. Clark: You did better in that period.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to bringing the constitution back to Canada does the right hon. gentleman intend to go to Buckingham Palace by his little self and bring it back here or does he intend—

Mr. Paproski: Bring it back on a bicycle.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand that when we talk about the patriation of the constitution it really does not mean putting statutes in a little satchel and bringing them back. If I can use layman's language it means to ask the United Kingdom to deprive itself of the right it has of making laws for Canada. This was done by the Statute of Westminster for the other Dominions. It was not done for Canada. All we want now is for the United Kingdom, through its proper parliamentary channels, to renounce that right. We think all Canadians would be happy if we put an end to this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I have one final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the right hon. gentleman come to this House and make a statement telling us exactly what he intends to do so we will all have the information and be able to do something about it as well.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, apparently the station to which the hon. member listened in Alberta did not carry the full story. It might be that if the hon. members wants me to do it right here I could just re-read what I said as recorded in Hansard of October 1974. If he would look it up he would see what I said then.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—REASON FOR NEGOTIATING FOR RESUMPTION OF NUCLEAR ASSISTANCE AND SAFEGUARDS DEMANDED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question which is directed to the Prime Minister is based on the grave concern of thousands of Canadians that Canada through its export policy is willfully and knowingly contributing to the increasing likelihood of a world nuclear catastrophe. Given the fact that India has already exploded a nuclear device in direct contravention of an earlier agreement with Canada and further that India still refuses to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, what prompted the government to re-open negotiations with India for a resumption of nuclear assistance to that country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the discussions going on with India are precisely to get India to accept the safeguards which we think are essential now that they have exploded an atomic device. We are not re-opening discussions with them. We are pursuing the discussion began with them after that explosion of some one and one-half to two years ago, after which we cut off technical aid to India. We said we would not resume it until we have reached a satisfactory conclusion. It is to that that the discussions are directed.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, given the horrifying implications for disaster that these negotiations present and because of conflicting reports that have emanated from New Delhi as to the agreements reached over the weekend, will the Prime Minister say what understanding was arrived at and also what conditions Canada is demanding that India meet before nuclear assistance is resumed. Have we for instance made it a condition that India sign and ratify the nuclear non-proliferation treaty?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have not read the reports of the discussions and negotiations which were going on in India last week and I believe over the weekend. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will answer when he is back in the House.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister give this House the assurance today that the terms of any accord between Canada and India will be tabled in the House for debate before it is ratified.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is not the parliamentary custom.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

APPROVAL OF PARLIAMENT BEFORE ACTION TO BRING TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister which perhaps is supplementary to the matter raised by the hon. member for Peace River. The Prime Minister is quoted as having said that if it is not possible to secure agreement at a federal-provincial conference to bring the constitution and its amending process fully under Canadian control there will be unilateral action by the federal government. In view of the fact that any proposal to amend the Canadian constitution is a very important matter and clearly within the jurisdiction of parliament as distinct from the government as such, will the Prime Minister undertake that before any action is sought in the United Kingdom on this issue Parliament as a whole will be fully consulted and its full approval sought.

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that undertaking. I would like to make a slight correction to the premise which is based perhaps on an erroneous report. I said we would give consideration to acting unilaterally. I quite agree with the hon. member that if that course has to be taken, it would have to be done of course by resolution of both chambers of parliament.

POSSIBILITY OF NEW AMENDING FORMULA AT TIME CONSTITUTION BROUGHT TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether in any proposal to bring back the constitution from Great Britain by means of a federal unilateral action a new amending formula will be substituted for the present power of the parliament of the United Kingdom in such a manner as to protect and entrench the basic language and civil rights within the provinces and to ensure that no further amendments would be made without at least some reasonable consensus of the provinces on all changes affecting provincial legislative powers.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can assure the hon. member that it would not be the intention of the government to see in Canada a constitution which could be amended unilaterally by the federal government once it is back. I think I should make that quite clear, and I believe that is the essence of the question of the hon. member. But I would go further and say that there is no intention on the part of the government to ask parliament by joint resolution to even contemplate such limited action without further consultation with the provinces.

As I indicated in January of this year, I believe, negotiations had been going on for almost a year with the various provinces in the hope that we would find agreement on a way to amend the constitution and repatriate it. I think that we are now about to reach the conclusion that it is unlikely that we will get unanimous agreement. My next step would be to report to all the provinces on the status of the discussions as we see them now. I would just add what I said in my statement on Friday night, and it seemed to have escaped attention. I said that I did not despair of even Quebec agreeing to that. I even said that I hoped there would be unanimous agreement, and we still hope for it. But at this stage I will contact all premiers and report to them on the status of the negotiations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF ARRANGING FREE DELIVERY OF MILK POWDER PURCHASED BY RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with surplus milk powder in Canada. In view of the fact that several world relief organizations, including Food for the Hungry, have attempted to buy surplus powdered milk and have experienced the usual bureaucratic runaround ending back with CIDA, I wonder if the minister would indicate to the House whether or not the government of Canada would make the same arrangement as did the Netherlands, that is that upon purchase by world relief organizations the milk would be delivered free anywhere in the world.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and inform the minister.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF POLICY ON NUCLEAR SALES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and it goes back to the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. In answer to the last question asked by the hon. lady, the Prime Minister said it was not the custom of the House to report to the House on international agreements before they are signed. Bearing in mind that that is in opposition to the policy announced by his predecessor twice removed, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, may I ask the Prime Minister now, because of the public confusion over who is making the policy on nuclear sales for this government—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Roche: —whether it is a representative of the Prime Minister's office or representatives of the Department of External Affairs, will the Prime Minister make an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to review the decision making process on this subject which is of extreme importance to world safety?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question seems to have many parts. The delegation in India engaged in these negotiations is there of course with the authorization of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They are his appointees and they are acting in complete agreement and in co-operation with the high commissioner in India. As to the other reference, I do not know what my predecessor twice removed did. I was just quoting what has been current practice since I have been in parliament. I will try to establish contact with the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and report to the House.

An hon. Member: How about Ivan Head?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MOZAMBIQUE—CLOSING OF BORDER WITH RHODESIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responding for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Subsequent to the declaration by Mozambique closing the border with Rhodesia, which put the country on a war footing, and following reports of increased shipments of Soviet supplied armaments reaching Mozambique, is the minister able to give any report to the House concerning this immediate threat to world peace?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): We do not have any direct contacts which would enable us to confirm or otherwise these reports. However, we do share the general anxiety about the situation in southern Africa, and I think it reinforces the view we have had that there should be no intervention by outside powers in that part of the world.

Mr. Johnston: Has Canada made any commitment, either individually or with other countries, to aid in compensating Mozambique in any way for losses consequent on the closing of its border with Rhodesia?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member will recall that Canada, like other members of the Commonwealth, had given an undertaking to discuss the situation, and when we have made official contacts with the government of Mozambique we will find out whether there is some way in which we could help which would promote peace and not war.

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL OF LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS TO STEVEN BADGER OF AUSTRALIA—REQUEST FOR REVIEW

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration my question is directed to the jocular Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Steven Badger of Australia has been in Canada and attending school here for two and a half years and that he is by reputation one of the world's finest swimmers and that he has just been refused landed immigrant status in Canada, this refusal coming just after it was too late to qualify for his own Olympic team in Australia and he has now been denied the opportunity to swim either for Canada or for Australia, will the Prime Minister urge a careful review of Mr. Badger's application in order that he may represent us at the Olympics?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware of the situation. I will refer it to the minister for study.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF RAISING BANK INTEREST RATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would he indicate whether he was consulted prior to the Bank of Canada raising the bank rate to an historical high and, if so, did he agree that the move should be made? Would he also advise what impact the raising of the bank rate will have on our mortgage interest rates and on the cost of borrowing for the average Canadian?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. Of course, it would be difficult to make a total estimate in response to the second part.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the national policy of high interest rates, would the minister indicate if he has been in touch with the banking institutions and has he asked that they cushion the impact of this high rate for homeowners and those requiring personal financing in the country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With respect to residential lending policies the hon. member will be familiar with the policies put forward by my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with respect to favourable interest rates for residential accommodation. Of course, one of the purposes of the rate increase is to further control the rate of increase of the money supply, and in that sense it would naturally have an effect on the lending policies of the chartered banks.

● (1440)

RATIONALE FOR LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES AT LOW INTEREST RATES WHILE DOMESTIC INTEREST RATES HIGH

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the surprisingly high interest rate structure in this country, would the Prime Minister indicate the rationale of the government in extending lines of credit of $500 million to Russia, $500 million to Poland and $100 million to Cuba at interest rates of approximately 7 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand that such lines of credit are extended in order to stimulate Canadian external trade and therefore to create employment in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Why just to the communist nations?

FISHERIES

RED FISH—CLOSING OF FISHERY IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—POSSIBLE STUDY OF INTERMINGLING OF OFFSHORE AND GULF STOCK

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). The minister has announced that the Gulf of St. Lawrence will be closed to all vessels fishing for red fish effective noon, March 6, until midnight, April 30. Since this action was taken on the recommendations of the minister's scientists, would he indicate whether a study has been conducted with regard to the intermingling of red fish stocks from our offshore banks with stocks in the gulf? If so, when was this study made, and what is the percentage of intermingling between these two stocks? At the same time would the minister indicate whether there was an impact analysis of the effect of this action on Nova Scotia and Newfoundland?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to have some detailed data on the statistics and research which has been done, but certainly the scientists knew in 1973 that the gulf stock would be depleted and the spawning stock would have been reached by late 1975 and 1976. Their prediction is turning out to be accurate. I will report in more detail to the hon. member.

Mr. Crouse: Since the Spanish pair trawlers and the Faroe Island trawlers are more destructive to our fisheries than to those of any other nation, by throwing back into the sea hundreds of thousands of pounds of red fish, flounder, yellowtail and any other fish caught in their trawls while they are fishing for cod, is this the type of conservation policy the minister is proposing for Canadian fishermen, not allowing them to catch more than 5,000 pounds of red fish per trip, or is this regulation subject to revision when our fishermen start throwing their excess red fish catches back into the sea?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I am afraid I cannot go along with the blanket condemnation of the hon. member. The foreign fleets which are fishing in the gulf are there as part of the phase out agreement. Three out of four will be phased out this year. Twelve of these vessels were boarded by our officials. There was no evidence of a big catch of red fish. They are not fishing for red fish. They do catch some, incidentally. The industry should regulate itself in the gulf, as it has off Nova Scotia, to stop discarding haddock and abide by the regulations which we put into effect with their co-operation and their agreement.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC COAST FERRY SERVICE—POSSIBILITY OF FARE INCREASES EQUALLING SUBSIDY REDUCTION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Because of the importance to the economy of marine ferry service on the east coast and the need for sufficient lead time for the companies involved to be properly organized for the heavy summer season, can the minister say when he will be in a position to tell us what fare rate increases will be permitted and whether these fare rate increases are expected to make up entirely for the severe cut in subsidies which has been made by the Treasury Board, especially with regard to the Northumberland ferry service?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the amount which is hoped to be cut, and which is indicated in the restraint program, is a total of $5 million. This will be spread over the various ferry services in the region. I expect a decision with regard to the specifics to be made quite soon, but some further consultations with the provincial government and with members of parliament are going on at the present time.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED—PROVISION FOR MONTHLY PAYMENTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Could the minister inform the House if the contract for the Lockheed LRPA clearly set out the terms and amounts of the monthly and milestone payments which were to be paid by the Canadian government to Lockheed during the life of the contract?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the contract has not been signed yet, therefore it has not come into effect.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: I am sure that must be the most well known fact in the country, but it has nothing to do with the question I asked the minister. I asked if the contract contained a schedule of monthly and milestone payments. This is the original contract which has been in the minister's possession for several months. Did it not contain a schedule saying when the money was to be paid by Canada to Lockheed?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say it in any other way. Really, I cannot explain more simply what is going on: the contract has not been signed, and therefore is not in force; we cannot therefore talk about a binding contract between the two parties.

AGRICULTURE

FERTILIZER—POSSIBLE DELAY IN DELIVERY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that the government has previously interfered in the marketplace when necessary with respect to the availability of fertilizer to farmers, and in view of some concern by fertilizer suppliers that later in the spring this year there could be a problem with transportation and delivery because of too much having to be delivered at one period of time, what advice does the minister have at the present time for farmers to assure that they will have fertilizer when they need it in the spring?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, our publications have advised farmers to buy their fertilizer early, contrary to that report.

Mr. McKinley: Because it has been reported that the minister has refused to speak to the fertilizer companies, does he not think the present situation might be rectified if he could convince the fertilizer manufacturers and distributors to offer a larger discount to farmers for accepting early deliveries, or is that too simple a situation for the minister's department to figure out?

Mr. Whelan: It would be a frosty Friday when this minister would refuse to speak to them if he was asked. I was not asked to speak this year. I was asked to be present, but I was not asked to be the main speaker. The main speaker this year was Premier Blakeney from Saskatchewan.

ENERGY

OIL—EFFECT OF POSSIBLE TAKEOVER OF ATLANTIC RICHFIELD BY PETRO-CANADA ON SYNCRUDE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the proposed takeover of the Canadian assets of the Atlantic Richfield Corporation of the United States by Petro-Canada. In view of the fact that the main reason for the delay in signing the Syncrude agreement arose from the difficulty of acquiring Atlantic Richfield's permits and leases in the Athabasca oil sands, will the acquisition of Atlantic Richfield's Canadian assets, resolve the difficulties with respect to the Syncrude consortium, and in the event that this proposed takeover is completed, how soon after that does the minister envisage the signing of the Syncrude agreement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of different questions there. Let me try to deal with each of them.

The first point I wish to make is that the question of the leases and the possible take over by Petro-Canada of ARCAN are unrelated events. The second point has to do with the Syncrude agreement itself and when it might be signed. That is going to depend very much on what we are able to negotiate with the province of Alberta. At the present time we have not been able to reach an agreement on a reasonable rate of return on the pipelines and utilities. We have proposed that we should put this issue out to arbitration. I believe the province of Ontario and the private sector companies would support that particular approach, but that is the log jam at the present time.

I must also say that we have not yet concluded, although I am hopeful we will reach, an agreement on the outstanding leases.

POSSIBILITY PETRO-CANADA WILL NEED ADDITIONAL CAPITAL TO FINANCE TAKEOVER OF ATLANTIC RICHFIELD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that only some $10 million has been allocated for Petro-Canada in this fiscal year, in the event that Petro-Canada does acquire the Canadian assets of Atlantic Richfield, what amount of money is going to be made available to the national petroleum corporation for working capital in addition to the purchase price which at the present time is being thought of in terms of some $400 million? Will additional funds be made available to Petro-Canada so that it can operate this company in the event that the purchase is negotiated?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada has retained consultants to advise it on the reasonable value of assets of ARCAN. The major part of these assets are oil and natural gas producing assets. It is by no means certain that ARCAN and Petro-Canada will arrive at a mutually agreed figure for the take-over of those assets. If they do, the financing plan by Petro-Canada for the take-over will have to be submitted to the government. It is possible that a large proportion of those assets will be financed without government assistance.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

ELECTIONS

REASON FOR DELAY IN CALLING BY-ELECTION IN ST. JOHN'S WEST

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the Prime Minister's comments at the end of the year about the need for changes in society, will he assure the House and the Canadian people that he and the government still feel that one of the fundamental rights in our democratic society is this: that a properly accredited electorate in any constituency in Canada is entitled to representation by elected officials in the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dick: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why is it that after Gérard Pelletier, the cabinet minister, resigned to become ambassador in Paris the Prime Minister called a by-election within 60 days, whereas in the case of the vacancy in St. John's West the by-election was not called until the last moment, thus depriving the people of that area representation in the House of Commons for over one year? Will the Prime Minister not announce an earlier date for the by-election?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

BURIAL OF RADIOACTIVE MATERIAL AT EAST BRAINTREE, MANITOBA—REASON FOR CHOICE OF SITE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Some days ago I asked the minister for information concerning the burial site of radioactive material at East Braintree, Manitoba. The burial site was completed under the auspices of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Manitoba Cancer Research Foundation, without the express knowledge of the Atomic Energy Control Board. Has the minister been able to check further? Has he information other than that he sent me in letter form? Will those people who, without permission from the Atomic Energy Control Board, chose the site be questioned on why the site was chosen and why the regulations of the AECB were not followed in the choice of the site?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe satisfactory discussions have taken place between AECB and the provincial government agencies involved.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect, although those discussions might be acceptable to the two bodies concerned, the people of my riding are also deeply concerned. I ask the minister, again, will he make a statement on motions or some other occasion informing the constituents of Provencher that eastern Manitoba is not becoming a burial site for radioactive material?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the hon. member would use the information I provided to him by letter he would be able to assure his constituents, as I will assure them right now, that there is no danger to health.

STUDY OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister tell the House when the five phase study of Fundy Tidal Power recommended over a year ago will commence? Will the minister consider placing these studies under the over-all direction of DREE which has a physical presence in the area and can study and promote a simultaneous, compatible industrial development in the region?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge that work is already under way and is being supported on a 50-50 basis by the federal government and the two provinces concerned, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The federal government has put up $1.5 million, payable over two years.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—SUGGESTION SPENT NUCLEAR FUEL BE RETURNED TO CANADA

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns safeguards affecting India. Is it, or will it be, a condition of any agreement that spent fuel shall be returned to Canada for reprocessing, to ensure that Canadian nuclear material will not be used to produce further nuclear explosions in India and to ensure environmentally sound standards of disposal and storage of nuclear wastes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that precisely, is one of the questions being discussed. As I indicated earlier, I have not received the report.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ADVICE OF MINISTER ON DISPOSAL OF NUCLEAR WASTE RETURNED FROM REACTOR SOLD ABROAD

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment? As the minister stated that he advised the government regarding the return and reprocessing of nuclear waste from reactors sold abroad, has the minister advised the government on the environmental aspects of nuclear waste disposal and storage, as applied to agreements currently being discussed with India?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that question ought to be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

AGRICULTURE

DESTRUCTION OF FRUIT TREES IN ONTARIO BY ICE STORM—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the recent damage experienced by the tender fruit industry, particularly in the counties of Kent, Elgin and Norfolk, following the ice storm last week. As early estimates indicate that at least 50 per cent of the trees have been destroyed, what measures has the minister taken to assist the industry, following that disaster?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the matter was brought to my attention by the president of the Canadian federation just this weekend. The usual procedure is to assess the damage, which is very great, especially to cherry and peach trees, and report to the province. If the province sees fit and makes further representations to the federal government, we will certainly give the matter consideration.

COMMUNICATION

ACTION TO MAKE CABLEVISION AVAILABLE TO RESIDENTS OF DALHOUSIE, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications and arises from delays in bringing cable television to the residents of Dalhousie. What action might the minister take to have private television people from CKCW at Moncton and Saint John, New Brunswick, complete the installation of equipment and bring in 100 per cent CBC programming to northern New Brunswick?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the matter of various people's access to CBC programs is the responsibility of the Secretary of State; I therefore feel that the question should be addressed to him. But with regard to possible applications for cable service in that area, I imagine the CRTC will, eventually, hold hearings in the course of studying such applications.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

JUSTIFICATION FOR EXPENDITURES OF ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. As the budget for the Anti-Inflation Board administrator is for $298,000 for three months, almost $100,000 a month, and as the administrator has dealt with only one request made by the Anti-Inflation Board, how does the minister justify this large expenditure?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that when the hon. member studies the supplementary estimates he will see that the expenditures were considerably less than $100,000. We should commend the administrator for the manner in which he is operating his office. His funding will be substantially less than $100,000 a month.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. When will an announcement be made regarding a new policy for car rental locations at Canadian airports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, discussions with the interested participants in the industry are going well. I plan to formulate new proposals and conclusions on the basis of those discussions but cannot give the hon. member a date.

HEALTH

LOSS OF RESEARCH SCIENTISTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and relates to funding for medical research. On March 6, 1976, the Stratford Beacon Herald, in an article headlined "Canada losing medical brain through lack of federal fund" reported the loss of medical research scientists to the United States, among whom is a researcher at the University of Toronto, Dr. Irving Fox. The physician in chief at the Toronto General Hospital and chairman of the university's department of medicine, Dr. Charles Hollenberg, was commenting on the loss of Dr. Irving Fox, an arthritis researcher, to the United States, because of lack of equipment and funding in Canada. Is the minister concerned about Dr. Hollenberg's comment, and the fact that people are leaving Canada because of the attraction of greater funds and better equipment elsewhere?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. Still, there is always a flow of researchers between Canada and the United States.

AGRICULTURE

REASON FOR SURPLUS OF MILK PRODUCTS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the build up of milk products in Canada, the dairy industry lending itself to supply-management, can the minister tell the House what went wrong in the decision-making process of the Canadian Dairy Commission, or is the present situation beyond the control of that federal authority?

● (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that usually has to be considered is the excellent weather conditions, and the fact we are dealing with a biological entity called a cow. They respond to conditions. Last year they over-responded. In addition, world conditions compounded the situation with 1,600,000 tons of surplus skim milk powder. This took away some of the market from Canadian producers. It again points out the efficiency of Canadian dairy producers.

TABLING OF LETTER FROM JUSTICE MACKAY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, last week I tabled a letter I had sent to the Prime Minister; today I should like to complete the exchange of correspondence by tabling the other letter I received from Justice Kenneth Mackay.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Standing Orders permit the tabling of documents that relate to the administrative competence of the minister. It is evident that this document is sought by the House but it is not strictly within the minister's departmental competence. I wonder, therefore, if the House gives consent so that the document might be tabled.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in my questioning earlier today, I think I inadvertently suggested that the Minister of Public Works and the former minister of finance confirmed that they had conversations with the judge in the case. Of course, what they confirmed was conversations with their colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I simply want the record to be clear as I was in error in my original remark.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs refused to answer questions relating to his alleged requests of one of his colleagues and one of his former colleagues to intervene on his behalf with a judge dealing with contempt of court proceedings. He claimed, as I understood it, the privilege of not answering to the high court of parliament because the contempt of court proceedings were still before the courts.

My point of order is that this is a spurious and unjustifiable claim. It is true that if a criminal proceeding is pending and may be prejudicially affected by a discussion in parliament, that discussion may well be out of order. However, proceeding by way of contempt of court is not a criminal proceeding. It is a civil proceeding. Moreover, it arises out of statements made by the minister at an earlier date. Discussion in parliament of the later attempt to secure intervention does not in any way affect the position of the appellate courts in the previous issue. Therefore, the minister has refused to answer to this parliament questions that are totally relevant, by claiming a privilege that is non-existent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood raises a point of order. Of course, the hon. member understands there is no obligation upon any minister to answer any question. Whatever reason the minister may give for refusing to answer may be his reason. The fact is the minister may be giving an explanation. He does not have to lean upon any kind of point of order or privilege not to answer a question. He is, in fact, under no obligation to answer the question. While I take the hon. member's representation as a sincere one, I cannot find that it is an established or well taken point of order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of that comment. Hon. members should appreciate that the long-standing rule in relation to comments on cases before the courts applies to both criminal and civil cases.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: It leads to a general rule of restraint that should lead members of parliament not to engage in debate here when a matter is before the courts in any way which can lead to any implication of impact or effect upon it. That rule is broader. I do not want to go further than that. While there are double grounds for the minister's position, it should be known there is that restraint that is appropriate in this House.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the minister has seen fit to interject his opinion I presume as a former minister of justice. There is a responsibility on every member of parliament not to become involved in discussions in this House in so far as something that is before the courts is concerned. There is also a very heavy obligation on the part of every member of this House not to interfere with any judge who is hearing any case involving a person who happens to be a member of this House, or any other individual in this nation, when the judge is in a position to make a decision in that instance. That has been going on, and it is a well-known fact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: It is time the people of this nation were aware of that. Members of parliament should not interfere with judges.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the spurious argument that the minister just made was sticking in my throat and I could not stand it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I wish to state, further, that in the 18 years I have been a member of this House I have never had an occasion where I felt justified in telephoning any judge in any part of this country, in any court, about any constituent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: That goes for all the rest of us on this side.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Notwithstanding the considerable contributions from both sides of the House in addition to the point originally raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, although it is a very interesting and important matter for discussion and debate with regard to the standard of conduct respecting these things, the fact is it does not constitute any reference to the privileges of members of this House. It does not constitute a point of order. Rather than get into a debate on this matter, which is clearly not permitted under our rules, the subject having been equally contributed to on both sides we will consider the matter closed.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I make reference to the point made by the Minister of Transport? At a meeting of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections some months ago we had the benefit of advice from parliamentary counsel who looked into all the precedents and made it absolutely clear that criminal and civil proceedings were not to be lumped together. In civil proceedings there is no plea of privilege or sub judice that can be raised unless the matter is exactly an issue before the courts and unless it is directed to influencing that decision. I suggest to the minister that before he gets up to volunteer advice he should find out the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL TO WASHINGTON, D.C.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to travel to Washington, D.C., from March 10, 1976, to March 12, 1976, in relation to the committee's order of reference in connection with international development and that the necessary support staff do accompany them.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 21(2), this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day. I understand there is some disposition on the part of the members of the House to dispose of the matter without debate. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I did not get the opportunity to bring up a vital question during the question period, and I wonder if this might be the appropriate time to express the great concern which has been felt in connection with the seal hunt which is due to take place in a few days. Information has become available that the green dye to be used may be harmful to the animals, and I should like to ask the minister whether he would agree to make a statement with regard to action which might be taken in the light of this evidence. In view of the fact that it could be harmful to the lives of people, and in view of the fact that instructions are being issued and should be gazetted tomorrow, perhaps the House might be made aware of them by the minister.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has raised a point of order. The hon. Minister of State responsible for fisheries.

I intended to address myself to this issue before the fisheries committee on Thursday morning, I believe. I am certainly ready to indicate to the hon. member what the order in council contains.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the first opportunity might be taken to deal with this matter. It might present itself during the question period tomorrow, or in the form of a statement by the minister tomorrow.

PANARCTIC OIL—PURCHASING OF OIL TANKERS

Question No. 3,304—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the Minister of Finance aware of the statements in the press attributed to the President of Panarctic Oil during the week of October 20 to 24, 1975 indicating the possibility that Panarctic Oil will purchase three Scandinavian crude oil tankers for transport of Arctic oil to market should that be feasible?

2. Is the Minister aware of the extent of participation in Panarctic Oil by the government and its agents and, if so, to what extent is this participation?

3. Has the Minister examined the implications of going outside Canada for such vessels in terms of the long-term viability and health of the Canadian ship-building industry and trade balance and (a) if so, what conclusions have been reached (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, citation 171(x).

GRAINS DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Question No. 3,901—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. What were the grain demurrage charges for the period October 1974 to October 1975?

2. For the same period, what were the charges for (a) West Coast ports (b) Great Lakes ports?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In so far as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned: 1.

Demurrage paid by the Canadian Wheat Board in the period October, 1974 to October, 1975 totalled $14,234,858.47.

2. (a) West Coast ports, $13,488,056.79; (b) Eastern ports, $746,801.68. Eastern ports include the St. Lawrence and maritime ports. No demurrage is claimable with respect to the Great Lake ports.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—PROJECT FINANCING IN CONSTITUENCY OF CHAMPLAIN

Question No. 3,948—Mr. Matte:

1. Since its inception, has the Department of Transport financed any projects in the Constituency of Champlain and, if so, how many?

2. In each case, what was the (a) name of the project (b) amount granted (c) year the project began (d) year the project was completed?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Records of projects financed by Transport Canada since its inception are not complete. To provide an accurate reply for the years for which records are available would entail a lengthy and costly examination of the accounts of every administration. However, available records show that since fiscal year 1966/67 this department has not financed any project in excess of $50,000 in the constituency of Champlain.

2. Not applicable.

FACILITIES AT HARMON AIRPORT, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 3,973—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has the Department of Transport made or requested a physical inventory of the facilities available at the Harmon Airport in Stephenville, Newfoundland, particularly as it concerns runways and underground facilities for fuel storage or its strategic location as it relates to international landing requirements and (a) if so, what were the findings (b) if not, has any consideration been given to assessing the physical facilities available at little or no cost to Canada?

2. Is DOT aware of the strategic location of the Harmon Airport and the physical facilities available in its determination of declaring capacity available to international or alternate stopovers?

3. What is the position of the Stephenville Airport in provision by DOT of international flight alternatives to Canada?

4. In regard to the government's effort to practice restraint in spending under DOT is any consideration being given to utilize the available facilities left to deteriorate at the Harmon Airport in Stephenville and, if not, for what reason?

5. What is Canada's position as it relates to giving landing rights to international airlines to utilize the availability of Harmon base?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Transport Canada maintains a complete physical inventory of facilities which exist at Stephenville airport. When the airport was an active airbase, two runways were in service. However, present requirements are satisfied with one 10,000 foot runway, thus the other runway is not maintained. Transport Canada has underground fuel storage tanks at Stephenville airport with a capacity of one million gallons which are not used. Private fuel companies own fuel tanks at the airport which have a capacity of 29,700 gallons and are in use.

2, 3 and 5. Stephenville airport is strategically located in relation to some Trans-Atlantic air routes and is currently being used as an alternate to Gander for those aircraft engaged in the Trans Oceanic Plane Stop Program (TOPS). Apart from the TOPS program, air carriers engaged in international operations have not identified the need for Stephenville as a regular or alternate international airport.

4. At the time that the United States Air Force made the decision to close the base, Transport Canada identified those facilities which were required for civil operations. All other facilities and buildings in this area, which were formerly the property of U.S.A.F., were brought under the administration of the Harmon Corporation. Transport Canada does not see any further requirement for the use of facilities or buildings in excess of those presently in use.

TAX WRITE-OFF FOR PURCHASE OF SMALL TOOLS

Question No. 4,033—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Will the government give consideration to increasing up to $500 the $100 tax write-off for purchase of small tools as suggested at the Western Agricultural Conference held in Regina in January 1976?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): At present tools costing less than $100 are eligible for inclusion in Class 12 of the capital cost allowance regulations to the Income Tax Act which provides for an annual write-off of 100 per cent. In addition, under Part XVII of the regulations, dealing with capital cost allowance for taxpayers with income from farming and fishing, the same 100 per cent write-off is provided for tools acquired before 1972 and costing less than $100. The effect of these provisions is to allow a full deduction for tax purposes of the capital cost of such tools in the year of purchase. The $100 limit referred to above has been in effect since it was increased to this amount from $50 in 1961. Suggestions that this limit again be raised are presently under consideration.

LIFEBOAT CG 108—SEARCH ACTION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 4,071—Mr. Marshall:

What action was taken by Lifeboat Base CG 108 in Newfoundland in the search for two seal hunters, Mr. Ronald Boyd and Mr. Eric Stride who were lost out of Moreton's Harbour, Newfoundland?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Canadian Coast Guard Lifeboat 108, based at Twillingate, Newfoundland, is a 44 foot boat and is not capable of operating in ice of more than a few inches in thickness. The vessel was laid up on January 21, 1976 because of severe ice conditions in her area of operation and a Notice to Mariners was issued to inform all concerned. Because of her laid up condition, Coast Guard 108 was not called upon to search for the two seal hunters out of Moreton's Harbour. The Canadian Coast Guard icebreaker Sir Humphrey Gilbert and Canadian Armed Forces aircraft carried out the search assisted, during favourable weather conditions, by a small vessel from the local area.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): With regard to Winter Capital Projects Fund loans in the constituency of Roberval the following details applied as of February 17, 1976:

PRICE AND WAGE INCREASES

Question No. 4,123—Mr. Robinson:

Is any consideration being given by the government to gearing our price structure and wage increases to the increase in the gross national product?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): No. A desirable price structure is one which adequately reflects the relative supplies and demands for the various goods and services in the economy. Wage increases should reflect, among other things, the growth in labour productivity. These economic aims would not be achieved by gearing the price structure and wage increases to the increase in gross national product.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to commence the debate today on this major legislative initiative of the government's peace and security program. In doing so, I wish to express my appreciation to the parties opposite for their co-operation through their House leaders and official spokesmen in having the bill brought forward two weeks after its introduction.

The criminal justice system is both a powerful and a delicate instrument for achieving justice and order. In adjusting the policies underlying it we have exercised great care to guard the continued proper balance between the system's two imperatives: the adequate protection of the safety and security of the law-abiding, and the legal rights and dignity of those charged with offences. When the community shares genuine and serious concerns about the adequacy of protection against those who pose a real and present threat to peace of mind and security of person, we have a duty to take firm and effective measures in response to these real concerns. But the responses must also be measured, not abrogating individual rights or other real safeguards. The measures I shall outline demonstrate a consciousness of the importance of this balance.

No role which falls to me as Minister of Justice is more important than that which bears upon the nature, character and quality of criminal justice throughout Canada. In performing this role, I see three paramount responsibilities which must guide me in formulating, recommending and implementing criminal justice policies. First, I must remain ever-conscious of a number of fundamental values recognized in our legal system upon which our society, as a civilized one, rests and must continue to rest. These bear repeating from time to time. They are: the dignity and worth of the human person; the right of an individual to the enjoyment of life, liberty, security and property; the full protection of the law; the rule of law and due process of law; the independence of the judiciary; the avoidance of cruel and unusual punishment; the protection of the rights of an accused or convicted person; the moral values of our society; the peace and security of the community.

None is, or can be, an absolute. They form a collectivity and in a given situation some values will merit greater weight than others. This is essential to the maintenance of a stable and viable society. The important thing is to ensure that none is ever undermined or discarded. None has been so treated in the peace and security measures.

Second, I must be sure that criminal justice policies are properly responsive to real public concerns. While basic values remain secure, society changes. New or different patterns of anti-social conduct emerge and old ones become more serious. Their related threats to the law-abiding give rise to deep concerns among the citizens about their continued security and tranquillity. I, as Minister of Justice, we as a government and as members of parliament have a responsibility to be fully aware of these problems and concerns. We must be prepared to bring forth and debate policies which are properly responsive to them. I say "properly" because criminal justice policies establish the moral tone of our society and must therefore be measured and reasoned responses.

Today, few would dispute that many people are deeply and genuinely concerned about the increasing incidence of criminal violence, the growing penetration of organized criminals in our midst, the number of accused or convicted offenders on the streets committing further crimes, and the difficulties the justice system is experiencing in coping with criminal activity.

● (1520)

Third, Mr. Speaker, in bringing forth criminal justice policies it is incumbent upon me, as Minister of Justice, to ensure that they will be effective. The system must be equipped with the tools and means necessary to achieve the goals.

