Hon. Mr. Haig: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, to those who were here last night I gave a word of explanation, which I do not mind repeating at this stage. This is the usual motion introduced at this stage of any session, and it has been the practice for a number of years. Its purpose is to expedite the work of this house at the late stage of any session. The purpose is not so much to go through a number of readings of bills in a great rush, but is to permit this house to give consideration to any measure at the moment it is introduced, without having to delay it for one or two days under the rules. As I have said, it is a customary motion at this stage of the session, and I recommend it to the consideration of this house.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I oppose the motion for several reasons. I oppose it firstly for technical reasons. We are told that the rules are to be suspended in connection with public bills. The Senate will remember that the last time such a motion was made we had a problem with a public bill introduced by a private member of this house. In fact, there is a distinction between a public bill as such and a Government bill. I do not want anyone here to propose tomorrow, without prior notice, that the death penalty be re-established.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I might favour it, but I would probably need a little warning to be able to make up my mind on that. This first objection therefore is a technical one.

• (1410)

The second point is this. This motion is all right, depending on certain circumstances. If, as was suggested by the Leader of the Government yesterday evening, Bill C-259, the so-called fiscal reform bill, comes to us on December 17 at 4 p.m., I am not too sure that I would be prepared to accept that it be dealt with on Friday and Saturday. As far as I am concerned, and as far as this group is concerned, I want to reserve my decision on this. I do not think the Government should move this motion at this time. The Government knows very well that on this side of the house we are willing to co-operate. If the bill reaches us in normal circumstances we will give leave to proceed with it, but I do not think we should be called upon to give such leave in advance.

Furthermore, there is something about the wording of this motion. It says: "For the balance of the present session". Do we know when the session will end? We may be here for another six or seven months.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We never know. It is a guess.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The wording of the motion has given me the best argument against the motion itself, better than any that I could put forward myself. If we do not know, we should not be called upon to vote on the motion. I suggest that it be withdrawn, against our assurance that we will not refuse leave to proceed with Bill C-259, unless it comes to us under circumstances that are really impossible to meet, as far as the duties and responsibilities of the Senate are concerned.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I have no objection to giving further consideration to this matter, and especially to the technical aspects of it, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. I suggest that the motion stand for today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Good.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this motion stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Notice of motion stands.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance entitled: "Growth, Employment and Price Stability", tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 18th November, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Manning.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the honourable Senator Manning speak now instead of the honourable Senator Martin?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to join in the congratulations which have been extended to Senator Everett, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, on the work which the committee accomplished and on the report it has presented to this house.

Those of us who were privileged to be members of the committee were very impressed by the outstanding group of knowledgeable and competent witnesses which Senator Everett and his steering committee arranged to give evidence on the important matter under consideration. It is unnecessary to reiterate what has been said by others who have taken part in this debate or to enlarge on the information contained in the report itself, but I would draw attention to the fact that out of these hearings—and the report itself confirms this—it has been made very clear that there is no single, simple solution to the type of economic problem that confronts us in this country today.

Repeatedly, the witnesses who appeared before the committee dwelled on the dual nature of our present economic problem. On the one hand we are faced with all the difficulties that arise when inflationary pressures are excessive, and, on the other hand, we are faced with the very significant number of unemployed we have in this country at the present time. It was made clear from the evidence given to the committee that there are quite well established traditional procedures for coping with either of these major problems, if the one could be divorced from the other. For example, in a situation of developing widespread unemployment, if that were the only concern it would be relatively simple to expand the credit and money supply of the country in a manner that would stimulate rapid economic growth which quite quickly could absorb the unemployed. Or if the only concern was the existence of inflationary pressures, then a restriction of the national money and credit supply could bring that situation under control fairly quickly.

However, as we all know, the problem that we face in Canada today results from a combination of these two matters. If we take the traditional steps to expand the economy in order to relieve unemployment, we seem inevitably to aggravate the inflationary pressures. If we take the traditional steps to restrict the credit and money supply of the country in order to curb inflation, then we pay a very high price in terms of serious unemployment.

We can say, therefore, that the evidence before the committee revolved round this one major consideration: how can we do both these things successfully at one time? And I repeat the hearings underscored the fact that there is no single, simple answer to a problem of this kind. I suggest that the tendency in many quarters to oversimplify this compound problem is a serious mistake. When governments or politicians, political parties or individuals in the private sector or organizations convey to the public the impression that there is a simple solution to a problem of this nature, they immediately create public expectations, and when it proves impossible to meet those expectations we create an atmosphere which is very unfavourable and in fact can be detrimental to steps we might otherwise be able to take. It seems to be the general conclusion, and it would be not inaccurate to say that the committee report leans in this direction, that what we have to choose in Canada today is a saw-off between these two problems: how much inflation are we prepared to live with, and how much unemployment are we prepared to live with? On the basis of a saw-off between these two things we must decide the levels of economic expansion that we should stimulate or the extent of economic controls that should be imposed.

Personally I am not convinced, at least not fully convinced, that the solution to this problem must of necessity be a saw-off between these two considerations. Out of the hearings and the evidence given by these capable witnesses there emerged rather clearly the fact that we have need in our very highly interrelated economy to try to develop some altogether new techniques that we could bring to bear on these two problems as an alternative to merely saying that we are going to have one or the other and that the best we can do is to decide how to balance one against the other to create a situation which will be tolerable.

I was impressed by the number of witnesses who stressed that there simply was not sufficient research being carried on by government, by educational bodies such as universities or by research groups into the intricacies of the complicated economic structure as we know it at the present time. Repeatedly when these witnesses were asked questions on these matters they would say quite frankly, "Well, we have this opinion or that opinion, but there really has not been sufficient research into the ramifications to be able to come up with a precise answer." Honourable senators, this fact is quite apparent and this is certainly something that could be corrected without great difficulty. In the recommendations and conclusions of the committee we find the following on page xv:

> 3. We recommend the formation of a Commission for Economic Analysis charged with the responsibility of producing short term forecasts and analyses of economic performance. It should be composed of professional economists not representative of any special interest group, who are appointed for a three year term. The commission should be financed by the federal government and be independent.

I regard that as among one of the very important and practical recommendations which the committee has made. Surely in an age in which sophisticated research has proven its value in industry, education, commerce, and in so many other spheres, we should not fall behind in the public sector. We should ensure that there is constant sophisticated research going on in these areas in order to produce what I have referred to as practical new techniques to assist in resolving these dual problems facing us in this country today.

I do not propose to labour this matter further. However, with respect to the committee's recommendation regarding a research body, if the Government accepts this recommendation I hope that within the group of specialists established they would give consideration not only to economists but also include men knowledgeable in the new discipline of cybernetics and in the field of systems analysis. In recent years, these two new disciplines have made a tremendous contribution to the private sector. In the public sector, we have not to any degree applied these disciplines in the field of economics.

National economies are frequently referred to as "national economic systems". The term "system" in modern times has come to mean a set of interrelated components organized to perform prescribed functions. The fact remains, however, that the classic economic models including the keynesian model, do not recognize in a scientific sense the "systems character" of national economies. The problems of managing modern economies include the problems of achieving stabilization, orderly growth, and the idea of self-regulation by means of automatic controls built into the system itself rather than by imposing arbitrary external controls. I think honourable senators will agree that in recent years as economic problems have become more complex there has been a marked tendency to rely on external controls to correct disabilities. And as a result we have seen an increasing number of government regulations, guidelines, ground rules, and controls of one kind or another imposed on the economy or segments of the economy.

This is done with the best of intentions. Perhaps some benefit has been achieved. In the aggregate, however, excessive external controls have made our economy increasingly complex. So many barriers in the way of the free exercise of enterprise and initiative have been imposed that we may well have reached the point of defeating many of the objectives we had hoped to achieve.

In these modern disciplines of systems analysis and cybernetics there is great emphasis on the concept of self-regulation, of developing within the system characteristics through feed-back loops which impose their own restraints on situations which otherwise might get out of hand. To my knowledge, there is no country or government in our modern, industrialized world that has really developed this idea of treating the national economy as a system of inter-related parts, and attempted to build into the system self-regulating features which would relieve the need for regulations and controls.

It seems to me that the time has come for more explicit recognition by Government and economists of both the general systems theory, systems analysis, and the discipline of cybernetics. The latter is concerned with systems stabilization, systems growth, and systems self-regulation or control through the development and use of feed-back loops. At present no nation has developed management strategies for stabilizing its economy, sustaining economic growth or establishing self-regulation by utilizing cybernetic principles. Canada, as a young nation which does not need to fear a little experimentation along these lines, is in a position to give significant leadership in bringing to bear the value of these disciplines on an economic problem which is recognized by all as serious.

I stress this because if the recommendation of the committee with respect to the commission of economic analysts is accepted, it would be my hope that the personnel of that commission would include experts in the fields of systems analysis and cybernetics. Such men could contribute much to the development of the type of techniques to which I have referred, and to the solution of the problems which face us today.

I am pleased, as I am sure are all senators, to see the amount of public interest which this report has created across Canada. The general reaction has been very favourable. In my view, this emphasizes the valuable work committees of the Senate can perform when given an opportunity to come to grips with public issues of concern to the Canadian people. If we can pursue in other areas the course that was followed with respect to this inquiry, we can make a valuable contribution to the good and welfare of the nation and serve the best interests of its people.

Had I been asked to make any recommendation on further inclusions in the report, I would have been tempted to suggest the addition of a paragraph to the effect that this study is a good example of the practical use that can be made of the expertise found in this assembly. This utilization of Senate expertise is something that should be pursued more vigorously than has been the case to date.

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, I am prompted to say a few words at this time, particularly in view of the opinions expressed by Senator Manning, to which I listened with interest.

First, I wish to say that Senator Everett, the chairman of this committee, did an outstanding job. All members of the committee, many of whom are present today, will agree with me on that. It was his leadership that promoted the committee's intense activity which is illustrated in the report, the subject matter of this debate.

Unfortunately I did not hear all of the speeches because I was absent from the chamber last week, suffering from the same disability as that experienced by our distinguished colleague, Senator Hayden. However, I have read those speeches, all of which made real contributions, including that of Senator Manning to which we have just listened.

I wish to stress only one aspect of the report. I should like to say in advance that I attended the preliminary hearings of the committee convinced that mandatory wage and price controls were probably the ultimate solution to the problem. By the time the hearings ended I was convinced that this was not so. That conclusion was reached partly after hearing the first witness before the committee, Sir Roy Harrod, the distinguished economist from England.

For the benefit of honourable senators who may not have had time to read the committee's proceedings I shall read from page 15 of May 4, 1971. I asked Sir Roy Harrod the following question:

> As I understand your thesis, you believe that the ultimate sanction is the imposition of wage and price controls. Can you point to any examples in the world where any country has imposed wage and price controls, and has successfully stabilized its economy?

His reply was:

> No, because I do not think they have tried hard enough lately.

In fairness, Sir Roy went on to say he felt that Sir Stafford Cripps made them work for a short period after World War II, but that was the answer from that outstanding exponent of mandatory price and wage controls.

I seem to recall one other witness who was less vigorous about wage and price controls. All the other witnesses gave us good and sound reasons why they would not work, but I have no intention of examining what they said because I believe Senator Grosart has covered that field thoroughly.

• (1440)

I simply want to point out that a person can begin to work in these committees with one point of view and, if he is at all objective, after listening to the witnesses he may very well end up with a completely different point of view. This is precisely what happened to me.

I read with interest what Senator Buckwold said on this subject and, as the senator who preceded me did, I refer him to what is said at the beginning of the report. At page IX under "Conclusions and Recommendations" there is this:

> The recent economic moves of the United States will have major effects on the Canadian economy. While as a result there may have to be short-term Canadian policy reactions different from our recommendations, this does not invalidate the basic idea of a properly conceived policy to provide maximum long-term stability.

The report then deals with monetary wage and price controls, and rules them out as a permanent solution to this problem. The committee certainly did take cognizance of the fact that for a period it might be necessary, due to the actions of the United States, to resort to such measures.

However, that is a digression from the main point that I wished to make. I repeat, those who preceded me have more or less stolen my thunder; therefore, I have decided to concentrate on one particular point. I trust the house will not think I am infringing on Senator Manning's argument that this problem can be oversimplified, but I feel that there is one aspect of the situation which has not been given sufficient consideration and to which I should like to draw attention.

At page 62, under the sub-heading "Spotlighting", the report says:

> But while we would discourage the promulgation and publicizing of general guidelines by the Prices and Incomes Commission on any sort of a continuing basis we strongly urge the Commission to mount an effective continuing programme of "spotlighting"—of identifying and researching cases of cost and price increases that are out of line by any reasonable standards.

At page 63 it continues:

> Excessive wage and price increases should not only be identified and publicized, they should also be researched and remedies should be recommended.

I suggest to honourable senators that this particular aspect should be emphasized. There is nothing like the glare of publicity to bring a person or an organization into line. The committee has suggested the Prices and Incomes Commission should do this and, as far as I am concerned, they should have powers—extraordinary powers, if necessary—to subpoena documents and witnesses and generally to examine into any situation which, on the face of it, appears to be creating an unreasonable increase in either wages or prices and, having done that, to give it the maximum amount of publicity.

It can be argued that the mass media might not cooperate, but do not forget that the newspapers and broadcasting stations are in the business of making money, and must attract readers or listeners. The ordinary situation is not news. If Joe Doaks lives happily with his wife, who cares? But if Joe Doaks takes a swipe at his wife, then that is news. If there is an extraordinary situation, such as an unreasonable demand for an increase in wages or prices, then the mass media would, I believe, give maximum publicity to it.

I emphasize this because it would promote economic stability. I am thinking in terms of the small businessman, and the person living on a fixed income, who is particularly hurt by inflation, which in turn is caused by excessive price and wage increases. If public attention is focused by suitable publicity of any given unreasonable demand for increases, then that would have a most salutary effect.

Perhaps this is not a very learned discourse compared to what has been said by those who have preceded me—

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Did the committee give consideration to an alternative proposal for a body to examine price and wage increases which, in the circumstances, were regarded as improper or unfair? Was attention paid, for instance, to the type of institution that existed at the end of the war—the Parliamentary Prices Commission—which sat for two years? Did the committee give consideration to such a commission?

Hon. Mr. Laird: There was a discussion with witnesses and among committee members of the type of body which could best do this. I cannot quote exactly what was said by each witness or by each member of the committee but consideration was given to this. We did receive, of course, a great deal of evidence which was critical of the Prices and Incomes Commission in its present role. I am sure members of the committee will recall that.

I can tell the honourable Leader of the Government that the wording of the report was carefully considered. It was drafted and re-drafted many times. There were many committee meetings in camera to consider the report before it was published. As a result of all those discussions we came to the conclusions that this was the logical body. Rightly or wrongly, that is our conclusion.

I am not suggesting we should be dogmatic about it. As a matter of fact, the point I am trying to make is that we often overlook the power of publicity. I am a great believer in directing public attention to matters of this type through the newspapers and broadcasting stations. There is nothing like such action as a means of controlling the conduct of people. People are naturally concerned about what others think of them, and making them look like heels can cause them to act properly in a given situation.

It was my intention also to refer to various newspaper articles commenting on the committee's report, but Senator Grosart jumped the gun on me.

Having read many newspaper reports on the work of the committee, and the favourable and intelligent comment on the report, I feel very proud of having been a small cog in the machine which turned it out.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Laird another question arising out of his excellent contribution to this debate?

Was attention given to the steps that could be taken to give such a commission effective direction, not only with respect to one section of the private sector but all sections? For instance, it is noteworthy that the commission was able to have very great influence and support from one group in the private sector, but not from another.

• (1450)

Hon. Mr. Laird: That is a good question, and one with which I intended to deal more fully. I am now giving a personal view which arises from my participation in the discussions. In the case of any body of this kind there will always be a situation in which organized groups are monetarily capable of appearing before the board or commission, as the case may be, and making out their case. I am thinking of the labour unions, and such associations as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

I am glad to have been asked this question, because I intended to stress the proposition that the PIC should not be subject to the pressure of organized groups; that it should have the power to subpoena witnesses to compel their attendance, and to subpoena documents. It could then take in the broad spectrum of people who would not normally appear before it to make out a case. I think that is the strength of the committee's proposition, on which I have expanded today. Everybody would have a chance of making out a case. If the commission felt any segment of society was being discriminated against or hurt by the actions of another segment of society, it could of its volition take the initiative, hold hearings, and focus attention on the unreasonable course of conduct.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, when I congratulated Senator Everett on the excellence of his report he told me that one of the essentials for a good report is to get the expertise so that the committee can examine the subject with people who fully understand it. For this reason, we should congratulate Dr. Gillies, Commander German, and Dr. McQueen on the very useful work they did.

This report has caused me to look more closely at the economy of Canada as it appears to me today. There are two things in Canada that are almost unique. With the discovery of large quantities of oil and gas in Prudhoe Bay and the discovery of a large quantity of gas in the Arctic islands, we have a source of clean fuel, as it is called, which we are quite capable of developing. Unquestionably, if we devoted the time and energy to studying the problem sensibly, there is no reason why we could not put down thousands of miles of gas and oil pipelines, which would be of tremendous benefit to the country for years to come, producing as it would at a reasonable price fuels for which there is an enormous demand, either in our country or in the United States. This development should cost about $4 billion, and would take five or six years to complete. These large expenditures would give an enormous impetus to business all across the land.

[Hon. Mr. Laird.]

At the other end of our country there are five rivers flowing into James Bay capable of producing 14 million megawatts of electric power, which is something in the neighbourhood of one and a half times the output of the Grand Coulee, the biggest hydro-electric dam in the United States. There is a very interesting article on this subject in the latest edition of Business Week. This would be a $6 billion development, and would be by far the world's largest power project. Remembering that the St. Lawrence Seaway cost $350 million, we can grasp the sort of thing we are looking at.

If we could get these two developments going in the next few years they would provide us with the impetus we got after the war, when tremendous development took place in Alberta and Saskatchewan with the discovery of oil and the building of pipelines, which really transformed our economy. We are looking at something in the neighbourhood of $10 billion for these two developments, which is enormous. Here are two sources of clean fuel, and no other country in the world is endowed with such wonderful riches.

With all this ahead of us, what is holding us back? One great obstacle at the present time is that we do not seem to be ready to stand on our own two feet and say that this is one country, and that it will stay one country. I am a French-Canadian, a Quebecer, and I understand the problems of the province. I am not trying to be unkind or critical but I would say, because Quebec is situated between the Maritime provinces and the rest of Canada, that if Quebec were to leave Confederation the four Maritime provinces would have no option but to join the United States. There are almost as many people in the four Atlantic provinces as there are in the Province of Quebec, and they should therefore have a say if there is to be any change.

If we look to the Pacific coast what do we see there? The lines of communication in western Canada are north and south, as they are in the Maritime provinces. If Quebec were to pull out of Confederation that would be the end of Canada. In a democracy everyone who is vitally interested should have a vote, so I think the 22 million people who live in Canada should be entitled to a vote if there were any question of Quebec separating from the rest of Canada.

What is wrong at the moment is that some people are making statements which imply that if a small majority in the Province of Quebec were to decide that Canada should be split apart, that decision should be accepted without question by the rest of the country. I say that is an absolute falsehood. Unfortunately, falsehoods, if there are not vigorously denied, end up appearing to be truths if they are repeated often enough. It makes absolutely no sense to allow small-time labour leaders with political ambition to advocate separatism without anyone saying anything to the contrary.

Honourable senators, have we not all sworn allegiance to the Crown, which must mean one Canada? If we have, should we not stand up and be counted?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government posed a very interesting question during Senator Laird's equally interesting comments on the item before us. The leader may have asked the question so as to have this on the record. The committee did consider the proposal that he made, as to whether there should be bodies other than the Prices and Incomes Commission which would be concerned with the problem.

Therefore, I draw his attention to the conclusions and recommendations, which appear on page 86 of the report, where the committee dealt with the role of the Economic Council and of the Prices and Incomes Commission, and pointed out that the role of the Economic Council is largely in long-term economic forecasting and that it was therefore not the most appropriate body to deal with day-to-day or month-to-month problems such as those which arise in connection with unemployment and price instability.

The committee therefore recommended the formation of a Commission for Economic Analysis, which would fill the void in this important necessity of short-term forecasting. It would be a kind of "early warning line" on these problems that come up, very often quite suddenly, in response to unpredicted changes in the economic climate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Was this to be part of the Economic Council?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is what I thought.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This was to be an entirely separate body, but I deal with it in this context because in the conclusions and recommendations to which I refer, No. 1 deals with the Economic Council. No. 2 reads:

> The Prices and Incomes Commission should become a federal-provincial body—

This is a major recommendation, that it be federal-provincial, rather than merely a federal body.

> —concentrating on identifying and publicly spotlighting price and wage increases that are out of line by reasonable standards.

That is a point which was well made by Senator Laird.

> Its recommendations for removal of the circumstances that made it possible to hurdle the barriers of normal market restraint could then be made to the appropriate government.

Then there is a reference to where this was dealt with in further detail in the report.

The Leader of the Government also asked about the possible role of parliamentary committees. He will be interested to know that the committee's recommendation No. 3, relating to economic analysis, would deal obviously with this kind of problem that arises in connection with unemployment and price instability. Recommendation No. 4 reads:

> Parliament and Parliamentary Committees should be given a more significant role in economic policy-making. The reports of The Economic Council of Canada and The Commission for Economic Analysis should be made to the Privy Council for submission to a Standing Committee of Parliament. Hearings would be held on these reports at which the appropriate Ministers and their officials as well as other witnesses would testify. The Parliamentary Committee should be provided with adequate staff.

While it is true that neither of these new instruments for the continuing consideration of economic policy refer directly to price stability and unemployment, they do appear in the same context with the comments on the Prices and Incomes Commission. So the committee did see them as corollaries to the operation of that commission—which, as I said, the committee sees as being very necessarily a federal-provincial committee, for the obvious reasons of constitutional constraints.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1972.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, in submitting to the Senate the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the Supplementary Estimates—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wonder whether there has been a motion for adoption of this report by the National Finance Committee. I understand we are dealing with Item No. 4.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, there was no suggestion of adopting the report, but merely of considering it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, as I was saying, it will be difficult for me to submit to the Senate the report of the Committee on National Finance which has considered the Supplementary Estimates (A) without anticipating in any way on what I shall have to say, in a few days, I hope, when I introduce the bill providing for parliamentary authorization of the said supplementary estimates.

First, our committee had the privilege to hear as witnesses on the matter before us, the following high officials of the Treasury Board: Mr. Osbaldeston, Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Board and Mr. MacDonald, Director General of Budget Co-ordination.

With the help of those two witnesses, the committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (A) covering—and now you see that I shall have to anticipate on what I shall have to say in a few days—first, funds in the amount of $365,925,284 and, secondly, budgetary estimates of a statutory nature in the amount of $198,111,500, as well as loans, investments and advances of $311,985,001, for a total of $872,021,785.

During the study, the committee was given by the representatives of the Treasury Board, some very important explanations on what we call one dollar items of which there are a total of 18. The details were given to the committee and they are included in the report tabled in this house, and printed as an appendix to our proceedings on December 2. I draw the attention of honourable senators to paragraph 3 of our report.

I would also draw your attention to paragraph 4 of the report which stresses the very important fact that 60 per cent of the estimates before us at this time—and by estimates, I mean statutory as well as non-statutory items—deal with unemployment measures; this remark is contained in paragraph 4 of our report.

The committee, in the course of its study, asked witnesses from the Treasury Board for a lot of additional information concerning the anticipated distribution of the $80 million item, which we authorized recently, in relation to the Employment Support Act with regard to any measure similar to that now affecting our trade, that is the American 10 per cent surcharge. These additional details, which we requested from the witnesses, will have to include present and anticipated commitments, under this act, by industry and by province, and also employment or jobs affected by such commitments. I am told that this information is being compiled and will probably be provided in the near future.

Furthermore, the committee asked the officials of the Treasury Board to consider again the method, way or form, as you prefer, of preparing the estimates mainly to see whether further details can be provided on the terms, conditions, status and provisions concerning loans, investments and advances contained in main as well as supplementary Estimates. The officials agreed to consider those requests and to report on the feasibility of providing all the information asked for.

Your committee also requested the witnesses of the Treasury Board to provide from now on along with the main and supplementary Estimates the total spending program of the Government, that is the statutory and non-statutory items of the main and supplementary Estimates, including loans, investments and advances of a previously approved nature, if applicable, comparing them from year to year in dollar amounts and in terms of a percentage to the country's GNP, so that anyone interested in the consideration of the estimates may at once see the relation between the total spending program of the government and the anticipated GNP for the current year. I understand that the officials of the Treasury Board are considering the matter and will subsequently submit a report.

Unfortunately, I cannot say any more about that report of our committee, because as I mentioned a while ago, by doing so, I would be afraid of covering to a large extent the points which I will make in a few days when I have the honour of bringing before the House the Supplementary Estimates (A). In conclusion, I will now merely ask the honourable senators to consider kindly the adoption of the said report.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Very well.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: This is a debatable motion and I will give the floor to honourable senators in a moment. For the present, it is moved by honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by honourable Senator Smith, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I just rise to clarify whether we are on item 3 or item 4.

The Hon. the Speaker: We are on item 4. That is why, right at the beginning, I rose to ask if there was a motion for the adoption of the report. I was informed that there was no question of a motion then. The motion came only at the end of Senator Langlois' remarks. We are now on a motion for the adoption of a report.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding Rule 36, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

TAX REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF PRELIMINARY REPORT NO. 2 OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM LEGISLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of Preliminary Report No. 2 of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 30th November, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks on this Order. I understood from Senator Choquette last night that, if Senator Flynn were not speaking today, I might be permitted to proceed in his place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I give way with pleasure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that honourable Senator Burchill speak now instead of honourable Senator Flynn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, as a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—if I may borrow an expression from Senator Walker, a very modest member—I join with Senator Walker and those who have preceded me in this debate in the tributes paid to the remarkable performance of the chairman of the committee, Senator Hayden, and the outstanding work he has done in respect of the tax reform legislation and the preliminary reports regarding it which have been presented to the Senate. I heartily subscribe to everything that has been said about the great contribution Senator Hayden has made to the Senate's consideration of this measure, and, indeed, of so many other measures in the past.

The detailed study which was given to every section of this complicated bill, under the guidance of the chairman and his able staff, is evident in the scope of the preliminary reports. Frankly, I have deemed it a privilege to have had the opportunity of sitting under the distinguished chairmanship of Senator Hayden. I am conscious of the opportunity it gave me of hearing the discussions and listening to the interesting evidence presented on the various sections of the legislation.

I rise this afternoon particularly to support the recommendation with respect to the pulp and paper industry and to endorse everything the chairman said in his comments on the reports. He dealt with the industry as a national industry, one of Canada's greatest exporting industries, one of Canada's greatest employers of labour and an industry that is of tremendous importance to the economic health of the nation. He supported his statement with figures which showed that the Canadian industry is handicapped when trading in international markets because the costs of production of its competitors from the United States and the Scandinavian countries are lower, with one of the reasons for this being that their taxes are lower. This is of special interest to the pulp and paper producing provinces whose economic welfare depends so much on that industry.

We in New Brunswick have a keen interest in this subject because no province depends as much for its well-being and prosperity on the pulp and paper industry as does New Brunswick. When you think of New Brunswick you think of trees, because over 80 per cent of the area of the province consists of forest land. We have 10 pulp and paper mills operating in the province with communities built around these mills. I want to make it clear to the Senate that these companies are now going through very, very difficult times. Several of the mills have been obliged to discontinue a section of their production, at least until market conditions improve. Another mill has been obliged to suspend operations entirely from time to time. Last week the province was shocked at the announcement that Consolidated Bathurst will have to close down a division of its plant in Bathurst in January, throwing 320 men out of work. This number together with 80 men already laid off adds up to 400. I do not have to tell you that this is very bad news for the people of Bathurst and the whole north shore community of New Brunswick, because this mill has been the backbone of that community since it was built 50 years ago. It creates a very grievous situation for families who depend for their livelihood on this mill.

Both federal and provincial authorities are presently studying the situation with labour officials in an effort to find a solution to this tragic problem. I mention this to underline what the chairman of the committee alluded to when commenting on the recommendations in connection with the pulp and paper industry. With market conditions being as they are, surely in the matter of taxes our Canadian pulp and paper industry should be placed on an equal footing with its international competitors.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

RULES OF THE SENATE

SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday, November 25, 1971, during the debate on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, respecting the examination of the parole system in Canada, the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) suggested that, in the light of the discussion, the proper course would be to adjourn the debate.

Honourable Senator Grosart then claimed that "we have no provision whatsoever in our rules for the adjournment of a debate".

He then quoted Rules 36(1) and 46(c) in support of his contention and added—

> In order to bring ourselves into line with our rules, this might be the time to suggest that, instead of attempting to adjourn a debate, we postpone it to a certain day. This would, I submit, be in keeping with our rules, which I believe is the desire of this chamber.

I have examined quite thoroughly the matter raised by the honourable Senator Grosart. All these rules already mentioned have existed since 1906, and Senate practice shows that Rule 46(h), which provides that no notice is required for the adjournment of a debate, has been used consistently. Rule 46(h) is there. It has become Senate practice and I have no hesitation in ruling that it is perfectly in order to proceed under 46(h).

Honourable Senator Grosart implied that the terms "postponed" and "postponement" in Rules 36(1) and 46(c) are to be interpreted restrictively. This is a contention that I cannot sustain.

In my opinion these rules should be interpreted in the light of continued Senate practice and therefore I must rule that a motion to adjourn a debate is in accordance with Senate rules and practice.

The point raised is an interesting one and I would think that on an appropriate occasion the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders might wish to consider this apparent conflict between Rules 36(1), 46(c) and 46(h).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Mr. Speaker, I need scarcely say that it is not my intention in any way to question Your Honour's ruling, which as usual is wise and very practical. In the latter part of your remarks, Your Honour emphasized the point I was making, namely, that there is an apparent conflict between Rules 36 and 46.

If I may presume to do so, Your Honour, I would compliment you on having made the suggestion that these two rules be brought into harmony. With that no honourable senator could have the least objection, I am quite sure, and I hope Your Honour will forgive me if I suggest that it is important that our rules, taken together, at all times make sense.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

> Copies of Ordinances passed by the Council of the Yukon Territory at its 1971 Third Session, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Yukon Act, chapter Y-2, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1971-2654, dated November 30, 1971, approving same. (English text).
> Report of the President and Statement of Accounts of the Industrial Development Bank for the fiscal year ended September 30, 1971, pursuant to section 30(4) of the Industrial Development Bank Act, chapter I-9, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, December 13, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I might add at this stage that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be sitting on Monday afternoon and it is expected that on Monday evening the supply bill covering Supplementary Estimates (A) will come to us for consideration.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So far as the Leader of the Government is concerned, is there any change in the prospect that Bill C-259 will reach us before four o'clock on Friday, December 17, 1971?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. Only this morning I had further confirmation of the accuracy of that prognostication.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The honourable Leader of the Opposition spent enough time in the other place and has been in this place for a sufficient length of time to know that governments open sessions while oppositions close them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Very well said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree with you there, but I think honourable senators understand that if we are coming back on Monday to give consideration to the supply bill it is probably because we are going to be kept busy on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday afternoon until four o'clock, the deadline indicated by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is no doubt that we will be kept busy. In any event, as I have already informed the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be sitting on Monday afternoon and honourable senators will have to be here for that meeting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is something entirely different. The committee could also sit on Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That the name of the honourable Senator Thompson be substituted for that of the honourable Senator Petten on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POLICY—ORDER BROUGHT FORWARD

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Welch calling the attention of the Senate to certain shortcomings in the agricultural policy of the Federal Government.—(Honourable Senator Argue).

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would ask that the Order of the Day to resume the debate on the inquiry of honourable Senator Welch calling the attention of the Senate to certain shortcomings in the agricultural policy of the federal Government, as set down on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday, December 14, 1971, be brought forward and placed on the Orders of the Day for this day.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Might I ask Senator Argue in what position on the Order Paper for today he wishes to have this order placed?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am informed by my advisers that it should go last.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1972.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, there appears to be some confusion as to what exactly we are dealing with here. This confusion seems to be caused largely by the fact that we have before us the report of our own committee on the supplementary Estimates before those supplementary Estimates have been dealt with in the other place. If I heard him correctly Senator Langlois suggested we will have the appropriation bill to implement the supplementary Estimates on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: On Monday next.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On Monday next. To some extent we will be jumping the gun, as Senator Langlois said, by considering the report at this time. However, I think that is one of the improvements the Senate has made in the last few years inasmuch as we now have the Estimates referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and the report of that committee in our hands before we receive the bill. The result is that the Senate is aware of what the Estimates contain because they have been considered by the committee.

• (1420)

If it is appropriate, I would like to postpone most of my remarks until we debate the motion for the second reading of the appropriation bill covering Supplementary Estimates (A). As Senator Langlois suggested in his excellent summary of the proceedings of the committee, we dealt with some matters which went beyond the specifics of the numbers in the supplementary Estimates before us.

It might be appropriate at this time to call attention to one or two of these larger subjects dealt with by the committee in its practice of taking an overview of the supplementaries rather than making a detailed examination of them. Senator Langlois has commented on this, but perhaps the most important matter which the committee brought to the attention of the officials appearing before it, and which it is now bringing to the attention of the Senate in this report, is that when we have before us the main Estimates plus the supplementaries we do not have the total spending program of the Government of Canada. We urged the officials to tidy up the highly confusing nomenclature which is used over and over again, and at times results in the presentation of bills which cannot themselves be said to be the fullest possible disclosure.

For example, we have drawn attention to a statement which appeared in a document issued by the Treasury Board entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" which, incidentally, is an excellent booklet. It indicates that the total spending program of the Government was approximately $14 billion at the beginning of the fiscal year when, in effect, the figures before us in the supplementary Estimates plus the figures in the main Estimates total over $16 billion. The assumption of a layman would be that this amount of $16 billion represents the total spending program of the Government this year. As the officials admitted, this is not so. There are other items that do not appear before us at the time we are asked to approve the main Estimates and the supplementaries.

I feel this committee can make an important contribution to the disclosure of government spending programs if it can convince the officials, and through them the ministers, that any committee which has to approve government spending programs should have before it the total spending intention of the Government. I repeat that this figure of $16 billion—the total of the main Estimates plus the Supplementary Estimates (A)—is not the total spending program of the Government. I suggest this is important. I have followed the proceedings in the other place and, unless I am mistaken, this fact has never been forcibly drawn to the attention of the minister or the officials. This is referred to in paragraph 9 of the report before us, as follows:

> The committee requested the Treasury Board to provide along with the main Estimates and the supplementary Estimates the total spending program of the federal Government, including all loans, investments and advances of a previously approved nature, comparing them from year to year in dollar amounts and in terms of a percentage of the Gross National Product. Officials of the Treasury Board undertook to examine this matter and to report on the feasibility of providing such information.

Why is such information necessary? Honourable senators, if my recollection is correct, we asked—I believe I asked—the officials when they presented these greatly increased spending Estimates, representing an increase from $15.3 billion to $16.3 billion as a result of these supplementaries, how the deficit will be affected? I pointed out that the cost of financing the present public debt of Canada takes 14 cents out of every tax dollar. Therefore, it seemed reasonable to inquire of those who brought these figures before us on behalf of the Government of Canada—the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance—as to the effect of the increases on the projected deficit.

It may amaze honourable senators to learn that the officials were not in a position to answer. They appeared before us with figures, and when we inquired of them how those figures would affect the public debt they replied: "We are sorry; we will have to return with that information."

I suggest that this indicates a kind of irresponsibility in the mechanism of disclosure. I choose my words carefully. I am not saying irresponsibility on the part of the Government or the officials as to the effect of spending on the public debt, but irresponsibility as to the mechanism of disclosure.

We emphasized to the officials that it is important that the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board assume the responsibility of making the fullest possible, most easily understood, disclosure of national finances when they appear before a parliamentary committee. I suggest that this has not been done in the past, either here or in the other place. If this committee, under the able chairmanship of Senator Everett, is able to convince the Minister of Finance, the Treasury Board, and the officials to do this in the future it will have made another useful contribution to the control of the public purse.

We put questions with respect to the loans, investments and advances. A conglomerate of figures appears in the main Estimates and in supplementaries from time to time under this very general heading. I suggest that, to some degree at least, this is a "camouflage" heading.

For example—and we drew this to the attention of the officials—the Estimates, main and supplementary, continue to tabulate the subsidies to the CBC as either loans, investments or advances. Obviously they are nothing of the kind. These are outright subsidies to the CBC and we are still in the ridiculous position every year of voting money to the CBC to pay the interest on last year's vote, which the CBC is not otherwise in a position to pay. I say this is a kind of camouflage, and I am informed that the CBC itself would be very happy to see this changed. Whether one agrees with it in concept or in quantity, the transaction should, at least, be made realistic. There is no chance in the world that we will ever get back the subsidy of $100 million or so a year to the CBC. Why should not the Public Accounts bring this into line with normal accounting practices and regard it as money spent and gone, which it is? I repeat that I believe the CBC would be very happy to see that aspect of its operations made more realistic.

We also asked—and I do not think this has ever been asked before—that officials bring before us in due course a clear statement of the status of these loans, investments and advances. We said that we should like to know the terms of such loans, investments and advances, the comparative interest rates from one to another, their status, and any that are in default? It would be very interesting to have the real status of such loans, investments and advances to the CBC brought before us in one statement.

We suggested that this was the normal practice that would be followed in any business. It would be unfair to say that the officials were surprised at the request; they were surprised, perhaps, that it should come from a Senate committee. We suggested that in any business operation this was the kind of report that should be given to the board of directors. The committee is hopeful that this addition to the quality of the disclosure that is put before Parliament from time to time will be made.

Report adopted.

POVERTY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty in Canada, tabled in the Senate on Wednesday, 10th November, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Grattan O'Leary: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does that mean that the honourable senator will himself speak on this matter?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It means exactly that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Because I should like to be present to hear his speech.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 7, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Welch calling the attention of the Senate to certain shortcomings in the agricultural policy of the federal Government.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am speaking now from necessity rather than from desire. I mentioned to Senator Croll that I was going to make a speech in the Senate this afternoon which would be a filler. He replied, "That's okay, all the speeches in the Senate are fillers." He was too modest. In any event, I wish to say a few words on some aspects of the agricultural situation, and perhaps adjourn the debate and conclude my remarks at the next sitting of the Senate. Certainly agriculture has been a controversial subject in the last few months, particularly in the House of Commons where it has been next only to the debate on the tax reform legislation. Great controversy has raged over the grain stabilization bill. This bill came to the House of Commons with stated general support at least in principle by the provinces, farm organizations, and, I believe, by political parties generally. However, it soon became bogged down in a protracted filibuster, and as a result of court action taken by certain farm organizations the Government finally suspended debate on the bill and decided not to proceed with it at this session.

The Assiniboia by-election was held just after this bill had been dropped in the House of Commons, and the resulting vote certainly left little by which the Government could be encouraged. The winning New Democratic candidate received approximately 10,000 votes, the Conservative candidate 8,200, and the Liberal candidate 7,000. The New Democratic party naturally takes a great deal of satisfaction in winning the by-election. The Conservatives say, "Well, we were second. Call a general election and in our strong bid for power we will have a fighting chance to win the Assiniboia constituency." The Liberals say that if the election had been held a month sooner their candidate would have received even fewer votes. Informed Liberals have told me that they were not particularly discouraged by the results, that they felt the vote was a clear indication that the Liberal party must improve its agricultural policies. They predict that if this is done it will be quite possible for the Liberals to win the Assiniboia riding in the next general election.

When you read statements issued by the three political parties they all sound like a research analysis of the stock market. They all sound good; they all sound plausible, but at least as far as the stock market is concerned only one statement can be right. In any event, the controversy over agriculture has made it difficult for political parties to forecast the results on the Prairies of an election. With a federal election in the not-too-distant future, it is a wide open area.

The Senate should endeavour to make positive recommendations of a non-partisan nature, or as non-partisan as we can be, to help solve the agricultural problems. Our informal Council of Prairie Senators has been working under the chairmanship of Senator Sparrow. We will be going out individually and collectively to meet on a non-partisan basis with farm organizations on the Prairies, and we hope to be wise enough to draft recommendations that will be helpful to the development of agricultural policies in Canada.

Farmers everywhere in Canada today are genuinely disturbed. The situation on the Prairies certainly leaves much to be desired. What has been happening in the last couple of years? Prices for Canadian grain have weakened and sales have dropped; there has been a glut of grain. The movement to market was exceedingly small. The farmers had a huge overhang of payments due on cash advances in former years, and there was a very grave cash situation on the Prairies two years ago, a year ago, and even now. However, there are some important improvements, but also some important difficulties that will remain.

A couple of years ago almost everyone in the grain business came to the conclusion that Canada could do much more to promote export sales. Over the years we had been very successful in providing a stable market. The Canadian Wheat Board, under the chairmanship of the now Senator William C. McNamara, did an outstanding job of orderly marketing, maintaining prices and returning to producers the highest possible amount of money for their products. However, we ran into stiff and grave world competition. We ran into trade barriers erected by nations against our products. We were facing increased difficulties in selling into the European Common Market. In this very grave situation the Government, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Canadian Grains Council, and everyone concerned with the grain business, decided that we should do everything possible to develop an increased market for Canadian grain, and all those involved have been working on this with outstanding success.

A year ago, in spite of difficult times, Canada exported the largest quantity of grain in its history, and we are off to an excellent start in this crop year. I have in my hand the latest weekly statistics from the Canadian Grain Commission, which show that from August 1 to December 31, 1971, there was exported from Canada a total of 313 million bushels of all grains, compared with 260 million bushels of all grains in the same period last year. We are thus up 20 per cent in our exports, and this is above what was previously our record export movement of grain. I think congratulations are in order to the Wheat Board, the Board of Grain Commissioners, the railway companies, the cabinet ministers, the farmers, and everyone else connected with the grain business.

This huge increase in the flow of grain to market has shown itself, as would be expected, in an improvement in the cash receipts to Prairie farmers. I take the Province of Saskatchewan because it is the largest grain producing province, and is an indication of the relative picture in Manitoba and Alberta. In the period January to June, 1968, the value of export grains was $512 million; in 1969 this figure had fallen to $307 million, a huge drop. In 1970, for the same period, the figure was $292 million, just a little worse than the very difficult year of 1969. This year, however, 1971, there has been a decided improvement in cash recipts, going up from $292 million to $351 million for the same period of January to June, an increase of some 20 per cent, or a little more, in cash receipts.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Argue: In Saskatchewan, in this one-year period. Manitoba and Alberta show the same general trend of very substantial increases in cash receipts.

If one walked into a little grocery store on the Prairies—and you can get a lot of good, sound economics by walking into such places—the storekeeper would say, "A year ago, two years ago, it was real difficult. My customers came in and bought the bare necessities, and went out with their carts half full. Now they are beginning to fill their carts again." The small storekeeper in the hamlet where I farm and do my trade said to me, "Hazen, you know, two years ago just before Christmas I sold hundreds of boxes of Japanese oranges. Last year I sold 14 boxes. This year I brought in 50 and I have one left. Farmers are starting to buy oranges again." It was his way of telling me that farmers have a little more money in their pockets this year than they had a year ago.

We are facing stiff competition in the world. Production of grain is up in almost every country, exporting countries as well as importing countries. I have in my hand "Wheat Situation", an issue of the United States Department of Agriculture for November 1971. The first paragraph on page 8 reads:

> 1971 World Crop Larger
> World wheat production in 1971 is up about 6 per cent from the 288 million tons of last year, according to preliminary estimates by the Foreign Agriculture Service. Larger crops are expected in all major producing regions except the USSR. Contributing to the increase has been generally favorable weather and expansion of harvested area.

Another paragraph on the same page reads:

> World Trade Likely Down in 1971/72
> The larger 1971 wheat harvest, especially in many importing countries, indicates that import demand may be down about 3.6 million tons from the high level of 54.9 million tons in 1970/71.

This is a drop in world trade in the same period of about 7 per cent. Yet the latest statistics show that Canadian exports are increasing in this period more than 20 per cent over last year, while world exports are down. We must take a good deal of satisfaction from the accomplishments of Canadian organizations in the grain business when they have been able to increase Canadian exports of grain, in the light of generally reduced exports of grain throughout the world. This, of course, is reflected all the way down.

Wheat quotas are much higher this year than a year ago. A year ago, probably most farmers were still on what we call the one-bushel quota, or the unit quota. Right now throughout the Prairies, probably all areas are on a general four-bushel quota for spring wheat, a general quota of five bushels an acre for Durum, 10 bushels an acre for barley, and five bushels an acre for flax. Certainly for the first time in the memory of the younger farmers there is not only a quota that gives the farmer the legal right to market his grain, but there is space in the elevators so that he can make physical delivery of the grain. This is something we have not seen, at least to this degree, for many years.

The Honourable Otto Lang decided that there should be a general reduction of wheat stocks held by the elevator companies at local points to make room for the handling of grain. The grain has been able to flow into the elevator system from the farms, and has been taken from the local elevators, at a much more rapid rate. Right now it is possible to deliver grain in most of the areas in the Prairie provinces without having to wait in a line-up. The box cars do not now come in one at a time every second week. By the block system the railway companies, over a given period, concentrate on taking grain from a certain area. The elevator agent, who was accustomed to getting one or two box cars when they were spotted in the past, now gets ten or twelve. He rolls up his sleeves and gets to work and moves the grain out in a hurry. Farmers are able to bring out the grain with a whole lot less difficulty.

But the picture is not all rosy. There are difficulties for the grain producer. The greatest single difficulty facing the grain producer today is the fantastic drop in the selling prices for his grain over the last couple of years.

I make no complaint about the action of those who lowered the prices of Canadian grain in order to meet competition. There is no use in keeping wheat priced at $2 a bushel in Canada if by reducing the price to $1.50 a bushel it can be moved out of the country and sold. So I do not criticize those who felt that they should reduce the prices. But when the prices are reduced, then obviously the farmer who is selling the grain gets a good deal less for his commodity—and there have been major reductions in prices.

When I look around the Senate chamber and see my colleagues who are connected with some of the industrial corporations of Canada—and they are doing a good job for the country—I just wonder how long their companies could last if they had to take, in a very short time, the kind of precipitous drop in grain prices that the agricultural producer has had to accept.

The price of Durum—Senator McNamara will certainly correct me if I am wrong—in the last few years has been up to $2.10 and $2.20 a bushel. Spring wheat has sold from time to time well in excess of $2 a bushel. But the price of No. 1 Northern spring wheat, as of November 22—and I think it is the same today—was $1.67 a bushel, basis Fort William. The price of Durum has been dropping until today it is not $2.20 but $1.54 a bushel out of Fort William.

When the producer has to accept a drop in price of some 70 cents—which is probably a 30 or 40 per cent reduction of his finally realized price—then he is put in a difficult financial position. He has to tighten his belt and curtail his expenditures, and do everything he can to stay in business.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What has happened to production costs in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. Argue: They have gone up. I think there is no doubt about that. The farmer has been very efficient. I think agriculture is one of the most efficient industries in the whole country. The farmer does not know anything about a 40-hour week; he is on an 80-hour week. He works as hard as he can. Twenty years ago, when he had one section of land, he worked as hard as he could. He is now better equipped and he has two sections instead of one, but he is putting in just as many hours as formerly. He has increased his efficiency, and in that sense he has decreased his cost. But at the same time he has to face the increased costs of machinery, taxes, and everything else that goes into the cost of production. Land is the only item that might be said to be reduced in price, but that is another story. Land is not really being either bought or sold at the present time.

Honourable senators, there was a lot of crying that in the proposed stabilization bill the Government was taking away the money that was being paid, or had been paid, under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, on account of storage for grain held by the Canadian Wheat Board on July 31 in excess of 178 million bushels. On the average over the years, probably $40 million a year was provided by the federal Government—starting, I think, in 1956 or 1957, under the late Honourable C. D. Howe—to pay the cost of storing wheat. If there was a glut that amount was increased to as much as $60 million, and if there was less of a glut, it went down.

It is estimated that in the near future there will be paid into the Canadian Wheat Board fund, under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, because of the reduction of grain stocks, not $40 million but $20 million. So, what the Government was taking away with the one hand, in order to provide a stabilization fund on the other, was a smaller amount of money than that which had been paid out in the past.

There has been such a substantial drop in the selling price of wheat that I would forecast there is going to be a net loss in the wheat accounts this year. Farmers need not look for a final payment because there will not be one, and instead of a surplus in the accounts there will be a deficit. If under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act $20 million to $30 million goes into the Wheat Board fund on account of storage, that money will be used to pay off any deficit that may exist in the Wheat Board accounts. In other words, the money will be paid but it will be a smaller sum and will not result in an increase in what the producer receives.

This is a further indication of the necessity for re-introduction by the Government, through Parliament, of a stabilization bill that will take into account certain factors not taken into account in the first place and which will make it possible for the federal Government to pay some money to the farmers to help correct a very difficult financial situation that still prevails on the Prairies.

This Government has been exceedingly active in trying to correct the difficulties of the grain business, and we have to give it credit for what it has been able to accomplish. Under the Honourable Mr. Lang and the Honourable Mr. Olson, the elevator congestion has ended. It no longer exists, really. The block system has greatly improved the movement of grain to market. We now have a modified protein grading system for wheat, something we needed for a long time. Our sales and exports have been the best in history. The Government now is attempting to deal with the problem of farmers on small family-sized farms, whose income is low and who may wish to quit farming soon. The Government has announced a plan that will make $150 million available for the purchase of these farms by the Farm Credit Corporation, as agent of the Government. The payments will be made outright or take the form of an annuity. To the normal purchase price of the farm may be added an additional amount that will provide the farmer with a reasonable annuity for the rest of his life.

The Government is acting in this field. I will have further remarks to make when I have had a chance to study the program in detail, but I must say that some kind of program to provide a market for agricultural land is absolutely essential. I know of nothing more depressing to the agricultural industry than for a farmer to be advertising a good farm for sale month after month, even year after year, and being almost willing to take any price but not being able to get a buyer. Land that was selling for $150 an acre two or three years ago is now being offered for $75 an acre without any takers. When farmers find their capital asset having fallen by 50 per cent in two or three years it makes for a very depressed agricultural economy and it is difficult for people to operate in that kind of economy.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: May I point out to Senator Argue that small farms in New Brunswick are selling for $12 per acre.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is even worse than where I come from. Of course, in the example I used the land was the best land. No doubt pasture land would go for far less out west; perhaps not for $12 an acre but certainly for $20 an acre.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: In New Brunswick they are turning the farms into small woodlots and are going out of agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Argue: This, too, points up the need for action by the Government to create a land market.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Just on the point Senator Rattenbury has raised, may I ask Senator Argue if he has any comment to make on the new program announced by the Government to assist small farms?

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is what I thought I was doing; but perhaps I am not doing it well. The $150 million program I was referring to is what I have said was announced. I have not been able to study the details of that, but certainly it is a step in the right direction. It is definitely leadership by the federal Government, which I must say has been taking the leadership in this field.

I have in my hand here a long and detailed submission made to the Government by the provinces. I am not sure how I managed to get this document, but I have it and it consists of proposals for a land-backed program. I also have on my desk the federal Government's proposal, which was made six months prior to the provinces' proposal. A comparison of the two shows that the provinces merely copied all the federal program, put in a few amendments of their own and then submitted it to the federal Government and said, "Look, we have a brand new package." The press has said, "Aren't those provinces smart? They all got together and gave the federal Government a policy."

The federal Government can take some satisfaction from that, because in the main it was a support of the original federal proposal with, as you would expect, some modifications of the original. But this, if it is handled cautiously and handled with the welfare of the individual farmer at heart and with his advice in mind, will certainly result in some farmers being able to retire who wish to retire. It may also help some younger farmers, who need to expand their units, to get additional land at a reasonable purchase price or under a long-term rental agreement with an option to purchase. That is being proposed in certain provinces right now.

I have a further suggestion I should like to make with respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I would suggest that the interest rate on money borrowed for the purchase of land should be reduced from its present position of about 7½ per cent to 5 per cent on loans up to $10,000—or $15,000 at the most. Such a reduction would be of much assistance to many young farmers. The suggestion is not radical nor is it far-reaching. Indeed, I think it is conservative, and, if it were put into effect, the young farmer or the small farmer could get a small sum of money—and $10,000 or $15,000 is a small sum in relation to the cost of setting up an economic farm unit—so that he could purchase at least a small parcel of land to improve his economic position. It would help him and it would restore a market in the buying and selling of land, and that is important to the life of the industry. Thus, I think the suggestion would be much welcome. Moreover, I think the subsidy feature would be a very minimal amount.

Honourable senators, I have spoken longer than I intended. I should therefore like to move the adjournment of this debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 13, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 13, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1971

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-273, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Loan and Trust Companies for the year ended December 31, 1970, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the municipality of Spruce Grove, Alberta, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970. (English text).

Report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage (Chairman, The Honourable Mr. Justice Yves Bernier), Part V—Study of Canadian pilotage, Great Lakes System—dated August 5, 1971.

Report on the operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act and on "Special Area" incentives for the month of November 1971, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, December 8, 1971, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter R-5, R.S.C., 1970.

TAX REFORM

FINAL REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM LEGISLATION—TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the final report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the summary of the 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, and I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of report see Appendix to today's Hansard].

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 78—and I bow in the direction of Senator Grosart—I ask that this report be considered now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I should like to take a short time to explain to you the scope and extent of this final report, and also to review in a very summary way what the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been following the reference to it of the 1971 Tax Reform Legislation.

First, in connection with the final report itself, as you will find in all final reports, what has been done is reviewed in summary form. For example, in this report you will find a list of all the business concerns which made submissions to the committee, and which appeared to make representations to the committee. You will also find a list of those which made submissions but did not appear.

You will find a reference to certain sessions which I call educational sessions. These took place at the beginning of our consideration and involved really an education of the committee by several persons who are well informed as to the scope and effects of, and the meaning to be attached to, Bill C-259. In the report you will find that we have set out the headings as used in the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, and the headings in the bill itself to which the explanations given by these people were addressed. For those who want to read what was said and thus get a first-hand knowledge in summary of the provisions of the bill, we have incorporated what might rightly be called an index by headings with the page numbers of the various items so that they have an easy book of reference.

I should point out too that in dealing with each of these items the two men who conducted this program of education prefaced what they had to say under each heading with a summary in brief form, in most cases not exceeding half a page or one column in length. In this very summary way they set out the headings together with the scope and effect of the bill under them. If any honourable senator wishes to read what the bill says or what it provides in relation, for instance, to changes in personal tax, he will find that developed in our report at page 35—and our method of marking is to put the page number, a dash and then the actual page. In this case you will find the subject of changes in personal tax in the report at page 35-5 to page 35-16. So it is quite an easy matter to acquire some understanding of it.

You may well say, "Why should I read that? It is too complex." I suggest you should read it because you will find it expressed in ordinary day-to-day language. You will be surprised at the simplicity of the language that is used. During our committee hearings these men who were speaking to us made use of the blackboard to demonstrate with numerous examples, and this was very helpful to the committee because by that means the committee was able to acquire reasonably quickly an understanding of the scope and effect of the bill.

If I might make an observation at this stage I would say that I agree entirely with the statement attributed to Lance Smith, an outstanding chartered accountant and head of a large firm in Toronto, who, when he was speaking to the Institute of Chartered Accountants some time in September, told them that their job was to instruct and advise their clients. He said that the only way in which they could do a proper job was by, first of all, understanding the provisions of this bill themselves, and perhaps they should inform themselves concerning the bill rather than go around making speeches on how complex the bill is. It was wholesome advice because very shortly after that several books were written, and I mention particularly one by Clarkson Gordon & Company, and another by Thorne, Gunn, Helliwell & Christenson, in which in understandable language there is a development of this process.