Specifically, the community, the police, the prosecutors, the courts and the correction services must have the capabilities to prevent, detect, apprehend, prosecute, incarcerate, control and rehabilitate the offenders. The sanctions must be strong enough to punish and deter. The most dangerous offenders must be effectively separated from society, for its protection.

All citizens must be given a real sense of personal responsibility in their own conduct, for ensuring their own safety and security. Citizens cannot assume that the peace of their community is none of their business, that it is something they can just push off on to the police and the politicians, and that their only contribution is to complain when things go wrong. In doing all of these things, it remains that the policies must build in proper safeguards to secure the rights of the individual, which has been the hallmark of the criminal justice system in Anglo-American jurisprudence.

The measures before the House, to which I will now turn, are designed to provide the tools and means to achieve these goals. The central objective of Bill C-83, the government's peace and security program, can be simply stated. It is to counter rising violence in our society without resort to violence itself in response, this to the end that law-abiding citizens will know a greater degree of security and safety while still preserving that critical balance in the scales of justice. This bill contains a number of important measures directed to that objective which will adapt our criminal justice system to respond in a more effective yet just way to the rising incidence of crime in Canada, particularly that of a violent or organized nature.

In addition to these legislative measures being prepared, there is a series of important administrative measures that have been announced and described by my colleague the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and which will be debated further by him in this House, relating to significant improvements in the police, parole and penitentiary services and facilities.

There is also, of course, a second legislative measure, Bill C-84, which is not yet under debate, dealing with the penalties for murder. Since it will be the subject of subsequent debate in this chamber, I shall not, of course, debate it this afternoon but confine myself to simply noting that fact. That bill is but one of several measures in the program directed toward imposing strong and effective, but non-violent, penalties and controls for those who engage in serious acts of personal violence, including the ultimate violence of murder.

With regard to the new provisions and principles of Bill C-83, I should like, if I may, to discuss those provisions relating to gun control. The growing number of crimes, deaths and accidents involving the use of firearms is a very proper concern of citizens, one fully shared by the government and one that I trust this House will share. Every year sees a further increase in gun-related murders, robberies, suicides and accidents in Canada. In 1974, nearly 1,500 persons died of gunshot wounds, an increase of 30 per cent over the 1970 number. Firearms were used in one-half of Canada's murders and in at least one-third of the 15,000 robberies. They also account for over one-third of the annual suicides and many accidental deaths. No count is known of the number of non-fatal accidents caused by firearms.

These are clearly statistics that call for measures that will lead to a curtailment of the incidence of gun-related violence both of a criminal and non-criminal nature, while at the same time avoiding undue interference with legitimate ownership and use of common firearms. The government's policy on the control of firearms as set out in this bill is designed to achieve this goal through a series of reasoned legislative and administrative measures based upon the following principles: increased criminal liability for misuse of weapons: increased standards of care for ownership and use of weapons; decreased availability of firearms and ammunition; screening for fitness to possess and use firearms; increased police powers to seize weapons in dangerous situations; increased awareness of the dangers of firearms abuse. The measures are of a comprehensive nature, directed both to those who would use guns for criminal purposes and to others who in using them for legitimate ends must learn to do so with greater respect and care.

For those who use firearms as tools of their criminal trade, no registration or licensing system will effectively curb continued access to and use of weapons. For such criminals the real sanction is and must be denunciatory sentences. To this end, the maximum penalties for unlawful possession or use of ordinary as well as restricted and prohibited weapons are being substantially increased. In addition, any person henceforth convicted of using an offensive weapon while committing an indictable offence will receive a prison term above and beyond that for the indictable offence itself. That is to say, there will be a mandatory minimum sentence in those cases.

For citizens who wish to own or use common firearms for legitimate purposes, a number of control systems were considered closely by the government: total prohibition, firearms' depositories, gun registration and possessor licensing. They were the subject of a full study carried out by Dean Friedland for the government during 1975. Of these, the one that is the only balanced and reasonable approach to the problem of controlling misuse of firearms is a system of licensing persons who possess guns. This system places primary emphasis on the proposition that no person should be entitled to possess or use a firearm unless he can establish his fitness and responsibility to do so. In other words, ownership and use of firearms should not be a right, but a privilege.

The system of licensing will be a simple and flexible yet effective system, with necessary safeguards to ensure that no one will be unfairly deprived of the privilege to secure a licence for legitimate purposes. Here, Mr. Speaker, I refer particularly to the sports hunter, the target shooter and, indeed, the northern family for whom hunting is a way and a means of life. I am also satisfied that the system reflects the belief shared by the wildlife groups that there is an important need for responsibility in the ownership and use of guns. As we know, there are some one million hunters who readily accept the requirement of a hunting licence in order to use their guns, leaving, however, some two million gun owners unlicensed.

It is important to screen out those who are unfit to possess firearms. It is also important that those with firearms keep and use those weapons in a responsible manner. To ensure this, careless handling and storage of firearms will become subject to criminal sanctions. I will also be urging the provincial attorneys general to provide in their laws a stricter civil liability for firearms' misuse.

There are a number of other important measures contained in this bill which form part of the government's initiative to develop an effective means to curb the growth of gun-related violence in Canada. The government does not pretend for a moment that any or all of these measures together will eliminate the tragic and ruthless gun incidents that now occur. What we believe it will do, through the combination of sanctions, screening and reduced access, is reduce the occurrence of such incidents. With some 1,500 people, in the last year for which we have figures, having died of gunshot wounds of one sort or another, it is incumbent upon me, upon the government and indeed upon this parliament to deal with that situation.

Turning to another aspect of the bill, it hardly needs saying in this discussion that effective apprehension, prosecution and punishment of criminals of whatever kind relies very heavily upon the ability of the police to investigate and detect suspected criminal activities in a timely and efficient manner. This ability becomes critically important where the criminal activities are of a highly complex and sophisticated character. They take place in a well organized and geographically dispersed fashion and the known criminals of the syndicate are often but minor or bit players. The real bosses remain remote, and to all outward appearances respectable citizens.

Nor are the criminal activities of the organized operation gentle in nature. They involve, as we well know from the gangland slayings in Montreal and Vancouver, some of the most violent forms of crime. Even where non-violent, the crimes are of the most insidious nature: loan sharking, extortion, drug trafficking, and prostitution rings. One has but to read the reports of the Organized Crime Commission of Quebec and of the Co-ordinated Law Enforcement Unit of British Columbia to appreciate the scope and character of organized criminal endeavours and activity.

The government share the concern of the public that these criminal business enterprises must be combated and the crime bosses exposed and punished. Because they operate underground, shrouded in secrecy, the law enforcement agencies must be equipped to enable them to carry out their task if the public is to be adequately protected against the threats and incursions of organized criminals.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I now turn to the amendments proposed to be made to the protection of privacy legislation, amendments that have been the subject of considerable controversy in certain quarters since the introduction of this bill. These measures will come under close scrutiny before the standing committee and it is not my intention to discuss the details of the proposed amendments at this time. I do wish, however, to set forth my reasons for introducing these important modifications in the privacy legislation and, at the same time, attempt to dispel certain misapprehensions by explaining the true nature and intent of the proposed changes.

First let me say that the amendments we propose in Bill C-83 do not derogate from the fundamental principle recognized by parliament in 1974 in the Protection of Privacy Act: that the individual has a right to privacy in respect of his private and lawful communications with others. That was a fundamental provision of the earlier bill and remains a fundamental provision. Consistent with that principle, parliament prohibited absolutely any unauthorized interception of a private communication by anyone. It also established a rigorous procedure by which the police could, with judicial permission, conduct electronic surveillance for justifiable law enforcement purposes.

The real safeguards provided by parliament were the judicial scrutiny of police requests for authorizations, the criminal sanctions of five years imprisonment for unauthorized interceptions, and the civil recourses including those against the Crown. This was new legislation at that time, breaking new ground. It was stated by the government in 1974 that the effectiveness of the legislation would be closely monitored and, indeed, the legislation provided for such monitoring and reporting.

We have reports from the Solicitor General and from the provincial attorneys general, as well as a comprehensive report prepared in 1975 representing the views of the provincial attorneys general, major police forces and telephone companies as well as members of the federal Department of Justice and the Department of the Solicitor General. It is clearly evident from these reports that there are several provisions in the 1974 legislation that are seriously hampering the police and prosecutors in effective detection and prosecution of major criminal activities. I would be remiss in my obligations as Attorney General of Canada if I did not put these concerns before this House.

If we are truly determined to combat crime in an effective manner, our responsible law enforcement authorities must be provided with the proper means to accomplish that task. It was not, in my view, parliament's intention in 1974 to frustrate or impede the ability of the authorities to uncover and to prosecute crimes. Nor is it now the government's intention in the proposed amendments to sweep aside, as some would suggest, the protection of private conversations or the safeguards for ensuring them. None of the amendments does that. The criminal sanctions remain. The civil recourses remain. Most important, the judicial supervision of authorizations remains. To obtain an authorization, the police must bring before a judge concrete evidence supported by affidavits showing that there is ample reason to believe an offence has been or is about to be committed. The judge must be satisfied that an authorization would be in the best interests of justice and that no other means of investigation is practicable. This is no simple procedure, Mr. Speaker.

Those who criticize our proposals as ones that will sanction the misuse of electronic surveillance are, I think, ignoring the reality of these safeguards. They would appear to be showing lack of faith in the integrity of our police forces and to be raising doubts about the ability of our judges to examine the merits of a request for an authorization. I do not share this doubt or lack of faith. Consequently, I do not fear that repeal of the notification provision or the change respecting the admissibility of derivative evidence will open the floodgates of illegal wiretapping.

On the other hand, I am satisfied that the existing law on these two points may well be impeding and will continue to impede effective police investigation of criminal activities, especially those of an organized and sophisticated nature. It is equally allowing known criminals to elude justice despite the weight of the evidence.

On the question of notification, the present rule requiring written notice to be given within 90 days after the surveillance of a person has terminated seriously inhibits the use of electronic surveillance, especially of organized crime. The notice alerts the target before the complex investigation can be successfully completed. I would note, for hon. members, that electronic surveillance is the only technique of criminal investigation in which there is a requirement for the authorities to advise a suspect that he is under investigation.

With respect to the derivative evidence rule, it is resulting in serious and unjustified delays in criminal trials. It is also allowing known criminals to elude conviction by having real evidence of a crime, derived as a result of an invalid authorization, excluded from the trial. There is some justification for excluding an illegally intercepted communication itself. I can see none for the exclusion of real evidence derived from such an interception where such evidence is both relevant and persuasive as to the commission of an offence.

The "fruit of the poisoned tree" doctrine of United States jurisprudence is not part of the common law of Canada, and is criticized even in that country. I think the present provision in the privacy legislation which incorporates it should be removed. As Wigmore, the great American authority on evidence, has noted, the exclusionary rule makes justice inefficient and coddles criminals by serving neither to protect potential victims nor to punish the offending officer. Rather, it punishes society by the release of criminals in our midst.

Mr. Fairweather: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: I am just quoting Wigmore, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: What about the Law Reform Commission?

Mr. Basford: The Law Reform Commission did not, in its model, comment on evidence. The rules are in the present privacy act, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: You have repudiated it.

Mr. Basford: It is to overcome these kinds of problems that we are proposing several important amendments to the privacy legislation. These amendments, I should note in conclusion, have received the full support of the provincial attorneys general, not all of whom, hon. members will be aware, are members of my political persuasion.

● (1540)

The proposed amendments to the protection of privacy legislation will go some distance to assist the police in their ordinary investigation of criminal activities. However, the work and results of the Quebec Organized Crime Commission have demonstrated the importance of and the need for investigative machinery beyond the traditional operations of the police if we are successfully to uproot widespread organized crime in Canada.

First, such crime networks can and do extend their tentacles beyond a particular province. Second, potential witnesses to such criminal activities are most reluctant to co-operate with the authorities on the usual voluntary basis because they live in terror of the consequences of such co-operation. Third, as the Quebec Organized Crime Commission has shown, or as reading of the law enforcement reports of British Columbia will show, there is real value in developing an increased public awareness of the existence and insidious nature of organized crime. The public spotlight is frequently the weapon most feared by crime bosses.

Last year, as hon. members know, the legal validity of the Quebec Organized Crime Commission was challenged in the courts, it being argued that such bodies may be legally established only under federal criminal law. This question is still before the Supreme Court of Canada. Beyond this, it was demonstrated during hearings of the Quebec commission that it is essential for any such commission to have power to reach witnesses and documents in other provinces. Finally, if this special machinery is to be established, it is imperative to ensure that it operates in a manner that secures real and uniform legal safeguards for the rights of persons being questioned or investigated.

For these reasons, the bill includes amendments to the Criminal Code to authorize a province to establish a special crime inquiry commission as necessary, with both effective powers and proper legal safeguards. It provides for common powers and safeguards throughout the country. The legislation also is flexible in leaving to each provincial attorney general the ability to determine the particular approach to take in investigating criminal activities with a formal, full-scale inquiry or with a less formal examination of the matters. Both these measures, I am satisfied, are consonant with the four principles that I outlined at the outset of this speech.

Measures Against Crime

Turning to another aspect of Bill C-83, the government shares the public's very proper concern for greater protection against offenders who perpetrate acts of serious personal violence. This bill contains provisions to enable the courts to order an indeterminate separation from society for criminals whose propensity to violent conduct constitutes a serious and continuing physical threat to other people. Both the report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections, the Ouimet report of 1969, and the Senate report "Parole in Canada", the Goldenberg report of 1974, recommended that the habitual criminal and dangerous sexual offender provisions of the Criminal Code be replaced by new "dangerous offender" legislation.

The Ouimet report criticized the habitual offender provisions on the grounds that almost 40 per cent of those sentenced to preventive detention had never been convicted of a serious offence against the person. The provisions had been applied to a substantial number of persistent offenders who were perhaps a "grave social nuisance" but who did not constitute a serious threat to personal safety. Those offenders who indeed were dangerous were often excluded from the application of the legislation because of the requirement of three previous convictions for serious indictable offences. The same report also noted that a dangerous sexual offender is only one class of dangerous offender, and concluded that it would be preferable to enact legislation that would encompass dangerous offenders generally. In this way, account would be taken of the violent nature of the crime and not simply its statutory classification.

The provisions of Bill C-83 mirror the remarks of those who reported. This bill, therefore, makes provision whereby a person who is convicted of what is defined as "a serious personal injury offence"—a crime of personal violence carrying a sentence of ten years or more, and including certain sexual offences—may, under appropriate circumstances, be found by the court to be a "dangerous offender" and consequently subject to an indefinite sentence of incarceration. Because of the gravity of this type of sentencing mechanism, the government has been careful to surround the provisions with a number of safeguards for the offender.

The application for a sentence of indeterminate detention may be made by the crown attorney only with the consent of the provincial attorney general. The offender can call any relevant evidence, including that of a psychiatrist, psychologist or criminologist. The court may seek additional evidence by remanding the offender for medical observation for a limited period. The indeterminate sentence must be reviewed within three years of the sentence, and every two years thereafter, by the National Parole Board.

These safeguards reflect my concern to strike the kind of balance I referred to earlier in my remarks. They weigh the protection that must be provided to law-abiding citizens against the protection of the rights of even the most dangerous among us. In addition to these safeguards, the Solicitor General has indicated our concern for developing more adequate treatment facilities in which to place persons found to be dangerous offenders.

I am satisfied that indeterminate sentencing should no longer be used against criminals who do not pose a continuing and serious threat to the life, safety and well-being of others. This type of sentencing, however, is a necessary mechanism to protect society against dangerous criminals where it is virtually impossible, at the point of sentencing, for a judge to determine the appropriate length of sentence to be imposed. The advantage of the indeterminate sentence lies in the fact that it postpones the decision on a proper release date to the point where the authorities can more accurately judge the readiness of the dangerous offender to resume a normal life in the community without constituting a continuing threat to others' safety and well-being.

One of the most serious concerns people have about threats to their personal security relates to the number of persons accused of violent crimes or imprisoned for such offences who a short time afterwards are out on the streets and often committing further crimes. To this concern the government is responding now. Bill C-71, which has already been passed by this House, contains provisions which, until they have been proven guilty, make it more difficult for certain types of accused persons to obtain release on bail pending trial.

In addition, the Solicitor General has announced a series of administrative measures respecting the containment of prisoners who constitute a continuing threat to society and the supervision of inmates released during their sentence. For example, he has indicated prison construction measures that involve phasing out some institutions and replacing them with smaller facilities better suited to controlling specific groups of inmates. These will be particularly important in ensuring proper custody for long-term inmates. Regional custodial centres will be constructed both for secure custody and for the treatment of offenders. As another example, in the case of offenders convicted of offences involving violence who have a history of violent behaviour, they will now not be eligible for parole consideration until they have served one-half of their sentence, or seven years, whichever is the lesser. At present, they are eligible after one-third of the sentence is served.

On the legislative side, Bill C-83 increases the penalty for escape or attempted escape from prison from five to ten years. It also repeals the right to statutory remission of sentence, thus eliminating any automatic shortening of the time an inmate must serve in prison. Instead, inmates must earn all remission. The fact that all remission must be earned, that none will be automatic, that it will be subject to forfeiture for misconduct and cannot be restored, will place a greater onus on the inmate to earn, by good behaviour and participation in prison programs, the earliest release date possible. This should promote better conditions within institutions.

The National Parole Board will be increased from 19 members to 26, and provision is made for the establishment of provincial boards of parole for those provinces which wish to do so. This will allow for fuller consideration of each case in the parole decision-making process and make the system generally more effective. With respect to temporary absences without escort, the period to be served before such privilege may be granted will be lengthened and the authority to grant leave will be transferred from the penitentiary officials to the Parole Board.

These measures will, we believe, go a considerable way toward ensuring that those inmates whose presence in the community constitutes a threat to citizens' security will in future be more securely confined. Release will occur only at such time and in such circumstances as best serve the need for protection of the community.

In conclusion, I have attempted to outline in a rather general way the policies, and the principal measures designed to implement them, provided for in Bill C-83 and to explain how I believe they represent a measured and reasoned approach to dealing with a number of basic problems apparent in our criminal justice system. In the ensuing debate and committee consideration many differing views and proposals will be advanced on the measures. I would like to assure hon. members—I think they know me well enough to know, from my record in the House, that such is true—that I will be, of course, open to all constructive criticism and proposals for further improvements both from them and from members of the public.

I would only like to add that the formulation and implementation of criminal justice policies is very much an ongoing process and is continuous, and the measures set forth in this legislation reflect but one part of the continuum. It is also a process that to be fully effective requires close and continuing consultation and collaboration with the provinces and their attorneys general. On the present measures there has been, and will continue to be, such co-operation and this will, of course, continue to be my policy in future initiatives.

There are many things yet to be done to bring about further improvements in the policies and the system. Evidence of this exists, among other places, in the many proposals for reform that are emanating from the Law Reform Commission. We have now received from the commission its first two final reports, one on the laws of evidence and the other on principles of sentencing, and look forward to a number of others in the months ahead. I will shortly be discussing with the provincial attorneys general the problems of the present pretrial procedures in criminal cases and have requested the Law Reform Commission to bring forth proposals for consideration of this matter on a priority basis.

We are now examining closely their reports on a code of evidence and on disposition and sentencing with a view to reaching early decisions, after consultations with the provincial ministers, on which of their recommendations can be incorporated, at the federal level, readily into our criminal justice policies to improve the quality and operation of the criminal justice system. Some of the recommendations in the report on sentencing are aimed at the most basic considerations of all: how to resolve conflicts without resort to the criminal justice system; how to prevent people getting enmeshed in the system in the first place or, once involved, how the system can be used in a restorative and reparative way.

I am also particularly concerned about the system as it relates to our native population. My department is developing a number of projects and measures, in concert with the provinces, designed to adapt the system to their particular needs and concerns. In these and other initiatives my goal will be to foster a criminal justice system that will best serve the interests and merit the respect of all the people of Canada, and I invite parliament's careful examination of this objective and of these proposals.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate the minister on making an excellent case out of such a bad bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Now I would like to file a caveat and a notice to you, Mr. Speaker, that at the end of my address I will move a motion, which I have studied very carefully and for the preparation of which I managed to obtain the best experts I could on the subject, knowing full well the difficulty of moving any amendment on second reading. Before I start my address I wish to bring to Your Honour's attention that the bill which we are now debating, Bill C-83, contains 73 pages, 39 of which deal with one matter, namely, gun control. There are five distinct changes in the law in this bill, but only one brings in a substantive new law on gun control. In other words, 39 pages out of 73 deal with the new law on gun control and the other sections, on which I will speak in a few moments, are merely amendments to the existing law. Because of that, I hope that when I complete my remarks the minister will agree with the motion which I will put forward.

In a bill of this nature the minister has brought in an extensive change to the law on gun control, a new law contained in 39 pages deliberately mixed with other amendments. This was done deliberately. You are damned if you do, and damned if you do not, and that is the reason the bill was drawn up in this fashion. I serve notice that I will move a motion that the bill be not read a second time because of the mixture of a brand new law and amendments which are merely a patchwork and which should be separated from the new law. We should have a separate debate on gun control and another one on the patchwork of amendments to the Criminal Code. This would give an opportunity to every member in the House, wherever he sits, to express himself on his will and his conscience—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: —and, above all, on the conscience of the people of this country who are very concerned about this problem. As one newspaper man put it to me today, it is a big bundle in a big chunk, and most of that chunk deals with gun control.

An hon. Member: Some journalist.

Mr. Woolliams: He might be a favourite of yours, so be careful. He wrote a pretty good article about you recently. I believe that this bill should be severed. In my comments I will show why it should be severed, why gun control should be separate from amendments on dangerous offenders, from amendments on wiretapping and provisions for a special inquiry, giving provinces certain jurisdiction, and from changes in the Parole Act.

● (1600)

My first words on this subject are to clear up immediately the misunderstanding which has crept across the nation, and even into the media, that the debate today will include a discussion on amendments and new laws to be added to the Criminal Code, namely, gun control, dangerous offenders, amendments giving the police full powers under the wiretap legislation—I will deal with that matter when I get to that point in my address—the assurance that the provinces will have the jurisdiction and power to conduct special crime inquiries, even though this government challenged the right of the provinces, and the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly Quebec to hold its crime inquiry, changes in the Parole Board, reversing the wrongful changes made by the Trudeau administration usurping—I want to emphasize this—parliament in regard to parole which was established by the Diefenbaker government. He was a man who had great compassion, an understanding of the criminal law and of the civil rights of people in this nation. This government has done more to usurp a good rehabilitation program in eight years than anything in my imagination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Along with these five things there has been deception across the land, through the media. The deception across the land, through the media, is that today hon. members on the other side of the House as well as on this side would be debating not only this bill on the amendments to the code but the question of abolition of the death penalty for capital murder or treason. This debate concerns the amendments, and certainly not abolition. I was glad to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) say that. The Minister of Justice emphasized that because they have endeavoured to sell this package to the Canadian people on peace and security when the media, members of this House and people across the land believed they were having one package, one debate with five amendments to the code including the question of abolition of capital punishment. The government is using this bill to assure the people that it stands for peace and security, and now it uses the words "law and order" and therefore it can take a different attitude as to murder.

It is really an astute, premeditated and planned attempt on the part of this government, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to try to give the impression that the bill, entitled "an act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime", Bill C-83, and the abolition Bill, Bill C-84, and the calling of both bills together peace and security legislation, that by this method the people would believe there would be one debate, one bill to deal with the increase of violence and murder in our nation, and to give the impression that they have the answers and that they have always stood for excellence in the administration of justice and have the safety and protection of law-abiding citizens as their first priority. The facts, of course, will bear me out when I say that the contrary is true. The history of this government in this field illustrates that. Lest we forget, let me remind this parliament and the people of this government's previous failure to protect innocent women and children and law-abiding people of this country.

To say the least, it has been a brilliant attempt on the part of the Minister of Justice and the government—or, better, a brilliant sinister attempt—to leave the impression with the public that this government has tried to do something about crime in the past. I will deal with other statistics when I get to that point in my speech, but in 1974 there were 258 murders where convictions were obtained; in 1975 there were 312. The murder rate was up 18.8 per cent. Breaking and entering went up 11.3 per cent, kidnapping went up 40.7 per cent, and robbery went up 70.9 per cent.

The gun control legislation in Bill C-83 which is now being debated is a legalistic—I say this with the greatest respect to the minister—and political poultice to be used to soothe the feelings of government members who are under pressure from their constituents because the government is doing nothing to half the ever-increasing trend in murder and violence in this country. The linking of gun control and new penalties for murder and other amendments under the name of peace and security was done solely to get support for both bills from the government's restless backbenchers, who are not only restless about this matter and this kind of policy but are also restless about other policies such as those for Time and Reader's Digest and about what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been saying in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: We on this side of the House gave the minister a fine hearing. I hope even though hon. members opposite disagree with me, they will give me the courtesy given to the minister by me and other hon. members on this side of the House. That is why the bill was left, as the newspaperman said, in one chunk. The way the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General have been peddling their propaganda that we would be considering both bills together reminded me of the history of the 1930s, when Ramsay MacDonald, prime minister of Britain, peddled peace and disarmament throughout Europe to the allied nations while the enemy rearmed. This mistake nearly cost us our democratic way of life and it cost the world thousands of lives and much human suffering.

Likewise, this government gave the impression for eight long years that it would be easy with violent criminals. What a mistake. Rehabilitation, yes. But, surely, the release of dangerous criminals and offenders, no. I have only to remind the House, during this period of increasing violence and murder, of children's deaths, women's deaths, rapes, police harassment and the untold suffering which has taken place. I am not saying for one moment that the government is totally to blame, but it must share part of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The selling job of the two ministers has been so effective that even "The Waltons" might have believed the government is crime-busting and that gun control is the answer. In this regard it sounds like "Have Gun, will Travel" or "Batman" having driven the bad men underground. I have seen and heard the two ministers, "The Odd Couple," on "Canada A.M." on CTV, on "The Fifth Estate" on CBC, on "W-5" on CTV, and on "This Day" on CBC, pouring out their propaganda and telling the people of Canada that the two bills are one package called peace and security, so that it is believed we are now debating the whole ball of wax.

The rules do not permit me to say it was a deliberate attempt to deceive the public. They might not allow me to go that far. But the rules do permit me to say that deception is taking place in this nation. These ministers have been on every program. They have been selling, endeavouring to persuade people, and to ingratiate themselves and their program, that murder, violence, rape and assault will be under control and that all parliament has to do is bring in gun control. I have not watched all the programs—

An hon. Member: You are lucky.

Mr. Woolliams: —and I do not know for sure whether they appeared with Carol Burnett or if they intervened on "Sesame Street," but they certainly could have been on Rich Little's show, and at least they tried to be the Six Million Dollar Men who never make mistakes. All this has been going on while prisoners have been escaping, and the correctional officers have been frustrated. Some of them have been held as hostages while prisoners escaped, to the extent that anyone might have thought he had tuned in to "Hogan's Heroes". Bill C-83 is really a legal poultice.

An hon. Member: Who wrote your speech?

Mr. Woolliams: Someone asked who wrote my speech? I might say right now that for good or for bad, I write my own speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: If hon. members want corroboration of that, they can call my office and talk to Bonnie or Carol, my secretaries, and they will tell you how late they worked on Sunday. I have no $100,000 researchers.

Bill C-83 is a legal poultice and will do little to counteract the statistics on crime, and crime itself. What is the cause of crime?

An hon. Member: Criminals.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I was about to answer. I will tell the House some of the causes underlying crime. The government has whittled away at laws which gave judges and courts power to restrain violent criminals. I am referring to easy bail regulations. The government permitted indiscreet day passes for violent and dangerous criminals and murderers. I have nothing against day passes provided there is an assurance of proper protection. Further, the government failed to implement programs of rehabilitation in penitentiaries, and failed to recognize that the destruction of the morale of correctional officers would make escape easy. Apart from these factors, if one can ignore them, one could say that the cause of crime is a social problem.

● (1610)

Indeed, the causes of crime are rooted in society. How many times have we heard the Solicitor General referring to statistics without foundation? This is his wishy-washy program. Really, it is the Prime Minister's. The minister is implementing it, like a puppet, without uttering a word of disapproval or showing any sign of wilful disobedience. The minister alleges that violence is on the decrease. He and I were on the television together not long ago. He looked in the camera, with that honest look of his, and said, "There is no evidence murder is on the increase." I went to his department and got the figures.

Mr. Allmand: I never said that.

Mr. Woolliams: I will get the tape and the minister can hear it in my office. In 1961 there were 185 reported murders; in 1962, 217; in 1963, 315; in 1964, 218. The murder figures go up, like inflation. In 1971 the reported murders increased to 426; in 1972 there were 479; in 1973, 474; and in 1974, 545. That is this government's record of controlling violence and murder.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: Go back over the newspaper columns of the past five years and you will find page after page of propaganda—at which this government is very good—telling the people of this country that violent crime is on the decrease. The government put out that propaganda. But something happened despite all the propaganda put out by the government opposite, a government never before equalled in ability to produce propaganda. The Canadian people turned against the government's unworkable, jelly-like policies. Incidents of hijacking, kidnapping, murder, violence, rape and assault piled up day after day until the government had to produce a remedy to retain its position even if it lost its credibility. In their administration of justice they failed to solve the problem of crime, just as in the economy they failed to control inflation. I ask again, what is the cause of crime? I have shown the government's contribution. I suggest that the real cause is the government's economic policies, coupled with the problems our nation faces together with other nations.

As I have said on other occasions that the notion that crime can be ascribed to a single category of causes is erroneous. Violent crimes create a climate of fear in the streets of our growing cities. White-collar crime, in economic terms, is much less visible than violent crime, yet the material costs of crimes such as petty theft, consumer fraud, violations of the combines act, and embezzlement dwarf the economic cost of all crimes of violence. In order to control violent and white-collar crimes we must have laws that are practical and acceptable in the light of modern, new interpretations of life and human behaviour. As I said before, our laws must be practical and do the job they were designed to do. They must not be aimed at ordinary law-abiding citizens of this country. They must be aimed at those who ignore our laws and wilfully would ignore gun licence provisions. That is why I hoped that the minister, in amending the code, would do a good job and not merely scratch the surface.

The need for proper laws and proper law enforcement cannot be underestimated in the control of crime. I have felt for years that we must get at the breeding grounds of crime. Mr. Speaker, crime breeds in the cesspools of injustice and poverty in our urban slums, in fast-growing cities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: And what is the government doing? Today we hear that the Bank of Canada is to increase the interest rate. How can people borrow money to buy homes? Urban poverty makes people who dwell in the slums the victims, not the masters of their environment. The bad environment becomes the heritage of the next generation. In order to launch a major assault on crime we must attack the despair and denial of human opportunity which makes crime grow. I know that crime also thrives under conditions of affluence. White-collar, economic crime is eroding our system of society and promoting more controls and less freedom. That is why I felt the government ought to introduce separately the gun control law and the other provisions. We should discuss them separately and vote on them separately.

In brief, the police, our courts and prisons cannot long control crime. We must deal with the underlying causes of crime, the immense and stubborn forces pervading our environment, measuring our character and determining the quality of our lives. With long-range efforts in a new land of bountiful resources we can conquer poverty, ignorance, disease, discrimination, family breakdown, injustice, social tension and despair. While we must strive to uproot the causes of crime, we must put our practical minds to work to amend the various sections of the Criminal Code and guarantee that the law is respected, not shaped and planned to protect the rich and create injustice for the poor.

The law will only be respected as long as our judges are respected. It is absolutely intolerable that ministers of the Crown should interfere with the courts. What happened recently is without precedent. A minister admitted that he talked to a judge concerning another minister who had been found guilty of contempt of court. At least I can say one thing about the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury). He is honest. He stated the case. Others hid behind various precedents as though pleading the American fifth amendment. The Minister of Public Works, in answer to a question I raised, said in part, as reported on page 11457 of Hansard:

> If it were not for the fact that I consider the associate chief justice of Quebec, whom I have known for a number of years, to be uninfluencible, in a pejorative sense, I would have refrained from intervening or from having any conversation with him.

In other words, he talked to the judge because he knew he could not influence him; he knew he could not interfere with his decision.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like the Chair to indicate to the hon. gentleman that the topic he has dealt with in the last minute and a half has nothing to do with the bill before the House.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, we know why the Liberals understand gun control. When they are wounded verbally, they cry.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that phrase, Eldon?

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Public Works went on to say:

> Indeed, the only intervention that would be contemplated by me would be one to see that he was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty—

I will let the matter rest. There cannot be peace and security in this nation if our courts are not respected.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Crime is a national problem according to our constitution, while law enforcement is a provincial and local responsibility. Parliament must direct its processes so as to ensure criminal justice. We must bring excellence to every aspect of the administration of criminal justice—to corrections, to courts, to law enactment in every jurisdiction of Canada. The law must be reformed, or repealed. If enforcement is impossible and law enforcement permits laws to be broken like dishes because the majority of people find them unjust and no one wants to obey them, they must be repealed. I will in a few moments be showing the anomalies in respect of gun control so that hon. members will understand the background of what I am building up to at this moment.

● (1620)

Surely this is the purpose of many of these code amendments. The law will be obeyed only when it is respected. The law will be obeyed only when it is just. The law will be obeyed when those in high office respect and carefully guard our traditions and constitution, the dignity the law demands and the dignity which we expect from the judiciary, the executive, parliament and the administration of justice. Nothing short of that standard is acceptable to this side of the House. We will have a free vote in my party on capital punishment. We demand the fullest examination by a standing committee on all of these matters. In my motion we will demand that the question of gun control—which is brand new law, not an amendment to the code—be severed from the bill so that both these matters can be discussed in an intelligent and able manner.

What about the gun control legislation? Let us have an examination of it. Apart from the argument as to whether gun control will stop the massive increase in crime, what are some of the farcical anomalies contained in the clauses of Bill C-83? The government has never taken the trouble, even with all its studies on gun control, to determine the cost of administering it, the number of bureaucrats it will take to licence all the guns in Canada, to issue permits for restricted weapons, as well as the certificates, licensing and other documentation in order to obtain ammunition. They never thought of looking into that. When I asked the Solicitor General questions about this, he said they have a big study going on with regard to gun control and are looking into this question. In these days of anti-inflation, one would have thought they would have considered the cost as well as the number of bureaucrats it will take, in addition to looking into the effect this will have on the law-abiding citizens of this country.

We should be able to determine the number of people needed to administer the legislation, such as issuing licences for all guns, issuing permits for restricted guns, issuing certificates, etc., and to administer control of the sale and use of guns, together with the same for ammunition. I put these questions to the Minister of Justice:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, the answer of which may assist us in the second reading debate on the peace and security bill. As sportsmen of Canada assess that about six million guns will be affected by the legislation, has the minister assessed how many public servants, including police officers, will be needed to issue permits for restricted guns and licences for all guns, and what the cost in this regard will be to the Canadian public?

I have hundreds of letters from my constituency and all across Canada asking me that question. What was the answer? I quote:

Mr. Speaker, there has been a careful analysis, but it is impossible to say what the result will be and how many people will be involved because this will depend to some extent on special arrangements made in each province.

Let me pause during my reading of this quotation. Will the provinces have to take this financial load in the same way as they did with the health program of this country?

Naturally, we hope to keep the administrative and licensing staff to a minimum—

That is easy to say, but what is the minimum?

—but, at the same time, make licensing personnel available in communities throughout Canada so that there will not be difficulty in obtaining licences. I anticipate that we shall use provincial and federal police forces—

By the way, the police forces do not want this obligation and responsibility. I asked further about the staff. I will not read all the answer. However, I was told that the government does not know how large a staff is needed or what the cost will be. That is something they did not consider. We know that if the government needs more money it will tax the Canadian taxpayer to death.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I hear a laugh. I wonder if the hon. member's constituents would laugh. Do you think they would laugh, Mr. Speaker? There are many anomalies in this guns control legislation. If I mentioned them all it would take longer than a speech in the United States Congress during a filibuster. Let us examine the definition of "ammunition." It's a humdinger. It is defined as follows:

Ammunition means ammunition for a firearm and includes any component, element or part such as a bullet, pellet, cartridge case, primer or propellant powder that is primarily useful as a component, element or part of ammunition.

That really means that ammunition is ammunition in whole. It is a shotgun shell, the powder, the pellet-casing and the cartridge. If it is a rifle bullet, it is the whole casing. It is the bullet, the powder and everything or any part thereof. What does the definition clause mean? Does this mean, when you read the clauses of the bill keeping in mind the definition, that if hunters find empty cartridges on the ground expelled from a shotgun, the finder has an obligation, as a finder of a component of ammunition, to turn in the empty cartridge to the police? If he should put it in his pocket absent-mindedly, and on the way home be stopped by the police, it is found as part and parcel of ammunition which is not his licensed ammunition, and he is guilty of an offence. He could be fined or sent to jail.

Let us take a second example. Clause 106.3 (11) on page 28 of the bill states that farmboys who go gopher hunting—they all do that on the prairies and, I assume, in other rural areas of Canada—with a 22 rifle to protect their fathers' grain crops will be classified as game hunters. In another clause it states that young people under 18 are only permitted to use guns if the families need the game as part of their living. Who eats gophers? What a farce.

Third, let us examine clause 106.5 on page 33 of the bill, which provides that everyone who, without lawful excuse, fails to obtain a licence or fails to get a registration certificate or permit, as the case may be, shall be liable to be charged with an indictable offence. If convicted, such a person would be liable—I believe this is the maximum—to two years' imprisonment, a fine or, as an alternative, guilty on summary conviction and fined. In this regard, the law is an ass. It will not be obeyed. If the law is not just, practical and workable, it will not be obeyed. That is one more reason these clauses regarding gun control should be severed from the other amendments.

Are law-abiding citizens to be put in jail because guns have been outlawed, except if they prescribe to the rules and regulations of this government? It will be the law-abiding citizens who will be subject to jail and fines, while the criminals will break the gun law as easily and as quickly as they commit violence, rape, robbery and murder. This is the reason gun control in this bill should be severed from wiretapping and other parts of the bill. Members of parliament should be able to disapprove, approve, and certainly improve gun control legislation as laid down by the government, without being controlled by the other terms of the bill. I might say you are damned if you do, and damned if you don't. Of course, that is the reason the government put it this way. It is enough to make the "Dynamic Duo" turn in their tights in disgust and mutter in the imaginative words of Boy Wonder, "Holy poultice policy, Batman, the Trudeau government is at it again."

• (1630)

In summary, may I say that the provisions for licensing, through federal government machinery, of rifles and shotguns may accomplish little more than a build-up of bureaucratic activity. The number of extra officials needed cannot be estimated by me and is ignored by the government. What will the cost amount to? What are the alternatives to this legislation? What are the suggestions which have been made? Perhaps better results could be obtained by using machinery already in existence by way of hunters' safety courses and courses conducted by recognized gun clubs. I should like to see the committee investigate this aspect. We might be looking toward the expansion of facilities which already exist. Tests in competence of handling handguns could easily be conducted by gun clubs as they are today in connection with hunters' safety courses.

The bill has repealed, without comment, section 101(b), previously the saving clause for youths who wanted to use guns under parental guidance for hunting or associated activities. Clause 106 leaves the way open for future restriction by way of government regulations. We have been giving no indication of what might eventually come out of those regulations. Too much power is being left to the governor in council. Another question is, what will be the cost of all this? Will a licence fee of $10 be charged to everyone who owns a gun? Are the law-abiding citizens of this land the ones who will have to pay the shot? Will only those who are not law-abiding get away free? I saw a sign the other day, "When guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns." Not bad. That was sent to me in the mail.

Now I want to turn to another subject the Minister of Justice mentioned—special crime inquiries in the provinces. I believe this is a good step in the right direction. Every province will be able to hold inquiries with respect to crime within its borders, and those tribunals will have the power to subpoena witnesses. But it is my comprehension that when Quebec was doing such a good job in investigating criminal activity within its borders, the Minister of Justice challenged its right to do so. He brought a case before the Supreme Court of Canada, judgment with respect to which has so far not been written. But for the Quebec inquiry we would not have known of the millions of dollars of meat which was sold, cut and carved from carcasses of animals which had died of disease and disposed of as hamburger, flavoured with onions by way of deception.

What we saw there was an attempt to destroy not only the moral fibre but the physical welfare of the Canadian people. The Quebec Crime Commission is to be congratulated on its work in this area. I suppose all that fraud was carried out by criminals under the reasoning that if they couldn't get at the people's morals they would get at their stomachs and pocketbooks through their appetites.

Now I turn to the subject of wiretapping and to the changes in the wiretapping legislation. I listened very carefully and made notes of what the minister said. He did not think the changes would erode civil rights. I realize that the detection of crime is very important, but surely members in all quarters of the House must weigh very carefully the proper balance between crime detection and civil rights. This is the reason distinguished members of parliament such as my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), one of the best legal minds in the House, and my hon. friend from Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), have insisted that 90 days after an electronic device—for example, a telephone—has been wiretapped, the person so affected must be notified that this was the case.

This section is now to be repealed. I understand the reasons: police officers in the detection of crime must not be hindered in their ability to possess and use equipment equivalent to that possessed by sophisticated, wealthy criminals. Yet on the other hand there is the aspect of civil liberties to be considered. If there is any interference with crime detection arising from the provision for notice, the time can surely be extended or abridged by a judge of a superior court to give the police the authority and protection they need. That is our recommendation, Mr. Speaker, while at the same time preventing the wrongful tapping, without their knowledge, of telephones used by law-abiding citizens.

Mr. Speaker, since I came to parliament I have defended the administration of justice and the actions of police officers in every category where they have acted judiciously and properly in the course of the administration of justice. Yet on the other hand, as an experienced trial lawyer may I remind hon. members—those who are lawyers will hardly need to be reminded—that I am well aware that this kind of power, placed in the wrong hands at the wrong time by the wrong people, can lead to the erosion of civil rights. Certainly, I have great respect for the RCMP. I have great respect for police officers who administer the law. But when you give so much power to people who want that kind of power, you can damage civil rights. That is why one has to build in a mechanism to protect civil rights, weighing it against the need for crime detection. Is that too much to ask, Mr. Speaker? I would think not.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

What about the clauses the Minister of Justice has dealt with in relation to dangerous offenders? I turn to the legislation covering dangerous offenders. The name of the offence is changed or, putting it in another way, the power of a judge to give an indeterminate sentence to accused persons who continue to use or attempt to use violent conduct endangering, or likely to endanger, the life or safety of another person or inflicting, or likely to inflict, severe psychological damage on another person, has been given a new name. The name of the offence has been changed; that is all. I agree that the phrase "habitual criminal" was not very good. I like the new description. But it is not something which is going to change the whole ball of wax in the control of crime.

I agree that a person might get drunk every weekend and end up in jail every weekend, which might point to habitual conduct on his part, but he would certainly not be an habitual criminal. No judge, as I read the authorities, has ever used the section in that manner. Changing the name does not strengthen the law. What does the change do to control crime? This is another example of an attempt by the government to place mock law and mock courts on a level with reality.

Last, but not least, we must consider the changing of the rules governing parole. Since 1968, when the just society was promised to the Canadian people, the pages of criminal history as exposed by the media are full of cases showing that day passes have been given indiscreetly and indiscriminately to violent criminals, to dangerous offenders who have returned to the streets of our cities, ravaging and threatening society, murdering and plundering, robbing and killing. I do not need to mention the Head case, a man serving his sentence having been found guilty of raping five different girls under the age of nine. He was released, without any provision of supervision, by the Department of the Solicitor General; not when the present minister was Solicitor General, though. But the policy never changed; just the personnel. What did this prisoner do? He murdered one of the warden's daughters.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House stand for rehabilitation. We believe the conditions under which people are incarcerated for certain offences in this country are deplorable. On the other hand, when there are dangerous criminals, and when they are known to be dangerous, when they are habitual offenders, great care should surely be taken to segregate them from society, to use the words of the Minister of Justice. I hope the hon. gentleman, as the new Minister of Justice, will follow that course.

The day of repentance is upon us, and what is the government doing? Membership of the Parole Board is to be increased to 26, making it regional in nature. The bill does much along lines I have recommended. The former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), in his wisdom and with the authority and consent of the government destroyed the parole system. He stated when he was minister—this was shown me by one of the officers who is now no longer in the service—that the first priority was rehabilitation, and the second was the protection of society. He got his priorities reversed. No wonder the policy went sour.

You know, Mr. Speaker, there is a weed on the prairies called tumbling mustard which rolls and spreads its seed across the land. Every time it topples it changes its position, and every time it changes its position it sows different seeds. This symbolizes the government's policy in the last eight years. One can truly categorize this policy as the tumbling weed program of the Liberal party. We now demand, on behalf of parliament and the country, a full airing of this legislation in the committee; and we demand, above all, that the term of the bill be separated.

● (1640)

When I started my introductory remarks I said I proposed to amend the motion now before the House. I shall do so because this bill, in each of its several parts, confronts us with the keystone question of political science. That question is: Where does the lawmaker strike the balance of convenience between the rights of society and the rights of the private citizen? These state rights and private rights are as the two sides of one coin. No man is free under the law of the jungle. That being so, society exists to ensure that the private citizen, in surrendering the minimum of his freedoms, is free to enjoy the maximum remainder of his freedoms. It is equally true that no man is free in a society that requires of him no more than the minimum surrender of his freedoms; he can lose his freedoms when the lawmakers forget that society exists for man, not man for society.

For example, we lawmakers may be forgetful of this principle when the administrators of the laws we pass are inefficient, when they protest that they are inefficient only because they need more power over the private citizen for his own good. The private citizen is therefore required by us to surrender more of his freedom to these administrators. This leads full circle to a bureaucratic society where the freedoms of the private citizen are trapped fast in a jungle of red tape and autocratic decisions. Again, and briefly, Mr. Speaker, the freedoms of the private citizen can be unduly sacrificed to political expediency or overreaction to the so-called "public demand". Too often, public demand is the demand of minority pressure groups.

With particular reference to Bill C-83, it has been said that some of the tougher law and order provisions, which the government now calls peace and security provisions, have been inserted by the government to seduce unwilling converts among its backbenchers to vote freely on the side of the government for the abolition of capital punishment. Others would have it that these law and order provisions are an overkill reaction by the government to so-called public demand.

I have heard a third explanation, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday, March 4, the government, on the motion of its leader there, referred the subject matter of this bill to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Such a reference to the other place has been generally reserved for the subject matter of bills dealing with income tax, corporation laws, and banks. In fact, the practice is known as the "Hayden gambit", after its innovator, the honourable chairman of the Senate banking, trade and commerce committee. The present reference appears to be a departure from banking to criminal law. I am assured, however, that the departure from practice is more apparent than real.

Last year, it is pointed out, was the most recessive year in Canada in the last 20 years. In that most recessive of years, bank profits rose 50 per cent. In that most bank profitable year, bank robberies rose accordingly. Therefore, this bill and the Senate reference are explained on the basis that the government foresees that so long as this government is in power the recession will increase, bank profits will increase and bank robberies will increase. The government has decided that something must be done about it. Bank robberies must be stopped, so the government has brought in gun control.

I do not necessarily subscribe to all these views, Mr. Speaker. After all, it must appear to the public that there have been a few breaches of law and order centred in these parliament buildings in recent times. But, seriously, I do endorse the method used by the other place. We should be permitted to have this bill go back to committee now, before second reading is completed, to enable the committee solely to study and report on the manner in which the bill itself has been drawn, a bill that puts 39 pages of new gun controls in our law, together with a patchwork of other amendments. With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I move the following motion in all seriousness, and I believe I am in order:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-83 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof."

The motion is seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). I appreciate that Your Honour may want to hear some comments on the motion I have moved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Chair will take the amendment under advisement and allow the debate to continue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (No. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I appreciate Your Honour has reserved your decision on my motion in order to consider it, but I would file the caveat at this moment that before any decision is made some hon. members would like to speak to the question of my right to move such a motion at this time.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was going to make the same suggestion as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I hope that at some point the Chair will want to hear argument on the motion by appropriate members of the House, and we will reserve our position on that matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some care and attention to the lofty goals that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) outlined for Canada's criminal justice system and the measures that he suggests will ensure that the system continues to be effective. He also said in the course of his remarks that crime in Canada is under control and that these measures will ensure that it will continue to be under control. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not very hard for members on this side of the House to find a great deal to disagree with in those statements. First of all, crime is not under control in Canada, and anyone who takes a careful look at crime statistics knows that it is not under control. In communities where I come from in the province of British Columbia people continue to lock their doors and buy German shepherd dogs. With the growing siege mentality in the surburbs of our major urban areas, the people know that crime is not under control. This legislation is not going to solve that problem. It may make some kind of dent in it, but it will not solve the problem at all—and the reason is that the legislation deals only with simplistic issues. It deals only with the penal side and not the causes of crime that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) so eloquently expressed to the House.

• (1650)

No program is worth looking at unless it mentions hard drugs, Mr. Speaker, and there is not a single phrase about that subject in any of the legislation that I have read.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: There is nothing to deal with a problem that is insidious, that is growing and which accounts for 70 per cent of the violent crime in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: The government says it is dealing with crime, yet there is not a single proposal put forward to deal with hard drugs. I think that is a shame. The minister of Justice should look again at what he calls peace and security legislation, and try to deal with that problem. People who have dealt with the hard drug problem in Canada, from the heavy penal side to the question of legalization, all agree that major change has to come about in this area. Why are we waiting so long for major change? The statistics are there. What is going on on the other side of the House? There is not a single program in Canada, not a heroin maintenance program for hard core addicts that might be worth looking at.

I do not see anything in the bill about the other major cause of crime in Canada. Sixty per cent of the inmates of our penal institutions are native Indians, yet they compose only 1 per cent of the population. How can the government say it is dealing with crime in any meaningful way when there is nothing that deals with the cultural shock of natives in Canada and the continuing conflict between the white culture and the native culture? It is to Canada's eternal shame that we do not deal aggressively and immediately with the problem of Canadian Indian crime. There is no use hiding this: it is out there, and in large proportions. We have offered a few court workers and a few token native people in the RCMP, but there has been no aggressive program to attempt to solve some of the basic cultural problems.

What we see in the legislation is a simplistic approach, one with which our party is not entirely in disagreement.

We believe there is a role for punishment in the criminal justice system; we do not disagree that some punishment should be increased where appropriate. But the great lack is the minister's insight into the causes of crime in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to deal in more detail with the question of drug-related crime. Not only is 70 per cent of the serious crime in Canada related to drugs, but 50 per cent of the inmates of federal institutions are there because of drug trafficking and drug trade offences. We spent $4 million on the LeDain commission which recommended compulsory medical treatment for hard core addicts, but we have never implemented the recommendations. I suppose that is another $4 million down the drain. Anybody involved in drugs can tell us that the approach we are taking now is a total disaster. Our crime rate continues to increase because of it. In Vancouver, in a period of three years, a coroner found that 1,000 deaths were directly attributable to hard drugs, all of which is related to the criminal process one way or another.

In Japan, under a heroin addict program of compulsory medical treatment, the number of addicts was reduced from 40,000 to 100. Maybe Japan has a different culture and a more homogeneous society but, Mr. Speaker, surely we can look somewhere else for solutions to the major cause of crime in Canada. In Great Britain, with a population of 50 million, there are 3,000 heroin addicts. They have a program to try to decriminalize users. That does not mean they legalize the distribution of hard drugs, but they isolate addicts and treat them. We should do the same in an effort to stop the insidious growth of drugs in schools where the user has no choice but to turn somebody younger on in order to secure the means of supporting his habit, so the thing pyramids through whole urban areas. The government is doing nothing about this.

In British Columbia we are beginning to think the government does not know we exist. We have the major drug problem in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I should like to quote the remarks of the Vancouver coroner about this problem when he discovered there had been 1,000 deaths due to drugs. The Vancouver Province reports the coroner as saying that serious consideration should be given to a federally-controlled drug maintenance system for addicts in both Canada and the United States; either that or the setting up of a strict, continental enforcement of drug laws. He said that British Columbia is left virtually on its own to deal with 65 per cent of the nation's drug problem, and it is time the federal government took over the fight on a national and international scale to take the profit out of heroin trafficking.

As long as we continue to treat crime in a completely one-sided and simplistic way, all we will do is put offenders behind bars. In many cases that is necessary, and in many cases the public is protected because there is no repetition of the offence. But it is not getting at the root of the problem. I mentioned earlier the problems of the native Indians are not being dealt with except in a token way with the provision of some court workers. There have been some Indian friendship centres as well. The crisis problem with the native people, however, is the educational system. We continue to warp the Indian's view of himself in the way we treat the history of Indian people in Canada. Until we decide to give Indian people pride in their culture, we will continue to see the growth of the insidious problem of the white culture imposing itself on the native culture, with the massive social and criminal problems that follow.

I want to say a few words now about the subject of gun control, Mr. Speaker. I have very vigorous disagreements with the hon. member for Calgary North concerning almost everything he had to say about gun control. Indeed, I wonder whether he read the bill. He was talking about the licensing of guns. I read the bill, and there is nothing in it about licensing guns; it is licensing of ownership. That is a proposal that has been made by most gun clubs in Canada, most wildlife federations, and it is the proposal we are now examining.

I oppose the registration of weapons Mr. Speaker. I think it is an unnecessary bureaucracy. The requirement that a person should act responsibly, however, and have a permit to buy a long rifle is not a severe interference with his rights, it seems to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We are a little beyond five o'clock, so pursuant to the order made on Friday, February 27, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, and public bills.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we agreed, through the usual negotiations, to discuss motion No. 43.

Before moving it,—

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

SUGGESTED AWARD FOR SERVICE IN NATO

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There has been agreement on all sides that motion No. 43, in the name of the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), shall be amended prior to presentation so that it shall read:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government consider the advisability of taking immediate steps to establish a service award for past and present members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in recognition of their dedication and high standards, keeping in mind that such awards already exist for members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the United Nations peacekeeping duties and that NATO servicemen deserve the same recognition.

● (1700)

Mr. Paproski: That has been agreed, Mr. Speaker.

NATO Service Award

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement that the House proceed with motion No. 43 at this time appearing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for York Centre, and that the preceding motions be stood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it also agreed that the hon. member for York Centre shall have permission to modify his motion as suggested, to meet the more normal presentation procedure in respect of motions to be adopted in the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government consider the advisability of taking immediate steps to establish a service award for past and present members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in recognition of their dedication and high standards, keeping in mind that such awards already exist for members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the United Nations peacekeeping duties and that NATO servicemen deserve the same recognition.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the long session in which we are now engaged has one advantage, at least. It gives so many of us who have had resolutions on the order paper an opportunity to have them come forward for debate. I am delighted to have the opportunity now to bring forward this motion. I am certainly hopeful it will find general support among many members of the House. I am asking that the government consider the advisability of taking immediate steps to establish a service award for past and present members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in recognition of their dedication and high standards, keeping in mind that such awards already exist for members of the Canadian armed forces serving in the United Nations peacekeeping duties and that NATO servicemen deserve the same recognition.

In my life, unfortunately I have had very little contact with the military, but that changed in the last years since I became a member of parliament representing the Downsview air base, Canada's largest military establishment. Since then I have had a considerable amount of contact with servicemen. I wish to tell hon. members that it is not because of pressure from the servicemen that I am bringing forward this resolution. In fact, there is very considerable reluctance on the part of servicemen to acquire recognition in the form of new medals to be established for bravery or, as in this case, for service. The general view of the military is that one ought to do one's best, but should not particularly press for recognition of those efforts.

We certainly do not want to have a tremendous number of medals established for the Canadian armed forces. There are some countries in which medals are given for practically everything—almost even for recovering from a cold. No one in the armed forces would want to see that degree of proliferation of awards exist in Canada. On the other hand, it seems to me there is an anomaly in that there have been so many awards and types of recognition for other forms of service, while for NATO service no award or recognition presently is given. In that spirit, I put forward this resolution in the hope that it will meet with the approval of the House.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Honours and decorations are bestowed upon persons by a grateful country to show the high respect due to such persons by reason of their having made some contribution to the common good beyond that required. These usually take the form of a star or a medal which is worn to signify the honour. A number of awards have been available in Canada, historically at least, since 1812. The government of Canada issued awards to Canadian servicemen back as far as 1866 and 1870 during the Fenian raids. They were awarded for service in the Sudan in the period 1884 to 1885. They were awarded for service in the Northwest in 1885, for service in South Africa in the period 1899 to 1902, for overseas service in World War I, and for voluntary service in the period 1939 to 1945.

Subsequently, there has been an award for service in the Korean war which involved service of one day in Korea or 28 days afloat. There is the UN Korea medal, and the UN Emergency Force medal for service on the Egyptian-Israeli border. There are also UN medals available for three months' service in the Congo, 30 days' service in Lebanon, three months' service in New Guinea, six months' service in India and Pakistan, 60 days' service in Yemen, 90 days' service in Cyprus, 90 days' service in India-Pakistan, and 90 days' service in Indochina. Although there are other awards, these are the principal ones. I have described them tonight to make clear to hon. members that a NATO service medal would certainly be within the tradition of our country. In this spirit, and without wanting to take too much time, I would urge hon. members to give support to this resolution.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say to the mover of this motion that it is in fact one of the more thoughtful things that has been done in this chamber with regard to serving Canadian armed forces personnel during the 10 or 12 years I have been here. I commend him for it. I should like to indicate to him that I take some pride in being a spokesman from this side of the House in support of the motion he has placed before us.

The hon. member has gone through the historic background with some thoroughness and obviously with some concern. He has clearly outlined the precedents for such a motion. It is a matter of regret to many us that the Department of National Defence, at least the people on the civilian side of the department, did not move in this direction a long time ago. The subject put forward and embraced by this motion, of course, is not new. It is not novel to the hon. member who proposes it.

Although I am sure the hon. member is aware of this, he has presented the motion in a very thoughtful and courteous way. This is the type of motion which we can readily accept. I think the government would be doing a service to the mover, to the chamber and to all Canadians if it were to give this motion and its very worthy subject the consideration it deserves.

There is another aspect of this matter which I think should be mentioned. I hope I do not get away from the subject matter in raising it. I suggest there is a very real question of urgency involved. If the concept is good, let us accept it now. Let us do everything we can with respect to this bill and urge upon the government the necessity and urgency of moving on this suggestion. Let us get it into place so that members of the armed forces who have served on the land, in the air and on the water might be the recipients of this honour from the government and from Canadians.

● (1710)

There is a sense of urgency because at the rate we are going with respect to the Canadian armed forces, we will not have a Canadian armed force in another three or four years, in view of the enormous difficulty that seems to be arising with respect to one of our principal contributions to NATO, namely, the LRPA program. We have the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) saying it is not their problem, and that the $200 million required by Lockheed must come from National Defence. National Defence says they have only $50 million. The Minister of Supply and Services said we must make up our minds by the end of this month or there will be no LRPA; they will cancel the program and put the contract back in the drawer or else bring to an end Canada's involvement in this form of military activity with respect to continental and NATO defence.

I inject this note of urgency because, like the distinguished mover of this motion, many of us are very concerned. We are concerned that we should always give the type of recognition that is necessary for service. Service is always distinguished, and we must not lose sight of that. There is urgency because we might not have an armed force in another two or three years. Going back to the long time it took us to erect memorials in recognition of the contribution made by our armed forces personnel since the Korean war—and I will just stay with those who lost their lives at sea—let me point out that we had no difficulty accommodating merchant seamen and naval personnel who lost their lives in the First World War, in the Second World War or in action in Korea. But in the intervening years between the First and Second World Wars, and between the Second World War and the Korean war, many of our Canadian armed forces personnel died in the line of duty and it took us a long time to give recognition to the contribution of their life that these men made. We have only had it for the last two or three years in the form of an anchor at Point Pleasant park in Halifax. We should have had it 25 or 30 years ago.

I suggest to hon. members that the motion should be dealt with and the government should give consideration to it this year, not in 20 or 30 years' time. Let us do it while the men who served with distinction in the NATO forces in Europe, on the Atlantic and in the air space over the north Atlantic are with us. I think it is something we can all support. I bring into this matter a note of urgency because of the necessity of doing it now while men whom we are attempting to honour can receive with distinction and pride the type of medal or ribbon that is being suggested by the mover of the motion. We support it, and hope the government will accept the amendment which gets around the procedural difficulty and that this chamber can very quickly, in the next few minutes, advance this matter to the point where the government can recognize the motion in the hope that some time in 1976, or perhaps while our present governor general is still functioning and active he can present the first of these awards. We commend the mover, we support the motion, and I hope the government will utilize the next few minutes to give some indication that it is prepared to accept it and move with it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to give our support to this motion. We commend the hon. member for bringing it in, and even more we commend him on his success in getting it through.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my minister who is visiting Canadian troops on exercise in Norway, I am very happy to inform the House that the government accepts the principle of this motion. I want to add my personal congratulations to the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) for proposing the motion. I would also like to express to him our gratitude for his interest in members of the armed forces. I am also very grateful to him for the change which he made in the wording of the motion, because there are inherent difficulties in its implementation. I want to point out two or three of these difficulties and to emphasize that I am not doing this to take up time. I will not be very long.

First of all, as the hon. member himself pointed out, the proliferation of awards does tend to reduce the value of existing awards and care will have to be taken in the implementation of this motion to see that that does not happen with existing awards in the armed forces. Consideration will also have to be given to the position of our forces serving in NATO vis-à-vis the forces of other countries serving in NATO, because several years ago—I believe it was in 1968—NATO discussed the possibility of having a NATO award for forces from member countries serving with NATO. The reaction among the various nations at the time was pretty negative, so the idea was dropped. However, this will be a Canadian award for Canadian servicemen.

Another point I would like to make is that there may indeed be some sentiment in the armed forces against the implementation of additional awards, and I think it would not be a good augury for the proposed award if it should become an object of controversy among the members whom it is intended to honour. I want to stress, also, that as I see it, at least, this is an in house award, not an additional award for bravery but a service award which would be presented within the armed forces to members of the armed forces. However, on balance the government supports the purpose and intent of the motion and I recommend to the House its speedy adoption.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the distinguished parliamentary secretary would entertain a rather brief question.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: I welcome the government's attitude with respect to this bill and again extend my congratulations to the distinguished member for York Centre. In reference to this being a Canadian award to Canadian service personnel, has it been taken into consideration that from time to time non-Canadians serve in an operational capacity with Canadians within the NATO context? Would the Canadian government consider extending to that relatively rare handful of people—nevertheless they are there permanently on officer exchange programs, and so on—their inclusion in connection with the award of a service ribbon or medal?

● (1720)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of the hon. member but I am afraid I cannot give him a definitive answer. It seems to me that there would be a problem of protocol since this country would be making awards to citizens of other countries, and I suspect that there would have to be consultation between the governments involved. I think it is a matter which would have to be subject to negotiation with other countries before it could even be considered.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my understanding that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) would like to offer certain comments as to the procedural acceptability of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North. I wonder if the House would agree to let this matter stand over until tomorrow, at three o'clock, at which time Mr. Speaker will hear arguments pro and con the acceptability of this amendment. Meanwhile the House could go on debating the motion for second reading of Bill C-83. Is this agreed?

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, when intervening, I rose to reserve the rights of the government, and it may not be I who will speak to the amendment. I hope that is acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so agreed.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, before I was so politely interrupted at five o'clock I tried to make two points, namely that this bill lacks provisions concerning our native peoples and provisions concerning hard drugs in Canada.

When he began his remarks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) elucidated some of the lofty ideals which he hoped this bill would meet in improving our criminal justice system. An ideal to which he and, I am sure, all hon. members subscribe is the ideal of the independence of the judiciary. I ask the minister to read again the answer of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) as reported on page 11457 of Hansard for March 3. I know the minister has acted in good faith and is making a serious attempt to inquire into the matter.

I think every hon. member should examine carefully the answer made on March 3 by the Minister of Public Works in response to a question by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I have read the record with care. That is the only incident to which I draw the attention of hon. members. I think the minister and hon. members ought to be concerned about it. I trust that despite any consultations in which the minister may engage he will give serious consideration to what the Minister of Public Works said on March 3 in answer to the hon. member for Calgary North. May I put on record once more the answer to the hon. member for Calgary North. The Minister of Public Works said:

> I had a conversation, also, with the Associate Chief Justice of Quebec, along, as I discovered, with a great many other public spirited citizens who had taken part in trying to effect a solution to a rather difficult and, to some degree, unprecedented problem. The hon. Mr. Justice Mackay has suggested that my intervention, whatever it may have been—and he does not make any suggestion as to what it was—did not have the desired effect.

To be fair, the minister disclaimed any intention to influence the judge's decision. Nevertheless, any member reading that answer must question if such intervention is consistent with an independent judiciary, of which the Minister of Justice spoke so eloquently. Is it consistent with one of the objects of the legislation? Is it right and necessary for the Minister of Justice to question the actions of another minister?

I turn now to gun control. Despite what the hon. member for Calgary North said this afternoon, I fail to see language in this bill which says that rifles or weapons must be registered. Such provisions in this bill are licensing provisions and ownership provisions. All hon. members have received much mail from those interested in gun sports. It is important to consider the objects of worth-while organizations; incidentally many of their worth-while recommendations are contained in the bill.

I have before me a brief from the B.C. Wildlife Federation. It is on gun control. In bold type we are told, in the brief, that all firearms owners should be licensed. This bill does what the B.C. Wildlife Federation asks, and what many gun clubs in Canada ask. I was urged personally not to touch on the question of gun registration. I say that the government is to be congratulated for a reasoned approach to firearms control.

I have read the bill through. Largely, it is sensible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Did I go too far?

Mr. Epp: You had better modify that.

Mr. Leggatt: Although I have some reservations about parts of the bill, I say that the principle of this gun legislation is sound. At a time like this some credit should be given to members of the public who had considerable influence and worked very hard to see some change made in gun laws. Mr. and Mrs. Slinger had a tragedy in their family as a result of firearms killing. Their member, the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne), has been active in this matter. It is to his credit that we now see brought to fruition a significant change in the law.

● (2010)

We can also congratulate a lady from British Columbia, Mrs. Maggie Burtinshaw, whose son met with a tragedy. These people, Mr. and Mrs. Slinger and Mr. and Mrs. Burtinshaw, did not hide or go away to suffer their tragedies. They had a feeling for the Canadian community. They wanted to do something so that other tragedies would not occur.

We in this House very often argue statistics on the question of gun control. What percentage was shot by rifle, what percentage was shot by handguns? The real question is the human tragedy. It is not statistics. It is the personal story of people like Mrs. Burtinshaw and Mr. and Mrs. Slinger who had the courage, out of their tragedies, to come to parliament to make sure that similar tragedies are not repeated. This House should congratulate those individuals in particular for their efforts in terms of trying to provide some safety in the area of gun control for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I also wish to congratulate the coroner from the city of New Westminster, Mr. Doug Jack, who a long time ago started to be concerned about this. He investigated 26 homicides in the New Westminster coroners' district. He found that 24 were as a result of firearms.

An hon. Member: Is he a doctor?

Mr. Leggatt: He is an ex-police officer. He was concerned that the recommendations of coroner's juries which have been made over and over for the past ten, 15 or 20 years were never reflected in legislation. He could not understand why. I can understand why. When I came to parliament in 1972 I just had to read my mail coming from various gun clubs, continually arguing there should be no change made under any circumstances.

That position has been modified over the years. We can congratulate most of the people in the shooting sports for a rational approach to the question of gun control. In fact their positions have become modified. Some of us who came to this House with a firm position with regard to the registration of weapons have modified that position. There has been a meeting of minds to a very large extent on the question of gun control.

You cannot avoid looking at some statistics on the effectiveness of the question of gun control. In Canada the handgun is the agent for about 10.4 per cent of our homicides. That is not a high percentage, but you must consider that the handgun is a restricted weapon in Canada. In the United States, where it is largely unrestricted, 54 per cent of homicides occur as a result of the handgun. When you refer those figures to Canada, we are doing the same with long rifles that they are doing in the United States. There is no more cogent argument that controls work when you compare the two cultures which have some similarity. Where we control the weapon, we reduce the extent of homicide.

It is important to remember that in Canada the firearm of one kind or another is the agent used in about 44 per cent of the homicides. Something like 50 per cent of those homicides are domestic. When you sift through these domestics you reach the conclusion that there are preventable homicides as a result of the negligent distribution of firearms in Canada among people who should not have access to them. That is what this legislation is designed to do. For enshrining that principle, our party will support it.

We have some reservations, however, in terms of what the legislation does not do. There are some very special problems with rural and native people in Canada. Native people, particularly in the north, have a severe problem in terms of their survival in that climate without the use of the rifle.