We invited our witnesses to comment on the question of complexity, and the comments which they made are interesting. I refer to the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, No. 35, dated September 30, 1971, at page 56, where one of the witnesses, Mr. Scace, is reported as saying:

> The difficulty is that they have tried to provide incentives in various ways for small businesses and private companies. Those incentives are in the form of a small business reduction, basically, and the integration feature on investment income. There is no possible way that they could provide these things without it being as complicated as they are. It is a very complicated subject.

On page 57, Mr. Smith adds:

> Perhaps I could just add a word. The complexities come in large measure from the incentives that many taxpayers argued should be preserved, the small business reduction being the most important of them, I suppose. The complexities come from the limits that have been put on it. As you know, the present split rate was a very inefficient incentive, because it was a subsidy to those who did not lack capital necessarily, those whose businesses were not necessarily expanding, as well as those who were, so the limits that have been put on it are designed to make it an incentive for those people who do lack capital in fact, and who are starting out from scratch, the theory being that once they have derived a benefit, a tax reduction that is worth $100,000 to them, that should be it. The government subsidized them to the extent of $100,000, they have got it, so long as they really need it to carry out their active business they can have it, but once they start putting it into portfolio investments, why should they have it? The complexities come from circumscribing the incentives in that way to make it efficient as an incentive.

It is true that the provisions in relation to small businesses and private investment income are very involved. But they become involved out of necessity in an attempt to limit the application of these incentives to those who are entitled to them, and to shut the door to any misuse or extension of that application. In drafting legislation, it is a matter of opinion whether you should attempt to be that exacting, or whether you should deal with the matter generally and deal with situations involving abuse as they develop by amending legislation. There are two schools of thought with regard to that, but the draftsmen here felt that since they were giving an incentive in the way of a tax reduction to small business they should circumscribe it so that only those entitled would get at it.

There you have substantially the complexities contained in the bill. I should point out, also, that contained in it are many "goodies", as I describe them. We have developed those in the final report, without any fanfare or extra words. We have simply enumerated the so-called "goodies". Certainly, the increases in personal exemptions, for a single person from $1,000 to $1,500 and for a married person from $2,000 to $2,850, fall in this category.

On page 3 of the report is to be found an enumeration of the "goodies". Some have described these as a carrot. However, those who receive the benefit, I am sure, will enjoy it and will not care whether it is referred to as a carrot, rose, thorn, or anything else.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is better to have a carrot than nothing at all.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what you meant.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: A rose is a rose, no matter by what name you call it; a carrot is an article of food which many people enjoy eating, and it is good in your diet.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It improves your eyesight, they say.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, it is good for your eyesight, and perhaps we should distribute a few carrots around here.

All I point out is that we should not assume that because we have presented a report containing a number of recommendations under various headings for changes in this bill, changes which we feel are necessary, the bill is devoid of many good things. There are many good things contained in the bill, and this is the way in which we have to look at it.

When we consider the position of the Senate and the recommendations the committee has made, it should be borne in mind that the committee had a complete background of study, research, and analysis. A very efficient and capable staff, dedicated to helping the committee as much as they possibly could, kept us informed. They were serving no other masters at that time.

The recommendations are included in several reports presented to the Senate, copies of which went to the Department of Finance. Last Friday the minister made a statement in the House of Commons in relation to a number of these recommended amendments. He also appeared before the committee this afternoon, and made a statement in relation to them. I would say that this statement today enlarged considerably on what he had said in the House of Commons on Friday. The chairman had prepared, with the approval of the committee, a list of top priority recommendations.

If honourable senators read the two reports they will see that a number of recommendations are listed, some of which, is the committee's opinion, rank higher in priority than others. It is the committee's view that all the recommendations should be implemented, but that priority should be given to those concerning provisions which adversely affect a large number of people. At the top of the list there were nine items. There were also three requests for further and fuller consideration of items.

I do not propose to review these items in detail now because I developed the substance of the recommendations when presenting the two preliminary reports.

For instance, representations were made on those aspects of the bill which would have the effect of discouraging the making of gifts, bequests and devises in kind—that is, other than by cash—to registered charitable organizations. If a person left something by will to a registered charitable organization, the gift would be valued at that time. If on a subsequent date the charitable organization disposed of that gift and there was a gain on the disposition, the gain would be taxable to the one who made the gift.

Honourable senators can see how impossible that situation would be. A man who makes a disposition of his estate by means of a will measures and determines its liquidity, and in the spirit of good will and charity he may make certain bequests in kind, by way of property or securities. He is then faced with a provision in the law under which at some future date his estate may be charged with a substantial capital gains tax if the charitable organization disposes of that property at a gain over the fair market value at the time the gift was made. The committee felt that it was basically unfair, and that it would tend to discourage that kind of giving.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If the estate was wound up it would be that much more complicated.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not know how one would go about winding up an estate in those circumstances. I suppose the answer would be that if there were a tax that became payable subsequently and the distributed assets were in other hands, perhaps the taxing authority could follow through the estate to the beneficiary who had the assets which are now needed to liquidate a liability. In any event, this was considered to be an undesirable, unfortunate, unhappy and, I would say, illogical situation.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance, when he was before the committee today, speak in terms reasonably close to my own thinking. He said that he wished to see this kind of giving continued and encouraged, and was trying to work out a method under the law by which it could be done and where there would not be abuses. I commend the government for that. Obviously there will always be those who attempt to stretch the law to suit their own purposes. If there is to be tax exemption, it should be limited to the deserving. With regard to this item, the principle has been approved. The matter will be taken care of, but the method of implementing it has not yet been settled.

With regard to employee and deferred profit-sharing plans, three recommendations were made and the minister indicated that two of them would be implemented. They have been approved. The third, it will be recalled, concerned capital gains. We stated that in a trust fund which is related to a profit-sharing plan or a deferred profit-sharing plan there may be capital gains on the buying and selling of securities in the year, and that there was no reason why those capital gains should be taxed as income in the fund. It is the same type of a capital gain which any other person might make, and which would only attract half the tax rather than the full marginal rate of income tax. The minister stated that they were looking favourably to doing it in that way. Frankly, I do not see how they can do anything else because it is so deserving.

On passive income—this is the international income situation, and it is a very important area for Canada and the export trade of Canada. I read in the newspaper this morning about a certain meeting which took place at Thunder Bay not so long ago, where the thought was put forward that Canada should forget about export trade; we should not waste time, money or tax concessions on export trade; we should not export our raw minerals but process them. What occurred to me right away is that we do not have enough places in Canada to consume all of the minerals we produce and could process. What do we do with them if we do not encourage export trade? Where do they go? We cannot eat them. There is a great deal of silly economics being preached.

At the committee meeting this afternoon the minister emphasized that export trade was very important to Canada, and he said that he recognized the importance of international trade and international source income. Passive income, as I explained the other day—and I will not take up any time on it now—simply means income in the way of royalties and other sources of income where the transaction ordinarily would take place in Canada but is diverted in order that the income might be received in some tax haven outside of Canada, and then the benefit of it comes back without carrying the load of any taxation. This is what they are trying to reach.

It is true that in the report on the White Paper we dealt with this situation, and our feeling was that there are enough provisions in the law as it exists to deal with that situation without adding any more. The Government, notwithstanding that, feels that something additional is needed to deal with this tax avoidance which has occurred and still continues to occur in this area.

The definition of passive income is unfortunate in that it fails to recognize the implication of "income from an active business." The legislation seems to proceed on the basis that if you own properties outside of Canada from which you derive rental income, that income would be from an active business. As I said in committee this afternoon, we have a good deal of jurisprudence in Canada in which a distinction is made between income from business and income from property. These decisions hold that rental income from property is not income from business. Therefore, the provisions in the bill do not go as far as they should, when they limit the income that is entitled to flow without being penalized to income from an active business. The concept is not broad enough, and the minister agreed that this is a matter which they must review. They recognize the problems in that regard.

With regard to the de minimis rule we have said that instead of every person operating a business outside of Canada, in which a Canadian company has an interest, being concerned with establishing dollars and perhaps searching the records to see whether there is tax exposure, there should be a minimum amount that he does not have to worry about or for which he would not have to do any accounting. They recognize that principle in the bill, but they put that minimum amount at $500 which is an absurdly low figure.

This was the position the Senate took in its report, and the minister in his statement in the other place and in his statement today said that they are examining into this and the recommendations we have made. That does not mean they will make a change, but at least they are looking at it. My own feeling is that if you take any fair and reasonable look at it you will realize how sensible that approach is.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Did we say what the minimum rate would be in our report? I forget whether we set a minimum.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We suggested a minimum amount of, I think, $5,000. Whatever the amount, that is not giving away public money or tax revenues. If there ever was a case that was entitled to have sufficient reserves, this is one case, for non-resident investment in Canada in debt securities, and they have enjoyed an exemption from withholding tax, because they are a tax-exempt organization in the United States. On that basis, the law was amended in 1963 to say that in those circumstances you were entitled to a certificate from the minister and therefore entitled to your exemption from withholding tax.

This is in line with the position you find being promoted today about more nationalism for Canada, saying that Canadians should buy the equity, and if it is decided to let non-residents in they should be forced towards debt securities, and Canadians should enjoy the equity position in development. This was a case where the non-resident investment in Canada was entirely in debt securities. I mentioned in committee the case of Malton Airport. Yet that type of investment is not in any sense a marketable security, because these people, in their position, are interested in security and not income; they are not interested in marketability; they do not look for their profit out of marketability. They finance pension plans for universities, for professors, and underwrite them. There is a big field for that in Canada and the United States—about $120 million in Canada and between $2 bilion and $3 billion in the United States. The whole plan was originally set up by Mr. Carnegie. If there is to be withholding tax, there are other areas where they can go and enjoy exemption. So far as the investment they have, there is a time limit under which they must conform or be subject to tax, and they just could not unload their investment.

The minister did say they were dealing with this situation. They have given this exemption for a period of several years. They are not questioning the merits of this particular transaction. All they are saying is that they want to look around and see that there are not other organizations or other areas where they would give this exemption, others who are not deserving who may ride in on the coat tails of those that are getting exemption here.

We spoke about deemed realization on ceasing to be a resident of Canada. The minister developed that today, indicating there was an area there which related to the transfer of employees, where the employees would leave the United States for Canada, work in Canada for a number of years, then go back to the United States, where the onus or the rigour of this deemed realization on certain securities which a certain person might have, would be lightened. The minister said he was looking into this. This is one of the points we made in our report.

We developed a point on private general insurance companies, and the minister's comment today was that they have to study it and see how far its ramifications go.

There are many other areas in our reports where the minister, if he did not say that they would accept amendments in the form in which we presented them, said they were studying our amendments. He favoured the substance or the principle involved but he said that they had to see what was the best way of doing it.

The one thing I considered that he said no to was the concept of basic herd. He felt that if a farmer sold cattle and made a gain on the sale, that is business income and is subject to tax just the same as in the case of a grocer who sells a product at a profit. He did indicate the extent to which they had gone in dealing with this problem of farming.

We recommended that when a farm passed on from father to son and remained in the family for generations for farming purposes, that the rollover—notwithstanding the increase in fair market value—should not attract any capital gains tax. That was our recommendation.

The amendment proposed by the Government in the House of Commons took a different course. It was that the gain which resulted from a transfer of property where there had been an increase between the fair market value at the time of the transfer and the cost, that that gain could be amortized over a period of six years; in other words, on the basis of the cost of money, etcetera, it would mean paying six instalments on the capital gains tax.

I indicated to the minister today that many farmers felt it could be a longer period, as long as twenty years. Even while I said it I thought that twenty years is a very long time to amortize, and the minister gave the answer that to amortize over that period of time might make it an unprofitable venture for the farmer as against paying off the tax much earlier. I replied that there may well be an area between six and twenty which may do substantial justice in this particular situation.

Honourable senators, dealing with the recommendation we made in our first report on Caisses Populaires or credit unions, we commented that to the extent that these organizations set up reserves, they are set up out of their profits. These organizations are required by statute to set up reserves on a certain basis, and these reserves are there to protect the depositor. The credit union can never get at these reserves at any time. There is provision in statute law that if there is a liquidation or winding up, the reserves must be distributed to certain designated charities. So the moment they go into reserve they are gone forever from the enjoyment of the company's operation.

What the credit unions said is that in those circumstances the profits that go to make up those reserves should not be reckoned as part of the profits that make up the $400,000 limit that you can accumulate in profits and still retain your position as a small business—and for a small business with a 25 per cent tax rate, and an income limitation of $50,000 a year, that is a preferred position. If those reserves had to be used to measure the accumulation up to $400,000, very quickly the benefit of the small business position would be lost.

The Government introduced certain amendments in the Commons, and these were approved. They accepted our recommendation completely, so it has been disposed of.

In connection with the construction industry, we said that they should be able to make their returns on a basis of completed contract instead of from year to year. That has been the administrative practice in the department for years. The minister assured me in a recent conservation that this position has been dealt with. In checking with the industry, they said that the administrative practice would continue.

We asked the minister about the joint venture in construction works, where the job is too big for one construction company and two, three or more get together and each provides its own equipment, personnel, staff, and financing, under an agreement whereby they share the profits, or, as someone suggested this afternoon, the losses. The construction people suggested that there be an exclusion of this kind of joint venture as a partnership. The minister felt that it would be dangerous to grant such exclusions but he said that it is being looked into. I do not think we could expect more than that, because there is an element of partnership when you agree to share profits.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In law. There is an element of partnership, probably arising out of law.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, if you have an agreement under which you share profits, I should think that, as a matter of law, it would be held to be a partnership agreement. The minister did indicate that rollovers—where a transaction or a transfer of depreciable property, for instance, might ordinarily attract tax—having regard to the personalities involved and the similarity and substance as between the transferor and the transferee, should go without attracting tax. In mergers and consolidations that is very important, and if you did not have that provision it could very well interfere with the proper conduct and operation of the business. The minister indicated in the statement he made in the Commons, and to us today, that they are reviewing this matter carefully because they realize the serious consequences of it.

I could go on with other enumerations, but I think I have amply indicated the attitude of the Department of Finance and the minister in relation to the proposals made. I could mention consolidated returns, which he told the house is being studied. He said that they have to see what effect the granting of that right would have on the tax revenue. Honourable senators will remember the famous illustration I gave the other day of the man who got legal advice and set up 140 hot dog stands and incorporated a separate company for each one of them. Well, he lost money on some and he made money on others, but he could not set off the losses on the profits he made. In other words, on the state of the law he had bad legal advice. If there had been a provision in the law for consolidated returns, he could have put all of them together and offset the losses against the profits so that his taxes overall might have been substantially less. They are looking into this matter and I think it is inevitable that this must come.

I believe that is a sufficient enumeration. We had talked about non-operators and the earned depletion, and the minister did deal with that for a moment today. He said that he realized the position of non-operators who had made certain deals prior to the cut-off date under this bill. They had made certain deals on the basis that there was an automatic depletion allowance and they could trim the terms of their royalty payments to fit in with the automatic depletion allowance they would get. But now the rules are being changed and what the non-operator is saying is that in relation to those transactions which were entered into prior to the cut-off date, or those where the liability was incurred prior to the cut-off date, they should have the benefit of working that out under the law as it existed at the time they made the deal.

You may ask why there should be this enumeration. I make this enumeration because I feel that from the consideration that has been given by the minister and the department there has been a genuine interest in and an acknowledgment of the importance of the work that we have done. I had a number of interviews with the minister, with the knowledge and approval of the committee, and I reported to the committee before and again after my interviews. From those interviews I could see that there was a keen appreciation of the research and analysis that we had done. Indeed, there was an acknowledgment that the work which the Senate did in research and analysis was something that you could not expect to get, or that you would not get, in any other areas of Parliament.

I did not probe to get the answers to that except that I should think you can fairly well assume that the members and staff of the committee were dedicated to the job they were doing and they wanted to do the best job they could possibly do. Moreover, they did have some basic knowledge and foundation with which they could start their endeavours, and they contributed that to dealing with the problem and reaching conclusions. We were happy to do this as a service. I am speaking for myself now, but I am sure that I am also speaking for every member of the committee when I say that the committee was dedicated to this work and had no other interest except that of doing in the public interest the best job that would be possible with all the information available, its assembly of it and its consideration of it and its acceptance of the recommendations made by its staff.

I just want the public, generally, to know what has been done. I am not sure how much they appreciate it, but a great deal of work has been done by the Senate. In committee we have done some heavy, solid work when some of us might have enjoyed a little more leisure. I speak not only for myself in making these remarks; I speak also for Senator Flynn, for example, who, when he might have chosen to occupy all or some of his time in other areas of endeavour, felt that he had to appear in committee to contribute his views—views which were most valuable to the committee. When the call came for a committee meeting all members of the committee were there. This indicates a dedication to duty that the public should know about. However, I am not sure how much they know about the work of the Senate and I am not even sure how much they want to know about it. Nor am I sure to what extent or how fully they are told about it, because it may not be headline news.

Interestingly enough, though, I discovered that something I said the other day was quoted. A few days ago I received a telephone call from a reporter in Ottawa informing me that the Minister of Finance had made a statement in the house on Friday afternoon. The reporter went on to ask me if I had any comment to make on the minister's statement. I said that usually before I make a comment I like to know what the statement is. Well, that seemed to be all right so the reporter proceeded to tell me what the statement was, although he, the reporter, said, "I am not up on these things, so I don't understand these words that the minister used in referring to deferred profit-sharing plans or employees profit-sharing plans or gifts and devises." I said that they meant something to me and he replied then, "What comments do you have to make on that?" I said, "Well, it is really very interesting that the minister indicated his views in support of these particular subject matters, because these are subject matters in which we were very greatly concerned in the Senate and they were part of our recommendations. So I am awfully interested to know that the minister agrees that they are matters that should be dealt with."

Then he said to me that he thought that the minister was showing a very conciliatory tone in dealing with the Senate. I said, "Well, that is interesting, too." I kept thinking of the rousing debate we had here last Tuesday during which there was some heat or warmth on occasion as to any attempt by the Commons to dictate how we should proceed to deal with the business that comes to the Senate. The reporter said, "Have you any comment on that?" And I said, "Yes, I have a comment. If the minister shows in this way how conciliatory he is, I am sure he will find that we can be as conciliatory in matching his conciliatory efforts."

[Mr. Hayden.]

I notice that they quoted that. I do not think I committed the Senate to anything except that we will be conciliatory. I think we showed this afternoon in committee that in developing the various points on which we wanted information there was a real conciliatory tone in the conduct of the meeting and in the questions asked. After all, you can get information without yelling your head off and you can get information without being enraged or worked up. In fact, sometimes the very subtle questions are those that elicit the most informative answers; the person giving the answer afterwards might think to himself, I should have paid much more attention to that question, but it looked harmless.

Honourable senators, we now have to wait until the bill comes over to us. Your Senate committee has finished its work. Unless and until this bill might in the process of time be referred to the committee, the committee as such has no more work to do on these particular things.

Perhaps I overlooked this earlier, but I should tell you that there is attached to this report a list of technical changes. I do not intend to go into that list. It is fairly substantial. It is also in quite an intelligible form; to read it is to understand it, and if you do read it you will see what the purpose is and what we are suggesting is needed by way of amendment. This material will go to the Minister of Finance for his consideration.

I would say that when this material was first collected by us it was substantially larger and included many more sections than the sections which have finally devolved, because in the amendments that were presented in the other place many of these provisions were caught and corrected. These represent ones which in the opinion of our experts, who have studied this thoroughly, had not been picked up. But, if your aim ultimately is to get a good bill in terms of language so that the interpretations are made as clear as possible and will not lead to confusion, there are technical changes that, at some time in some revision of the bill, should be made.

I would not suggest that the nature of these changes is such that you could at any one time introduce a bill for the purpose of carrying them out. What is usually done is this; when a bill is introduced and there is found to be a need for changes of this nature, the opportunity is taken on the presentation of an amending bill on some substantial matter to put forward some of these changes. I presume the attitude is that you can live without the changes, but you can live better with them so far as interpretation is concerned, and in so far as they relate to the problems that people may have.

I should tell you one other thing, honourable senators, that may seem strange, and that is that the committee has been getting some fan mail. It is not at all like the fan mail received by movie performers. It comes from people who appeared before the committee, and indicates how satisfied they are with the consideration and understanding given to their problems. In some instances they refer to our reports and the recommendations which we have made.

I mentioned to you earlier the pulp and paper industry on which we spent some considerable time because we felt it was a substantial industry which employs a considerable number of people, and whose well-being, since it is a large exporting industry, is essential to the national health in an economic sense. The industry was having considerable financial problems, some of them due to tax disadvantages and some undoubtedly due to overcapacity. However, we spent a considerable amount of time on it, and worked out some recommendations. Since that time the industry has had sessions with the Government and a number of ministers. As a result I have received a very interesting note. While I do not wish to burden you with our fan mail, I thought you might find this letter interesting. It is addressed to me, and it reads as follows:

Dear Senator Hayden:

Our industry is most impressed with the recommendations your Committee made on our behalf in your deliberations on the Tax Reform Bill. Thank you for listening to us and for your concern.

I am sure you will be interested to know that a small group of us met with nine Cabinet Ministers on Monday morning of this week to review the problems of our industry. Because of your report and continuing pressure from this important industry in Canada, for the first time Mr. Benson did not turn us off out of hand and he told us his Department would give our submission most serious thought.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Who signed the letter?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Mr. Bell, President of the Abitibi Paper Company Ltd. He appeared before our committee. There were also letters from the co-operative organizations, Hollinger Mines, and others. This is just an acknowledgment of what we had done. Now we did not do the things we did, nor did we treat the people in the way we did, simply because we were inviting them to write and tell us what wonderful people we were. We did it because it was part of our job, and because we thought they were entitled, as indeed they are entitled, to come and tell us their problems. But it is gratifying to find that there are people who appreciate the effort put into things, and who are prepared to go out of their way to say so.

Honourable senators, having gone through all that and having just touched on the substance of the bill, there is one other thing I want to refer to on a lighter note. I read everywhere in the papers about this terrific bill, C-259, consisting of 708 pages. It is pictured as being really a fantastic bill. But it is a combination of the French and English versions and, therefore, to get an idea of the size of the bill you have to divide the number of pages by two. It is really a bill of some 350 pages.

I recalled that I have seen larger bills than that in front of me during the time I have been in the Senate, and so I did some delving and I found one which in English only contained 572 pages. We heard no complaints about that. I am referring to the Canada Shipping Act. I can remember sitting through the hearing of evidence on that bill back in 1951 and 1952.

I mention this, honourable senators, because I do not think it is fair, logical, or sensible to criticize a bill simply because it is composed of three pages instead of one, or 20 pages instead of 10. What one has to look at is the scope of the bill. I think this bill is much larger in volume than it might otherwise have been, but if the intention is to circumscribe some of the goodies so that their benefit is confined to those people who are strictly entitled to them—and this applies particularly to the small business and private investment income provisions—then perhaps the number of sections is justified.

Honourable senators, you have been very patient, and I thank you very much.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Hayden has spoken on what he termed the third and final report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the 1971 tax reform legislation. He has also said that the committee had completed its work. There are two reasons for that. The first is that the terms of reference to the committee were limited. The committee was not to deal with the principle or principles of Bill C-259, but was only to consider whether the bill would achieve what it was intended to achieve in many respects.

The second reason, which has now become quite obvious for this being the final report and for the committee having completed its work, is that the bill will reach us, whether we like it or not, on Friday, December 17, at four o'clock in the afternoon at the latest, and there is no hope of getting it before them. Whether the committee could do any more work on this bill between now and then is doubtful; I do not think it could do anything useful. But I suggest to Senator Hayden and to other members of the committee that if we had had time, even within the limited terms of reference, we could have continued to study this bill and the many problems involved in it, including, I suggest, the technical amendments that are part of the final report and which will be printed for the benefit of honourable senators in the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of this date.

Senator Hayden said that the Minister of Finance was at the committee meeting this afternoon and expressed sympathy and understanding concerning the recommendations made by the committee in its two reports to date. The minister had not seen the third report before he appeared this afternoon, only the first two. He informed us that some time next year we would have an amending bill and that very sympathetic consideration would be given to the Committee's recommendations. I agree generally with what the chairman of the committee said regarding the commitment made by the Minister of Finance, but I would like an opportunity to read the minister's evidence in today's committee proceedings. I commend the chairman for having arranged to have these proceedings printed as quickly as possible for the benefit of all honourable senators.

I am in full agreement with the chairman that the committee has done extensive work on this legislation. It has been working on it for nearly three years. There is no doubt that the fiscal reform which was begun by the Carter Commission is the subject of much debate and has been for nearly eight years. Then the White Paper appeared two or three years ago. We received this bill last summer and since that time the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the committee of the other place, and many other people have been concerned with this legislation. We cannot praise too highly the work of our committee, and especially the chairman.

However, I do not agree with the chairman when he says that this bill, although it contains some 700 pages, is not as difficult to understand as it might appear. He said he has seen larger bills, such as the Canada Shipping Act, but I do not think you can compare the two. The Canada Shipping Act, although highly technical, deals mainly with navigation, but the Income Tax Act concerns all Canadians. This country has been dealing with fiscal reform since 1917, an accumulated experience of 54 years, and it is not a simple matter to scrap all that and replace it with what is almost entirely new legislation. We are dealing with a very complex and important matter. I doubt whether Parliament has had a more important issue before it in the last 50 years than the one it is facing now. I shall say more on this subject when the bill reaches the Senate.

Having praised the work of the committee, I should like to draw a distinction between the reports which the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has made and the opinions expressed in the report on the White Paper of 1969. We are not considering exclusively the recommendations made by this committee in its three reports, but also the entire tax reform legislation with all its difficulties and complexities which have been outlined over the past eight years. The committee did not express an opinion on the principle of the bill. It dealt only with technical problems.

Therefore, the question which the Senate will face when the bill comes to it on Friday next at four o'clock in the afternoon or, if you prefer, the sixteenth hour—and this is only two hours before the projected time for adjournment of the House of Commons—is whether it will deal with the bill in its entirety, not restricting itself to the three reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in an endeavour to obtain royal assent by six o'clock on Friday, or take two, three, four or five days and just appear to be dealing with the matter. If we are going to have a thorough debate on this bill, I suggest in all sincerity that we cannot complete it in less than three weeks, and we should not be expected to deal with it before the Christmas recess at a time when no one is in the mood for such a debate, or to do the highly technical and difficult work involved. This is really the problem facing the Senate. I suggest that the choice on Friday will be one of giving the bill quick passage in two hours or taking our time and devoting three weeks or a month to it. To attempt to appear to be doing a job in three, four, or five days, or even sitting until December 31, as suggested by the Leader of the Government, is simply ridiculous and obtuse, and I will not go along with it.

If the Government wishes a good job done, it will have to agree to one dealing with the bill in due course in normal circumstances. If it wishes to impose closure here, as it has done in the other place, it has only to say so. The bill will then receive royal assent on Friday at 1800 hours, and it will then be the responsibility of this Government and this huge Liberal majority.

That is all I have to say for the time being.

[Mr. Flynn.]

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1971

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-273, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972.

He said: Honourable senators, before I proceed with my remarks regarding Bill C-273, I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to two documents which I caused to be distributed at the commencement of this sitting. One of these documents is a statement entitled "Supply, 1971-72" which summarizes two previous Appropriation Acts passed at this session, Appropriation Act No. 1 and Appropriation Act No. 3, and a summary of the present bill. The second document is entitled "Estimates, 1971-72" which summarizes budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures, including loans, investments and advances, but excluding Old Age Security payments. The total expenditures amount to $16,212,940,921.

As I remarked the other day when I had occasion to speak with reference to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which studied Bill C-273, it is quite difficult for me tonight to speak on this bill without duplicating the remarks I made on that occasion. I would like to start, however, by reminding honourable senators that royal assent has already been given to two supply bills covering Estimates for the current year. The first provided interim supply for the months of April, May and June. The second, assented to on June 23, 1971, provided full supply for the balance of the main Estimates for 1971-72.

The bill introduced today provides for full supply of Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1971-72. These Estimates consist of $361,925,284 in budgetary items, and $311,985,001 in non-budgetary (loans, investments and advances) items.

The Estimates tabled to date consist of budgetary expenditures of $14,912,260,045, and loans, investments and advances of $1,300,680,876, for a total of $16,212,940,921, or an increase of 6 per cent over the original main Estimates for 1970-71.

Supplementary Estimates (A) were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on November 24, 1971, and they were discussed in committee with senior officers from the Treasury Board on December 2.

The form of this bill is the same as that passed in previous years. No additional borrowing authority is requested since the first supply bill for the current fiscal year provided sufficient borrowing authority in the amount of $3 billion.

Honourable senators, the greater part, or about 60 per cent, of the budgetary expenditures in these Estimates is the provision of funds for measures to combat unemployment. First, there is an item of $25 million in the Estimates for the Secretary of State to cover the Opportunities for Youth Program of last summer, and $7 million for other items related to the employment of students last summer.

Secondly, with relation to winter unemployment, these Estimates include the following:

In the Estimates for Manpower and Immigration:

$100 million for the Local Initiatives Program

$ 20 million for on-the-job training

$ 15 million for additions to the regular manpower training program;

In the Estimates for Industry, Trade and Commerce:

$80 million for the statutory provision for grants under the Employment Support Act; and

In the Estimates of many departments:

$80 million for "federal labour-intensive projects".

I should also like to draw to the attention of honourable senators certain items on the non-budgetary side of the Estimates which include $160.5 million to finance loans to the provinces and for agriculture, and $10 million to institute a program of loans for multi-purpose exhibitions, both loan items being directed to the creation of employment. The total of these two, $170.5 million, accounts for 55 per cent of the non-budgetary portion of the Estimates.

The only large non-statutory items in these Estimates, other than those I have already mentioned, are: $21 million to implement the first of two steps to achieve pay parity in the armed forces; $10 million to cover losses in coal mining incurred by the Cape Breton Development Corporation; $22 million for relief for Pakistani refugees; a loan to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in connection with the rehabilitation of Deuterium of Canada Limited for $95 million, and $32 million in loans under the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program.

These Estimates continue a practice instituted in the fiscal year 1968-69, as honourable senators will recall, of seeking to finance supplementary Estimates items through complete or partial offsets in other votes in the same program or other programs of the same ministry where funds can be made available through the exercise of restraint or where changed circumstances permit lower expenditures. The complete offsets are treated as $1 items in order to bring them before Parliament for authorization. There are three such instances in the bill.

In addition, the supplementary Estimates contain a further 15 $1 items. At this point I remind honourable senators that a complete list with details of these 18 $1 items were tabled as an appendix to Hansard and of the Minutes of the Proceedings of this chamber and formed part of the record on December 2 last. Seven of these items may be said to be legislative in character, in that they extend the period or range of application of some legislation, change the financial limitations in existing legislation, or authorize the deletion of certain debts. The balance of the items cover expenditures for grants. These latter items were included in order to meet the requirement that grants be listed in the Estimates whether or not additional appropriations are sought.

Honourable senators, I think I have covered the most important features of this piece of legislation, which I commend to your consideration.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill two questions. First, would he relate the total spending intention of the Government of $16.2 million to the equivalent figure for last year? He will know why I use the phrase "equivalent figure". Secondly, what will be the balance of revenue and anticipated expenditure at the end of the fiscal year? In other words, will we have a deficit, and, if so, how much?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In reply to the first question, if I heard it correctly, the answer can be found in the document entitled "Estimates, 1971-72," which I caused to be distributed at the commencement of this sitting. The honourable senator will find contained in it the ingredients that make up the figure of $16,212,940,921 which, as I mentioned during my current presentation, represents a 6 per cent increase over total expenditure last year.

In reply to the second question, a deficit is envisaged, but at this moment I cannot give the exact figure.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Order of Reference

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, September 14, 1971:

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Hayden moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled this day, and any bills based on the Budget Resolutions in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate, and any other matters relating thereto; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

After debate, and—
The question being put on the motion, it was—Resolved in the affirmative."

Robert Fortier,
Clerk of the Senate.

Monday, December 13, 1971.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, having completed its examination and consideration of the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation and bills based on the Budget Resolutions in accordance with its terms of reference of September 14, 1971, now makes its final Report, as follows:

Two earlier reports called Preliminary Report and Preliminary Report No. 2 were tabled in the Senate on November 4, 1971, and November 30, 1971, respectively.

Attached to this Report is a statement prepared by our advisers setting out the technical changes required in Bill C-259 to clarify or correct the language of many provisions of the said bill.

Also attached is a list of the persons who made submissions to and appeared before your Committee to present their case for changes in the said Bill to avoid hardship in their operations. There is also set out a list of those who made submissions but did not personally appear.

Earlier today your Committee held its final meeting in connection with the reference made to it by the Senate. At this meeting the Minister of Finance appeared in response to an invitation extended by your Committee. Prior thereto the Chairman, with the approval of the Committee had several interviews with the Minister of Finance to discuss the recommendations made by the Committee in its several reports to the Senate and to obtain, if possible, some indication of the attitude of the Minister in relation thereto.

With the approval of the Committee, a list of top priority items among the recommendations in our two Reports was submitted to the Minister, together with amendments which in the view of our expert advisers and our Committee would incorporate the substance of the top priority recommendations contained in your Committee's Reports. This list is also attached hereto. In speaking by way of explanation to the Senate, the Chairman of the Committee will discuss these items indicating how many have already been dealt with and the reaction of the Minister to other of these items expressed in the House of Commons on December 10, 1971, and to your Standing Committee earlier this day.

The Minister of Finance stated in the House of Commons and before our Committee that an amending Bill would be put forward in the next session. In the House of Commons he said:

> There are a number of areas that the Government is actively studying at this time and I want to give the House some indication of our present thinking.... there will undoubtedly be a number of important amendments introduced next year and I think it is only fair that people should be aware of the direction of our planning.

In the Committee the Minister repeated what he said in the House of Commons and dealt in a particular way with the subject matter of the recommendations in your Committee's several Reports. These will be referred to in the course of the explanations given by the Chairman and will appear in the printed report of proceedings this day of the Committee.

Your Committee would direct your attention to the printed reports of its proceedings, particularly numbers 35 and 39. There you will find clear explanations of the principal subjects dealt with in Bill C-259, namely:

(1) Changes in personal Tax	Report P. 35-5 to P. 35-16
(2) Capital gains (with Summary at P. 35-16)	Report P. 35-16 to P. 35-42
(3) Valuation and Tax Free Zone	Report P. 35-39 to 40
(4) Partnerships and Professional Income	Report P. 35-43 to 51
(5) Corporations and Distributions to Shareholders	Report P. 35-51 to 61
(6) Dividend Tax Credit	Report P. 35-52
(7) Small Business	Report P. 35-54
(8) Inter Corporate Dividends	Report P. 35-54
(9) Designated Surplus	Report P. 35-54 to 55
(10) Investment Income of Private Companies	Report P. 35-55
(11) Complexity	Report P. 35-56 and 57
(12) International	Report P. 35-17 to 25
(13) Taxation with Summary	Report P. 39-17
(14) Estates and Death Duties (Summary at P. 39-5) and Trusts	Report P. 39-5 to 16

The above references are to a series of lectures or explanations on the various provisions of Bill C-259 with section references. Your Committee wishes to express its great appreciation to Mr. Arthur R.A. Scace and Mr. Stephen Smith for their assistance. It should be noted that their services were given without remuneration—expressly so stipulated.

In many of its aspects this Bill C-259 is very beneficial to taxpayers in Canada. The elimination from the tax rolls was estimated in 1970 at approximately 750,000 persons* now subject to tax and the increase in personal exemptions of all the taxpayers, the improved deductions for wage and salary earners, the incentives to small business, the deductibility of interest on money borrowed by one company to buy shares in another company, the ability of a corporation to distribute its 1971 undistributed income on hand on payment of a special 15% tax and thereupon to distribute without further tax its 1971 capital surplus on hand, the elimination of gift taxes and estate taxes, the continuance of dividend tax credit although different in form but beneficial—all these are some of the beneficial features of Bill C-259.

In addition to the above sources of information available to Senators, Senate Hansard of November 24 and December 1, 1971, contain statements in narrative form of the meaning and scope and effect of the various provisions in Bill C-259 referred to in the several reports of your Committee.

Further, however, there is the Report of your Committee to the Senate on the White Paper Proposals for Tax Reform, dated September 1970. Therein you will find all the subject matter of the White Paper Proposals dealt with. Many of the headings are carried through to the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation and Bill C-259.

Your Committee wishes to acknowledge in a particular way the contribution of the Honourable Lazarus Phillips to our study of this Tax Reform Legislation and Bill C-259 as Chief Counsel to the Committee. You will recall he was Vice-Chairman of the Committee in its study of the White Paper Proposals. In the drafting of the Report of the Senate thereon, and in the preparation of the several reports of the Committee on its examination and consideration of Bill C-259, his advice and direction were invaluable.

Mr. Alan Irving and Mr. Douglas Ewens were part of our team of legal advisers. We were very fortunate in securing Mr. Irving's services at this time as he had worked with your Committee throughout the study of White Paper Proposals. Mr. Ewen's services were valuable to your Committee in the analysis of the submissions received and as an adviser to the Chairman. Both these men worked on the preparation of our several Reports and in the drafting of amendments. We wish to acknowledge the skill and judgment they brought to bear on the consideration of these matters.

Your Committee retained the services of Mr. Albert Poissant and Mr. Charles B. Mitchell, senior partners in the accounting firm of Thorne, Gunn, Helliwell and Christenson. Their services were invaluable in every phase of the work of your Committee.

As a result of all this work and the information thereby available to Senators, the consideration of this bill should be greatly facilitated. The introduction of an amending bill next year, which the Minister's statement would indicate, will afford the opportunity to the Senate to propose further amendments at that time, the nature and extent of which may be governed by such further and amending provisions as are incorporated in the amending bill.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

APPENDIX "C"

TAXATION OF INDIVIDUALS

1. Section 6(1)(e) and 15(5)—standby charge for automobile

Section 15(6) provides that the formula set out in Section 6(2) for determining the amount that would be a reasonable standby charge for an automobile that was made available to an employee by his employer shall also apply where a company car has been made available to a shareholder. These subsections fail to consider the situation where one car is made available for several shareholders and/or employees and appropriate amendments should be made.

2. Section 62(3)—Moving expenses (C.I.C.A.)

Subsection (3) of Section 62 provides that the cost of cancelling a lease on one's residence is an allowable moving expense for purposes of determining the amount deductible under Section 62(1) in respect of expenses incurred in moving to a new work location. There is no similar provision for bona fide costs incurred in connection with the assignment of such a lease. As all landlords may not be prepared to cancel a taxpayer's lease and the taxpayer may therefore be forced to sublet (incurring costs in connection therewith), the definition of the term "moving expenses' should be extended by amending paragraph (d) of Section 62(3) to read as follows:

> "(d) the cost to him of cancelling or otherwise disposing of the lease, if any, by virtue of which he was the lessee of his old residence".

3. Section 63—Child care expenses (C.B.A.)

Where a taxpayer is employed by his spouse, the taxpayer's remuneration from such employment is to be included in the spouse's income for tax purposes under the provisions of Section 74(3) of Bill C-259 and excluded from the taxpayer's income for tax purposes. Because of this and because one of the limitations on the amount allowable as a deduction under Section 63 in respect of child care expenses is that the deduction cannot exceed two-thirds of the taxpayer's earned income for the year, a married woman who is employed by her husband may be unable to take advantage of the child care expense deduction. Further, no deduction will be allowed to the husband in these circumstances as he will not comply with the conditions contained in paragraph (b) of Section 63(1) because his wife was not incapacitated or confined to prison. Provision should be made to allow the husband a deduction in these circumstances, at least in those cases where it can be established that his wife was a bona fide full-time employee for the period in respect of which the expenses were incurred.

A similar problem arises as a result of the attribution rules in Section 74(4) where a married woman is employed by a partnership of which her husband is a partner.

In addition, where a husband and wife are partners in a business and the Minister of National Revenue exercises his discretionary power under the provisions of Section 74(5) and thereby attributes all of the firm's income to the husband, one of the effects may be to deny any deduction for child care expenses even though the expenses were incurred to enable the taxpayer's wife to devote her time and energies to the partnership business.

APPENDIX "D"

CAPITAL GAINS

1. Section 2(3)(c)—Tax payable by non-resident persons (C.A.B.)

The first specific clause in Bill C-259 which deals with disposition of properties on which a taxable capital gain may be realized by non-residents is Section 2(3)(c). This provision appears to define persons not resident in Canada who can fit within the categories outlined in Division D of the Bill and implies that any person who at any time in the past disposed of "taxable Canadian property" (as defined in Section 115(1)(b)) is subject to the provisions of Division D—even though he may have no taxable income for purposes of Division D and, hence, not be subject to tax in any event. There seems to be no apparent necessity for drawing the net so wide.

2. Section 13(4)—Insurance proceeds and other compensation in respect of the loss or destruction of property (C.I.C.A.)

Section 13(4) of Bill C-259 has the same technical defect as its predecessor in the present Income Tax Act (viz. Section 20(5a)).

The purpose of this provision is to allow taxpayers an additional period of grace in which to expend insurance proceeds or other compensation received in respect of the loss or destruction of depreciable assets without being subject to tax on recaptured capital cost allowance. Ordinarily, where a class of depreciable assets is in credit balance at the end of a taxation year because the taxpayer disposed of assets for an amount in excess of the undepreciated capital cost of property in that class and did not expend a sufficient portion of the proceeds in that same year to bring the class into debit balance at the end of the year by acquiring additional depreciable assets of that class, the amount of the credit balance is included in income as recaptured capital cost allowance. However, where the credit balance arises because of insurance proceeds or other compensation receivable in respect of the loss or destruction of depreciable assets, then, by virtue of Section 13(4) the amount of the credit balance will not be treated as recaptured capital cost allowance to the extent that it is expended by the taxpayer in the immediately following taxation year on the acquisition of depreciable property of the same class as that lost or destroyed.

Where the asset destroyed is a building, the taxpayer will obtain the benefit of this relieving provision to the extent that any credit balance in the relevant class of buildings at the end of the taxation year in which the insurance proceeds or other compensation becomes payable is expended by him in the immediately following taxation year on the acquisition of a building of any class, whether or not it is of the same class as the building that was destroyed. However, because of an anomaly in the Bill (and in the present Act), where a taxpayer chooses to replace a destroyed building by a building of another class and he does so by acquiring such other building in the taxation year in which the proceeds of insurance or other compensation becomes payable (rather than in the immediately following taxation year) he will, upon a technical interpretation, be subject to tax on recapture.

In order to remove this anomaly, it is recommended that paragraph (c) of Section 13(4) be amended to read as follows:

> "(c) the amount shall, to the extent that it has been expended by the taxpayer
> (i) in the taxation year immediately following the initial year on acquiring property of the same class,
> (ii) in the initial year or in the taxation year immediately following the initial year on acquiring, if the property so lost, destroyed, taken or sold was a building, a building of a prescribed class, or
> (iii) ....."

3. Section 44—Deferral of gain on involuntary dispositions (C.C.C.)

Section 44 provides for a deferral of gain on involuntary dispositions of capital property where the gain arises by virtue of the fact that the taxpayer has received (or is entitled to receive)

> (a) proceeds of insurance or other compensation in respect of the loss or destruction of capital property,
> (b) compensation for capital property taken under statutory authority, or
> (c) the proceeds of sale of capital property which was sold to a person by whom notice of intention to take under statutory authority was given, and the taxpayer has expended an amount at least equal to the gain before the end of the immediately following taxation year acquiring a replacement for the former property.

It is recommended that these deferral provisions be extended to apply to a gain realized where capital property is unlawfully taken and the taxpayer becomes entitled to receive compensation therefor. This amendment may be accomplished by changing Section 44 to read as follows:

> "Where in a taxation year a taxpayer has received proceeds of disposition described in subparagraph 54(h)(ii), (iii) or (iv) of any property . . ."

4. Section 53(2)(a)(i)—Adjustments to the cost base of capital property (C.C.C.)

Subparagraph (i) of Section 53(2)(a) provides that any amount received by a taxpayer after 1971 as a dividend (other than a taxable dividend or a capital dividend) on the share of the capital stock of a corporation resident in Canada shall be deducted in computing the adjusted cost base to the taxpayer of such share. Any dividend received from a mutual fund corporation that is deemed under Section 131(1) to be a capital gains dividend should also be excluded, along with taxable dividends and capital dividends, from the amounts that are to be deducted under Section 53(2)(a)(i) in computing the adjusted cost base of shares to the taxpayer. A capital gains dividend is deemed to be a capital gain in the year in which received and is taxed accordingly. Therefore, it should not reduce the adjusted cost base of shares since such an adjustment would result in double taxation.

5. Section 53(2)(m)—Adjustments to cost base of capital property (C.B.A.).

Section 53(2)(m) provides that, in computing the adjusted cost base to a taxpayer of capital property at any time, there shall be deducted

> "such part of the cost to the taxpayer of the property as was deductible (otherwise than by virtue of this subdivision) in computing the taxpayer's income for any taxation year commencing before that time."

It is to be noted that the deduction to be made under this paragraph is based on the deductibility of the amount specified therein regardless of the amount actually deducted in computing income. It is recommended that the paragraph be amended to read as follows:

> "(m) such part of the cost to the taxpayer of the property,
> (i) as was deducted (otherwise than by virtue of this subdivision) in computing the taxpayer's income for any taxation year that ended on or before that time, or
> (ii) where the adjuster cost base is being computed as of a date other than the end of a taxation year, as was deductible (otherwise than by virtue of this subdivision) in computing the taxpayer's income for the first taxation year ending after that date."

6. Section 54(g)—Principal residence (C.B.A.)

It is recommended that the definition of the term "principal residence" be amended specifically to include,

> (a) a condominium unit (which may not fall within the present definition), and
> (b) a dwelling-place located on property which is held under a long term lease rather than owned by the taxpayer

7. Section 74—Income or gains from property transferred to one's spouse

Subsections (1) and (2) of Section 74 provide that a taxpayer must include in his or her income for tax purposes any income and net taxable capital gains (i.e. taxable capital gains less allowable capital losses) which his or her spouse may derive from property transferred to the spouse by the taxpayer (or from property substituted therefor). The purpose of this provision is to prevent a taxpayer from reducing his income for tax purposes by transferring income-producing properties to his spouse.

It has been suggested that Bill C-259 be amended specifically to provide that these attribution rules will not apply in respect of property transferred to a spouse more than one year prior to the date on which the transferor first became a resident of Canada. This suggestion appears to have merit and it is recommended that the following amendment be made:

Section 74(6)

> "Subsections (1) and (2) of this section do not apply in respect of property transferred to a spouse more than one year prior to the date on which the transferor first became resident in Canada or in respect of property substituted for such transferred property."

A similar amendment should be made to the attribution rules contained in Section 75 which relate to property transferred

> (a) to a person under eighteen years of age, and
> (b) to certain inter vivos trusts.

APPENDIX "E"

Corporations and their shareholders

1. Section 83(2)—Capital dividends (C.B.A.)

Section 83(2) provides

> (a) that a private corporation may elect, subject to specified conditions, to treat a dividend payable by it to its shareholders after 1971 as a capital dividend if the amount does not exceed the corporation's capital dividend account immediately before the date on which the dividend becomes payable, > and
> (b) that no part of such a dividend shall form part of the recipient shareholder's income.

Under Section 89(1)(b), a corporation's capital dividend account at any particular time is defined to include only amounts attributed to such account in taxation years ending before that time. Accordingly, if a corporation paid a dividend in kind by distributing part of its capital assets and the fair market value of the property distributed exceeded the adjusted cost base of the assets to the corporation, gain would only accrue on payment of the dividend and the corporation could not elect to treat the dividend in kind as a capital dividend out of the one-half non-taxable portion of that capital gain. It is recommended that provision be made to enable a private corporation to treat the one-half non-taxable portion of any capital gain arising from the payment of a dividend in kind as part of its capital dividend account at the time the dividend became payable.

2. Section 87(1)—Definition of an amalgamation (C.C.C.)

The definition of the word "amalgamation", as defined in Section 87(1) of Bill C-259, is similar to that contained in Section 851 of the present Act in that, in order to qualify for the treatment set out in Section 87 of the Bill (previously Section 85I), it will still be necessary that all of the assets and liabilities of the amalgamating corporations become assets and liabilities of the amalgamated corporation. This requirement often causes corporate taxpayers an undue amount of trouble and expense arranging to settle amounts owing between amalgamating corporations immediately prior to an amalgamation so as to ensure that the amalgamation will in fact be treated as such for income tax purposes.

It is accordingly recommended that paragraphs (a) and (b) of Section 87 be amended to read as follows:

> "(a) all of the property of the predecessor corporations immediately before the merger (other than amounts receivable from, or investments in shares of the capital stock of, any of the other predecessor corporations) becomes property of the new corporation by virtue of the merger,
> (b) all of the liabilites of the predecessor corporations immediately before the merger (other than amounts owing to one predecessor corporation to another predecessor corporation) become liabilities of the new corporation by virtue of the merger, and"

3. Section 87(2)(r) Amalgamated corporation's 1971 capital surplus

4. Section 87(2)(s) on hand or paid-up capital deficiency (C.C.C.)

Paragraph (r) of Section 87(2) provides that, in computing the 1971 capital surplus of an amalgamated corporation, any 1971 capital surplus which the amalgamated corporation may itself have on hand shall be increased by the amount, if any, by which > (a) the aggregate of each predecessor corporation's 1971 capital surplus on hand, if any, immediately before the amalgamation

> (b) the aggregate of each predecessor corporation's paid-up capital deficiency, if any, immediately before the amalgamation.

There is no provision to the effect that, where the amount described in (b) above exceeds the amount described in (a), the excess must be deducted from the amount otherwise determinable in computing the amalgamated corporation's 1971 capital surplus on hand. Unless such a provision is introduced, it may be possible to eliminate a corporation's paid-up capital deficiency by means of an amalgamation without decreasing the 1971 capital surplus of the amalgamated corporation by a like amount. It is therefore recommended that a new paragraph be added to Section 87(2) to the following effect:

> "(r. 1) where the amount described in subparagraph (r)(ii) exceeds the amount described in subparagraph (r)(i), there shall be deducted from the aggregate of the amounts determined under subparagraphs 89(I)(l)(i) to (iv) for the purpose of computing the 1971 capital surplus on hand of the new corporation at any particular time an amount equal to such excess."

A similar problem exists with respect to paragraph (s) of Section 87(2), relating to the computation of an amalgamated corporation's paid-up capital deficiency.

5. Section 87(2)(aa)—Amalgamated corporation's refundable dividend tax on hand for purposes of determining its cumulative deduction account (C.C.C.)

Section 87(2)(aa) provides for the flow-through to an amalgamated corporation of any refundable dividend tax which each predecessor corporation may have on hand immediately prior to the amalgamation. It is not clear, however, whether the amalgamated corporation will be deemed to have inherited such amounts as of the end of a taxation year immediately preceding its first taxation year, or whether such amounts will not be included in computing its own refundable dividend tax on hand until the end of its first taxation year (following the amalgamation). If the latter interpretation is correct and the amalgamated corporation is, therefore, not entitled to deduct the predecessor corporation's refundable dividend tax on hand for purposes of computing its cumulative deduction account immediately prior to the amalgamation (see Section 87(2)(y)), an amalgamated corporation which qualifies as a Canadian-controlled private corporation (as defined in Section 125(6)(a)) could be deprived of a small business deduction for its first taxation year even though it should, in equity, be entitled to such a deduction.

To ensure that there is no anomaly in this regard, it is recommended that Section 87(2)(aa) be amended to read as follows:

> "(aa) in the case of a new corporation that is a private corporation for the purpose of computing the refundable dividend tax on hand (within the meaning assigned by subsection 129(3)) of the new corporation at the end of a taxation year immediately preceding its first taxation year or at the end of any subsequent taxation year, where a predecessor corporation had refundable dividend tax on hand immediately before the amalgamation the amount thereof shall be added to the aggregate determined under subsection 129(3) from which the new corporation's dividend refunds are to be subtracted;"

6. Section 129(3)(a)—Refundable dividend tax on hand (C.C.C.)

Section 129 provides that a corporation "Canadian investment income" and "foreign investment income" are to be computed separately but it does not provide that a loss obtained from one or other of these "sources" is to be deducted from income derived from the other "source" in computing the amount described in paragraph (a) of Section 129(3). As a result, the amount of refundable dividend tax which may be credited to a private corporation's refundable dividend tax account in respect of a particular taxation year could be greater than the amount properly creditable thereto.

It is suggested that this anomaly could be eliminated by making the following amendments:

(a) Paragraph (a) of Section 129(3) would be amended to read as follows:

"(a) 25% of the amount, if any, by which its 'total investment income for the year', as defined in paragraph (4)(c), exceeds the amount deductible under paragraph 111(1)(b) from the corporation's income for the year,"

(b) Subsection (h) of Section 129 would be amended by the addition of the following paragraph:

"(c) 'total investment income' of a corporation for a taxation year means the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of

(i) the aggregate of the amounts described in subparagraphs (a)(i) to (iii) in respect of the corporation for the year, and

(ii) the amount that would be determined under subparagraphs (a)(i) to (iii) in respect of the corporation for the year if the references in subparagraphs (a)(i) to (iii) to 'in Canada' were read as references to 'outside Canada', exceeds the aggregate of

(iii) the aggregate of amounts each of which is a loss of the corporation for the year from a source that is a property or business other than an active business, and

(iv) the aggregate of all amounts deductible under section 113 from the corporation's income for the year."

7. Section 129(3)(b)—Refundable dividend tax on hand (C.C.C.)

Any inactive business income from foreign sources will form part of "foreign investment income" for purposes of the refundable dividend tax provisions but any foreign tax credit relating to such income (being a credit allowed under Section 126(2) will not be taken into account in determining whether the limitation contained in Section 129(3)(b) is applicable. Thus, even though no Canadian income tax is payable on inactive business income from foreign sources after deducting the provincial tax abatement and the foreign tax credit, an amount equal to 25% thereof could be credited to the refundable dividend tax account.

8. Section 189(4)(b)—Ineligible investments (C.C.C.)

Further statutory clarification is required to minimize the number of problems which could be encountered in determining the cost of ineligible investments on hand at any time. For example:

1. Where there is a change in the use made of a capital asset, will the use to which it was originally put govern its classification for the purpose of Section 189(4)(b) for all subsequent years?

2. If a capital asset, such as a building, is used in part for active business purposes and in part for rental purposes, will the entire cost be treated as not falling within the ineligible category?

3. If, for example, a Canadian-controlled private corporation owned a minority interest in another company at December 31, 1971, and it acquired a further 100 shares of that company but disposed of the latter before the end of its 1972 year, that should not be treated as an ineligible investment?

APPENDIX "F"

BUSINESS AND PROPERTY INCOME

1. Section 16—Debt obligations issued at a discount (C.I.C.A.)

Subsections (2) and (3) of Section 16 provide that, where a debt obligation is issued at a discount by a tax-exempt person, a non-resident person not carrying on business in Canada, a government or certain other public bodies, the amount of the discount is, under certain circumstances, to be included in the investor's income for tax purposes. Subsection (2) relates to debt obligations which are issued before June 18, 1971 and subsection (3) deals with debt obligations issued after that date. Neither deals with debt obligations which are issued on June 18, 1971. Subsection (2) should accordingly be amended to apply to debt obligations issued on that date as well as to those issued prior thereto.

2. Section 24—Deduction in respect of eligible capital amounts (goodwill and other "nothings") on ceasing to carry on business (C.C.C.)

The combined effect of subsections (1) and (2) of Section 24 in a situation where an individual ceases to carry on business and the business is thereafter carried on by his spouse or by a corporation controlled by him appears to prevent any deduction under Section 20(1)(b) (relating to the amortization of goodwill and other "nothings") for either the individual, or his spouse or the controlled corporation for the year in which the business is transferred if both the transferor and the transferee have the same fiscal year end or if the fiscal year of the transferor ends at a later date in the year than the transferee's.

In order to remedy this inequity, it is recommended that subsection (2) of Section 24 be amended to read as follows:

Section 24

"(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), where an individual has ceased to carry on a business and thereafter his spouse, or a corporation controlled directly or indirectly in any manner whatever by him, has carried on the business,

(a) in computing the individual's income for his fiscal period in which he so ceased to carry on the business, the following rules shall apply;

(i) the provisions of subsection (1) shall be read without reference to paragraphs (a) and (b) thereof and as if the reference in paragraph (c) thereof to 'the time he so ceased to carry on the business' were read as a reference to 'the end of the fiscal period in which he so ceased to carry on the business'; and

(ii) the amount allowed as a deduction under paragraph 20(1)(b) in respect of the business shall not exceed that proportion of the maximum amount otherwise allowable that

(A) the number of days in the period from the commencement of the fiscal period to date on which he ceased to carry on the business,

(b) in computing the cumulative eligible capital in respect of the business of the spouse or the corporation, as the case may be, at any time after the end of the fiscal period in which the individual so ceased to carry on the business, there shall be included the amount of the individual's cumulative eligible capital in respect thereof at the end of that fiscal period; and

(c) in computing the income of the spouse or the corporation, as the case may be, for the fiscal period in which the spouse or corporation commenced to carry on the business, the amount allowed as a deduction under paragraph 20 (1) (b) in respect of the amount included in the spouse's or corporation's cumulative eligible capital amount under paragraph (b) shall not exceed that proportion of the maximum amount otherwise allowable in respect thereof that

(A) the number of days in the period from the date on which the spouse or corporation commenced to carry on the business to the end of the fiscal period,

(B) 365."

APPENDIX "G"

Certain of the proposals made by the Canadian Bar Association

Subdivision K—Trusts and their Beneficiaries

Sec. 104. Reference to trust or estate.

(1) In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a "trust") shall be read as a reference to the trustee or the executor, administrator, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property.

Sec. 104(2)

(2) Taxed as individual. A trust shall, for the purposes of this Act, and without affecting the liability of the trustee or legal representative for his own income tax, be deemed to be in respect of the trust property an individual; but where there is more than one trust and

(a) substantially all of the property of the various trusts has been received from one person, and

(b) the various trusts are conditioned so that the income thereof accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary, or group or class of beneficiaries, such of the trustees as the Minister may designate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be in respect of all the trusts an individual whose property is the property of all the trusts and whose income is the income of all the trusts.

(3) Deductions not permitted. No deduction may be made under section 109 or paragraph 110 (1) (d) from the income of a trust.

Sec. 104(4)

(4) Deemed disposition of property by a trust. Every trust shall, on each of the following days, be deemed to have disposed of each capital property of the trust, other than depreciable property, for proceeds equal to its fair market value on that day, and to have reacquired such property immediately thereafter for an amount equal to that fair market value; and for the purposes of this Act those days are:

(a) where the trust is a trust created by a taxpayer, whether during his lifetime or by his will, under which

(i) his spouse is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the spouse's death, and

(ii) no person except the spouse may, before the spouse's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, the day on which the spouse dies;

(aa) Where the trust is a classified trust the day prescribed by regulation

Comment: This amendment is designed to permit the Minister to prescribe alternative rules for trusts such as protective trusts which are worthy of special treatment.

(b) that day that is 21 years after the latest of

(i) January 1, 1972,

(ii) the day on which the trust was created, and

(iii) where applicable, the day referred to in paragraph (a); and

(c) the day that is 21 years after any day that is, by virtue of this subsection, a day on which the trust is deemed to have disposed of each such property.

Sec. 104(5)

(5) Idem. Every trust shall, on each day described in subsection (4), be deemed to have disposed of all depreciable property of a prescribed class of the trust for proceeds equal to,

(a) where the fair market value of that property on that day exceeds the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the trust on that day, the amount of that undepreciated capital cost plus ½ of the amount of the excess, and

(b) in any other case, the fair market value of that property on that day plus ½ of the amount, if any, by which the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the trust on that day exceeds that fair market value, and to have re-acquired each such depreciable property of that class immediately thereafter at a capital cost (in this subsection referred to as the "deemed capital cost") equal to that proportion of the proceeds determined under paragraph (2) or (b), as the case may be, that the amount that was the fair market value of that property on that day is of the aggregate of the amounts that were the fair market values of all properties of that class on that day, except that

(c) where the amount that was the capital cost to the trust of any particular property of that class exceeds the deemed capital cost to the trust of the property, for the purposes of sections 13 and 20 and any regulations made under paragraph 20(1) (a) as they apply in respect of the property at any subsequent time,

(i) the capital cost of the trust of the property shall be deemed to be the amount that was the capital cost to the trust of the property, and

(ii) the excess shall be deemed to have been allowed to the trust in respect of the property under paragraph 20(1)(a) in computing income for taxation years before the reacquisition by the trust of the property, and any other amount allowed to the trust in respect of the property under that paragraph in computing income for those years shall be deemed to be nil, and

(d) subsection 13(2) is not applicable in respect of any such reacquisition.

(6) Deduction in computing income of trust. For the purposes of this Part, there may be deducted in computing the income of a trust for a taxation year such part of the amount that would, but for this subsection (12) and subsection 105(2), be its income for the year as was payable in the year to a beneficiary.

Sec. 104(7)

(7) Non-resident beneficiary. No deduction may be made under subsection (6) in computing the income for a taxation year of a trust in respect of such part of an amount that would otherwise be its income for the year as was payable in the year to a person who, at the time such part of that amount became so payable, was not resident in Canada, unless at that time, the trust was resident in Canada.

(See also C. 104(6).)

Sec. 104(8)

(8) Limitation on deduction. No deduction may be made under subsection (6) in computing the income for a taxation year of an inter vivos trust that had income for the year from a business carried on by it in Canada, in respect of such part of an amount that would, but for subsections (6) and (12), be its income for the year as was payable in the year to a person who, at the time the amount became so payable, was

(a) a non-resident person;

(b) a non-resident-owned investment corporation; or

(c) a trust resident in Canada other than

(i) a testamentary trust, or

(ii) a trust that throughout the period commencing on April 26, 1965 and ending at the time the amount became so payable, was a beneficiary under the trust by whom the amount became so payable, which latter-mentioned trust was throughout such period carrying on a business in Canada.

Sec. 104(9)

(9) Idem. No deduction may be made under subsection (6) in computing the income for a taxation year of a trust other than a mutual fund trust, in respect of any amount that is deemed by subsection (21) to be a taxable capital gain for the year of a non-resident person or of a non-resident-owned investment corporation from the disposition of capital property.

Sec. 104(10)

(10) Where property owned for non-residents. Where all the property of a trust is owned by the trustee for the benefit of non-resident persons or their unborn issue, in addition to the amount that may be deducted under subsection (6), there may be deducted in computing the income of the trust for a taxation year for the purposes of this Part, such part of the dividends and interest received by the trust in a year from a non-resident-owned investment corporation as are not deductible under subsection (6) in computing the income of the trust for the year.

Sec. 104(11)

(11) Dividend received from non-resident-owned investment corporation. Where any part of the dividends received in a taxation year by a trust described in subsection (10) from a non-resident-owned investment corporation are deductible under subsection (10) in computing the income of the trust for the year, for the purposes of Part XIII the trust shall be deemed to have paid to a non-resident person on the last day of the year an amount equal to that part, as income of the non-resident person from the trust.

Sec. 104(12)

(12) Deduction of part of accumulating income included in preferred beneficiary's income. For the purposes of this Part, there may be deducted in computing the income of a trust for a taxation year such part of its accumulating income for the year as was required by subsection (14) to be included in computing the income of a preferred beneficiary.

Sec. 104(13)

(13) Such part of the amount that would be the income of a trust for a taxation year if no deduction were made under subsection (6) or under regulations made under paragraph 20(1)(a) as was payable in the year to a beneficiary shall be included in computing the income of the person to whom it so became payable whether or not it was paid to him in that year and shall not be included in computing his income for a subsequent year in which it was paid.

Comment: The purpose of this subsection is to make an amount deductible by reason of its allocation to a beneficiary, taxable in the hands of the beneficiary. The words "or (12)" deleted in the version above, are unnecessary in that subsection (14) provides for the inclusion of the amount deducted under (12) in the income of the preferred beneficiary concerned.

Sec. 104(14)

(14) Where a trust and a preferred beneficiary thereunder jointly so elect in respect of a taxation year in prescribed manner and within prescribed time, such part of the accumulating income of the trust for the year as is designated in the election, not exceeding the preferred beneficiary's share therein, shall be included in computing the income of the preferred beneficiary for the year, and shall not be included in computing the income of any taxpayer in a subsequent year in which it was paid.

Comment: "The income of any taxpayer" is substituted for the words "his income" as the accumulating income may in a subsequent year be paid to someone other than the person so electing.

Sec. 104(15)

(15) Preferred beneficiary's share. The share of a particular preferred beneficiary under a trust in the accumulating income of the trust for a taxation year is,

(a) where the trust is a trust described in paragraph (4)(a) and the taxpayer's spouse referred to therein is alive at the end of the year, an amount equal to,

(i) if the particular preferred beneficiary is the taxpayer's spouse, the trust's accumulating income for the year, and

(ii) in any other case, nil;

(b) in any case not referred to in paragraph (a), where the shares in which the accumulating income of the trust would be payable to the beneficiaries thereunder do not depend upon the exercise by any person of, or the failure by any person to exercise, any discretionary power,

(i) if at the end of the year a particular beneficiary was a member of a class of beneficiaries under the trust each of whom was prospectively entitled, as a member of that class, to share equally in any accumulating income of the trust the portion of the trust's accumulating income in the year that may reasonably be regarded as having been earned for the benefit of beneficiaries of that class divided by the number of beneficiaries (other than registered Canadian charitable organizations) of that class in existence at the end of the year.

Comment: This subsection provides a code to establish the amount in respect of which a particular preferred beneficiary can elect for the purposes of 104(14). The whole context, therefore, is one of income which is not, in fact, being paid but which is prospectively allocable to a particular preferred beneficiary. Consequently, in sub-paragraph (b) and particularly in clause (i) thereof, words suggesting that anyone is "entitled" to share in income should be changed. In addition, the right to elect only arises in connection with accumulating income so that any reference to income should be modified by the adjective "accumulating".

(ii) in any other case, the portion of the trust's accumulating income for the year that may reasonably be regarded as having been earned for the benefit of the particular preferred beneficiary;

(c) in any case not referred to in paragraph (a) or (b), where each beneficiary under the trust whose share of the accumulating income of the trust depends upon the exercise by any person of, or the failure by any person to exercise, any discretionary power, is a preferred beneficiary or a registered Canadian charitable organization, the portion of the trust's accumulating income for the year that may reasonably be regarded as having been earned for the benefit of the particular beneficiary, not exceeding the amount determined in prescribed manner to be his or its discretionary share of the trust's accumulating income for the year; and

(ca) in the case of a classified trust the amount prescribed.

(d) in any case not referred to in paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (ca), nil.

Comment: These amendments are designed to permit the Minister to prescribe alternative rules for trusts such as protective trusts which are worthy of special treatment.

Sec. 104(16)

(16) Capital cost allowance deduction. A beneficiary under a trust may deduct from the amount that would otherwise be his income from the trust by virtue of subsection (13) or (14), as the case may be, such part of the amount that would otherwise be deductible from the income of the trust for the year under regulations made under paragraph 20(1)(a) as the trust may determine; and any amount deductible under this subsection for a taxation year shall be deducted from the amount that the trust would otherwise be able to deduct under those regulations but shall, for the purposes of section 13, be deemed to have been allowed to the trust under those regulations in computing its income for the year.

Sec. 104(17)

(17) Depletion allowance. Where an amount is payable in a taxation year by a trust to a beneficiary under the trust, no part of that amount shall be deemed, for the purpose of subsections (6) and (13), to be payable out of an amount deductible in computing the income of the trust for the year under regulations made under subsection 65(1) except such part thereof as the trust designates as being so payable.

Sec. 104(18)

(18) Trust for infant. Where the income of a trust for a taxation year or any part thereof was not payable in the year but was held in trust for an infant or minor whose right thereto had vested and the only reason that it was not payable in the year was that the beneficiary was an infant or minor, it shall, for the purpose of subsections (6) and (13), be considered to have been payable.

Sec. 104(19)

(19) Portion of taxable dividends deemed to be dividends received by beneficiary. Such portion of

(a) the aggregate of taxable dividends received by a trust in a taxation year on shares of the capital stock of taxable Canadian corporations,

(b) may reasonably be considered (having regard to all the circumstances including the terms and conditions of the trust arrangement) to be part of the amount that, by virtue of subsection (13) or (14) or section 105, as the case may be, was included in computing the income for the year of a particular beneficiary under the trust, and

(c) was not designated by the trust in respect of any other beneficiary thereunder, shall, if so designated by the trust in respect of the particular beneficiary in the return of its income for the year under this Part, be deemed, for the purposes of section 82 and this subsection, to be a taxable dividend received by the particular beneficiary in the year from a taxable Canadian corporation, and not to be a taxable dividend received by the trust in the year from a taxable Canadian corporation.

Sec. 104(20)

(20) Portion of non-taxable dividends not to be included in beneficiary's income. Where an amount has, in a taxation year, become payable by a trust to a particular beneficiary thereunder, such portion thereof as

(a) may reasonably be considered (having regard to all the circumstances including the terms and conditions of the trust arrangement) to have derived from an amount received by the trust in the year as, on account or in lieu of payment of, or in satisfaction of, a dividend on a share of the capital stock of a corporation resident in Canada other than a taxable dividend, and shall, if so designated by the trust in respect of the particular beneficiary in its return of income for the year under this Part, not be included in computing the income of the particular beneficiary for the year.

(b) was not designated by the trust in respect of any other beneficiary thereunder,

Sec. 104(21)

(21) Portion of taxable capital gains deemed gain of beneficiary. Such portion of

(a) the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of the taxable capital gains of a trust for a taxation year exceeds the aggregate of

(i) its allowable capital losses for the year, and

(ii) the amount, if any, deductible under paragraph 111(1)(b) from its income for the year

(b) may reasonably be considered (having regard to all the circumstances including the terms and conditions of the trust arrangement) to be part of the amount that, by virtue of subsection (13) or (14) or section 105, as the case may be, was included in computing the income for the taxation year of a particular beneficiary under the trust, and

(c) was not designated by the trust in respect of any other beneficiary thereunder, shall, if so designated by the trust in respect of the particular beneficiary in the return of its income for the year under this Part, be deemed, for the purposes of sections 3 and 111, to be a taxable capital gain for the year of the particular beneficiary from the disposition of capital property.

(22) Deduction for foreign taxes. For the purpose of section 126, the following rules apply:

(a) such portion of the income of a trust for a taxation year (before making any deduction under subsection (6) or (12)) from sources in a foreign country as

(i) may reasonably be considered (having regard to all the circumstances including the terms and conditions of the trust arrangement) to be part of the income that, by virtue of subsection (13) or (14), as the case may be, was included in computing the income for a taxation year of a particular beneficiary under the trust, and

(ii) was not designated by the trust in respect of any other beneficiary thereunder,

shall, if so designated by the trust in respect of the particular beneficiary in its return of income for the year under this Part, be deemed to be income of the particular beneficiary for the taxation year from sources in that country;

(b) a beneficiary under a trust shall be deemed to have paid as income tax for a taxation year, on the income that he is deemed by paragraph (a) to have for the year from sources in a foreign country, to the government of that country an amount equal to that proportion of the income or profits tax paid by the trust for the year to the government of that country or to the government of a state, province or other political subdivision of that country (except such portion of that tax as was deductible under subsection 20(11) or (12) in computing its income for the year) that

(i) such portion of the amount included in computing his income for the year by virtue of subsection (13) or (14), as the case may be as is deemed by paragraph (a) to be income for the year from sources in that country,

(ii) the income of the trust for the year from sources in that country (before making any deduction under subsection (6) or (12));

(c) the income of a trust from sources in a foreign country for a taxation year shall be deemed to be its actual income therefrom for the year minus the aggregate of the amounts deemed by paragraph (a) to be the income therefrom for the year of all beneficiaries under the trust; and

(d) a trust shall be deemed to have paid as income tax to the government of a foreign country for a taxation year an amount equal to the income or profits tax actually paid by it for the year to the government of that country, or to the government of a state, province or other political subdivision of that country (except such portion of that tax as was deductible under subsection 20 (11) or (12) in computing its income for the year), minus the aggregate of the amounts deemed by paragraph (b) to have been paid to the government of that country for the year by all beneficiaries under the trust.

(23) Testamentary trusts. In the case of a testamentary trust, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act the following rules apply:

(a) the taxation year of the trust is the period for which the accounts of the trust have been ordinarily made up and accepted for purposes of assessment under this Act and, in the absence of an established practice, the period adopted by the trust for that purpose (but no such period may exceed 12 months and a change in a usual and accepted period may not be made for the purpose of this Act without the concurrence of the Minister);

(b) when a taxation year is referred to by reference to a calendar year, the reference is to the taxation year or years coinciding with, or ending in, that year;

(c) the income of a person for a taxation year from the trust shall be deemed to be his benefits from or under the trust for the taxation year or years of the trust that ended in the year determined as provided by this section and section 105;

(d) where an individual having income from the trust died after the end of a taxation year of the trust but before end of the calendar year in which that taxation year ended, a separate return of his income from the trust after the end of the trust's taxation year to the time of death shall be filed and tax under this Part shall be paid thereon as if that income were the income of another person; and

(e) in lieu of making the payments required by section 156, the trust shall pay to the Receiver General of Canada within 90 days from the end of each taxation year, the tax for the year as estimated under section 151.

Sec. 104(24)

(24) "Amount payable". For the purposes of subsections (6), (7), (8), (13) and (20), an amount shall not be considered to be payable in a taxation year unless it was paid in the year to the person to whom it was payable or he was entitled in that year to enforce payment thereof.

(25) An election under subsection (14) hereof on behalf of a preferred beneficiary under a disability can be made by the person designated in the trust to make such election and if none by a parent or guardian of such preferred beneficiary and if none by the trustee.

Comment: Doubt has been expressed as to the ability of persons to elect when otherwise entitled to do so as preferred beneficiaries in respect of accumulating income. It is understood that the Department of Justice has given the opinion to the Department of Finance that no problem arises under the provincial law with these elections. It is further understood that the Department of National Revenue has informed the Department of Finance that no problem arises in connection with the rights to elect which presently exist insofar as persons under a disability are concerned. The Bar Association does not dispute the advice tendered by either Department but in the particular context under discussion here, it does not consider that either advice meets the problem. It is perfectly true that the legal institutions exist in all of the provinces under which a person could become competent to elect on behalf of an infant but the institutions often involve tedious procedures and considerable expense as they are necessarily designed to cope with the awkward problems which arise in connection with the property of a person under a disability. The most common disability with which we will be concerned in connection with the right of election by a preferred beneficiary will be the disability of infancy. Other disabilities such as mental incapacity or absenteeism are uncommon or even exotic and the likelihood of resort to a proper procedure which would result in the appointment of a legal personal representative is great. Very few parents however, bother to become guardians of their own children. It is considered that the Statute should give the right to a parent to make the election. This would not interfere with the provincial right to determine the matter of guardianship but would simply say that a federal election can be made by a particular category of person.

Sec. 105. Benefits under trust, contract, etc.

(1) The value of all benefits (other than a distribution or payment of capital) to a taxpayer during a taxation year from or under a trust, contract, arrangement or power of appointment, irrespective of when made or created shall, subject to subsection (2), be included in computing his income for the year.

Sec. 105(2)

(2) Upkeep, etc. Such part of an amount paid by a trust out of income of the trust for the upkeep, maintenance or taxes of or in respect, of property that, under the terms of the trust arrangement, is required to be maintained for the use of a tenant for life or a beneficiary as is reasonable in the circumstances shall be included in computing the income of the tenant for life or other beneficiary from the trust for the taxation year for which it was paid.

(See also S. 12(1)(m); S. 104(6), (13); S. 248(1).)

Sec. 106 Income interest in trust.

(1) Where an amount in respect of a taxpayer's income interest in a trust has been included in computing his income for a taxation year by virtue of subsection 104(13) or subsection (2) of this section, there may be deducted in computing his income for the year the lesser of

(a) the amount so included in computing his income for the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which the cost to the taxpayer of the income interest exceeds the aggregate of all amounts in respect of the interest that were deductible by virtue of this subsection in computing his income for previous taxation years.

Sec. 106(2)

(2) Disposition by taxpayer of income interest. Where in a taxation year a taxpayer disposes of an income interest in a trust,

(a) except where subsection (3) is applicable, there shall be included in computing his income for the year the proceeds of the disposition;

(b) any taxable capital gain or allowable capital loss of the taxpayer from the disposition shall be deemed to be nil; and

(c) for greater certainty, the cost to the taxpayer of each property received by him as consideration for the disposition is the fair market value of the property at the time of the disposition.

Sec. 106(3)

(3) Proceeds of disposition of income interest. For greater certainty, where at any time any property of a trust has been distributed by the trust to a taxpayer who was a beneficiary under the trust in satisfaction of all or any part of his income interest in the trust, the trust shall be deemed to have disposed of the property for proceeds of disposition equal to the fair market value of the property at that time.

Sec. 107 Disposition by taxpayer of capital interest.

(1) Where a taxpayer has disposed of a capital interest in a trust,

(a) for the purposes of computing his taxable capital gain, if any, from the disposition of the interest, the adjusted cost base to him thereof immediately before the disposition shall be deemed to be an amount equal to the greater of the adjusted cost base to him thereof otherwise determined immediately before that time and the cost amount to him of the interest immediately before that time, and

(b) for greater certainty, for the purposes of computing his allowable capital loss, if any, from the disposition of the interest, the adjusted cost base to him thereof immediately before the disposition is the adjusted cost base to him of the interest immediately before that time as determined under this Act without reference to paragraph (a),

except that where the interest was an interest in an inter vivos trust not resident in Canada that was purchased by the taxpayer, paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the disposition thereof except where subsection (2) is applicable in respect of any distribution of property by the trust to him in satisfaction of all or any part of the interest.

(1) Where a taxpayer has disposed of a capital interest in a trust,

(a) for the purposes of computing his taxable capital gain, if any, from the disposition of the interest, the adjusted cost base to him thereof immediately before the disposition shall be deemed to be an amount equal to the greater of the adjusted cost base to him thereof otherwise determined immediately before that time and the cost amount to him of the interest immediately before that time, and

(b) for greater certainty, for the purposes of computing his allowable capital loss, if any, from the disposition of the interest, the adjusted cost base to him thereof immediately before the disposition is the adjusted cost base to him of the interest immediately before that time as determined under this Act without reference to paragraph (2),

except that where the interest was an interest in an inter vivos trust not resident in Canada that was purchased by the taxpayer, paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the disposition thereof except where subsection (2) is applicable in respect of any distribution of property by the trust to him as or on account of all or any part of the interest.

(2) Where at any time any property of the trust has been distributed by the trust to a taxpayer who was a beneficiary under the trust as or on account of all or any part of his capital interest in the trust.

Comment: Some doubt has been expressed as to whether a capital encroachment for a beneficiary represents the distribution of property by a trust to a beneficiary "in satisfaction of all or any part of his capital interest". The problem seems to be with the word "satisfaction". The doubt has been expressed in print by writers such as David Ward and has been felt privately by those in the Bar Association concerned with the preparation of this brief. It seems to us that the problem can simply be solved by changing the phrase where it appears in both subsections from "in satisfaction of" to "as or on account of".

(3) Determination of cost of property other than non-depreciable capital property. Where the property referred to in subsection (2) that was distributed by a trust to a taxpayer was property, other than capital property that was not depreciable property, for the purpose of determining the cost to the taxpayer of the property under paragraph (2)(b) (except for the purposes of paragraph (2)(b) as it applies to determine the taxpayer's proceeds of disposition of his capital interest under paragraph (2)(c), the reference in paragraph (2)(b) to "that proportion" shall be read as a reference to "½ of that proportion".

Sec. 107(4)

(4) Where trust in favour of spouse. Where the trust referred to in subsection (2) was a trust described in paragraph 104(4)(a) and

(a) the property so distributed by the trust was capital property other than depreciable property,

(b) the taxpayer to whom the property was so distributed was a person other than the spouse, and

(c) the spouse was alive at the time the property was so distributed, notwithstanding paragraphs (2)(a) to (d), the following rules apply:

(d) the trust shall be deemed to have disposed of the property for proceeds equal to its fair market value at that time;

(e) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to that fair market value, and

(f) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have disposed of all or part, as the case may be, of his interest in the trust, for proceeds of disposition equal to that fair market value.

Sec. 107(5)

(5) Distribution to non-resident beneficiary. Where subsection (2) is applicable in respect of the distribution by a trust of any property of the trust to a non-resident taxpayer who was a beneficiary under the trust and the property was not taxable Canadian property or property that would be taxable Canadian property if at no time in the taxation year of the trust in which it was so distributed the trust had been resident in Canada, notwithstanding paragraphs (2)(a) to (c) the provisions of paragraphs (4)(d) to (f) are applicable in respect of the property as if the reference in paragraph (4)(f) to "that fair market value" were read as a reference to "the adjusted cost base to him of the interest or part thereof, as the case may be immediately before the property was so distributed".

Sec. 108. Definitions.

(1) In this subdivision,

Sec. 108(1)(a)

(a) "Accumulating income".—"accumulating income" of a trust for a taxation year means the amount that, but for subsections 104(6) and 104(12) would be its income for the year;

Comment: The words "104(6)" would appear to have been omitted by oversight.

Sec. 108(1)(b)

(b) "Beneficiary".—"beneficiary" under a trust includes a person beneficially interested therein;

Sec. 108(1)(c)

(c) "Capital interest".—"Capital interest" of a taxpayer in a trust means a right (whether immediate or future and whether absolute or contingent) of the taxpayer as a beneficiary under the trust to, or to receive, all or any part of the capital of the trust;

Sec. 108(1)(d)

(d) "Cost amount" of capital interest.—"cost amount" of any capital interest of a taxpayer in any trust at any time means,

(i) in any case where any money or property of the trust has been distributed by the trust to the taxpayer in full satisfaction of the whole of his capital interest (whether on the winding-up of the trust or otherwise), the aggregate of the money so distributed and all amounts each of which is the cost amount to the trust, immediately before the distribution, of each such property so distributed to the taxpayer, and

(ii) in any other case, that proportion of the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of all money of the trust on hand immediately before that time and all amounts each of which is the cost amount to the trust, immediately before that time, of each property of the trust exceeds the aggregate of all amounts each of which is the amount of any debt owing by the trust, or of any other obligation of the trust to pay any amount, that was outstanding immediately before that time, that

(A) the fair market value at that time of the capital interest in the trust, is of

(B) the fair market value at that time of all capital interests in the trust;

Sec. 108(1)(e)

(e) "Income interest".—"income interest" of a taxpayer in a trust means a right (whether immediate or future and whether absolute or contingent) of the taxpayer as a beneficiary under the trust to, or to receive, all or any part of the income of the trust;

Sec. 108(1)(f)

(f) "Inter vivos trust".—"inter vivos trust" means a trust other than a testamentary trust;

Sec. 108(1)(g)

(g) "Preferred beneficiary".—"preferred beneficiary" under any trust means an individual resident in Canada who is a beneficiary under the trust and is

(i) the settlor of the trust,

(ii) the spouse or former spouse of the settlor of the trust, or

(iii) a child, grandchild or great grandchild of the settlor of the trust, or the spouse of any such person;

Sec. 108(1)(h)

(h) "Settlor".—"settlor",

(i) in relation to a testamentary trust, means the individual referred to in paragraph (1), and

(ii) in relation to an inter vivos trust,

(A) if the trust was created by the transfer, assignment or other disposition of property thereto (in this paragraph referred to as property "contributed") by not more than one individual and the fair market value of such of the property of the trust as was contributed by him at the time of the creation of the trust or at any subsequent time exceeds the fair market value of such of the property of the trust as was contributed by any other person or persons at any subsequent time (such fair market values being determined at the time of the making of any such contribution), means that individual, and

(B) if the trust was created by the contribution of property thereto jointly by an individual and his spouse and by no other person and the fair market value of such of the property of the trust as was contributed by them at the time of the creation of the trust or at any subsequent time exceeds the fair market value of such of the property of the trust as was contributed by any other person or persons at any subsequent time (such fair market values being determined at the time of the making of any such contribution), means that individual and his spouse;

Sec. 108(1)(i)

(i) "Testamentary trust".—"testamentary trust" means a trust or estate that arose upon the death of an individual and in consequence of his death, but for greater certainty does not include any such trust that was created by any person other than that individual; and

Sec. 108(1)(j)

(j) "Trust".—"trust" includes an inter vivos trust and a testamentary trust but, in subsections 104(4),

(5), (12), (14) and (15) and sections 105 to 107 does not include

(i) a unit trust, or

(ii) a trust governed by a registered pension fund or plan, an employees profit sharing plan, a registered supplementary unemployment benefit plan, a registered retirement savings plan or a deferred profit sharing plan.

Sec. 108(1)(k)

(k) "Classified trust".—"classified trust" means a trust which has been accepted by the Minister for inclusion in a class prescribed by regulation.

Comment: This amendment is designed to permit the Minister to prescribe alternative rules for trusts such as protective trusts which are worthy of special treatment.

Sec. 108(2)

(2) Meaning of expression "unit trust". For the purposes of this Act, a trust is a unit trust at any particular time if, at that time, it was an inter vivos trust the interest of each beneficiary under which was described by reference to units of the trust, and

(a) the issued units of the trust included

(i) units having conditions attached thereto that included conditions requiring the trust to accept, at the demand of the holder thereof and at prices determined and payable in accordance with the conditions the surrender of the units, or fractions or parts thereof, that are fully paid, or

(ii) units qualified in accordance with prescribed conditions relating to the redemption of the units by the trust, and the fair market value of such of the units as had conditions attached thereto that included such conditions or as were so qualified, as the case may be, was not less than 95% of the fair market value of all of the issued units of the trust (such fair market values being determined without regard to any voting rights attaching to units of the trust), or

(b) throughout the taxation year in which the particular time occurred it complied with the following conditions:

(i) it was resident in Canada,

(ii) its only undertaking was the investing of funds of the trust,

(iii) at least 80% of its property throughout the year consisted of shares, bonds, mortgages, marketable securities, or cash, or of rights to or interests in any rental or royalty computed by reference to the amount or value of production from an oil or gas well, or from a mineral resource, situated in Canada,

(iv) not less than 95% of its income for the year was derived from, or from dispositions of, investments described in subparagraph (iii),

(v) at no time in the year did more than 10% of its property consist of shares, bonds or securities of any one corporation or debtor other than Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or a Canadian municipality, and

(vi) all holdings of and transactions, if any, in its units accorded with prescribed conditions relating to the number of its unit holders, dispersal of ownership of its units and public trading of its units.

Sec. 108(3)

(3) For the purposes of paragraph 70(6)(b), paragraphs 73(1)(a) and (b), paragraph 104(4)(a) (herein called the "rollover provisions") and of paragraph 108(1)(e)

(a) the income of a trust is its income computed without reference to the provisions of this Act.

(b) where the trust directs the application of the income of the trust for the benefit of the spouse, the spouse shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be entitled to receive the income so directed to be applied.

(c) the fact that debts of the taxpayer or taxes exigible by reason of his death or administration expenses of the trust are payable out of the property of the trust shall not for that reason only prevent the application of the rollover provisions.

Comment: The Bar Association feels concern on two points in connection with the exclusive trust for a spouse. In the first place if money is spent for the benefit of a spouse rather than being paid to a spouse it ought to be treated in the same way. There is some concern that it would not be so treated and that the possibility of spending income for the benefit of a spouse would disqualify the trust. Similarly there is concern that if the trust must bear taxes payable to a province or to a municipality or debts of the deceased, that the trust would be disqualified. A section such as section 7(4) of the Estate Tax Act together with its interpretation is required and the Association is satisfied with the language which is proposed for this purpose.

Additional Sections to be amended

110(2)(a) Where an individual was, during the taxation year a member of a religious order and had, as such, taken a vow of perpetual poverty, he may, in lieu of the deduction permitted by paragraph 1(a), deduct from his income for the year an amount equal to his earned income for the year as defined by section 63 if, of his income, that amount has been paid to the order.

(b) Where a taxpayer has died in a taxation year in applying paragraph (1)(a) for the purpose of computing his taxable income for that year that paragraph shall be read without reference to the words "not exceeding 20%".

Comment: The Bill now limits charitable deductions to an amount equal to 20% of the taxable income in the terminal period. It is, in fact, not uncommon for a taxpayer to give all of his property, or all of his property subject to a life interest in favour of his spouse (and perhaps other dependants) to charity. The effect of the present provisions of the Bill would be to make some part of the charitable gift an amount in excess of the 20% limit and hence taxable. It is, therefore, suggested that in the year of death a 100% deduction should be available for charity. It is to be noted that this is not a novel suggestion. A 100% deduction is now available under the Estate Tax Act of Canada and is as well available under the Income Tax Act when a gift is being made to that well-known charity, the Crown. The Bar Association requests that the 100% deduction be generally applicable to all charitable gifts in the year of death.

54(e) "listed personal property" of a taxpayer means his personal-use property that is all or any portion of, or any interest in or right to, any

(i) print, etching, drawing, painting, sculpture, or other similar work of art,

(ii) jewellery,

(iii) rare folio, rare manuscript, or rare book,

(iv) stamp,

(v) coin,

(vi) antique furniture,

(vii) gold, silver, antique flatware or plate,

(viii) antique or rare china.

Comment: In the Minister's explanation of the Bill, the categories of listed personal property were explained as being examples of items which did not normally depreciate through use and would hence normally attract a gain on disposition. However, the technique in the Statute understandably has been to define a specific list for the purposes of listed personal property and the list contains omissions. Ordinary furniture depreciates through use but genuine antiques do not. The difficulty of establishing what is an antique can be resolved and is resolved for the purposes of the customs regulations. The present list includes coins, jewellery and works of art. These categories do not embrace gold or sterling silver tableware. Such articles do not depreciate through use and as they acquire patina of age they also acquire value. Similar articles made of more base metals such as pewter or copper or brass while normally belonging to the category of things which depreciate through use, may, if they are very old, move into the category of antiques and like the antique furniture, begin to appreciate by the passage of time whether or not used. Finally, antique or rare china describes two classes of pottery which do not depreciate through use. Every member of the Senate must be acquainted with particular items which, whether or not used, are more valuable now than when they were purchased. The characteristic of antiquity is here the more important qualification. Rare china which is not also old china will not commonly arise. However, certain of the most artistic makers of fine china are in the habit of issuing special limited editions which immediately commence growing in value.

40(2)(k) For the purposes of paragraph 69(1)(b) and subsections 70(5) and 104(4) there may be deducted from the proceeds of disposition otherwise determined of property (other than depreciable property) an amount equal to the reasonable expenses which would have been incurred by the taxpayer in the disposition of the property deemed to be disposed of by him had he actually disposed of that property.

Comment: Commission on the sale of property and other similar expenses are deductible in computing the capital gain to be paid by the taxpayer. It seems only fair that allowance be made for this type of expense which the property is deemed to be realized rather than actually realized.

122(2) Subsection (1) is not applicable for a taxation year of an inter vivos trust other than a mutual fund trust or a classified trust if the trust

(a) was established before June 18, 1971

(b) was resident in Canada on June 18, 1971 and without interruption thereafter until the end of the year,

(c) did not carry on any active business in the year,

(d) has not received any property by way of gift after Royal Assent has been given to this Act,

(e) has not after Royal Assent has been given to this Act insured

(i) any debt

(ii) any other obligation to pay an amount to, or guaranteed by, any person with whom any beneficiary of the trust was not dealing at arms length.

Comment: Many trusts have been unintentionally put into the minimum 50% taxation category by additional gifts or borrowings since June 18, 1971. The authors of the Bill have their sights set upon sophisticated taxpayers indulging in constant tax planning. For such persons the rule of June 18 is undoubtedly fair. Those people all heard about this particular provision over the weekend of June 19 and 20. However, small trusts, often for children, are legion, not attended by formality and not always or even most largely, created by sophisticated people. The mother who banks her family allowance cheques in the name of the children, the grandfather who buys a $50 Canada Savings Bond each year for his grandchildren, are examples. Those trusts should be saved by the creation of a new category of infants' trusts but pending such salvation, it would be more equitable to give a greater amount of time to taxpayers to become acquainted with the rule. At the time of the last amendment Section 13(4) of the Estate Tax Amendment Act, 1968-1969 allowed taxpayers to engage in post mortem variations of wills in order to qualify within the definition of the spouse-exempt trust created by section 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act. Such variation was permitted until August 1, 1969 and the purpose was to allow a sufficient period of time to elapse to catch the cases where persons would not have had a reasonable opportunity to alter wills. The same principle is applicable here.

Comment for Classified Trust. At present the Bill recognizes the following categories of trusts:

Unit Trusts

Testamentary Trusts

(a) exclusive spouse trust

(b) other trust

Inter Vivos Trusts

(a) exclusive spouse trust

(b) other trust created before June 18, 1971 and not contaminated by gifts or borrowing since that time

(c) other inter vivos trusts

The effect of the Bill is to treat generously spouse trusts, testamentary trusts and pre-June 18 trusts but all living trusts created after June 18 are treated punitively as if there never were any reason for employing them except tax avoidance. The Bar Association finds it tiresome to have to reiterate over and over again in argument with tax policy officials at the federal level that there are other uses and reasons for trusts than tax avoidance and that these uses are of everyday application. In the 1968-1969 amendments it was recognized that an infant's trust was a legitimate device. There was also recognition in the estate tax context of a trust for an incapable person. It is suggested that the revenue has nothing to fear from the creation of further types of trusts to be treated on a less punitive basis both as to the time when the trust is deemed to dispose of its capital assets and as to the applicable rate of tax on accumulating income. The Bar Association would suggest that the two categories most urgently required are the category of a protective trust and the category of infant's trust. In each case conditions could be established to protect the revenue while at the same time leaving criteria which could be met in ordinary cases. The Bar Association considers that flexibility could be obtained in this connection by building in the possibility of prescribing categories of trusts by regulation and in this way making provision in the future not only for the two types mentioned, but also for other types. The required amendment is extremely simple.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Copies of final communiqué issued following the Ministerial Session of the North Atlantic Council, held in Brussels, December 9-10, 1971.

ADJOURNMENT

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 16, 1971, I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, 10th January, 1972, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45 (1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 15th December, 1971, and that Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DISTRIBUTION OF TAX FORMS—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government is absent, I may put my question to the acting leader (Hon. Mr. Langlois) in the form of notice. Is is true that the Department of National Revenue has already circulated forms taking for granted that Bill C-259 will come into force on January 1, 1972?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Due to the many implications of this question I will take this as notice.

TAX REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the Final Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, as we are all aware Bill C-259 received its first reading in the House of Commons in June 1971. During the course of the summer recess I was in touch with Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as to the position that should be taken by the committee in regard to the bill. When the Senate reassembled on September 14, 1971, there was tabled in this house a summary of the 1971 tax reform legislation, and on the same day Senator Hayden moved to refer the summary and the legislation connected therewith for study and report to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In other words, we have been seized of the summary and of the bill exactly three months, today being December 14.

As we are aware, that was an unusual procedure. We knew the bill was voluminous and complicated, as any tax legislation is bound to be. We spent a great deal of time studying and making recommendations on the White Paper. I am sure that when the chairman made his motion, all honourable senators were of the opinion that it would be desirable to forestall any criticism of the Senate for giving the bill inadequate consideration because of insufficient time to debate it.

The purpose of the reference was to enable the committee to study the legislation, to hear witnesses, and to make a report. Upon reflection, I feel this was a wise step for the chairman to have taken. It is not dissimilar to attitudes regarding other bills. For many years we received complaints about rubber stamping appropriation bills, and then a few years ago we adopted the current practice of referring the Estimates and the supplementary Estimates, when tabled in the house, to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. This procedure has enabled the committee to deal with the Estimates upon which all appropriation bills are based, and any honourable senator may attend the meetings.

This practice has resulted in two things. The first is that the debates on appropriation bills are more informed; secondly, the criticism voiced for so many years that we knew nothing about the contents of these bills has been stifled. This has been a salutory consequence for the Senate. With this precedent in mind, a similar procedure was adopted with respect to the tax bill.

Pursuant to this order of reference, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce held its first meeting on September 29. It organized a staff and advised interested people when hearings would take place. The last meeting was yesterday, December 13. The committee held 27 meetings, heard 129 witnesses, and received 30 briefs. Although the bill has not yet reached us, I feel that the Senate, through its Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, has already given the bill very careful consideration.

Without creating a debating point, I find that I must take issue with some of the remarks made by Senator

Flynn last night, particularly in respect of his proposition that our consideration of the bill was narrow and technical. Normally I do not disagree with Senator Flynn. I find his argument, and his point of view and approach to problems here, so reasonable that I agree with him many times more than I disagree. This case, however, involves a matter of perspective. I do not consider our exercise in respect of Senator Hayden's motion to be in any way restricted. I think of the enormous amount of work carried out by the committee in connection with the White Paper. The reference of the White Paper and the White Paper itself were as broad as any issues could be. In that connection we considered the White Paper in 60 meetings of the committee between January 28 and September 15, 1970. We heard 118 briefs, and there were 225 in addition which were submitted and considered but not heard by the committee. I am told that 471 witnesses appeared with respect to the White Paper.

I should like to refer to the Table of Contents of our report, which was published in September 1970, to indicate the range of interest and the breadth of view of that Senate committee in respect of tax reform, particularly as a result of the White Paper. In the first chapter we dealt, for example, with the Tax Burden on Individuals; the Capital Gains Tax; Wage Earner Expenses; the Integration System; the Mineral Industries; Taxing International Income; Coordination with the Provinces; and Impact on Revenues and the Economy.

Chapter 2 is headed: "The Individual and Family", and covers Increased Personal Exemptions; Pension and Retirement Savings Plans; Income Averaging Formula; and Benefits to Employees.

Chapter 3, "Capital Gains and Losses", contains many headings. In Chapter 4, headed: "Corporations and Their Shareholders", we rejected integration, and discussed Retention of Modified Dividend Tax Credit; Closely-Held and Widely-Held Corporations; Corporate Surpluses; Small Business Corporations; Public Utilities; and Co-operatives, Caisses Populaires and Credit Unions.

In Chapter 5, "Business and Property Income", we dealt with many subjects including Depreciation; Consolidated Returns; Incentives for Mining and Oil and Gas Industries; Non-Operators; Professional Income; Non-Profit Organizations; and Trusts.

• (1420)

In Chapter 6, "Taxing International Income", the committee considered Dividends from Foreign Corporations; Tax Havens; Foreign Business Corporations; Withholding Tax; and Capital Gains—Non-Residents. These are general considerations, not only on tax legislation but on the economic implications of tax legislation upon the private sector of the economy.

In the Summary, in which are set out the major points upon which the committee reported and made recommendations, one finds the primary concern is directed towards ensuring that the legislation does not unduly disrupt the economy, that co-ordination with the provinces is maintained and if possible improved and that the legislation preserves savings and the necessary moneys for Canadian economic expansion. The conclusion is reached that a tax system must preserve investment of capital and savings by Canadians and foreigners, and must permit Canada to remain competitive in world markets.

I have given only a few of the highlights that are apparent from the Table of Contents and the Summary. They indicate the breadth of interest taken by the committee at the time the White Paper was before it for consideration.

The committee was told by the minister yesterday that 44 recommendations made by the Senate committee had been adopted. If honourable senators will take the time to review what has been done since the presentation of the committee's report they will find that more recommendations were accepted from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce than from any other source, including the House of Commons committee.

For example, the Senate committee recommended the abolition of the integration concept, which recommendation was accepted. It recommended serious modification of the capital gains tax proposed in the White Paper, and half rates as opposed to the full rates proposed in the White Paper will now apply. The concept of a five-year revaluation, which the committee strenuously opposed, was discarded. The provisions relating to registered retirement savings plans were changed radically. The maximum contribution of $1,500 in each year was increased to $2,500. This represents a significant change. The proposed tax law in respect of registered pension plans was changed just as radically. The maximum amount deductible per year, which was formerly $2,500, is now increased to $4,000.

The committee seriously considered the problem of principal residence. What was proposed in the White Paper does not appear in the bill, so apparently the committee's objection was noted. A number of views were expressed in respect of small business corporations, nearly all of which are reflected in the present bill.

Honourable senators, the committee undertook, in respect of the White Paper, a general review not only of the tax law but of its many implications with regard to the economy.

Turning to the study which has just been concluded, I would refer the house to the order of reference which appears in the Debates of the Senate of September 14, and which has been repeated in each of the committee's reports. It reads as follows:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled this day, and any bills based on the Budget Resolutions in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate, and any other matters relating thereto—

The committee was authorized to "examine and consider". Nothing could be wider than those terms of reference. We could examine the principles or any details.

An Hon. Senator: No.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Any senator could have come before the committee and raised any issue he wished. We were not inhibited in any way in our reference as to the type of study we made. In practice we took a broad approach.

The first three or four sessions of the committee were devoted to a review of Bill C-259. This work was done by two relatively young lawyers from Toronto, Mr. Arthur R. A. Scace and Mr. Stephen C. Smith. Incidentally, these two gentlemen were responsible for lectures given under the auspices of the Upper Canada Law Society to some 500 Ontario lawyers. They also carried a great deal of the burden in the meeting of the Canadian Tax Foundation in Vancouver on November 15, which was attended by some 1,300 professional and business people.

Mr. Scace and Mr. Smith discussed with us at length the broad implications of Bill C-259. Their evidence is a valuable textbook for amateurs and professional people, and I am sure all members of the committee are grateful for the service they rendered. They gave us a great overview of the bill.

When Senator Hayden tabled the Committee's final report last evening he listed the various topics these two gentlemen discussed with us. In reviewing the highlights of Bill C-259, they dealt with personal income tax, capital gains, evaluation of tax free zones, partnerships and professional incomes, corporations and distribution to shareholders, dividend tax credits, small businesses, intercorporate dividends, designated surplus, investment incomes of private companies, complexity, international income, taxation on the summary, and estate and death duties.

This was not in any sense a restrictive study; it was really an overall study of the entire tax structure as reflected in this bill. The character of the evidence that we heard in this second round of our inquiry into the tax reform legislation bears analysis. It was generally an excellent broad sampling of the private sector of the Canadian economy. We heard, for example, from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce; the Canadian Federation of Agriculture; the National Association of Canadian Credit Unions; the Canadian Bar Association; the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants; the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association; the Mining Association of Canada; the Canadian Mutual Funds Association; the Petroleum Association, life insurance and general insurance associations, the Canadian Construction Association, and the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. This is not any specific, detailed, picayune kind of approach.

As a result of the evidence we heard from these very representative groups we saw what the effect of the proposed tax law would be upon various segments of the economy, upon various areas in the private sector, upon the various industries concerned. We cross-examined these witnesses, many of us at length. The briefs were well prepared. I would say the dialogue between the committee and the witnesses was excellent. I for one—and I am sure I speak for all members of the committee—appreciate the efforts these people made when they came before us to give us their views in so clear, concise and comprehensive a way.

I said earlier, but I think it bears repeating, that the proceedings of the committee form an invaluable textbook for people who are interested in the tax bill. It gives an overview of the bill; it shows the practical working of the bill and the criticisms that can be made about certain areas of it. We have reported and proposed remedies for the things we felt should be criticized. In short, honourable senators, I think the committee in its approach to the tax bill, in the work it has done, has discharged its duty, the duty of senators, the duty of legislators, and we took three full months to do it. We knew what we should do and we did it. We provided a public forum for the taxpayer to come and express his views about the proposed tax law. If the press or anyone else fails to recognize the value of this forum, if it or anyone else does not appreciate the value of the work and instead of expressing appreciation is on the contrary critical, then I say that is irresponsible criticism.

I do not propose to repeat what Senator Hayden said about the excellent work done by the committee staff. Mr. Frank Jackson, of our own staff, looked after the proceedings and the infrastructure. I am sure I will be pardoned if I make special reference to the very important work done by the Honourable Lazarus Phillips, our former colleague. I mention, too, Mr. Albert Poissant, Mr. Charles Mitchell, Mr. Alan Irving, and Mr. Douglas Ewens, all of whose names appear in the report made last night by Senator Hayden.

We drafted two comprehensive reports. I should not say "we", because the staff drafted them; we revised them. The reports that were tabled here on November 4 and November 30, although the second one was, as I recall it, dated November 24, were good reports. They were reports of which any Senate committee could be proud. We followed that up by making drafts of specific amendments which we thought might reflect the views expressed in our reports. It is true that the draftsmanship of some of these specific amendments has not been completed. As Senator Hayden said at the second last meeting of the committee, we simply have not had time to put this material together.

We should remind ourselves that this measure has been studied in detail by many bodies outside this house. Most of the large accounting houses in Canada have issued comprehensive brochures on this tax measure, brochures which in themselves are difficult and complicated. Furthermore, they have given courses, mainly to their clients. I have already mentioned that the Law Society of Upper Canada arranged a course which was attended by over 500 lawyers, mostly from Ontario. CCH Canadian Limited published an analysis of this bill, together with an annotated copy relating the old law to the present bill. This proved to be an invaluable document for the Senate committee. The Tax Foundation meeting in November attracted 1,300 people. It too was highly successful.

I understand that a task force and other groups in the Department of National Revenue have been very active. I do not presume to answer Senator Flynn's question, but I know that bulletins have been published by the department from time to time on certain aspects of the tax legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest that a bulletin is something different from a form. A bulletin is for information, while a form is for direction.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That may be so. I do not presume to answer the question, as I do not know.

In addition, this tax reform bill has been discussed at a very high level—at a federal-provincial conference, at meetings of finance ministers, and at meetings of the first ministers.

When I was speaking to Senator Hayden's motion on September 14, I referred to the White Paper and I gave the minister credit for "daring" to listen as he did to our committee and to the House of Commons committee. From our experience yesterday afternoon, we can validly come to the conclusion that the minister certainly has dared to listen to the recommendations of our committee in respect to the bill itself.

We are all tremendously indebted to the chairman of the committee, Senator Salter Hayden. Here is a man who spent many long hours and days and weekends working at tax legislation, first on the White Paper and then on the bill itself. The concept he envisaged for our procedure on this measure, to give us a three-month opportunity to study the bill, was brilliant. Indeed, it sets a pattern for future activity for this chamber in complicated measures of this kind. The execution of the project, for our examination of this bill, has been of as high an order as the other work which Senator Hayden has performed for the committee and on behalf of the Senate. It could well be that his work over the past several years in connection with tax reform legislation in this country will be his masterpiece and his monument.

Honourable senators, we in Canada have been engaged in a discussion of tax reform for some ten years. We have had a royal commission, a White Paper, and now a tax reform bill. I suggest that there must be some finality to this long process, that a decision must be made and must be translated into action by a government which is elected to govern.

Some people say that this bill is too complicated, that they cannot understand it. I would ask those people how much of the existing tax law of Canada they understand at present. Most of us understand those sections of the tax law which affect us personally. If we happen to be advising in professional capacities, we understand, learn and, very often after a great deal of research, know what the problems are for the people we are advising.

In dealing with such a complicated measure as this, I suppose ultimately we all come to question, "What is the capacity of Parliament to deal with measures as voluminous and as difficult as the new tax act or any income tax act?" But are we going to say that Parliament cannot do it? Are we going to say that it is beyond the reach of Parliament to deal with a measure of this kind?

As far as this chamber is concerned, if we attack measures like this in the way the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has attacked this particular measure, then the way for Parliament to proceed in future is pretty well indicated by what we have done.

I still think the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is the best committee in Parliament.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, after listening to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) I am wondering what the purpose of his speech was. I assume it was a special plea.

[Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West).]

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, it was no special plea.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, yes, implicitly.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I assume it was a special plea for the Senate to pass this bill expeditiously, and without full discussion in the chamber.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I must ask Senator Grosart not to impute motives to me. I think the members of the Senate will take my word when I explain that I simply wanted to say that I have always been most impressed with the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: You have said that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In my view, that committee has done a magnificent job on tax reform generally, and particularly on this bill. It is up to the committee, and indeed up to the Senate, to point out the value and extent of the work that has been done.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is hardly a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If Senator Connolly objects to my assumption, I can only say that I am very sorry. I cannot change my assumption, because it is based on what I heard. It may be wrong, of course, and I concede him that. But I still say that was my assumption, particularly when the honourable senator said at the end of his remarks that the way to attack the problem is the way the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has attacked it. He said that that is the way to attack it in Parliament, and he made reference to the three-month study of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. If he was referring to that when he said that that is the way it should be handled in this chamber, then I am inclined to agree with him. But, as I say, I did not gather that to be the thrust of his remarks.

The perfect answer to such an assumption is to be found in this morning's Gazette in an editorial written by John Meyer, a name familiar to all honourable members of this house. That editorial puts the position that is before the Senate—and it is before the Senate because we have been given a calendar. The finest answer to the situation that confronts the Senate is to be found in this editorial, which reads:

> It's up to the Senate to stand firm on reform.
> The federal government used the guillotine again on Monday to chop off debate on the third reading of tax reform. Debate will end on Friday and the bill sent to the Senate which, apparently, is expected to rubber stamp it in time for the Christmas recess. The Senators, however, are bitterly resentful of this procedure—

And I would interject that I know some who are.

> —and may just possibly insist on amending the bill, sending it back to Commons where, again, use of the guillotine would be necessary to put it through.
> Another possibility is that Finance Minister Benson in return for quick action now may undertake to put through the Senate's amendments, or some of them, next year as part of the continuing process of working the legislation into shape.

I think that suggestion, made by Mr. Meyer before he knew what would happen yesterday, makes this comment entirely relevant because that is exactly what happened yesterday. Mr. Meyer's suggestion as to how we might answer it is found in the words with which he continues his editorial:

> It's to be hoped the Senate won't deal. Nothing would be lost to taxpayers by prolonging Senate debate and a great deal could be gained by retaining an open forum for discussion.
> The measures applying to corporate taxation are so questionable in so many aspects that, inevitably, clarification will become the function of officials in the Departments of Finance and Revenue to a degree that will usurp the function of Parliament unless, of course, that latter function is exercised by delaying passage. There has never been a greater need for the Senate as a chamber of sober, second thought.
> It has no lack of justification in the complexities of the bill itself and the cavalier indifference to its own views on the legislation.

Senator Connolly rightly praised the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, but as informed a commentator as Mr. Meyer says the Government's response to that work has been cavalier. The editorial goes on:

> The government is taking the position that the Opposition is being unnecessarily obstructionist, that it is standing in the way of passing on the benefits of tax reform to those in the low income brackets. This is nonsense. The bill could have been split between personal and corporate measures, putting through the former while holding over the latter for further study.
> The seeds of the government's difficulties with the bill were planted in Mr. Benson's determination to put through the whole package of reform by the beginning of this year. Mr. Benson, apparently, never has recognized how complex the reform measures were, both in their immediate application and in their implications. Either that or he is determined to put the bill through regardless of its faults.
> The time provided for debate, in any event, has been much too limited—particularly when the bill has been amended more or less continuously throughout and has, as Mr. Benson freely concedes, still to be amended after passage. Had he phased his approach to reform, took personal income first and then moved by degrees into corporate income, he would not have had to resort to the guillotine. And, of course, the legislation would be more workable.
> As it is, he violates his own guidelines of clarity, equity and acceptability. In the process he is riding roughshod over Parliament, the provinces and business institutions. The damage he is doing to his own party, in the extent to which his actions have eroded its credibility, is incalculable. It's an excessively high price to pay for ministerial ambition.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I am sorry that Senator Hayden is not here, because I should like to tell him how much I admire the work he has done on this committee. I should like to tell him how grateful we are for his obtaining a high-class staff who received no remuneration for their work with the committee. This is something we should always bear in mind.

I congratulate Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) on his reference to and explanation of the committee's report on the White Paper proposals for tax reform tabled in September 1970. He read to us the order of reference of September 14 last, from which it seems the committee could have studied the great differences between the recommendations in the report on the White Paper and what is provided in Bill C-259. The committee did not do that. Fortunately the subject matter of the bill was referred to the committee, and we now know, to a great extent, what is in the bill. However, the committee did not compare what is in the bill with what is suggested in the report as being good tax law.