If the issuing officers in the north have a standard that is the same as that in the south, there could be a very severe prejudice to native people. Our party will suggest there should be guidelines drawn for the use of the rifle by that special group of people who need the rifle to survive. For example, we may have a case of an indictable offence in the north where a native person, or someone working in the north, is convicted. Without the use of his weapon his livelihood is finished. Therefore there has to be some flexibility and exception under the terms of the legislation in that area.

I see the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in the Chamber. I am hoping that the government will give consideration, if not to amending the legislation, to setting forth some very careful guidelines for the licensing officials in the north and in rural areas so that people who require a weapon for survival are not deprived of it frivolously or through the prejudice of a licensing officer. It may be we will have to apply different standards in different parts of the country. That is something we have to recognize.

I am disappointed in another area. One of the recommendations continually made by firearms groups such as the B.C. Wildlife Federation and the Canadian Wildlife Federation is on the question of mandatory competency tests and training prior to the issuance of a licence to purchase a rifle.

I examined the legislation carefully. I cannot see any provision whereby some form of training or competency testing is required. This is a fairly severe weakness in the gun control legislation. Our party will propose to amend this legislation in accordance with recommendations by groups like the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the B.C. Wildlife Federation to encourage the responsible use of weapons, and the training and competency tests that are so necessary.

There was a recommendation by the Canadian Wildlife Federation which I think is attractive and which, I am sorry to say, the government has not seen fit to adopt. That is with respect to delay in purchase. A person wanting to purchase a rifle can simply walk in and pick it up if he meets the ownership licensing provision. In some cases a tragedy could be averted if there were a 24 hour delay in delivery of the weapon, if a person has an illegal purpose for the weapon or is emotionally unstable at the time of purchase.

There are a number of areas where recommendations by the Wildlife Federation and people involved in shooting sports have not been adopted. I hope the government will take a second look at amendments this party will be proposing in those areas.

I am delighted, of course, that the legislation ends mail order sales of weapons.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member might permit a question solely for the purpose of ensuring that the record is correct. I draw his attention to clause 106.8 of the provisions which allows the Solicitor General to enter into agreement to maximize the co-ordination with provincial laws relating to game hunting and firearm safety training.

● (2020)

Mr. Leggatt: There might be some provision for entering into agreements with provincial authorities, but it seems to me that the government could provide leadership in this area. There is nothing to prevent the federal government taking the lead in terms of competency tests. I don't see that there is any jurisdictional problem. It could have been set forth as one of the prerequisites in connection with the licensing provision. However, I appreciate that there is a capacity to enter upon agreements later under the provision to which the minister has referred. I understand from my respected friend from Regina-Lake Centre that the minister could do it under the migratory birds legislation.

In any event, in summary, though we have some reservations about the gun control legislation we think it is a useful first step. It does incorporate the major principles we have been seeking to incorporate, and it goes a good distance toward accommodating those interested in the shooting sports and the hunting field who are so concerned about the licensing of weapons. Licensing, it seems to me, is a small price to pay by those in the shooting sports who have a legitimate purpose in using these weapons. It is a routine arrangement and one which, I imagine, will be complied with in order to protect that sport and its respectability, while preventing those who should not have weapons from possessing them.

Before embarking on new legislation it is wise to take a look at legislation presently on the statute books. As things are now, a person can walk out of a mental hospital suffering from a paranoic delusion, buy a long-barrelled rifle and shoot whoever he is paranoid about. At present there is nothing to prevent such an occurrence. How many fatalities have resulted from these and similar circumstances?

We have been talking about statistics and, I admit, statistics can become boring. But over and over again I read in newspapers of homicides which, under this legislation, might have been prevented. Obviously it will not solve this problem. People will still be able to obtain weapons from the black market. Nevertheless there is a real chance that an unstable or emotionally disturbed person will be unable to obtain weapons. Some people ask, "Why don't you control the possession of knives?" Well, there is always a point at which one stops. They might as well ask why one is allowed to buy shoes or boots without a licence. After all, people are sometimes kicked to death. The fact is that the gun is the most dangerous weapon because it takes only the pressure of an index finger to cause death.

The statement that people kill people and that guns do not kill people does not stand up to serious examination. I could quote item after item in newspapers to illustrate the point I am making. Here is a heading, "Labourer kills wife, then self". This man had been under psychiatric care. Under this legislation he need not have had access to a weapon had the licensing officer been informed. Here is another heading, "Elderly Man kills Son-in-Law". This was the case of a senile person; the weapon he used would have been removed had the relevant information come to the attention of the licensing officer.

I read of another case where a man was shot to death after a dispute over the digging of worms, of all things. In a resulting argument one of the parties obtained a weapon and shot the other. The person was obviously emotionally disturbed; if there had been a history of instability the legislation we are considering might have prevented this homicide. There are, of course, the classic tragedies which occurred in Ottawa and Brampton involving two boys, both obviously unstable. One might argue over whether or not this legislation would have prevented those two incidents, but there is a clear chance that it might have done so. It is surely incumbent upon the House to try to reduce homicides and the price to pay, that is, an application to a licensing authority, is small indeed.

I wish to deal now with the subject of wire tapping. We fought this battle in 1973 and now we are back fighting it again. The Minister of Justice suggested that those who criticize the changes in the wire tapping bill are raising doubts about our police forces. I have not seen a bigger red herring in this House for a long time. Look at the report of a Law Reform Commission, a report which the government paid a great great deal of money to obtain; it is true hon.

gentlemen opposite paid very little attention to the recommendations contained in it. I will read page 61 dealing with the question of the admissibility of illegally obtained evidence in courts of law.

> Rules of evidence are unlikely to prove very effective in controlling police behaviour. However, the courts must be able to protect the integrity of the adjudicative process. Therefore evidence should be excluded if it was obtained in such a manner that its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute and in effect render the judicial process, which ultimately is designed to further the aims of the penal system, self-defeating.

This is a law and order bill. It should mean law and order for you, for me, and for the police too. I see no reason why the police should be rewarded by permission to introduce illegally obtained evidence. The law is for all of us, not just for some of us. This proposal does nothing to reduce the crime rate, but if we allow illegal evidence to be produced it does a great deal to bring the judicial system into disrepute.

Another provision the minister seems very keen on is the removal of the notification process. With the greatest respect I do not think he understood why that provision was put there in the first place. It was meant to provide a check in this exceptional area so that the police would not abuse their right to wiretap and so that, ultimately, an innocent citizen would know his communications had been intercepted. This was the method by which parliament decided to reduce the number of unnecessary interceptions.

Wire tapping is not a normal police procedure. Look at the statistics in the United States and you will find evidence of the most amazing kinds of fishing expedition which have revealed nothing except the bedroom behaviour of all kinds of people. The United States experience of wire tapping goes to the roots of the system under which we live. It profoundly affects the right to privacy.

If we remove the right to privacy we must do so carefully and in a manner consistent with the rights the public has traditionally learned to expect by way of protection from big government. The two provisions the minister proposes in this area represent the most serious erosion of the kind of rights to which we are accustomed under the British judicial system, which I am sure we all respect as among the finest in the world. I hope the Minister of Justice will give serious consideration to withdrawing those changes. Let me tell him that the members of this party and, I hope, most of the opposition are going to fight them with all the vigour at our command.

We have little to argue about the provisions regarding dangerous offenders. It is a rationalization of the program. There is a useful change, as I understand it, in the sense that only violent sexual offenders qualify now for an indeterminate sentence, and that is an improvement over the old system. Nevertheless we are still faced with the problem of the discretion given prosecutors and attorneys general; the manner in which the section is applied can be abused substantially. I am therefore issuing the caveat regarding this section, perhaps for the guidance of attorneys general and prosecutors in this country, that they had better get together and have a conference and decide who is going to be charged under the dangerous offenders provisions, and who is not.

At the moment the majority of people who are presently serving time in Canada come from British Columbia, and this is because of some very effective prosecutions in that province. Nevertheless it is clear that those sections were not being applied properly across the country. It seems to me that a national conference of some kind on the application of the dangerous offenders provisions is fundamental to seeing that the sections are applied fairly.

The bill also deals with changes in the operation of our prisons and parole. I should like to quote from the minister's statement which he issued on February 24:

> —a revised construction program that will accelerate the replacement of large, obsolete maximum security institutions by smaller, more manageable institutions and the reduction of population in the existing medium institutions—

Although the minister talks of reducing the prison population there is no question, if one examines the bill, that the prison population will increase. I see the Solicitor General shaking his head. If we amend the mandatory parole provisions regarding violent offenders as the bill provides, and the capital punishment bill provides for 25 year mandatory sentences—though that is not as important in terms of numbers as the general parole changes—then I would be happy to be enlightened if this does not mean that we will be increasing the population of our prisons very substantially. So these pious statements about reducing the population of our penal institutions in Canada, quite frankly I do not think will wash when one examines the approach being taken to sentencing.

Mr. Allmand: They have to do with non-violent crimes.

Mr. Leggatt: Another facet connected with parole that has been of concern to me is the lack of consultation with those who most intimately know the subjects for parole. It is very easy for a prisoner to get himself ready for a parole hearing, and what happens is that the glib and articulate wind up out on the street while the inarticulate remain inside, when quite often the reverse should be the case. We should consider having consultations with other inmates in the institution and with the guard staff who have more day-to-day contact with the inmates of institutions.

There is not much doubt that one of the reasons, why the penal system has come into such terrible disrepute has been the mistakes that have been made in the issuance of parole. They have been horrible mistakes; there is no getting away from that. The problem continues to be in the granting of parole—who gets parole, and the review process that presently exists. I submit that the kind of consultation that should be carried out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt: May I thank the House. I will try to close my remarks briefly and not take advantage of the generosity extended to me. If I may get off the subject of parole for a moment and back to the question of what we do about the dangerous offender who will now spend 25 years in prison without eligibility for parole if the murder bill passes in its present form, I contend it is time we take a look at our maximum security institutions. I suggest that what we need is a super maximum security prison for that kind of prisoner, and there may be only ten of them in each of the maximum security prisons that we have. Certainly the institutions we have at the moment are not doing what they should. Morale is at rock bottom in those institutions and a war is continuing between the Solicitor General, the administration, the guards, and inmates. No one has been able to bring them together.

What is the answer to this situation? The answer is not to make the same mistakes again. First of all, in terms of morale we have to examine the question of raising the salaries of people who work in our prisons. They do a difficult and dangerous job and in British Columbia it is one that is not paid very highly, being just above British Columbia's minimum wage. I give people who go into our prisons every day full credit for doing a dangerous job and a great service to our community. But that is only part of the story, Mr. Speaker.

The rest of the story has to do with the whole civil service structuring of the operation of the prisons, and in particular with segregating the kinds of prisoners we have. For example, we should not have sexual offenders and stool pigeons in the same institution as drug traffickers and violent offenders. There is neither rhyme nor reason to that.

The minister has talked about his new program of smaller institutions. I read the Hall report when I first came to the House in 1972 and it seems I am still reading the same report; there has been no change. We do not have any crash priority program to phase out existing facilities and construct new facilities, and until we have the public are not going to be satisifed with this kind of legislation as a means of dealing with those who are in maximum security prisons.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this legislation is not going to solve the crime problem in this country—let there be no mistake about that. There are major areas not dealt with by the bill. The only preventive legislation is that having to do with gun control. We have to get at other problems such as hard drug trafficking and native crime in Canada. These areas remain untouched. We also have to deal with disparity of income. An examination of the crime rates in urban areas reveals that that is where the highest rates are. It is also where you find the highest disparity of income. That is what breeds crime. It breeds crime through envy, through unemployment, and through child abuse. There is ample evidence of massive child abuse and this is not being controlled.

This party will support some of the sentencing changes because the public are entitled to feel secure. They have a right to be concerned about safety and rising crime rates, rates that are clearly demonstrable. But until we get to the cause of crime which, as I say, is urban proverty, drugs, and psychopathic behaviour that must be identified at an early age, we will not make a serious dent in what is essentially a cultural problem in Canada.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-83 is aimed at protecting Canadian society from perpetrators of violent crimes and others. And the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) told us this afternoon about the different subjects dealt with in this bill. I think that bill C-83 deals with several matters. It is some kind of an omnibus bill. It deals with firearms, parole, penitentiaries, jails, correction institutions and wiretapping.

Mr. Speaker, at first we should expect a bill that would ensure to everyone the security they expect in Canada. After reading the bill more carefully, I realize that the technocrats who drafted it acted once more against common sense. This bill will allow the Minister of Justice to seize arms belonging to honest people under the pretext of protecting them while more freedom will be given to well-known criminals who are threatening the safety of all Canadian citizens. The bill should be entitled "Rifles in jail and criminals at large". This government proposes a stricter control on firearms, but who will be affected by this control, Mr. Speaker? Certainly not the criminal element which is getting larger every day. Once more the good will pay for the bad. In fact, the only group that will be directly and efficiently affected by this control is the majority of honest people owning an arm for their personal use or their pleasure. This will be one more noose around their neck, one more restriction, a control that will not improve by one half of one per cent the safety in our country.

Mr. Speaker, can we believe that this minister will be able to control all the firearms owned by criminals in Canada and elsewhere. Of course not. It would be a marvellous opportunity for criminals to operate in another field: the illegal trade of firearms that will add to that of drugs, prostitution and all other crimes that are increasingly destroying our society.

The point was made previously that the bill would reduce the number of gun accidents. I am convinced that the small percentage or real accidents caused by firearms will certainly not be reduced one tenth of one percent when there is absolute control. We never had such control since the beginning of Canada, and I believe total control as proposed in the bill before us is exaggerated. I suggest it will not reduce in any the number of simple accidents, or even suicides for that matter.

If someone wishes to commit suicide with a firearm, he will find the way to buy a gun and kill himself. But this is disturbing everybody. This is another case of restricting honest citizens' activities, without stopping in no way those who should be stopped, gangsters in other words. It is not good policy in my view to pass such general legislation. I am for a certain amount of control, or some kind of registration for certain types of firearms. I even accept an intelligent control of firearms, a restricted licence. I wish to explain this, Mr. Speaker. I am referring to businessmen, travellers, bank managers, store managers, credit union managers, managers of every other financial institutions that must handle funds day and night. Those people must own licences. In my view, everyone in an important public function should be licenced to carry an arm if he so wishes. This will put him on an equal footing with his aggressor. These days, one must be able to face an aggressor, because it is the only way to protect one's life. This should be the case with drivers of every public vehicule, while on the job. Why do so many honest citizens fall victims to their aggressors? Simply because they were attacked by a well-armed individual. If they had been armed, if they had been holding a firearm licence while on the job, most probably the murderer would have been the first to fall. This would have relieved society, without the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) being able to save the murderer at the victim's expense. Everyone should have the right to self defence against the one who wants to take his life. That is the right to live, Mr. Speaker. This is the right that honest people have to keep their life.

Several people will be surprised by such a liberalization, but it is the only way, Mr. Speaker, to have law and order respected as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) advocated this afternoon, in this era of liberalism we live in, when the greatest offenders are favoured by the greatest judiciary protection ever seen in Canada. We demand that protection for the honest and peaceful man be guaranteed. Is it asking too much from our Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker? In the ridiculous judicial system we live in, government authorities continually pity our criminals while thousands of victims are left without any protection, when their name is not even mentioned.

When shall we have legal reform that gives priority to the victims of criminals? Today, we worry about the criminals, but we never think about their thousands of victims. They are never mentioned. Let them fend for themselves, let them organize themselves. For instance, we show concern for the criminals, we think that we do not give them enough, that we should build houses for them and allow them to go out two or three times a week, and send them women at least every night to console them, but we never talk about the thousands of victims of these same criminals. Today, we multiply paroles and allow the killers sentenced to life imprisonment—the term is "life imprisonment"—to commit one, two, three and even four murders, or we allow the numerous organized escapes which have well-known consequences.

The first reform should therefore be to consider the conditions of the victims of crime, which are often very painful. The government has introduced no legislation to compensate the victims. We have talked about this quite often, but there is still no legislation to help and compensate these victims. What is the minister waiting for? When shall we stop orienting our justice simply towards the rehabilitation of criminals, and bring help to the hundreds of victims which remain marked and often handicapped for life. On the contrary, the minister seems to want to give criminals a medal.

When shall we finally amend our legislation so as to give more protection and security to police officers when they are dealing with criminals? Our police officers have to wait for the bandit to shoot at them before they can shoot back. This is equivalent to condemning police officers to suicide. And what about police officers who appear as witnesses in criminal cases. The evidence of the criminal is more highly considered than that of the police officer. I have occasionnally followed the work of certain police officers in murder cases, and I came out of the court disillusionned, because our laws give all the protection wanted to the murderers and nothing to the police officers. They are often ridiculed. After such events, we have a tendency to blame the judge, but it is our laws that we should blame.

I have myself often had the tendency to be dissatisfied with certain judges, but when examining the whole facts, I realized that the laws were responsible after I had discussed the matter with the judge and after he had told me: I could not do otherwise. The laws must be corrected. There is a lack in that respect at present in our laws.

If we want order, we must first protect those who are appointed to maintain order. I heard someone say earlier that policemen must come under the same terms as others. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. Policemen are men of law who must not be considered as plain civilians. They have rights. They have powers. They must be a tool for them. This bill proposes to increase the number of parole commissioners to 26. I will say in passing—without taking too much time although I would like very much to discuss those famous paroles more at length—that most members recognize today that paroles have become ridiculous; I wonder whether it is changed today or if we still continue to release all prisoners to allow them to go and commit other murders or armed robberies.

Increasing the number of commissioners will not solve the problem. It will be solved when the government will do something—I say the government because we know that the minister always has the last word, just like the Solicitor General always has the last word and may release whomever he wants.

I read in the paper that a guy sentenced to life did four years in prison. Imagine how painful it must be for a murderer to do four years in prison! The Solicitor General can do that, or the minister can intervene in paroles. There is no need to ask ourselves why today we see so many robberies and murders; it is because of the famous paroles. We want to rehabilitate prisoners. But when a person has been sentenced to 5, 10 or 15 years in jail, let him serve his time. If he has been sentenced to 15 years in prison, let him stay there for 15 years!

I say that parole should not even exist. We should instead give a just sentence. Some judges, considering that parole is so easy to obtain, say to themselves: We will give a criminal 10 years in prison, and he will serve four. But that is not right. If we want fair justice, let us give a sentence of three or four years, but let the prisoner serve it. We should not follow the example of unions in wage settlements. Organized workers say: We will ask for $8 to get $5. That is not justice. If it is three years, it is three years, if it is five, it is five.

When the person convicted has been sentenced to five years, it is not the role of a board, in spite of the judge's decision, to release the prisoner after two years in jail. Then why do we have judges? Thus we do not need judges any more; let us ask immediately the opinion of the parole board to see how long a prisoner must stay in jail. I think this is ridiculing our judicial system. As long as the appointment of commissions or judges will be political, and this is true in any area, we will have political results.

In the province of Quebec, we would have had for the first time the opportunity to have an efficient Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime, but because of the weakness of our legislation, stemming from the definition of the jurisdiction, all the main witnesses in this inquiry are today beyond the reach of the commission. They are under sunny skies while their victims are still here. I wonder whether the federal government has not complicated matters and taken the risk of restricting the powers of our provincial commission.

Everybody acknowledged that the work undertaken by the commission of inquiry was positive and ingenious. This work was within its jurisdiction but federal intervention was required to stop it all. I wonder if the amendment moved by the federal government will not stand once more in the way of this provincial commission. Could it be because the commission was too successful when it began to unearth political machinations by the ruling party, which was not a pretty sight to watch and an even more disturbing thing to hear? When the most notorious names of the underworld are among the campaign managers of a major political party, what more can you expect? I am asking the minister whether the job of the 26 men board will be to check the work occasionally too efficient of our commission?

It is a question that all Canadians are asking themselves after the legal incidents that took place in Quebec these past few months. The people of Quebec have lost confidence in the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and have suspicions about Canadian justice. It is this government's responsibility to restore the confidence they used to have in our justice. And surely it is not by opposing 90 per cent of the people that some ministers will restore their image.

Can you believe that you will accomplish something if you restrict the number of firearms among honest people, fine them if one ever happens to forget or neglect to bring back his shotgun or museum piece? When one sees how this government acts, one wonders who are really guilty of crimes perpetrated in Canada. The honest man or the criminal? Why is there so much violence in Canada? Is the government not primarily responsible for this violence with all these anti-social laws that were put forward in recent years in this House?

Let us bring forward more human laws and violence will decrease! Let us legislate for the Canadian people instead of doing it only because of high finance. Let us stop fiddling with protective policies or indulging in partisan profitability and we will have order and peace that the minister is wishing. Everyday, this government acts in a discriminatory way towards the poor by not providing them with minimum wages. The government further promotes violence among working people and low income heads of families by allowing and contributing to interest rates of 12 to 40 per cent, depending on the credibility of the borrower.

All this is designed to safeguard the interests of those who fill up the electoral funds of parties elected by big wheels. Therefore it is useless to strengthen control on weapons held by poor people if this government keeps on shining up its economic weapon, the worst of all. As regards investigations and firearms control, I hope at least that the government will give this responsibility to the various police forces, thus avoiding hiring a whole army of control agents to go around the country.

Wiretapping was discussed a while ago: the representative of the New Democratic Party said he was against it. I am for it. Anyone who is against wiretapping has something to hide. It is the supreme technique for policemen who want to make a serious inquiry. They could very well bug my office, my house, everywhere, it would not bother me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): But it would me, Mr. Speaker, though I have nothing to hide: but it would annoy me, disturb me.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): It would not bother me in the least. I am not talking about wiretapping to see what goes on in a home, but wiretapping criminals. I say that, for our policemen, it is the only sturdy tool, to enable them to do good work or make a conclusive inquiry.

We have seen it at work in Quebec, during the inquiry on organized crime. To my mind, the government must continue to allow policemen to use wiretapping when dealing with murders, the underworld, drugs and all other crimes committed today.

Mr. Speaker, there are many clauses in this legislation whose adoption I would have been in favour; but since we have to do with an omnibus bill and since on the other hand there is some clauses I cannot accept, I will certainly not vote for the whole bill, because I could not swallow such a piece which is too big for the moment. I would have liked this bill to be divided in two or three parts; this would have been easier for us to dissect and to vote on each of these parts.

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-83 is a very important piece of legislation. As its title indicates, it is an act for the better protection of Canadian society against the perpetration of violent and other crime. It deals with matters which are considered crucial by Canadians at the present time.

I am sorry that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has already left as I want to say that I think he was being somewhat unrealistic in attacking the bill because it does not deal with all the causes of crime, as he charged. As I think all members of the House know, it is questionable if legislation ever really gets to the causes of crime at all and, if it does, it is even more questionable if it is criminal legislation that does so. Crime has broad roots, and obviously through legislation we can hardly grapple with crime in all its aspects. Yet this bill does come to a very realistic treatment of at least the effects of crime in our society today, and certainly proposes some solutions for the problems that we face.

What is important about the legislation is that it adjusts our criminal code still further to social change. If there is anything that is important about the law—and many things could be said to be of importance about it—perhaps the most important thing of all is the fact that law must constantly reflect the society that it has to govern. Law is not something that just comes from the sky; it is something that has to be worked out by people as the best rules to govern the conduct of people in society. That is more important in the case of criminal law than in any other form of law, and it is most important that that law keep constantly in touch with changes in society.

I think we have often come to think in recent years that changes in law following changes in society usually mean the loosening of law. That is often the case. We have seen changes in that direction and we have seen areas in which the criminal code has retreated, and undoubtedly we will see more of those. But as our life changes and becomes more complex we will also see many ways in which the law will become more restrictive. For instance, with the coming on the scene of the automobile we have had to develop a whole new class of laws that we have been strengthening in recent years, and here I mention laws to deal with intoxication while driving. Similarly with respect to the increasing prevalence of weapons, perhaps more important, with the increasing sophistication of weapons, it is necessary for us to adjust our laws.

Here we have a new measure in Bill C-83 which is largely restrictive in its application. Nevertheless it is highly justified on the basis of necessary adjustment to social change. I join those who have already congratulated the two ministers on having introduced this legislation. It is in general an excellent piece of legislation.

I really intended to speak largely about the matter of electronic eavesdropping, but I am glad to see the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has returned to his seat because I would like first to make a few comments about his address. I found his address so discursive and so disturbing that I decided I had to devote my initial remarks to some of the questions which he raised. I might have been tempted to refer to his speech as being marked by a scattergun approach if he had not himself presented us with a better metaphor this afternoon when he spoke about the tumbling mustard plant which is a native of the west, the one that spreads its seeds around. Certainly he spread a lot of seeds around this afternoon but I do not think any of them will germinate, because they are dead.

One thing that was especially lacking in his approach was his attempt to blame so much of crime—in fact one had the impression he blamed all crime today—on the federal government. It does not require a very sophisticated criminal law theory to adjust to the fact that there is shared responsibility in the law in Canada. The administration is largely under the control of the provinces even though much of the criminal law is made by the federal government. In fact if the hon. member were to care to look at his own province of Alberta I think he would find that there has been a large increase in crime in that province in recent years, probably larger than in many other provinces.

When governments are involved, we have to take provincial governments into account as well as the federal government. Actually as the hon. member for New Westminster indicated so well, the fact is that law, especially criminal law, is only one of the means of dealing with crime. Crime is a subject which cannot be wholly embraced by law and certainly not wholly in its causes.

The main point made by the hon. member for Calgary North was that the bill should be severed. I was quite mystified by this for a few minutes, but then I realized that the official opposition really has not changed a bit. We on this side have been expecting great new things as a result of their leadership convention.

● (2110)

An hon. Member: Tell us about your leadership convention.

Mr. MacGuigan: I would be glad to give a speech on leadership at any time. You need it.

Mr. Epp: Go ahead, tell us all about it.

Mr. Muir: Tell us about Dr. Smith.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) has the floor.

Mr. MacGuigan: Psychiatrists are obviously needed, judging by the comments I am hearing from the other side.

Mr. Muir: That is why they have one at the head of the Liberal party.

Mr. MacGuigan: With all the great questions facing us, the reason why the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) concentrated on this question of severing the bill into its various parts was because this is apparently the only matter on which the opposition can agree.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Careful what you say, Mark. Joe is here.

Mr. Muir: Now we know why Smith beat the hell out of you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I just felt I had to come back because there is so much to do in this House, as the opposition is proving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: But I found the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North disturbing for none of these reasons. I found it disturbing because he was suggesting that for reasons of conscience the bill should be split. There was an undercurrent to his whole speech that there was a natural right to bear arms. He never squarely said this—he never squarely said anything in his speech—but it was implied. There was this undercurrent, a feeling throughout the whole of it that we had to protect the sacred natural right to bear arms. If that is to be the line the opposition takes in the House on this bill, this is going to be a very—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, usually the hon. member gets right to the point of every bill, and I am a little shocked that he is straying in such an unacceptable way at this time. We are dealing with Bill C-83, and I hope he gets to the bill in the next minute or so.

Measures Against Crime

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that that is a point of debate and not a point of order.

Mr. MacGuigan: This is the first time I have ever seen the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) shrink from politics. Perhaps he should take advice from his provincial counterpart.

Mr. Epp: You know all about provincial politics, don't you?

Mr. MacGuigan: I was talking about this unfortunate undercurrent, and I was saying that if this is going to mark the speeches of opposition members on this bill, this is going to be a sorry day for the Conservative party as well as for debate in this House.

Mr. Epp: Look at your own house and what is left of it.

Mr. MacGuigan: I not only have my own conscience. I have to worry about you people too.

Mr. Coates: We don't need you as our conscience.

Mr. MacGuigan: The theory of the right to bear arms is not a Canadian theory; it is not a British theory; it is an American theory, and it is part of the most revolutionary aspect of American life, the one part of American life which has been rejected by all Canadians looking at the United States from the very beginning of our history. We can say that we are not Americans because we refused to share that tradition. If that is the kind of argument hon. members opposite are going to make against this bill, if they want to have that kind of alien importation of American philosophy and to strike at the British and Canadian tradition—which members of their party have been so proud to uphold over the years—then I am very worried about the course of this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Just to refer to the various kinds of control which are provided by this bill with respect to firearms, I might mention providing stiffer sentences for most crimes involving guns, the permitting of police seizure of weapons which are likely to be used in an offence—which I think will prove to be a very valuable power—tighter regulations concerning both restricted and prohibited weapons, and perhaps the centerpiece of all these measures, the licensing of all gun owners and gun dealers. That is really the heart of the legislation.

In addition to that there is the program of the recall of all unwanted weapons and the program to promote greater legal responsibility for those who possess weapons. However, the heart of all this is the licensing of gun owners and gun dealers.

The kinds of arguments we heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Calgary North are really not very effective arguments with respect to gun control. Most Canadians today will agree that it is just as important that guns should be as controlled as automobiles. If uncontrolled both are dangerous things, and guns are much more dangerous than automobiles.

[Mr. Alexander.]

I do not think anyone can successfully make the argument before the Canadian public or this House that guns should not be subject to some form of licensing and that gun owners should not have to show a certain responsibility before they are given the privilege of using firearms, and it is indeed, a privilege. In Canada it is not a natural right. I do not know what the hon. member for Calgary North hoped to prove by repeating the phrase one gets from U.S. extremists that when guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns. I do not think we should have that kind of argument being used to oppose this bill. That will not win very many supporters for the hon. member who makes it.

I also want to say some words about the wiretapping provisions of the bill. When we approved the protection of privacy bill some years ago—1974 was the year the bill was proclaimed—the votes at that time indicated that most hon. members of this House believed that wiretapping was necessary in view of the increasing sophistication of criminals and criminal activity in our country. There seems to be no other way by which the police can be effective in dealing with criminals except through the use of devices which are of this degree of sophistication. However, even used by the police, wiretapping is somethng which is dangerous. It is sufficiently dangerous that it requires an unusually careful balancing of interests every time it is allowed, even when it is carefully controlled by law. It must be very carefully controlled and very carefully restricted so that it is always used in the public interest and does not get out of hand.

As chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs I may not have as much opportunity as I would wish in the forthcoming debate in the committee to express my viewpoint on this, so I want to do so here this evening, first with respect to the notice provision. We had an indication here from the minister today, and indeed from our general awareness of what is going on, that the police consider a problem to exist because of the provision that notice must be given to a person who has been wiretapped 90 days after the wiretapping is completed—after the investigation is completed, to put it more accurately—and that this is unduly hampering the police.

Although I have never seen it put this way, I suppose one might say that the exemption provisions which allow a judge to defer giving the notice, while they are broad enough to allow continuing investigation, are not broad enough to provide for continuing suspicion. I have some reservations about allowing notice to be deferred when we are proceeding only on the basis of continuing suspicion and when the investigation is actually finished. Yet we know there are people in our society who are sufficiently borderline in their activities that a particular investigation may be concluded by the police—and by any reasonable test the police might have to say before a judge that that investigation was completed—but they would not want to have notice given to that person to make him aware in a very direct way that he was being watched by the police. Perhaps we will have to take all this into account in committee. I have an open mind on it at the moment. But even if there is a problem not taken into account by existing law, that does not necessarily mean that no notice at all should be given. Perhaps the law could be changed in other ways, to require notice still in some circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. gentleman, who was a distinguished dean before coming to this House, not agree that the judge who grants leave to wiretap should also be given the right to extend or abridge the time? Would this not be better than having the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) abruptly suggesting or requiring that notice be repealed?

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to agree with the hon. member for Calgary North despite what I said earlier. I have considerable respect for his legal ability, and the action he proposes might be successfully embarked upon. Perhaps it would be better not to restrict notice to the judge who gave the original order, but that would be one way of solving the problem.

Another way would be to allow any judge broader powers for deferring notice. Now he must require that notice be given, except when the investigation is still continuing. Perhaps his power should be broadened so that the police can receive authorization not to give notice even over a long period of years. That might provide the protection they need. I fear that if we do not enact provisions which will provide the police with effective legal procedures for wiretapping, either they will not use wire-tapping, in which case there may be more criminal activity or, worse, they will resort to illegal wiretapping.

My second area of concern is with respect to the specification of crimes. I am prepared to listen to the government's case in committee, but I have in mind that the present law is the result of a motion moved by a government member in 1973. As I recall the vote, the motion carried 206 to 26 in favour of the existing law. However, as the minister said this afternoon, we must keep the law under constant surveillance to see that it adequately meets the needs of the times. If necessary we could bring in another amendment which would add more specific offences, rather than proceed with what is proposed at present, but if there is a case to be made for total coverage, I am prepared to listen.

I am especially concerned about government proposals with respect to derivative evidence. If the present law banned such evidence I would not feel quite as I do; but the present law does not ban the use of derivative evidence. As a result of a government motion, which carried 115 to 114 on December 4, 1973, we gave a judge power, in cases where the judge thought it was in the interest of justice, to allow derivative evidence to be presented in court. This was a reasonable compromise among the various positions. Some wanted any form of illegally obtained evidence to be available in court, even the direct evidence of the wiretap. On the other hand some would have extended the ban both to direct evidence and to all other evidence obtained from so-called indirect or derivative evidence.

In 1973, when the law was put in its present form by parliament, we gave the judge power to admit secondary evidence. Although there was a general rule against the admission of derivative evidence, we gave the judge power to make exceptions to that rule. Really, we did not give him much guidance in the legislation, and the matter was left to his complete discretion. It was in the sole discretion of the judge when such evidence was to be admitted as evidence. I voted in favour of the proposal at the time because I was concerned about the alternative.

It had been drawn to our attention, I believe by the NDP attorney general of British Columbia, that if we suppressed all such derivative evidence we would not be able to deal with a case in which the original, illegal wiretap had been undertaken, not by the police, but by some criminal group. If one criminal group listened to the conversations of another and the wiretap fell into the hands of the police, the police would not be able to use the wiretap taken by the criminals. That would have restricted investigatory procedures. Also, if the police were wiretapping for one crime, say a lesser crime, and in the course of the wiretap discovered evidence of a much more serious crime, like murder, the police would not be able to use such evidence. It would seem that the police would not have the legal authorization to do so. It was argued that if there were such a discrepancy as between two crimes, the police should be allowed to use evidence so gathered. For these reasons we gave the judge discretion.

I might say that my bias is strongly in favour of keeping that discretion with the judge. As the minister said this afternoon, one of the lynch pins of this legislation is judicial supervision. I think he was probably talking about judicial supervision with respect to wiretap authorization, but we should go further, since throughout the bill judicial supervision is an important aspect of our present way of controlling police action.

The minister suggested that one reason for changing the law is that the present rule produces delays at trial and exclusion of evidence. I am not particularly concerned about the exclusion of evidence. Delays at trial are a problem, but I do not think that they should weigh very heavily in the balance against the result if we gave the police carte blanche.