Honourable senators, there are some great differences. I shall not deal with them at length but the committee recommended, for instance, that the capital gains tax be a special tax at half the going rate and, in any event, the rate should not exceed 25 per cent. As you know, capital gains, according to this bill, are considered as income, and taxed accordingly. I am not going to say that the committee's system is better than that devised by the Government, but surely if we are going to pass a law we should examine it carefully to see whether the Government is right.

Let us look at the mining industry. The committee examined the mining industry at length. It studied the laws of our friends to the south, and gave the subject a great deal of thought. Bill C-259 originally ignored unearned depletion completely, and so far as exploration is concerned provided that a mining company could get $1 of earned depletion for every $3 it spent. Then the two big corporations in Quebec told the Minister of Finance they were going to stop work the following day, and the bill was amended to allow mining and extractive industries to deduct 15 per cent of the tax they would otherwise pay to the federal Government, which means that their basic tax would be 35 per cent instead of 53 per cent. Since the mining industry has a tax base of about 32 per cent, it is not that bad, and if a company has a lot of earned depletion it may be quite good. But, it seems to me that we should examine this situation before we make a decision. After all, that is what we are here for.

The dividend tax credit has been mentioned. As honourable senators know, the dividend tax credit means that if you receive Canadian dividends you may deduct from your tax 20 per cent of the Canadian dividends. That is the maximum. What is proposed here? If you get so much in dividends, you gross up and you add an imaginary one-third, and then calculate the tax you would pay. But if you are to go by what Mr. Benson has put in here, from the tax you otherwise would pay you take off the one-third you added on first to get a tax base. I am looking at page 36 of the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation. If you get, for example, $300 in dividends you add on $100, and you have a total of $400 as your tax base, and then you deduct the $100 again at the end.

The new section 121 in Bill C-259 tells a totally different story. The marginal note is "Deduction in respect of taxable dividends", and the section reads as follows:

> 121. There may be deducted from the tax otherwise payable under this Part by an individual for a taxation year 4/5 of any amount that is, by paragraph 82(1)(b), required to be included in computing his income for the year.

There is a tremendous difference between taking off four-fifths, and taking off the 100 per cent and grossing up.

I hope I have made myself clear, but let me explain further. If you receive $3,000 in dividends and add $1,000 the total is $4,000, on which you calculate the tax, and then you deduct the amount you grossed up.

Hon. Mr. Lang: May I interject a remark here?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I was confounded by the apparent discrepancy between that section and the other points mentioned by my honourable colleague, but I have learned since that they are, in fact, consistent in that allowance is made for a provincial tax credit. In other words, the summary was published for those simpletons among us who are not sufficiently aware of the complexities of that piece of legislation. I believe the bill does, in fact, produce the same results.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: That brings me to the last point I want to deal with, the matter of co-operation with the provinces. Senator Lang has said that because of concessions from the provinces it can be deducted. But if you leave the provinces with no tax laws at all on that point, where do you stand? It is all very well to pass legislation on the basis that perhaps the provinces will do something, or perhaps they will not.

Some of us might be unlucky enough to die in the next few months. What position would our estates be in then? Gift tax is gone and estate tax is gone. We are starting off on matters in which the provinces have a tremendous say but, as far as I know, we have not got anywhere with the provinces. If you are looking after an estate, do you know where you stand? If you have to sell some securities at the beginning of the year for one reason or another, how do you choose? The regulations indicate that you are going to have to take your securities in one block, and state whether you are going to take cost or the valuation on valuation day.

The majority of people will not sell their securities unless they are required to, and then, all of a sudden, they are going to have to choose. If you have had your securities for a long time and are not aware of their cost you will have to take their valuation on valuation day. This will be terribly unfair to the person who buys Bell Telephone stock at $65 and discovers that on valuation day it is worth roughly $45, as it is today, and then six months later it is worth $50. He does not know what his cost is.

All these considerations need to be examined by knowledgeable people. The only way this can be accomplished is to have the concurrence of the provinces. Otherwise, I do not see where we are going. We have not had co-ordination with the provinces. This is serious business. I am not trying to play politics. I am merely trying to show that this is serious business which is upsetting to a great many people. It is difficult to advise people how to choose. I feel we should go over this bill again and iron out several points which I, at least, do not understand.

Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words to the Leader of the Government when he is here. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1971

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, for the second reading of Bill C-273, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1972.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has referred to our procedure in handling consideration of appropriation bills. The supplementary Estimates on which this bill is based have been before our Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. That committee has made its report, and Senator Langlois has commented on the report as well as on the bill.

It is worth pointing out, however, that there is considerable difference between the supplementary Estimates and the appropriation act which implements the spending intentions of the Government as expressed in the supplementary Estimates. The supplementary Estimates do not carry the enabling clauses, of which there are five in this bill. Perhaps it is worth calling your attention to them. The preamble to Bill C-273 concludes:

> —be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada—

We often hear, as we will no doubt hear again, either inside this place or outside it, that the Senate has no business dealing with tax bills or money bills. I merely point out that this bill requires that it be enacted by and with the consent of the Senate. This is our full authority to deal with the spending of public money and the levying of taxes.

Paragraph 1, entitled "Short title", reads:

> This act may be cited as the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1971.

Paragraph 2 shows an amount of nearly $674 million which Parliament is asked to approve as supplementary Estimates to the main Estimates and the appropriation bills which have already been passed. Senator Langlois has already commented on this in his excellent summary. But I would like to point out that this is not the total amount of additional spending that Parliament is faced with. There is an additional $198 million of statutory expenditures which brings the total from $673 million to $872 million. As the Blue Book on supplementaries indicates, this figure of $198 million does not have to be voted because it is already covered by existing statutes.

Paragraph 3, entitled "Purpose and effect of each item", deals with the control and authority to spend this money. It is a short paragraph and I would like to read it. I am going to suggest that Information Canada print this in large type and distribute it to the office of every minister, deputy minister, and associate minister in the Government of Canada. The paragraph reads:

> The amount authorized by this act to be paid or applied in respect of an item may be paid or applied only for the purposes and subject to any terms and conditions specified in the item, and the payment or application of any amount pursuant to the item has such operation and effect as may be stated or described therein.

The Auditor General and others have brought to our attention on numerous occasions that essential controls on spending have not been observed.

Subclause (2) of clause 3 is often overlooked in discussing appropriation bills. It reads:

> The provisions of each item in the schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1971.

The officials have indicated their reasons for preferring it this way. I feel we should be aware of the extraordinary procedure we are being asked to follow today—as well as on other occasions—to approve spending which may have taken place since April 1 of this year. This is in the supplementary Estimates.

I have not given notice to Senator Langlois, and I am not pressuring him for an answer today, but as the sponsor of the bill I would like him to inform us whether any of the money covered by Supplementary Estimates (A) has already been spent; I would assume that it has. It would be interesting to know whether we are being put in the position of voting to approve money which has been spent without the authority of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not only spent but committed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, spent or committed. I do not suggest that this is the situation, but if it is this should be disclosed when we are asked to vote on the matter. Retroactive legislation is bad enough at any time; it is far worse when its effect is to authorize the spending of money which had no prior authorization.

• (1510)

The last clause, clause 5, requires that these amounts when spent be accounted for in the Public Accounts in accordance with section 55 of the Financial Administration Act. The marginal note of section 55 reads, "Submission of Public Accounts to Parliament". It has not been the practice to submit the Public Accounts to Parliament. They have been submitted to and passed by the House of Commons only. It is true that the act itself is somewhat at variance with the marginal note, but I suggest, as I have done in the past, that in due course the Public Accounts should be submitted, when available, to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It makes very little sense to spend the time we do on the Estimates unless we are prepared to return at the end of the year and report in general to the Senate our satisfaction or otherwise as a committee on National Finance that the moneys, within reason, have been spent in accordance with the announced spending intentions of the Government.

Here again it may be said that Public Accounts are not normally the business of the Senate. Then we should change the name of our committee from National Finance. Surely any committee on National Finance has to be every bit as much concerned with the manner in which the money is spent as it is with the manner in which it is intended to be spent.

I commend Senator Langlois for the excellent summary he presented of the figures. Perhaps it should be brought to the attention of the Senate that although on the page headed "Supply, 1971-72" we read, "Total Estimates (to be Voted) tabled to date" are $8.9 billion—approximately $9 billion—we should not consider this to be the total spending of the Government for the year, even though the Appropriation Act No. 3 which we passed granted full supply. The $9 billion, of course, is only one part of the Government expenditures for the year. Others appear on the second page, "Estimates, 1971-1972" where Senator Langlois has added the statutory expenditures of $7.2 billion, to arrive at a total of $16.2 billion expenditures for the year.

I am sure that all honourable senators are interested in the answer given by Senator Langlois to my inquiry, that this represents an increase, year to year, of 6 per cent. That, I take it, was perfectly correct in the context of the figures with which he was dealing and which are normally considered. However, I remain perplexed at my difficulty in reconciling the Government's own figures as issued from time to time. The Treasury Board publication entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", contains, under the heading, "The Spending Program—Past, Present and Future", the spending program from 1964 to 1971-72. In this official statement by the Government I read that the spending program for 1971-72 is $14.3 billion. When I refer to the Supplementary Estimates (A), I find they start with the figure $15.3 billion, to which we add the $872 million of which I have spoken, making a total of $16.2 billion.

I repeat my previous observation that while there are explanations of these apparent superficial discrepancies, the time has come when the Government should make up its mind as to the nomenclature it will use when informing Parliament or the Canadian public of its spending program for the year. We have never had it in toto before this house so far in respect of years or at the time we are asked to approve expenditures. I therefore ask that the necessary steps be taken to present to Parliament and the public at one time and consistently throughout the year the exact total expenditures by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Before Senator Langlois closes the debate, I should like to add a few words in connection with the problem raised by Senator Grosart as to the power of the Senate to deal with money bills. This is appropriate in the prevailing special circumstances, and may be of relevance in the days to come.

I have just obtained the text of the British North America Act in order to refresh my memory. I wished to read all the provisions pertinent to the problem, but from what I have read so far, and if my memory serves me correctly, there is no doubt whatsoever that constitutionally the Senate has the power to deal with any money bill as it wishes. The only restriction contained in the Constitution—I do not know whether I should still refer to the BNA Act as the Constitution—with regard to money bills is in sections 53 and 54, which provide:

> 53. Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.
> 54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Therefore, the first restriction is that the bill must originate in the House of Commons. Secondly, it must be recommended by the Governor in Council. In view of this, the Senate is entirely free to dispose of any money bill received by it in any manner it sees fit provided it does not add to the tax imposed or the burden on the public purse. It may delete, vote against, or deal otherwise with such bills provided it does not—and I think this is the only limitation that exists—add to the burden on the public purse. I want this to be clear.

Although I do not object or care very much, I have always wondered when royal assent is given to an appropriation bill—and this occurs only in respect of an appropriation bill, and not any other bill which imposes some burden on the public treasury—why the Speaker of the House of Commons presents the bill with a green ribbon. I do not think the practice is based on any section of the BNA Act. It may represent pride on the part of the Commons. It may be a logical procedure, or it may be based on tradition. I do not object if they wish the practice to continue, but I would be very surprised if anyone were to find justification for it in the BNA Act.

As far as I am concerned, we are entirely free, within the limits I have indicated, to deal with any money bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And to amend it.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Does Senator Flynn know of any occasion on which the Senate exercised its right in this respect? I have been here a long time, and while I have heard excellent speeches on such bills I do not recall any occasion when this house altered any such bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do I understand that the honourable senator is asking me whether I recall an amendment of a money bill by the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Smith: Appropriation bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The point is well taken by Senator Smith who interjected "appropriation bill." The term "money bill" includes an appropriation bill, but an appropriation bill does not embody a money bill. Senator Burchill may remember the famous "class and kind" bill which was amended by the Senate some years ago. Discretion was given to the minister concerned in deciding whether a certain class or kind of goods was or was not subject to tax. That was a money bill that was amended by the Senate. But I do not recall an appropriation bill being amended.

However, the fact that the Senate has never exercised its discretion does not mean it could not do so. Constitutional authorities are unanimous in saying that this house could vote against an appropriation bill. The consequences of such action would be another matter. In such a situation the Government would probably call an election and let the public decide whether the Senate was right or wrong, and most likely public opinion would be that the Senate was wrong in voting against what was purely an appropriation bill. That also is another matter.

I doubt very much whether the situation would be the same if, for instance, we were to vote against an item contained in an appropriation bill after having studied the Estimates and reached the conclusion that there was waste involved, and that it was wrong to appropriate money for that particular purpose. If the Senate were to decrease the amount of an appropriation bill, having decided that the original figure represented waste and a bad administrative decision, its action would probably meet with similar reaction from the public.

I am speaking now of principle. Senator Burchill introduced the problem of practice, precedent, and tradition, but that is something else. As far as I know there has been no decision of either the Supreme Court or the Privy Council which contradicts the position I am now taking.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise at this time merely to make a correction to two replies that I gave last night to questions raised by Senator Grosart.

Senator Grosart asked me to relate the total spending intention of the Government of $16.2 billion to the equivalent figure for last year. I replied to the effect that the total Estimates tabled to date were $16,212,940,921, an increase of 6 per cent over the original main Estimates for 1970-71. I wish to correct my reply by saying that the Estimates tabled to date total $16,212,940,921, an increase of 18 per cent over the original main Estimates for 1970-71. The total of the main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1971-72, represents an increase of $1.8 million, or 12.5 per cent, over the total of the Main Estimates plus Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) for 1970-71.

In fairness to my honourable colleague I felt that I should make that correction at this time.

Senator Grosart also asked what would be the balance of revenue and anticipated expenditure at the end of the fiscal year; in other words, would there be a deficit, and, if so, how much? My reply is that the Minister of Finance stated on October 14 last that changes had taken place since his June budget which implied a budgetary deficit in the fiscal year 1971-72 of $1 billion resulting from anticipated revenues of $13.58 billion and expenditures of $14.58 billion.

The budgetary Estimates tabled to date total $14.912 billion. As the honourable senator is no doubt aware, the actual expenditures will be less due to under-expenditures or lapses.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Keep something for tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 9, the adjourned debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty in Canada, tabled in the Senate on Wednesday, 10th November, 1971.

Hon. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, my first words must be to express regret that after the lively discussion we have had here this afternoon you must now descend with me into dullness. However, I must say that if there be one subject on earth about which I can speak with some authority gained from first hand experience, it is the subject of poverty.

Next, I should express my appreciation, as I am sure it is the appreciation of all in this house, for the dedication of those who were members of the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty in Canada. I know, especially at my age, that it is not easy to travel all over this country. I had the most heartfelt sympathy for Senator Croll when he was in the throes of writing this report. I had that sympathy because I had that experience myself when I was chairman of a royal commission.

What I will be saying here today is not on behalf of any party. I do not speak for those on this side of the house; I do not speak for any group or organization whatsoever. My thoughts, scattered perhaps as they shall be, are my own.

I came originally from one of the most impoverished regions of this land today, the region of Gaspé. I was born and reared in Gaspé, and I want to say to Senator Croll that I am very much afraid that, if I had been promised as a boy in Gaspé a guaranteed annual income in the future, I still would be in Gaspé in that ghetto of poverty.

As I look at the empty seat of the Leader of the Government in this house, whose past I know very well, I think I would say to him if he was here that if he, during his boyhood days when he was struggling for university education, had been promised a guaranteed annual income, he might not have attained the position of eminence in this country which he occupies today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: These are things which I feel must be said. I know nothing of the financial aspect of this guaranteed annual income, but I hear competent people saying that the country cannot afford it. I do not know. What I do know is that the morale of our people and the worth and human dignity of our people cannot afford a guaranteed annual income.

You may think I am old fashioned; you may think I am one of those people of whom it is sometimes said that they do not want anything to be done for the first time. Well, frankly, I do not want the guaranteed annual income to come for the first time. I am too old to join in the pessimism of many of our youth, but having lived in the shadow of Parliament now for perhaps too many years, I am suspicious and afraid of the state. I am afraid of the planned state. I am afraid of a nation dominated by big government, big business, and big unions. I am afraid of a state dominated by the industrialists and the scientists, supported by bureaucrats, with the concept of liberty constantly being eroded to the concept of state control.

We used to call this land the land of opportunity. We almost paraphrased Lincoln's famous phrase about the last best hope on earth. But today, because of our record over the past 35 years, we see young men trying to avoid the adventurous life. We see young men craving for the unadventured life, and we see young men at the age of 20 hoping for security from the state at the age of 60. I do believe that this is doing something to the morale of our people.

We used to call this one of the great last lands of opportunity. We used to go to Europe and say, "Come to our horizons of hope; come and take advantage of the opportunity we will give you." What do we tell them now? We tell them to come to our country and we will guarantee them an annual income. We say, "Come to our country and we will give you social security. We will give you this and give you that, and we will give you in the end a guaranteed annual income."

That is not the spirit in which Canada was born. That was not the spirit of the pioneers who came to this land and settled it, and, God knows, that was not the spirit of the men who, with sword and crucifix in hand, went into the wilderness and left their names and often their bones in what was then a land of savages.

These were our ancestors; these men left us a heritage and a spirit, and that spirit is being eroded year after year by this concept and that concept, most of which had their origin in Marxist socialist thought.

I am not one of those who refuse to listen to the arguments or the importunities of people, but there are certain basic facts in life which are true today, will be true tomorrow, and will be true to the last syllable of time. When the young men of this land lose their initiative, their ambitions, and their sense of dignity, then I say that that is the stuff of decay, that is the stuff of defeat, and all of us, whether we call ourselves Liberals or Conservatives or anything else, who live in this land, who know its past, and who are proud of the heritage that has been left to all of us, should resist this thing, and I will resist such policies to the last breath of my life.

I must say to Senator Croll, having read his report, that had he not achieved distinction in politics he would certainly have received distinction as a "pamphleteer," because this is a pamphlet on poverty. It is not a report; it is a story about poverty.

I do not like to make invidious comparisons. I listened to most of the speeches, and those I did not hear I read. I am bound to say that the speech which seemed to me to come closest to the root of poverty was that of Senator McGrand. I say this because he talked about conditions which also existed in my native Gaspé. I witnessed such things as a boy and I have seen them there since.

• (1540)

When I was a young man in Gaspé we had 100-acre farms. We tilled those farms and grew our vegetables. We raised our cattle and our sheep. We sheared the sheep in the spring, and put the wool out on the snow to bleach. Then we brought it in, carded it, spun it, and finally took it to a loom and turned out the homespun that we wore.

I hear people talking about how much tourism has brought to Gaspé. I say to my friend Senator Langlois, who must know something about this, that in many respects tourism has been more of a curse than a cure for Gaspé. Why? The young men worked on their fathers' farms 75 and 80 years ago when I was there, and loved those farms. Now the young men have deserted the farms. In the summer they work for two months, in July and August, catering to tourists, and when that is over they go back on government relief of some sort or another. The farms I knew as a boy are now deserted. The Irish Town Road, which I knew, is now a scene of desolation; the old homes are boarded up and the farms submerged in switchgrass. That is what has come about because of this infernal thinking that, "After all, let the worst come to the worst, the state will look after me." My friend Senator Langlois knows that has happened around Gaspé.

I know that the tourist industry has brought something for people who run hotels, motels or something like that. But it has brought nothing to the majority of the people, nothing for the farms I knew. Those farms are now deserted.

Senator McGrand spoke of what was being done in the Scandinavian countries, in Belgium, Holland, and so on. I have seen these things myself. He said, rightly, that an effort should be made to do the same thing for the Gaspé and other regions of Canada. I think—and I do not say this with partisan bitterness—that this sort of treatment for Gaspé, for northern New Brunswick, which I know as well as Gaspé, would be far better and far more productive than what is called regional development, always with the awful risk that regional development will in the end turn out to be constituency development. Some day I will get up in the Senate and speak about that.

I believe this Government, this Parliament, and this country should send a committee, a deputation, a delegation, call it what you will, comprised of knowledgeable people, to Scandinavia, Belgium and Holland to see what is being done with, for example, what Senator McGrand called tree-farming. We have forestry experts in this country; the University of New Brunswick has been famed for it. Let these people go to Europe to see what has been done there, then come back and tell us if we can do the same thing in certain regions of our country, such as the northern shore of New Brunswick and the Gaspé Peninsula. I believe this is possible. For heaven's sake let us get away from this new philosophy or theory in Canada that the state will take care of us in the end no matter what may come.

I am not criticizing the sincerity of men like Senator Croll and those who served on the committee, often at great inconvenience to themselves. It was a good committee in its way, but I do not think the approach is right.

I have often said in this chamber that if I had my way I would dot the country with libraries, in every village and hamlet. I say that because I think it would be the best approach to education. Speaking of education, I think the present approach is wrong. We have confused, and we are confusing, technical training with true education. Although we need technical training in a world like this, although we need technology and science, they are not education. Education is not something to make a man a lawyer, a doctor, an engineer or a priest. It is something to make him a man. If we forget that, we forget what true education is about. In this country we are forgetting the simple truth that there is no sense pasting wings on a man unless you can give him a winged nature.

We are forgetting that the true worth and value of education is not to give a man a standard of living, but is to give him a standard of life. That is what education is about. We have built these enormous schools all over the country; we have dotted the land with schools, with their huge auditoriums, their campuses, and so on, to train men, not to educate them. This is something the country will have to take in hand. I know the provinces have to control education, but the spirit of true education should be inculcated into our people, into our young people, into our high schools. They should be told and taught there that training is not education. They should be told more about the history of government of the country. What they get there now is no history after the French Revolution. This is pitiful.

I speak with some feeling on this. I am not in this chamber because of the formal education I received. I left school at the age of eight. I never went to high school. But God was good to me in that I knew an old bishop in Gaspé, Bishop Bossé, whom many senators will remember. His sister lived on an adjoining farm to ours; he learned from his sister that I loved books, so he sent me his books. He was a remarkable man. He sent me biography, history, poetry and novels. He once even sent me the sermons of that famous Baptist devine, De Witt Chalmers. I wonder how many Baptists in this chamber know the works of De Witt Chalmers. Yet a Roman Catholic Archbishop sent a Roman Catholic boy the speeches of De Witt Chalmers.

When I read these books, I read them by candlelight because we had not yet reached the kerosene stage. I read them by the light of candles made in our own home. I read them late at night with the winter wind howling outside. What did they do for me? They made me think that I must explore that outer world. I got to know about that world which is far, far beyond the Gaspé coast. It also made me know that I had to work to get to that outer world. I worked in a lumber mill at the age of twelve. I went to sea at the age of fourteen and remained two years at sea. I came ashore in Saint John, New Brunswick, and worked in the Saint John's iron works, in the Pinder nail works, in a brewery; I worked in a hardware shop. I went up to Richibucto, a little windswept village on the Northumberland Strait and worked in a store. Finally I got a job as a reporter, which I am sure has been a bad thing for journalism, but at least it saved my spirit and my soul. I have never thought of the state looking after me, never; I never thought of it, I expect, until I guiltily entered this chamber in this Senate.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, these are things I feel deeply. When I think of poverty, which I know so well, and the boys who went to school with me, I cannot think of one of them now who is not very very close to the state of poverty. This is because they stayed in Gaspé, because they did not work at anything else. I do not blame them for not looking for more. We had never thought, there, of getting things from the Government. As a matter of fact, when I was there they were mostly Conservatives, and the Liberals were always in power, so the Government would not give us anything, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Times have changed.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: They have changed all right. Even in Irish Town they gave my friend Senator Langlois an election once.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Times have changed for you too.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I know that a lot of good, hard work and dedication went into this report; but, if adopted, it will not eradicate poverty. A guaranteed annual income will paper over poverty. Actually, it will subsidize and entrench poverty, and so I am against it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, since the attention of the Senate has been drawn to the absence of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) from the house this afternoon, I wish to inform you that he is in Pembroke, visiting his sister who is very ill. I am sure I speak for all honourable senators when I express our best wishes for her speedy and complete recovery.

If no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate at this time, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois debate adjourned.

TAX REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF PRELIMINARY REPORT NO. 2 OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM LEGISLATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 8, the debate on the consideration of Preliminary Report No. 2 of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 30th November, 1971.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, there is no reason why this order should continue to remain on our Order Paper since, in the consideration of the final report, we can deal with the first and second reports. Therefore, I suggest that this item be dropped.

Before doing so, I should like to draw attention to one point. When he was dealing with the remarks which I made yesterday, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) suggested that I was wrong in describing the limits of the work of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-259 because of the wide terms of reference in the resolution we adopted.

Technically speaking, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) may have been right. However, if you refer to the debate which took place at that time, it is obvious that we were not going to deal with matters of policy. Senator Beaubien was quite clear on that point. He said that when the committee considered Bill C-259 it did not consider the problem of capital gains tax. This is one very important matter. We stuck with the technical problems.

I think it would be wrong to assume that when the bill comes to the Senate the only question facing us will be whether the recommendations of the committee, as contained in the three reports, will be implemented eventually. The debate cannot be limited to that, it is much wider and it would be totally unfair and unjust to take such an attitude.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this order is now considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Frederick William Rowe, Esquire, has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. Frederick William Rowe, of St. John's, Newfoundland, introduced between Hon. Mr. Martin and Hon. Mr. Basha.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

BUDGET OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I desire to table the committee's report approving the budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with regard to its examination of the parole system in Canada.

SENATE ACCOUNTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration presents its third report as follows:

Your committee recommend that pursuant to subsection (1) of section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, the following expenses shall be paid to Members of the Senate:

(a) (i) Subject to paragraph (v), such expenses incurred by members of the Senate in travelling one return trip each week between their place of residence and Ottawa by common carrier not in excess of the cost of air transportation economy fares (or first class in exceptional circumstances), which are supported by receipted vouchers, plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick up point and airport, in Ottawa and in their place of residence; or

(ii) Such expenses incurred by members of the Senate in travelling one return trip each week between their place of residence and Ottawa by motor vehicle not in excess of the cost of air transportation economy fares or sixteen cents per mile, whichever shall be the less;

(iii) Such expenses incurred by members of the Senate in travelling 10 return trips in each period of twelve consecutive months to any place in Canada from Ottawa or from their place of residence by common carrier not in excess of the cost of air transportation economy fares (or first class in exceptional circumstances) which are supported by receipted vouchers, plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick up point and airport, in Ottawa, their place of residence or in the place in Canada as the case may be;

(iv) Such expenses incurred by members of the Senate for their spouses to travel six return trips in each period of twelve consecutive months by common carrier not in excess of the cost of air transportation economy fares (or first class in exceptional circumstances) which are supported by receipted vouchers, between their place of residence and Ottawa plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick up point and airport, in Ottawa and in their place of residence; and

(v) The trips set out in paragraph (iii) and (iv) shall not be in addition to the trips for the member of the Senate provided for in paragraph (i) but each trip undertaken under paragraph (iii) and each trip undertaken under paragraph (iv) shall be considered a weekly return trip provided for the member of the Senate under paragraph (i).

The expenses set out herein are to replace those set out in paragraph (a) of the report of this committee adopted by the Senate on June 26, 1970.

These expenses shall take effect on the adoption of this report by the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Smith moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1971

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-273, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1972.

He said: Honourable senators, before this motion is voted on, I would like to attempt to answer two questions put to me yesterday by the honourable Senator Grosart. His first question was:

> Has any of the money covered by Supplementary Estimates (A) been spent or committed already?

It is very likely that departments have used some of the funds that were authorized earlier this year, to finance some of the $80 million in Federal Labour Incentive Projects. All these projects fall within existing program authority. Also, as the supplementary Estimates indicate, some of the grants have already been financed by allocations from the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote.

Senator Grosart's second question was:

> Should the public accounts, when available, not be submitted to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Of course, such a question of referral to a committee is a matter to be decided upon by the Senate and the committee itself, and I leave it to these proper authorities to answer that in a definite way.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TAX REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the Final Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I take it for granted that we will receive Bill C-259 around four o'clock Friday afternoon. By receiving this bill so late, the Senate is placed in a very difficult position. If we hurry it through, we look as though we are not giving it any thought; if we refer it to a committee and give it enough time for proper consideration, we will find that next week we will be down to a corporal's guard and we are bound to look ridiculous.

We should feel very upset about this situation, because a tremendous effort has already been made by the Senate in dealing with tax reform legislation, particularly by those senators who have faithfully followed this whole question in and out of the committee meetings over the last few years. I must say that if certain senators are not here next week, I could not blame them. Incidentally, there is no conflict of interest in my case; I am going to be here. I am not arguing because I want to be away, but I say that honourable senators should be able to make plans ahead. If they are going to be away from here at Christmas time it should not be held against them.

The tax reform bill is the most important piece of legislation to come before this house in a great many years, and yet a host of the most knowledgeable senators will be away when it is being dealt with, if we proceed next week. If you want to count heads, you will see that I am correct. I do not think it is right.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

If it is true that the Leader of Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) represents the Government in the Senate, it is also true that he represents the Senate in the cabinet, and in my opinion the Leader of the Government in the Senate should have known a month ago that the Senate would not be in a position to deal with this important bill in a dignified and sensible way should it come to us in Christmas week. After all, the leader owes something to the Senate. He could have taken the trouble to say to his colleagues in the cabinet, "Now, look, you have had this bill since June. If the Senate does not get it by December 8 it will not deal with it until the beginning of the new year."

They have had this bill since June. It is simply not right for them to decide all of a sudden, in order to meet their own convenience because they want to go home, to send it to us on the Friday night before Christmas and expect us to take it and lump it. The Senate is its own master. If the Leader of the Government does not think of the welfare of the Senate, then I know he is going to have a lot of trouble here. I feel very strongly on the subject and I think that all of us should. Get a list of the senators who will be absent next week and then you will realize that we are going to have only a corporal's guard here.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few observations with respect to the motion before us, particularly with regard to the implications which attach to it by reason of the circumstances just referred to by Senator Beaubien.

We are all aware that within the next few days we must render our decision with respect to two important matters. First, we must give our judgment on the new tax bill which, finally, will be submitted to us on Friday of this week; secondly, we must decide what our proper stand should be in the light of the untenable position in which we have been placed by the disregard for our responsibilities demonstrated by the Government and the House of Commons.

With respect to the bill itself I should like to make three observations. First, it is inaccurate and misleading to suggest that we can give a bill of this magnitude and importance the thorough examination it requires in the time remaining between now and January 1 of next year. Surely, a minimum of three weeks would be necessary for any really meaningful analysis to be made of its provisions.

I am well aware of the detailed and excellent work which has been done by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Obviously, that committee is deserving of the highest commendation. It is not inaccurate to say that in that committee the tax bill has received more detailed and objective analysis than it has received in any other committee associated with Parliament. The fact the Government has seen fit to accept a substantial number of the amendments proposed by the Senate committee speaks well for the calibre of the work done. So I do not want to be unfair and leave the impression that the Senate is totally unfamiliar with the bill we are discussing. But I am speaking of the constitutional responsibility that rests not just with the committee but with the Senate as a whole. I submit that we cannot lightly slough off the responsibility that rests on each of us as a member of this house on the grounds that a committee of the house has given detailed study to a bill of this nature. So, honourable senators, my first observation is that, notwithstanding the work done in the committee, it is utterly impossible for us to discharge our responsibility with respect to this bill by the end of the present year. If it is to be enacted into law, we should make it clear to the Canadian people that this important piece of legislation did not receive the meaningful endorsation of this assembly. It may receive what can only be called a ceremonial consent, but certainly it is not possible for it to receive the meaningful endorsation of this house, not because the bill is necessarily bad law, and not because we desire to prevent its passage, but simply because we have been denied the opportunity to give it the critical analysis and serious second thought which it is our right and responsibility to give.

My second observation with respect to the bill is that the principle of enacting into law legislation of this importance, while it is admittedly still far from satisfactory both from the standpoint of contents and draftsmanship, is fundamentally unsound. When closure was invoked in the House of Commons to force its passage there were still a significant number of important recommendations for its improvement which had not been considered. The same is true of a number of very desirable amendments recommended by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of this house. The Government itself acknowledges that substantial amendments will be necessary, perhaps as early as the next session, but it still insists on forcing the bill into law prior to such amendments being made. Such actions violate the basic principle of sound and proper parliamentary procedure. This is something the Canadian people have a right to know about and to protest against. We have an obligation to protest on their behalf.

My third observation is that the experience this country has gained in the last number of years surely has proven that sweeping changes in the entire tax structure enacted at one time is not the best way to implement tax reform. I suppose we have to chalk this costly lesson up to experience. To be fair it must be said that when a general review of Canada's tax structure was first proposed, it was regarded as a sound idea. It was so regarded not only by Parliament but by most of the provinces. I know it was so regarded in my own province and by the government which I was privileged to lead provincially at that time. It seemed a logical thing to have a responsible commission make a thorough assessment of the whole complicated tax structure and produce a new model that would correct deficiencies and iron out inequities and which would represent a significant step forward in tax legislation on this continent. So we went through the whole process of the Carter Commission, the White Paper, the reports of parliamentary committees on the White Paper, and finally the long parliamentary process which brought us to where we are at the present time. During that long and rather painful process it has become clear that the disruptive impact of so many major changes in the tax system being made at one time is too great, especially at a time when the national economy is under many severe strains.

When it became evident that the consequences of pursuing this course were going to still further complicate the national economic and financial problems, it would have been wise to change course and develop a less disruptive alternative. My own conclusion in the light of what has been learned during this period is that the best way to bring about tax reform is step by step, resolving one problem at a time, rather than sweeping changes all made at one time which has resulted in the disruption and uncertainty prevailing in this country today.

May I add a brief comment on just one of the provisions of the bill itself. I refer to the proposed capital gains tax. This is an area where a contradictory situation exists within the Government's own policy position. The Government of Canada in the last few years has expressed strong nationalistic sentiments. These sentiments have been echoed in the mass media and by organizations and individuals across this country.

A great deal of concern has been expressed about the importance of Canadian ownership and Canadian control of our resources, industries, and commercial enterprises. This matter of Canadian ownership is closely related to the availability of adequate Canadian investment capital, because the way Canadians acquire ownership and control of industries is by investing enough of their own money in those industries to enable them to exercise effective control.

Income accruing from capital gains to a very large extent finds its way back into the investment field. This represents one of the big reservoirs of investment capital in this country. The steeply graduated personal income tax seriously restricts the amount of savings an individual can accumulate from ordinary earned income, so that is not a source from which there is a large volume of investment capital available. Up until now income which accrued from capital gains to a large extent found its way back into the investment field, which surely was accomplishing the very thing the Government and many of the people of Canada say is so essential today, namely, giving the individual citizen a greater financial equity in the industries and commercial ventures of this country.

Having said that, I want to be fair and acknowledge that there is a valid argument to be made for a capital gains tax. Consider the status of two citizens, one having, say, a $25,000 a year income from a salary and another acquiring $25,000 a year from capital gains through investment on the stock market. It is very hard to explain why the one man should be subject to a steeply graduated personal income tax, whereas the other is entirely exempt because his income was by way of capital gains.

While my own view is that it is premature in Canada to have a tax of this kind, and I think we are working against our national interests in imposing a capital gains tax this early in our national development, nevertheless, accepting the proposition that there is a widespread public acceptance of the concept of the capital gains tax, I submit that a far better formula would be a flat rate capital gains tax rather than putting 50 per cent of the capital gains into the category of personal income, where it then becomes subject to the steeply graduated personal income tax. The graduated personal income tax on any significant amount of income takes such a large bite that there is little left for investment in Canadian business. If we really want Canadian citizens to invest in, own and control Canadian businesses, a graduated capital gains tax—which is what this amounts to by virtue of being put into the personal income tax bracket—is perhaps the worst formula that we could adopt.

May I turn for a few moments to the matter of the second decision facing this house, that we must make with respect to the position in which the Senate is placed by the disregard for our constitutional responsibilities by the Government and the other place. The facts as I assess them are these. The Government, prior to the introduction of the new tax bill before the summer recess, announced that the bill would become law before January 1, 1972. Notwithstanding this decision, the Government, in developing its timetable for the passage of the bill, ignored the obvious fact that the Senate should be accorded a minimum of three or four weeks to give the bill meaningful consideration and recommend to the other place such amendments as it deemed necessary. Further time would, of course, then be required by the other place to deal with such amendments.

The appropriate procedure surely would have been for the Government to accept as the first premise for its timetable that the bill would need to reach the Senate not later than December 1 if it was to become law by January 1. They could then have worked back from the December 1 deadline in alloting time for debate and for committee study in the other place.

I know it is argued that adherence to such a timetable is not within the Government's power to control. But, honourable senators, the Government in its judgment exercised closure to terminate the debate in the other place at the time they deemed appropriate. Surely there would have been no significant difference if the whole procedure had been pushed forward three weeks and closure had been invoked three weeks earlier. They would have had the same length of time for debate, but the responsibilities and the constitutional rights of this chamber would have been respected and the bill would have come to us in time for us to give it some meaningful consideration.

I do not want to give the impression that in my view the Government was wholly to blame for the long delay in dealing with this legislation in the other place. It is fair to say that much time was taken up by members of the Opposition in endless repetition, which did not contribute to any meaningful assessment of the merits of the legislation nor did it influence the final decision that was made. In logical argument you state your premise and then build your argument but you do not add anything by a whole succession of people repeating the same thing over and over again. I agree with those who say that that type of conduct is making a mockery out of Parliament in the eyes of a great many people. Many of the repetitious and procedural wranglings in the other place could only be regarded as being politically motivated.

But, honourable senators, in the last analysis the majority rules. That is the basis on which our parliamentary system is built. The Government holds the majority, so it must assume the responsibility that goes with it. The fact remains that no apparent consideration was given to the Senate's role and responsibility under the Constitution, and we are now asked to deal in a few days with a complicated bill, and certainly one of the most important bills to be enacted in recent parliamentary history.

The only possible conclusion is that the Government and the House of Commons did not attach any real importance to the Senate's constitutional role in the parliamentary process of enacting into law this important legislation. Such a position is an affront to the constitutional rights of this house and to the responsibility which rests on each and every one of its members. It is tantamount to an affirmation that the Senate is regarded as only a ceremonial rubber stamp for the legislation passed by members of the other place.

I for one am not prepared to accept that position. Either the Senate has a meaningful constitutional role in the enactment of legislation or it has not. I submit that the time has come to find out which is the fact. I am not suggesting for a moment that this house of appointed members should have the right to prevent the passage of legislation approved by the people's elected representatives. That is an important point for us, as senators, to keep in mind.

In a democratic society, those whom the citizens elect to represent them must have the undisputed right to enact such laws as they believe are in the interests of those who elect them to legislate on their behalf. But the appointed members of this chamber do have the constitutional right and responsibility to give such legislation the serious second thought that all important bills should receive before being enacted into law. If that right and responsibility is not going to be respected by the Government and the House of Commons, I submit they should move to abolish the Senate altogether.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the answer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What are you applauding?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Because he was replying to you.

Hon. Mr. Manning: They should stop playing games at the expense of the public. I repeat it is not the proper role of the Senate to thwart or set aside the decisions of the people's elected representatives. We must respect their prerogative in that regard. That is not my point at all. It is simply the fact that, by a procedure, we have been manoeuvered into a position where our constitutional right and responsibility has been rendered inoperative.

We are not intended to be a house of obstruction, but we do have a constitutional duty and responsibility to discharge. I submit that we must insist that we not be thwarted in carrying out that responsibility to the Canadian people. Under the present circumstances there are perhaps only two responsible things we can do. We can make clear that our assent to this legislation in this case is a mere ceremonial formality, given under protest against the flagrant disregard of our constitutional rights.

Secondly, I do feel we must take positive steps to restructure the rules of procedure relating to the passage of bills in this house to make it impossible in the future for a comparable situation to occur again.

It is not outside our province to determine rules for this house with respect to various categories of legislation which will provide a minimum time for meaningful study to enable honourable members of this house to give such legislation the serious second thought which it is their responsibility to give.

The other house should then be officially advised of our new rules of procedure relating to important bills in their passage through this house, so that the other place will know the minimum time requirements of each category of legislation to be dealt with by the honourable members of the Senate.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as a neophyte in this chamber I must say that I am a little startled by some of the points that I have heard put forward from the benches opposite this afternoon, and at one or two of the other sittings.

I did not accept the summons to the Senate in order to become a rubber stamp. I am sure all honourable senators feel as I do. I agree wholeheartedly with Senator O'Leary, who very vehemently indicated our responsibility as senators. However, I am here as a senator who is also prepared to work in the interests of the people of Canada. I am here to give my time and energy to the consideration, amending, and passage of legislation in the interests of the country.

We shall have before us on Friday Bill C-259. We have heard Senator Manning indicate that there are two responsible actions that we may take. The first is to pass the bill, and tell the public that we have not had time to look at it and that we have been ignored completely by the other place. The second is to change our rules.

I suggest there is a third responsible action we can take. We have a responsibility to the people of Canada to pass legislation which has already been discussed at length in the House of Commons. I refer to statements appearing in Hansard of the other place to the effect that this bill has been discussed in principle and amended to the extent possible in the circumstances. Therefore, the third action which I suggest we can take is that of rolling up our sleeves and starting to work. I am not one of those who believe we have not the time, although I agree with Senator O'Leary that if, by any chance, there is not sufficient time the debate can be adjourned to the new year. I point out that we have ten working days, allowing for some time off for Christmas.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you serious?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: We do have time. It is possible for us to change the rules so that we can start at 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning, and continue in the afternoon and evening. That is the kind of thing that those who are prepared to be responsible members of this chamber would do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Joker.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Let us look at the bill; let us discuss it, and give it, the time and consideration which, as Senator Manning has said, is absolutely essential. If we cannot do that in the time that is envisaged, that is fine. However, I suggest that we owe it to the nearly one million taxpayers of Canada who will be relieved of paying income tax.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is wrong; that is wrong.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Laissez le sénateur faire son discours.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the honourable senator a question. Is he aware that even if this bill is not passed until the 10th, 15th, or 30th of January, it could still be made retroactive to the 1st of January?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Only with regard to certain taxes.

• (1450)

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I am well aware of that, but in that event a bureaucratic, administrative nightmare will be created that I suggest would cause the dismay of millions of taxpayers, and disrupt the policy programs of many large companies.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The same thing happened three years ago.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I suggest that it is better to do it now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It happened three years ago.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Please allow the honourable senator to speak. Do not keep interrupting him.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If he wishes to give us lessons, he should know what he is talking about.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I suggest that I do know what I am talking about.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I remind honourable senators that when one honourable senator has the floor any other honourable senator may rise in his place on a question of privilege, or on a point of order, or to put a question which, of course, the honourable senator who has the floor may decline to answer, or he may answer at the end of his remarks.

I realize all honourable senators like to have a lively debate, especially when such an important matter as the tax reform legislation is the subject, but I also suggest that if we proceed strictly under the Rules it will be easier for the Chair to make for a more satisfactory debate all round, especially for the honourable Senator Buckwold who has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I wish to make it quite clear that I am well aware that it will not be the end of the world if the final decision on this legislation is delayed until after the new year. I do suggest that it would be very difficult for a great many people. I also want to make it quite clear in what I am saying that we must not abrogate the rights of this Senate to a careful perusal and study of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: We must not do that. If it takes us longer than the period of time we have left to us, well and good. Let us go past the end of the calendar year. I agree with that. But I also suggest that, if we really want to roll up our sleeves, this work can be done in the interests of the people of Canada. That is the responsibility I feel I and every member of the Senate have, but perhaps I feel that way because I am a new member.

Nevertheless, I hope that when the rules are made for this particular debate we will adjust our sittings to the point which will enable us to spend many hours each day working hard in the interests of the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is an indication of complete naïvety.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the excellent speeches made by those who urge that we do not deal with Bill C-259 before the end of the year, and despite Senator Flynn's motion of which he has given notice, I have come to the conclusion that upon balance no useful purpose will be served by the Senate's not dealing with this bill now or by adjourning until January 10.

In my opinion it was never a practical proposition that the Senate would reject in toto any bill which had the purpose of reforming our income tax system and which was passed by the other place. On the other hand, it is, of course, a very practical and responsible proposition that the Senate might well make amendments to such a bill.

The only real question now confronting us is whether the present turn of events has deprived us of the opportunity of making what we consider to be worthwhile amendments. It is a good thing to make the law certain so far as it is possible. The Government feels this so strongly that it has now moved closure in order to have the bill passed before January 1, 1972. If, therefore, the bill is to become law by January 1, we will, indeed, have lost our opportunity to make any amendments now. But I suggest to you that the opportunity is only lost at this time.

When the minister appeared before our Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on December 13, he spoke in part as follows:

> Now I would like to indicate the appreciation of the Government and, indeed, of myself for the work done from the beginning by this Senate committee on the tax legislation. Relating the reports produced by the committee with respect to the White Paper on Taxation to the budget of June 18, if I recall correctly, some 44 recommendations of the Senate committee were adopted in Bill C-259. Since debate on the bill commenced in the House of Commons this fall, the Senate has been considering the subject matter and has so far made two reports. We have studied these very carefully, and have made certain amendments in the House of Commons. I think of such amendments as those with respect to credit unions and co-operatives, as well as a great many other technical amendments, as being in conformity with the suggestions of this committee. I would like to repeat that your recommendations have been very helpful and will be the subject of our continuing study. An amending bill will be introduced next spring as, indeed, there always is an amending bill to a taxation statute. There has been one every year since 1918, when income tax was first imposed in Canada.

It is clear, therefore, that the Senate will have the required opportunity in due course to make any amendments it thinks wise and necessary. It is also clear that the Government has given careful and serious consideration to the Senate's report on the White Paper and is also giving consideration to the Senate's reports on Bill C-259. Therefore, there is every reason to believe that any future amendments will also receive the same consideration.

Now, surely, the purpose of putting forth amendments is to have them adopted or accepted. If the Senate insists on debating this bill now and upon making amendments, there is very little hope of those amendments being accepted at this time. However, in the new session, when the amending bill is before us, we will have the advantage of the definitive text of the law and the issues before Parliament will be narrowed down to a marked degree. This will be of great assistance both to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and to those who will appear before the committee. At that time the Senate will be in a much better position to persuade the Government to accept the amendments the Senate wishes to have adopted than it would be in by insisting on these amendments now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear. That was an excellent statement.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You might just convince us, you know. Are there any more senators who have something further to say along those lines?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, debate adjourned.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

December 15, 1971.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th of December, 1971, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited.

An Act respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital.

An Act to provide for the obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities.

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1972.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I should think so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My question of privilege is in regard to the headline and story which appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette. The headline and first two paragraphs of Arthur Blakely's column at the top of page one read as follows:

> Government suggests snap general election.
> Senators told: Pass tax bill or you may lose jobs
> Worried senators have been cautioned that the very survival of the Senate might well be at stake should they delay the Government's massive tax reform bill.
> The Senate has also been warned that the Government may call a snap general election on a constitutional issue if the Senate should make a single amendment to the bill.

I must deny the allegation contained in these paragraphs that I or my colleagues in any way or at any time indicated to my fellow senators that they must either pass this bill or face dire consequences of assorted kinds, including a snap general election on constitutional grounds and the loss of senators' jobs.

I have always held and I maintain the same view that every senator is free to take whatever position he considers appropriate in relation to any matter before this house as he is in relation to all pieces of government legislation including the tax bill. There has been absolutely no question of any form of duress or undue pressure having been applied, directly or indirectly. I am sure that each senator will freely examine and vote on the various issues as they may arise, without fear of reprisal or expectation of reward. This is a senator's right and duty and I very much regret that any imputation to the contrary has appeared in the headlines and columns of the Montreal Gazette.

Fortunately, at 7.45 yesterday morning, December 15, I took advantage of an interview with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the national network, and I quote from the reply of the transcript that was made this morning from the tape which was loaned to me by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The relevant questions and the answers which I made were as follows:

> Q. With the guillotine rule to limit debate being once again invoked by Liberal House Leader Allan MacEachen, passage of the Benson tax bill through the House of Commons by Friday is virtually assured. Now the bill will go before the Senate in the expectation that it will pass through the Upper House by Finance Minister Benson's target date of January 1, 1972. This would probably leave the Senators only a day or two for debate on the 332 clause bill if they wish to take any Christmas holidays. And with us on the telephone this morning is Senator Paul Martin, Government House Leader in the Senate. Good morning Senator Martin.

And I answered good-naturedly as I always do, "Good morning".

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Then the question:

> Q. Do you think that the passing of the bill to the Senate with such a short amount of debate downgrades the Upper House, sir?
> A. Well, I don't agree with the statement you made before you put your question. You said that the Senate would have a day and a half debate, but that is not accurate. The Senate could have 5-1/2 days at least before Christmas and if it did not finish its work, it could have another six days after Christmas. To this must be added, of course, the fact that the Senate has been engaged through the Banking and Commerce Committee in a study of this bill for over a period of 3-1/2 months. Not only has the Banking and Commerce Committee made a parallel study of this bill while the House of Commons was dealing with it in Committee of the Whole but the Senate, in addition, had representations made to it, witnesses came before that committee; so that the Senate has had a very full discussion of the principle of the bill, and if the Senate wishes to take more time than the time . . .

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. The honourable Leader of the Government is completely outside the point of order he has made. If he wishes to engage in a debate, I do not mind.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a question of privilege, but it concerns the article in the Gazette, not what was said over the radio. He is arguing his case with what he said on the radio.

Hon. Mr. Martin: An accusation was made in the Gazette.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But that is certainly not what was said on the radio.

The Hon. the Speaker: A point of order has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition and, if the Government Leader has certain views to express on this point of order before I rule on it, I shall hear him.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing with a question of privilege and the rule is that the person who raises the question of privilege makes his case. After that it is up to the Speaker to decide whether or not a prima facie case has been made. Until that ruling is given the question of privilege is not debatable. I am now in the process of stating my response to the allegation contained in the Montreal Gazette.

The Hon. the Speaker: After listening to the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the explanation given by the Leader of the Government, I must rule that the Leader of the Government may proceed to deal with the newspaper article in question, and give his reasons why this article might affect the privileges of the whole Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: To continue reading where I was interrupted:

> —so that the Senate has had a very full discussion of the principle of the bill, and if the Senate wishes to take more time than the time—

This is in answer to the Gazette.

> —envisaged by the Government, it is up to the Senate to decide that.
> Q. Senator Flynn, the Opposition Leader in the Senate, feels that either the Senate should whip it through all the required readings in a day or so or it should give the bill a real going over. Don't you think so?
> A. I think it should get a good thorough examination. I do not think that most senators want to pass the bill in a day. That is not our view, and it is certainly not my view. It isn't the Government's view. And the Senate will give this matter substantial consideration and it will have that opportunity if it wishes to exercise it.
> Q. The other day, Mr. Benson made a special appearance before the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee. Was that scheduled when it became apparent that the bill might be in for a bit of a rough ride in the Upper House?
> A. I don't think so. In any event, that was an arrangement by the committee itself through the chairman, and they pointed out that they had made certain recommendations. The Minister of Finance acknowledged the contribution of the work of the Senate and he said that some of the recommendations were acceptable, others he would have to examine. It was his intention to bring in an amending bill, possibly in March, and if at that time the Government acceded to those recommendations, they would be embodied in such an amending bill.
> Q. Do you think this will be given quick assent in the Senate?
> A. This is a matter for the senators to decide themselves in the light of the study that they have made over many months; in the light of the desirability of putting into effect relief from taxation as provided for in this bill and any other consideration that they have in mind, but the matter lies with the Senate. There is no guillotine in the Senate, there is no closure in the Senate.

The final question was:

> Q. Do you anticipate any filibustering on the part of the Conservative members of the Senate sir?
> A. Well, I don't belong to the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Thank God.

Hon. Mr. Martin:

> —and all I can glean is what I read in the papers and what occasionally I learn in the Senate but I would think that most senators will act very responsibly in this matter. That is my hope.

That was done on the very day before this story appeared in the Gazette. The Minister of Finance went before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Monday, and here is what he said on the point of my question of privilege. He was asked the following question by Senator Flynn:

> SENATOR FLYNN: Then you suggest that if we were to make some amendments along the lines of our two reports, that you would not be prepared at this time to accept them or to recommend them to the other place, if we return the bill with these amendments?
> HON. MR. BENSON: Well, you know it is not within my jurisdiction to control what the Senate does, and I am not saying to the Senate what they should do in any way.

This is to be found on page 33 of the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for Monday, December 13. Then the following exchange took place between Senator Flynn and Mr. Benson:

> SENATOR FLYNN: You are not suggesting that you would refuse amendments?
> HON. MR. BENSON: I am not suggesting anything. I am not here to tell the Senate what to do. I am simply here to answer questions.
> SENATOR FLYNN: There was some misunderstanding—
> HON. MR. BENSON: You are master in your own house.

That is my answer to this wholly irresponsible article in this morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nothing relevant.

NEWSPAPER EDITORIAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: I rise on a question of privilege. The Montreal Gazette on December 16 published an editorial entitled the "Right of Senate", in which it refers to the Notice of Motion of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. It says:

> The Senators are being subjected to intense pressure from the Government in its efforts to put tax reform through by January 1. They'll have broad public support if they resist that pressure. Attempts will be made to publicly discredit them. There will be renewed talk of Senate reform. The Senators must brush these consequences aside. They have the constitutional right to give the tax reform legislation detailed study—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Where is the question of privilege in what the honourable senator is saying? Every time a newspaper publishes an article about the Senate, if an honourable senator does not like what it says he attempts to rise on a question of privilege. We will be dealing with this matter later today, and the honourable senator knows very well that he can make his point at that time. There is no prima facie point of privilege in what the honourable senator is saying, especially as it does not affect him. If it affected him personally there would be a question of privilege.

• (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: I must confess that I have not yet heard enough of what the honourable Senator Prowse has to say to determine whether there is or is not a prima facie case as regards his question of privilege. I would like to hear more from him.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I do not intend to cover the ground already covered by the Leader of the Government. I am talking about another question of privilege. The Montreal Gazette is published by the Southam Press Limited. I should like now to refer to an editorial of Wednesday, December 15, 1971, which appeared in the Sun, a Vancouver newspaper. I might add that the Sun is published by a combination of the F. P. Publications Limited and Southam Press Limited who, between them, divide up Canada as far as newspapers are concerned. The editorial is headed: "Senators Invited to Commit Suicide".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will you accept the invitation?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The editorial improperly quotes Mr. Benson. It states:

> In effect, he told the senators not to bother their venerable heads with the work they were appointed to discharge in the national interest. Just to leave everything to their juniors and betters; to rubber-stamp what was put before them and take off for home for Christmas.
> If the Senate does any such thing, it will affirm its own uselessness and confirm every argument for its abolition . . .

The facts as set out in both these editorials are incorrect. The decisions are remarkably the same. They say to me that as a senator if I do not do what they tell me I am a craven object, subject to abolition.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And so you are.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Well, from the honourable senator who believes as he does in the freedom of the press, and who knows as no one else knows, that the press is the fourth estate and not the first, which this house is, I am surprised. As a senator I do not intend to be intimidated—as I have not been by Mr. Benson, by the Leader of the Government, by the Leader of the Opposition or by anyone else.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have never tried to intimidate you.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has to please his own leader and he is doing his best.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know how your leader proceeds, but I never do that.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Let me make it clear that the time has come to reconvene the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media. I am intrigued by the fact that in Ottawa, F.P. Publications Limited and Southam Press Limited maintain an even balance. Nowhere else in Canada do two newspapers manage to maintain an even circulation balance. In Winnipeg, the F.P. Publications Limited runs the Winnipeg Free Press, and Southam Press Limited runs the Winnipeg Tribune, and there is no economic reason why the Tribune is able to continue in business unless there is some type of arrangement between the two publishing companies.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I hope His Honour has now heard enough to give a ruling on something that is so irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: If Your Honour has not heard enough, we have.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind Senator Prowse that if he has a complaint with respect to a newspaper editorial he should state the matter succinctly. There must be a limit to the scope of a question of privilege. I cannot allow the honourable senator to go far afield, even though his statements might indirectly be linked with the question of privilege. If the honourable Senator Prowse has made his point with respect to the newspaper editorial in question, then I would ask him to refrain from making further statements.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, in view of His Honour's ruling I will not point out to you that Southam has a big paper in Calgary, F.P. has a little one, and they publish together in Vancouver.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Michel Fournier, Esquire
Guy Williams, Esquire

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk and were seated:

Hon. Guy Williams, of Richmond, British Columbia, introduced between Hon. Mr. Martin and Hon. Mr. Nichol.

Hon. Michel Fournier, of Pointe-Verte, New Brunswick, introduced between Hon. Mr. Martin and Hon. Mr. Michaud.

• (1430)

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

ADJOURNMENT

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Friday, December 17, 1971, I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, December 18, 1971, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move:

That for the balance of the present Session, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, the last time this motion was put, it was stood.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Well, notice was given.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not objecting. I am not jumping as fast as your leader is.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It might help if you did.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You think so? You wait until later this day.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is jumping Jacques better than jumping Paul?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The last time this motion was put, I objected to the fact that public bills cover bills which may be of private initiative. I also objected to the Rules being suspended for the remainder of the session when we do not know when the end of the session will come.

I understand that the main purpose of this motion is to be able to proceed with second reading of Bill C-259 on Friday when it reaches us. In my opinion this motion is too wide in its terms and could lead to abuses under certain circumstances, which I cannot foresee but which could occur. Rather than pass this motion, we on this side would be agreeable to making it an order of the house that we will proceed with second reading when Bill C-259 reaches us tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If we are here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of course, if we are here! It would depend on whether my motion, which I am going to move later, does or does not carry.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course.

• (1440)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I feel I have an understanding of what the aim of the Leader of the Opposition is in objecting to my motion. It is because we use the term "public bills" instead of "government bills". The reason is that the rules make no mention of Government bills. I am ready to grant him that a public bill could just as easily be called a government bill and vice versa. I am ready to give the assurance that my only aim is as he has stated. I cannot go further at this stage.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not make it an order? Why not move that when Bill C-259 reaches us tomorrow, and is read the first time, that we proceed with second reading without prior notice?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But there is also the question of reports of committees.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What do you mean by reports of committees?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We might get a report from a committee and want to consider it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There would be no objection to that. You speak of public bills and you raise the problem of reports of committees, but that does not necessarily mean reports concerning public bills. I think it means first, second and third readings. While there might be some hesitation, I assure you that there would be no objection on our part to suspending the rule as far as all normal proceedings on Bill C-259 are concerned, with the exception, perhaps, of third reading and I am not too sure about that, but that is only a matter of one day.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sorry I cannot agree to your suggestion, because there is a possibility that we might be getting other bills. That is why I do not want to limit this motion to cover one bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean we might be getting other bills before Christmas?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is a possibility.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then I object most strongly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us vote on it. Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière), that for the balance of the present session Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Carried.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since there appears to be some uncertainty, those in favour will please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the motion will please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the honourable senators.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved, pursuant to notice:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 10, 1972, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government is willing to support my motion I will refrain from speaking on it at this time.

Hon. Paul Martin: I can conceive of nothing more irresponsible than for this house to adjourn at the time suggested and for the length of time suggested when there is work for the Senate to do. That is my answer.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not envious of the Leader of the Government's receiving this applause for his speech. We have had a proper dress rehearsal for it, and it was perfect. As usual, he has answered the question with a speech. He never answers yes or no.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You asked for it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have done the same thing. I will not draw a picture for you, because that would take too much time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Would you please go ahead and draw a picture.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I rise on a point of order. I would like to know what we are talking about.

The Hon. the Speaker: I ask honourable senators to listen very carefully to the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I can only praise Senator Fournier for endeavouring to follow the procedure here. He is not behaving as he usually behaves.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is obvious. It is to enable the Senate to decide whether it will give Bill C-259 a thorough and complete examination, or whether it will merely rubber stamp it. I do not expect to bring any new arguments in support of, or against, my motion. I feel everything has been said on this subject over the last two weeks. We have heard the argument of the Leader of the Government on his point of order, and I may have more to say about that later. However, I intend for the record to attempt to classify the pros and cons and to point out the most important conclusions to be drawn from the adoption or rejection of this motion.

• (1500)

What are the objections to my motion? I shall not take into consideration the words used by the Leader of the Government when I jokingly asked him whether he would support this motion. He said that he had never heard anything so scandalous in his life.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Irresponsible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Irresponsible, yes.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Or both.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If he knows something about being responsible. I don't believe that is the kind of argument that I would use. I will attempt to be as objective as possible and not use such emotional adjectives.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think you always are.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, I do not believe that. I sometimes become a bit—

Hon. Mr. Blois: Carried away.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —carried away.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, not too much. We all do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On this special occasion, however, I wish to speak to this motion as objectively as possible. I think it is an important question for the Senate, and I hope honourable senators realize that I have put this motion in good faith. I believe that it is in the interest of the Senate to consider the problem involved, namely, the manner in which we are eventually to deal with this important piece of legislation which affects all Canadians.

What are the objections against the adjournment of the Senate to January 10—that is, postponing consideration of Bill C-259 to January 10? Of course, I am not adamant about the date of January 10. Whether it is January 10 or January 3 is irrelevant. My proposal is that we should return in the new year after the Christmas season, and proceed with the bill at that time. We should not do it under the pressure of a deadline of December 31 and the obligations of the Christmas season, or suggestions, if you wish, that we do something other than endeavour to achieve the quality of work that we are obliged as senators to strive for with regard to this type of very difficult legislation.

I have not classified the arguments in their order of importance, but the one has been used more often than any other is that the bill should be passed before December 31, 1971, since it should become law on January 1, 1972. I have already referred to this and I wish simply to call as my expert witness Senator Hayden himself. I refer honourable senators to the Debates of the Senate of December 7, at page 1560. Senator Martin, in his usual manner, had attempted to put his arm around Senator Hayden—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Careful now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —to have him indicate that he was in agreement with him. Senator Martin received the reaction he should have expected. When Senator Hayden rose he said this:

> This measure is proposed to become effective on January 1. In my view, if on January 1 the bill had not been passed and the present session of Parliament was still continuing then, whenever the bill was passed during the continuance of that session, that date would still be the effective date.

I then interjected "Indeed". I had already said that, and I was happy to get the support of Senator Hayden. Senator Hayden continued as follows:

> I have not heard any suggestions to the contrary, and I think the pressure, the speed, and the selfishness displayed show an utter disregard for the Senate. I am completely dissatisfied because the House of Commons is steering its own course without any regard for us. In my view, honourable senators, we should steer our own course straight down the middle of the road.

Therefore, I suggest, honourable senators, that as far as the coming into force of this bill is concerned, the fact that we deal with it only in January and complete its examination and passage by the end of that month, or even the middle of February, will not in any way change its effectiveness.

The second argument, of course, is that failure to pass this legislation by December 31 will deprive some taxpayers of the benefits provided therein. This is what has been argued, and it is a very easy argument to make. Many thousands are supposed to benefit from the increased exemptions, and by this argument they are being called on to rise and protest against any long discussion of the bill. They are told they will be deprived by a delay in passage of the bill. Again, I say this is incorrect. Adjustments can and have been made.

The same situation occurred not too long ago. Honourable senators opposite remember very well when the Pearson Government's bill increasing taxation was defeated in the other place. The Government had to produce another bill providing for a lower increase in taxation, and adjustments were made at that time. The same procedure can be easily followed.

The only suggestion that may be valid, and which I understood from the remarks of Senator Buckwold yesterday, is that perhaps when we are, as we are now, using computers, that type of job cannot be done easily. If it cannot, let us use the old system, which worked pretty well. I suggest that the serious use of this argument is sheer demagoguery.

• (1510)

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not wish to interrupt Senator Flynn, but would he like to address himself also to the effect of the failure to pass the bill on what are called transaction taxes?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not mind speaking to that. I have already said that I wished to be objective, and I am willing to consider all questions, especially if they are serious and when they come from the Leader of the Government.

Many transactions could be affected by the new legislation. The honourable Leader of the Government knows that very well. The suggestion made by the Minister of Finance before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and in the other place, that changes to the legislation may be introduced in an amending bill, possibly early in the spring, will create a good deal of uncertainty with regard to many transactions, including those that my honourable friend says may be affected by the delay.

One thing certain is that any businessman who knows anything about this legislation, and who knows that some provisions will not be amended because they are fair, or will be amended only to provide them with more benefit, will not be worried by the delay. The only benefit that can accrue to anybody who has a transaction in mind will be by amendment that can be made by the Senate. I say, with great deference and with all due respect to my honourable friend, that he has not raised an objection, but has given me another argument.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The third argument against my motion, and one which might be said to be of a practical nature, is that we could deal with this bill by sitting every day if necessary until December 31. I thought that suggestion, put forward by the Leader of the Government, was made in a joking mood but apparently other members of the Senate took it seriously, since Senator Buckwold decided to adopt it. I was perhaps a little rough with our new colleague, and I wish to apologize to him at this time for my interjection. I indicated that he had not had sufficient experience of the legislative process to say that it is easy at this time of the year for honourable senators to roll up their sleeves and sit from 9 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night on a matter of this kind. It would be rather amusing to see that happen. It would be something that has never occurred before in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Nichol: Then perhaps it should.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think that such a suggestion would be practical. I do not imagine the honourable senator works that way in his law office.

Hon. Mr. Nichol: I am not a lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I thought that at one time he was. I apologize to the honourable senator for giving him that title, which he refuses to accept.

Hon. Mr. Nichol: I accept it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is very complex legislation. At this point I shall call as a witness none other than Senator Manning who yesterday made an excellent speech in support of my motion. To my way of thinking the speech was well prepared and well thought out. I invite honourable senators who were not present in the chamber and who have not read the honourable senator's speech to do so, because it was very interesting.

Senator Manning said:

> —it is inaccurate and misleading to suggest that we can give a bill of this magnitude and importance the thorough examination it requires in the time remaining between now and January 1 of next year. Surely, a minimum of three weeks would be necessary for any really meaningful analysis to be made of its provisions.

The difficulties surrounding the making of travel arrangements at this time of year, and the presence of members of the other place waiting to go home for Christmas, are not conducive to a thorough study of the bill. We must have time to prepare, and we must be allowed to work under less strained conditions. To merely read and try to understand all the sections of this—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: —this 700-page volume.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes—which has been called a monster, would take a very long time. If we are to do a good job, we must have time to prepare, have experts with us, and have a lengthy debate on the important points. I am not suggesting a lengthy debate is required on every section. I suggest that if the committee is to study the principles involved, and deal with the provisions and consider whether they are useful—I will deal later with this matter of usefulness in making amendments—it is impossible to do so adequately before December 31.

December 31 is not a deadline. There is no urgency. After all, so-called fiscal reform has been debated for years, and many people have not had time to express their views on the legislation. I shall refer to this aspect later. Many people still wish to appear before the Senate committee or make recommendations to the Government.

The argument that we can roll up our sleeves up and work like slaves until December 31 is not a valid one. We can definitely do that, but I do not see any sense in it because we will not achieve anything worth while.

The fourth argument that has been advanced against adjournment is that the Senate should give quick passage to this bill. I make no distinction as to whether the bill is passed in two hours, three days, four days, before Christmas, or before December 31. Quick passage in this instance means debate without amendment and without a thorough examination of the proposed legislation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Has anyone suggested that that should be done?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am coming to that. You have suggested it yourself but, of course, you did so in terms that were not precise. You are never precise in what you say, but anyone can understand what you mean.

Hon. Mr. Martin: "Not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have been one of the best since Mackenzie King argued about that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Why bring him into it? He has nothing to do with this bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You just finished quoting him. You were a good pupil of his.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean he does not speak to you in your dreams?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The only one that speaks to me in my dreams these days is the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then you must have nightmares.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are quite right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should like to return to the argument I was trying to make on behalf of the proponents of the motion.

It has been argued that the Senate should give quick passage, or passage before December 31, to this bill because it has had an opportunity, in the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, on the White Paper, and on the bill itself during the last few months, to give adequate consideration to it. This argument was advanced by Senator Cook yesterday. It was also advanced by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), and by Senator Martin himself in the quotations he read from the telephone interview he had this morning when he was awakened by a radio reporter.

I have already indicated why I cannot accept this suggestion. Senator Manning dealt with this argument yesterday and expressed practically the same view as I have expressed.

With respect to the committee's report on the White Paper, many recommendations of vital importance contained in it were rejected by the Government. I am not going to list all of them, but I refer, as did Senator Manning yesterday, to the way the capital gains tax provisions in Bill C-259 differ from what we recommended in our report on the White Paper.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There are other areas of difference also, including the provisions respecting farmers, charitable donations—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, there are many other items, but I mention this one because I believe it is the most important.

The three reports submitted by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce simply dealt with the subject matter of Bill C-259. I have already expressed my view that the committee did a tremendous job. I can repeat that view, if it pleases the Leader of the Government or those who support this argument. I never spared any compliment to the committee or to the chairman in this connection.

The three reports of the committee dealt only with the drafting and the technical aspects of the bill. It was clearly understood that the committee was not going to deal with any matters of policy, because it would have been improper for a committee of the Senate to deal with such matters concerning any legislation that had not come to us in the normal course of events. The purpose of the committee's investigation was to be prepared on the technical aspects in order that we could deal with this matter. The committee did not touch on matters of policy. The best example I can give of that is in the fact that we did not consider the matter of capital gains tax. We did not discuss it, and we made no recommendations in that regard. That is just one item. There were many other items which were dealt with in the report on the White Paper and which were put aside by the Government.

We are far from having exhausted our study of this bill merely by referring the subject matter thereof to committee. As has already been pointed out by Senator Manning, the committee is just that; the committee is not the Senate. Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that because 30 members of this committee have studied the bill, the remainder of the membership of this place need not worry about it, and they should take for granted everything that is contained in the report? I suggest that that is a wrong assumption. The report of the committee is not binding on the Senate. The three reports submitted by the committee were the subject of consideration. No one ever asked the Senate to adopt these three reports.

It is up to all of the senators who are not members of that committee, and members of the committee as well, to express their views if they are different from those contained in the report. The three reports were limited in their scope.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce did a good job, of course, but it was certainly not an exhaustive job. The committee took three months just to look at the technical aspects of the bill, so one can imagine what an examination of the whole bill would require, if we were to examine it thoroughly.

The three reports have been tabled. I do not know how many senators have read them. The committee, I believe, made ten or twelve major amendments, but it has also recommended, I suggest, close to 40 or 50 minor amendments, and, again, these relate only to the technical aspects of the bill.

Should we be satisfied simply because the minister has said that he might correct some of the matters raised by the committee? I certainly do not believe so. I feel we should go back to the committee and decide whether the amendments proposed in the report should or should not be adopted, notwithstanding the words of the minister. I was going to use the word "commitment" but to me it was not a commitment; it was only an affirmation to the effect that every year we have a bill to amend fiscal legislation or the Income Tax Act. Even at that, again we would be forgetting about very important matters in this legislation which the committee had no authority to deal with, or in any event did not deal with because it considered it had no authority to deal with matters of policy.

I come back to the question of an amending bill. Senator Cook has made an argument and said to just forget about it. Again I say that the minister has not committed himself. If we believe in the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, we should amend the bill accordingly. What we are suggesting is that when we have an opinion and the minister says, "Don't embarrass us in the other place with amendments; we are going to deal with them eventually," we become only a consultative body and not a legislative body. As someone has remarked, the prayers recited by the Speaker refer to, "The Senate herein in its legislative capacity assembled". If we are a legislative assembly, we should not hesitate to legislate, and when we express an opinion we should not be satisfied with a mere assurance that the Government or the Minister of Finance will eventually respond to our wish.

The seventh argument that has been made—perhaps not too strongly, but yesterday the reactions of the Leader of the Government and his deskmate, Senator Langlois, suggested that they supported it—was that the Senate had no power to amend financial legislation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have never said that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not say you had said it. I said that some of your reactions yesterday when Senator Manning was speaking suggested that we should never tamper with a money bill or with a financial bill. Anyway, I am glad to accept the correction that the Leader of the Government is making. It will reinforce my argument with respect to other members of the house, because he has such authority on the majority of us here.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Senator Hayden does not believe that either.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, that is right. I said a few words about this the other night. I have been furnished with the report of the Special Committee appointed by the Senate to determine The Rights Of The Senate In Matters Of Financial Legislation. This is not a recent report; it was made in 1918. The chairman was Senator W. B. Ross. I suggest that nothing has happened since then to alter the opinions that that committee had then. I will quote the pertinent paragraphs from it:

> That the Senate of Canada has and always had since it was created, the power to amend bills originating in the Commons appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing a tax by reducing the amounts therein, but has not the right to increase the same without the consent of the Crown.

That is what I have said.

> That this power was given as an essential part of the Confederation contract.
> That the practice of the Imperial Houses of Parliament in respect of money bills is not part of the Constitution of the Dominion of Canada.
> That the Senate in the past has repeatedly amended so-called money bills, in some cases without protest from the Commons, while in other cases the bills were allowed to pass, the Commons protesting or claiming that the Senate could not amend a money bill.

These are the main conclusions of the report, which is based especially on legal opinions obtained from the top constitutional lawyers then known, Messrs. Eugene Lafleur and Aimé Geoffrion. The report contains their reasoned opinion; so as far as this is concerned I do not think there is any doubt.

The Government Leader, when he rose earlier on a question of privilege, referred to the article in the Gazette this morning which suggested that some pressure would be put on members of the Senate to pass this bill quickly or else the Government might take the occasion to call an election and discuss the abolition of the Senate. The leader commented on that. That is all very well. Personally, I think it is rather amusing speculation, and can hardly be founded since the Government could scarcely blame the Senate, composed of a huge majority of its supporters, for taking for once a courageous attitude. There could be no doubt that the Senate would show courage under the circumstances, because no decision like the one I am suggesting to you can be taken without a large segment of the Government supporters here affirming the rights of the Senate to deal with this bill in the way it thinks it should, assuming fully its responsibilities. This article to which the leader has referred does not, therefore, impress me.

Incidentally, although this has nothing to do with the argument I am making at this time, I will tell the Leader of the Government that I believe he never puts any pressure on anybody, but I would suggest that instead he always uses his natural charm, which he even tries on us on this side of the house to persuade us not to be too rough with the Government, so I can imagine how he proceeds with the members sitting on his side. It is very amusing to see him running around in circumstances such as those we are going through, being all smiles and trying to convince everybody, saying, "It is a very, very difficult situation and I count on your support. I am quite sure that I can count on you."

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Make it unanimous.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If someone insists, the leader will tell him, "Don't you feel that you are not too well? Hadn't you better go home and have a rest?"

Hon. Mr. Martin: You have given me some ideas.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, I am not giving you some ideas. I have borrowed some from you occasionally, but not with the same success.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, we get along all the same, even though you hurt me from time to time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The leader has repeatedly told me that I hurt him. I say that the man who can hurt the Leader of the Government is not yet born. His skin is too thick. I think these are the only arguments I have heard up to now opposing this motion. It has been mentioned that I am proposing this motion at the wrong time, that I should have waited until the bill reaches us, because my action might be misinterpreted, that the public might think the Senate does not want to work and wants to go. I am not too worried that the comments I make about the Senate will be misinterpreted and I will not check every editorial that is going to be written about the Senate, as does Senator Prowse, for instance.

• (1540)

The idea is very simple: we either deal with this bill at this time or we do not. That is why my motion is worded in this way. I suggest it is a useless exercise to start the examination of this bill, if the Senate is not in agreement with doing so. I am going to be here until I have had enough and I have to go. I have to leave on December 21, and I am not hiding the fact. In the meantime, I am going to be here. No one need worry about that. I suggest to you that by adopting this motion the Senate will indicate that it is willing to assume fully its responsibility. There is no doubt there is some pressure from the other house, but I do not mean pressure in the sense of undue pressure. We all work under pressure. The work of a legislative body is under pressure from the public or other segments of the population. We are all under pressure, but the Senate will show that it can resist the pressure that is certainly put by the Government at this time not to have the Government face another problem in the House of Commons should we make some amendments. This is the fear more or less expressed by Senator Cook—he did not express a fear but simply said that if we amend the bill the Commons will not accept the amendments anyway. That was his argument.

Honourable senators, if we believe in the amendments suggested by the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and if we believe other amendments should be made to this bill, then we should show, by carrying this motion, that we are not afraid and that we can stand up to any kind of pressure.

There will be another advantage in adjourning for two weeks. This legislation has been debated in the other place for quite some time, and we have been arguing about it here and already our tempers are getting a little heated. The two weeks' respite would be very useful to us and to the Government. We could really fulfil our role of giving sober second thought to Government legislation by dealing with this bill only in January. In the meantime, of course, the Government and the upper echelons of the Departments of Finance and National Revenue could give further consideration to some of the suggestions that have been made and which might be more amenable to amendment.

After all, the minister has agreed that this legislation is imperfect, that it needs amendment. I suggest it would be far better to correct as many of the obvious problems as possible before passing this bill. Some have even suggested it would be bad to delay the passage of the bill because it would create uncertainty. This was the gist of the suggestion made by the Leader of the Government at the beginning of my remarks. I suggest that there would be more uncertainty by leaving hanging up in the air perhaps another 50 amendments that the minister or someone else has suggested should be made, and may eventually be made next year during its first year of operation.

I am not suggesting that we will be able to make a perfect bill, but we should try to make it as perfect as possible. If we could go into committee in January we could hear views that have not yet been expressed in Parliament, because in the other place the bill was considered by the Committee of the Whole, and in this place we dealt only with technical matters and not with matters of policy. Many such problems have been brought to my attention.

There may be more advantages, but the last I shall deal with is this. By dealing with this bill in January, the Senate would respond to the invitation of a very wide sector of the public, which has asked us to debate the many uncertainties that exist and to amend the bill.

Mention has been made of the attitude of some provincial premiers and others. I have received several telegrams and letters. One is from the President of the British Columbia Chamber of Commerce:

> Imperative reform be postponed to keep faith with the community.

Those are the last words of the telegram. I shall not read the rest, but what I have read serves my purpose.

A group of students at the University of Saskatchewan put their signature to this message:

> We, students at the University of Saskatchewan, support many of the aims of the income tax bill, removing the tax burden on the poor, an equitable capital gains tax, reduction in subsidies to oil and mining corporations. But we are not certain that the bill's specific provisions are the best to achieve those aims. Therefore we want the fullest discussion on all sections of the bill. In view of the Government's admission that the bill can be improved, we urge the Senate to hold fast to its prerogative to debate and amend the income tax bill.

Honourable senators, I suggest to you that these are the advantages of carrying the motion I have put before you. If a date is selected other than the one in my motion, January 6, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, I do not mind—it is the principle that I am putting to the house.

Finally, I want to draw your attention to the consequences of a negative vote. It will be interpreted by the public, even if we take until December 31 to pass the bill, as a refusal to assume our responsibility. It will be concluded that we accepted the idea the Government would refuse any amendment made by the Senate and that therefore we considered it useless to assume our responsibility.

Personally, if this motion does not carry, I would prefer that the Senate be very frank, as was suggested by Senator Manning yesterday. If we are going to give ceremonial approval to this bill, let us not hide behind one, two, three or four days of apparent debate with no amendments, but let us pass it while at the same time declaring our inability or our incapacity to assume at this time our responsibilities because we are sure that whatever we do the present Government will not accept. Let us declare that we have not been able, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to convince the Government that the Senate's views should be accepted and, therefore, we have to be realistic and we ask the people to be realistic with us. So let the Government assume its responsibilities. If it does not want the Senate to work efficiently, we are not going to stay here just for the fun of it. We are going to go home, and the people of the country can express their judgment of that at the next election.

The Hon. The Speaker: Before I give the floor to any other honourable senator, do I understand that the Leader of the Opposition is now putting his motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes. I will not ask to speak again on the matter, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the honourable Senator Choquette, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 10, 1972, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Lang has the floor.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I hardly need point out to you that, although Senator Flynn's motion is procedural in nature, it is of fundamental importance. He has dealt with the subject and the ramifications of this motion at great length, and I am only going to touch on some other aspects of it very briefly and from a slightly different point of view.

A week ago, like many of the senators in this chamber, I was very optimistic about the possibility of our performing our legislative function in connection with the tax reform bill. I thought we could perform it adequately and within the time limit necessary to meet the Government's intention that it should be passed before December 31 to come into effect on January 1, 1972. There were several reasons for my optimism. The first had to do with the successful work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which had considered this bill since last September under the able chairmanship of Senator Hayden. As everyone knows, that committee submitted three reports of a very exhaustive nature, although dealing only with technical matters contained in the bill. Because that work was behind us and, secondly, because we were led to believe that the minister would appear before the committee on Monday of this week—that is, December 13 last—and on that occasion we would receive adequate undertakings which would satisfy our requirements, I felt that there was no reason why we could not thereafter proceed with the bill expeditiously once it arrived in this chamber. I thought we would be able to debate it thoroughly on questions of principle and in accordance with tradition in respect of second reading.

Today, honourable senators, I feel quite differently about the matter, and I should like now to explain why I feel differently.

First, let me say that I had some misgivings as to the propriety of relying upon undertakings given by a cabinet minister as a substitute for performing our legislative function but, notwithstanding those misgivings, I felt that acceptance of those undertakings would be one way by which we might be able to meet a very serious and rather nasty problem.

The Minister of Finance did appear at last Monday's meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. He gave generously of his time to the committee. Whether the committee obtained satisfactory commitments depends, I suppose, to some extent upon the interpretation given to that hearing by each individual member. But when I came away from that meeting, I felt that in fact I had received no assurance that would enable me to say, "We can now by-pass the normal legislative function of this chamber."

In fairness to the minister and to the committee I have tried to excerpt the exact answer to the exact problems raised by the committee as they appear in the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for Monday, December 13, 1971.

With regard to the employees' profit-sharing plans and the recommendations the committee had made therein, the minister said:

> —there is an amendment which we think should be made—

Thereafter he elaborated on the nature of that amendment and it was, indeed, basically in conformity with the committee's recommendations.

With regard to the question raised by our committee on deferred profit-sharing plans, the minister said:

> I made a promise to do this a while ago—

Evidently it had not been incorporated in the legislation as he had expected it would be.

With regard to passive income and the treatment of foreign income of corporations, the minister said:

> We are looking at the passive income section . . . This also applies to the de minimis rule with regard to passive income.

With regard to people coming to Canada to work for a few years and then, upon departure, being deemed to have realized capital gains, the minister said:

> We are having a look at this to see if something can be done about it.

With regard to the pulp and paper industry and the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the minister said:

> —we met with the pulp and paper industry . . . and are taking a look at the taxation position vis-à-vis other countries.

That is, the taxation position of these companies. With regard to the suggestion made by our committee that earned depletion be provided for the pulp and paper industry, the minister said:

> I would not commit myself to this.

With regard to the committee's proposal that the logging tax credit should not be limited only to the provinces and people subject to what is specifically called the logging tax, the minister replied:

> We have looked at your recommendations, and I assure you they will be given full consideration as we continue studying this problem.

With regard to the tax-exempt non-resident investors, the minister said:

[Hon. Mr. Lang.]

> What we have considered doing is . . . looking at hardship cases—

With regard to the possibility of permitting consolidated returns, the minister said:

> We are presently looking at this. I cannot promise we are going to have it solved in a few months or anything, but we are looking at the problem.

• (1600)

With regard to non-resident owned investment corporations the minister said, "That is taken care of in one of our amendments." That would be one of the recent amendments in the house.

With respect to private and general insurance corporations, the minister said, "In our opinion the bill as drafted poses no problem to the private general insurance corporation."

With regard to the family farm and the rollover concept within a family as proposed by our committee, the minister said:

> The roll-over concept within a family is a very difficult thing to follow through as you might well know. We decided on the six-year period . . . it is my intention to put it in the amended bill in the spring.

With regard to the concept of the basic herd the minister said, ". . . that is the position the Government is taking." That is the position it takes in the tax reform bill itself.

With regard to rollovers on reorganization the minister said:

> I have instructed my department to carefully review the proposals under Bill C-259 to see if they could be extended without undue prejudice to the system . . .

With regard to the mining and petroleum industry and the loss of the 25 per cent automatic depletion, the minister said:

> I can only say that this is under consideration. I would like to defer comment until we decide where our studies are in this regard.

With regard to the construction industry and joint ventures of two or more companies, Mr. Benson said, "I am told that we will consider this further."

Finally, honourable senators, with regard to the suggestion that another amending bill would be forthcoming shortly, the question was asked of the minister:

> Can we expect a special bill for the purpose of these amendments?

The minister replied:

> There will be a bill to amend the Income Tax Act and it will take into consideration the propositions brought forward by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and, indeed, by a great many other people as well, and also other matter that we want to build into it, but I am certainly in no position to give an undertaking that we would have this bill introduced in February or at the end of January, or whenever.

To the question: "Will you take into consideration the recommendations of the Senate, Mr. Minister?", the minister replied, "Yes, but I do not say that I will agree with them."

Honourable senators, I think those quotations—I have chosen them carefully, and I assure you that they are as accurate and as much within context as I can make them—show, as I think you will agree, that in fact last Monday the Minister of Finance gave absolutely no commitments whatever to our committee other than an assurance that our recommendations would be carefully and sympathetically considered.

So, honourable senators, within this context I felt the grounds upon which I had based my previous optimism had been very badly shattered.

The second ground that I was being confident about was that we could adequately debate the principle of this legislation between now and the end of the year. I am now satisfied that in fact we cannot do that. I say that in all honesty. In the week before Christmas not only will no one in the country be listening to us, and for obvious reasons, but there will be very few people in this chamber to listen to.

A further aspect which I consider to be most serious is that there will be absent from this chamber some of those honourable members whose presence I consider to be absolutely essential to an intelligent discussion of this complex piece of legislation.

In fact, honourable senators, I have to confess that I am afraid we would be performing a charade. In effect, to be practical all we could do would be to debate the bill simply for the purpose of debate, and pass it without amendment. We have done that before in our history, but we have never done it with respect to a bill of the magnitude and complexity of this one, which is in fact the most complex piece of legislation that has ever been presented to the Canadian Parliament. It will affect, as you know, everyone in this country as no other piece of legislation has, except legislation affecting our civil rights. Therefore, everyone is deeply concerned about how effectively we function in its review.

In 1949 when the Income Tax Act was previously amended, the bill was extensively debated in both houses of Parliament and then deferred by the government of the day for one year. I assure you, honourable senators, that the 1949 income tax bill was very simple compared to the present tax reform legislation.

I think we all have to weigh the Government's desire to have this bill passed before the end of the year against other considerations. I myself have not been satisfied as to the necessity for the passage of this legislation within that time limit, and I am satisfied that it could be dealt with during next year and passed with its effectiveness retroactive to January 1. I am not satisfied with the reasons given by the Minister of Finance in the other place or before our committee as to the necessity for this haste. I refer honourable senators again to the proceedings of the committee where the minister in answer to this same query from the committee replied, "It is advantageous, as I outlined in the house, to have the bill through by the end of this year in order that we may have certainty."

My colleague on the opposite side of the house has commented on the validity of that argument of certainty, and I would say there is probably no uncertainty greater than this tax reform bill with some of its incomprehensible sections passing into law and subject obviously to continuous and heavy amendment throughout the next few years.

Against the expressed desire of the Government to achieve this end I have to weigh the fact that there are five provinces in this country which are desperately anxious to have this bill postponed. These five provinces represent 75 per cent of the population of this country, and they represent three political parties of different stripes. Two of those five provinces, Ontario and Quebec, are the most deeply and seriously affected by the timing of this legislation. Ontario is unable to gear its tax collection machinery and its legislation to mesh with this tax reform bill. It has pleaded desperately that its implementation be deferred for one year in order to enable it to do so.

I do not think I need to remind honourable senators that we are appointed to represent provinces. We do not sit in this chamber representing the other place or the Government. I represent the Province of Ontario. I know how the people and Government of Ontario feel with respect to this legislation. I know that I must give my full attention and scrutiny to it to the best of my limited ability, and I know I cannot do that in the context of the present time table which is being imposed upon us.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I shall support Senator Flynn's motion and, believe me, I do not do this lightly.

In conclusion, I might add one point. If this motion does not carry and we are forced to proceed as I envisage, I hope that when we receive this bill tomorrow we will give it three readings tomorrow night, and pass it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: At least that will be intellectually honest.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I rise for the purpose of making only a few remarks. I do not propose to express any opinion on the merits or demerits of the tax legislation. I am concerned by the motion presented by the honourable Leader of the Opposition in this house. I am very much afraid that if the Senate adjourns today, that is, December 16 until January 10, a period of more than three and a half weeks, we will be inviting the condemnation of the people of Canada. I feel that it will be said that the Senate, in disregard of its responsibilities, has decided to take a vacation of three weeks. This in face of the fact that the other place is still in session, and the legislation with which we are concerned is just about to be enacted.

I do not think that we can make it appear that we are walking out on our responsibilities in this way. Let us remember that the same people who now charge us with being rubber stamps will then accuse us of being irresponsible. In the same way, let us remember that those who have been complaining most about the uncertainty and the damage to business caused by the delay in the enactment of tax reforms are now asking this house to assume responsibility for further delay. These contradictions should be apparent to all.

Reference was made earlier to the editorial in the Vancouver Sun of Wednesday, December 15, which I have before me. It criticizes the Government's policy in introducing closure. I certainly do not condemn the Vancouver Sun for doing that. The editorial then goes on, however, to say:

> The government has also ordered its majority of Liberal senators to whip the measure through the Upper House in time to go into effect on January 1.

And further on in the editorial it is stated:

> If the Senate does any such thing, it will affirm its own uselessness—

And so on.

A further paragraph of the editorial reads:

> It will know, too, that the government deliberately exposed it as such. The government's decision to invoke closure in the Commons was so timed that the Senate couldn't even read the tax bill—

Is the writer complaining that the other place was given too long a period to discuss this measure, that closure should have been enforced earlier? I am a little bewildered by these contradictions.

A great deal has been said and with merit regarding our limited opportunity to study and lack of expertise respecting the tax reforms. I am somewhat familiar with these reforms. I have been involved in tax investigations over the years. The proposed tax reforms, as I see them, although I do not defend them now, are based on certain principles which have not changed. I sat on a royal commission on taxation in Quebec at the same time as the Carter Royal Commission held hearings, and we met frequently. The principles have not changed, whether they are right or wrong.

I suggest also that no more thorough study of these underlying principles can be made than has already been carried out by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This applies not only to the study of the underlying principles, but to the study of the principal changes envisioned. There was, for example—and reference has been made to it—the detailed study of and recommendations regarding the White Paper on Taxation, after many witnesses were heard. The same witnesses will wish to appear before our committee if we proceed in the way in which I think we will. These recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to its credit, materially affected the subsequent policy adopted by the Government. There followed the more recent study, which began in September and resulted in the production of three reports. These studies have given leading members of the Senate the expertise required to discuss fully and intelligently the propositions which will be before us.

I certainly oppose the idea of a time limit, and we are not in a position to impose one in any event. I do believe very strongly that we should proceed immediately upon receiving the bill, and continue to debate it until we feel our work is completed. I am not suggesting that we will complete this task this year, because changes such as are contemplated cannot be made with finality in one session, or even one Parliament. There will be further changes and amendments, such as there are every year in tax legislation. There is no doubt that the Senate will have further opportunities to consider and recommend further changes in the light of an experience which we do not now have.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that you will have detected in Senator Goldenberg's very reasoned presentation his long association with the labour movement.

I am troubled by the limited choices that we appear to have, as indicated in the debate so far and in the debates that I have followed previously. Apparently we have a choice of adjourning, to show our displeasure with the cavalier treatment we are receiving from the other house.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: Or we can sit night and day until the end of the year in order to meet the Government's deadline, or we can quickly rubber-stamp the legislation and pass it without amendment.

I am wondering who imposed these limitations on us. I reject the proposition to adjourn. I do not think that we discharge our responsibility by abdicating it. I reject also the proposition that we sit night and day, because I do not accept the philosophy of having legislation by exhaustion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: I do not believe that we should follow that procedure. Nor do I accept the proposition that we must take it, rubber-stamp it in three sittings as a form of intellectual honesty, as one honourable senator said, and immediately pass it. I am sure there are more choices available to us than that.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the Government Leader, Senator Martin, who said unequivocally that there is no closure, no guillotine rule, that the Senate makes its own rules. I am one of those who reject the view of the Commons that we do not have the right to amend money bills. I think we do have that right, and we have a responsibility to exercise it.

I am troubled by many sections of the bill, and I am not about to be intimidated by the Vancouver Sun or anyone else who suggests that not to do the Government's bidding is to commit some form of suicide.

I am troubled because nowhere in the legislation does it recognize that trade unionists even exist. There is a classification both in the regulations and the bill, for salesmen, but the legislation does nothing for the dignity of labour. For a very important section of the Canadian fabric to be classified with used car salesmen is something that we should comment on when the bill is examined.

Surely those who serve on our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee have the right to propose amendments, and if other honourable senators wish to propose amendments, and are able to persuade us of their reasonableness and justification, surely they have the right to propose them, and we should send the bill back to the other place should that be necessary.

I am not concerned with the desire of the Government to have the legislation passed by December 31. I think it is a reasonable desire for any government to want to reach a goal which it has set, and if we are able to pass this bill within the time set it would be a fortunate coincidence for the Government. However, if in discharging our responsibility and examining the bill thoroughly, it takes us to January 2, 5 or 25, or if we have to adjourn until the chairman of the committee can advise us on some of these matters, then we must be prepared for such a delay.

Surely there is no reason why, in the interim, we could not deal with many sections of the legislation in an orderly fashion. I suggest that many senators are allowing themselves to be somewhat panicked by public pressure and the press. We should not minimize the importance of this bill as a major piece of legislation, but we should deal with it in the same calm and orderly fashion as we would any other significant piece of legislation. If it warrants amendments, those amendments should be made and sent to the other place for consideration.

I have heard it suggested that if we do not rubber-stamp this legislation, the next bill to come before us will be to abolish the Senate. If that should happen, we should deal with the bill calmly, perhaps amend it, but do whatever is necessary.

There is a very important principle here for me as a trade unionist. I have not spent half a lifetime negotiating labour contracts that provide a five-day week to come to the Senate to work all hours or on Saturdays and Sundays. However, there are working days available to us between now and whatever time it takes to review the bill, and we should work on those days. I recognize that it will require some sacrifice. Those of us with young families, as well as other senators, may have to sacrifice our planned Christmas holidays. While we reject being intimidated by the press and by pressure from the other place, we should not allow ourselves to be intimidated by Santa Claus. We should allow ourselves time to properly discharge our responsibilities, and I am prepared to make the necessary sacrifice.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I am not sufficiently knowledgeable to be concerned with the contents of this bill. Some people call it a bill for tax reform. Others have called it a bill for tax confusion. Which is right, I do not know. Our only concern should be that no external force should attempt to place a deadline upon the time we give to considering this or any other bill.

I am not afraid of the threat to abolish the Senate. Actually that threat does not come, as someone has suggested, from the Leader of the Government or from the Prime Minister. The threat for extinction of the Senate comes from the Senate itself. I say in all sincerity to my friends opposite—and I hope that some of them are my friends—that if today, tomorrow or later on they vote down the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, they will be voting for the end of the Senate. Let us make no mistake about it. If the Senate has not the right to debate, at any length it chooses, a bill coming before it, then the Senate has no place in the political structure of Canada—no place whatsoever.

John Stuart Mill, the spiritual father of their party, and others have all pointed out at one time or another that the greatest danger to representative government is the tyranny of majorities. That is what is threatening at this time.

My good friend, Senator Carl Goldenberg, said at the outset of his speech that he did not wish to go beyond a certain date because he thought the people of Canada would condemn us as being irresponsible. I am afraid that my friends opposite are labouring under a grave misapprehension regarding the state of public opinion on this bill. They had the same grave misapprehension in the case of the pipe line debate. Certain people were sure that the people of Canada were on their side, and were greatly disabused of that idea a few months later. My duty all through life has been to watch public opinion. I say in all sincerity that never, never in all the years that I have been watching Parliament, have I seen such unanimity all across this country against the position of the Government in trying to force this bill through this house in this way. Let us not be mistaken about that.

I want to say a word to the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should have stayed out.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: When he came to this house—and we were all glad to see him occupy this high position—he told us that he did not come here to preside over the liquidation of the Senate. I say to him now that if he refuses to accept Senator Flynn's motion, that is precisely what he will be doing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is nonsense.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: He will be associating himself with those who are trying to bring about the end of this chamber.

My long time friend, Senator John Connolly, came here the other day with a special plea to pass this bill. I hear over and over again—I have been hearing it ad nauseum—of the toil, the brains, and the ability which the committee put into certain amendments. Well, where is the gentleman who headed that committee? I have great respect for him. Are the members of that committee, from either side of this house, now going to stand up and vote against the proposed amendments?

My friend Senator Lang spoke a while ago of the generosity, as he called it, of Mr. Benson in appearing before the committee and giving us some good intentions. I think he meant well, but I think he meant well feebly. He never mentioned the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I have—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I beg your pardon, he never used the word "Senate", and you can look at the record. He spoke of "your amendment" which could mean anything outside, but not once did he use the phrase "the amendments of the Senate", nor did he say he would accept them. He said "We will give them consideration later on"—sunshine for your grandchildren. I am not impressed by that, and I do not feel this house should be impressed by it.

I repeat, if honourable senators rise and vote against this motion, then they will be sitting at the wake of the Senate, and it not even a good Irish wake. Make no mistake about it.

This chamber is not popular in public opinion. I have travelled all over this country trying to defend the Senate. I appeared before university audiences, and so forth. If this bill is passed in the time limit imposed upon us by the ministry, or by the representatives of the ministry in this house, then I would not feel like going to any university or appearing before any audience in this country to defend the Senate. I would be glad to see its abolition.

I spoke the other day against the guaranteed annual income. If this house yields to the dictates of a majority and refuse to pass Senator Flynn's motion then all we are doing is taking a guaranteed annual wage while performing no service for it. We are certainly not performing the service that was laid down for us in the British North America Act.

I shall say something else to my friend—and he is my friend. Fifty years ago I sat over in that corner for two sessions of the Senate. I sat there when Senator James Lougheed was the Conservative leader; I sat there when Senator Raoul Dandurand was the Liberal leader; and I sat there when Senator Arthur Meighen was the Conservative leader. James Lougheed never took orders from the Conservative Prime Minister, and neither did Arthur Meighen take orders from Prime Minister R.B. Bennett. If my friend can show me one instance, then I ask him to do so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I can show you a number.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Senator Raoul Dandurand never took orders from the Prime Minister. Raoul Dandurand looked upon this Senate as an independent body which should take legislation cold.

Arthur Meighen never even went to a Conservative caucus. He said: "I cannot sit in cabinet and mould legislation, and then come here and refuse it. I will take the legislation cold." He made that announcement to R.B. Bennett, and Bennett accepted it. I know these things for facts.

Dandurand did not believe in two sides of this house. He said that all senators were here only for the purpose of studying legislation and letting conscience be their guide, and having men of ability to help guide their conscience. This is exactly what we are missing here.

I am not suggesting that the Leader of the Government had made threats. I accept his explanation, but I say that if we are not going to accept our responsibility, if we as senators are not going to play the part we are supposed to play under the Constitution—or, if you like, the B.N.A. Act—then we have no right to exist. We have no right to be here if we are not going to perform the task given to us under the Constitution. As far as I am concerned the Senate could be abolished tomorrow, and I would say "good riddance."

I wonder if honourable senators really know what the public is saying about the Senate? It is mostly unjust, I know, and some of it illiterate, but they say it and think it, and they will say it again tomorrow, only with more justification if you do not accept Senator Flynn's motion. I say that very sincerely. I believe with my whole heart that there is a spirit against this house in Canada, and it has been growing during the past few days—because of what? It is because the people outside think that we are going to bow to the will of the Government. That is what they are thinking. Read this morning's newspapers. They are not concerned with the bill, or the contents of the bill. They are asking just one question, and that is, "Does the Senate exist or does it not? Is it going to perform its responsibilities or is it not?"

My friend a while ago was terribly concerned about an editorial in the Vancouver Sun. Do you know who wrote that editorial? It was written by Mr. Bruce Hutchison who has been a loyal heart to the Liberal party, or what is called the Liberal party, for many, many years.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He has been wrong so often.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Listen to what he has to say. He is not concerned with the contents of the bill. The editorial states in part:

> Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's revolutionary concept of "participatory democracy" has now reached its final refinement, with everyone having a say in the law-making process except the House of Commons and the Senate.
> Under the new guillotine rule, the governing Liberals will use their majority power to force the house on Friday to pass the entirely new tax law for Canada, with about two-thirds of its 332 clauses either not debated or not approved in detail.
> The government has also ordered its majority of Liberal senators to whip the measure through the Upper House in time to go into effect on January 1.

Now, there may not have been direct orders, but what does it mean if you do not accept Senator Flynn's motion? Do you not want to sit here and consider this bill further? Are you telling me that you know all you want to know about this bill? Mr. Benson says he does not know everything he wants to know. No one in the House of Commons professes to know all about this bill. The tax experts clear across the country say they do not understand the bill, and yet you people sit here and tell us, "Look, we do not need to wait until January 10. We know all we need to know about this bill". That is nonsense. I do not know a thing about this bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I just want to make sure we are talking about the same thing.

The purpose of the motion is not that we should sit until January 10, as the honourable senator has just said, but that we should leave now and not come back until January 10. That is the proposal.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is all right. What is wrong with that?

• (1640)

Hon. Mr. Martin: But that is not what you have just said.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You know perfectly well what I mean.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I want to be sure.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Make no mistake about it, if you believe in those amendments that your distinguished colleague moved—and indeed he told me once he was going to insist on their passage, which you all applauded—are you rejecting them now? Why do you not come back and consider them here? Why do you not come back on January 10? What is wrong with that? Let us return here and have a second look—what they call a sober second look—or any kind of look. So far as I am concerned, I will sit tomorrow and the day after; I will sit Christmas Day. But that is not the way to deal with these matters.

Senator Lawson put it well when he said he did not believe in legislation by exhaustion. That is not the way to consider legislation. Let us take these Christmas days off and have a bit of reflection, after which perhaps we will have more kindly feelings towards one another and even towards this Government, although I find that hard. Let us all come back feeling refreshed, sit down calmly, and see what we can do about this bill.

What can the Senate do to justify its existence? That is what is at stake. If we abdicate our responsibilities now and say we must do what the other place wants us to do, then why are we here at all? Are we here because occasionally we have a committee to look into poverty? Is that the only meaning of the existence of this house? Are we here to have a committee to look into the mass media? And what in the name of heaven has happened about that? What will happen about the report of any committee this house sets up?

This house must declare that no one shall put a deadline upon its deliberations.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: We should make that absolutely clear to the country, and one way to do it is to support this motion. You cannot sit back and say, "We support the idea. We will do this and we will do that." Here is a clear cut proposition before us. Let no one outside dictate to us how, or when, or for how long we should discuss these bills. Let no one do it. We are here to discharge our own responsibilities. We make our own rules. If we do not do that, the country will say—and the country will say rightly—that the Senate has no place in the structure of government in Canada, and should be abolished.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I did not intend to participate in this debate, and my remarks will be brief. I will reluctantly vote against Senator Flynn's amendment, not because I am not in sympathy with it but because I think a decision to do as he asks today would be misinterpreted very badly. I am jealous of the reputation of the Senate, and I want to see it continue. I think it would be unwise to pass this motion.

I should like to follow the procedure outlined by my friend Senator Lawson, which I think is the right one. Apart from Senator Flynn's excellent presentation, we have had two very good speeches on this subject by Senator Lang and by Senator Lawson. I think most of us are prepared to sit here and discuss this bill for as long as is necessary. If we cannot do what we consider justice to the bill by the deadline that has been set, then I would be perfectly happy to go into the new year. I am sure the heavens would not fall if we did that. I think that would be better tactics. It would not be wise, because of the misinterpretation it would evoke, if we adjourned today, so I will oppose the motion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: How can there be misinterpretation if we make the right interpretation clear and give reasons why we are doing this?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I will not argue it. That is my interpretation.

I read carefully the report of the meeting last Monday with the Minister of Finance, and I was looking for some evidence that he had made a commitment. I have come to the same conclusion as Senator Lang, that there is no commitment that even one amendment will be accepted. I realize the difficulty the minister is in; he cannot commit the cabinet. However, I say to you that we must have more assurance than we have been given that some of the amendments proposed by the Senate committee will be accepted early in the new year. The bill that is coming to us tomorrow afternoon, to which some 150 amendments have been proposed, is not the same bill as the unamended version which will be approved within a month, two months, or whatever it may be.

With regret, Senator Flynn, I will oppose your motion, for I think a very good reason. Nevertheless, we must give this matter the fullest consideration. As far as I am concerned the deadline does not matter a bit, even if it does inconvenience Mr. Benson or the cabinet.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I thought for some moments this afternoon that it would be unnecessary for me to say anything, because the things I thought ought to be said had already been said, and so well said. We have listened to some very fine speeches this afternoon, beginning with a most comprehensive and logical speech from Senator Flynn. There may have been certain features with which I did not agree, but it was a masterly presentation of his case. Nobody could listen unmoved to the superb eloquence of Senator O'Leary, presenting those great principles of parliamentary government of which he is such an eloquent defender. Nobody could listen to the careful and reasoned speech of Senator Lang without being impressed by it, at least so I feel.

But it seems to me that essentially there is just one question at issue on this motion of Senator Flynn's this afternoon. I do not think there is very much difference of opinion among most of us here, on whichever side of the house we sit, about the necessity of giving this bill just as much, as thorough and as prolonged consideration as the Senate sees fit. At any rate, I am quite sure I am not alone on the Liberal side of the house in feeling this.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If there are Liberals who feel differently, that is their responsibility. I find myself in accord with my friends Senator Cameron and Senator Goldenberg at least, on this matter, and I think in accord with other senators. As far as I am concerned the question is not shall the Senate give whatever consideration it deems adequate to this bill. The question is: Shall it start tomorrow afternoon when the legislation reaches us or shall it put off that consideration for more than three weeks? That seems to me to be the critical question before us this afternoon on Senator Flynn's motion, and that is why I cannot vote for it.

I yield to no one, not even Senator O'Leary, in my belief that this house should not be pushed around or bulldozed or dictated to, or any of the other strong terms he may have used or may have thought of, or that other people could use. The central issue raised by this motion is simply, shall we start that thorough, adequate and detailed, as detailed as we think necessary, consideration tomorrow when the legislation reaches us, or shall we go off on holidays for over three weeks and begin that consideration only after that period has elapsed. I do not see how we can justify to the people of Canada interposing this hiatus, this gap, in our consideration of this legislation. That is why I feel, with some reluctance, obliged to vote against Senator Flynn's motion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Is he not aware that, I would say, three-quarters of the senators who do not live close to Ottawa, Montreal, or Toronto—who form 98 per cent of the Senate—made their plane reservations some months ago, as they had to do? You cannot anticipate that there will be more than a corporal's guard here after December 22. Let us not joke about that.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: My honourable friend has asked me a question. In the first place, I think the public interest should come before the private interest of any member of this house. I realize that I am in an unusually favourable position; I live here and have no plans to go away to the Caribbean, Jamaica, or even across the river to Hull, for the Christmas season. I propose to stay put.

At the same time, it does seem to me that while there may be senators who are in a position where they simply cannot be here, the great bulk of members of the house would be able to be here for a considerable part of the period which may be necessary to give this bill prompt and adequate consideration. I am not persuaded that it is not possible to make arrangements, including transportation arrangements, for senators who find themselves in particular difficulties. I think this should be possible, and I even have some reason to think so from things I have heard from authoritative sources.

If the proponents of this motion are going to take their responsibility as senators as seriously as they have said over and over again—and with eloquence that has torn the purple off the clouds—surely they must be prepared to make some personal sacrifice, accept some personal inconvenience. If I lived in Vancouver or in St. John's, Newfoundland, or even in my native place, Grand Bank, which is even more inaccessible, I should still say exactly the same thing as I have said now.

Hon. John Nichol: Honourable senators, I will only take a moment or two of your time. Senator O'Leary mentioned an editorial in the Vancouver Sun which reads, in part, as follows:

> The Government has also ordered its majority of Liberal senators to whip the measure through the Upper House in time to go into effect on January 1.

Senator O'Leary questioned this statement, and questioned it quite correctly, as far as I can see. This is not given as an opinion of the editor of the Vancouver Sun but as a statement of fact, and I rise to say that as far as I am concerned it is inaccurate. I do not know how other Liberal senators feel about the editorial.

My second point is in regard to Senator Choquette's remark about travel problems. Those of us who come from British Columbia, I suggest, have a more serious problem than most other people, though perhaps not more serious than Newfoundlanders. The only person who lives farther away than I do is Senator Heath, who lives in Nanaimo—in the banana belt.

I think it is most inconvenient that this bill should come to us at this time, but I suggest that our responsibility to this institution and to the people who pay our bills is to get on with it as quickly as we can and stay on it as long as we have to. The suggestion that it would be more responsible to adjourn to January 10 does not carry any logic that I can see. We should come here on Saturday and if we cannot put the bill through by January 1, then we must sit beyond January 1. We will not get it through any earlier by waiting to begin until January 10. The logic of this suggestion escapes me.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, I was deeply impressed, as usual, by the speech delivered by our most distinguished colleague, Senator O'Leary. He told us he was prepared to sit here even on Christmas Day and New Year's Day. That is very nice, but the vote that he is about to make on this motion just contradicts what he said. He should amend the motion. Why should we lose ten days this year to gain ten days next year?

Senator O'Leary gave a wonderful demonstration of his freedom here as a senator. He has made up his mind freely whether he will vote for or against the motion, and I enjoy the same freedom to vote for or against. I do not like to be pushed around or be terrorized by the Opposition, who state we are killing the Senate, bringing shame on it all over the country. That is not so. We are perfectly free to do as we wish. If I vote against the motion, I am using the same freedom as anyone who is prepared to vote in favour of it.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to indicate why I will vote against this motion. I listened to the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Opposition that we should have a three-week recess and come back on January 10. While I look with great respect and fondness on Senator Grattan O'Leary, if the employees on his newspaper were to say they wanted three weeks for contemplation or relaxation, he would be outraged. They may get two days.

I look over to my friend the senator who, with great ability and skill, has fought for the rights of labour unions. I think he would be delighted if the members of labour unions were to get a three-week holiday at Christmas because of a plea by the Leader of the Opposition that they needed to rest up for three weeks.

If there is any justification for the abolition of the Senate, it would be that we accept this motion on the basis that for three weeks we must rest up, that we cannot contemplate the technicalities and principles of this bill without having that three weeks' rest. If we were to vote for this motion on that basis—and it is clearly stated that it is January 10—that only by then we would feel fit and full of vigour again, we would be a laughing stock to the whole of the working people of Canada. For that reason, I intend to vote against the motion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would you go for January 5?

Hon. Mr. Thompson: No. I am here to work. I came here to assume my responsibility and I intend to assume it.

• (1700)

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, in his remarks Senator Lang made the point that we are here to represent the provinces. With all respect to the provinces, there are other reasons why we are here. But as a representative of the Province of New Brunswick I regard this motion as nothing more than a delaying motion. In that respect I do not believe it to be constructive, and I do propose to vote against it.

I am in agreement with Senator O'Leary in that I do not pretend to understand all this bill. Even if I were to study it from now until doomsday I could not understand it, with its legalistic jargon and its involvements that only tax experts could pretend to understand. No, I do not understand all of it. I suspect that Senator O'Leary and many other senators would never understand it all. Moreover, I do not think that the Senate, even if it were to sit now for two solid months, would be able to introduce amendments that would make this a perfect tax bill. I am sure most of you will agree with that.