If the police are not wiretapping illegally, there is no need to amend the legislation. If they are wiretapping illegally, then we in this House want to know why. We do not want to give them any protection or encouragement in that regard, or allow them to use evidence obtained in that manner.

We have set out rules which allow the police to obtain evidence by electronic means. They are adequate, perhaps generous, for law enforcement purposes. If we were to allow the police, in cases when they do not follow laid-down procedures and obtain evidence illegally, still to get the fruits of those illegal procedures, we would make a very serious mistake. The matter at stake is not a small one.

The existing legislation provides for judicial discretion, and explicitly says that when there has been a mere mistake in procedure in obtaining authorization, such as when the police think they have obtained valid authority but have not, such a mistake is not to count against the police. That is not the kind of illegal wiretapping about which we are thinking. We are thinking about the case when the police decide not to apply for an authorization, by-pass the law and spurn the law and this House. We do not want to allow the police to act in that way.

I hope illegal police wiretapping is not a problem. If it is not, I am not sure that the reason advanced, namely, that to avoid delays at trial, is sufficient to offset the considerations on the other side. We are dealing with the protection of the public from injurious action by the police. The public need to be reassured that the police, their guardians, are themselves acting according to law.

We are all very much concerned about protection from criminals, and we have substantial apparatus for doing that. But if we cannot also be assured that the people who are protecting us from criminals are not themselves taking advantage of us, we shall have put ourselves in a most unfortunate position.

The Minister of Justice has given comfort to those who have reservations about the bill by observing that he will listen attentively and with an open mind to what is said in the House and in committee. We shall all be interested in pursuing a fruitful dialogue with him on these matters.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of a better time to debate the government's proposed peace and security legislation. The members of my party welcome the opportunity to discuss this legislation and to discuss the kind of law necessary for restoring the confidence of our people in law and order.

● (2130)

In these days law and order are giving a good many Canadians a great deal of concern. One of the things we, as Canadians, have been proud of is that we have one system of justice that applies to everyone in this nation. As far as justice is concerned there are no second class citizens. What has given me concern, as I am sure it has most members of this House, especially those trained in the law, is the indication that there may have been some interference with the way that justice is administered in this country, and that there have been moves by members of this House that in effect bring justice into disrepute. In their minds Canadians are concerned that there are two sets of laws in this nation, one for some members of parliament and one for all other Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: That just is not good enough. It is not good enough for any member of this House. It is certainly not good enough for any member of the Progressive Conservative party in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: As I said earlier today in reply to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who for some reason decided that he is the fountain of all wisdom and justice in this country, even in excess of that now available to the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), there are two forms of ethics as far as law in this country is concerned.

As a member of this House for close to 18 years, and having been trained in the law, I appreciate that there is absolutely no way, especially for a man trained in the law, under any circumstances to telephone a judge who is deliberating on a case, even so much as to ask when he is going to render his decision, because it may be presumed that in some way you are interfering with his very real responsibilities.

Let me say something about judges. They are very lonely men. They are lonely because they assume a very special and sacred responsibility, to administer the law. They have no one to whom they can turn. In this particular instance Justice Mackay would not even have had the knowledge that is available to the public in his special privileged writings to the Minister of Justice if it were not for some chance that the information became public. What greatly concerns me as a member of parliament is how many other times that we do not know about when some judge in this country was contacted by a member of the executive and had something suggested to him, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) said, to get him straightened out as to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: There is only one way that any individual, be he a member of this House or anyone else, to get a judge straightened out as to the facts, and that is to take the stand in a courtroom and tell him what the facts are in his mind. That is the only way we can have a system of justice in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I want to say to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) that even though at one time he may have been dean of a law school, he should not come into this House and try to be the conscience of the Progressive Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Earlier today the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woollians) said the foundations for the judicial system and penology of this country were laid by the Diefenbaker administration, in particular by the Hon. E. Davie Fulton who, for a long time, gave great lustre to the role of Minister of Justice. He gave us the foundation on which we are trying to build today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Indeed the parole system on which the Minister of Justice is today endeavouring to build in order to give people peace and security was the creation of the Hon. E. Davie Fulton when he was Minister of Justice. It was a tremendous achievement, and it can be a tremendous achievement in the future to bring peace and security to this nation. However, we have to build in a constructive, not destructive way. The hon. member for Calgary North today stated some of the reasons why he feels this legislation is not adequate to handle the job we feel has to be done if we are to have law and order and protection for the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) pointed out the biggest gap that exists in this legislation when he said you would not even think there is a drug problem in this country, However, our penitentiaries are filled with people involved in one way or another with drugs. This is one of the major problems facing the country today. Yet, as he says, we have nothing. I cannot imagine why this is being left out because it is one of the most serious problems we, as a parliament, have to grapple with if our children and their children are going to be able to live without the danger inherent in the drug trade as it exists today and without the major crime being created by drugs. We cannot walk away blindfolded as if it does not exist, any more than we can walk away from the two systems of justice that appear to be in existence at this moment in time in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: There is a lot of concern about certain aspects of this legislation. I want one fact to be clear. The hon. member for Calgary North never left the impression with me or any other member of this party that he was opposed to gun control, an impression which at least one member tried to give. There is no way that this party is against gun control. What we are in favour of are realistic controls, if they are possible to perceive, that will give to those who use guns the right to continue their sport without at the same time building up a bureaucracy that takes away the kind of freedom that the government over and over again has taken away from Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: An article in the Truro Daily News points out that Canada has no gun control at the present time except for that in the Criminal Code and which the government has not done very much about until now. It states that Japan has the tightest gun control of any country in the world, yet there is in Japan as much crime and unlawful and disorderly conduct as in Canada. Therefore let us not feel that this is a panacea for curing the kind of crime we face today.

The minister suggests that crime in Canada is under control. Well, Mr. Speaker, if crime is under control here, everybody is in trouble! Crime is growing at an unprecedented rate in this country and much of the blame lies at the feet of the government for ignoring the problems of crime for so long—indeed, up to the day on which it brought in this legislation.

● (2140)

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has done no one a favour by running around with his statement, associated with capital punishment, to the effect that if we do not play his game in the way he would like us to, he will pick up his toys and go and play by himself. Mr. Speaker, for the sake of law and order in this country the best thing which could happen would be for the Solicitor General to pick up his toys and go and play by himself somewhere else. What he has done to the morale in the penitentiary service is—

Mr. Alexander: Criminal?

Mr. Coates: The hon. member for Hamilton West says it is criminal. It is almost criminal. One needs only to talk to any employee of the penitentiary services, and I have a great many of them in my constituency. What bothers me is the attitude of those employees today compared to what it was when Davie Fulton was Minister of Justice. It bothers me to go into those penitentiaries and see what is happening there today as compared to the time Davie Fulton was Minister of Justice.

Today there is absolutely no discipline in our criminal institutions. The reason most people find themselves in those institutions is because they cannot face the discipline of society. But they go into those institutions today and find there is no more discipline there than there is out in the streets. As a result, barely are they out once more on the streets than they are back in the penitentiary again. There is a complete failure when it comes to rehabilitation in our penal system and this is mainly because we have ignored the fact that discipline is needed in order to convince inmates of our institutions that they do not want to go back there.

Since the hon. member for Calgary North and my new leader are both from Alberta I want to point out that one of the most realistic pilot projects in penology exists in the province of Alberta at the present time. They have said to people who transgress, to those who have done material damage to their fellow citizens, "You are not going to the penitentiary to lie around; you are going to work and compensate those to whom you have done damage." I cannot think of a better form of rehabilitation than to put some of these guys to work and make them pay the bills thay have run up. If they have to make amends in that way they will not want to make a second trip nearly as fast as they do today when things are almost as good inside the penitentiaries as they are outside. Indeed the food is probably better. The Solicitor General was even going to pay them unemployment insurance. I suppose the government might still pay them all unemployment insurance; almost everyone else in the country is getting it as a result of the economic policies, or lack of them, for which the government is responsible.

It is imperative that we get back to the realism Davie Fulton showed when he was Minister of Justice trying to build up a system which would make it unlikely that many of those who entered the institutions would wish to risk returning to them. We have not been getting such a prospect since the present administration took office.

Davie Fulton probably built more new penal institutions than any Minister of Justice in the history of this nation. One of the concepts which he introduced, the one which impressed me most, was that of minimum security institutions, which were really nothing more than what one might call work camps. There were no bars, no walls, no guns worn by the guards or correctional officers, whatever they were called. One of the first of these institutions was constructed at Springhill in my constituency shortly after the disaster there. It was one of the finest contributions to rehabilitation which existed. But the present government did away with all those institutions. They were not part of its program. In fact they were the least costly way of housing prisoners.

The decision to do away with them was an unfortunate one; it happened because there were a lot of negative thinkers sitting around on the treasury benches. They thought it would be a good thing to save a few dollars by shutting down those institutions. Mr. Speaker, from the taxpayers' point of view it was a most costly decision, as evidenced by the crime situation which confronts us today.

When the minister tells us crime is under control, I ask him this: when were ten people murdered in any city in this nation in any other period but this? Yet this happened a week ago in the City of Montreal.

Mr. Woolliams: Ten over a weekend.

Mr. Coates: These things have been happening because the government has failed to give leadership along the road to better rehabilitation processes and a more realistic approach to penology. We must get back there. We are as willing as any group of individuals in the House to help the country get back on that road, and we shall co-operate with the minister in any way we can to improve this legislation. There is no doubt that the legislation needs improvement. For instance, in the area of gun control there is one clause which suggests that if a gun is stolen from an owner and is used in the commission of a crime the owner must be made responsible or a party to the crime in question. Just how ridiculous can you be? The situation we then face is that if a car is stolen and used later in the commission of a bank robbery, the person whose car was stolen could be regarded as a party to the crime.

If parliament wishes to see the legislation improved I can think of no reason why we should not be able to come up with a package which everyone finds acceptable. After all, every member of the House wishes to have the best possible laws on our statute books to protect all Canadians.

● (2150)

The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has drawn my attention to another section which provides that everyone who has a weapon in his possession while attending, or on his way to attending a public meeting is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On his way to a Conservative party meeting.

Mr. Coates: I would say it would be a meeting of the sort we have these days in the province of Quebec, and probably in the city of Quebec.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They are very convincing.

Mr. Coates: Well, I do not know whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is very convincing. I have watched him in the House for quite a while, and the way he was holding the podium the other night made me think he was going to jump through the television screen. If that is convincing then all I can say is that it is a new form of convincing.

Seriously, what type of meeting has the minister in mind here? If a person is carrying a concealed weapon for a number of clandestine reasons and goes to a meeting surely to goodness this should not be dealt with on summary conviction but should be an indictable offence.

In effect, the government is saying that it has to control guns because guns kill people. In this section it is saying that carrying a gun is no more serious than a speeding offence. I suggest we get our priorities straight. Many facets of this legislation will require a lot of examination and probably a lot of amendment before the package is perfect.

As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) pointed out, there is nothing in the bill to deal with drug offences. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, or the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will be responsible for drug legislation, but will they please tell us, so we know who it is, and that something is being done about the problem. As I say, there is absolutely nothing to deal with the use of drugs in this peace and security legislation.

We all know that drugs are being sold and used in the penal institutions of this country and are responsible for most of the trouble in those institutions. It is a serious problem, one we should be made fully aware of before we are even asked to vote on this legislation. We must know exactly what the government is going to do about all aspects of crime in the nation. Perhaps it just wants the legislation to be cosmetic so as to please the great majority of the people who never see or handle a gun. By telling them that the government is going to put on controls, and do this and that, it hopes things will be a lot better in this nation. I suggest that gun control is not going to stop the crime in our streets at this particular time. Rather if we control the use of drugs we will be a long ways down the road to stopping crime. As I say, we had better hear something about this from the government before the legislation comes back to the House and is voted on.

This is one reason why I think the members of the House should examine the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North. It is a sensible amendment. Many people are upset about this legislation because they have not had the opportunity of placing their positions before the government and the public so far as amendment of the law is concerned. From this point of view, if the bill were sent back to committee and the government's program to control drugs were revealed and explained to the public, we would be in a much better position to make a decision about the value of the total package we are now being asked to consider.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say we must look seriously at some of the rehabilitation programs that have been proposed and which are underway within the penal system. I have before me a petition signed by hundreds of constituents of mine who live in an area called Apple River. The penitentiary service has endeavoured to carry out a project in that area with a private company, and has frightened and alarmed the people of the community. They are frightened and alarmed because no one told them of the danger inherent in such a program. Suddenly things started happening that presented a danger to the residents of the community.

As a result of this the people in the area called a meeting and asked to have the program withdrawn because of the dangers and risks it posed to them. Then at last the officials met with the people, who up until then were told nothing of the program. When people in a small community suddenly start facing inmates on the loose, naturally they become fearful. That is no way to carry out a rehabilitation program, and there are too many programs of this type under way at present. The Canadian penitentiary service must work with the people if they want to get things done in that area. That has not been the case, but it must be the case in future if we are to have acceptance on the part of the public of the kind of rehabilitation programs the government wants to put into effect.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, if you permit me to call it ten o'clock, I will be able to make my speech tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—SUFFIELD COMMUNITY PASTURE—REQUEST FOR PERMANENT OPERATION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in this adjournment debate I wish to continue the discussions I have already had with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) relating to the recent decision of the Department of National Defence that "grazing should not be permitted in 1976 and possibly for several years thereafter", that is, in the Suffield PFRA pasture near Medicine Hat.

● (2200)

On February 19 I addressed a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) based on a most unfortunate and irresponsible press release issued by wildlife and fish and games interests in Alberta, the first sentence of which reads as follows:

> The native grasslands of the Suffield Military Reserve, approximately 1,000 square miles of what was once one of the ecologically most valuable natural areas left in North America have been almost totally destroyed by the mismanagement of the Canada Department of Agriculture, Department of National Defence and the PFRA administration.

In my opinion it was sentiments such as this quotation, essentially from environmental and wildlife interests, that were instrumental in influencing the Suffield base commander to recommend to the Minister of National Defence that PFRA pasture grazing should cease. In doing so the Minister of National Defence chose to reject the very practical recommendation of his cabinet colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In essence the PFRA report stated that there has been no unalterable damage done to the ecology of the range, although there is some damage; that PFRA could improve conditions with better distribution and more uniform grazing, with increased watering facilities, but this requires extra financing which is presently not available under the temporary operation of the pasture.

PFRA recommends that under the strict terms of reference for use of the Suffield pasture—that it only be available under emergency drought conditions—no grazing be permitted because of the excellent growth here in 1975 but that, if required, the pasture could operate this year with reduced numbers of cattle.

This latter suggestion is a sensible recommendation that any cattleman can support as it is a policy he would follow on his own pastures; I mean by that he would make the cattle numbers fit the available grass.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these PFRA recommendations were prepared by agronomists like Dr. Bob Lodge and PFRA director Walter Thomson who have a history of over 40 years of PFRA pasture administration to back up their practical knowledge and experience.

I take some considerable pride in pointing out that PFRA has always agreed with my personal view since serving in this House that the emergency drought term of usage is ridiculous in determining if the Suffield pasture shall be used on a year to year basis.

Surely now is the time to establish a policy of an ongoing permanent pasture so that proper management, with adequate financing, can develop sufficient watering facilities and good range management. It does not follow that a permanent pasture will permit indiscriminate grazing with excessive cattle numbers. Cattlemen ranchers are by nature the very best conservationists. Their long-time livelihood depends on their understanding of and co-operation with nature.

Production of short grass on the Suffield pasture is the highest and best use of these lands and the multiple use concept of these lands by cattle, wildlife—including rattlesnakes—and even gas wells, is a long established land use principle that must continue to be recognized.

We are not so desperate yet for food that the Suffield pasture should be stocked completely with deer and antelope—and no cattle. Cattle and sheep are much more efficient converters of grass to meat. The Suffield pasture will support approximately 5,000 head of breeding cattle—I refer now specifically to the PFRA pasture—at a maximum quota of 20 head per patron, and that means some 250 farmers, all small cattle producers, will be severely affected by this order.

Since this entire area is primarily a ranching or grazing area these local farmers have not been able to take advantage of better grain markets, whereas cattle markets currently leave much to be desired.

I know that the minister and his parliamentary secretary are very well aware of this situation. I would ask the minister to consider again the recommendations of the PFRA staff and confer with his cabinet colleague, the Minister of National Defence, to work out some sensible compromise solution that will permit the Suffield pasture to operate this year perhaps on a limited basis. At least it should continue to operate. The good public relations that would accrue to his department, and indeed to the Department of National Defence, would be well worth while.

I want to point out that the use of the main Suffield area by the United Kingdom for tank training is now in its sixth year of a 10-year contract. I suggest it is not too early to begin to establish a policy for the future use of this 1,000 square mile area. I further suggest that the government of Alberta should be foremost in these future policy deliberations if only because the lands are, after all, Alberta lands, overlaying one of the largest proven natural gas fields in the world, now just beginning to be developed by the people of Alberta. In closing I wish to remind the minister of the petition he has received from 29 cattle producers along the south side of the Suffield Pasture.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the hon. member in reality was addressing his remarks tonight to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It may have been that he expected my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. McIsaac), would be here tonight. My information was that the question was directed to the Department of National Defence. If there has been a mix-up in that regard I apologize to the hon. member, but it is certainly no fault of mine.

The hon. member stated that he was making his proposal in the utmost sincerity. I want to assure him that there is no doubt concerning his sincerity in respect of the case he is putting forward. I do not have very much information to add. My minister dealt with this problem during the question period and again last week during the adjournment debate. During the course of that debate, as recorded at page 11450 of Hansard, he stated:

> The Suffield range is held by the federal government primarily for military training purposes. The range can, however, be of very real benefit to cattlemen in the area, particularly in times of emergency and in periods of drought, as it has been in the past. It seems to me it would be best for all concerned, including the cattlemen, if the range is kept as a reserve for emergencies, as in the past, and not used for grazing on a continuous basis. If the range is used each year for continuous grazing there will be no extra pasture available during periods of drought.

Later on in the same answer he said:

> ... I see no reason why we should not give full consideration to re-opening it in future years in special circumstances, as we have done in the past.

I wish to emphasize that the Suffield range is held by the Department of National Defence primarily for defence purposes. The decision with regard to the disposal of the range in the final analysis is a decision of the Minister of National Defence. He has made the decision. The range is and will continue to be administered by the Department of National Defence. His decision for this year is that there will be no use of the range for pasture unless an emergency situation arises.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF REAL GROWTH AND JOB CREATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this debate tonight arises out of a question I put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on December 16, 1975. At that time I referred to the information brought out by the former minister of finance that in 1975 there would be a real growth in the economy of 4 per cent and that the employment increase in 1975 would be a quarter of a million of new jobs.

The minister on December 16 really did not answer my question. The supplementary question I put concerned what his predictions were for 1976. He stated that the real growth, in his opinion, would be 5 per cent. He said that his aspiration is 5 per cent, but made no comment concerning job creation.

Just last Friday, as recorded at page 11531 of Hansard, the minister was asked further questions by my colleague from this party concerning the economy, and specifically what steps the government is taking to improve the growth performance in the economic sector. I was most startled to read the answers given by the Minister of Finance last Friday because virtually all he did was to read from Statistics Canada, and I can only presume that those statistics have so confused the minister that he does not know the sad state in which we find ourselves in 1976. I think it is good to put this on the record and I hope the parliamentary secretary tonight will shed some light concerning the present attitude of the Department of Finance with respect to the Canadian economy. I suggest that the Minister of Finance appears to be trying to justify the sad economic performance that we have experienced in Canada over the last 18 months. Let us look at the facts.

As I have stated, in November of 1974 the then minister of finance predicted that we would have a 4 per cent real growth last year. In reality it was two tenths of one per cent, and even by December 16, the day to which I referred, the present Minister of Finance would not admit that the government had failed. What is the cost of that failure, what is the cost of not producing a 4 per cent real growth in our economy? It is a loss of $4.2 billion or $420 per taxpayer. That is the shortfall that the government experienced in 1975, and I believe it is time it admitted it to the Canadian public.

If the Minister of Finance wants to read Statcan figures let him tell the public the real truth, namely, that there was a loss of over $4 billion from the projected figures in 1975. To put that in perspective, a $4 billion loss is enough to pay our whole debt interest charge in a year in this country. It would build 111,253 living units in the country, that is, 40 per cent of the total number of apartments and homes built in 1975. That is a colossal shortfall for any government to have within the few short months to which I have referred.

To put it on a per capita basis—I think that is perhaps the most significant figure for the average Canadian—the loss in 1975 was $67 per person, that is, the average person in 1975 compared to 1974 was $67 less well off than he was the previous year. That is Liberal progress. If you want to refer to the decline in percentage terms on a per capita basis, the decline in 1975 was 1.4 per cent from 1974. Now we are told by the same Minister of Finance that there may be an increase of 5 per cent in the current year. But with that 5 per cent increase, if it is achieved, and do not be surprised if it is not, it would mean that in the last two years the real growth on a per capita basis in this country has only been 1.9 per cent over a two year period. Imagine, less than 1 per cent a year in a country with the resources and the vibrance that is ours in Canada.

In the question that I put to the minister on December 16 I asked him about job creation. The previous minister had indicated that 250,000 jobs would be created. In December it appeared that only 123,000 jobs were going to be created, well short of the initial target. Now we have the figures up to date. For 1975 we find that there were only 108,000 new jobs created but, most alarmingly, in the manufacturing sector there was an actual decline of 99,000 jobs in 1975 from 1974. Manufacturing employment is now lower, based on the 1975 average figures, than in any year since 1972 in Canada.

Is it not absolutely shocking that we have a Minister of Finance who only last Friday attempted to justify these figures, indicating that somehow the economy was relativery healthy, and he used Statistics Canada figures to try to justify that proposition? Now perhaps the minister will answer my question, or at least his parliamentary secretary. I should like to know what in fact the job creation reduction for the Department of Finance for 1976 was? What does the department currently believe will be the growth in this country for 1976? And above all, what immediate measures does it intend to take to improve the growth performance of our economy for 1976? The Canadian public deserve some answers. I think the time has ended when the government should be permitted to be less than candid in this House with regard to the state of our economy.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on December 16 the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) regarding estimates in real growth, and particularly regarding job creation. Up to a point he was quite accurate, but I do not agree with some of the figures he has used. Let me try to put some of the figures I possess on the record.

Canada's job creation and real growth in 1975 have to be considered against the background of severe declines in world economic activity in 1974 and 1975. Real output for the seven major OECD countries as reported in the December, 1975 Economic Outlook declined absolutely by 0.6 per cent in 1974 and is expected to show a decline of 2.25 per cent for 1975. Canada took offsetting action to support output and employment in November, 1974. As the world situation declined even more sharply in the winter of 1974-75, further offsetting actions were taken by Canadian governments in the spring and June of 1975. Even so, Canada's real output slowed and then declined through the first quarter of 1975, mainly because of the decline in Canada's real exports which reflected the severity of the decline abroad.

Canada's real growth and job creation were thus held below our goals and expectations, but even so in both respects Canada's performance was much better than most other industrialized countries. I will give the figures. Canada's real growth between 1973 and 1974 was 2.8 per cent. Between 1974 and 1975 the increase of Canadian real GNP was a fraction of 1 per cent, according to the national accounts released last week. Average year over year employment growth in 1974 was 379,000 and in 1975 about 167,000, and I believe the hon. member quoted 108,000.

Mr. Stevens: How about December to December?

Mr. Trudel: The low point of Canada's economic activity in the recent world recession was reached in the first quarter of 1975. Since then Canadian real output has grown by about 2.2 per cent. In the eight month period from April through December seasonally adjusted employment increased by 214,000. The Canadian economy is at present experiencing a cyclical recovery which should carry on through 1976.

Forecasts of the increase in real output in 1976 are falling in the range of 4.5 per cent to 5.5 per cent, which was quoted December 16 by the minister. Improvement in exports and housing activity, increased real consumer spending, and a modest resumption of inventory stocking are the principal positive factors for real Canadian growth in 1976.

To conclude, there should be considerable expansion of employment, but owing to the continued rapid increase in the Canadian labour force unemployment is not expected to drop sharply in the immediate future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INDIA—GUARANTEES SOUGHT PRIOR TO RESUMPTION OF TRADE IN NUCLEAR MATERIALS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in May of 1974 India exploded a nuclear device in the Rajasthan desert. That explosion was a herald of one of the most prolific dangers ever to the perpetrated on this world, and the fact that Canada provided the technology, the tools, and the knowledge with which that explosion was created is something for which we ourselves must remain accountable and for which we must be held accountable in any world court.

● (2220)

Canadians and parliamentarians have every right to expect the government to tell us in specific terms what the government discussed with the Government of India concerning the export of nuclear aid and nuclear technology. These discussions have resumed, and the government ought to be far more forthcoming with information than it was today. I put certain questions on the subject to the Acting Prime Minister on Friday, and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today. I am appalled at the lack of interest and concern they showed about the horrendous, politically suicidal course on which we are embarked. Some months ago I said, when speaking on the subject of Canada's continuing export of nuclear technology, that in today's world:

> Acceptance of a country's word that it will not use our technology to create weapons is a show of confidence which conditions in today's society do not warrant. Faith in a country's avowals of its peaceful purposes, avowals which can be withdrawn at any time, for any reason, amounts to naive gullibility. Trust that any country will prevent materials and knowledge from falling into the hands of criminals and lunatics is suicidal stupidity.

Yet here we are, embarked on further discussions with a country which has already shown bad faith, which has already broken an agreement over the use of nuclear technology. One year ago the British publications, New Scientist, said:

> Canada has consistently refrained from committing its sophisticated nuclear energy industry to military purposes, yet it has emerged as a major offender under the nuclear weapons non-proliferation treaty.

Only those who deliberately blind themselves to the obvious continue to deny that Canada is wilfully and knowingly contributing to the increasing likelihood of some future world nuclear catastrophe. I say that because I am greatly disturbed. The Prime Minister, who sent his personal, political adviser to India to discuss the resumption of shipments of nuclear aid and technology to that country, did not care to inform himself 48 hours after the conclusion of those discussions as to the outcome of any accord or agreement entered into. He did not inform himself as to conditions Canada might require India to observe before we entered into the accord. He was too preoccupied with his party's domestic concerns in Quebec to discover what this country was negotiating with another country which had already broken the terms of a contract relating to nuclear matters.

I am appalled. In our own, unthinking way, we may be instrumental in unleashing a nuclear holocaust on this world, yet the Prime Minister does not feel accountable to Parliament or the people of this country, and will not explain the terms of the accord.

As a country we cannot stand apart from such conflicts. We cannot stand apart from international conditions which we have allowed to escalate. We have helped nuclear knowledge to spread in the world. As a country we are responsible for our actions and cannot rationalize away that responsibility. We must meet our responsibilities.

We, as a country, have been very fortunate in the knowledge we developed in the last 30 years in the field of nuclear technology. We have not at the same time learned how to contain the spread of nuclear waste. As long as we continue selling, perpetrating, and spreading across this world the nuclear energy we have without any kind of reference, containment or guarantee, there is only one way open to Canada. That is to place a ban or moratorium on all extension and all effort to spread abroad our nuclear technology, fuels, and capability until such time as there is a world agreement that there will be no further explosion of nuclear weapons. Until there is that agreement, Canada should declare an over-all ban, a total moratorium on the export of its nuclear technology.

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadians who would have heard the speech of my colleague from Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) tonight might believe that their government is totally irresponsible with regard to nuclear technological knowledge transfer and aid to Third World countries, which is not the case. I respect the concern expressed by my colleague, but I strongly oppose the overly harsh words, I feel, she has used, the vagueness of her statements and the fact that those statements entertain the latent fear of every Canadian for the nuclear field, since Canadians have always wanted peace in the world.

[English]

The negotiations in New Delhi on safeguards only finished over the week end and officials are now studying the reports received. Nothing seems abnormal in these procedures. In these circumstances it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the course that these negotiations followed. I am sure the hon. member knows that since she referred to the fact that it was only last Friday that she asked her question. Once the report of officials has been studied by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), he will no doubt wish to answer members questions on this issue.

With regard to the relation between nuclear co-operation and NPT ratification, however, I would like to reiterate our policy. NPT adherence is not an absolute pre-condition to nuclear trade on commercial terms with other countries. Binding international safeguards meeting Canadian standards on Canadian supplies, are, however, such a prerequisite. It is for this reason that Canada has been negotiating with a number of countries.

This is a continuing process, not something that stops one day with a perfect agreement which everybody signs. It is an on-going process which we try to improve according to new knowledge. However, NPT adherence is a precondition for extending bilateral government development assistance resources in the nuclear field. Canada will only make new commitments for extending such bilateral aid—as opposed to completing existing undertakings—to NPT parties.

In the case of India, amended and strengthened safeguards on both RAPP reactors would be a precondition for completing such deliveries as remain outstanding for the second RAPP reactor.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER EXPLAIN ATTITUDE TOWARDS QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that during the last weekend, the province of Quebec, and especially the premier of Quebec, had the very great honour to receive a distinguished guest, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada; considering the remarks made by the Prime Minister of Canada about the premier of Quebec on the one hand, and about some goals of the government of Quebec, on the other hand, and since in the opinion of several observers and thousands of Quebecers these remarks are qualified as offensive, arrogant, even insulting towards the premier and, consequently towards the whole people of Quebec, I regretfully move, seconded by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie):

That this House unanimously deplore such a position on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada and, at the same time, invite him to make a statement so that the members of this House may better understand such behaviour.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSAL THAT MINISTER BE TOLD CAUSE OF CRIMES IS CRIMINALS NOT GUNS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent matter requiring immediate consideration.

Since the actions proposed by the Minister of Justice under his public order and security program are aimed at controlling firearms rather than dissuading criminals, and since Canadians want to be protected against criminals and killers rather than against firearms, which are dangerous only when handled by criminals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House hire someone to explain to the Minister of Justice that criminals, not firearms, commit crimes, in order to prevent the minister from eventually jailing rifles and letting killers roam free, which seems to be the logical outcome of his policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT REGULATIONS COVERING SEAL HUNT BE APPLIED MORE STRICTLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the House regret and strongly condemn the crusade undertaken by the Green Peace Corps which, through illegal means, seeks to deprive indirectly the fishermen of eastern Canada, and particularly those of the Atlantic region and of Magdalen Islands in Quebec, of part of their income derived at this time of year from seal hunting, and that the government enforce with all due strictness the regulations enacted and promulgated concerning that kind of hunt.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Since the House gives its unanimous consent, I shall put the motion. Seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) moves:

That the House regret and strongly condemn the crusade undertaken by the Green Peace Corps which, through illegal means, seeks to deprive indirectly the fishermen of eastern Canada, and particularly those of the Atlantic region and of Magdalen Islands in Quebec, of part of their income derived at this time of year from seal hunting, and that the government enforce with all due strictness the regulations enacted and promulgated concerning that kind of hunt.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. An indication was given by Your Honour that this motion was agreed to unanimously. Am I correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43 refers only to the presentation of the motion. I had asked whether there was unanimous consent that the motion be presented pursuant to Standing Order 43, and it was my impression that there was no disagreement with that; therefore, I presented the motion. However, if in the commotion that usually surrounds such motions I overlooked any hon. member who either now identifies himself or who distinctly heard another hon. member withhold his unanimous consent, I stand to be corrected and the motion ought not to have been put.

Mr. Leggatt: The motion ought not to have been put, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Evidently the hon. member makes it clear that the unanimous consent of the House was not forthcoming, and therefore that motion ought not to have been put.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER APOLOGIZE FOR BEHAVIOUR IN RECENT VISIT TO QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I should like to present a motion.

As the federal government exists owing to the express will of the provinces, and as each one of them wants to keep its identity and integrity, and as the contempt and demagoguery expressed by the Prime Minister over the weekend toward Mr. Robert Bourassa were a direct attack on the Quebec premier and an indirect one on all provincial premiers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the House request the Prime Minister of Canada to make a public apology in order to prevent that regrettable incident from having untoward consequences.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be put without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—BASIS ON WHICH CONSUMER MINISTER ASKED MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS TO APPROACH JUDGE HUGESSEN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works who must realize that his answers in this House last Wednesday, as reported on page 11457 of Hansard, have put him in an extremely difficult position as a member of the House and as a senior member of the government. Yesterday the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs refused to answer questions about conversations between himself and the Minister of Public Works. Would the Minister of Public Works now tell this House on what basis the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs asked him to approach Mr. Justice Hugessen?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I support entirely and follow in the footsteps of my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. gentleman does not accept that conversations between members of the privy council are privileged.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION ON REFUSAL OF MINISTERS TO ANSWER

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that the ministers get together on their excuses. The Minister of Public Works is claiming privilege. Yesterday the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was claiming that the reason for his not answering was that the matter was before the courts, I suggest a spurious reason. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he accepts either or both of these dodges as a means of keeping from the House of Commons information that the House of Commons should know about the potential involvement by intervention by ministers of the Crown in decisions of members of the judiciary respecting matters that are before the courts. Does the Prime Minister accept the reasons which have been given for refusing to answer questions by either the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question in great detail last week, when I answered many, many questions. I could rehearse the answer once more, if the Leader of the Opposition wants to hear it. I have heard from the three ministers who were mentioned in Justice Mackay's letter. I consulted myself, since he also saw fit to mention me as perhaps being guilty of some form of contempt.

Mr. Fairweather: And how did the consultation go?

Mr. Trudeau: I listened to their version and feel that their explanations indicated clearly that they were not attempting to influence in any way the judgment of the courts. I have said that if the courts feel otherwise it is up to them to pass this information on to the Minister of Justice, as was requested by the Minister of Justice of the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. Until we hear definitely that the courts feel aggrieved, I take the word of my ministers.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF JUDGE DESCHÊNES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister continues to refuse to make available to parliament information on the basis of which parliament can come to a conclusion as to the propriety of the ministers' actions. Without for a moment accepting the evasions in this House regarding those conversations, and understanding the very limited scope of the inquiry of Chief Justice Deschênes into the legal aspects of the case, may I ask the Prime Minister some specific questions about the publication of the report to be made by Chief Justice Deschênes. First, does the government agree to the full publication of that report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, I must remind the Leader of the Opposition that he is asking his third supplementary question and a series of questions now put would seem to presume on the privileges of the House. I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition might put one question.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister to tell the House if the government will agree to the full publication of the report to be made by Justice Deschênes; also, is the government now actively seeking the agreement of Mr. Justice Deschênes for the release of that report in full, immediately it is received by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not agree to that. The Minister of Justice made clear what the procedure would be. He was writing to the Chief Justice of the Superior Court, to ask the chief justice to communicate to the Minister of Justice any information he might possess on this case which is so disturbing the opposition.

Mr. Muir: Where are your purple robes?

Mr. Trudeau: If the Chief Justice feels that he has something to communicate to the Minister of Justice, we would not, as I made clear in the House the other day, object to that. On the contrary, if he wants to make it public, it will be up to him to decide. It will not be up to us to tell the Chief Justice how he should act.

Mr. Clark: But will you request that?

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REVEAL CONTENT OF CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN MINISTERS AND JUDGES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Last Friday, according to Hansard, the Minister of Justice said that he was sure members of the government and ministers would submit to interviews with the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. On the other hand yesterday the Prime Minister seemed to agree with me, seemed to agree that Chief Justice Deschênes would not normally be called on to look into conversations between members of Cabinet. Can the Minister of Justice indicate what he intends to do now, as Attorney General of Canada and chief legal adviser to the government, to remove this ambiguity; or, will he institute some sort of independent inquiry so that the House may know the contents of any conversations which any ministers of the Crown had with judges relating to the intentions and motives of any ministers of the Crown?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not intentionally paraphrasing me erroneously. I indicated last Friday that if the Chief Justice of the Superior Court wanted to talk to ministers on this matter, I was sure they would co-operate. There was no conflict between my answer of Friday and the Prime Minister's answer of yesterday. As to the latter part of the question, I have already indicated my position. As Minister of Justice, I do not intend to make further recommendations to the government at present until I have had the opportunity to hear from the Chief Justice of the Superior Court any matters he thinks it is appropriate to bring to my attention.

● (1420)

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I certainly thank the minister for his answer. I do not wish to argue with him, but I maintain that there appears to be on the record some sort of ambiguity as matters stand now. Apparently neither the chief justice nor this House may have access to conversations between his cabinet colleagues. Would the Minister of Justice give this House some explanation. Is he prepared to provide any kind of documentation for example that these conversations were about normal government business and not the private and political interests of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, private communications between ministers are confidential. I see no ambiguity whatsoever on the record.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

ABILITY OF BOARD TO MONITOR PROFIT AND PRICING POLICIES OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. This question is about justice—economic justice. Over the past year various officials of National Revenue, including the minister, have admitted to the public that this country loses hundreds of millions of dollars because of the ability of multinational corporations to divert funds from one subsidiary to another in a different country in order to take advantage of tax laws. Given this ability to manipulate profit and loss statements does the minister still maintain that the Anti-Inflation Board is capable of monitoring, let alone controlling the profit and pricing policies of multinational corporations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Those operations in Canada, Mr. Speaker, yes.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister more on his faith than on his facts. We had a chance to speak to some of the people from the monitoring board, the AIB, and I asked a question of Mr. John Hague at the seminar held for MP's on the anti-inflation program. He told me that the National Revenue people had lots of experience in handling such attempts at diverting funds. Given the fact that 60 per cent of our manufacturing sector is foreign controlled, that petroleum is 95 per cent and the Minister of National Revenue has admitted that he really cannot control—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question would he put it.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the face of this admission on the part of the Minister of National Revenue that he had no way of really monitoring the foreign multinational corporations can the Minister of Finance say how he intends to do the monitoring.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would check the record I think he will find he has not correctly stated what the Minister of National Revenue has said. The minister has pointed out that, of course, there is difficulty in monitoring transnational transactions and indeed there is the possibility in some cases that revenue has been lost. Notwithstanding that, the Department of National Revenue over the years has had some success in monitoring the transfer payment problems.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON MONITORING PROFITS OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue in this case. The other day in response to a question of mine, the minister said that people in his department were meeting with their counterparts in the United States to arrange some kind of a method to monitor the profits and transfer payments of multinational corporations. Can the minister say how those meetings are proceeding and whether he has reached agreement with the United States government on monitoring multinational corporations?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, once again we have the hon. member looking at a glass that is nine-tenths full and seeing that it is one-tenth empty when he interprets the wording I used. We are working on a close, almost daily, co-operation with the Internal Revenue Service in areas in which we have mutual concerns, because tax laws are bound by boundaries and what we have to do is work across these boundaries. I must say we have had first class, 100 per cent, co-operation from the Internal Revenue Service of the United States in the hope that we will get other countries to join with us and embark upon simultaneous monitoring which will make us not only effective as we are now but more effective in the future.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER DEFINE "AMENDMENT" AND "REPATRIATION"

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last weekend, the Prime Minister spoke about the repatriation of the constitution from England to Canada. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, I commend him because he had the courage to say how he would proceed with the repatriation of the constitution. Either some people did not understand anything or I misunderstood. Could the Prime Minister say clearly and as firmly as he did last weekend that the purpose of the repatriation of the constitution is not to amend the constitution in England but to repatriate it to amend it here in Canada? Can the Prime Minister repeat if this is what he said namely that we do not need England to legislate on a constitution which properly belongs to us Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada understood, certainly better than some other hon. members opposite. I indicated very clearly in Quebec City and in this House yesterday, and on several occasions before and after, that it was a matter of putting an end to the last trace of colonialism which enables England to pass legislation which is valid and applicable in Canada. We are the only independent country in the world which is in this situation where its laws, and in particular its constitutional laws, can be made by another country; this is precisely what we want to put an end to. Once the constitution is repatriated, Mr. Speaker, the federal government will not get any new power whatsoever.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In my supplementary, I put aside the statements made by the Prime Minister of Canada about Premier Bourassa. That is none of my business and I do not want to talk about it. But referring to the Canadian constitution, the Prime Minister also stated that pretty soon he would proceed to its repatriation and that if he has not the support of the provinces, he will act unilaterally. I also approve of that, because there is no need to beg here and there for repatriating what belongs to us. Here is what I want to know. The Prime Minister said that pretty soon we would initiate proceedings or will proceed to such a repatriation. When does the Prime Minister intend to begin or did he begin to work in order that the constitution, after 49 years of controversy, be finally repatriated, discussed and amended in Canada, and that it really belongs to the Canadian people?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I would like first of all to clarify my previous answer. When I said the federal government would not have any more power than before, I meant it would not take any away from the provinces. The separation of jurisdiction between the provinces and the federal government will remain exactly the same.

As for the latter part of the question, as I have said previously, I intend to report to the ten premiers on the state of the discussions which have been going on for a year. A year ago, the provincial premiers and myself agreed on the principle that repatriation was desirable. I had a mandate from them to seek an agreement largely based on the foundations we had laid down in Victoria. I must now report in writing to the provinces and shall then see whether an agreement is possible on the basis of the progress we have made. If an agreement is possible, there will be the usual meetings, detailed discussions, following which repatriation will take place with everyone's agreement. If not, I shall report to both chambers to find out whether they share my view that after 49 years of fruitless efforts the time has come to take unilateral action.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS REVEAL CONVERSATION WITH JUDGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. I should like to congratulate him on his frankness in his answer to me on Wednesday when he said he intervened to make sure the judge had the facts and did his duty. Today he said that any conversation between privy councillors is privileged. I ask the minister to reconsider his position. Government matters would be confidential and secret, but does he consider a conversation which affects the Minister of Public Works personally in reference to a court matter in which the Minister of Public Works admitted he did intervene with the judge as confidential? Has he reconsidered his position, and will he tell us now what that conversation was?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the hypothesis in the first part of the question, I must say that I have thought over this matter a good deal. I still regard conversations between privy councillors as being privileged—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Do I take it now that the Minister of Public Works is refusing to answer on the ground that all conversations between privy councillors, whatever they may be, are privileged and confidential? Is that his position?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—REQUEST THAT CONSUMER MINISTER SAY WHETHER MINISTERS ASKED TO INTERVENE WITH JUDGE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who I know has had an opportunity to reflect on his refusal to answer questions. Knowing the difficult position the Minister of Public Works is now in, having disclosed some information, I now ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as a lawyer and as a member of this House who has had at least 24 hours to reconsider his indefensible refusal to speak up yesterday, to tell the House whether he invited the former Minister of Finance or the Minister of Public Works to intervene in any way with the judge who was in charge of those proceedings. Surely, he can answer that question.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the hon. member that he consult Beauchesne, 4th edition, citation 149, paragraph (c).

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—PRIME MINISTER'S VIEW ON ESSENTIALITY OF CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN MINISTERS FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the stonewalling is continuing. Let me ask the Prime Minister a question. The other day the Prime Minister said that the chief justice would not normally be called upon to look into conversations between members of his cabinet. Surely, the Prime Minister must now admit that these are not normal circumstances. Does he not agree that the reasons for the conversations and the conversations themselves between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Public Works are vital in order to accomplish a complete investigation by the chief justice?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I honestly fail to see why the opposition is pursuing this diversionary tactic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Are you kidding again, Pierre?

Mr. Clark: Perhaps this is a privileged comment.

Mr. Trudeau: I can see that they are very sadly sidetracked. The essence of the question is what ministers might have said to judges in the course of their duties. What ministers say between themselves or what hon. members opposite say between themselves is not relevant to this case. It may be relevant to something else, but whether the courts have been aggrieved by interference in the course of justice surely would depend on what the ministers said to the judges and when and how, rather than what the ministers said between themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—POSSIBILITY OF PUNISHMENT FOR MINISTERS WHO APPROACHED JUDGES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Let us get down to the nitty gritty. It has been stated by the law societies of both Ontario and Quebec that leaving aside the grievance which might come into play with respect to judges, a cardinal rule has been broken by the ministers who so approached them. Would the Prime Minister now advise this House what punishment he envisages for those ministers who broke those rules, and when can we expect an announcement in that regard?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The point I was making to the hon. member in my first answer—and the second one follows it—is that ministers by speaking between themselves have not broken any rules of which I know. If there are any rules broken—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It must happen frequently that members of the cabinet discuss—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Why are they afraid to reveal it?

Mr. Trudeau: That is my answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: It's not a very good one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: You have broken a cardinal rule.

An hon. Member: Name the cardinal.

Mr. Fairweather: I can name the cardinal. He is with the Queen, Harold Wilson and the Pope—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: —who seem to be intervening in Canada's constitutional evolution.

ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE BY JUDGE MACKAY—SUGGESTED REFRESHER COURSE IN ETHICS FOR MINISTERS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask, pending the chief justice's report—and whether or not it is secret is apparently up to the cardinal—will the Prime Minister convene a refresher course in legal and ministerial ethics for his cabinet colleagues based, I suggest, on a most excellent speech by Professor Lederman—that should have had much wider publicity than it did—made to the judges' meeting last week in Toronto?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this question is addressed to the gallery rather than to me.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—SAFEGUARDS AGAINST NUCLEAR EXPLOSION WHEN NUCLEAR AID IS RESUMED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the hope that he will be better informed than the Prime Minister as to any accord or agreement reached between India and Canada over resumption of nuclear aid.

Will the minister tell us explicitly what arrangements were worked out in New Delhi by the Prime Minister's political adviser, and if any agreement was arrived at which would ensure that India will refrain from the detonation of a nuclear device during the lifetime of its reactors and not just for the 15 month period in which the Rajasthan reactor is to be completed, as initial reports seem to indicate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I am not any better informed than the Prime Minister on this subject, but I can tell the hon. member that the negotiating team in New Delhi, which was headed by Michel Dupuy, the Assistant Under-secretary of State for External Affairs, did reach some understandings with the negotiating team on the Indian side. These understandings are subject to approval by myself and by the cabinet, and until consideration is given to the report which will be made to me, I do not think it would be very relevant or useful to give a report of understandings which have not yet been approved by the government and which may not be implemented.

ADHERENCE TO NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY AS PRECONDITION TO GRANTING NUCLEAR AID—POSSIBILITY OF DOUBLE STANDARD

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister to clarify his government's decision with regard to ratification of the NPT as a precondition to the export of nuclear aid as a result of two statements made by his parliamentary secretary last night on the adjournment debate as follows:

NPT adherence is not an absolute precondition to nuclear trade on commercial terms with other countries.

Later the hon. lady said:

NPT adherence is a precondition for extending bilateral government development assistance resources in the nuclear field.

Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from this that when nuclear exports are thought to be commercially profitable, Canada will peddle its nuclear technology throughout the world regardless of the moral and political consequences of such sales? If not, why the double standard?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no double standard involved at all. In any sale of nuclear equipment or technology to any country, precisely the same standards are applied whether they are applied to a reactor for which we provide assistance through our Canadian International Development Agency or whether we provide a reactor on a completely commercial basis, the safeguards are precisely the same. There is no double standard and in its bilateral agreements Canada exacts precisely the same standards, regardless of the source of the financing.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED—REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROVIDE FOR SHORT TERM FINANCING—POSSIBILITY OF BUYING CANADIAN AIRCRAFT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services and concerns the negotiations presently under way with the Lockheed corporation for the proposed purchase of the Orion LRPA. Since the decision was announced in principle two months ago, can the minister advise whether lack of agreement about front-end money on that purchase, which is over $100 million, was as a result of negligence or oversight by the government or the result of it being deliberately misled by the Lockheed corporation as to the necessity for additional government funding for the contract?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated many times to the House, it is a question of financing on the part of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation Ltd. It is necessarily the question of long term financing, given that corporation's circumstances which prevailed on the international market, and as a result, we are led to be more cautious. On the part of the government, it is a matter of short term financing, and this is an extremely complex question. We are considering the possibility of achieving this short term financing through a re-evaluation of the production schedule originally planned. We are hoping a conclusion will be reached by the end of this month.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I should like to uncomplicate that question for the minister in just a moment. The terms of the contract will require that Canada take the risk by putting up the money. Since Lockheed has no United States federal guarantee or advantage, and in view of the clear case that Canada is risking up to $200 million without guarantee of delivery of this aircraft, will the minister now drop the other shoe and make the obvious decision? Also, would the minister tell the House when they are going to go either to Canadair or de Havilland to provide a Canadian LRPA and put all Canadian workers to work?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, from the contract negotiated but not yet signed with Lockheed Aircraft Corporation Ltd. will flow a major economic boost for Canada and we obviously keep this advantage in mind.

As for the terms of payment of this eventual contract with Lockheed, we are not required to make a down payment. According to the agreed formula, we pay as the production goes on. As for the risk of dealing with Lockheed, some officials met with representatives of the American government to assess what would be their own position towards Lockheed, given the prevailing circumstances surrounding this corporation.

The American government accounts for two thirds of Lockheed's overall orders, which means that Lockheed considers the U.S. government as a major player. The fact that the United States chose to deal with Lockheed reassures Canada to a certain extent.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY WHETHER PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD RECEIVED APOLOGY FROM JUDGE

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Last March 3, in answer to some allegations made by a Justice of the Superior Court, the minister told the House that he would ask the judge to apologize and withdraw his allegations. He gave him three days to do so. I would like to know whether the minister did receive an apology and whether he intends to table it in the House?

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON METHOD OF FINANCING DEFICIT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Following the Prime Minister's statement about the Olympic Games, which amounts to a flat no, the President of the Treasury Board stated at the same meeting that he was trying to find another payment formula. The Quebec finance minister says he is very optimistic concerning the use of this formula. Can the President of the Treasury Board explain what he means when he talks about a new payment formula?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I said in Quebec—and I was simply repeating what the Prime Minister had said—that there is absolutely no question that the federal treasury will make up the deficit resulting from the Olympic Games, because we want to respect fully the agreements entered into by the parties some years ago. As for other self-financing formulas, I have discussed some of these last months with the Minister of Finance. I met him Saturday afternoon, but I have nothing to report at this time.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

In view of the interest shown by Quebecers and all Canadians, I imagine, and since the negotiations between the responsible ministers in Ottawa and Quebec City are going on, when could the minister give some relevant information to the House?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly advise the House as soon as possible. It would be useful to know the views of the hon. member's party about the matter.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY DUTCH CHEESE BEING DUMPED INTO ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture regarding the importation of cheese. Would the minister look into the possibility that Dutch cheese has been dumped into the Ontario market? This cheese, manufactured in Holland, is selling at 40 cents per pound less in Ontario than it sells in Holland?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that all aspects of imported cheese, subsidized or otherwise, are being investigated at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT TO CONTINUE NUCLEAR AID WILL CONFORM TO PRINCIPLES AGREED TO BY SUPPLIER NATIONS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I am not attempting to ask him to breach any cabinet secrecy in respect of an agreement which has not been placed before his cabinet colleagues. I wonder if the minister could confirm that any intended agreement with India with respect to the continuation of nuclear aid will be in conformity with the four principles agreed upon by Canada and the other six supplier nations as a result of the London conference?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly the standards that have been agreed upon by the supplier countries are involved in this discussion. One of the questions that I shall be asking as I receive the report is to what extent the understandings that have been reached in New Delhi comply with the guidelines established by the suppliers before I would send forward recommendations to the cabinet.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that one of the principles involved in respect of the supplier conference agreement was that recipients of nuclear aid must give assurances that nuclear facility imports will not be used to make nuclear explosives for any purpose, even tunnel excavation by nuclear explosion, for any period of time, whereas the intended agreement now on the desk of the minister relates only to an 18 month period respecting the New Delhi agreement. Can the minister comment on the contradiction between no time limit in respect of the supplier conference agreement and the 18 month period specified in the draft agreement now on his desk?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any draft agreement. What I have received is a very summary report by way of telegram. I hope to receive a full report from Mr. Dupuy very shortly. At that time it will be possible to be more precise. However, on the basis of my personal knowledge, I do not believe there is any difficulty with respect to the question of the duration, as has been raised by the hon. member.

SIGNING OF NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY AS PRECONDITION TO SIGNING NEW AGREEMENTS FOR NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It flows from the questions on the New Delhi agreement as well as the statement made by the minister's parliamentary secretary during the adjournment debate yesterday. Is it government policy to complete nuclear power sites without the host country involved having signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, but that all new agreements to build Canadian nuclear power sites will have as a precondition that the host country has signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, that would not be a clear definition or clear statement of government policy with respect to membership in the NPT. I believe that my colleague, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in making his statement in December, 1974 underlined the conditions with which we look at the NPT. Briefly, I would say in cases where we provide direct aid or assistance in the construction of a nuclear reactor, we expect such countries to join the NPT because of the greater responsibility Canada has taken through its provision of financial assistance and because of the greater possibility that exists in that situation for having an influence on the recipient country. In other cases, generally, membership in the NPT is an influential factor in considering whether to undertake a transaction of any kind.

ELECTIONS

DATE OF BY-ELECTION IN OTTAWA-CARLETON—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister yesterday assured this House that he believes the electorate in every constituency in Canada is entitled to representation in the House of Commons, can the Prime Minister inform this House and the people of Ottawa-Carleton when a by-election will be held to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of one of the Prime Minister's disenchanted party members, John Turner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will follow the rules laid down by this House in making that announcement.

Mr. Dick: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister was able to bring on a by-election within 41 days of the resignation of Gérard Pelletier to fill that vacancy in the province of Quebec, why is the Prime Minister leaving constituencies in Newfoundland and Ontario so long without representation in the House of Commons by refusing to call by-elections at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Because we in Ontario are second-class citizens.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I am following the cardinal rules laid down by the House in this matter. In the case of Newfoundland, the vacancy was caused by a Tory member resigning. In the case of Hochelaga, it was a minister of the Crown resigning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HARBOURS

HALIFAX—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID IN CONSTRUCTION OF CONTAINER FACILITIES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the debate now going on, but I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It arises out of last week's decision to have a federal-provincial study on the feasibility of expanding container facilities in Halifax harbour. Does this federal participation mean, should the need for more facilities for the most active container port in eastern Canada be proven, that federal moneys will be spent on new container facilities there? I ask this because we have never had a direct public answer from the National Harbours Board.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it should be well recognized that there is a very fundamental federal involvement in port construction. That would ordinarily involve us in legitimate and needed expenditures in any port, including the port of Halifax. Therefore, the basic answer to the question is yes. Of course, that in no way prejudges the issue as to whether the particular facility recommended is needed and further study will be made for that purpose.

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NEW POLICY WILL NOT CAUSE LOSS TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the dairy producers are concerned by the future plans of the federal Department of Agriculture, could the minister assure the dairy producers that his new dairy policy will not mean any loss of income in comparison with last year, because some dairy producers state that as a result of his new dairy policy they will lose from $5,000 to $6,000 a year?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the milk management supply committee is made up of people from all over Canada, such as provincial representatives, producer representatives and people from the trade. They are meeting in Ottawa today and possibly tomorrow. It is my opinion that people who are productive should be paid for their production. Because they overproduce, they should not be penalized by being asked to give away their produce. In no way will I be responsible for such a program as that.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF INCLUDING OIL PRICES WITHIN GUIDELINES

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Nova Scotia Premier Gerald Regan was reported in Saturday's Globe and Mail as accusing Ottawa of hypocritical expediency for leaving crude oil prices outside the anti-inflation program. In view of this assessment by a fellow Liberal, will the minister now bring crude oil prices under the anti-inflation guidelines?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO NOVA SCOTIA AND MAINTENANCE OF OIL SUBSIDIES

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Is the minister prepared to make very substantial increases in the equalization grants to the province of Nova Scotia as well as maintain the present level of import oil subsidies to offset a severe decline in that province's economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member there have been substantial increases in the equalization payments to Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces in recent years. As to whether there should be a special subsidy for Nova Scotia so it will have a special Nova Scotia oil price as opposed to that payable by the rest of Canadians, it is not a course of action which commends itself to me.

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

NUMBER OF ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEES NEEDED TO COPE WITH INCREASED WORKLOAD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. With estimates of his department already requesting nearly 400 employees to run the anti-inflation program, twice the original estimate of 200, will the minister tell the House how many additional staff members will be required by the Anti-Inflation Board in order to cope with the expansion of their activities announced in the order in council tabled yesterday which puts the number of firms covered by the board at 20 times the original estimate?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question should be directed to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a precise figure in that regard. I will see if I can seek one and communicate with the hon. member.

POSSIBLE EXPANSION OF MONITORING ACTIVITIES—EXPANSION OF CONTROLS—POSSIBLE ADMISSION OF NEED FOR COMPREHENSIVE CONTROLS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the estimates actually come under his department with respect to the Anti-Inflation Board. My supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance. Accepting that general insurance companies are now being reviewed with a view to possibly including those companies under the wage and price controls, will the minister tell the House whether the Anti-Inflation Board or he is considering any further expansion of monitoring and regulating activities into sectors of the economy as yet unaffected by the wage and price control program? Also, will he tell the House whether the expansion of the scope of the anti-inflation program represents an admission that selective controls are inadequate and a realization that comprehensive controls are more appropriate?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that the Anti-Inflation Board will receive a reference from the government with respect to the general insurance industry. Of course, under the provisions of the law, that will be effective from the date of the public statement and the reference. The hon. member seems to be saying in one breath that the Board is acquiring too many personnel, while in the next breath he says it should engage in a program which would require many more personnel. I would have to reflect to see if there is any logic in the two positions.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the rather strange manner in which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) objected to a motion which had already been passed. You asked three times for unanimous consent and obtained it. Then the hon. member for New Westminster rose on a point of order to say that he disagreed.

Being aware of the legal abilities of the hon. member for New Westminster, I am surprised that he took so much time in stating his objection to that motion which had already received, I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, the unanimous consent and which moreover had been passed.

Mr. Leggatt: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was simply rising to point out that because of the noise in the chamber at the time—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

EMPLOYEES EARNING MORE THAN $25,000

Question No. 3,497—Mr. Fortin:

1. How many employees are earning more than $25,000 a year in (a) CNR (b) Air Canada (c) CBC (d) Polymer (e) Eldorado (f) CMHC (g) Industrial Development Bank (h) Farm Credit Corporation?

2. In each case, how many are (a) French-speaking (b) English-speaking (c) bilingual?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) It has not been the practice of the Company to disclose data on employees' earnings in the manner requested. Certain details on annual earnings of various occupational groups of Canadian National employees, however, are available from the publication "Railway Transport" Part VI (Employment Statistics) issued annually by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

2. CN records are not designed to capture the information as requested. However, a survey conducted earlier this year established that roughly 12.5 per cent of those on the senior officers' payroll were francophones. On the St. Lawrence Region (comprising all trackage in the Province of Quebec, except the Gaspé Peninsula, plus a line in Ontario, Vankleek Hill Ottawa—Brent) 78 per cent are bilingual and 22 per cent are unilingual English speaking.

1. (b) Air Canada has not been in the practice of disclosing such information on employees' earnings.

2. Of those employees earning a basic salary of $25,000 a year or more (a) none speak French only, (b) some 70 per cent speak English or English plus a language other than French, and (c) approximately 33 per cent are bilingual. (English and French).

1. (c) 631.

2. CBC records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the Corporation to extract readily and without an inordinate amount of work, time and cost, information about the mother tongue and language proficiencies of these employees. In addition, since the Corporation's records do not necessarily contain the requested information, the final answer would not be complete.

1 and 2. (d) The subject matter of the question does not fall within the administrative responsibility of the government of Canada.

1. (e) 26.

2. (a) 0; (b) 21; (c) 5.

1. (f) The four employees of CMHC appointed by Governor-in-Council are in receipt of salaries of more than $25,000 per annum. It is not the policy of CMHC to disclose salaries in greater detail, since these are matters of internal administration and the responsibility of the President and Board of Directors.

2. The Personnel records of CMHC are not yet complete with respect to language capabilities. Of the total number of employees earning more than $25,000, 61 have been tested, of whom 27 are bilingual.

1. (g) There are 144 employees earning more than $25,000 a year.

2. (a) 0; (b) 105; (c) 39.

1. (h) 36.

2. (a) 2; (b) 23; (c) 11.

PEI COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT PLAN—PHASE 2

Question No. 3,532—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to Schedule "C" of the PEI Comprehensive Development Plan, signed in 1969, for each economic indicator cited (a) a 50 per cent below national average output in the agricultural sector (b) a per capita income of 60-70 per cent of the national average (c) an aggregate annual output in commodity sectors growing on average 2.2 per cent from 1961-1965, what is the level (based on constant dollars) for each year since 1969?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Net Provincial Product per cent Growth: 1970, 7.4; 1971, 1.9; 1972, 9.2; 1973, 12.2; 1974, 8.4. Population: 1970, 110,000; 1971, 112,000; 1972, 113,000; 1973, 115,000; 1974, 117,000. Per Capita Income per cent Growth: 1970, 9.2; 1971, 0.3; 1972, 10.8; 1973, 9.6; 1974, 4.2.

PEI COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT PLAN—PHASE 2

Question No. 3,546—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to the agricultural sector of Phase 2 of the PEI Comprehensive Development Plan, what progress has been made in decentralizing decision-making among district farm offices so they can better adapt their programmes to local needs?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The decision-making process in district farm offices is a matter which is the responsibility of the government of Prince Edward Island and, as such, questions related to these organizational and administative arrangements should be directed to it.

DREE—NEW BRUNSWICK FUNDING

Question No. 3,911—Mr. McCain:

Did the Province of New Brunswick request funding from DREE over the next five years for (a) upgrading of Route 2, Fredericton to Grand Falls (b) upgrading of Route 2, Mactaquac to Woodstock and, if so, in each case (i) how much (ii) how much financial assistance is DREE prepared to give?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: In response to a request from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the province of New Brunswick submitted to the Department an outline of the provincial plan for highway construction and improvement to be undertaken over the next five years. Although the projects listed in this question form a part of the overall provincial plan, there has been no specific request from the province for DREE assistance to them. the question of what assistance, if any, might be provided is being considered in the continuing process of federal-provincial discussion regarding DREE activities in New Brunswick. (i) Not applicable; (ii) Not applicable.

CMHC—APPOINTMENT OF MR. W. TERON

Question No. 3,921—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since William Teron was appointed Acting Secretary or Deputy Minister of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs how many senior officials of the Department including Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have (a) left their jobs (b) been transferred to other departments (c) given notice or signified intention to leave or desire to be transferred and, in each case (i) what are their names (ii) what are the positions they held or presently hold?

2. Has Mr. H. L. Laframboise, Assistant Secretary for Policy and Research left the Department since the appointment of Mr. Teron to assume a position with the Department of Labour and, if not, is it his intention to leave?

3. Did (a) Mr. André Saumier, Senior Assistant Secretary responsible for inter-governmental co-ordination (b) Mr. Harold Dyck, urban affairs co-ordinator for the Prairie region, leave the Department following the appointment of Mr. Teron and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is concerned: 1. (a) Four. (b) Two of these four accepted transfers to other departments. (c) One person has advised he has accepted a transfer. (i) H. L. Laframboise. (ii) Assistant Secretary, Policy and Research.

2. Mr. H. L. Laframboise is being transfered to Department of Labour effective March 1, 1976.

3. (a) Mr. André Saumier, Assistant Secretary, Coordination and Development, was granted two years leave without pay from the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs effective January 26, 1976 to accept a position outside the federal government. (b) Mr. Harold Dyck, Senior Regional Coordinator for the Prairie Region, resigned from the Ministry January 16, 1976 to accept a position with a provincial government.

In so far as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned: 1. (a) Two senior officials of CMHC retired at the end of 1975 because of age or length of service. (b) Two senior officials of CMHC have been seconded to the Anti-Inflation Board. These retirements and temporary transfers are not related in any way to Mr. Teron's appointment as Acting Secretary in the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. Details of personnel administration of CMHC are the responsibility of its President and Board of Directors, and it is not the policy to disclose details of that administration.

ESTIMATED COST OF PROVIDING OLD AGE SECURITY TO THOSE IN THE AGE GROUPS 60 TO 64

Question No. 4,082—Mr. Korchinski:

1. What is the estimate of the cost involved in providing old age security to those in the 64 year age group in 1976?

2. What would be the estimate to reduce the eligibility age by one year in each succeeding year to lower it to age 60?

3. Is there an estimate of what amount of social assistance is presently being received by persons in each of the age groups from 60 to 64 and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. On the assumption that the January 1976 OAS rate remains constant in 1976, and based on Statistics Canada population projections, the estimated additional cost in 1976 would be $259.6 million dollars.

NOTE: The Guaranteed Income Supplement is not included in this estimate.

2. Under the same assumption as that made in the answer to part 1, the estimated additional cost would be:

Year	Eligibility Age for OAS	Estimated Additional Cost
1976	64	$ 259.6 million
1977	64-63	$ 549.6 million
1978	64-62	$ 848.5 million
1979	64-61	$1,148.4 million
1980	64-60	$1,469.1 million

NOTE: The above estimates are based on the current value of the Canadian dollar.

3. Very rough estimates derived from the 1973 Survey of Consumer Finances are as follows:

Age Group	Amount of Social Assistance*
60	$28 millions
61	$23 millions
62	$34 millions
63	$22 millions
64	$18 millions

* Amounts include federal and provincial payments.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is agreement that the order which is to be called first today will be government order C-61. However, I indicated yesterday, a point of order having been raised in connection with a proposed amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North, that argument would be deferred until this time. I hope hon. members will agree that it would be appropriate to hear those arguments now in order to give the Chair an opportunity to reflect on them, so that when we return to Bill C-83 the Chair might be in a position to make a disposition of the question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

On the order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might begin by putting the words of my motion on record:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"That Bill C-83 be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice nad Legal Affairs for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof."

Those of us who were preparing this motion realized at the time the difficulty of wording a motion which would be in order on second reading. Thus, we did give the matter considerable thought. I intend to begin by referring to two authorities, raising points which I shall deal with in the course of my submission. I wish to refer to the fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 278, citation 386. I wish to refer, also, to May's Parliamentary Practice, particularly page 487 where the subject of reasoned amendments is dealt with.

May I say that an amendment at second reading of a bill is an amendment to the second reading motion, not to the bill itself. For this reason, all the allowable forms of amendment at this stage eschew specific references to the provisions of the bill or to things which are not in the bill but which some members think ought to be. Citation 386(3) of Beauchesne's sets out this rule. It is also found in May's eighteenth edition, chapter 21. May states in part, at pages 487 and 488:

(i) The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such motion. The amendment must strictly relate to the bill which the House, by its order, has resolved upon considering.

(ii) The amendment must not be concerned in detail with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that my proposed amendment certainly relates to the bill. My second point is that it does not deal in any way with the provisions of the bill. Clearly, if we followed the practice to which the quotation from May refers, the amendment would not even be questioned since it does not refer to matters in the bill or matters which are not in it, or to anything which might be dealt with in committee. It relates strictly to the progress of the bill and to the second reading motion itself.

I believe that even in light of Canadian practice there is nothing wrong with the motion. In fact, only under the most restrictive interpretation of practice which could be conjured up could a case be made against the amendment. Some contend that the addition of any words whatever to the end of a motion for referral of the subject matter to a committee—and the amendment asks that the bill be sent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof—automatically means that the amendment is out of order. I would point out, again, that the amendment does not deal with any clause of the bill: it merely concerns itself with the division of the bill as to categories—for instance, gun control, wiretapping and provincial inquiries. Such an interpretation cannot be justified by anything which appears in our Standing Orders, in Beauchesne's in May's, in the practice of the House of Commons at Westminster, or here in Ottawa.

Where amendments of this type have been ruled out of order, it has been because the words added referred to the precise terms of the bill or introduced extraneous matters, not because there were words of any sort added after the name of the committee in the motion. To illustrate this I have three examples of referral amendments to which words were added without rejection by the Chair. On May 17, 1956, the hon. member for Prince Albert, as he then was, moved a referral in the usual terms, and Mr. Caldwell, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, moved an amendment as follows:

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and by adding thereafter the following words:

"so that consideration might be given to the advisability of recommending the constructing and operating of a trans-Canada natural gas pipe line under public ownership."

That amendment was accepted without question. If there were a rule that no words could be added, it would have been struck out instantly. So the mere fact that we have put a phrase in the end should not rule out our amendment. I might say that when the amendment I have just quoted was accepted it was not a time at which the opposition parties got away with anything they were not entitled to get away with. I think things are a little easier today; I think there is more flexibility.

On September 28, 1964, a referral was moved which included at the end the words "for further study and report". Those words are rather innocuous, but so are the words I propose to add to the basic motion. In fact, the "further study" was added as a political attack, as the member who moved the motion had spent most of his speech saying that the bill before the House had been improperly prepared and insufficiently considered. The words were not there by accident. But without referring to the specific provisions, the mover gave the reason for the referral of the subject matter to a committee, and I am doing the same thing now, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, on Thursday, November 16, 1967—this is more recent—an amendment was moved in relation to the abolition of capital punishment bill as follows:

That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—

So far, that is exactly the same as my motion.