This whole matter has been before not just Parliament but the whole country now for a number of years. The best tax minds in the nation have made their representations. Barristers have made representations on behalf of their clients, corporate and otherwise. Surely the time has come to relieve the uncertainties that the corporate structure tells us exist in the country. Witnesses have suggested to our committee, and to the other place, that the delays and uncertainties involved have held back major capital investments in this nation. Surely it is a time to end those uncertainties and the upset in the economic structure that has been created, we are told, by those delays.

As a New Brunswicker I do not want to see further delays. With others I am prepared to sit now and do my bit, however small, in getting the reformed tax law before the nation. As a New Brunswicker I must think of the thousands of small wage earners in my province who are below, many of them far below, the poverty level referred to in the excellent report recently presented to this chamber by Senator Croll and his committee on poverty. And yet, although they are below that poverty level and even have to scrimp for a living—thank God they are still working for a living—they are still paying taxes. Thousands of those people will come off the rolls because of their very small earnings. Thousands more of my fellow New Brunswickers will get a reduction in taxation.

There is great uncertainty in a number of the major industries of New Brunswick today. There are slowdowns and shut-downs threatened for the next few weeks, and it is reported that those shut-downs will cause the loss of 1,400 full-time jobs in my province. Whether that can be related to the uncertainties being created by delays, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Of course not.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Senator O'Leary shakes his head. Perhaps he is more familiar with the situation than I am.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It will not affect the workers at all. The bill goes into effect on January 1 regardless of what we do.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I appreciate that thesis, but it is not true.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is true. It is stated clearly. So what are you arguing about?

Hon. Mr. McElman: If we were to follow through the proposition that we have heard, then who is to say that the three weeks proposed, starting sometime in January, is going to give us a better bill or a more effective bill?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: The point is that we have the right, at least, to do it.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Who is to say that it will take three months, or the year that some are proposing we should take? It may take two years. How long do we malinger in dealing with tax reform? That is the whole point.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Malinger?

Hon. Mr. McElman: Yes, malinger, senator. If you wish to dispute the use of the word, let us hear what you have to say.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I object to any suggestion that the Senate would be malingering.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Would "procrastinate" be more appropriate, in your opinion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, putting off; procrastinating, yes.

Hon. Mr. McElman: The whole proposition is that we delay. Many of the propositions being put forward by editorial writers and elements of the corporate structure are also that we continue to delay. They want us to delay so that they can make further representations—repetitions of representations they have already made. I do not think anything is to be gained by further delay. We are here. A bill is to come before us. Let us get on with it now. If it takes until mid-January or mid-February, all right, but let us not go home now before we even get the bill. Let us get on with the thing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Leader of the Opposition speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall not detain you long. I want only to answer briefly a few of the arguments put forward by some honourable senators who participated in the debate. I shall proceed in reverse and say a few words with respect to what the last speaker, Senator McElman, had to say. He seemed to suggest that a delaying motion is always an obstructive motion.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Not always.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, that is what you said.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He used the word "malingering".

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At any rate, you must agree that a delaying motion is not always an obstructive motion.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I did not say "always". I suggested that this motion is obstructive.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest that sometimes it is a very good thing to delay a decision, and to think it over before making it. That is the essence of my motion.

I was very interested to listen to the remarks of Senators Goldenberg, Lawson and Forsey. They are newcomers here, and they reacted as people who have no knowledge at all of the ways in which Parliament operates.

Hon. Mr. Martin: They have been writing about it for years.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They seem to think that Parliament never recesses. We always recess at Christmas, even if we have some bills that are not passed. We always recess in June, even if numerous bills have accumulated. That has always been the case.

All honourable senators know that it was indicated a long time ago that the Government was trying to adjourn the house on December 17, and that there was no need to pass legislation in the other place except this bill and the appropriation bill. When the house adjourns there will still be many pieces of legislation on the Order Paper. We never finish all our work here. There are always some bills which remain on the Order Paper at the end of a session, or at the time of adjournment. To say that you can never go away while there is legislation before Parliament is simply ridiculous, and it shows ignorance of the way Parliament works.

• (1710)

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Nobody said that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Goldenberg, Senator Lawson, and Senator Forsey said that since the legislation is there it must be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I never said that. I have been around these institutions for many years now, and would never say that.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I also rise on a question of privilege. I have been around these precincts for a very long time. I was brought up in the shadow of the old buildings. My grandfather was chief clerk of votes and proceedings of the House of Commons from 1888 to 1915, and in 1888 had already spent 33 years in the service of the Assembly of the Province of Canada and the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada. If Senator Flynn thinks I do not know about these things he is very much mistaken. If he imagines anything to the contrary he is grossly deceiving himself.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: If I may rise in defence of Senator Flynn on one point, I confess that I am a rookie, but I still have an understanding of the proceedings in this place, and I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, I cannot remember who said it, but I am happy that I have succeeded in having three honourable senators jump up one after the other, and particularly to have Senator Forsey tell us about his grandfather. I did not know experience could be inherited.

Honourable senators, I was just saying that it is entirely wrong to assume that Parliament should never recess unless it has cleared the Order Paper. We always take recess at Chritsmas, and we always take recess during the summer. There is a great difference between urgency and importance where legislation is concerned. Legislation may be urgent without being important, and it may be important without being urgent. And now we are told that that kind of legislation which has been on the Order Paper of the other place for six months needs to be passed in 10 days. No, absolutely not.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: That is what you suggested.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You probably did not read the motion, or did not understand my suggestion which was that this is not the proper time at which, nor are these proper circumstances in which, to deal with this type of legislation. When I suggested the Senate should adjourn today until January 10, I did so because I felt that would be a more appropriate time to deal with the legislation and to do a good job of it. I assure you it is not because I want to go away. Honourable senators will discover—and I shall leave you with this thought—that if we proceed with the legislation at this time we will not do a good job of it. We will not do a good job of it because we will not be able to. It will be impossible to do a good job of it. The bill will of course go through, and it will go through quickly, but you will find that what I am telling you is true; that we will not be in a position to deal with it as we should deal with it. It is not because we want to go away. If we deal with this legislation during this time, will we have the experts? Will we have the people we need?

I am not trying to avoid criticism. I am not afraid of what the press may say. I have said so before. I am not at all afraid of that. All I am suggeting is that we do what we think we should do, and in the best possible circumstances. Nobody can deny that we have been told by the Government to pass this legislation by December 31. Even Senator McElman has said that we have to pass it because the small wage earner may benefit as from January 1. If that is not suggesting that we have to deal with it before December 31, I do not know what it is.

Senator Lawson also said that we should stay here, and if we are not through by December 31 we can continue in January. I suggest to you that we will use our time much better by coming back on January 10 than by trying to work on a complex bill like this in the circumstances I have mentioned.

I know what is going to be the result of the vote. There is within the huge Liberal majority with many active members a silent majority that will dispose of it very quickly. Nevertheless, I considered it my duty to warn the Senate that we are being asked to do something in exceptional circumstances. I dare to predict that we will not do a good job.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by honourable Senator Choquette, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 10, 1972, at two o'clock in the afternoon. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since there is uncertainty of opinion will those in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would those against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[Later:]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. The Leader of the Government assured us that there would be no closure in the Senate. I was standing at the door with Senator Sparrow—and there were two witnesses as eminent as we need—and had the door closed in my face by the page. I was at the door, and the bell was still ringing. I suggest to Your Honour that the vote was improperly taken. A senator has the right to remain outside the chamber while the bell is ringing.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Your Whip came in.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This is as ancient a rule of procedure as there is. I hope Your Honour will take this into consideraton and inquire. I am not blaming the page. He said he had instructions—instructions to close the door in the face of two senators. Perhaps the Government Leader will renew his assurance that there will be no closure. I cannot think of any worse form of closure than having the door slammed in the face of a senator. Is that not closure? He was closing the door, not opening it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure that the consensus of the Senate—which was reflected on both sides—to the observations of Senator Grosart will convince him that his reference to closure was not accepted in the manner, however regrettably, he put it forward. I point out that the two Whips, Senator Langlois and Senator Macdonald, came in. If the senator was denied the right, we regret it. I do not agree with the term closure, especially as used by the honourable Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Point of order.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am speaking on a point of order now. I am about to help you.

I suggest that Senator Grosart be recorded as having voted for the motion put forward by Senator Flynn.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Grosart has raised a question of privilege, and since he felt that he should say a few words with regard to it perhaps I might also speak. We have followed, as far as I am concerned, the general practice. When I saw both Whips, Senator Langlois and Senator Macdonald, take their seats I waited a certain time because some other senators in the chamber were in conversation. Then I called for order and, of course, took the vote.

If the honourable Senator Grosart would like me to inquire further into this, I will do so. I assure him, however, that this vote did not take place before both Whips were in their seats.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think Senator Sparrow would like to record his vote. What side would you be on, sir?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: If permitted to do so, I would like my vote recorded as being opposed to the motion.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, the point I make is not whether the Whips were in but whether we intend in the future to follow our practice of years of not closing the doors while the bell is still ringing. Surely that is the purpose of the bell, to warn senators that when it ceases they may not enter. I suggest it is a confusing practice if we are to have differing signals to His Honour the Speaker as to when a senator may record his vote.

• (1730)

The recording of a vote is a very important matter. I suggest that the ringing of the bell has traditionally been for the guidance of senators. It is a question that I should like His Honour to take up, in order to ensure that in future when the bell is ringing the doors are not closed in the face of any senator.

I should like to make one further comment. I regret that Senator Martin mistook my remarks on closure. It was meant to be obiter dictum, to be humorous. In the mood I was in, I may not have expressed myself in a manner which sounded humorous to him.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I thank the honourable senator. I have forgotten anything he said against me that I did not like.

SENATE ACCOUNTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I gather that the report of the committee covers the same ground as that covered in the other house and is in conformity with most of the representations in the Beaupré Report. However, I see a discrepancy between the text as published in the Minutes of the Proceedings in English and that published in French. The document, as adopted in the other house and as reproduced here in French in four paragraphs, refers to travelling between:

> la localité où ils habitent ou leur circonscription et Ottawa,

The English text refers to "their place of residence and Ottawa", without referring to "constituency".

The word "constituency" is used in the other place, and I submit that in this place the French version in our Minutes should prevail and the word "constituency" used. Senators from the Province of Quebec do have "constituencies".

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Divisions.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: Or "circonscriptions". For practical purposes, to change anything of that nature would not greatly increase the expenditure. I for one would not wish to impose my presence on the good people of the Gulf Region for 52 weeks of the year. Nevertheless, it is a constitutional requirement. It is in the Constitution. I suggest that the text of the rules of this house, whether they be internal economy rules or others, should recognize this fact.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, the remarks of Senator Lafond have come as a unique coincidence, because only half an hour ago I discussed this matter with our Director of Administration. I would like the chairman of our committee to recognize that in matters of administration we have fought for equality with the other house. I represent Kenora-Rainy River, which encompasses perhaps one-eighth of the Province of Ontario. I was for 20 years a member of the House of Commons and was not entitled to expenses in moving from town A to town B, C, D, E or F, each being 100 miles apart.

My understanding has been that there is a regulation in the other place which entitles members of Parliament who travel to various communities in their constituency, in order to meet with their constituents, to receive a car allowance of 16 cents per mile. I submitted such a bill here and was told by our administration that they knew nothing about such a regulation. I cheerfully withdrew my account. As I say, just half an hour ago I discussed this matter with our office and inquired whether we had equal status with members of the other house in this respect.

Hon. Mr. Smith: What was their answer?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: The answer was that they did not know, that the matter would be taken up with our chairman, Senator Smith, and an investigation made.

Hon. Mr. Smith: I do not intend to close the debate, but I should like to reply to the point raised by Senator Lafond. It was conveyed to me that there was no departure in form or context from that passed by the House of Commons. In other words, I was assured that honourable senators had extended to them those improved rights and privileges with respect to travelling expenses which were recently extended to members of the House of Commons. The recommendations extended no more and no fewer rights and privileges. I am inclined to believe, from the discussions we had when preparing this item for consideration by the committee some time ago, that there is a basic principle of law involved. I have been informed that there is no such thing as a constituency within the Senate. There are what are called "divisions"—

• (1740)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Only in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Yes. People must be assigned to these divisions, and they must own property of a certain value in order to qualify for membership.

I do not know what the French translation of the word "division" is. Is it "division"?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is only in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Yes, it exists only in the Province of Quebec and for very good historical reasons.

There is a reason for using the word "constituency" in the House of Commons which does not apply to this chamber. My constituency, for example, is the Province of Nova Scotia.

I wanted to point out to Senator Lafond and to others that the new regulations will provide for a rather generous privilege with respect to travelling within one's so-called constituency—his "division". Under the new rule he will be allowed to travel ten times each year, and if this rule does not work to the satisfaction of Senator Lafond or any other senator who may feel restricted—Senator Benidickson has felt this way for some years—then I, as chairman of the committee, would be glad to view favourably any proposal that the committee might want to consider in improving the situation.

I do not believe there is anything else I can add. I hope that the extensions, after they have been carefully read by honourable senators, will be accepted. These extensions appear at page 493 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of Wednesday, December 15, 1971. They are rather important extensions of our former rights and privileges.

We are entitled, as members of Parliament—not as members of the House of Commons—to equal treatment in matters of this nature. We have attained that, as indeed we have with respect to the treatment of our staff at all levels. Senators get exactly the same amount of indemnity as the members of the House of Commons.

I should also draw to the attention of those who may be interested one particular item of the new order, and that is paragraph (a)(i) which puts into effect a restrictive change. This restricts senators' visits to their residences to one a week. This is not a privilege which has been abused, to the best of my knowledge, by members of the Senate, but the added extensions of our privileges are such that there has to be a restriction as to their use. In order to get a moderate restriction of these things it is necessary to have a base from which we can calculate how many trips to various parts of the country, or even one's "constituency", we are going to have. I simply draw that to your attention, but, in general, these are favourable and welcome extensions.

It will be possible for the first time for senators to see parts of this country which they should see, and also to bring their wives to Ottawa at public expense.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And some of them will be able to campaign for their parties.

Hon. Mr. Smith: They will be able to campaign for the NDP, the Social Credit, or for whatever independents they wish.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have one suggestion to make. I feel there is ample provision for any requirement I might have, so it is not a question of the amount of money, but at the moment we have both an English and a French version and they are not the same. I have no quarrel if there is good reason to delete the word "constituency" from the English report if it is not applicable to this house. Nonetheless, there is a constitutional requirement as far as senators from the Province of Quebec are concerned, and that is that they must hold a senatorial division. If we must delete the word "constituency", then we should insert the words "senatorial division".

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising again, but perhaps I can excuse myself for doing so on the basis of a point of privilege.

The Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee was extremely sympathetic with and understanding of the position some senators are in. My point of privilege is with respect to his statement that I complained for a number of years about the situation. That is not so. I suffered under this for many years, having to pay for airplane transport to visit my constituents, travelling sometimes a thousand miles.

We have achieved a fair amount of parity in our rules in this respect with those of the other house, and I hope, in the recommendations of the committee, that we continue our endeavours in that direction. I hope the chairman will give consideration to subsequent amendments.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, there is a restriction, it seems to me, that will now be imposed upon senators whose provinces are a far distance from Ottawa. Any senator from a distant province who establishes residence in Ottawa will now be limited to ten trips a year to his home province, whereas under the present rules such a senator can travel back and forth as frequently as he requires.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have to keep a residence in your home province.

Hon. Mr. Smith: The regulations have no such effect. This situation has existed for a good many years. A senator from Nova Scotia may choose to have a permanent residence in Ottawa, but he is registered as a resident of his home province and there is no question about his eligibility for the same treatment as everyone else.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question which will probably provide Senator Flynn with proof of his aspersions upon my lack of knowledge of this place. It is probably perfectly clear to everyone else, but it is not clear to me. I should like to know whether we are adopting the English version of this report, or the French version? I want to know which one is to be authoritative. Under the Constitution, and the Official Languages Act, both are authoritative. But which one are we adopting? It makes no difference to me, but it may make a difference to some members of this place.

It is not only in paragraph (a)(i) that there is a difference, but also in paragraphs (a)(ii) and (a)(iii).

[Translation]

In French it says: ". . . ou leur circonscription . . ." but in English, it is entirely different.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Smith: Perhaps I can reply to that briefly, and hopefully clarify the situation.

When we were considering this in the plenary session of the Internal Economy Committee the other day we had only the English version before us. Up to that time, as far as I know, the French version was not available. There is apparently some doubt as to whether the translation is accurate, and, of course, that will be looked into very carefully. If there are any discrepancies they can easily be corrected.

This is the version we considered, and this is the version I refer to in moving the adoption of the report.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

VOTING PROCEDURE

CORRECTION OF DIVISION LIST—STATEMENT BY HIS HONOUR THE SPEAKER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday the honourable Senator Grosart rose on a question of privilege respecting the recorded vote on honourable Senator Flynn's motion, and said that the doors of the chamber were locked before the division bell had stopped ringing, and that he was therefore prevented, with the honourable Senator Sparrow, from entering the Senate to participate in the vote.

I have looked into the matter and found that the honourable Senator Grosart's question of privilege was well taken. Through an unfortunate misunderstanding, the doors of the chamber behind the Chair were closed and locked while the division bell was still ringing.

I suggest, therefore, if honourable senators agree, that the division list printed in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, December 16, 1971, pages 499 and 500, be corrected by the Clerk; that he be authorized to record the name of the honourable Senator Grosart as having voted for the motion of the honourable Senator Flynn, to record the name of the honourable Senator Sparrow as having voted against the said motion, and to correct the number of Yeas and Nays accordingly.

I submit, honourable senators, that this course of action is justified in these circumstances.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Agreed, and it is so ordered.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I agree with the statement just made by His Honour the Speaker, but it should be made clear that this does not set a precedent that will allow a senator who is absent from the house at the time of a vote to enter later and say that he wishes to have his vote recorded.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am glad that the honourable Senator Prowse has raised this point, because Rule 50 is perfectly clear with respect to this. It provides as follows:

> A senator shall not vote on any question unless he is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.

After what took place yesterday and the question of privilege raised at that time I investigated this morning with the officers, and found there was definitely a misunderstanding. The doors were locked while the bell was ringing. I did not include this in my statement, but we have already made the necessary arrangements to ensure that a similar situation will not occur again.

SCIENCE POLICY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Donald Cameron, Vice-Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy presented the following report of the committee:

> On December 17, 1970, the honourable Senator Maurice Lamontagne, Chairman, tabled Volume I of the report of the said committee, prepared pursuant to the committee's terms of reference and entitled A Science Policy for Canada—A Critical Review: Past and Present, together with a summary thereof.
> Volume II of the report is now in the hands of the printer and your committee asks leave of the Senate to publish and distribute the said Volume II as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would the honourable senator indicate the seconder of his motion?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Senator O'Leary.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am confused as to why Volume II of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy should be submitted at a time when the Senate is not in session. I appreciate that there is a certain desire for this report within the scientific community, but yesterday the majority of the Senate indicated by vote that they would rather be in session than adjourn until January 10. I see no valid reason for the request now before the house.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I propose giving an explanation which I hope meets with the approval of my colleagues. At one time the committee thought it might be possible to complete its work with the publication of Volume II, but because of the massive amount of material which had to be considered, digested and put in coherent form it decided to confine the subject matter of Volume II to Targets and Strategies for the Seventies.

The report deals with the need for a new emphasis on the encouragement of research, development, and innovation in Canadian industry. It almost suggests, in effect, the need for a new economic policy for Canada.

Your committee had hoped it would be possible to have Volume II of the report printed and ready for distribution before the Senate adjourned for Christmas. However, because of the backlog of work in the Translations Bureau it will not be possible to have the printed report ready until sometime in early January.

I regret the absence of Senator Lamontagne, the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy. He has been under a terrific strain for some considerable period of time, and has been ordered by his doctor to take a rest. At the present time he is out of the country, and I undertook to present this report on his behalf, and on behalf of the entire committee who discussed and approved the report.

Volume II of the report will be followed by a third volume which will contain the recommendations governing organizational changes and the establishment of new institutions in the hope of solving the many national problems which will confront us in the seventies and early eighties.

While Volume II emphasizes the need for more research, development and innovation in Canadian industry, the third volume will be concerned mainly with the area of social innovation, a subject which has been greatly neglected in Canada up to the present time.

As the Senate may not be sitting when Volume II is ready for distribution, and because of the importance of its recommendations, your committee asks permission to publish and distribute it as soon as it becomes available. The report would then be tabled in the normal fashion whenever the Senate reconvenes in the new year. The report will have been distributed in the meantime, and honourable senators will have an opportunity of considering it before it is tabled in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Cameron could say, since he has indicated the report will be ready around January 15 next year, when he anticipates the Senate will reconvene.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I am sorry, Senator Macdonald, I cannot answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I can only regard that question put to Senator Cameron as one that Senator Macdonald, for one reason or another, did not wish to put directly to the Leader of the Government.

I rise not only to answer the question which was put vicariously, but also to acknowledge the fact that Senator Cameron spoke to me privately of his intention to ask leave to have this report printed and distributed even though the Senate may not be sitting. I told him at that time that the general practice in Parliament is that reports of parliamentary committees are tabled in Parliament prior to their publication. However, there are precedents for the course Senator Cameron is proposing. I am not opposing that request, except to say that in normal circumstances I would hope we would regard Parliament as the place where parliamentary reports should first be presented. Senator Cameron has indicated that the report will be tabled in the Senate shortly after publication, and I presume there will be a statement on behalf of the committee when the report is tabled, at which time it will be open to the Senate to debate it.

We shall certainly welcome this report because it results from an important study made by the committee. It could be that we shall not be sitting when it is ready, but that depends on Senator Macdonald and some others.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It could be that we shall not be sitting during most of January, but it all depends on the disposition made of other matters.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I should add a further word of explanation. I spoke with Senator Flynn as a matter of courtesy and he told me he would have no objection to my request, and, as I have already indicated, it was unanimously agreed to by the full committee. Senator Martin has already indicated, there are precedents for my request.

I might also say that I understand the report will be printed before January 15, and it contains some 42 recommendations, some of which will be of a quite controversial nature. We are somewhat concerned about protecting the security of 3,000 or 4,000 copies of this volume. This is another reason why we would like to have it released. We also felt it would be very useful to have some discussion of the report in the interval between its publication and the date on which it is tabled in the Senate. At that time there will be opportunity for full discussion in the usual way.

I hope this request will meet with your favour.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think there will be any objection to following the course of procedure that has been outlined, especially since I appreciate the difficulty Senator Cameron mentioned of maintaining security. There might very possibly be a leak if copies of the report are held. Consequently, we have no objection to following the course he has outlined.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I suggest to Senator Cameron that there is an alternative method open to him. He can give it to the cabinet, who will arrange to have all the leaks and publicity wished for before it is discussed in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I leave that to you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am glad Senator Phillips has not lost his sense of humour.

Report adopted.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave the following notice of motion:

> That the names of the honourable Senators Buckwold, Goldenberg, Lafond and McElman be substituted for those of the honourable Senators Carter, Croll, Macnaughton and Smith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

With leave of the Senate I now move, seconded by the honourable Senator Bourget, that the notice of motion standing in my name be amended by adding thereto the following:

and that the names of the honourable Senators Bourget and Langlois be added to the list of senators serving on the said committee.

Honourable senators, when I gave this notice yesterday I inadvertently failed to add two names to fill existing vacancies on the committee. As honourable senators will realize, it is most important that at this stage, when the committee is about to embark on a very important task, it be at full strength on both sides.

I understand that my good friend the Whip of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) will move for some changes in the committee, and I am very pleased to recommend to this side of the house that he be given leave to do so today.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: In case there is a vote, I hope you know how they are going to vote.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Perhaps I ought to have checked.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is as good an excuse as any.

Motion to amend motion agreed to.

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h):

That the names of the honourable Senators Bélisle, O'Leary, Phillips and Quart be substituted for those of the honourable Senators Blois, Haig, Welch and White on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, December 18, 1971 at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave that the names of the honourable Senator Buckwold and Senator Williams be added to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved that the names of the honourable Senators Buckwold, Goldenberg, Lafond and McElman be substituted for those of the honourable Senators Carter, Croll, Macnaughton and Smith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and that the names of Senators Bourget and Langlois be added thereto.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA—QUESTION

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: In view of the settlement reached between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Rhodesia, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether Canada is continuing to exercise sanctions against Rhodesia. If not, is our policy in that respect to be determined by the Government of the United Kingdom or by the Security Council of the United Nations?

Hon. Paul Martin: Of course the government of the United Kingdom does not determine the policy of Canada.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Let us wait and see.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Canada, as a member of the United Nations is, of course, bound by and has accepted the obligation imposed on it by the Security Council. That obligation is respected not only by Canada but by Britain herself. I am not aware that there has been any agreement reached on the substance of the proposals for an agreement between the two countries concerned. There has to be a referendum in Rhodesia. Until the agreement has taken place on the proposals, it is not open to the United Nations or to Canada to take any action.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have indicated that we regard the proposals as short of what we think is desirable. However, we have said that we will respect an agreement between the United Kingdom and Rhodesia. But there is no agreement on the substance of the proposals. There are simply proposals for an agreement depending on certain conditions in both countries that have not yet been met.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask in what respect Canada has agreed to accept the agreement?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If the two parties agree to the proposals then, of course, all the nations, even though they may regard the proposals as short of what is desirable, will be bound by the agreement which has been reached.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will be bound?

Hon. Mr. Martin: They will be bound in the sense that these two countries determine their own course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean you will not intervene, but what will you do?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Leader of the Government used the phrase "bound by" in connection with the Security Council resolution in regard to Rhodesia.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Can the chamber take it from that that the Government of Canada regards itself as always and invariably bound by resolutions of the Security Council?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would think that as long as Canada is a member of the United Nations its commitment to the Charter means it must accept the obligations under the Charter of the Security Council. I do not think there is any question about that at all.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Excuse me, but, if I may say so, the Leader of the Government did not fully answer my question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think I did.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I asked if the inference that can be taken from his original statement is that Canada is in all circumstances bound by resolutions of the Security Council. In his reply the Leader of the Government said that Canada would "accept" its responsibility, which is quite a different thing. I am asking him if he will now reaffirm that it is Government policy that the Government of Canada regards itself bound, both as to international and domestic matters, by resolutions of the Security Council.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have answered yes.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the sanctions, does the Leader of the Government know how much chrome was imported into this country last year, and where it came from?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I shall find out for you. I do not have information now as to how much chrome was imported.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I think the Leader of the Government should find out. I think the chrome came from Rhodesia via Russia.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend says, "I think". In any event I shall find out. I hope my honourable friend is not suggesting that Canada is not carrying out the obligations imposed on it by the resolution of the Security Council.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am speaking of buying chrome from Rhodesia. The very fact that it came to us via Russia means that we are not carrying out the obligations imposed upon us.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator O'Leary is not usually as excited as he now obviously is.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am not cold about anything. I take sides, and I do not cover up the sides I take by a lot of verbiage.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator O'Leary is making these accusations sitting down, and I suppose for that reason I should give them the respect they deserve.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am speaking to the fact that while maintaining sanctions against Rhodesia we are still buying Rhodesian chrome via Russia.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Do you mean that as an accusation?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I have asked if it is a fact.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I ask the Leader of the Government a couple of supplementary questions? First of all, was he entirely correct, or was it merely a slip of the tongue, when he said that the proposals for the agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Rhodesia contained a provision for a referendum in Rhodesia?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: With great respect, I venture to state that judging from what I have read about this in the press, and particularly in the English press, there is nothing whatsoever about a referendum. There is to be a commission appointed, presided over by Lord Pearce, which is to travel around the country and collect opinions. In fact one of the objections taken to these proposals is that they do not provide for anything resembling a referendum. I should like to know if the Leader of the Government is perfectly positive that a referendum is provided for, since this could mean quite a difference in some attitudes, particularly perhaps in that of the Government of Canada, in certain instances.

The other supplementary question I want to ask is this: If the Government of Canada is bound by the resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations providing for sanctions against Rhodesia, can Canada at the same time be bound by a bilateral decision of the Government of the United Kingdom and the illegal, soi-disant, rebel Government of Rhodesia that sanctions should disappear?

I should have thought that for the sanctions to be lifted, and for the obligations of Canada under the Security Council's resolution to be lifted, and for Canada to be relieved of its duties under that resolution, it would be necessary for the Security Council to take some other decision. I do not see how the Government of Canada can be bound by conflicting decisions by two governments—one of them being a rebel government—and at the same time by a contrary resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations.

I should like the Leader of the Government to clarify the situation. I may merely be showing, as Senator Flynn said yesterday, that I know very little about the procedures of this place, and I may be jumping to a wrong conclusion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should like to say that any obligations imposed by the Security Council can only be disposed of by an action of the Security Council. The sanctions flowed from the actions of a recalcitrant government in Rhodesia. Since that time the Government of Rhodesia and the Government of the United Kingdom have agreed on certain proposals subject to certain conditions. One of those conditions is the acceptance of them by the people of Rhodesia. I am not sure that I am wrong, but I might possibly be wrong in my use of the word "referendum".

• (1440)

The condition I had in mind was the acceptance of the policy of the Government of Rhodesia, in this instance, by the people of Rhodesia, its Parliament, and likewise the Parliament of the United Kingdom. If these conditions are met—that is Britain as the colonial power agreeing, along with the Government of Rhodesia—then the United Nations will be faced with the fact that the complaint registered against Rhodesia in the first instance by the United Kingdom no longer applies. I am sure that Britain would move formally in such a situation. The United Nations could no longer impose sanctions because, in the first instance, they imposed sanctions as a result of a complaint put forward by the Government of the United Kingdom. This will be taken care of if there is agreement and the necessary conditions are fulfilled.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is still the question: If Britain withdrew its complaint, would Canada lodge its own complaint if it is not satisfied with the agreement?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I have indicated we would accept the agreement between the two countries as I am sure it would be accepted by all other nations.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Even if it falls short of Canada's position on the matter?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, it does fall short, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Sharp, indicated the other day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does that mean you would not make a new complaint?

TAX REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON TAX REFORM LEGISLATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Final Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 13th December, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Martin: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would suggest that the item be disposed of since Bill C-259 itself will reach us later today.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Senator Paterson has indicated he wishes to speak on the matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Then may I suggest that Order No. 1 be called later this day?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I feel it would be proper to remove this item from the Order Paper, otherwise we will have duplication when the bill is before us.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It can be called later this day.

Order No. 2 having been called:

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I hope the Senate will not mind if I call attention to the fact that Senator Langlois asked to have Order No. 1 stand until later this day. That was the end of the matter, and we proceeded to the next item.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we revert to Order No. 1 at this time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes. I understand that Senator Grosart wishes to refer to Order No. 1, and there is no objection at all to that.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If I heard correctly, when Senator Langlois asked that it stand until later in the day it was regarded as having been passed with leave. I raise this matter because of what occurred yesterday when Senator Martin very generously asked to have my vote recorded because of my enforced absence from the chamber when the vote was taken. I was informed later that because Your Honour did not put the matter before the house my vote could not then be recorded. I suggest this clearly indicates that we should follow our Rules and not penalize others when this is not done. I raise the matter at this time because, in this instance, Your Honour did not put before the house Senator Langlois's question regarding suspending the Rule so that we could consider this order later this day. I have no objection to the motion, but I object to the fact that I was penalized yesterday because Your Honour did not put the motion as suggested by Senator Martin. I am afraid it will happen again. I merely make the plea that when a motion is before this house it should be recorded so we do not repeat what occurred yesterday. I do not object to the shortened procedure, and I do not object to the phrase "with leave" regarding the suspending of the Rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not know whether Senator Grosart was present at the opening of today's proceedings when I spoke on this matter, but I thought I had disposed of it then. As I recall, there was no firm motion put yesterday, although there was an agreement. I read a statement at the beginning of our sitting today and asked that the vote be recorded in our Minutes of Proceedings, and this was agreed to. This morning I made an investigation of what happened yesterday and I ascertained that the doors in the rear of the chamber behind the Speaker's Chair were closed while the division bell was still ringing. There is no question about this, and I thought I had disposed of the matter at the commencement of today's proceedings when I read my statement. I do not know whether Senator Grosart was present then.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was not present, but Your Honour's generous action was communicated to me after I came into the chamber and I would like to thank Your Honour and all honourable senators for the action taken. I believe it has rectified the situation and I appreciate it. I have drawn attention to what just happened because I feel it parallels the situation that occurred yesterday when the motion was not put in the form of a question and it was not recorded in Hansard. I am afraid this has happened on several occasions in the past, and it may occur in the future unless the house is careful that our Rules are followed so that motions may be recorded in the Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand we are still dealing with Order No. 1. Will the Clerk Assistant please read Order No. 1?

• (1450)

The Clerk Assistant (Reading):

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Final Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 13th December, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I have just noticed that the honourable Senator Paterson is now in the chamber. If he wishes to speak at this stage, I think it would be agreeable to honourable senators.

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, I did not speak yesterday because I felt humble when listening to the magnificent speeches being made. I thought my message would be rather poor and I decided to let the good speakers carry on. It takes a good deal of courage to rise in this chamber, and it takes twice as much courage when what you are going to say will not be popular with your leader.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You will still be my good friend.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Thank you. I did want to express my disapproval of what has been happening over the years. Senator Salter Hayden and I are senior in service in the Senate. Each year for thirty-one years we have listened to complaints about the late arrival of appropriation bills in this chamber. It was always a case of, "Hurry, hurry, it doesn't matter if you look at the figures." Well, it seems that we have reached the climax when we are asked to pass this important bill without having an opportunity to make amendments to it, to see our committee's recommendations put into effect.

I happen to have been in the office when Senator Hayden was working on the recommendations. I know the immense amount of labour he put in. But the way things shape up now, his labour and all those good amendments—and he told me there were both good and bad things in the bill—will go out the window. I will always feel badly that this Senate will not have a chance to introduce its amendments. However, it may be better otherwise.

I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the meaning of a promise. I do not think promises mean much—in politics, in love and in war. I sat in this chamber a short time ago when we debated the repeal of capital punishment. We finally let the bill go through provided that it did not apply to murderers of policemen or prison guards. Since then fourteen policemen have been murdered but not once has capital punishment been carried out. Not once.

I am not bloodthirsty, but I do like to see a contract carried out. However, that is another matter and I suppose we have to forget it. I just want to say that I dislike reading in the newspapers what a poor, lousy outfit we are. It is too bad that we have to put up with that. I will not say any more.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks with respect to those just made by honourable Senator Paterson.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Senator Paterson has just mentioned that all the work of our committee would be thrown out the window. With due respect, I wish to remind this house that some forty amendments suggested by our committee have already been accepted and implemented in the proposed legislation. This was pointed out to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Monday by the Minister of Finance and was repeated yesterday in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister himself.

As to the honourable senator's remarks concerning the alleged promise made by the Minister of Finance, which Senator Paterson compared to promises made in love and in war, I wish to say that it was more than such a promise that was made to the Senate Banking Committee on Monday by the minister. It was a definite commitment by a senior minister of the Crown to the effect that an amending bill would be brought forward with due dispatch in the next session to take into consideration the remaining suggested amendments of the Senate. He made it quite clear that he was not giving a commitment that all the suggested amendments would be accepted and implemented. He made the commitment that they would be considered and, if acceptable, incorporated in the amending bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not a commitment!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I know that my honourable friend, and his friends, attempted to pin the minister down to a definite commitment as to the date of introduction of the amending bill. However, the minister stated this would be done, as I just said, with due dispatch. He even referred to the month of February or April. I recall that even Senator Beaubien mentioned then that that was all he wanted. He said he would be satisfied with that. That is why one can hardly understand the position taken today by my friends on the other side of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, we can understand that you do not.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: And the public will.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us not lose our tempers.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but let us not use this device. We have heard an excellent speech and a very servile answer by the Deputy Government Leader.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What is wrong with this?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a servile answer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I suppose you claim to be the only one who has a right to speak in this chamber?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have a right to speak, but I am objecting to the manner in which you did it with respect to Senator Paterson. I am disgusted!

The Hon. the Speaker: This item is now considered as having been debated.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—INTELSAT AGREEMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, yesterday I tabled a number of international engagements. Pursuant to the practice which we established a little less than two years ago, I now wish to comment on a number of these agreements, the first of which is the International Wheat Agreement, which comprises the Wheat Trade Convention and the Food Aid Convention. The Leader of the Opposition and I discussed this arrangement, and he is aware that I intended to speak on these agreements. I believe he intends to participate.

The International Wheat Agreement was signed on behalf of Canada by our ambassador in Washington on May 3 of this year, and the Canadian instrument of ratification was deposited on June 10. The agreement entered fully into force on July 1, replacing the 1967 International Grains Agreement which had expired the previous day, and will remain in force until June 30, 1974.

Senator McNamara is fully aware of this, and I add not for his benefit, but for my own and perhaps that of some of my colleagues, that the Wheat Agreement consists of a Wheat Trade Convention and a Food Aid Convention linked by a common preamble. These two conventions are the result of negotiations at the United Nations Wheat Conference which was held in Geneva from January 18 to February 20 this year.

The conference was attended by 13 wheat exporting and 48 wheat importing countries. The objectives of the Wheat Trade Convention are to further international co-operation in connection with world wheat problems, to promote the expansion of international trade in wheat and wheat flour, and to secure the freest possible flow of this trade in the interests of both exporting and importing members, and thus contribute to the development of the countries concerned, the economies of which depend on commercial sales of wheat such as our own; to contribute to the fullest possible extent to the stability of the international wheat market, in the interests of both importing and exporting members; and to provide a framework, in conformity with Article 21 of the present Convention, for the negotiation of provisions relating to the prices of wheat, and the rights and obligations of members in respect of international trade in wheat.

It was not possible, in drawing up the Wheat Trade Convention, to include provisions regarding price levels or the rights and obligations for importers and exporters concerning wheat purchases or supplies. The convention does, however, provide for consultation in the event of actual or threatened market instability, including price fluctuations.

Provision was also included for the International Wheat Council to examine the question of price and related rights and obligations, and when it is judged that these matters are capable of successful negotiation, with the objective of bringing them into effect within the life of the convention, the council is to request the Secretary-General of UNCTAD, the United Nations trade co-operation administration, to convene a conference for this purpose.

Canada would welcome such a conference. We have, in fact, expressed our support in the International Wheat Council for the opening of discussions on wheat pricing provisions.

The convention establishes an advisory subcommittee on market conditions which will provide for continuing consultations between members on global wheat market conditions, and will report on situations from which market instability has arisen or may arise. Mr. Sharp has indicated that we will participate fully in the work of this subcommittee, as I believe has Mr. Lang, the minister in charge of wheat for the Government of Canada.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

The Wheat Council will also continue to maintain records on all aspects of international wheat transactions and will annually review the world wheat situation and inform members of any factors emerging from this review in order that members may be aware of these in establishing their agricultural and pricing policies.

Given the importance of wheat in our economy, the provisions of the Wheat Trade Convention are of special importance to Canada for the measures which are aimed at preserving a stable and healthy international wheat market.

The provisions of the convention have been adopted by all the major wheat exporting and importing countries, including the U.S.S.R. which had not participated, as Senator McNamara will know, in the 1967 Grains Agreement.

With regard to the Food Aid Convention, the objective of this instrument is to carry out a food aid program with the help of contributions for the benefit of developing countries. Under the terms of the convention, all the parties have agreed to contribute to food aid to the developing countries in the form of wheat, coarse grains or edible derivatives, or the cash equivalent at least up to specified annual minima. With the exception of the Soviet Union, the signatories to the convention include all the major international grain producers, as well as Finland, Japan, Sweden and Switzerland.

Our annual commitment is 495,000 metric tons. Contributions under the convention may be made on either multilateral or bilateral basis. The Food Aid Committee will administer this convention. It will receive regular reports from member countries. It will review grain purchases financed by cash contributions, particularly with respect to the convention's requirement that at least 35 per cent of such a contribution, or that portion necessary to purchase 200,000 metric tons of grain, be used for purchases from developing member countries of the convention.

It will examine the way in which the obligations under the Food Aid Program have been fulfilled. It will exchange information on a regular basis on the functioning of the food aid arrangements, particularly in relation to their effects on food production in the receiving countries.

This convention is important for the contribution that it makes towards assisting the developing countries by providing for an equitable and orderly Food Aid Program by the major international grain-producing countries.

In summary, therefore, the International Wheat Agreement, which is made up of these two conventions on wheat trade and food aid, is a key element in the promotion of international co-operation in the grain trade. We heartily support such co-operation, and the Government looks forward to further strengthening of the arrangement in the future.

The Leader of the Opposition has been called out on business. I know that he intended to comment on this matter. If any honourable member wishes to comment, I will take my seat. If not, I shall proceed and report on the agreement respecting INTELSAT.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have only your notes, which I have not yet had the pleasure or opportunity of reading.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In that case, I shall proceed with the other agreement.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Perhaps I might ask the Leader of the Government a question. I regret that I was called out of the chamber just as he began. I am not clear on the purpose of bringing this convention to the attention of the Senate. I believe the Leader of the Government said he was reporting to the Senate on the convention. Would he inform the house what is the status of the convention with respect to any obligation it might impose on Canada, whether any further action by Parliament is necessary to impose the obligation on Canada, and whether the Government, under what I am sure he would call the prerogative of the Crown, has full authority to conclude such a convention, to obligate Canada to expenditures without the sanction of Parliament?

• (1510)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, this is not a new question involving a difference of view between Senator Grosart and myself. This constitutional issue has been raised at least four times by the honourable senator, and he is aware of my views.

It is, of course, within the prerogative of the executive to conclude all international agreements. The practice has been that certain of the major political arrangements are followed by acts of ratification and, in some instances, even the approbation of Parliament is received before the act of commitment takes place.

Such a treaty would be an agreement to involve the provision of forces at some time pursuant, let us say, to the United Nations or some Commonwealth commitment, but there is no requirement on the part of the Government to make a report. The foreign policy of the Government is always, of course, subject to approval by Parliament, and it is open to any honourable senator to say that an agreement which Canada has concluded is objectionable and not an acceptable arrangement in the judgment of Parliament, or one of its houses.

Two years ago we in this house agreed, whatever be the practice in the other place, that all agreements between Canada and other countries be tabled, and at some time, not necessarily at the time of tabling, an explanation of the commitment made by Canada would be given.

That is the situation as it now exists. My honourable friend takes the view that the Government should not make any commitment with any other government without the prior approval of Parliament. I think I have accurately stated his view. I do not agree with that view. That is not the view of constitutional authorities. It is not the practice that we have observed in this country, nor has it been the practice observed in Britain, or in other Commonwealth countries. In fact, I do not know of any country, except those countries where there is a constitutional requirement to do so—the United States, for example—where that is the practice.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Leader of the Government will perhaps not mind my saying that I recall his undertaking to discuss and report upon these treaties, conventions, agreements, or other undertakings, bilateral or multilateral, which the Government of Canada, on behalf of Canada presumably, enters into.

The Leader of the Government stated that I have raised this matter at least four times. That is true, except I do not think he noticed that on this occasion I went a little further than on other occasions. I asked the Leader of the Government specifically if, in his view, the Government has the right by convention to commit Canada to the expenditure of public funds.

I am quite sure he will have a good answer to that question, and I would like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did not answer that question; I apologize.

Of course, the Government cannot provide for the disbursement of funds without the approval of Parliament, but the Government of Canada can certainly make a commitment to a foreign power whereby it will undertake to carry out certain obligations. Such commitments may involve the expenditure of public funds, but only Parliament itself can make a decision which will permit the expenditure of public funds.

What will be the situation here if there is money involved, as there will be for the purposes of administration? At the appropriate time the Minister of Finance will ask for moneys to meet the obligations of this commitment. At that time Parliament can refuse. The Government would have to argue that in the exercise of its prerogative it has made a commitment, but in the end it will have to abide by the decision of Parliament with respect to the expenditure of public funds.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That is exactly my point. It would appear that the Government of Canada can commit itself to another country in respect to certain expenditures, but there are other checks and balances which would require it to bring the question of the expenditure before Parliament. This could be done, obviously, in the Estimates or in supplementary Estimates, or in some other way.

The Government has other ways of expending money. For example, it could obtain the money from the Contingency Fund, and so forth, without consulting Parliament in advance. However, that is not my point. My point is that it seems strange that the Government should feel it is under constraint in the matter of expending money but not under any constrait in the matter of committing Canada to a policy which, in its implications for Canada as a whole, might be much more important than the expenditure of certain sums of moneys.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could give some consideration to that anomaly in the situation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not know if the Leader of the Opposition wishes to comment on this subject. I cannot add anything more to what I have already said.

Honourable senators, I should like now to refer to another document which I tabled yesterday. On August 20 of this year Canada signed in Washington two agreements respecting the International Telecommunications Satellite Organization known as INTELSAT.

The first agreement, an intergovernmental one, defines the permanent new structure of INTELSAT and lays down the basic principles by which countries wishing to be associated with the establishment and development of a world-wide commercial telecommunications satellite system are to abide.

The second agreement, which was signed by the President and General Manager of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, is an operating agreement setting out the terms by which the operating companies designated for that purpose by their respective governments undertake to share in the financing, management, and use of the INTELSAT system. The Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation is the Canadian company designated for this purpose.

The signing of these two agreements was the culmination of more than seven years work. These agreements replace the original interim arrangements which were arrived at in 1964 by the organization's ten founding members, of which Canada was one.

The original International Telecommunications Satellite consortium which was established in 1964 had as its purpose to design and establish a single global commercial communications satellite system, pending the working out of definitive arrangements. These definitive arrangements took much longer to negotiate than had been anticipated. The main difficulty was that the majority of the 79 members of INTELSAT wished to ensure that the resulting organization had a truly international character and was not unduly weighted in favour of those nations providing the largest part of the financial and equipment involved.

The success of the negotiations is attested by the fact that of those 79 members attending the INTELSAT meetings, 73 approved the two agreements, and there were no recorded negative votes.

It is expected that the membership will continue to grow. At the present time, for instance, none of the eastern European nations, with the exception of Yugoslavia, are members. It is expected, however, that eventually this group of nations as well as others will seek membership.

• (1520)

The main objective of the new organization will continue to be the establishment of a single global satellite system providing an international public telecommunications service. The new organization will have its own juridical personality and will have four components which are an assembly of parties; an assembly of signatories; a board of governors of not more than 25 persons, made up of representatives of countries who have signed from the following: countries having the largest investment shares, groups of countries whose combined investment is among the largest, plus three to five members representing groups of countries chosen to give broad geographical representation; and finally, a director general, who will be responsible to the board of governors for the management of the system.

The Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation is assured of continuation of its membership on the board of governors, because the forecasts for Canadian use of the satellite system place Canada among the five largest users in the world. The COTC has been using the Atlantic Ocean segment of the INTELSAT system since October, 1966. Through its two earth stations at Mill Village in Nova Scotia the corporation has established links with 19 countries in the Atlantic area. Further facilities are now being built at Lake Cowichan in British Columbia. These will become operational in 1972, and will provide direct links with countries on the Pacific rim.

Under the agreements, Canada's ability to develop, own, and operate its own domestic satellite communications system will be in no way circumscribed. Countries engaging in domestic satellite communications systems are required to inform INTELSAT of their plans to ensure technical capability and lack of interference with the INTELSAT system. The findings of the system will, however, be in the form of recommendations and will not be binding on its members. Canada would continue to ensure non-interference through the co-ordination process of the International Telecommunications Union.

These agreements which I tabled yesterday ensure the sound development of a global system of telecommunications which has already proved itself. The agreements represent a careful balance between the rights and responsibilities of the nations which have developed the technology and equipment required for the system, and which will provide the bulk of the investment funds, and those of the other nations of the world who will be mainly users of the system. I think it is a source of satisfaction for Canada that it has been able to play a constructive part in these difficult and protracted negotiations.

The Senate adjourned until the call of the bell.

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be read a second time later this day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not now? Why should we waste an hour?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I agree with you, but we want to distribute copies of the bill. They are being distributed as quickly as possible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was already prepared, and was rolling up my sleeves.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We have our sleeves already rolled up.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I move that the Senate do now adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Before that motion is put, I understand that there is a second edition of the bill being distributed to members of Parliament. I have received one copy.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is so. That is a reason for adjourning until 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: One of the reasons.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I say a word on the same point? I read in the press that there was a second edition of the bill which was not available to the press but which had been available to members of Parliament. I did not receive a copy of that. Was it given to the members of the House of Commons, but not to us?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is being distributed now.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is a very thick volume. Perhaps it was thrown away.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I seriously doubt that we shall be able to read the bill in the time we have left before eight o'clock this evening. In any event, I thought the sponsor of the bill would tell us how to proceed with the reading of it, and underline its main provisions, to facilitate our job. I did not want to lose any time at all. I wanted to co-operate with the Leader of the Government, but when I offer him my co-operation he refuses it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am very grateful to my friend for his offer.

The Senate adjourned until the call of the bell at approximately 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

PRIVILEGE

AVAILABILITY OF COPIES OF BILL C-259

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege before the motion for second reading is put. When we adjourned at 5 o'clock the honourable Leader of the Government explained that he wanted to adjourn until 8 o'clock because copies of the bill were being distributed as quickly as possible. It is now my understanding that copies were in the reading room for quite a while.

Therefore, I cannot understand why we did not proceed at 5 o'clock rather than at 8 o'clock, since it appears that the Government side of this house is in such a great hurry to proceed with this bill. I suggest we lost at least one hour because of the assumption that the bill was not ready when in fact it was ready. It seems to me to be a definite part of a scenario intended to give the impression of taking a great deal of time with this bill by wasting it in the way we have up to now.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, as soon as the adjournment was agreed upon, I proceeded to the reading room to check on the possibility of having copies of the bill distributed. I found there a great number of packages in the process of being unwrapped. I was told at that time that it was not at all certain that there was a sufficient number of copies of the bill for distribution to all honourable senators. It was because we wanted to ensure that each honourable senator had a copy of the bill that it was moved that we adjourn and commence the debate on the second reading of the bill at 8 o'clock.

I assure my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, that there is no question of its being a scenario. We are working in the best way possible and with all due despatch. I also assure him that no honourable senator will lose his right to speak for as long as he wishes on the bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not a question of losing the right to speak. I happened to be in the reading room when the copies of the bill were brought in. This was an accident. I wanted to read some papers to see whether they were still interested in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No doubt it was an accident.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not go to the reading room very often. I do not read every paper in the country, I can assure you. However, the bills were there at the time, and it would have been very easy to distribute them. From reading the Debates of the Senate it is obvious that the Leader of the Government was not ready to proceed, or he felt it would be better to wait until 8 o'clock this evening so we could waste an hour and appear to be taking more time than we really are in dealing with this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the Leader of the Government wish to move second reading of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you moving second reading of the bill?

The Hon. the Speaker: I am inquiring of the Leader of the Government whether he is moving second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I rose to indicate to the house that I now wish to move second reading of this bill.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin moved the second reading of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act.

He said: Honourable senators, last June 30, prior to the summer adjournment of Parliament, first reading was given in the other place to Bill C-259 which is now before us. Twelve days prior to that, on June 18, the Minister of Finance in his budget tabled a ways and means motion. The motion was considerably fuller than normal to enable members of both Houses of Parliament and the public at large to get an immediate start on studying the measure.

The accounting and legal professions have been busy ever since reviewing the proposals. The draft legislation has been scanned by technical experts to determine its drafting adequacies, and to ensure that the intent of the bill was achieved in its detail clauses.

The Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and the Canadian Tax Foundation, each formed committees, submitted briefs to the Government, and met on a number of occasions with officials of the Department of Finance. A great many other organizations have submitted briefs, and have met with departmental officials or with the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of this house, and in some cases, with both. The intensive examination of the bill undertaken by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of this house from the early autumn was due to the foresight of the committee chairman, Senator Hayden, and he deserves the commendation of the entire Senate and of the Canadian public for the excellent job that he and his committee have done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should add that I regret, as I am sure we all do, that he has suffered an illness which has caused his medical advisers to give him advice which makes it necessary for him to take respite from his labours. I would also like to take advantage of this opportunity to express on behalf of the Senate our thanks to a former member of this house, the Honourable Lazarus Phillips, for the assistance he has given, not only in his work as a senator in the study of the White Paper, but in the advice he has given the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce as counsel during the past three and one-half months. He undertook to assist the work of that committee without remuneration. We are grateful to the Honourable Mr. Phillips not only for his work as a senator, but for the work he has performed gratuitously for our committee and for Canada.

The Minister of Finance discussed the tax reform proposals with representatives of the provincial governments. This was done both on a ministerial and on an official basis. The federal Government has been very anxious that its tax reform proposals would be as acceptable as possible to the provinces.

• (2010)

The Minister of Finance told the provinces that the federal Government was willing to continue to collect provincial income taxes providing the provinces harmonize their system with the federal system. The nine provinces which are in the present tax collection agreement have indicated they wish to renew.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They had no choice—they had no choice.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Minister of Finance undertook that the provinces would suffer no revenue loss from the federal tax reform. Initially he offered a revenue guarantee for a three-year period, but after some provinces expressed concern that this was too short a time, the period was extended to five years. Although income taxes are being reduced for most taxpayers, the provinces are not being forced to share the cost of these tax reductions. On the other hand, it was not the federal Government's intention to subsidize the provincial governments inadvertently through the tax reform process. Therefore, the federal Government stipulated that to obtain the revenue guarantee, provinces could only adjust their rates at the outset to come out with the same amount of revenue in the first year.

This attempt to be fair to the provinces brings me on to the broader question of the principles of tax equality. The Government considers that persons in similar circumstances should share similar tax burdens. The Government considers that those with lower incomes should pay a smaller share of their incomes in taxes. The Government considers that a law should apply equally to commercial and industrial enterprises that are equivalent to each other in the same way that similar individuals should be similarly taxed. This means closing up inadvertent loopholes. The Government considers that the tax system should be as objective and efficient as possible. Although the transitional stage may be somewhat complex, it is intended gradually to produce a stable tax system more like a rock garden than a tax jungle.

I would now like to speak a little about some of the more important provisions of the bill before us. As of last July 1, the 3 per cent surcharge on personal and corporate incomes was abolished. This was announced last June. In a subsequent announcement on October 14, the Minister of Finance proposed that effective July 1, 1971 until the end of 1972, the tax paid by Canadian corporations would be reduced by 7 per cent. Combined with the elimination of the 3 per cent surtax, the effective reduction of corporation taxes as from last July 1 has been 10 per cent. Since individuals provide two-thirds of the national income, and therefore represent the base of spending power in the economy of the country, the Government proposed as well on October 14 that federal tax payable by persons be reduced by 3 per cent during the period July 1, 1971 to December 31, 1972.

As of July 1, 1971, the lowest rates of federal tax were changed to eliminate taxpayers with taxable income under $500. This removed three-quarters of a million Canadians from the tax rolls. The Guaranteed Income Supplement for persons 65 years of age and more was exempted from tax, retroactive to January 1, 1971.

The most far-reaching tax relief provided in the tax reform proposals is in the increase in the personal exemptions. These are being changed from $1,000 for single taxpayers to $1,500, and from $2,000 for married taxpayers to $2,850, effective January 1. This was intended to go beyond the recommendations of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the White Paper Proposals for Tax Reform. In that report of September 1970, senators had proposed for single taxpayers a basic exemption of $1,500 if taxpayer's income did not exceed $3,000. For married taxpayers, the committee had proposed $2,800, if the taxpayer's income did not exceed $8,500.

The $500 extra exemption for persons 70 years and over is intended to be increased to $650, and extended to all persons over 65. When combined with the removal of the Guaranteed Income Supplement from taxable income, the effect is that all single taxpayers 65 years old will be exempt on $2,250 of income.

There is a new employment expense allowance allowing deductions up to $150 a year which applies to the 85 per cent of Canadian taxpayers who are wage earners. A child care expense deduction of $500 per child, and up to $2,000 per family, is introduced. Broader deductions are authorized for expenses entailed in moving to new jobs. It is intended to make unemployment insurance premiums deductible, though the benefits will be made taxable.