—for its examination in the light of studies made of the penitentiary system in general and, in particular, the rehabilitation of inmates.

The very points we are discussing today were raised. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, who had a reputation for being extremely strict on this type of amendment, ruled as follows:

I assume the hon. member for Lafontaine would want to argue in favour of his amendment. I must tell him that after reflection, and in spite of the difficulties to which the Registrar General referred, I believe the amendment should be accepted. It is a reasoned amendment. Normally reasoned amendments suggesting that a subject matter be referred do not go beyond referring the subject matter to a committee. Additional considerations are embraced in the amendment proposed by the hon. member, but I do not think they are irrelevant. In view of these considerations I suggest to the House that from the procedural standpoint the amendment should be accepted.

I am arguing my case to Your Honour as if I were presenting a legal argument in a courtroom, and I would say, with respect, that the only possible objection that Your honour could take are to the words "for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof". In the examples I have referred to, they went even further than that. I suggest that, if anything, the amendment that I proposed yesterday is easier to accept than the one Mr. Speaker Lamoureux accepted.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment should be accepted. It does not refer to the subject matter of the bill, it does not anticipate the committee stage, and it does not refer to matters beyond the scope of the bill. Acceptable reasoned amendments of this variety do occasionally have words which, to quote the ruling I have just referred to—I must say, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to argue a case with so much noise and I would appreciate a little more order—go beyond referring the subject matter to a committee, and this amendment is even more circumspect than most of those. I want to come back to my point about a reasoned amendment. According to May, page 487, under the heading "Reasoned amendment":

It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment".

I contend that is what I have done.

This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the amendment be made. A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

(1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

(2) It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

(3) It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees . . .

Such amendments have tended in modern times to become rather stereotyped and are confined generally to the first two categories; and amendments selected by the Speaker for discussion have commonly included the words, "this House declines to give a second reading"—

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Those words have not interfered with the substance of the motion.

I do not think I need spend much time on Beauchesne's because this has been covered in my argument. Citation 386 provides:

On the second reading of a bill, the House may decide to refer the subject matter thereof to a commission—

That is basically the same as a committee; if it were referred to a committee it would be in order. I should now like to make a suggestion to Your Honour. I gave this matter considerable thought yesterday before I moved the motion. It was not a case of making the motion and then trying to find arguments to back it up; we did our homework before the motion was moved. If Your Honour feels that the words "for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof" puts us in difficulty, I suggest that we are still in the ball park, but if we have knocked the ball out and it is a foul ball under these rules, then I hope the House will allow me to withdraw those words and move the motion in its pure and plain sense instead of perhaps establishing a precedent for the future. May I thank Your Honour for the kind attention I know you have given me. I know you will give my argument the consideration that I have experienced in the past.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I think his last comment is perhaps the most revealing. He finds himself in serious difficulty with regard to this motion and he is trying to salvage a pretty bad deal from the beginning.

There are two major defects with respect to this amendment. The first is that it goes against all previous precedents in that this particular motion does not oppose the principle of the bill. Your Honour knows that there are two major types of amendment that are permitted on second reading. The first is what is commonly referred to as a hoist—namely, that second reading should not now be given but that it be given at a future time. In such event, the session might have ended by the time the three or six months had expired. Evidently the hon. member for Calgary North is not attempting to do this.

The second type is what is referred to as a reasoned amendment. This is subject to a number of precedents dating back to 1947, and if the hon. member for Calgary North is to be successful, he must come within that particular definition. The cases are quite clear. Decisions rendered by various Speakers on reasoned amendments are also clear. In order that a reasoned amendment can be allowed, it has to oppose in principle the bill or any of its provisions. In this particular instance the motion presented by my hon. friend deals with the form and not with the principle of the bill. He seeks, as he has admitted, to have the matter referred to a committee so that the committee might consider a better form.

I should like to refer Your Honour to the Journals for Friday, May 7, 1971. On that occasion the Deputy Speaker at that time ruled on a motion moved by Mr. Gleave and seconded by Mrs. MacInnis. The motion moved that a bill before the House be withdrawn and two new bills be presented; that there be a division of the bill. At that time the Deputy Speaker held as follows:

With respect, it is my feeling that the hon. member is not opposing the principle of the bill but is suggesting another way in which the government could deal with essentially the same subject matter.

He went on to say:

So I suggest, without repeating my initial concern but adding to it those remarks, that it seems to me that the opposition to the bill as set out in the hon. member's amendment is an opposition to the form of the bill and is not in opposition to the principle of the bill. He is suggesting that the way in which the House should deal with it should be changed, and again that is a matter of debate, but it seems to me that it is not acceptable as a reasoned argument.

The second weakness of the hon. gentleman's amendment is that, contrary to what he alleges, it goes behind the bill and touches the different parts of the bill. He attempts to show that the amendment does not substantially amend the bill and does not anticipate amendments which can be moved in committee.

When speaking on the motion, the hon. member said that he intended to divide the bill so that the gun legislation could be dealt with separately. Evidently he does not approve of gun legislation; he intends it to be separate and apart from other parts of the bill, intends to vote against that part and so dispose of that aspect of the bill. Surely he can move such motions when the bill is in committee.

Again may I refer to the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of January 26, 1971. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), seconded by Mr. Richard—who is no longer a member—proposed a motion to send various parts of Bill C-207 to various committees. The hon. member sought to divide that bill, much as the hon. member for Calgary North seeks to divide this bill, and refer its various subject matters to various committees. As recorded on page 286 of the House of Commons Journals, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux said:

It is not a reasoned amendment. It is largely a deviation or a change from the old established form of amendment which provides that the subject matter of a bill or a motion before the House be referred to a special committee or a standing committee. What I believe is objectionable from a procedural standpoint in connection with this proposed amendment is that it goes into the details of the bill . . .

My difficulty in accepting the hon. member's proposed motion is that it goes behind the bill and seeks to touch the different parts of the bill by way of an amendment which should normally not be used in this form.

The hon. member for Calgary North wishes to correct the particular failing of his motion by removing all provisions which Your Honour may not find acceptable. I suggest he cannot be permitted to do that. By removing those particular provisions which follow the referral—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think we need to waste time on that point. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) put the matter accurately. The permission of the House must be sought for removing the offensive words, not the permission of the Chair. This can only be done with the permission of the House. If I found the words offensive, I understand that the hon. member would expect permission of the House to be forthcoming for removing the offensive words. It cannot be done any other way.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, may I refer the House to another precedent on point. Again, the hon. member for Calgary North was implicated, and I use that word advisedly and, refer Your Honour to the House of Commons Journals for January 23, 1969. The House was dealing with an omnibus criminal bill, and the hon. member tried to do exactly what he is now trying to do in slightly different form. The motion then before the House was that——the . . . standing committee be instructed to make and bring into the House four separate reports—

Those four separate reports related to various clauses of the omnibus bill. As recorded on page 617 of the Journals, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux said, in part:

As I stated at the outset, a close scrutiny of precedents and authorities, I suggest to hon. members in all humility, leads to the conclusion that a motion to divide a bill by way of an instruction to a committee cannot be entertained at this particular stage of the House's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker Lamoureux went on to say, as reported on page 618:

The hon. member for Calgary North has advanced the suggestion that the significance of second reading has been altered by the new rules, and he expounded this view in a very interesting way this afternoon. Although this is not clear from the rules themselves, I would think this is a fair interpretation of the new relevant standing orders. The vote on second reading is less a vote on the principle of the bill and more a decision of the House to send the bill on for further consideration at subsequent stages of proceedings. If this interpretation is correct, it seems it should now be even less difficult for honourable Members to vote either for or against the main motion, since such vote would not constitute either approval of, or opposition to, the principle of the several propositions contained in the omnibus bill.

I suggest that the wording of Standing Order 47 is conclusive. It reads:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to a committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

In conclusion, I suggest that the entire amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North is unacceptable.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I first suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) that Standing Order 47 does not apply. Before us is a motion for second reading, not a motion to refer. That is the main part of the motion, namely, second reading. Actually, I am puzzled as to what Standing Order 47 means. A number of years ago we used to move one motion, that the bill be now read a second time. After second reading, the appropriate minister moved another motion, to refer the bill to committee of the whole or to a standing committee. Similarly, on third reading, we moved that the bill be read the third time. After that there was another motion, that the bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper. I suspect that Standing Order 47 was drafted long before we made these changes, whereby we combined the two motions on second reading as well as on third reading. At any rate, to use Standing Order 47 as an authority for the proposition that you cannot move an amendment to the second reading motion is stretching the old rule very far.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council suggested that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) had two options: he could move a hoist, or move a reasoned amendment. I suggest the hon. member for Calgary North has a third choice. He can move a hoist, a reasoned amendment, or avail himself of citation 386 of Beauchesne's fourth edition to move a motion calling for the bill not to be read a second time but for the subject matter to be referred to the standing committee. That, I suggest, the hon. member has done, and he is perfectly within his rights. But he ran into trouble, as he himself knows, by not making the motion a simple reference of the subject matter to the standing committee. He added a phrase which seems to call for the bill itself to be referred to committee "for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof"—in other words, a more proper legislative division of the subject matter of the bill. The latter wording is the trouble, as my hon. friend agrees. I think the hon. member's purpose would be served if the motion were to end with the words "Justice and Legal Affairs". I hope Your Honour will so find.

The parliamentary secretary's suggestion that the hon. member should not be permitted so to change his motion is the ultimate in being ridiculous. The hon. member need merely ask the next Conservative speaker to move that the bill be not read the second time but that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, so why not let him alter his amendment accordingly? I do not support the substance of that amendment. I think the bill should go to the committee and the committee should work on the bill. But I defend strongly the right of the hon. member for Calgary North to move the motion ending with the words "Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs".

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, with all the learned members who have entered this debate, I hesitate to enter it. However, I wish to bring to your attention the fact that I consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) out of order for the reasons stated by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader. I also wish to bring to your attention Standing Order 46, which states very clearly that when a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; to continue or extend a sitting of the House; or for the adjournment of the House.

Quite clearly, the hon. member's motion falls within the first category, namely, a motion to amend it. However, the motion before the House is that the bill be not now read the second time. The motion to amend, even if the House agrees with the hon. member's deletion of the words that he may require, in substance is that the bill be not now read the second time. I would refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's citation 202(12) which states that an amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order. The motion before the House is that this bill be now read the second time. The motion of the hon. member for Calgary North is a direct negative of that motion, and by reason thereof is out of order.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I shall not go over all the ground so ably covered by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I certainly want to go over some of the ground that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) just now attempted to foist upon Your Honour when he made the argument that the motion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North in effect is a direct negative to the second reading of the bill. I suggest that is not so. I suggest the purpose that would appear from the full version, which may not be accepted, is to have a very polyglot measure dealing with five or six items of law sorted out so that it can come back to us in some form in which members could give it an intelligent vote. I suggest it is that simple.

The Minister of Justice did not argue the point for very long. I think perhaps the reason is that he did not have any long argument to make. Obviously, it is not a direct negative. I believe the argument of the parliamentary secretary has been shot down very well by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I will take my own shot at the lame duck as it approaches the ground. I suggest there are only two possible ways one may change motions for second reading and referral of bills to committees. One is the principle of the reasoned amendment; the other is the hoist. The parliamentary secretary, I think, made the error of saying that the vote on second reading must always be against the principle of the bill. Certainly we must agree, in respect of the case of anyone who has been lucky enough to get a reasoned amendment accepted by the Chair, that this situation obviously suggests that the bill should not be read the second time. So obviously the reasoned amendment is against the principle of the bill.

However, a hoist may be considered as much a matter of substance or procedure; that is, it may be considered a device operating against the principle of a bill; but it may also, I would suggest to Your Honour be considered as a device to get a contentious issue out of the way in a particular parliament and have it come back again at a future time. Members may have two very different motives for voting for a hoist. The third point the parliamentary secretary did not mention, but which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did mention, is the use of the procedure under citation 386.

I suggest there are no closed categories with regard to the type of motion that can be presented on second reading. It can be against the principle being discussed. It can be against the type of the bill by way of a reasoned amendment. It can be against dealing with the bill immediately by way of the six months' hoist, and it can also be, as the hon. member for Calgary North brought in, by a measure to have it taken out and looked at by a committee and somehow brought back in more intelligible form and then the vote can start on whether the bill or portions of it should be read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not propose to deal with the matter definitively now, but there are some matters which I believe I can clear up. I do not think there is any difficulty in understanding the motive behind the amendment. It is an omnibus measure, and frequently when such measures are put before the House there is an attempt in one way or another to either split the bill directly by way of a motion or, as is attempted at the present time, to send the bill to another body for consideration of those factors which might lead to the advisability of dividing the bill in some other way.

As I say, I do not think there is any difficulty in understanding the basic motive behind this particular amendment. Neither do I have any difficulty in understanding that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) or any other hon. member is perfectly entitled, not by way of a reasoned amendment but by way of citation 386 of Beauchene's to move an amendment which might, if one were to attempt to analyse it, appear to be what is described as an expanded negative but which is so well established in our practice as to be beyond question. That is to say, the hon. member has the right, as do other hon. members, to put an amendment that the bill be not now read a second time and that the subject matter be referred to some other body for consideration provided it is the subject matter that is referred and not the bill, and provided, also, that the other body is a body that is in existence and not about be to called into existence. Therefore, up to that point there does not seem to be any argument.

What is solely in issue here is whether or not the hon. member puts himself out of court, as it were, by adding the words which have been referred to. At that point the Chair has some considerable difficulty, not simply because of understanding the nature of that language or the difficulty it might put the committee in, but really about whether or not we want to get into a practice or encourage a practice which might lead to the proliferation of different language in respect of second reading amendments which might cause such a variety to be put forward that really second reading amendments would be limited only by the imagination of the proponents. That is really the question. It has to do with the kind of policy we want to follow. But certainly there is no difficulty about the ability of the hon. member to put an amendment forward which would stop after the words "legal affairs". The question the Chair must decide now, after all the argument which has been most helpful, is solely whether the hon. member has disabled himself by adding the extra language. Perhaps after further consideration by the House of Bill C-61 I might be able to dispose of that matter before the return to further debate on this particular motion before the House.

Order, please. Orders of the day.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

On the order:

March 5, 1976—Resuming consideration of report stage of Bill C-61, an act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: I understand this is the resumption of the debate on this particular motion.

Mr. Forrestall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It had been understood, because of Your Honour's consideration of the amendment and the procedural points in front of us, that we would continue with Bill C-83 and would move to Bill C-61 at five o'clock; that there would be a short debate on motion No. 9 and that the bells would be rung some time between five o'clock and six o'clock. If there have been some other arrangements, perhaps we had better go behind the curtains, because very clearly this is not the understanding that was left with us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At five o'clock it will be private members' hour.

● (1540)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that the order which you called would be the first order called after the particular argument, which has now been disposed of, had been dealt with. There is private members' hour at five o'clock and it was our information—and we had advised hon. members of it in the usual way—that private members' business would be dealt with at five o'clock.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I think it was pretty well agreed that this is the way we would deal with Bill C-61. I believe that motion No. 9 still has to be disposed of. A member of our party wishes to say a few words with regard to motion No. 9, following which we can dispose of the whole bill before five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it understood, and agreed, that the House will now move to the consideration of motion No. 9 which still remains outstanding at the report stage of Bill C-61, and that upon its disposal the several deferred divisions will be called? Thereafter, I hope to be in a position to make a ruling on the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved motion No. 9:

That Bill C-61, an act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be amended in schedule III by striking out lines 28 and 29 at page 59 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The minister shall provide a suitable place for".

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this final motion which appears on the order paper in connection with Bill C-61 I think I can be very brief and simply recount to Your Honour and to the House what transpired during the course of our committee work with respect to the particular section dealt with in motion No. 9.

As we considered clause by clause the various sections set out in schedule III, it came to the attention of some hon. members that there was a question in their minds about the propriety, as they saw it, of making a reference in this statute to the National Capital Act and the national capital region in connection with the location of the central registry that is established under the legislation.

I think it is fair to say that there were mixed views on this subject around the table in the committee, but simply to avoid any difficulty which this problem might cause for some members in dealing with this piece of legislation it was decided, in the interests of expediting the work of the committee on Bill C-61, to delete reference to that statute and to that region and simply in substitution to give the minister power to designate where the location of the headquarters should be.

In making that amendment at the committee stage we omitted, unfortunately, to make a consequential amendment in the statute to make a subsequent section in the legislation correspond with the section that we amended in the committee. Motion No. 9 does nothing more than simply make that consequential amendment to ensure that all sections in the act are consistent on this point. I commend this amendment to members of the House.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this amendment which has been moved by the government has perhaps removed one of the technical objections which could be made to the bill. However, there is a wide range of technical objections which this and the other amendments do not accommodate. For instance, I should like to draw to your attention and that of the House, and particularly the attention of the minister, the fact that prior to the introduction of this bill, and as an initial announcement of policy, the former minister of transport, the now Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), assured the Atlantic provinces' premiers that there would be safeguards for coastal industries in Canada, particularly in the Atlantic area.

These safeguards, of course, would cover a wide range of problems which include the adequacy of the supply of boats, the containment of the rate, the maintenance of the service, and in general ensure that coastal industries would not be unfavourably affected by the introduction of this legislation either in respect of service or in respect of the economic impact that this legislation might have upon them.

Secondly, there should have been a safeguard that there would be maintenance of existing competitive rates and that these would not be adversely affected for those who would ship goods by land. To date, these safeguards have not been forthcoming. Thirdly, the minister indicated there would be participation by the provinces in the formation of regulations in respect of the bill, and that prior to the enactment of legislation these regulations would be approved by the premiers of the Atlantic area. This has not happened.

Fourthly, we were assured that the federal-provincial committee which deals with transportation matters and transportation regulations would be given an opportunity to monitor the situation as the effects became apparent. To date, no such opportunity has been presented to the provinces to do this in co-operation with the government, and the regulations as submitted by the Department of Transport have not been accepted by the Atlantic provinces' premiers. We are, then, in a position of having accepted this bill in principle—a bill which, however, is not in accord with the agreement and the commitment of the predecessor of the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang).

As I understand it, the premiers of Atlantic Canada have asked the Minister of Transport that this bill not become law until such time as these safeguards have been honoured by the Minister of Transport and the government in general. I think, therefore, that we are going at a rather precipitous rate with this bill and that this amendment is very much in order. It points out some of the anomalies which exist and some of the efforts which the government is making to accomplish some things which are not acceptable to Canada as a whole and to the Atlantic provinces in particular.

Where will he get these safeguards? It would be impossible, I submit, for the people of Canada to know exactly what the economic effects on this nation will be unless the government were to study the economic effectiveness, as others have suggested, or to have a cost-benefit study. In some instances, should we not determine whether or not we should have a cost disadvantage study? I have no objection to—as a matter of fact, I support—the principle of the establishment of a marine code and a Canadian merchant shipping structure as proposed in this bill, but like so many other items that have been introduced by this government, it is only part of the package; it is only the tip of the iceberg.

It is high time the government answered some of these questions. They have been posed in committee. There have been no answers by the minister or his parliamentary secretary. No answers have been given to us by any member of the staff of the Minister of Transport, and to the best of my knowledge and belief the Atlantic premiers have not received the assurance they requested, that the economies of the Maritime structure will be preserved or monitored or in any way safeguarded as initially promised.

One of the principal facets of transportation, not only in the Atlantic region but in Canada, is the fact that we have both land and water transportation opportunities. As a result of this, the land rates have very often been based upon what it would cost to transport the same item by water. There is a multitude of items which fall into this category, and they move from Thunder Bay to the Atlantic area, from the Atlantic area to Toronto, the Atlantic area to Hamilton and from British Columbia to Thunder Bay or the east coast. Item after item is rated by the rail transportation structure of Canada at a water competitive rate.

The rates, for instance, which have been extended to the B.C. forestry industry for the movement of their product eastward is very low relative to a multitude of other rates, because the railroads estimate that this product could be moved from B.C. to eastern Canada by water at this particular rate. All these things may very well disappear unless, as was mentioned earlier, the committee gets the authority to monitor what is taking place. The government has steadfastly refused to present to the House or to the committee the regulations which have been submitted for approval to the Atlantic premiers. We understand that there have been some negotiations with respect to these regulations. There was a news release with respect to these regulations in which some objections were expressed. Part of that news release reads as follows:

> The Honourable Wilfred Bishop, New Brunswick Minister of Transportation, expressed the concern of the Atlantic ministers in the proposed changes to the coasting trade laws of Canada. All ministers thoroughly endorsed the maritime code now before parliament and were assured by Mr. Lang that the federal government will hold further consultations with the provinces before the new regulations are introduced under the code.

But bear in mind that the Atlantic premiers, in December of 1975, requested that the bill not be passed until these regulations were approved by the Atlantic area, in compliance with the assurance given by the former minister of transport who advised the present minister of the positions which had been taken. Let me cite some examples of cost which can occur as it is presently understood. If this can be effectively denied, I will have no quarrel, but so far I have heard no denial in spite of the search I have made for information. Labrador Liner Board has been advised that under the regulations presently proposed it would cost $650 per day for the ships which they use—one usually, and two at least part time, for approximately seven months of the year. Their additional cost, as they understand the proposal, is $650 per day per ship for the movement of their wood products from Labrador to the Liner Board plant on the island. This is indicative of at least one of the costs.

As I mentioned earlier, comparable legislation in the United States has put the state of Washington in an unsatisfactory competitive position on the east coast of the United States. This legislation will put British Columbia and its lumber products in an unsatisfactory competitive position on the east coast of Canada. Under this structure, Washington lumber could conceivably move into eastern Canada quite a bit more cheaply in international bottoms than could British Columbia lumber, except for one thing: there has been a suggestion that there may be an exception for B.C. lumber. This is not a firm suggestion, but there has been the suggestion that B.C. lumber might move as an exception to the regulations of this legislation. I think Atlantic Canada, and all Canada for that matter, should know, if exceptions are made for B.C. lumber, are exception to be made for east coast products?

One of the things which I think is misunderstood in the consideration of this bill is that we are not talking in terms of 100,000-ton vessels or 150,000-ton vessels. We are talking in terms of small vessels for coastal trade, in the main, excepting perhaps traffic between the Pacific and the Atlantic which might consist of larger ships. However, basically the coastal trade in going to be moved in relatively small ships, and as a result of this the cost of the small ship is going to rise much faster than it would in the case of the larger ship.

I say this because the Canadian Shippers' Association pointed out to the committee that it had been able to reduce shipping fares under certain conditions comparable to the marine code as it applied in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence systems. However, there have been two factors which I do not think are applicable to the general coastal trade of Canada. One is that as the St. Lawrence Seaway was deepened, locks were made capable of carrying bigger ships—bigger ships came into use and an economy of scale was introduced.

Second, and at about the same time, although not exactly coincidental, massive shipments of bulk products from Sept-Isles to Great Lakes' points made a possible two-way trip for a boat. It could have a load coming and going, with a little dead space in between, I agree, as it went from, perhaps, a steel port to a grain port on the lakes or as it went from a grain port to Sept-Isles in the St. Lawrence system. Therefore, though economies were exercised as a result of an opportunity for two-way hauls, when a comparable law applied in the seaway I do not see comparable opportunities for economies as we refer to the coastal trade of Canada. I think this should be taken into consideration and all hon. members of the House should recognize that in the main we are talking about a small ship transportation structure.

I am sure the Minister of Transport does not wish to impose anything detrimental on any area of Canada, but if we explore the water competitive structure I wonder if the minister knows that the freight rate on Prince Edward Island potatoes—perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) would be particularly interested in this—as they are shipped to Canadian points is established on the estimated cost of moving potatoes on an historical basis to water points in Canada such as Montreal and Toronto. That is how that rate has arrived at the level it is today. If by any chance the implementation of the Maritime Code produces a substantial rise in the cost of transportation by water estimated for potatoes from Prince Edward Island to Toronto, that same increment in rate will apply to potatoes from P.E.I. as they are moved by rail from P.E.I. to Toronto or Montreal. These are the broadening effects that this bill can have.

● (1600)

This, of course, would apply to the same product in New Brunswick, because the New Brunswick rate on this product to the inland areas of Canada is competitive with Prince Edward Island. Therefore, if the Prince Edward Island rate rises because water competitive rates rise, the New Brunswick rate will rise as well. This imposes very serious hardship on one of the sources of income for Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. We are not talking of imaginary things when we talk of these inequities, Mr. Speaker. We are talking of real things by example from other jurisdictions. We are talking of the effect of the Jones Act in the United States. This will have identical effects in Canada. It will require a federal subsidy to keep the rates at the present level or to protect the water competitive rates as we know them today. No witness who has appeared before the committee on behalf of the minister, the minister or his parliamentary secretary, is prepared to give an assurance to any part of Canada that any of these items will be monitored and regulated or that exceptions will be made in order to control costs.

Last night I had representations from the feed industry of the Atlantic area. They pointed out that not too long ago the rail rates for feed grains transported to the Atlantic area had dropped by $3 per ton in the last five years. This did not take place because the rails found they could transport grain more cheaply than before, but because of the private enterprise of the entrepreneurs who moved grain by water to Halifax, to Summerside and to Fort William to obtain a cheaper rate. The rail rates came down accordingly.

On behalf of farmers in the Atlantic area, I ask the Minister of Transport for assurance that the livestock industry in the Atlantic area and eastern Quebec will be monitored, that costs will not go up, that water competitive opportunities will remain for receivers and shippers of products related to the coastal areas of Canada. If there is to be an exception for British Columbia, as was suggested during debate, an equal opportunity for exception should be extended to the Atlantic area or any other area where it is required.

There have been estimates as to costs. It has been estimated that transportation costs of petroleum products from coastal refineries to central Canada would increase by 40 per cent as a result of implementation of this bill. I wonder if the minister could assure the House and the Atlantic refineries that such is not the case. If it is the case, could he give an assurance that Atlantic refineries will be protected, or that consumers of their products in the province of Quebec will be protected against increased transportation charges brought about by implementation of this bill?

Let me repeat what I said in my opening remarks, Mr. Speaker. This is not an objection to a particular proposal of a maritime code; it is an objection to the fact that the bill involves only part of the total package. It has given no consideration whatsoever to the economic impact which might be pressed upon the coastal areas of Canada or even the lakehead areas of Canada. If it is brought into effect, it will impose hardships on the coastal areas against which other areas are protected. While feed grains may cost more in the Atlantic area, the Crowsnest pass rate remains in place. I do not quarrel with that, but I do quarrel with an increase in feed costs in the Atlantic area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. We are at report stage on a motion before the House, not on the whole bill, and the hon. member has spoken for 20 minutes which is the time allotted to him.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have enough time for two more sentences.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I want to cite one more example. Since the opening of the Atlantic seaway there has been no change in rates, to the best of my knowledge and belief. There have been cost increases in the movement of ships through the mouth of the St. Lawrence, through the canal and into the lakes. I hope the Minister of Transport will assure the coastal areas of Canada that they will receive the same treatment as grain shippers in the prairies and those who receive service from the St. Lawrence Seaway and its connecting services.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there was a discussion with respect to the form of the legislation that we are dealing with. Perhaps I should deal with that, and then the parliamentary secretary may have something to say about it. At page 59, lines 26 and 27, there is appended to the form of the bill as it came from committee the following words:

—described in the schedule to the National Capital Act.

My understanding is that these words were deleted or, as a result of the findings of the committee, were held to be unnecessary to the statement of the statute. I hope that before we finish debate today we can have the consent of the House to delete these words. I understand there is no difficulty with respect to that and perhaps we could deal with it later. I should like to say something about the amendment itself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We might as well clarify the point now, to make sure that everybody is satisfied with the guarantee. The matter was raised by two hon. members. I think we should proceed with motion No. 9 and the vote on the report stage motions that have been deferred. Then, before putting the question on third reading maybe the House could, by unanimous consent, make the suggested changes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree in principle, but since third reading might not come today perhaps this could be done as a point of order just before we pass the motion for concurrence and report stage, rather than waiting for third reading.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I gather the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is acceptable to the government. It is acceptable to us, and I hope it is acceptable to the Chair. I should like now to turn to the amendment itself. As I started out to say, I want to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for this amendment. I support its intention.

On January 30, 1976, a motion was moved under Standing Order 43 condemning a surreptitious attempt to change the name of the capital city of Canada to the national capital region. That motion was turned down, of course. It had been proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The bill, as it went to committee, contained a legislative attempt to do exactly the same thing. At least it looked that way.

● (1610)

In terms of the motion under Standing Order 43, it generated one of the largest batches of mail from the Ottawa area that I have received as a member. Ottawa members on all sides of this House commented with respect to the national capital, what it is and what is its name. There was quite violent reaction to an exchange of correspondence between the clerk of the privy council and another with respect to the procedure that might be used to change the national capital. Quite frankly, it looked in the legislation as it went to committee as if this was being carried out. It may well have been the intention of the government to move step by step to gradually change the public thinking in terms of what is the capital city of this country. This is certainly one indication of an intention on the part of the government. I do not know what more we can find than a statement in legislation. Certainly, the way the National Capital Commission in this area has always described itself as Ottawa-Hull has a tendency to appear to be an attempt to do indirectly what the government heretofore did not have the courage to do directly.

I commend the minister on this amendment as it at least to this extent takes the heat off a subject which can be heated indeed. The clause would read that the minister would provide a suitable place for the appropriate functioning of the office of the registrar, and so on. That is satisfactory. It would remove the very strong feeling that could be generated as a result of the subclause as originally framed in terms of the matters to which I have just alluded.

What is a suitable place? I do not want to advise the government directly on what a suitable place might be. However, I want to make some comments if the government is considering it within the city of Ottawa or some other place within the area described in the National Capital Commission Act as the national capital region. I wish to make some suggestions to the minister, as I assume he will have something to say about the location of the offices of an agency for which he is responsible.

I believe we are making a mistake in the city of Ottawa and the national capital region by continuing the North American phenomena of piling more and more people, offices and installations into the centre of our cities. We are, in effect, creating the potential for large social problems. We have an opportunity in Canada because our country is not yet developed to the extent of the United States. Although it is a little larger in geographic area, it is much smaller in terms of population. Because of this, we have an opportunity in all the larger cities in Canada to take a look at the direction in which we are moving. When the minister is considering what is the suitable place for the registry office, I hope he will consider that within the national capital region there are locations outside the central core of the city of Ottawa and even the city of Hull.

There has been an expressed intention on the part of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton to diffuse places of employment of public servants, the main group in this area outside the central core, into the smaller towns and villages in the townships of Nepean, Gloucester, Goulbourn, the village of Richmond and the township of Rideau. This involves their official plans and the over-all planning done with respect to their providing a place for employment and a change of direction in the development of the capital area in such a way that the transportation facilities would be better used. The necessity of developing what might be called super-highways and super-parkways, with all their intrusion into urban areas, could be limited to a great extent. The minister would be doing a great service with regard to the planning of the national capital area if he decided upon a change of direction with regard to this particular agency.

If the minister is looking for a suitable place, I want to remind him of one. At the corner of Baseline Road and Woodroffe Avenue in the city of Ottawa there is a model community planned in terms of commercial operations, office installations and dwelling places being developed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. What concerns me about that whole development is not the fact that it is going there, although that does concern some people, but that to this date there has been no strong federal commitment in terms of placing there some installations of government.

Unless the minister feels that a maritime operation ought to be placed on the banks of the Ottawa River, I can think of no more suitable place for the placement of this type of registry system, because it is the avowed intention of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with the general agreement of the township of Nepean and the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, than to have this as a mixed type of community as I have just described.

There seems to be a lack of commitment by the federal government in terms of placing their installations in that development. It is important that we make a commitment to that area, not just because of crowding in the downtown area of the national capital but because there is an opportunity here to show in a rather unique way that there can be places outside the central core, in accordance with these official plans, for government installations that are not farms of laboratories but offices.

The hon. member who represents the great city of Pembroke said it might be a good idea to place this in Pembroke. I could not agree with that because of the particular wording of the statute. If the registry system is to be centralized, as this government seems to think it ought to be, it is not unreasonable to centralize it somewhere within the national capital area. Regardless of the aspirations of the City of Pembroke, it is not within the national capital region.

● (1620)

I know the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) does not have authority for planning within the national capital region. I sometimes wonder who does have such authority in terms of the ministry. But the Minister of Transport is a very influential member of cabinet and I would ask him and his officials, when they are looking for a suitable place, to consider that there might be an equally valid argument affecting the development of the national capital. Are we always to centralize and bring buildings to the downtown core, or are we to take advantage of the amenities which are available in the smaller communities in and around the national capital?

Visiting Washington, I see large government installations outside the capital in the surrounding area. If the city is to be a monument, it ought not to be simply a monument to municipal clutter; it should be a monument to thoughtful planning offering a variety of lifestyles. If the minister is looking for a suitable place, I think he ought to consider carefully what a step he would be taking, in an historical sense, by moving one installation of government—and others would follow—into an area within the national capital to which the government has already made a large commitment in terms of planning. It is important that this be considered.

In closing, I commend the minister upon this amendment, one which I think will go a long way toward at least beginning an approach to the question of the national capital in regard to which it can be said that the government is not doing indirectly what it would never try to do directly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. To make sure there is no disagreement or confusion, I think the minister should speak by consent. He moved the motion, and by doing so he is taken as having spoken. I would ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that what you have said is technically the case, and I appreciate the consent given. I must say I am having an uneasy afternoon as a result of the disposition presently shown by members. The kind words of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) commending me on this change in the bill have shaken me somewhat. I am delighted he has seen the usefulness of moving things out of the central core here. I need not tell hon. members about my own dedication to decentralization, to the notion that a good deal of what is done here can be gradually done elsewhere.

Having said that, I am not sure I would want to look only at the Baseline Road. Since he has decided to march me away from the central core, I will go with the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) and take a look at quarters in that area. I know that hon. members will wish me to look at other places, too, for example, the banks of the Saskatchewan River in Saskatoon, naturally, if we are not bound to consider a coastal position. I shall certainly follow the lead given me by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton in that regard.

I should like to direct a few remarks to some of the words spoken this afternoon by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) and, in particular, to attempt to make the record very clear in relation to my belief in the necessity for full consultation in connection with the regulations. It should be evident that the discussions between my predecessor and the maritime premiers, and with the Newfoundland government as well, indicated an intention to consult with regard to the regulations. But there was no reservation of any kind about moving forward with the maritime code subject to the assurances on consultation. On September 24, 1973, for instance, a release following a meeting between the premiers and the then minister of transport stated:

> The provinces stressed, and it was agreed, that they would participate actively in drawing up regulations governing these safeguards.

It was, therefore, in the regulations that the safeguards were to be found, not in the bill itself as might have been implied. I have, of course, received strong representations from members of parliament as well. For instance, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) has spoken to me many times on this subject, drawing attention to the need to ensure that most significant changes to disadvantaged coastal shipping, or those affected by the freight rates, would be made without full consultation. I have, of course, given such an assurance myself to the ministers in recent meetings both on the west coast and on the east coast—to the eight ministers of the provinces to the west and to the east—that there would be full consultation on the regulations before they were adopted.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Therefore, in answer to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte, I can say that full consideration will be given to his concern about pricing and cost of shipping before the regulations under this act are adopted. I am very conscious of the desirability of full consultation. My policy is, basically, one of open consultation, and in view of the apprehension regarding shipping costs and my feeling that it is important that all parties should make an input, I have undertaken with members of parliament that there shall be full consultation with them, too, prior to the move toward regulation. Indeed, I have asked for, and received agreement from two hon. members, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) and the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Landers), that they will co-chair an informal committee of members of parliament to look at regulations.

Through this method all members who have an interest in safeguarding their regions can make an input. I know that members such as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who have shown particular interest in this subject, not necessarily from identical viewpoints, will want to make an input as well.

I simply want to assure the hon. members that as this amendment moves forward, these consultations—which have been agreed to before—are now doubly assured and that it is our intention to hold the widest consultations possible before we move to specific regulations under this act.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): In addressing myself to motion No. 9, I wonder if I may make an observation with respect to the reassurances given us just now by the minister. The difficulty faced by the maritime economy, the council of maritime premiers and the government of British Columbia, and certainly, to some degree, by the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland, is that the words of ministers in the government cannot be trusted. Of course the minister is sincere when he says that consultation will take place and he is setting up a committee. I might say I found that absolutely ridiculous—that he was setting up a committee headed by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Landers). I can understand his naming the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) who does have some interest, but for the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster to head up a committee, with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to produce regulations under the bill, is ridiculous. I doubt whether he has even read the bill or knows anything at all about shipping. I think this would be a great insult to the former member for Saint John-Lancaster who fought both inside and outside this chamber for the re-establishment of a Canadian merchant fleet.

● (1630)

We appreciate the indication given by the minister that he will let the members of this chamber make some consultative input on the question of regulations, but our concern is that the government must demonstrate its intentions in some way or another, and not simply with words, which have nothing to do with what the CNR will charge for the movement of a carload of potatoes or a boat load of lumber from the west coast of Canada to the east coast. The words must be in the statute. I am sorry the minister is leaving. I understand he has cabinet committees and we appreciate his participating for at least five minutes this afternoon.

As much as I support this bill and the concept that we are talking about this afternoon, the words of caution expressed this afternoon, in committee and last week are words that we cannot treat lightly. We have no reasonable grounds, as members of this chamber, to go back to our maritime provinces and to the west coast and to tell the governments, the people and the industries in those provinces that we are satisfied that the government will not let this bill impair the ability of commerce to move goods from one point in Canada to another without seriously affecting the cost of so doing. We all know where that cost will wind up—in the consumers' pockets. It will result in increased prices for homes and vegetables.

I had thought that the least the minister could do this afternoon was to give us, with some emphasis, an outline of what he expected to do with respect to the regulations; to build in words that would import the type of safeguards that we require in the regulations.

As for motion No. 9, Mr. Speaker, it is quite acceptable to us. It is a consequential amendment. With respect to the error that appears in the reprinted version of the bill, I think the authoritative document must continue to be Votes and Proceedings, in which the amendment moved and carried in committee is correctly recorded. Having said, that, I would just echo the sentiment expressed by our distinguished House leader, that it was only the perception of members of the committee that caught this devious attempt to import by way of statute, indeed, to defile the maritime code or attach to it the remotest possibility that at some point in the future the government would say, "We have been doing this for a long time. Look at the maritime code which describes Canada's capital as 'Ottawa-Hull'." We are aware of the origin of the phrase "national capital region" and we are aware of the National Capital Act. I am also pleased that the government recognizes that the maritime code is hardly the statute into which to import the basis and structure for the renaming of the capital of Canada.

With those one or two reservations I think we are prepared to concur in the report stage of this bill. But again I say to the members of this chamber that as much and as strongly as I feel for this bill, as great are its advantages to the development of a segment of the Canadian transportation industry which can stand on its own, a massive industry which could bring back to us $2.5 billion in foreign exchange and create 7,000 new jobs, give us 175 ships sailing the waters of the world, the reservations that have been voiced are even stronger because they affect the commerce and industry of Canada.

We require a much clearer assurance from the Minister of Transport when this matter moves into third reading; otherwise we will have to reconsider how we stand on the matter, so serious is it to us. In closing, I want to express my appreciation to the parliamentary secretary for his many courtesies over the last few months in connection with this particular measure.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Maritime Code

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of recorded divisions in relation to Bill C-61, an act to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions.

Shall motion No. 2 carry?

The House divided on motion No. 2 (Mr. Forrestall) which was negatived on the following division.

● (1640)

Motion No. 5 is no longer with us. Therefore, the question is on motion No. 7. Shall motion No. 7 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)—Immigration—Admittance of members of Palestinian Liberation Organization to Habitat conference—Government position; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Labour Conditions—Reason for refusal to permit air line employees to prosecute Air Canada; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Transport—Request for assurance of full use of east coast ports.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

● (1730)

Mr. Speaker: I understand that motion No. 9 was carried. I further understand there is some concern about a printing error in the bill that needs to be cleared up before the motion for concurrence can be put.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): That is correct, Mr. Speaker. It is a very simple matter of a printing error. I think there is general agreement in the House about it.

The particular clause in question is clause BII-24 in the third schedule to the bill. It originally appeared on pages 59 and 60 of the first reading edition of Bill C-61. In committee we moved to remove line 41 on page 59 and lines 1 and 2 on page 60, substituting the very simple phrase "shall be established at a place designated in Canada by the minister". That was the amendment. This is clearly recorded in the February 26 edition of Votes and Proceedings. Unfortunately when the bill appeared in its reported stage and reprinted, clause BII-24 contained an additional phrase at the end reading "described in the schedule to the National Capital Act". That clearly is not what was in our amendment. Votes and Proceedings clearly record the decision taken. That additional phrase was simply added in error. I draw that to the attention of the House. It should be deleted upon reprinting.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the observations of the parliamentary secretary are quite correct. We agree with that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this was drawn to our attention earlier. The comment made by the parliamentary secretary is quite correct, namely, that what the committee did is properly recorded in Votes and Proceedings of February 26 at page 1055. I believe that under Standing Order 84 the parliamentary counsel can reprint the bill as corrected.

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding, from looking at the bill before me, that the French text did not suffer from the same disability. Therefore the order will go that the bill in being reprinted between the conclusion of the report stage and third reading stage will take note of that difficulty, and the printing error will be corrected.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is not debatable. I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Basford:—That Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier, I would be prepared to dispose of the point of order with respect to the bill that was before us and on which I understand debate will resume at eight o'clock this evening. However, I do not want to interfere with private members' hour if it is understood that is going ahead. If there is no understanding about proceeding with it, perhaps I can deal with the very interesting point of order that was raised late this afternoon with respect to the proposed amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I had some conversations with reference to this motion. I am prepared to withdraw the words:

—for the purpose of considering a more proper legislative division thereof.

I ask the consent of the House to make that withdrawal. I understand it will be given.

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that was the agreement reached with me. What is in effect is the motion in front of you with those words attached.

Mr. Speaker: I might say, with respect to the action of the hon. members involved, that they probably anticipated pretty accurately what the position of the Chair would have to be in this regard. After some careful consideration I have in any case reached that conclusion.

These, of course, are unsolicited remarks by the Chair at this stage. However, my decision would have been to encourage very much a strict interpretation of the language to be used in the second reading amendment, and to recognize that since this was effectively the first time that any hon. member put before me this kind of motion, it would have been expected in accordance with previous practice, at least the first time a new Speaker had been called upon to make a ruling.

Having found those words to be of some procedural difficulty, I would have earnestly asked the House to grant the request now sought to delete those words, and permit the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), as opposed to any other, to be reduced to the words "That Bill C-83 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs."

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Consent having been so given, the hon. member has the permission of the House to change the words following "That." Therefore the motion as I have just read it will stand in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North and the House will resume debate on that amendment in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North at eight o'clock this evening. It is so ordered.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and I regret that our agreement has deprived the House of hearing your views on the subject.

Order stands.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is some disposition that the House will now move to private members' hour and Order No. 41 standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-241, to amend the Criminal Code (cruelty to animals), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill as spelled out in the explanatory notes is simply to enable a magistrate, who has imposed a sentence upon a person convicted of an offence of cruelty to animals, also to prohibit such a person from owning, harbouring or otherwise possessing an animal or a bird for a stated period of time, as part of the sentence.

Presently magistrates are limited to fining or jailing any person convicted of cruelty to animals. The vast majority of magistrates are most reluctant ever to impose a jail sentence for this type of crime, and a fine is often an unsuitable punishment since lack of funds may very well have contributed to the cruel treatment which the animals receive in the first place. This kind of provision, prohibiting possession of animals, is a means of meeting this problem.

I am aware that Bill C-71, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which was passed by this House in January and is currently before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, contains in clause 35 an amendment to the Criminal Code which, by and large, achieves the same objective as my bill. However, in debate on Bill C-71, debate in which I took part as a member of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, the attention of members was concentrated almost totally on other areas of the bill, with virtually no discussion on the specific clause I have mentioned. This very absence of debate, I believe, indicates to a large degree the wide agreement on the need for the kind of amendment which my bill proposes and which is contained in clause 35 of Bill C-71.

Nevertheless this House should have an opportunity of discussing the specific proposal prohibiting possession of animals for those convicted of cruelty to animals, and indeed the more general question of cruel treatment of animals. This is my purpose in going ahead with Bill C-241 this afternoon.

The scope of my bill, and also that of clause 35 in Bill C-71, are limited to those offences described under Section 402 subsection (1) of the Criminal Code. Those offences do not touch on the controversial and highly emotional aspect of cruelty to animals, particularly wildlife, such as the trapping and hunting of fur-bearing animals, a subject I shall attempt to steer away from today. Rather, they deal only with domestic animals or birds, or animals or birds wild by nature that are kept in captivity.

The type of person who commits an offence under this section of the Criminal Code falls into one of two categories: either he harbours an animal or bird as a pet, or he harbours an animal or bird for profit. The offender in the latter category is by far the more serious not only from a moral point of view but also, in many cases, in terms of the degree and amount of suffering and injury caused.

It can be argued that the pet owner who causes unnecessary pain to an animal, either directly or by neglect, may do so out of ignorance not knowing the proper means of disciplining, training or handling the pet. The same may occur if the owner finds he simply cannot afford the cost or time required in caring for the pet. Of course this argument has no application in many cases where owners have caused damage or injury to their pets, and even where it does apply it is no justification for cruelty to animals. Nevertheless there are considerations which may be weighed in respect of offenders who are pet owners, considerations which are not relevant when the offenders' purpose in owning or harbouring animals is solely to obtain an income.

For those who make their livelihood in part or whole from animals there can be no excuse for cruelty on the grounds of ignorance or economics, or at least there should not be any such grounds. Common sense tells us you cannot run a business without a sufficient knowledge of all the aspects involved. Similarly if one does not possess the financial resources required to run an enterprise effectively and profitably, he must get out of that enterprise.

The successful pet shop owner, breeder or farmer knows his animals or birds and recognizes that his profits are closely related to the investment he makes in his animals, both in terms of care and money. Fortunately this kind of professional in the various animal-related businesses is in the majority, but there are some who believe they can cut corners with regard to the knowledge or proper care of their animals, an attitude which usually results in injury or damage to the animals. It is at this kind of offender that Bill C-241 is aimed and on which the bill should have the most beneficial impact, both as a deterrent and as a means of assisting in enforcement.

A provision prohibiting possession of an animal or bird after conviction for a cruelty to animals offence in effect shuts down an offender's business for a specific period, denying him income from this source. I believe this would be a significant deterrent and I am supported in this belief by a number of people involved with animal welfare organizations. These people have drawn attention to a case in which a farmer showed appalling neglect of a valuable herd of cattle valued at thousands of dollars. At present the only really acceptable penalty for such an offence—ruling out a jail sentence—is a fine. Normally such fines have little value as a deterrent. After all, a fine of $100 or $200 is little more than a nuisance tax when one is talking about a herd of cattle worth many thousands of dollars. If the manner of treatment of an individual's livestock can result in the loss of that livestock, much greater care will be paid to it.

The provision prohibiting possession of animals could also assist officials in the enforcement of the law especially as it relates to repeat offenders. An example of this can best be shown in the most extreme case of animal cruelty, that of the baiting or fighting of animals and birds. It is most difficult for law enforcement officers to obtain sufficient proof of these crimes to gain a conviction, although in many cases the officials are fully aware of the identity of the individuals taking part in these activities. Obviously my bill does not assist in obtaining first time convictions but it should hinder subsequent activities by those who have been convicted once inasmuch as it makes the mere possession of an animal or bird an offence.

There are two other points I should like to touch on briefly although they are related only indirectly to my bill. The first has to do with the importation of exotic animals and birds as pets or for display purposes. This is not a recent development; it has been going on almost since the first days of the colonization of this country. However, in the last ten years or so the number and variety of exotic animals imported into Canada have increased tremendously, giving rise to a good deal of concern for their proper care. The simple fact is that in the case of many of these animals presently coming into Canada we do not know how to provide the care which is needed. Until we know more, and until we have the services of trained, qualified personnel, knowledgeable about exotic species and capable of providing the veterinary care necessary, I believe a greater degree of control and supervision should be exercised with regard to these importations.

My final point has to do with the use of animals for scientific research purposes. Here again we must take a close look at all available information and evidence. This has become an increasingly controversial and highly emotional issue. We must make sure we are not left in a position where we become stampeded in one direction or another.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me just say that an amendment to the Criminal Code prohibiting the possession of an animal or bird by anyone found guilty of a cruelty to animals offence is needed and, more important, is just plain, good common sense.

Mr. Gilbert: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Robinson: I would not mind being asked a question but there are many others who wish to speak on this measure. Perhaps it could be reserved until later.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) on introducing the bill before us. We have been somewhat negligent with respect to animal cruelty in Canada and it is not until the present parliament that we seem to be making any headway. In the last parliament a special committee was established to deal with animal welfare, but we could not get it off the ground because no Liberals would attend meetings.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McKenzie: I am certainly pleased that the hon. member should have taken such an interest in animal welfare. He made a good point when he touched upon the importation of exotic species. I have had a considerable interest in the importation of exotic species, as was evident especially in the last parliament. Many problems were raised at that time and I still do not know whether they have been dealt with. As an example I should like to mention what has been happening to air shipments arriving in Canada.

One man is encountering difficulty when making insurance claims for the dead fish he has been receiving. He thinks the fault lies with the Toronto air express base. The situation is disheartening to my constituent since he has to pay freight charges 50 per cent higher than the regular shipping charges. He is experiencing great difficulty settling claims with respect to his fish with Air Canada. He was experiencing heavy losses because fish were arriving dead.

In correspondence with me, officials of the Department of Transport pointed out recently they were setting up a special committee dealing with animal welfare in the course of air transit and that the committee had been established, among other things, to develop more sophisticated facilities on the ground for use by live animals. A move was under way to educate all the personnel involved in the better handling and care of animals. Aircraft environment was to be reviewed and training material was to be produced useful to everyone concerned. Whether these proposals were carried out, I do not know.

● (1750)

Recently the Ontario Humane Society, in co-operation with the Animal Welfare Foundation of Canada, did a survey of the retail trade in exotic animals in Ontario, and the following were the problems encountered in the area of transportation:

Since most pet store owners buy from Canadian wholesalers the transportation part of the survey is inconclusive as far as the questionnaire goes.

They sent out a questionnaire to a number of pet stores.

Method of transportation and transportation time were interprovincial estimates and consequently very few problems were encountered. The most common complaints which arose dealt with the airlines and express handlers and to lesser degrees the veterinary services at the port of entry. Eleven stores complained of the airlines because:

1. Handlers (airline personnel) did not know how to handle the animals.

2. Animals were not crated properly.

3. Animals did not have proper food or water.

4. In winter animals are left on the runway or in drafts.

5. Airlines are too slow in notifying animal owners that their animals have arrived.

6. Airlines lose animals much like they lose luggage.

We all know how Air Canada loses luggage.

A few shops complained that government veterinarians were not on duty 24 hours a day and if their animals came in late in the day they had to rouse a veterinarian and pay him to inspect the animals. Some charges were laid that the government veterinarians did not know enough about the animals concerned to pronounce them healthy or not and that inspections were carried out in a somewhat cursory manner.

Complaints were also received concerning inadequate housing while in transit. This complaint was somewhat substantiated by an article in the "Pet Dealer".

In a number of American and European cities there are special terminals for properly handling imported animals and pets. This is something that we in Canada must examine. I hope that the bill will be sent to committee where we can question Air Canada officials, and other airline officials, as well as officials of the Department of Transport as to whether animals are properly handled at our terminals across Canada.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the hon. member for bringing forward this private member's bill and for his continuing sensitivity in terms of the mistreatment of animals in Canada. I also appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) who said we should reconstitute the animal welfare committee. Perhaps all members of the House, owing to the pressure of time, have not devoted the kind of attention to this subject that it merits, and I welcome the invitation of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to deal with this question on a regular basis in a committee of the House.

The intention of the bill is good, but the hon. member should keep in mind that Bill C-71, which we passed on January 27, provided for a two-year prohibition period. The hon. member's bill appears to depart somewhat from that in that, where there is an order for prohibition after an offence relating to the keeping of an animal, his bill would provide for a period not exceeding two months upon first conviction.

I would take issue with this legislation inasmuch as I prefer the bill that we have passed, which gives a judge discretion to impose more than a two months' denial of possession of any animal. The penalty is greater under the provisions of Bill C-71. I realize the intention behind the hon. member's bill is to provide flexibility in the area of treating animals. I have long believed that the degree of civilization or culture in any country has a lot to do with the way we treat our animals. Canada is not at the top of the list in terms of treating animals humanely. We have a considerable distance to travel in this area, and in those terms the hon. member's bill does seek to continue to move this country forward in a civilized way.

I am convinced that the time is long past due when we should eliminate the leg hold trap. In this regard there have been a number of private members' bills presented to this House. I think it is time for the government to bring forward a Conibear trap; and in the area under its own jurisdiction, namely, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the government should ban the leg hold trap immediately. We can then move on to deal with the question of possible payment of compensation to trappers. They have a problem in terms of the cost of the leg hold trap, but as a civilized country we should not allow use of this kind of inhumane trap to continue in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: In conclusion, once again I congratulate the hon. member for his bill. I know of his long felt sympathy for the problems of animals and I am delighted he has again raised the matter in the House. I agree that we should reconstitute the animal welfare committee and I thank him again for his invitation to join that committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for introducing Bill C-241. I overheard the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) mention it is unlikely this bill will be passed tonight. I can appreciate his feelings, as there is a zoo in his riding. I also believe in the welfare of animals and I am rising on a matter of principle at this stage to point out that the legislation put forward by the hon. member provides for minimum penalties. In my view it is desirable and a matter of principle to avoid mentioning minimum sentences in the Criminal Code.

We can see in the Criminal Code a reverse trend because the people who are entrusted with administering justice in Canada think that the courts should be given the prerogative of deciding on the penalty which best fits the offence. If a provincial attorney general does not approve of the sentence, an appeal can be lodged.

Without trying in any way, to vindicate cruelty to animals, I believe, once again, Mr. Speaker, that we should not lose sight of the nature of the offence.

● (1800)

If a minimum sentence is provided for under this charge, we shall have to reconsider the penalties applicable to other serious offences against law and order. To provide for minimum sentences for offences which are a patent transgression of a prohibition ordinance by a Court would be giving Canadian judges less credit than they deserve. So, as I have said before, my purpose is not to contradict my learned colleague, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) who wants animals protected in this country but rather to comment on a matter of principle with regard to sentencing. He advocates a minimum sentence for repeated offenders guilty of flouting a prohibition ordinance—

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that it has not been possible to reach agreement under the provisions of Standing Order 75A and 75B in respect of proceedings on the second reading of Bill C-68, an act to amend the Medical Care Act. Therefore, in accordance with Standing Order 75C, I hereby give notice that at the next sitting of the House I shall move that not more than five hours shall be allotted to the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage of the said bill.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As hon. members know, the House agreed to allow the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to move an amended version of the amendment he proposed the other day. With the consent of the House, that motion not having been put, I shall now put it to the House. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), for the hon. member for Calgary North, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), moves:

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-83, An Act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to make a preliminary remark concerning the bill before us, Bill C-83, as an initial clarification which will prove necessary in the light of my later comments on the spirit of the proposed measures.

When it is time to vote on third reading, I shall probably vote in favour of Bill C-83, even if I have serious reservations as to the merits of certain clauses, because it completes Bill C-71 which the House has already considered and because it is a valuable and necessary updating of our criminal justice and correctional tools.

Indeed, as many of my colleagues have already pointed out, particularly the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), most of the subjects covered are not new legal points, they only result from the normal development of existing statutes. Whether it be amendments to the Protection of Privacy Act, the updating of the rules governing custody and parole, the approval in principle of public inquiries on organized crime, the clarification of the status of dangerous criminals or even the new set of measures on gun control and the regulations governing gun users, owners, one could almost say that we have here the substance of a housekeeping bill. This is why the best forum to debate such legislation would be the parliamentary committee and I hope that the second reading debate will not be too long so that the discussion can be really constructive and the few litigious or controversial elements, specially in the field of wiretapping, can be studied with the attention they deserve by the persons concerned in the presence of experts from the Department of Justice and witnesses or resource persons wishing to appear before the committee.

Even if a few hon. members had some reservations about the combination of the five issues covered, I do not think that on this sole basis we should object at this first stage of the parliamentary study of Bill C-83, and this with all due respect for those who hold opposite views. In this regard, most hon. members have already approved in principle the proposed measures. And the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) himself, having clearly said that criminal justice instruments like the Criminal Code and legislation concerning parole, the Penitentiary Act and other related statutes were changing constantly I think that the suggestions made by hon. members could be and should be considered by the parliamentary committee to help this government fight efficiently the alarming increase in crime in Canada.

For those reasons and only those, I support Bill C-83.

Where I do not agree however is where Bill C-83 is made to say what it does not say and is made to do what it cannot do. Bills C-83 and C-84 have been given the pompous and mistaking title of "Peace and security program for protection against violent crime".

The first question that comes to my mind is WHY?

Why give so much importance to a mere readjustment of the internal administration of criminal justice instruments, readjustment long since advocated by the Parole Board, the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and the different police corps at all jurisdiction levels?

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Why? And the first answer which comes to my mind, shocking and brutal, is that they have tried to coat the bitter pill, Bill C-84, abolishing capital punishment, with what may seen to be and is effectively a tightening of the Criminal Code. Bill C-83, Mr. Speaker, is an exercise in marketing Bill C-84.

Without any intention of judging the merit of Bill C-84, which will come up for discussion later, a discussion impassioned to one's liking, I suppose, if we really want to make people and their elected representatives believe that through the measures proposed in Bill C-83 we can effectively and efficiently stop the thrust of violent crime in this country, I apoligize, but we are trying to deceive the public by means of a sophisticated exercise in organized camouflage. Indeed without referring to the overly narrow approach taken in this struggle by the program in question, I agree with the comments of Jean-Claude Leclerc of Le Devoir, who said in an article entitled: "The illusory protection obtained by life imprisonment", I quote:

● (2010)

. . . it will be easier to multiply repressive measures than to cover the penitentiary system in the changing process that is required and without which, when the next crime occurs, the public will ask for capital punishment to be reinstated.

As regards the peace and security program itself, and particularly the booklet which features the program highlights and which was circulated by the Department of Justice, one may see with astonishment and incredulity that crime prevention is not given much importance: three tiny paragraphs that cover a quarter of a page, a third of which concerns the defensible space, that is to say:

Marked efforts to better understand the matter of reinforcement of possible crime targets, as well as that of the environment design. Strategy to increase the community resistence towards crime.

Anyone who is seriously involved in an over-all effort to control crime must consider in a comprehensive manner all the aspects of the criminal process, from the causes of the first offence to the reasons for repeated offences, and this includes different concepts, whether it be crime causes, police investigation and indictment, the judicial process including conviction and sentencing, penitentiary life in which penalty and rehabilitation are opposed, and finally, reintegration into society with, in most cases, the rejection of the former inmate.

Well, the peace and security program falls within this framework. Basically, it deals only with penalty and implementation of sentence, without really trying to come to grips with the causes of crime and the roots of community distrust toward offenders and former inmates.

An organized program of crime control should take into account all factors involved in the anti-social or asocial behaviour of some individuals; it should therefore bear on crime causes, social and police prevention, sentencing, penitentiary reform, treatment, social rehabilitation, information and community involvement.

Let us begin at the start, with the definition of delinquency. It was on the assumption that no simplistic definition of delinquency and its features are of any value that criminologists and psychologists developed scholarly theories in normative terms.

Two mainstreams however seem to emerge. One is based on the ecologic theory evolved during the last century. The other, the more recent psychological theory, draws upon fundamental criminology in terms of formal patterns. Supporters of the latter look to conditioning as prime factor in the disposition-forming process.

I draw upon Professor Eysenck, a renowned criminologist, to grasp the impact of conditioning upon individuals. In his book Crime and Personality, Mr. Eysenck, while granting official status to the psychological concept of deliquency, uses a Freudian concept, that of more or less suppressed agressiveness, to strenghten his assertion that the degree of personality extraversion determines the marginal tendency to ward anti-social behaviour. This is where the "conditioning" factor comes in. It can eventually convert that simple disposition into a major personality feature. While reaffirming that his explanation is totally doctrinal and cannot explain the overall criminal process in man, Eysenck draws certain conclusions that appear to be quite pertinent on the possible ramifications of delinquent correction. He thereby attacks the remuneration concept of sentencing relative to the prohibited act that was committed. That result alone of the psychological analysis, if nothing else, would make Eysenck's work valuable.

And to quote the professor:

[English]

... the effect of reward and punishment depends entirely on whether the behaviour to which they are applied is frustration-instigated or motivation-instigated. In the latter case, punishment may itself constitute a frustrating situation, in which case it will either increase the strength of any frustration instigated behaviour already present, or transform the motivated state into a frustrated one.

[Translation]

Supporters of the ecological theory, on the other hand, favour a demographic and social approach to delinquency. Following analyses of popular environments as opposed to so-called "have" environments, certain constants were stressed, while certain variables were used as parameters.

Through ecology, we can better define the surroundings which might bring about a deficient environment. In the light of these somewhat academic comments, I admit, it will be agreed that poverty, especially urban poverty, has a definite influence on the development in certain individuals of a conscience that is anti-social to say the least.

From the numerous studies on the conceptualisation of the notion of poverty, the following two criteria should be kept in mind: environment and conditioning, both of which are present in all stages of delinquency prevention and remain operative when corrective action is necessary. Since the environment has a direct influence on conditionning, the only logical way to fight crime is through the elimination of the causes of delinquency. The thing to do therefore is to plan government action and coordinate the various programs, housing, health, welfare, community centres, towards a single objective: the improvement of the living conditions of the underprivileged.

It is in such a context that the rationale for potential rehabilitation and treatment systems can be found. In reality, we shall never be able to completely eradicate the harmful elements which make up individual behaviour patterns, but once the environment problem is solved, it will be much easier to deal with the psychological causes of delinquency.

The second factor concerns social and police prevention and, in this regard, I have been surprised and shocked by the reactions of policemen and prison guards concerning the order and security program, and especially the abolition of capital punishment.

The excessive conservatism of policemen and prison guards increases violent criminality much more than it decreases or prevents it. It seems that the best way to hide one's own incompetence is to play on the emotions and the ignorance of the population, like some are now doing with regard to capital punishment. In my opinion, policeman and prison guard associations hide behind the death penalty their failure in the areas of prevention and rehabilitation. Police authorities must understand that their role is not simply to apprehend offenders or to make searches in an effort to prevent offences. The image of the policeman has suffered a lot from the military character that police forces have often given it. In fact, we have made a mistake in giving more and more power to policemen, like Bill C-83 is now doing, in return for the peace and safety of the citizens while providing little or no control over their actions.

Police forces have also suffered from the patent lack of recruiting and even training. To be really efficient, policeman should act as a human affairs officers. Indeed, they also seem to suffer from the fact that they have to enforce unpopular legislation and also from the fact that they have dehumanizing and lowly jobs to perform such as giving parking tickets.

The policeman's role should be especially oriented towards two things, first, crime prevention through information programs and education about the role of the policeman, and second, the traditional criminal investigation which could bring about an arrest.

In its report "Sentences et mesures non sentencielles dans le processus pénal", the Law Reform Commission of Canada clearly states that, considering that the community should deal with most problems and disputes in an ordinary fashion, that is without having recourse to criminal law and without necessarily fighting in courts, one should encourage police forces, social services and other community organizations to help individuals, families, schools and other groups to solve the problems and conflicts which affect them without taking legal proceedings.

At any rate, it seems obvious that if we want to recruit policemen with some knowledge of psychology or human relations, one will have to entrust them with more responsibilities than those entailed in purely mechanical tasks. We should therefore create a department within the police which should entrust ordinary civil servants with some of the functions which are now in the hands of policemen, such as fines, traffic control, clerical tasks, reports, and so forth. The police would be the first to profit from such a diversion of tasks, the first benefit being to assure them a far better public image.

I would like to quote a passage from The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society, a report of the American presidential commission on justice administration and application of the law. I quote:

● (2020)

[English]

Crime flourishes where the conditions of life are the worst, and therefore the conditions of a national strategy against crime is an unremitting national effort for social justice. Reducing poverty, discrimination, ignorance, disease and urban plight and anger, cynicism or despair—these conditions can inspire, is one great step toward reducing crime.

[Translation]

The third level is sentencing. In spite of the reports of the Law Reform Commission little if anything has been done in this respect, except giving to magistrates again through Bill C-84 the power to extend from 10 to 25 years the minimum period of detention without parole for second degree murder.

As early as 1968, the Ouimet report deplored that no specific and elaborate sentencing policy existed in Canada, with the result that an accused may be at the mercy of a judge who is more or less understanding, and depending on the case he will do two years of penitentiary or remain on parole with the possibility of developing his sense of responsibility and fitting in the community while being guided by a social worker.

The main obstacles to the development of a unified system of criminal law and social rehabilitation have been thus far the absence of a clearly defined sentencing policy and the inadequacy of services and facilities available to a judge entrusted with the key function of this global process.

That policy still does not exist in any case. Until there is a school for judges—without necessarily wanting to attack the process of appointments to the bench—we will continue to have inadequate judges or judges motivated by considerations based on outmoded principles.

This code of sentencing could, for example, provide that certain individuals sentenced for a first offense will all the same have to undergo a certain period of treatment if the conditioning to which they were submitted—and one sees here the role of the report provided by the social worker—was deficient.

All those problems are of a judicial procedure nature. As for the correctional process as such the situation is confused. Although a certain number of positive changes have been made in the last few years in the operation and the administration of penitentiary services the faults afflicting detention institutions prevent most often the achievement of the commendable objectives of those in charge—training and rehabilitation.

Indeed, as long as punishment is mistaken for rehabilitation, there is hardly any hope that the spirit existing in penal institutions will evolve appreciably.

Unfortunately, I am unable to adequately cover the treatment aspect of the correctional process and that is too bad; Bill C-84 will perhaps provide me with that opportunity.

In short, crime prevention should now be based on two principles: to prevent individuals from indulging in criminal activities by the removal of some environmental factors which seem to have a decisive impact on the development of delinquency; for the offenders, it would be advisable to consider community therapy through the action of social workers and citizen's committees, to think up a new philosophy for the treatment of individuals having experienced a defective or antisocial conditioning.

Finally, it is necessary within the correctional process itself to remove one of the main causes of delinquency: the penitentiary subculture, by systematically promoting the establishment of small institutions such as community residential centres.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-83, though basically sound, does not constitute an efficient weapon in the fight against crime. Only a well defined all encompassing policy might stand a chance of checking the deplorable tendency towards increasing crime, disturbing symptom of an even greater failure, which could be that of our whole society.

In conclusion, I should like to quote an excerpt from the report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada entitled "Sentences et mesures non sentencielles dans le processus pénal" which indicates the direction in which we should go.

How will we treat those who violate those fundamental values, those of our society? I quote:

Everyone, legislator or private citizen, must understand that the coercive power of penal law must be used only with moderation since otherwise, we run the risk of generating other social ills. Too great a desire to have law and order can, on contrary, produce disorder. What is basically a manifestation of responsibility can on the contrary lead to irresponsibility when, instead of serving as guidance toward an honest solution of the problems we are confronted with, the rules serve as screens to keep us from understanding them.

Mr. Speaker, that is food for thought. I do hope that all hon. members will understand that it is the duty of each and everyone of us to find such solutions as can check the tide of crime, in our country.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, most people of this country, I suggest, cannot logically quarrel with the concept of some sort of gun control. It is not an alarming concept any more than controlling the use of automobiles, poison, snowmobiles or any other device, or substance that might be considered dangerous. But no issue since I have come to the House of Commons has prompted such a rash of protests from my constituents against the way that the government is implementing what ought to be a very simple and laudable objective.

The so called peace and security package is really a misnomer, I suggest, because to start with it is a joint product of two ministers who do not even agree philosophically. It is an anomaly. My friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), says they are the odd couple. That may well be, but I rather think that Robert Lewis in the current issue of Maclean's magazine sums it up pretty well when he refers to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) as playing a kind of good cop-bad cop routine. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) says he can live with hanging and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) says he cannot. This kind of basic philosophical difference is not doing anything to inspire confidence in the people of this country that this legislative package is a well thought out and valid concept, particularly when it is also billed as some sort of trade off for tougher measures.

● (2030)

It is said that measures on guns, wiretaps, and sentencing are a trade-off for abolishing capital punishment and a sop to the police and prison guards. I think that is too simplistic a proposition, but it is indicative of the type of perception the people of this country have about this kind of legislation, and I think it is a very unhealthy state of affairs.