Payments made to handicapped care centres, and to institutions for the disabled, will henceforth be deductible. Although medical expenses paid by medicare plans will cease to be tax deductible, premiums will be deductible if they are paid to a non-government hospital or medical plan. Donations to registered national athletic associations are henceforth to be deductible. The charitable donation limit is increased from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of a taxpayer's income.

Income averaging through two new methods is provided in the legislation. A savings encouragement and post-retirement provision raises the limit on deductions for contributions to pension plans, deferred profit-sharing plans, and to registered retirement savings plans.

The effect of this legislation would be to remove one million taxpayers from the tax rolls next year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you sure of that?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In addition, some 4.7 million taxpayers will find their taxes reduced.

Changes are undertaken in the definition of income, the most important being the creation of a capital gains tax.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Santa Claus.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Half of the capital gain is intended to be taxed at the taxpayer's personal rates, while half of any capital losses that are experienced is intended to be deductible. Accrued capital gains are intended to be taxed at death. The capital gains tax is also applicable to all corporations in Canada and in certain instances to non-residents. In the process, a significant source of revenue will be made available in the public domain.

• (2020)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Where did you get that figure of 1,250,000 people who would be exempted from paying tax?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The figure of one million was stated by the Minister of Finance. That is the basis of my statement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is far from the 750,000 suggested in the report of the committee as of September 1970.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend can make that argument if he wishes, but the statement stands. If he wishes to controvert the statement that is his privilege.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He is asking you a question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The bill proposes that a taxpayer's home and the acre of land on which it stands be exempt from the capital gains tax. Personal property is to be exempt unless the selling price exceeds $1,000. Our committee recommended that a lifetime exemption of $50,000 be granted for the principal residence.

To help corporations and their shareholders, the Government has proposed that the general tax rate be 50 per cent in 1972 on corporations, and, thereafter, the rate will drop by one per cent a year until it reaches 46 per cent in 1976.

To help develop smaller Canadian-controlled private corporations, it is proposed that the tax rate be 25 per cent on the first $50,000 of business income.

It will be recalled that the committee report of September 1970 proposed that the present low rate of 21 per cent on the first $35,000 of the income of small business corporations be retained. This was against the White Paper proposal that all corporations pay tax at the rate of 50 per cent. One can see that in this instance the Senate report has had some influence. This is combined with a reformed dividend tax credit increased to 33 1/3 per cent, and included in income. This makes the credit of greater value to lower income shareholders.

It is proposed to assist the mining and petroleum industries with substantial incentives, although with incentives more efficient and less costly than those presently in operation. Automatic percentage of depletion will continue until 1976, at which time it will be replaced by a basis of earned depletion. A fast write-off provision will replace the present 3 per cent tax exemption for new mines, which will be withdrawn. In 1977 the federal tax on mining profits will be reduced to 25 per cent from 40 per cent, making allowance for the provincial mining taxes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will not be here.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There are important changes which affect business and property income. These include a section which makes deductible interest paid by Canadian corporations on money borrowed to buy shares in other corporations.

Business and entertainment expenses are going to be tightened up. Professionals in fields such as medicine and law found the White Paper's proposals somewhat restrictive, but the provisions provided in the bill are similar to those recommended by our committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I entirely disagree with that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You make affirmations as if you were speaking as God.

For God's sake, be realistic. Do not read what you have been handed by the Department of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend is unusually perturbed tonight.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Every time you deliver that type of speech I get perturbed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The honourable senator will have an opportunity to controvert anything I have said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is untrue.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend knows better than that. I would ask him to withdraw that statement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, I will not withdraw it. It is untrue.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend is normally imperturbable outside of this chamber. I would ask him to maintain normal composure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. There was an expression used, and I think that the word "untrue" was directly related to a figure mentioned by the honourable senator who has the floor. Under the circumstances, I do not think this is to be considered as unparliamentary; this is a matter of argument. I now give the floor to the Leader of the Government and I would hope he may proceed without too many interruptions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I was saying, before my honourable friend was seeking to help me, business and entertainment expenses are going to be tightened up. Professionals in fields such as medicine and law found the White Paper's proposals somewhat restrictive, but the provisions provided in the bill are similar to those recommended by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Some aspects of the legislation are intended to encourage Canadians to acquire equity in Canadian enterprises. Canadian corporations will be permitted to deduct as an expense interest on sums borrowed to undertake the purchase of shares in other corporations. This would remove a disadvantage which Canadian corporations have had in the past in competing with foreign corporations in takeover bids.

It is proposed there would be a 10 per cent limitation on foreign assets of pension funds and retirement savings plans. It is expected that this could have an important influence in directing funds of these large intermediaries to Canadian investment. The lower tax rate provided for small businesses is to be available only to businesses which are Canadian owned. Any savings afforded by this incentive will be recoverable by the Government should the ownership of these businesses subsequently pass into the hands of non-residents. The form of the dividend tax credit makes the incentive to invest in Canadian equity more attractive for more Canadians.

In the course of what I have said up to this point, I have indicated some, but by no means all, of the proposals in the report of September 1970 by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which were incorporated in the bill introduced in the other place last June.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government—

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Minister of Finance, in his testimony before our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee last Monday—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am asking the honourable Leader of the Government if he would accept a question at this point.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He does not like it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, I would accept my honourable friend's question.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The honourable Leader of the Government has spoken of the incorporation of some recommendations made in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the White Paper. Would he not agree with me that the vast majority of the recommendations in that report have not been incorporated in the bill before us?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I would not agree with that.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would not agree with the statement that the vast majority of the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce were not accepted. I would say, as the Minister of Finance indicated last Monday, that a substantial portion of these recommendations were accepted by the Government, as I shall ultimately show.

Before Senator Grosart asked his question I was commenting that in the course of what I had said thus far I had indicated some, but by no means all, of the proposals in the report of September 19, 1970, by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce were incorporated in the bill introduced in the other place last June.

The Minister of Finance, in his testimony to our committee last Monday indicated, as I was reminded by Senator Langlois, that some 44 recommendations in all from that committee were adopted—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Out of what?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —in the June 1971 draft of Bill C-259.

• (2030)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Out of what number?

Hon. Mr. Martin: One of the most significant examples of an acceptance of the Standing Senate Committee's recommendations was that relating to integration. Senators who were not at the committee's hearing last Monday might be grateful if I were to read out exactly what the minister said on that occasion. He stated—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope you will read it all this time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He stated, and I quote:

> We did not know until the very end where we were going to end up on a great many matters.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think he knows now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He said:

> Integration was one of them. Finally, we accepted your recommendation from the Senate committee and did not have integration but amended the dividend tax credit.

That is the end of the quotation and that is my response, in part, to Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You end the quotation where it pleases you and where it fits your purposes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would now like to mention a number of instances—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Martin: —in which points were brought to the Government's attention by being discussed this autumn in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The suggestions I am about to list were taken into account—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Listen to the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to recognize Senator Grosart, who rises on a question or a point of order. Honourable Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Surely, Your Honour, we are going to observe the rules of this place. When a senator rises and there is no way of knowing what he may rise on, he should be recognized, and the Leader of the Government should not deliberately ignore him and continue speaking—in this case for at least a minute—even after Your Honour has risen to intervene.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Oh.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I suggest, Your Honour, that we decide now what the rules are. I did not speak, I did not interrupt, I did not comment; I rose in my place. I would like to know what the rules are.

The Hon. the Speaker: I shall dispose of this question of privilege. I said I recognized the honourable Senator Grosart. It may be that I did not speak loudly enough—I do not know. I understand that the Leader of the Government was not looking at the Chair at the time, but I would ask Senator Grosart to proceed now with his point.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise to ask if I may ask the Leader of the Government a question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If you have a question, ask it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: As a matter of fact, I might say I did not ask for an imperative. I asked for permission. The imperative was "ask it". I still ask, might I ask it, and a good answer is "yes".

I would ask the leader if he has analyzed the recommendations made by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in what I would call its first report, which was the report on the White Paper. I ask the question because he has ranged over four reports, and I have some doubt as to whether he understands the difference between the recommendations contained in them and in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the question?

An Hon. Senator: It is a speech.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My question is, as I enunciated clearly at the start, has the leader enumerated carefully, numerically, the recommendations made by that committee, as against his statement—which I regard as untrue—that the recommendations were substantially incorporated in the bill before us.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would now like to mention a number of instances in which points were brought to the Government's attention by being discussed this autumn in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a very good answer.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The suggestions I am about to list were taken into account by the Government when it tabled its list of amendments to Bill C-259. The Government amended section 116(5) of the bill to allow a purchaser who has acquired taxable Canadian property from a non-resident not to be liable for tax of 15 per cent where he had a reasonable inquiry and has reason to believe that the non-resident is not a resident in Canada, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Government amended paragraph 18(2)(b) to exclude from a non-deductible expense "income or profits taxes or taxes computed by reference to the transfer of property". This is now a deductible expense, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Government amended section 80 so that the amount to be applied to reduce those things set out in paragraph (a) of section 80 will be that by which the lesser of the principal amount and of the amount for which the obligation was issued exceeds the amount paid, thus recognizing that an obligation can be issued for an amount less than face value, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Government has changed section 47 substantially, taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce contained in the proceedings, No. 35, of the committee of September 29, 1971.

The Government amended section 74(2) to clarify which capital gains shall be taken into the income of a transferor of property transferred to a spouse, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Amendments have been made to subsections (5) and (6) of section 26 of the Income Tax Applications Rules regarding valuation of assets for capital gains purposes at the start of the system, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

An addition has been made to section 245(2) by adding paragraph (c) so that a gift will not necessarily be income of a beneficiary, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

A change has been made to section 192(13) so that surplus of corporations which have amalgamated in the past does not become designated, thus taking into account the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

In addition, and these are some examples, the Government has been responsive to suggestions made in the reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which were issued in November. For example, as Mr. Benson pointed out, the Government amended the section dealing with the taxation of credit unions directly in response in part to the recommendation of the committee.

• (2040)

I have listed in some detail the ways in which the Government has responded to suggestions emanating from the Senate in regard to the form of the bill. This is because I am afraid the public has not been as fully aware as it might have been of the extent to which the Senate has been able to influence its intent and wording. I noticed, for example, in the main editorial in the Globe and Mail of yesterday the following paragraph:

> It is true that a Senate Committee has considered the White Paper on Taxation which bore no resemblance to the tax bill. It is also true that a Senate committee has examined the draft bill and that the Senate has this week been debating the report of the committee.

But the definitive bill is far different from the draft bill.

The Globe and Mail is certainly one of our outstanding national nespapers, and yet it is evident that the Globe and Mail was under the impression that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has only considered the bill in the form in which it was tabled last June.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was right too.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yet as I have mentioned to honourable senators in the last few minutes, there are numerous examples of ways in which the Senate committee has not merely taken note of the amendments to Bill C-259 that have been proposed by the Government during the autumn—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You should have attended the committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —but that the Senate committee itself was responsible for many of those Government amendments. So it is not a question of the Senate not having had the opportunity to take into account the Government's amendments. The fact is that the Government has had the opportunity to take into account recommendations made by the Senate committee and has done so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The least important.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The honourable senator says "the least important", but I take issue with him. This is important. I know the Leader of the Opposition finds it difficult to accept this portrayal of what I am sure all honourable senators will generally recognize as a true statement of the facts as they emerged from the committee in its deliberations on the consideration of the White Paper, and on its consideration of the bill now before us.

In the realm of our international agreements, it is intended that our tax treaties will be developed to seek competitive tax treatment for Canadians investing abroad. The withholding tax on investment income paid to non-residents is to remain at 15 per cent until the end of 1975. Thereafter it will be increased to 25 per cent in non-treaty countries. After January 1, 1972, pensions will be subject to withholding taxes. However, all old-age security pensions, and $1,290 of Canada and Quebec pension plan benefits, will be exempt.

Honourable senators will recall that the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on the White Paper recommended abandonment of the death duties field to the provinces. The federal Government has proposed that federal estate and gift taxes be eliminated after January 1, 1972. However, the federal Government has offered to help the provinces by collecting provincial succession duties and gift taxes for a three-year period.

Reform in our income tax legislation has been sought by the business community for many years. The previous government, in which some of the distinguished senators opposite were prominent members, established the Carter Commission to look into the question almost seven or eight years ago. If I remember correctly the Leader of the Opposition was a member of the Government which authorized the establishment of that commission. The Carter Commission held hearings, it produced a report, and the report engendered further debate.

The present Government produced a White Paper encompassing its own proposals, which provided a basis for further public discussion. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce produced its recommendations with respect to the White Paper. The Finance, Trade and Economics Affairs Committee of the other place also made its recommendations.

On the basis of all these submissions, and of many submissions from individuals and companies, the Government introduced its bill on July 12 last, and all of us were able to judge what the Government had in mind because there was a distribution of the document.

More recently the Government also supplied some amendments to this bill. The entire process of consultation has been a long one and has been accompanied by an uncertainty as to what the eventual outcome would be. In the next session of this Parliament, as the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee was told by the Minister of Finance last Monday, there will be some amendments proposed to the present legislation in the form of an amending bill. There is nothing abnormal in this. There have been amendments virtually every year to the income tax program ever since the income tax was introduced in 1918.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is very convincing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In some cases the Government is anxious to have a little more time to consider the best wording for amendments. It is sometimes easier to endorse the intention of a proposal than to find wording which perfectly accomplishes the intent. In other cases the Government believes that the wording will be adequate, but is ready to clarify the wording if in operation there is some dispute as to the meaning. In still other cases the Government would like further time to consider whether it will necessarily accept the full principle involved in some suggestions. As the Minister mentioned to the committee last Monday, and as he has said elsewhere at other times, the Government is not only willing but anxious to give the most serious consideration to all the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and from other quarters as well.

In the meantime, the Government and, I submit, Parliament has a responsibility and a duty to ensure that the public and the business community are able to operate in the new year on the basis of the law, without confusion and without uncertainty—confusion and uncertainty that would affect the operations of the Government as well as the economy of the nation. It is desirable to ensure predictability in regard to the income tax structure under which the public and corporations will be living. It is not in the public interest to allow uncertainty as to whether business and the public in January 1972 should be working under either expiring or prospective tax legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Due to an amending bill?

Hon. Mr. Martin: This bill has been before Parliament and the public for a long time. It is desirable that this long period of uncertainty should now come to an end.

The Hon. the Speaker: Did I understand that the Leader of the Opposition wished to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I will not bother to put a question.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Do not disturb an excellent peroration.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is an important item of the Government's program, and I have no hesitation in commending this bill to the Senate. The Senate is master of its own house. The Senate will decide of its own accord what the decision of this house will be.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The best joke has been made.

• (2050)

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Senate has full authority to accept or reject submissions which I make. However, in making these submissions, I would like to say that no tax bill has ever been fully acceptable to all sections of the people since I have been in Parliament, and that is a long time. I would ask any honourable senator whose experience corresponds to mine whether he would not agree that this is the case.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Corresponding to your experience?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, this is a good bill. This bill goes a long way towards tax reform. This bill relieves thousands of people of taxation. It approaches equity more than any other corresponding measure. This is a bill of which the Government need not be ashamed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is a good bill. This bill goes a long way towards tax reform as no other bill has done. I am sure any honourable senator, whether he fully agrees with the contents of the bill or not, could find weaknesses in it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not you, I am sure.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure any honourable senator could find weaknesses in any tax bill and could say such a bill is an imperfect measure, and does not deserve to be accepted by the Canadian people. But the Government is not ashamed of this bill. As the representative of the Government in the Senate, I recommend this bill and propose its adoption.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And that is without amendment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Imperfections in the bill can be corrected. We are not afraid of the taunts and criticisms levelled against it by those who do not have the responsibility of directing the Government of this country. This is a good bill. It deserves to be adopted.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And that is without amendment. I have never heard a better joke in my life.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I shall not make a speech at this time. However, so there will be no misunderstanding regarding the relationship between the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the bill as it appears before us, I would merely draw the attention of honourable senators to the final report of that committee tabled on December 13. Appendix B, at page 8, lists nine recommendations described by the committee as Top Priority Recommendations, for change in this bill. These are not small incidental changes, nor are they small specifics such as the Leader of the Government has drawn to our attention, but top priority recommendations. Those are the exact words of our committee. And not one of these recommendations is incorporated in the bill as it is presented to us today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I take it this observation is a question?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It was not meant as a question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I read a portion of the Minister of Finance's evidence at our committee meeting on Monday, December 13. This is at page 1 of the proceedings:

> Since debate on the bill commenced in the House of Commons this fall, the Senate has been considering the subject matter and has so far made two reports. We have studied these very carefully, and have made certain amendments in the House of Commons. I think of such amendments as those with respect to credit unions and co-operatives, as well as a great many other technical amendments, as being in conformity with the suggestions of this committee. I would like to repeat that your recommendations have been very helpful and will be the subject of our continuing study. An amending bill will be introduced next spring as, indeed, there always is an amending bill to a taxation statute. There has been one every year since 1918, when income tax was first imposed in Canada.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I take it the remarks made by my colleague, Senator Grosart, were by way of question, not by way of speech, and that he did not take my place in the order of debate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No, far from it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I wish to follow the honourable Leader of the Senate, which I consider a great honour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are delighted to accommodate you.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, Senator O'Leary reminded the Leader of the Government yesterday that when he delivered his maiden speech in this chamber he paraphrased Sir Winston Churchill, saying he did not come here to preside over the liquidation of the Senate.

This reminds me of another Churchillian gem of eloquence worth paraphrasing: Never was so much written by so few to bewilder so many.

Bill C-259 is a mandarin elephantine legislative monstrosity so complicated and so poorly drafted as to make it, to a considerable extent, unintelligible.

Yet, one of the principal objectives of this tax reform, according to the precursory White Paper, was "widespread understanding of, and voluntary compliance with, tax laws".

So this bill, these 707 pages of confusion, ambiguity, and complication are the result of this Government's attempt to draft legislation which would be both comprehensible and palatable to the average Canadian—just another in a long and impressive list of outstanding flops.

If we did not know before, we are certain to appreciate after our look at this bill that legal drafting is the weakest link in the legislative process. Good draftsmen are few, undervalued and overworked. This, combined with pressure to force large volumes of legislation through Parliament as quickly as possible, has produced a plethora of laws which are dismally unclear.

Usually, these structural shortcomings are of insignificant import. The individual statute does not usually affect that many people, or, if it does, not that frequently. Judges, lawyers, and government officials manage to make the laws work reasonably well most of the time. The nuisance and expense occasioned by flaws in a statute rarely constitute a major problem.

Our income tax law, however, is very different. It directly affects almost everyone in the country, and it does so annually. The considerable complexities of capital gains taxation will affect many more people than does the present income tax. Most of the complications, with their attendant added expenses, will fall on taxpayers in business rather than salaried citizens and wage earners.

The cost of complying with the new tax law will increase many-fold. Like other business costs, these will find their way into the prices of the goods and services upon which all of us depend. Therefore, we can look forward to more and more inflation as one of the results of this bill.

Our income tax law should not be rushed onto the statute books, because the consequences of error and ambiguity could be disastrous. No one wants to be the beneficiary of a law that imposes a higher than necessary compliance cost on the rest of society. As Canadians, we want the laws to be such that most people can understand and comply with them without the constant attendance of a professional adviser.

The Minister of National Revenue was not being very encouraging when, in a speech to the Canadian Tax Foundation some weeks ago, he stated:

> Once tax reform comes into effect, the increased need by taxpayers for rulings and interpretations will make greater demands on the limited number of staff engaged in this work.

He also warned that there would be lengthy delays in getting rulings.

While the Minister of Finance creates chaos by bringing in over 150 amendments seemingly calculated to further complicate an already confusing bill, the Minister of National Revenue tours the country telling us things are not half as bad as they are going to be, since there are not enough competent people to sort this mess out.

The complexity of this bill is a complete negation of the fundamental principle of a self-assessing tax system. It is of paramount importance to this type of system that the taxpayer should have a basic understanding of how it works.

Honourable senators, I think it has been the consensus of opinion throughout this country, from law societies and associations of bookkeepers, actuaries and accountants, that this law is not understandable.

If the taxpayer does not understand, at least conceptually, he will lose respect for the system and begin to suspect unfairness—all of which can lead to a complete breakdown in "voluntary compliance", of which the Government is so sincerely in search.

I would suggest that we pass the bill in its entirety during this session. Those sections dealing with changes in personal rates and exemptions, the deductibility of interest by corporations on money borrowed to buy shares, simplification of the tax structure and a new system of dividend tax credit could be proclaimed for immediate implementation. Proclamation of the very complex sections, I would like to see postponed for one year to allow adequate study, assimilation, planning and possible redrafting. The tax reduction in the bill could be effectively introduced by means of an ordinary budget.

Another very important reason for recommending the postponement of certain sections is that the additional time will permit provincial governments—and we must not forget provincial governments and their tax laws—to enact their enabling and complementary legislation during regular 1972 legislative sessions, thus providing a smoother transition. Otherwise, we could be faced with the very difficult problems of retroactive provincial taxation, which is most unsatisfactory.

If the taxpayer and tax practitioner are lost in this jungle of legalese, so we expect will be the tax assessor. This will inevitably give rise to a deluge of new tax forms, new regulations, government bulletins and the ubiquitous amendments which are certain to render everything mentally indigestible.

If the tax assessors cannot master the law, inequitable and inconsistent assessments will result. People will lose respect for the law and the courts will not know what struck them.

A year's delay in implementing some of the more abstruse sections would allow for complete redrafting of the bill, a reasonable time for outside experts to study and suggest changes, time for the education of the taxpayer and tax assessor, time for the provincial governments to amend their legislation which in turn should be studied by interested parties, and time for a smoother introduction of a polished workable tax reform.

We are all anxious to be finally done with tax reform. I am fully conversant with the fact that review of our tax law has gone on for eight years. We all know that, but the fact is that it is only in the last six months that we have had a chance to see, study and discuss the actual legislation. And the work of eight years has been before Parliament for only a couple of months.

It just does not strike me as right or logical that we should spend eight years elaborating a philosophy of taxation and only two months discussing the vehicle devised to implement that philosophy. The results brought about by the bill could, quite likely, unless we give it some more study, be completely at odds with the intended goals.

Let us try it, says the Minister of Finance, with a what-have-we-got-to-lose attitude. My reply to that is that executive irresponsibility and superficiality added to an already strident arrogance will surely not engender confidence in this administration.

• (2110)

It seems to me that a responsible administration would heed the warnings of such as the Honourable D'Arcy McKeough, Treasurer of Ontario and Minister of Economics, who said of this bill, in a statement to the meeting of the Ministers of Finance in Ottawa, November 1 and 2, 1971:

> —after four months of detailed study, we have not been able to even half digest the legal and administrative implications of the complex new Income Tax Act drawn up by Ottawa, let alone evaluate its impact on corporations and its practical workability. The 100 assorted amendments to Bill C-259 introduced on October 13 and the further substantial changes on October 28 have rendered our task that much more difficult.

It is still the minister speaking, and he goes on:

> —Given this situation, we do not intend to incorporate the federal tax changes in our own tax legislation in the immediate future ... Ontario cannot afford the risk of taking on faith that the new Bill C-259 is inherently sound and workable. In our view, it would be irresponsible to submit to the Ontario Legislature major changes in tax law that the Government itself has not fully appraised, understood and approved.

It seems to me that a responsible administration should listen attentively to the Canadian Bar Association which, in its brief to the Minister, warned:

> We have found it impossible in this short space of time to master the proposed legislation to the point where our criticisms can be in any sense adequate. We do feel confident that for every problem or mistake we have found in the statute, there are ten we have missed.

The brief goes on:

> —Our association, in putting together this submission, has had the advantage of concentrated effort by persons who are expert in analysing taxation statutes. If our group finds the time period allowed impossibly short, we wonder if many others will be able to comment effectively at all.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that a responsible administration would not fear that retention of this bill before the Senate, for the purpose of giving it the close scrutiny that was rendered impossible in the other place, could become a source of considerable embarrassment. This Government should be accustomed by now to the humiliation which usually accompanies serious blunders.

This Government, compelled by its vanity, its irrational fear of losing face, is determined to foist upon us a bill which even the minister concedes, after hundreds of amendments, is still largely imperfect; a bill whose workability is hopeless; a bill whose implications for the conduct of business are in many instances unknown; a bill whose administration is unnecessarily complicated; a bill whose total effect will be one of unremitting confusion. There is no intelligent excuse for the Government's adamantly sticking to this course of errors. It is wrongheaded and obtuse.

The Prime Minister would render a service to this country if he were to arrange for this bill to be split, allowing for immediate implementation of that upon which all of us are agreed, and for further study of the more contentious and unclear sections. This would be a true measure of statesmanship.

There are three excellent reasons why we should limit these tax reform measures for the coming year to those affecting personal income. The first is the complexity of the measures affecting corporate income. The second is the opposition of the provinces. The third is the uncertainty caused by the economic measures recently taken in the United States which is something important and should be considered very seriously by this body.

The complexity of this bill is mind-boggling even for the experts. In these circumstances, it seems reasonable to proceed only with those measures which can be understood and for which there is some real urgency. These are largely confined to measures applying to personal income.

The complexity of the measures applying to corporate income is the basic reason for the provincial opposition to their implementation next year. Those provinces levying taxes on corporate incomes will otherwise be placed in the position of having to introduce comparable changes in their own tax legislation or else, by holding their present legislation, as Ontario says it will, introduce a dual and frequently conflicting system.

No provincial finance minister will introduce tax changes which he cannot understand, much less justify to his opposition. This is not a partisan issue. The provinces that have opposed the introduction of the corporate reforms are Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and New Brunswick, three Conservative governments, one Liberal, and one New Democrat. Their opposition to quick implementation is based quite simply on their awareness that they will need at least a year—at least a year—to thread the federal measures into their own legislation.

The Nixon measures are something else again. We do not know how far the United States intends to go on this course of protectionism. Hence, it makes no sense at all to lock business into a straitjacket of new and incomprehensible tax measures at a time when it needs ultimate flexibility and freedom of movement to enable it to cope with foreign protectionism.

The minister says that this bill is an integrated whole which cannot be broken down into component parts without risking total collapse. I am not at all impressed by this fatuous argument. The one important integrating element in the reforms is the tax on capital gains. If Mr. Benson abandoned his attempt to tax gains in the coming year, he would then be able to separate the reforms into two distinct segments: personal and corporate, putting the former through before January 1, and holding the latter for more study and debate. And that, honourable senators, is what we on this side of the house have been advocating for the last few days.

There would be no political difficulties in pursuing this course. Everyone in the official Opposition would support it. We all agree, I think, on the measures relating to personal income. Passage of these provisions could be completed with singular alacrity. And with the convincing reasons which I have just explained for postponing the corporate measures, there would be almost no risk of loss of political face.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Or advantage.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Does Mr. Benson's insistence on taxing gains justify pressing ahead with measures which the provinces reject, which the tax experts and their clients cannot understand, and which, as we have been assured by the minister, will be altered again in the proximate future. Of course not, especially when the revenue involved is so minimal. The same can be said of his decision to give up federal death duties, again over provincial protest. In fact, he will collect more from death duties in 1972 than gains, given the sort of income we are experiencing.

Revenue, in fact, is the least of the considerations here. Were the minister to implement the measures covering personal income except for gains, retain death duties one more year, take off the surcharge, and confine his corporate measures to implementation of the uniform rate for large businesses, his estimated revenue loss would be in the range of $55 to $60 million. A nugatory sum, not even worthy of consideration when one measures it against the cost of trying to implement this taxation maze.

The measures affecting corporate income, especially international income, are excessively complex. We are categorically opposed to their implementation without further in-depth study. But let me not hear any voice raised to suggest that this concern for the technical rightness of the measures, the implications for the conduct of business, and the administrative efficiency, constitutes political obstructionism.

We in the Senate have a responsibility to study legislation carefully—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: —and we of the official Opposition intend to acquit ourselves of that responsibility honourably, rationally, and responsibly.

The Government argues that the uncertainty of another year of delay in implementing the measures would weigh too heavily on business decisions. In fact, it would weigh no more heavily than the continuing amendment of the legislation after it has passed. The Government's argument might apply to a simpler piece of legislation. It is patently ludicrous and completely meaningless in application to anything as complex as tax reform.

Simple common sense dictates a slow and measured approach to changes which can have such widespread implications for business activity at a time when, if the challenge of new job requirements is to be met, business activity should be given every inducement to expand. As it is, the pending imposition of the new tax legislation is driving business out of Canada. That we cannot afford at a time when unemployment is rampant, and the economy totters on the brink of collapse.

We must be given adequate time to carefully scrutinize this legislation. Let us have no "Christmas closure", as Senator Forsey so aptly described it last week.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Last week, yes.

[Hon. Mr. Choquette.]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Has he changed his mind since?

Let us resolve that there will be no Government by decree in this chamber. Let us stand together; we are the masters of this house and the Government should not be allowed to bully us into rubber-stamping legislation of this magnitude and importance.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Have you convinced Senator Martin of that yet?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Let us not knuckle under and accept on faith a piece of legislation which is being decried across the land. Let us not put up with this cavalier presumption of our subserviency to the Government's ambition.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce made several recommendations as to how this piece of legislation could be beneficially amended. They were largely ignored.

I do not care what the Leader of the Government says tonight. I repeat, they were largely ignored. Senator Hayden has said so himself. Senator Hayden's roommate, Senator Paterson, was today reprimanded because he, at his age, was sincere. Senator Paterson is one of the deans of this chamber. He has shared office space with the honourable Senator Hayden for some considerable time. Senator Paterson told us that he was terribly disappointed when he saw his roommate working for months on this piece of legislation, and then before leaving say to him, "I honestly believe that these amendments on which this committee has worked for months will be accepted."

The Leader of the Government, thinking it would bring him at least one or two votes, had his deskmate, who sometimes acts as the Deputy Leader, get up and defend his attitude on the bill. Senator Langlois told Senator Paterson that he was all wrong, that some 40 proposed amendments had been accepted.

Again I repeat, they were largely ignored.

Sure, the minister appeared before the committee and promised to bring in amending legislation which would incorporate the committee's suggestions. But that only made matters worse. It is more insulting to be patted on the head and promised goodies in return for proper behaviour, than it is to be completely ignored.

This insufferably arrogant Government has violated the dignity of the Senate. We are being told by this Government that they have no use for the Senate as a legislative body. They are trying to turn us into a merely consultative body.

This is not what we were intended to be; this is not what the majority of us would like to see the Senate made into; and this is not, I feel convinced, what will happen because I am sure that senators on both sides will agree to fight these bold attempts to destroy the Senate.

As Senator Hayden said last week, we will not be dictated to. If we rubber-stamp this bill, then we will deserve fully all the ridicule that will be heaped upon us. We will have volunteered concrete evidence of the fact that we are a completely useless legislative appendage.

• (2130)

You know and I know that the Senate plays a role of tremendous importance in the development of worthwhile legislation. You know as well as I do that the Senate is capable of excellent work, and is always willing to rise to any challenge. This bill offers a challenge, a tremendous one. And I am sure that given adequate time and the proper circumstances, we could transform this chronically arthritic piece of tax legislation into a metamorphic adonis of legislative intelligibility, equity, and workability.

The key to all this is time. We cannot be expected in a matter of ten days to study and pass intelligent and informed judgment on a piece of legislation that had a gestation period of some eight full years. The nasty fact is, honourable senators, that we do not—I repeat, do not—have the time to put this bill through the metamorphosis of which it stands in such great need.

Bill C-259 consists, in reality, of at least eight separate and distinct bills, all affecting the Canadian public—bills dealing with personal income, capital gains, taxation of corporations and shareholders, taxation of the mining and petroleum industries, business and property income, international income, taxation of co-operatives and credit unions and the taxation of farmers.

Furthermore, this one mammoth bill affects the Government's own activities in seven distinct areas. It affects their federal economic, fiscal and monetary policies and planning, both domestic and foreign; it affects federal-provincial relationships through unilateral apportionment of tax resources available to the federal Government and the provincial governments; it affects Canada's welfare and social programs; it affects Canada's trade; and it affects the Government's industrial development, agriculture, and resource development.

Of the bill's 707 pages, at least 175 have been amended since first reading in the other place, some more than once. We have a responsibility as senators to see to it that adequate consideration is given this bill. I fail to see how this can be done now, during what should be the Christmas recess, in the ten or so days we have left. I think we have a duty to prolong this debate into the New Year. By so doing we will be maintaining an open forum for discussing and resolving the many complexities of this bill. It is absolutely essential that discussion of this bill be continued. We must not allow the bill to drop from public sight on the mere promise of more amendments in the spring. It would be sheer folly to allow this legislative mess to fall into the hands of officials for interpretation as they may see fit.

I repeat, for the sake of emphasis and clarity, that we have no quarrel with the measures applying to personal income. Those we would like to see implemented as soon as possible. But the measures relating to corporate income must, of necessity, be given much more thorough consideration than has been the case up to now, and this can only be done later, some time in January, and without a deadline being held over our heads like the sword of Damocles.

It is my contention, in which I was supported by Senator Hayden last week, that if on January 1 the bill has not been passed and the present session of Parliament is still continuing, then whenever the bill is passed during the continuance of this session the date of January 1, 1972, would still be the effective date. That means we could pass it any time in the New Year, and it would be deemed to have become effective on January 1.

This is the first time in the history of Canada that any government has taxed the people by using closure on the representatives of the people. This is government by decree. And if we pass this bill without due consideration, then we will be as guilty as they were of this travesty of justice, this prostitution of democracy.

I must disagree most vehemently with those who assert that the Senate has already given this bill ample review. It is claimed that we could not conceivably add much of value to what we have already indicated in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee's three reports on Bill C-259. I beg to differ. The recommendations the committee made were for the purpose of obtaining alterations on a strictly technical level, and I am not at all willing to agree that we have no more work to do in this area.

However, the very essential point I wish to make at this juncture is that we have not given any consideration of the principles which form the substructure upon which has been erected this legislative Tower of Babel called Bill C-259. We have been so preoccupied with the intricacies involved in how to make this bill workable that we have not had time to sit back and ask ourselves whether or not much of the philosophy upon which this bill is predicated is palatable to us.

We have dealt only with the technical aspects of the bill. Let us now send this bill to committee and go through it with infinite care to see if whether or not it coincides with the guidelines we set down in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee's report on the White Paper on taxation.

Let us see if there has been translated into this legislation an appreciation of the fact that economic growth in Canada can come about only through the investment of capital and savings by Canadians or foreigners.

Let us look at it closely to see if the bill reflects acceptance of the fact that Canada is, of necessity, a capital importing country heavily dependent on substantial risk capital, which traditionally has come from the United States.

Let us see if this bill shows any awareness of the fact that there is now strong competition in world markets for capital, including risk capital, and that it has become necessary for Canada to meet such competition or suffer a diminution in capital inflow, with disastrous effect on our economic growth, prosperity, and standard of living.

Let us see if this bill blends equity with our capital needs and maintenance of our competitive position in the export market.

Let us see if the Government paid any attention to the recommendations we made in the report on the White Paper on taxation. They did not pay any attention to our reports on this bill. What were we promised by the minister? That he would continue to study our suggestions with a view to possibly incorporating some of them into an amending bill next spring—a conciliatory, propitiatory bribe, an outright sop. The minister made no commitment. We were dismissed out of hand. No special consideration will be given our recommendations.

I should now like to point out to our senatorial neophytes, our raw-raw-roll-up-your-sleeves-and-work-on-Sunday boys, that we on this side have a list of a few hundred points that we want cleared up in committee. I suspect we will have more questions to ask and arguments to make as we go through the bill clause by clause.

• (2140)

In my estimation, this bill is a wholly incomplete and inadequate reform. It fails to reform federal tax activities, reform tax sharing and integration with the provinces, provide greater equity for middle-income taxpayers, stop taxing the poor or employ a tax credit rather than exemption system to more effectively assist low-income Canadians, simplify the language and draftsmanship, and reform tax collection.

In that, honourable senators, this behemoth is a monument to pedantry; it is technocracy run wild; it is an unholy exercise in obscurantism. This bastard child of statism and egalitarianism is depressing to contemplate. It offers for the future an increasing burden of taxation imposed in an increasingly complex way.

This—and I am through, honourable senators, and I am sure you are all glad—is the "Just Society", one of the most highly taxed and overgoverned societies in what is left of the free world.

I leave you with the thoughts of Abraham Lincoln:

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could do for themselves.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to comment at great length on the speech we have just heard, but I cannot refrain from making a few remarks before going on with what I had intended to say this evening.

First, I noted that my honourable friend Senator Choquette referred to the work which has been done in connection with Bill C-259, in mentioning that its study had lasted some nine years. He called that a rushed study. A nine-year rush? I, too, would attempt to paraphrase the great Churchill, by adding: Some study, some rush! Now I will continue in French because, in commenting on my honourable friend's remarks, I think I should use the language that we both speak normally.

[Translation]

My good friend Senator Choquette apparently wished, in his opening remarks, to scold me for having taken Senator Paterson to task this afternoon.

I am sure that my honourable friend was carried away by his oratory and he did not mean what he said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I did not ask you.

I would draw his attention to the fact that when the item on which he was supposed to speak was called, he was not in his seat and it is at my request that it was stood to allow him to speak later and I indicated at the time that it was precisely because Senator Paterson intended to take the floor. I never took him to task as Hansard will show. All I did was to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that 44 of the amendments suggested by the Senate had been accepted by the Minister of Finance; I wondered about the position the Opposition was taking and referred, as my honourable friend will recall, to what Senator Beaubien had said the day before yesterday when he participated in this debate.

But I will leave this little incident aside for the time being knowing that I need not give it further attention.

I was again surprised tonight to hear my honourable friend talk about the ruthless way in which the Government apparently wanted to dispose of this legislation, and I think that in order to assess the merit of remarks of that kind—for he was not the only one to express such remarks—it is necessary to fully relate the circumstances that led to this legislation.

I know that by so doing I might have to say certain things that will not please my honourable friends opposite but I must tell them that should it be so it is simply by pure coincidence and that it is not my intention to turn this debate into a political discussion.

First, I would like to recall that my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We are here to have a debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You will have an opportunity to make your speech later, my friend. You have the habit of continuously interrupting debates because you do not know how to reply when it is time to do so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I wanted to tell my honourable friend to go right ahead and say anything he wants to say, that we would not be offended, that we would not be put out, that he is absolutely free; it just so happens that we are here to debate issues and there is no need for him to fear that we would be offended, provided he himself is not.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I wish to point out that Senator Grosart is not in his seat because, if he were, he would have called to order the Leader of the Opposition who is interrupting without any reason a speech I am making; this is absolutely out of order and you know that your colleague would certainly have pointed it out to His Honour the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a question of privilege, it is certainly in order to rise and ask the senator who has the floor if he will allow a question.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You did not ask me anything.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree, I did not ask anything but I presume that when I stand this means I intend to ask a question. Since my good friend and colleague does not like to be interrupted may I tell him that he can say whatever he wants, even things to which I could take exception more without my interrupting him; if he wants to speak all by himself he is free to do so.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I understand that the last part of this question of privilege was directed not to you, Your Honour, but to me and I wish to thank my honourable friend for the suggestions—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Anyway I am going to withdraw.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I see that my honourable friend is leaving the chamber and perhaps I will be able to continue to address the Senate in peace.

Honourable senators, I was just giving the background of the legislation now before us. This measure, as was pointed out tonight by Senator Choquette, originated with the creation of the Carter Commission in 1962. Moreover, as the Government Leader also reminded us tonight, that Commission was organized and established by the Conservative Government of the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker. That might explain the ire of our honourable friends opposite, whenever they are reminded of that disastrous regime we had for several years in this country.

The work of the Carter Commission, which lasted several years, was followed by the production, by the Department of Finance, of the White Paper, which was thoroughly considered by the committees of the House of Commons and of the Senate. First, there was a report from the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the Commons, then the report on the White Paper from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I am sure my honourable friends opposite have not forgotten the two volumes I have here and which stand as monuments to the untiring efforts and dedication of Senate and House of Commons members who participated in this remarkable study.

Following production of the reports I have just mentioned, the Minister of Finance introduced what has been described as the 1971 summary of the tax reform legislation. On July 12, 1971,the government tabled and gave for distribution Bill C-259, now before us.

Then there was the summer adjournment and, during those long summer months, all members of this House as well as those of the other place had every opportunity of studying this legislation.

When the houses were recalled in the fall, in September, the Government met with concerted opposition from all the Opposition parties in the House of Commons with the result that, facing this concerted opposition and looking back on several weeks of useless and often irrelevant debates, the Government decided, as was its right, to resort to a closure motion, commonly called guillotine. I know that some of our honourable friends in this house often referred to this procedure as being infamous and unworthy of a responsible government, but I shall merely point out to them that the so-called guillotine is a British device, whereas the filibuster, the practice in which they and their friends in the other house were indulging, is an American institution which has nothing British about it.

In view of the attitude of some members of the Opposition parties, who seem to have a marked dislike for anything American, I wonder how they agreed to use a formula as American as this in order to make their point before the House of Commons. However, I will leave this matter aside.

When the summary of 1971 tax reform legislation came before this house, the Senate realized immediately that this legislation could not receive proper consideration unless a somewhat unusual procedure—but one for which there were a number of precedents in the history of this house—were followed.

I was quite aghast while listening to Senator Beaubien—I am sorry he is not here tonight—say, as recorded on page 1608 of the English version of the official report of Debates of the Senate, of December15, from which I quote:

> If it is true that the Leader of Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) represents the Government in the Senate, it is also true that he represents the Senate in the cabinet, and in my opinion the Leader of the Government in the Senate should have known a month ago—

—a month ago, you will notice—

> —that the Senate would not be in a position to deal with this important bill in a dignified and sensible way should it come to us in Christmas week. After all, the leader owes something to the Senate. He could have taken the trouble to say to his colleagues in the cabinet, "Now, look, you have had this bill since June. If the Senate does not get it by December 8 it will not deal with it until the beginning of the new year."

The honourable senator had quite forgotten yesterday what happened here on September 14 last, when the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce brought forward the following motion which I quote from page 1246 in the English version of the official report of the Debates of the Senate:

[English]

> Hon. Salter A. Hayden, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), moved:
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, tabled this day, and any bills based on the Budget Resolutions in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate, and any other matters relating thereto; and
> That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

[Translation]

Following that motion, Senator Hayden said further, and I quote from the same page of the Debates of the Senate:

[English]

> You will recall that the Government issued a White Paper proposing many tax changes or reforms, and in the House of Commons that White Paper was referred to the Commons Finance Committee, while in the Senate it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Public hearings were held by both committees and in due course, on the determination of the hearings, a report was submitted by each committee. Subsequently the Government considered and reflected, and proceeded to draft what it felt would be the implementing legislation. I should say that in this summary of the 1971 tax reform legislation many of the recommendations made by your committee, and many of the recommendations made by the committee of the House of Commons, have been recognized and incorporated.

[Translation]

[English]

> However, so far as Bill C-259, which has been introduced in the House of Commons, is concerned you may well say that it uses a great many words to reflect the opinions, judgments, and decisions of the Government concerning the form and the scope of the amending legislation. I have here a copy of the bill, and while it is true that it is printed on only one side of the page, nevertheless it runs to over 700 pages. Now when one is tackling such a massive job as this, I think it it is almost inevitable that it should take a very long time, and that there should be thorough and widespread consultation rather than having it confined within very narrow limits. I say this because we could arrive at a situation in which many things are introduced into the resulting bill which are not intended, while others bring about situations that are not intended, and while yet others do exactly the opposite of what was intended originally.

• (2200)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Who said all that?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Senator Hayden.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is it very long?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is too long for you, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I always enjoy listening to him when he has something to say himself, but not when it is repeated by you or anybody else.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Perhaps if it is repeated often enough, it will sink in and you will learn something. Then he went on to say:

> Furthermore, the language in the bill is quite a departure from the language of taxation legislation as we know it. As a result, the combination of all these things presents many difficulties.

He continued on the same page, and I am sure my learned friend will be following what was intended to be done at the time. He will find that away back in September this chamber fully realized and anticipated the situation in which we find ourselves today, and took steps to deal with the bill in the manner in which we are dealing with it today. This was agreed upon by all parties in this chamber, and I am going to prove it by quoting from this record. Senator Hayden went on to say:

> The thickness of this copy of Bill C-259 can be seen. It is important that we get to work as quickly as possible in order that we may make some study of the bill. I would like to be able to say that we can make a complete study, but that would be a vain hope, because for a number of years after this bill passes into law there will be annual presentations of amendments because of the interpretations of which the language is capable and which were not sufficiently thought out in those extended applications before the bill was passed. Yet, January 1 is the deadline.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

And that was said on September 14, 1971.

> The economy and the revenues are geared to this bill, with its substantial provisions, becoming effective on January 1, 1972.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Of course they become effective, but it does not say that that is the deadline.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Is that a speech or a question?

Mr. Speaker, has the honourable senator the right to make a speech?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Very well, may I ask a question? I take it you realize that what Senator Hayden said was that the deadline meant the effective date. Do you not think he meant the effective date was January 1? I suggest to you that he did not mean that everything had to be done—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Is that a question?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am asking you a question.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Will you please write it down and send it over to me?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Do you want me to repeat it in French for you? Perhaps that will help you to understand it better. My question is quite simple. Do you suggest that Senator Hayden meant that nothing could be done after January 1?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What he said I am going to repeat.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I know what he said, but I am asking you for your interpretation of what he said.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He said:

> Yet, January 1 is the deadline. The economy and the revenues are geared to this bill, with its substantial provisions, becoming effective on January 1, 1972.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Does that mean everything concerning the bill should be ended before January 1? That is the question I am asking you.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is what he said, "substantial provisions". Is that language clear enough for you? It does not mean all provisions, but it does mean "substantial provisions" would become effective on January 1. When he said that the bill is geared to the economy of the country, that means something to me even if it does not mean anything to you.

Then he went further and added:

> Therefore, I think it is our duty, as best we can, to accommodate ourselves to that intention and plan. At the same time I think we should work as hard as we can to make it as effective and as easy of administration and understanding as is possible in the limited time available. You will not get perfection, but I think the result of the committee's sittings and conclusions will be to remedy many of the situations arising in the transition from existing law, through the decisions made in the summary to the implementation of those decisions in Bill C-259. We may be able to correct and adjust much that is in this bill that is not really intended and does not serve the purpose it was designed to serve.

Your leader, Senator Flynn, spoke after Senator Hayden on the same day, and this is what he had to say as reported on page 1248 of the record of this house:

HON. JACQUES FLYNN: Honourable senators, I do not hesitate in saying at once that I am in full agreement with the sponsor of this motion and the objectives he has indicated he has in putting this motion before the house.

At first, the idea of considering a bill which has not been passed by the other place may appear a little irregular, but we are faced with a very special situation. This bill, after all, follows the White Paper which was tabled about two years ago. It follows reports of a special committee of the other place and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Therefore, it is not a problem of dealing with the principle of the bill, but really of finding out whether the conclusions of the Government following the White Paper, its criticism by the public in general and in the reports of the House of Commons and Senate committees are actually enacted in the manner indicated to be the wish of the Government. We are faced with a technical problem which is, as Senator Hayden said, very important.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is good.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is quite clear.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why do you not file the whole book?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I think you do not understand it. Listen to your leader speaking again, as reported on the same page:

> Senator Hayden has indicated that the department—I suppose he refers to the Department of National Revenue—has realized after some consideration that amendments are necessary. I am personally quite convinced that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce can help the department and the Government. I am even more sure that both the department and the Government need help in this respect.

And Senator Hayden said:

> May I answer a question which is inherent in what you said? There is precedent for this procedure in the Senate. It has occurred on at least three occasions since I have been here, one of which was almost parallel. This was done in 1945 when it appeared that the budget resolutions were never to become legislation and sent to this house. There was a resolution similar in wording to that which I put on the Order Paper tonight referring the bills arising out of the budget for examination and consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

He was followed by Senator John J. Connolly, who said:

> Let me say in the first place that it is heartening for parliamentarians who have given a great deal of work to a complicated problem such as that presented by the White Paper and earlier by the Report of the Royal Commission to know that their work was not in vain. Many parts of the White Paper and recommendations of the royal commission were strenuously contested during the committee hearings. The new Income Tax Act which has now been presented to Parliament in the other place generally has been applauded.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is this a filibuster? I ask that because they used to read dictionaries in the old days.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am sure we want to listen to all honourable members in this house without interruption.

• (2210)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I did not read on indefinitely.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe Senator Langlois is entitled to be heard regardless of the reaction of any honourable member opposite.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You are killing time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Surely the Senate is entitled to hear speeches without having to listen to interruptions such as we have been hearing for some time now from honourable members opposite.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Dealing with the point of order—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly the Leader of the Government interrupted me as often as he wished, and I gave him permission to question me any time he wishes. If an honourable senator has experience and control of himself, I think it is only fair that he should allow a colleague to put a question to him, especially when he quotes from part of a debate and distorts the meaning.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege and request that the honourable senator be ordered to withdraw his accusation that I have distorted the record I have been quoting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have made the statement and I will stand by it.

The Hon. the Speaker: When the Leader of the Opposition said that honourable Senator Langlois distorted a statement did he mean that he distorted it deliberately?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I said "distorted." I did not use the word "deliberately."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to dispose of this question. I have examined the rules and they provide for the taxing of remarks. I have to use my judgment, of course, especially in a case such as this where there has been a heated debate. If the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) had used the word "deliberately", I would have had to ask him to withdraw his remark. However, I am sure this was not the case. Returning now to the original point of order, I feel it is the desire of all honourable senators to proceed as orderly as possible. When honourable senators on both sides keep making interjections from their seats, it becomes impossible for me to follow what is going on.

It has been the practice here that when a senator has the floor he is not to be interrupted unless another senator rises on a question of privilege or a point of order or to obtain permission to ask a question. The senator addressing the house might well decline to have the question put, or he might allow the question to be put and indicate that he will answer it at the end of his speech or on some future occasion. In such an important debate as this, the Chair needs the full co-operation of all honourable senators so that we may proceed as orderly as possible. I give the floor to the honourable Senator Langlois.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: To continue reading.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I will not insist that the Leader of the Opposition withdraw his unparliamentary remarks. I feel he has sufficiently demonstrated his lack of gallantry.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I feel Your Honour has disposed of this matter and if the honourable senator wishes to rise on this question again I will have something further to say. If he is not satisfied with Your Honour's ruling, that is his problem. The honourable senator has said that I made an unparliamentary remark, and this is not true.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order please. I am now addressing myself to the Leader of the Opposition. He may use any words he wishes as long as they are not construed to be unparliamentary. Once before this evening I decided that certain words are not unparliamentary. Of course, we must accept the situation that the same kind of remark might have been made from the other side. I must confess I did not hear the last comment Senator Langlois made. I would ask him to proceed, and if he wishes to repeat what he said I can decide on the nature of his remark.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am quoting from honourable Senator Connolly's remarks as they appear at page 1249 of Senate Hansard of September 14, 1971:

> The bill is to come into effect at the end of this year and it would be impossible for the House of Commons to deal with the matter in the normal course and pass it on to us for approval. It would reach the Senate in the dying days of the session, before the Christmas adjournment and we could not possibly give it any kind of consideration. We could hold it over to another session; we have that authority or veto power. However, I do not consider that to be a desirable exercise to contemplate. Senator Hayden suggests in this regard that the rules of Parliament be used with ingenuity. He is making the parliamentary process adaptable. He is making it come alive. He is making it serve the country, and he is allowing us and Parliament to get around the dead letter of the law.

In reply to remarks made by Senator Hayden and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), Senator Walker, as reported on page 1249 of Hansard, said this:

> Honourable senators, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has really made the point that I had in mind. If the Chairman of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee had not taken the initiative the committee would never have had the opportunity of examining this voluminous bill.

• (2220)

> How often have we received legislation which has been delayed in the House of Commons and which arrives here too late for us to give it full consideration? It may be that the other place is anxious to adjourn. By doing this at the opening of the session the House of Commons will come to look forward day by day to the deliberations of our committee. They really do look to this committee for enlightenment on bills of this kind. Without being political at all, I would like to pay my tribute to the greatest chairman this committee has ever had, the honourable Senator Hayden.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

As I said before I started quoting from the Debates of the Senate of September 14—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did he say anything also in May that you could read into the record?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I know that you do not like to be reminded of what you have said earlier in this chamber, because you change your mind every day.

As I said when I was interrupted, all parties in this chamber understood as early as September 14 and anticipated the situation we were to run into, which is the present situation. Everyone agreed on that day to proceed in the way we have proceeded, by referral of the tax reform legislation to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for advance study. This was done, and today my friends have changed their minds. It is too bad, but the Senate has set a course and we must follow it through.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker, there is a rule that a speaker cannot be interrupted except for correction of a misinterpretation of a speech. I say that Senator Langlois is putting a wrong interpretation on the speech I made on that date. It does not mean that I was prepared to receive the bill on December 17, and have it assented to before December 31.

I made my point in accordance with the rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: On the point of order, the Leader of the Opposition was entitled under the rules to give his interpretation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker: He has done so now, and I give the floor to the honourable Senator Langlois.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I will let the record speak for itself. It is quite clear and a good indication of what was realized at that time by all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What does it matter? The amendments are not in the bill. While the honourable senator is finding his place, would he permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You ask your question after I am through.

[Translation]

This was the procedure agreed upon by the Senate on September 14, 1971, to the full knowledge of all honourable senators. As I said in English earlier, we cannot now alter this course of action which was unanimously adopted by the Senate itself on September 14, last.

Following this motion, the Senate carried out a study for over three months on the tax legislation and suggested many amendments. It was content with making suggestions because, as all honourable senators realize, and not being legislatively seized of this measure, it could only make recommendations. As stated by the Minister of Finance himself before the Senate committee on Monday, December 13, 44 of these recommendations, of these suggested amendments, have been not only accepted but incorporated into this legislation.

I think this is an undisputable reply to the argument raised by several honourable senators opposite to the effect that this measure was to be rammed through without the Senate having the opportunity to study it carefully.

Incidentally, I was quite surprised yesterday to hear Senator O'Leary—and I regret that he is not in his seat at present—mentioning external forces which would have imposed a deadline on the Senate. He was speaking in English and I will quote a few notes I took while he was speaking.

[English]

No outside force should impose a deadline to the Senate.

[Translation]

He also referred in this same speech to the pipeline debate of 1956, and compared the two. Finally he added—much to my dismay—that not only had Mr. Benson given the Senate committee no assurance as to the future introduction of a bill to amend Bill C-259 but he had made no reference whatsoever to the Senate when talking about amendments.

I know I will again spread great confusion and probably draw shouts of protest from my honourable colleagues opposite when I quote what was said by Mr. Benson on Monday when he paid a visit to the Senate committee.

I shall first quote from page 51:32 of the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of December 13, that is last Monday. Here is what the Honourable Mr. Benson said at the beginning of his remarks, and I quote:

[English]

> Gentlemen, firstly, in appearing here today at the request of Senator Hayden it is not my intention to make a general or lengthy statement. I will appear again before the Senate when the bill is officially in your hands next week, if you so desire. At that time, if you so wish, I will make a longer statement.
> Now I would like to indicate the appreciation of the Government and, indeed, of myself for the work done from the beginning by this Senate committee on the tax legislation. Relating the reports produced by the committee with respect to the White Paper on Taxation to the budget of June 18, if I recall correctly, some 44 recommendations of the Senate committee which were adopted in Bill C-259. Since debate on the bill commenced in the House of Commons this fall, the Senate has been considering the subject matter and has so far made two reports. We have studied these very carefully, and have made certain amendments in the House of Commons. I think of such amendments as those with respect to credit unions and co-operatives, as well as a great many other technical amendments, as being in conformity with the suggestions of this committee. I would like to repeat that your recommendations have been very helpful and will be the subject of our continuing study. An amending bill will be introduced next spring as, indeed, there always is an amending bill to a taxation statute. There has been one every year since 1918, when income tax was first imposed in Canada.

• (2230)

The following appears on page 51:32 of the committee's proceedings:

> THE CHAIRMAN: You do not want to tie the amending bill to budget time?
> SENATOR BEAUBIEN: No.
> SENATOR MOLSON: No, and we do not think it should be necessary to wait so long.
> HON. MR. BENSON: If you want a better definition I will bring in an amending bill, but I cannot promise I will have the amending bill by the end of January or the end of February.
> SENATOR MOLSON: Bring it in at the earliest possible date.
> SENATOR BEAUBIEN: That is all we ask you, Mr. Minister.

[Translation]

As you can see, Senator Beaubien was speaking on behalf of his party, I hope, and he would have been satisfied with an assurance that the bill to amend the bill before us would be dealt with during the course of the next session.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Beaubien is not here.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Well, I am quoting his words and the record—le record—is there, he can refute it whenever he likes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean the official report—le compte rendu.

Hon. M. Langlois: That, I presume, is another point of order, Your Honour.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no, I am correcting your French.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I come now to what Senator O'Leary had to say, speaking before the committee, on page 51:35, and I quote:

[English]

> SENATOR O'LEARY: Mr. Chairman, am I right in saying that what the minister has said to us today, and that all he has said to us, is that at some unspecified date in the coming year he will bring in an amending bill under the budget, and he may or he may not incorporate in that amending bill some of the amendments which your committee has suggested? Is that correct?
> HON. MR. BENSON: I think it has gone further than that. I indicated in the House of Commons on Friday, and again here today, that I will incorporate some amendments.

On page 51:36 it continues as follows:

> HON. MR. BENSON: Some of the amendments recommended by the Senate. I have also indicated that we will move forward with all due dispatch to examine the more complicated suggestions which the Senate, as well as others, have made, and produce new legislation in the form of an amending bill. Now, I cannot say whether that is going to be introduced in January or February; but we will move forward just as fast as we can in order to produce legislation. The only reason this got tied up with the budget is that if you make substantial changes in the House of Commons, under our procedure, I normally introduce it in the form of a budget.

[Translation]

As I said awhile ago, what the Honourable Mr. Benson stated before the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been definitely and clearly acknowledged as an assurance that a bill amending the legislation now before us would be promptly introduced during the next session and that such bill would incorporate some amendments suggested by the Senate. Whether it is called a commitment, an assurance or a statement, it matters little. A senior minister of the Crown, the Minister of Finance responsible to the country gave those assurances, made those commitments on behalf of the Government of Canada—and Senator Beaubien said he was satisfied, according to the record which I have here, that is the record of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

I would now like to state briefly the advantages resulting from the legislation now under consideration.

[English]

The other day, when the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce spoke in this place, he referred to some of the goodies in the bill:

1. One million Canadians are removed from the tax rolls of this country;

2. 4,700,000 Canadians will pay less tax after the legislation has been passed by Parliament;

3. The tax burden is spread so as to include persons benefiting from capital gains. The tax load is no longer concentrated solely on salary and wage earners, professionals and businessmen;

4. A fair deal to the mothers will be provided because it permits deductions for child care expenses;

5. It is much fairer to those mentally or physically handicapped or disabled, in permitting deductions of expenses for the care and training of such persons;

6. Existing exemptions to the elderly will be increased and applied at age 65, instead of age 70 as at present;

7. Members of the labour force will benefit from broad exemptions of expenses in moving themselves or their families to another part of the country to accept new jobs, and expense allowances in respect of special clothes, books, and tools required for a job will be permitted, thus placing the working class on an even footing with the self-employed in Canada;

8. Substantially increased deductions for contributions to retirement plans will raise the level of personal savings available to finance capital investments in Canada;

9. Foreign investment of pension plans, deferred profit-sharing plans, and registered retirement savings plans may not now exceed 10 per cent of the assets if those plans are to qualify for tax-free treatment, and this figure of 10 per cent will also be raised. This change will channel millions of dollars into Canadian investments;

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

10. The progressive reduction of the general corporate tax rate from 50 per cent to 46 per cent in 1976 will bring this tax down to a level below that in the United States, our main competitor;

11. Small businesses will be encouraged by making the lower tax rate available to Canadian-owned companies, and by penalizing non-resident control;

12. Capital losses will be set off against gains and not lost totally as in the past.

I regret that I must end with the thirteenth.

13. An improved dividend tax credit will be an added incentive for Canadians of modest income to invest in Canadian corporations.

Finally, once again let me remind those who still claim that this bill is being rammed through Parliament of the enormous studies made by various bodies, such as the Carter Commission, and the committees of both houses who have worked tremendously hard on this piece of legislation. Let me also remind honourable senators of the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in connection with the White Paper; of the fact that some 49 days were devoted by the other house to the consideration of the legislation; and of the fact that copies of the present bill, as both the Leader of the Government and I have said, have been distributed and available to both houses for study and consideration since July 12 last.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Honourable senators, I notice that it is now 10.30. I shall need about an hour if I go ahead.

I am willing to proceed, but perhaps it would be best to adjourn.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, I believe I rose first. As a matter of fact, I rose ahead of the honourable Senator Langlois but, out of courtesy to the Deputy Leader of the Government, I sat down. I certainly want to be heard tonight because it will be impossible for me to be here tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I will yield to the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: That is in the best senatorial tradition. Thank you, Senator Belisle.

Honourable senators, the bill before us has been described in glowing terms. It was my intention to quote a few remarks from the other place in the spirit of levity, as we have heard tonight expressed by the honourable Senator Choquette, to, perhaps, amuse you. However, because of the lateness of the hour, I will get right to the meat of what I wish to say.

This statement was made in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette on Thursday, December 16, 1971:

> It is manifestly impossible for the senators to give the bill the study it deserves in the few days left them. The choice before the Senate, then, is to either hold the bill over, making time for that study, or to rubber stamp it.

What are the facts? Let us consider the Senate's record. First of all, tax reform has been under discussion for nearly ten years. It started with the Carter Commission. Secondly, the Government issued its White Paper. Thirdly, the White Paper was referred by resolution of the Senate on November 19, 1969, to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Fourthly, that committee sat from January to June in 1970, and during that time it received and examined briefs from 118 companies, organizations or individuals. In addition, the committee received 225 briefs which, while not heard by the committee directly, were examined by its staff. Fifthly, in September 1970, the committee submitted its report on the White Paper proposals for tax reform.

Finally, on September 14, 1971, this honourable house moved that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the summary of 1971 tax reform legislation, and any bills based on the budget resolutions in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate.

This was an extraordinary and historic procedure. For the first time since Confederation the Senate took advantage of the tabling of a draft bill in the other place—this was in June—and even before the draft bill reached the Senate it was sent to our Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In effect, the Senate was the only instrument of parliamentary government that legitimately provided a means whereby the views of the public could be expressed on a draft bill.

As a result of this historic and unique move our committee brought into focus a series of suggested amendments, traceable to leading institutions or companies in Canada. As examples I need only refer to the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the various mining companies, paper companies, charities, co-operatives and credit unions. In a sense we were x-raying the anatomy of the country through the representations made to us.

As a consequence of the committee hearings, two early reports called Preliminary Report No. 1 and Preliminary Report No. 2 were tabled in the Senate on November 4 and November 30, 1971, respectively. A statement setting out a list of technical changes required in Bill C-259 in order to clarify or correct the language of many of the provisions was attached to our third and final report.

When the Government officially announced that it would terminate debate in accordance with the rules of the other place, the chairman of our committee, Senator Hayden, contacted the Minister of Finance and obtained a commitment—perhaps not as extensive and satisfactory as one would like—that the recommendations of the Senate committee would receive consideration.

On Friday, December 10, the Honourable Mr. Benson, Minister of Finance, made the following remark in the other place:

> Next, Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the members of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce who submitted a comprehensive report in the fall of 1970. About 50 of the measures contained in the legislation are the same or similar to the recommendations of that committee. That committee has also held hearings this fall while the bill has been in the committee of the whole in this house, and it has issued two reports which will be given serious study by the Government.

Later on a list of top priority items among the recommendations in the two committee reports were submitted to the Minister of Finance, together with amendments which would incorporate their substance.

Last Monday, December 13, the Minister of Finance appeared before the committee and again, in my opinion, gave a commitment, in so far as he was able as a minister of the Crown, that within the next three or four months he would introduce considerable amendments to the present bill, and carefully consider the committee's recommendations in respect thereto.

It is, therefore, manifestly absurd to say that no detailed consideration has been given by the Senate to the tax reform legislation; that we are rubber-stamping it without any consideration of its contents. On balance, the Senate has made a very careful study of this legislation and has brought forward a series of recommendations which we hope will be considered in depth.

At this time I would point out two dangers to parliamentary government which, in my opinion, are demonstrated by the debate on Bill C-259.

Time allocation is part of our every day life. Without it we could not get through our work. I am in favour of time allocation by agreement. As a matter of fact, I tried to provide for it in the rules of the other place for many years. No minority should be allowed to unduly obstruct the business of the properly elected government, yet the use of closure, or procedures akin to it, usually creates more trouble than it cures. Closure should be a measure of last resort.

When a tax bill is incomprehensible to a large number of members, and, when the different clauses are not fully debated, it seems to me that great care should be taken before it is adopted under pressure. New procedures may have to be developed to avoid this sort of situation in the future.

The second warning I wish to give is that at the present time there is more than enough uncertainty and unrest in the economic world, and the business world, and among the people generally. To some extent this uncertainty has been caused by trying to do too much too quickly. Many persons claim the uncertainty is created by the Competition Bill, the proposed labour amendments, the many activities and apparent trends of the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department, and the confusion in regulatory matters in the communications, energy, and transport fields. And now there is this tax reform bill. Perhaps this results from our increasingly complex society which is reflected in increasingly complex legislation.

• (2250)

What is our record? The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has for more than two years carefully considered the tax reform measures. The committee, with the consent of this house, has created historic precedent by providing a public forum for any citizen, company, or interested party to present his case, during the time the bill was being considered in Committee of the Whole in the other place. The Senate has, in effect, issued four reports: one on the White Paper, and two preliminary reports and one final report following its recent hearings into the draft bill. There are four detailed reports in all.

The Minister of Finance has recognized the usefulness of the Senate committee work, suggestions, and proposed amendments. He appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Monday of this week, and in effect gave a commitment to review and bring in amendments at the earliest possible date.

I believe the Senate has carried out its duty fully, and in a commendable way. I believe the practical way to operate now is for the Senate to pass this bill, thereby reducing some of the uncertainty that exists at this time, and then at the first opportunity in the new year to examine in detail the amendments that the Minister of Finance has promised to bring in. To use his own words on December 10 as reported in Hansard of the other place, he said:

> As honourable members know the bulk of these provisions do not come into effect until 1976, and none of the important changes come into effect until 1973. Therefore, there is plenty of time to make changes if circumstances warrant.

Further on he said:

> The only way the imperfections in this legislation will come to light is through the actual experience of taxpayers and their advisers reading and using the new act in relation to particular transactions and situations.

Canadians generally want some of the present uncertainty resolved. For the Senate at this time to create a political, constitutional crisis by refusing to pass the bill would result in great confusion. In the present economic circumstances this would be both irresponsible and dangerous. Let us stop this uncertainty. When the amendments come forward in the first four months in 1972, after some practical experience in operating under this legislation, we will be in a much stronger position to bring our experience, power, and influence to bear in an endeavour to get a better tax law for Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will the honourable senator permit a question for purposes of clarification? Do I infer from his conclusion that sufficient study has been given to this bill in committee, and that we would serve no purpose in referring it back to the committee?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Referring it to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Or referring it again to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: My own personal opinion—and, of course, it has to be personal—is that the Senate, in rendering four reports to this house, in considering the various tax reforms, has had some influence on the Minister of Finance, because he has admitted making at least 50 changes. At this stage we will not advance the cause of proper tax reform by spending more time in committee.

I think the people of this country want something definite. Those who operate companies and those who have financial responsibilities want to know where they stand. We cannot go on waiting for this bill to be considered again before it is passed. It is important for the industrial security and advancement of this country to have something concrete, good or bad—and the whole bill is not necessarily bad. I have been told by people of authority that at least two-thirds of the previous Income Tax Act has been incorporated in the present bill. There are changes, of course, to bring the act up to date.

The uncertainty in the country is causing people to demand that we get on with this thing; that we work with it for three or four months, with the assurance of the minister, which he gave in committee, that he will very carefully consider the proposed amendments. If he does not, then we can go to town with the benefit of some experience.

Hon. Mr. Bélisle: Honourable senators, I now move that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We are all grateful to Senator Belisle. I know Senator Macnaughton had to make his speech tonight because of a pressing personal situation. I want Senator Bélisle to know that what he did is appreciated, and I take it that tomorrow he will be first on the list. There are a number of other honourable senators who wish to speak.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bélisle, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Small Loans Companies and Money-Lenders licensed under the Small Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1970.

Report on the administration of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 17 of the said Act, Chapter I-10, R.S.C., 1970.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH BILL IN THE SENATE—QUESTION

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Government Leader in the house, which I hope he will feel free to answer. It would be very helpful to all of us in our debate of Bill C-259 if we could be made aware at this time of the intention of the Government with respect to the procedure from here on.

If the bill is to be referred back to committee, it would seem to me desirable that our debate should be minimal at this stage in order to allow sufficient time for dealing with it in committee and with any amendments that may come back to the house. On the other hand, if it is not the intention of the Government majority in this house to permit the bill to go into committee or to permit any amendments to the bill in committee, this debate, in general terms, will be the only debate on the entire bill, because we would not be dealing with the bill clause by clause in committee or with proposed amendments to the bill.

It would be very helpful, as a guide to the form of our debate, if we could know whether it is the intention of the Government majority to refer the bill back to committee. If that is the intention, is it their position that no amendments will be made to the bill in committee?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I do not wish to enter into an argument with Senator Manning at this time. However, I noted that he kept referring to the bill being referred back to committee. On a point of order, the bill has not yet been referred to committee. We received it only last evening. It has never been referred to a committee of this house.

• (1110)

Hon. Mr. Manning: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I quite appreciate the fact that the final bill has not yet been referred to committee. However, as all honourable senators are well aware, we have had three months of discussion in committee with respect to the draft bill.

Technically speaking, my friend, Senator Phillips, is quite correct. I am asking the Leader of the Government whether it is intended that this bill be referred to committee. If that is not to be the case, then our debate is limited to the generalities of second reading.

The second part of my question to the Leader of the Government is this: If this bill is referred to committee, is there any possibility of the Government and the other place accepting amendments thereto?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am grateful to Senator Manning for his question. The question that he asks has been very much in my mind. As an individual senator I am anxious to know the course that will be followed, but whatever course is followed is one which, of course, the Government will accept.

I do not believe it is possible to arrive at a decision until we have heard more speeches in this debate, but referring the bill to committee should be the course followed. This house is master of its own destiny. It is up to all honourable senators to decide which course they wish to follow. The normal practice has been to send bills to our standing committees. If the house wishes to maintain that practice, that decision will be respected, but we will have to wait until we know what honourable senators propose. There certainly will be no objection on the part of the Government if this course is followed.

Hon. Mr. Manning: A supplementary, honourable senators. I do not want to precipitate a debate or argument on this question. I am quite sure my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, is aware of the intentions of that side of the house.

I am quite sure he did not introduce this bill without knowing what his supporters in this house would do in respect of any proposed amendments. I wish to know whether or not amendments to this bill are going to be entertained. He may not feel free to indicate that, but surely the Leader of the Government knows whether it is the intention of the Government majority to accept any amendments to this bill in light of the position of the Government and the other place.

If they are not going to accept amendments, then I suggest we should be made aware of that now so that our debate can be directed to greater detail of the bill than would otherwise be the case.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot add anything more to what I have already said.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Louder, please; this is important.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If I reply to the honourable senator's question I would then be accused, as I have already been, of exerting undue pressure. I am not going to indicate anything that in any way can be regarded by any honourable senator as a circumscribing act.

After reading some of our newspapers I feel that the real pressure being exerted on this chamber is from the outside.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I will preface it by commenting on his last remark with which I agree. There is pressure from outside this chamber.

My supplementary is this: Would the Leader of the Government not follow the normal practice this time of indicating whether, as sponsor of the bill, it is his intention on conclusion of second reading to move that the bill be referred to committee?

I will not ask the leader to answer the second part of Senator Manning's question, good question though it is. It is not normal for the sponsor of a bill to answer such a question, but I suggest to the leader that it is normal practice in this house for the sponsor of a bill to indicate, at the time he introduces a bill or in answer to a question such as Senator Manning's, whether it is his intention to move, as sponsor of the bill, that it be referred to committee, the decision, of course, to be left in the hands of the Senate. I suggest that at this time it is very likely that the Leader of the Government knows what his intention is, and that is all I would ask him to be positive about at this moment, because it will help the course of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Grosart is always disposed to be helpful, but the normal practice, if I may suggest, is to indicate after debate on second reading is over what it is proposed to do.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I say that is the normal practice, in my judgment. As the representative of the Government I will, of course, accede to any request of this house, and if it is indicated that this bill should go to the committee, that will be the view I will take.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Martin) referred to certain outside pressures. I presume he is referring to those that come from the other place and the East Block, as well as newspaper editorials.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I was not referring to the other place. That would be impertinent for a member of this house. I was not referring to what had been said in the other place. I do not think it is proper for us to refer to what goes on in the other place, and I think it is wrong for members of the other place to make references to our deliberations and our course of action. I was referring to the editorial I saw in the Gazette this morning. That paper has a right to publish what it wishes. The other day it had a story that pressure was being exerted on this house. I raised that on a question of privilege and stated that there was no foundation for that story. Their story was carried on the front page. Senator Molson called me last night from Montreal to tell me that he saw that our denial appeared on the last page of the Gazette. I am objecting to that kind of pressure.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Martin for second reading of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Rhéal Belisle: Honourable senators, Judge Learned Hand, one of the finest legal minds in the United States in the twentieth century, once said of an income tax act:

> In my own case the words of such an act as the Income Tax Act—merely dance before my eyes in a meaningless procession—cross-reference to cross-reference, exception upon exception, couched in abstract terms that offer no handle to seize hold of—leave in my mind only a confused sense of some vitally important, but successfully concealed, purport, which it is my duty to extract, but which is within my power, if at all, only after the most inordinate expenditure of time. I know that these monsters are the result of fabulous industry and ingenuity, plugging up this hole and casting out that net, against all possible evasion; yet at times I cannot help recalling a saying of William James about certain passages of Hegel: that they were no doubt written with a passion of rationality; but that one cannot help wondering whether to the reader they have any significance save that the words are strung together with syntactical correctness.

• (1120)

Although Judge Learned Hand uttered these words many years ago, they are perhaps an appropriate description of the tax reform legislation before us now. One cannot help but relate this feeling of frustration, so admirably expressed, with that which has confronted most tax specialists who have attempted to discover what the new legislation means.

At this late stage it is still not clear whether the public is being proposed to or propositioned—the difference between the two is largely a matter of style. Whether the bill lacks style or sets a new one remains to be seen, but, if anything is certain, it is that one of the most difficult tasks is not to interpret what the bill does say but rather what it does not.

The bill is a massive document which, to this day, no tax expert fully comprehends. It has already been amended four times. In addition, further amendments are necessary, as indicated by the Minister of Finance, especially to the section dealing with international income, generally referred to as the FAPI income.

The bill also requires many technical amendments. The minister stated that this will be done in the years to come. Therefore, the legislation in Bill C-259 is legislation which is incomplete.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has made three reports to this chamber in which many amendments are proposed. This committee spent approximately three months interviewing knowledgeable witnesses. But to this day, it remains doubtful if those senators who sat through these deliberations fully grasp all the ramifications of this bill. The Government demands of this chamber that the bill be passed in a few hours or in a few days at the most.

The Senate is to be required, according to the timetable established by the Government, to study and pass upon this Bill C-259 by December 31. Honourable senators will recall that this bill was read the first time in the House of Commons on June 30, 1971, and those senators who read it know that it then contained 707 pages. The size has increased. The edition we received yesterday evening contains 739 pages—and we are told that this must be passed by December 31.

It is manifestly impossible for the senators to give the bill the study it deserves in the few days that are left to them. The choice before the Senate, then, is either to hold the bill over, taking the time necessary for proper study, or to rubber stamp it. The latter course would be a denial of the obligation imposed on the Senate under our system of government. The Senate was established as a chamber to review, and to challenge as necessary, legislation emanating from the Commons. It was established as a check on the actions of an arbitrary majority.

The Government has three times resorted to closure in its efforts to ram this tax reform through the Commons against all the dictates of common sense and over the opposition of the provinces. The arbitrariness of the majority is the issue here. The Minister of Finance asked that we pass this bill and he promised to consider our recommendations with a view to incorporating them in future amending legislation. Well, I will just repeat what was said last night: A pat on the head is what we were given. This type of condescension is loathsome. Moreover, to see our Senator Hayden fall for it was extremely disappointing.

We must discuss the policy behind this bill and do so thoroughly. It is not enough to achieve equity in taxation, if it is brought about at the expense of reduced economic growth. We cannot afford to frustrate to any degree the initiative of industry or the initiative and ambition of our entrepreneurs who make increased economic growth possible. We must remain competitive in world markets so that our products may be exported. From the point of view of taxation and otherwise, this requires a cost level in Canada which will permit the establishment and maintenance of such a competitive position.

We must make sure that the Government is fully conversant with the fact that Canada's economic system is based upon competitive enterprise and that this awareness is mirrored in the legislation now under discussion.

Our free enterprise system, which affords maximum individual freedom, encourages the exercise of individual initiative. The broad dispersal of decision making and the most economic allocation of human and material resources must be preserved.

A market economy promotes dynamic economic growth and a steady rise in living standards. One of the major roles of government in such a system is to maintain an equitable and favourable climate for private action. Contrary to what is expressed in this bill, the role of the Government is most assuredly not to attempt to exercise ever increasing control over the economy. Nor is it the Government's role to enter into direct competition with the private sector. This is aberrant behaviour for a government and I intend to see us go through this bill and make sure that it is not the flesh covering a statist skeleton.

The operation in Canada of the competitive market economy, motivated by opportunities for profit and the dangers of loss, is responsible in large measure for the improvements in social and living standards which have been achieved over the years.

The competitive enterprise system develops maximum managerial capabilities, the technical knowledge, operating skills and competitive attitudes required for sound growth. The profit motive exercises a determining influence upon the use of resources, the level of savings and the volume of investment; it compels private enterprise to operate efficiently.

There is ample evidence of the fact that far too large a proportion of Canada's present and future business activity derives from federal spending rather than soundly-based growth in the private sector. This worries me and it should worry every senator.

We owe it to the free enterprise system that built this country to make sure that this tax reform legislation does no violence to the principle of free competitive enterprise. Government must be properly cast in the role of referee, the enforcer of contracts, the originator of ground rules devised to facilitate commercial transation and to ensure fair and honest dealing.

This country's first economic objective should be prosperity for everyone. This can be achieved only through the generation of the maximum amount of wealth. But the reading of this bill leaves me with the distinct impression that the emphasis this Government has placed on equity is unfortunately in direct conflict with the need for priority to be given to generating real wealth if Canadians are to have reasonable living standards.

In Canada, we have moved significantly to a government-oriented economy in the last decade, and this has substantially contributed to the inflationary crisis. Countries whose policies are investment-oriented are rapidly gaining in the world's economic race. Countries which have too long been consumer-oriented have undergone recurring monetary crises. The lesson to be learned from all this is plain enough—the private sector must be permitted to expand; the public sector forced to contract.

Certain sections of this bill are definitely in conflict with this principle and they must be remedied.

Technological development since the war has proven that economic expansion and rising living standards are achieved through sharply rising investment of capital. So Canada, to grow, must follow policies which will channel the greatest possible share of her national income to savings for investment and a reasonable amount to consumption to allow living standards to rise progressively.

I am far from convinced that this bill encourages savings for investment. I rather see it as discouraging savings for this purpose.

This bill also indicates an extensive shift of the tax burden on to the middle and upper bracket taxpayers. It is a known fact that this group accounts for virtually all our savings, and the combination of the outright tax increase with this shift of burden would have a most adverse effect upon total national savings.

Honourable senators, this bill is increasing Government burdens on Canadian business, and it is reducing the savings potential of Canadians. This can hardly be considered in keeping with our national objective of increasing investment and thus employment and incomes for Canadians.

The Robin Hood theory of taxation is quite manifest in this legislation, and we have no sympathy with it. Coercive redistribution of income with a perfunctory and hypocritical genuflection at the altar of so-called equity is totally unacceptable as a guideline principle. Only real economic growth can help the poor.

Government's attempt to hand out higher incomes without the assurance of real economic expansion as a base can only give rise to inflation, destruction of monetary unit values, unemployment—and I believe everyone agrees we have had enough of that—and disaster for the very people it is designed to assist.

I am pleased to note that the honourable Leader of the Government is listening with attention to me. I thank him for his attention because I am about to refute his thesis which he so eloquently presented to us last evening.

In the end, it is always the poor who suffer most from inflation and this is the future we are guaranteeing them if we pass this bill without amending in part its very soul. To help our less fortunate, to offer employment opportunities to our fast-growing work force, and to raise living standards for all Canadians, we must have economic and fiscal policies which favour savings and investment by Canadians.

Let me now take a closer look at this bill and see exactly what it does for the average citizen. To begin with, the 3 per cent surtax will not apply in 1972. There is nothing to get all fired up about there. The surtax was a tax on tax, not a tax on income, as such. Consequently, its effect on income retention by individuals ranged from nothing up to a maximum, for practical purposes, of about 1½ per cent. Very few Canadian taxpayers will receive an increase in their income of more than one-third of 1 per cent, or about $3 for every $1,000 earned.

The removal of this surtax will allow for about three weeks' inflation, at the present rate. In other words, if you do not receive an increase in income within three weeks of this bill's becoming law, you will be back to where you were before the surtax was removed.

Canada's rate of inflation is often as high as 6 per cent and is rarely lower than 3 per cent a year. Because of inflation, the Government receives what is called a "fiscal dividend." As incomes increase to meet cost inflation, taxpayers move into a higher tax bracket, without any increase in their real income. By so doing, they pay more tax on the same "real" income. Thus, the Government collects more tax every year, without having to raise tax rates and lose votes. The Government can appear, as is the case with this bill, to be lowering taxes when, in fact, due to inflation it is not.

The elasticity of Canada's income tax structure, a factor geared to the progressive tax, has increased, not decreased under the new tax legislation.

[Hon. Mr. Belisle.]

Elasticity means that as incomes rise, taxes rise at a faster rate. Under this tax reform bill, every 10 per cent increase in income is accompanied by an 18 per cent increase in tax.

By putting together new personal exemptions, new tax rates and new items of income, the minister's claim that all married taxpayers will pay less taxes in 1972 is simply an outright fabrication, patently untrue, crassly false.

Close analysis of this tax reform bill indicates that: taxes will rise for the vast majority; the middle income taxpayers will face an immensely increased tax burden; the new rates will lead to accelerated tax increases because rises in income will not keep up; the poor will still be taxed.

There is a general movement evident in this bill towards a larger proportion of wages and salaries going towards taxes, due to general salary increases.

In effect, what I am saying is that the Government is not being as munificent as it alleges; and that is why we need time to go over this bill with a microscope.

Individual taxpayers stand to lose more from the changes in the definition of "taxable income" to be found in this legislation, on the average, than they will gain from new tax deductions.

For example, a certain sum will have to be added to income if a company car is available for personal use. If the company owns the car, a reasonable charge would be 1 per cent per month of the cost of the car new.

There will be new deductions for child-care expenses which will be made available to parents, neither of whom is married. However, the child-care deduction will not be available for university students or for persons taking certain occupational training courses. This is because the bill has a provision saying that persons claiming the deduction must need child-care services because they are employed. Nor will the deduction be available to persons whose only income is from property. In my opinion, these are rather ludicrous inconsistencies.

Though we would be willing to pass immediately those parts of the bill calling for tax reductions and for removing from the rolls those below a certain income level, let it be known that we have not been taken in. There will be no federal tax windfall. This whole issue is as phony as a three-dollar bill. This is a cruel fraud being perpetrated on the Canadian public. These lowered taxes are no more significant than is the number of objective, open-minded Grits.

What is diabolical is that the proposed tax law is a fraud on the poor, the retired, the helpless, the unemployed, on those who must live on fixed incomes. It creates a semblance of concern, when the disgusting fact is that this Government has permitted the ensemble of economic conditions so to deteriorate that the tax benefit presently offered amounts to nothing less than callous hypocrisy. The Government is throwing these people a bone while it simultaneously grinds them into the dirt.

If this bill is passed without amendment aimed at correcting the situation, we will still be faced with the anomaly of people being forced to pay taxes out of incomes which are well below the generally accepted standards.

Sixty per cent of the income of poor people goes in the payment of taxes, direct and indirect; and this will not change as a result of this bill. The bill provides for an increase in personal income tax exemptions. These exemptions will not even give the poor the same benefits as they had in 1949. Inflation has consumed all the extra dollars they have been granted as tax exemptions in the intervening years.

This Government deserves our praise: it is sparing no effort; it is labouring indefatigably in the noble quest to keep up with 1949. Now, that is mediocrity in action.

Honourable senators, I will vote against this bill because I am very conscious that as senators we represent not only political parties, but also the provinces. Knowing that five provinces have made strong representations against this bill, and that they represent 75 per cent of the population of this country and three different political parties, I cannot overlook their bona fide request for a year's deferment of this bill.

My many years of service in the Ontario Legislature would have been in vain were I not to stand up for them.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, it is apparent that many members of the public, to whom we are of course responsible, and indeed some senators, particularly some of our new colleagues, are fearful that the Senate is neglecting its duty and has not, or will not, give Bill C-259 the consideration which such a very large and important piece of legislation deserves.

In my opinion, there are no grounds whatsoever for these fears. The facts are as follows: The considerations which should influence the Government's decisions as to the extent and nature of these tax reforms have been the subject of a royal commission, of two parliamentary committees and of general debate for a very long period of time.

It is therefore very unlikely that any new or fresh suggestions will emerge at this time, no matter how long our debate lasts. In any event, during the course of this debate there will be full opportunity for any honourable senator to advance any fresh and new suggestions.

In my opinion, the best way, indeed the only sensible way, to consider such a sophisticated piece of legislation is in committee. It is nonsense to attempt to make detailed amendments to the bill by debate.

In any event, there has been a good deal of general comment about the making of amendments, but, as far as I am aware, no one has as yet mentioned any particular amendment which is vital to the bill and which should be made before the bill is passed. I am not aware of one single amendment which must be made now in order that no possible injustice will result when the bill becomes law.

There are a large number of amendments, all of which have many pros and cons yet to be ironed out, but not one single vital amendment needed to ensure that no injustice will be caused to taxpayers.

The way to proceed is the way the Senate has already proceeded. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, under the chairmanship of one of the very best and most able tax authorities in Canada, has been studying the bill for over three months, aided by expert staff and by our very distinguished former colleague, the Honourable Lazarus Phillips, Q.C., a tax authority of equal rank with our chairman.

We have carefully examined the draft bill, heard many witnesses and the committee has made many valuable suggestions to the Minister of Finance, some of which have been accepted and the balance are receiving careful study. It is not therefore correct for editorial writers and commentators to state that the Senate is rubber-stamping the bill, or that the Senate is steam-rollering the bill through without due consideration. I repeat that it is not in accordance with the facts for these people to assert or write that the Senate has not given the bill due study.

The Senate chose its Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee as its instrument to discharge its duty of examining in detail the provisions of Bill C-259. May I point out that all senators, whether members of the committee or not, had always the right to attend the meetings and to make any observations which he or she desired to make. I have been a member of a number of Senate committees, and in my view no member of the Senate has any reason to have any feeling of guilt concerning the study and consideration given to Bill C-259 by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The study, consideration and work of this committee, is, of course, the study, consideration and work of the Senate itself.

It is not therefore true for our critics to write or to say that the Senate is rubber-stamping this bill or not giving it proper prolonged and serious consideration.

I for one firmly believe that the Senate has left no stone unturned in the discharge of its duty to the people of Canada, to Parliament as a whole, and to the Government of the day. Those who assert the contrary simply do not know the facts, and therefore speak or write irresponsibly. We are all aware that there are a number of important amendments still the subject matter of discussion between the minister and the committee. These amendments have not been rejected because they are unacceptable to the Government. The Government's reply is that time does not permit the other place to consider them if the bill is to become law by January 1. In the circumstances, I consider the Government's decision to be a reasonable one.

On balance, the arguments in favour of making the bill law by January 1 are, in my opinion, stronger than those in favour of further delay. If we make amendments now, the other place can make amendments to the amendments. The debate could continue almost indefinitely, and the other work of Parliament would come to a standstill. Secondly, the law relating to income tax is a continuous process. It is not a one-shot deal, and there will be time next year and the year after to improve this act.

To sum up, honourable senators, I think the Senate, as far as circumstances allow, has done a good job on this bill, and while I do not want to be provocative, I must point out that the short time allowed us is not all the fault of the Government, and that more harm than good will result if we delay the passage of the bill.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like, first, to direct a question to the Government Leader.

As I mentioned in my speech the other evening, there is no reference in the bill to trade unions as such, or to the classification of trade unions. The absence of that cries out for an amendment. However, being a reasonable man, I am prepared to accept an undertaking from the Minister of Finance that in a future amendment or by regulation there will be specific reference to trade unions as a classification. Can the Government Leader give me any assurance that such an undertaking will be made? Is it possible for the leader to obtain such an undertaking, that consideration will be given to this matter?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly consideration will be given, but I cannot comment further.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You pronounced one word too many.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The most serious consideration.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: I would like to be assured that some consideration will be given, either in the legislation or in the regulations.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think there already has been some discussion on this. In fact, I feel sure that there was even an amendment made in the other place. However, I wish to check on this point and will do so during the luncheon recess.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Bring in an amendment.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: I propose now to review the bill from my status as an Independent senator. As an Independent, I am perhaps in a difficult position, yet this could prove helpful. If I were sitting on either side of the chamber, representing the Government party or the Opposition party, I would have some difficulty in giving a balanced view of the legislation.

First of all, I would have to add the weight of my own political bias. I would then have to add the weight of my support for my political leader, and the support of my party's position.

• (1200)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You mean if you were a Liberal you would do that.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: If I were a Liberal or a Conservative. But having done that, I am afraid I would have already tipped the scale, and consequently I would be somewhat off balance before I even considered the merits of the bill. However, not having that handicap, I am forced to deal with this bill purely on its merits.

The first question I have to ask myself is whether this is a perfect bill. We have heard reference that it is an imperfect bill. I have not been dealing with bills for very long, but in my short experience here and in my long experience in the labour movement, I have yet to see a perfect bill. I wonder if, in our political system of government and opposition, we will ever find a perfect bill. I think not. Therefore, I am forced to deal with the merits of the one before us.

I am touched by the concern for the people who are considered to be in the poverty class. On the one hand, I cannot encourage and support a poverty bill, and then turn around and oppose a bill which deals directly with the problem and provides some relief for it. Money can buy many things, but the one thing money cannot buy is poverty. It is comforting to know that there is a concern and some relief for the poverty class in this bill.

The next question I have to ask myself concerns capital gains tax. Is a capital gains tax good or bad? I know that in the years that I have been in the labour movement a capital gains tax has been advocated, and has been one of the top priorities of labour. Again, this is contained in this bill. I do not know how we can spend years advocating a capital gains tax and then come here and vote against it, when it appears that something is finally being done in that direction. I do not do it on the basis that it has been the view of the labour movement that there should be a capital gains tax, but simply on the basis that fairness demands that such a tax should exist.

Senator Belisle expressed the concern that there would have to be an increase within three weeks after passage of this bill because inflationary conditions will put us right back where we started. If that is so—and I accept Senator Belisle's word that it is—you may be assured of the support of trade unions in obtaining this increase within three weeks, or sooner if possible.

I do not want to give the impression of being anti-business. I think I am one of the few people in the labour movement who endorses unequivocally the free enterprise system. I am not a socialist, nor am I a capitalist, although somewhere along the way I would like to be one.

I am concerned for industry. Senator Beaubien, a few weeks ago, talked about the lack of expressed concern by labour for industry as it is affected by the proposed tax laws. I want to assure the honourable senator that I am concerned for industry. Over the years in British Columbia I have seen impoverished areas become viable economic communities. There were farming and ranching areas in British Columbia where quite a few people were unemployed and a great many on welfare. Mines such as Craigmont and Bethlehem were established in these areas, and now, instead of depressed areas with high unemployment and many on welfare, we find progressive, alive communities with a minimum of unemployment and very few people on welfare. These small communities have become self-sustaining economic units.

If there is anything contained in this bill which diminishes or takes away from the continuing establishment of that type of community, then it would be the worst kind of economic lunacy that I could imagine. There must be incentives to encourage more and more self-sustaining communities, such as those I have mentioned. I would be most angry if I found that type of incentive lacking in, or in any way impaired or discouraged by, this bill, and I would be prepared to support any of those who want to make amendments that would give incentive and encouragement to the establishment of the type of industry around which such communities grow.

We have heard from time to time of western separatism. The concern in western Canada is largely economic. The term "western separatism" is not a term I endorse, but I do acknowledge it because I feel it does exist. When the Government provided $80 million to manufacturers to offset the 10 per cent surcharge imposed by the United States, the feeling in the west was that at least $78 million of that went to Ontario and Quebec. In my judgment, that should not be considered a resentment of the success of those two provinces. We simply have to acknowledge that most manufacturing does exist in Ontario and Quebec. My point is that this legislation, or any future legislation, should be such that it would encourage more manufacturing and secondary industries in the other provinces.

In my home province, British Columbia, we are certainly faced with a very real problem of unemployment. This is perhaps the priority problem in the country, and any steps that can be taken in that regard must be taken. One of my main concerns is that, if there is an untimely delay in the passage of this tax legislation, it will cause more unemployment. Will the doubts in the mind of industry cause it to hesitate in making investments that would produce more jobs? The only conclusion I can reach is that this would be the effect. I feel the uncertainty must end, and that can only be accomplished by a minimum of delay in passing this bill.

I have been affected by people like Senator O'Leary, who has such fervour and passion for the institution of Parliament and this chamber. We owe a great debt to people like Senator O'Leary who have this feeling for this institution, and I would be quite prepared, in most circumstances, to stand shoulder to shoulder with Senator O'Leary and others in order to preserve this chamber and its autonomy. However, what troubles me now is, if we engage in this type of conflict with those who want to abolish this chamber, who would be the casualties? If I could be sure that those of us in this chamber and those who would weaken or destroy us would be the only casualties, I would not hesitate to engage in such a battle.

I am fearful that the casualties will be the 800 thousand presently at the poverty level who will be helped by this legislation. I am fearful the casualties will be the 4.7 million Canadians who will receive a tax reduction from this bill. I am fearful that the casualties will be business and industry which will hesitate to make investments and create additional jobs because of the uncertainty involved, and flowing from this my people in the trade unions will suffer as a result of the lack of jobs that are not created. I am concerned for those who would be the real casualties as a result of this type of conflict.

I am, of course, concerned about the question of this chamber's autonomy. This is something that must be preserved, but, as someone once said, "Autonomy is like virginity; nothing very significant happens until after it is lost."

If we find, when the Minister of Finance brings forward his amendments in the spring, that the concerns expressed by the Senate committee on the priority questions referred to by Senator Grosart are not in some form contained therein, then I shall be prepared to stand with any of those in this chamber who want to propose amendments and send the bill back to the other place for correction of these inequities. My only question is whether this is the time to do it.

I am in a difficult position. I cannot be pre-committed by party policy or party philosophy. I am forced to deal only with the merits of the legislation. I have to rely on the presentation of the Leader of the Government in respect of this legislation. I am not so naïve as to not recognize that it is his duty and responsibility to plead the case of the Government which, I must confess, he did eloquently and very well. In outlining the Government's position Senator Martin used an unfair tactic, one for which there was no defence, the tactic of fact, reason and logic. The facts Senator Martin put before me, which I have no reason to doubt, are that a substantial number of the proposals of the Senate committee are embodied in this bill. I am left with the fact that three-quarters of a million on low incomes, about whom I am concerned, will be removed from the tax rolls. I am left with the fact that 4.7 million are going to benefit by paying less tax as a result of this legislation. In spite of the confusion and ambiguities that exist, there are benefits for the Canadian community.

I have often been concerned with the reaction of industry generally, and sometimes with the lack of human concern. I have talked with many representatives of industry, and have asked them, "Were you to have a call from your broker tomorrow morning that one of your investments was going to depreciate by $25,000 or $50,000, where would you be?" The unanimous answer has been, "In my broker's office." I have often said, "If you have a long-service employee who has served you faithfully and well, in whom you have an investment of $25,000 or $50,000, and he is being fired for whatever reason, where are you? We never see you at that time." The usual answer is, "We have more important matters to attend to."

If they are not at least concerned from a human point of view, I often question why they would not be concerned from a cold, investment point of view. I think it is the human concerns that will determine the outcome of this legislation. The concern over inflation is valid. Labour's responsibility is one it will have to face and assume; and I am satisfied it will, provided the essence of fairness applies, and applies equally to all segments of society.

Having examined the whole bill briefly, hardly what one might call a thorough examination, with the evidence and facts presented to me I can only decide on the merits of the case by asking myself the simple question: Does the good in the bill outweigh the bad? The conclusion I have reached is that it does, and for that reason I will support the bill.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, the main thrust of this debate so far—perhaps with the exception of portions of Senator Belisle's speech—of both attack and defence, has been two-fold: first of all, the question of the complexities, the intricacies, the imperfections, what we might perhaps call the technical imperfections of the bill; secondly, and related to that, the question of how far the Senate committee's recommendations have been accepted or are likely to be accepted by the Government.

All that is, I think, of immense importance. For myself, I am inclined to think that any bill dealing with this extremely difficult and complex subject is bound to be rather complex. Any bill dealing with this subject is, by the same token, bound to be imperfect. Even if you could get agreement on the principles involved, there would still be room for wide differences of opinion about whether the drafting of the bill has adequately served the purposes, which in the hypothetical circumstances, and very unlikely circumstances, everyone would agree on.

As for the question of how far the Senate committee's recommendations have been accepted, or are likely to be accepted, this is in part a matter of fact and in part a matter of judgment. It seems to me quite clear that some of the Senate committee's proposals at various stages of the discussion of this question have certainly been accepted. How many I am not prepared to say; there appears to be some difference of opinion among the experts on that. However, it seems clear to me from what has been said, and not denied, that a substantial number of proposals emanating from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have in fact been incorporated in the bill that is now before us. It also seems clear that a substantial number of recommendations have not been incorporated. There the question of judgment enters in, and we have to ask ourselves how far the assurances and commitments, qualified assurances and qualified commitments, in some instances very heavily qualified assurances, given by the Minister of Finance last Monday to the committee, can be taken as firm or binding, or satisfactory to those who feel strongly about the recommendations that have been made by that committee.

Here I find myself on a knife-edge. I agree that in many instances the minister is not in a position to give an absolutely firm commitment, even if he had all the desire in the world to do so, simply because of the highly technical nature of some of the proposals. On the other hand, I am inclined to agree with honourable senators in the Conservative Party that perhaps some of these assurances are not quite as satisfactory as might be desired. However, while that question is highly important, it seems to me that it is not by any means the most important, or, at all events, the only important question before us in this debate on second reading. These questions, to which much of this debate has so far been devoted, and quite properly devoted, will have to be dealt with more concretely if, as, and when the bill goes before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as I think it almost certainly will.

There are also, however, as the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn), Senator Choquette and Senator Belisle have said, matters of principle involved in this bill, matters of principle to which they have referred, and even, perhaps, matters of principle that they have not mentioned, or may not even have considered. In my judgment this house has the right to deal not only with the technical problems, which are highly important, and on which already the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has spent a great deal of time, with admirable results, we all agree; this house has the right to deal not only with the details and with the technical matters, but also with the principles involved in this bill, because, as Senator Choquette has pointed out, there are really a great many different measures dealing with different facets of this subject embodied in this single bill. On a multifaceted bill like this I think we can legitimately say that discussion of the principles of the bill is in order at this stage.

Broadly speaking, those matters of principle cannot be dealt with in the committee, although they can be to a certain extent. I agree that when the reference was made to the committee in September last, in terms the reference was wide open; the terms of the reference would have permitted the committee to go into matters of principle. But the committee did not, and I think properly did not, because, as I understand it, that is not the essential function of a committee, whether a standing, select or special committee, or Committee of the Whole. In French the term for going into committee, if I remember correctly, is "passer aux articles," at least in the French Parliament in Paris. I think that puts it very neatly. Having dealt with the principle, you then go on to look at the detail and see whether the principle is in fact carried into effect properly and adequately by the details of the measure. In my judgment, we have the right to discuss the principle or principles involved in this bill, here, and this is the time and this is the place, this is the stage of the bill at which we ought to do so.

• (1220)

I propose to say something on that head. What I have to say may not altogether please either the Government or the Opposition. Perhaps it is not the first time that that has been so, and it may not be the last; but I am willing to risk that and make my small contribution to this debate by raising matters of principle which I think deserve the consideration of this chamber. That is how I conceive my responsibility and that is how I propose to discharge it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And rightly so.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I thank the Leader of the Government. This is balm to my wounded spirit after the remarks made about my incompetence which proceeded from another quarter the other day—my technical incompetence, shall I say.

Hon. Mr. Martin: These were regrettably uttered.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They were made so that you will not forget it.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: The first point of principle that I want to deal with is the statement by the Government Leader that this is a good bill. My comment on that is, "so it is, in many ways." I am not prepared to say "in all ways". It would be an extraordinary bill indeed which was a good bill in every way; that would be a perfect bill and in this imperfect world we cannot expect that. The proof that it is a good bill in many ways and in important ways, is that even the ranks of Tuscany could scarce forbear to cheer last evening when Senator Choquette said—and I may venture to quote precisely what he said—that there would be no difficulty in passing promptly certain parts of this bill. Speaking on the desirability of splitting it, he said there would be no political or other difficulties. He went on to say, in pursuing this course, that everyone in the official Opposition would support it. He said:

> We all agree, I think, on the measures relating to personal income. Passage of those provisions could be completed with singular alacrity.

That seems to me to be an indication, even from one of the spokesmen of the official Opposition, that there are parts of this bill which are certainly good. I was a little surprised when Senator Belisle said that even these parts of the bill, or some details of them, at all events, were really a fraud upon the public. I was surprised to find that he was suggesting that something one of his own party thought could be passed with "singular alacrity" because we were all agreed on it, might also be considered a fraud on the people who were supposed to benefit. However, I leave that aside. I could not resist making this somewhat jocular debating point, but it is not of course important. The only thing really important is that everyone admits that there are certain parts of the bill which are good.

I would be inclined to say that in some ways the bill is not good enough. In some ways it may go too far in a direction which I do not like, and in some ways it may not go far enough in a direction which I do like. I shall have a little more to say about that under separate heads in a moment or so.

The second point which I wish to discuss, which arises easily and obviously out of the first, is the suggestion of the official Opposition that the bill might be split and that we might pass it as a whole. If I understood Senator Choquette correctly, and I refreshed my memory by looking this morning at Hansard, he said that we might pass it as a whole, but with a proviso or amendment bringing into force the sections which Senator Choquette thought were at least tolerable—the personal income sections, the reduction of personal income tax and that sort of thing—and providing that the rest of the bill should come into force only upon proclamation, apparently at a somewhat distant date.

Senator Choquette said that the only real difficulty about that, in his judgment, was that the capital gains tax would have to be dropped, that this was the only real obstacle to the course which the official Opposition had been suggesting. I wish to say very strongly that, if that is the price of splitting the bill, I am not prepared to pay it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I agree with Senator Lawson on this point. Like him, I may be influenced by my trade union association. He is still a trade union official. I was one for 27 years. One does not slough off easily, perhaps, one's déformation professionnelle in things like this. But I am still convinced, quite apart from that—as Senator Lawson said that he was—that this is a proper kind of tax, that it provides for equity between people who earn their income or derive it from dividends or interest on investments and that kind of thing, and people who make their living, shall we say, keep body and soul together perhaps rather amply, by capital gains. That principle of taxing capital gains on the same basis as ordinary income seems to me to be a sound one, and I can only regret that in fact the bill does not seem to me to go quite far enough on this. It seems to represent a certain retreat from the position on this subject which I think was set forth in the Carter Report. But half a loaf is better than no bread; I am in favour of the degree of capital gains taxation which is proposed in this bill and I shall be sorry to see it go. I should like to see it pushed further.

I agree also with what Mr. Kierans said in the other place the other day, that the danger of cutting down investment by any such tax is an illusion, because the people who make these capital gains have a choice only of investing them in some way or another, or eating them. That is approximately what it amounts to. They are not likely simply to live off their capital gains and not put them into use in some way or another, at least for the most part, to forward production, to increase the gross national product, the amount of goods and services available to the people of the country.

If that is the price of splitting the bill in this way, which Senator Choquette suggested, I am not in favour of paying it. I think it is too high. I hope that, once we have this principle of taxation of capital gains embedded in the act, it may be pushed further to what seems to me to be its logical and equitable conclusion.

Honourable senators, the third point I wish to discuss is the one which Senator Choquette made about the provinces and the difficulties which they face in adapting their taxation systems to this legislation. I think that what Senator Choquette said on this subject will bear rather careful examination. As reported at page 1654 of Senate Hansard of yesterday, he said:

> I would suggest that we pass the bill in its entirety during this session. Those sections dealing with changes in personal rates and exemptions, the deductibility of interest by corporations on money borrowed to buy shares,—

That is an important point, by the way, to which I shall return later—

> —simplification of the tax structure and a new system of dividend tax credit could be proclaimed for immediate implementation.

I am extremely interested to note one or two of the things that have got in there for "immediate implementation". Senator Choquette continued:

> Proclamation of the very complex sections. I would like to see postponed for one year to allow for adequate study, assimilation, planning and possible redrafting.

• (1230)

Further on, Senator Choquette says that a year's delay in implementing some of the more abstruse sections would allow for "complete redrafting" of the bill. Well, I confess that that rather baffles me. What exactly is Senator Choquette getting at here? What should we be letting ourselves in for? Senator Choquette seems to suggest that the provinces would need at least a year, but a year to do what? A year to digest this bill and then adapt their systems to it, with all its imperfections and complexities, real or alleged? Or a year in which to try to get a revised bill, a possible redrafting? Twice Senator Choquette used that expression—a possible redrafting. So there would be a revised bill on which, then, they would presumably still want some time in which to work out the assimilation of the provisions of this bill into their own taxation systems. It seems to me that if we adopted this principle on the ground suggested by Senator Choquette, we might be letting ourselves in for an infinite regression, because I find it very difficult to believe that, even after the year that would have been spent in this possible redrafting, you would get anything but a very complex, difficult, intricate bill. The provinces might then very well say, "Well, look, this is really beyond our capacity to deal with in any short period. We must have a further delay of at least some months before we can decide how we can work this in with our own system of taxation."

I do not know how long a delay this would lead to. I think we might end up with a situation where the more complex parts of the bill would not be proclaimed for a very long time indeed. We would still be left in this position of extreme uncertainty about a very large part of the whole scheme of taxation.

It is possible, of course, to over-estimate and over-state the dangers of uncertainty. It is possible to go so far in the other direction that you can say that we must get this thing through in 24 hours, otherwise people will be in a frightful state of mental chaos and they will not know in the least how to plan their affairs. I am not suggesting that we should be hurried or pushed over this thing. I am not suggesting that we should not give it adequate consideration. But, if you are going to split the bill and postpone for a year the proclamation of a large part of its most intricate provisions in order to allow the provinces to study it and digest it and decide how many they will link in or assimilate with their own systems of taxation, it seems to me that you may be in for a very, very long period of very grave uncertainty for a very large number of corporate taxpayers, at least.

I find it difficult, therefore, to accept the position which Senator Choquette has sketched on that subject.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask you a question? Are you afraid that the Government is going to accept that proposition of mine? Is that why you are trying to convince them not to? You can go on indefinitely like that, you know, making a speech of that type. You can take somebody's speech and just destroy it. I do not know what it is going to give you, however.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not propose to go on indefinitely. Nothing is further from my desire.

They used to say that Burke was the dinner bell of the House of Commons. Looking at the clock now, I am inclined to say that I am the dinner bell or the luncheon bell of the Senate. But there are a few other things that I want to say. As a matter of fact, I have finished with what I want to say on that particular point. I am sorry if Senator Choquette took amiss what I was saying. Essentially, what I was trying to say was that he had made an important and substantial point which I had thought needed consideration, very careful consideration, in fact. Whether there is any danger, as he puts it, or any hope of the Government accepting his proposal is quite another matter. Frankly, I do not think there is. But I think that a serious argument, a substantial argument on principle, put forward by a leading member of the Official Opposition deserves proper consideration. If I had thought this was a merely frivolous proposal on the part of Senator Choquette, I can assure you that I would not have spent five minutes—I should not have spent 30 seconds—talking about it. But I think it is a serious proposal. It is a proposal which has been put forward in the other place by the Official Opposition and I think it deserves consideration here also.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And, equally, your own observations deserve the careful and respectful attention of all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is right.

[Hon. Mr. Forsey.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who do you suggest is not paying any attention?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt Senator Forsey, but I am always intrigued by his manipulations and his ability to move from one situation to another. I find it rather difficult to accept the fact that Senator Forsey, with his record, is now saying that a corporate taxpayer would be in an awkward situation. Has he gone to the right now from his usual left position?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Well, honourable senators, I am interested to find that I am still regarded in some quarters as being usually in a left position. I am afraid that on the whole I am getting rather tired of these distinctions between left and right. I am more and more concerned, as I get older, in trying to see that what results from public discussions on public questions is sensible. If somebody says that this is right and that is left, or this is middle or centre or what-not, it does not really bother me very much.

However, to turn to the specific point which Senator Phillips has raised, it seems to me that whether you are a socialist, a communist, an NDP-er, a Social Crediter, a Liberal, a Conservative or an Independent, if you are discussing economic questions of vital import to this country, so long as we have a mixed economy in which private corporations play a substantial part, then what happens to those private corporations is of concern to whoever is discussing the matter, regardless of what his views may be.

Surely, anybody of any opinion whatever is bound to say that the situation of private corporations under this bill is of importance, and it is of importance not merely to the private corporations but also to their employees and to their customers and to the public at large.

I think it is perfectly legitimate for anybody from any point of view and any part of this chamber to say that, if a particular course of action would put private corporations in a difficult position, an uncertain position, a hazardous position, unnecessarily, then this is a factor which ought to be taken into consideration.

I am not expressing any particular tenderness for the private corporations. I am simply saying that it will be bad for the country as a whole, if they are placed in a position of uncertainty unnecessarily for longer than is really required by the public interest. That is all.

If anybody thinks that indicates I have now become a sort of old-fashioned, 18th century, hard-shelled Tory—there would not be many others to keep me company—if anybody thinks that, he is quite welcome to draw that conclusion, if he wants to. I have no apology to make for this reference which I made to the position of the corporate taxpayers.

The next part of my remarks might be a little more palatable to the Official Opposition, although I fear not very much more because it may only increase Senator Phillips' distrust of what he calls my usual left position and may confirm the suspicions of other members of the Official Opposition that I am still an irreclaimable old CCF-er. But I want now to turn very briefly to what seems to me a fundamental criticism of this whole measure which was put very concisely and forcibly by Mr. Kierans in the other place the day before yesterday. I cannot quote from the Debates in the other place, but I hope I may be permitted to summarize some of the points which Mr. Kierans made which seemed to me to be very important indeed.

First of all, if I understood his argument correctly, and I think I did, he feels and believes that this measure would perpetuate an unduly favourable taxation position for the resource industries, and therefore an unduly unfavourable position for the manufacturing industries which are taxed at a much higher rate than the resource industries, although it is the manufacturing industries rather than the resource industries which provide the bulk of our employment, and that this a very serious matter indeed in our present situation—it would be in any situation, but especially in the one we are in now, with a high degree of unemployment.

Secondly, Mr. Kierans called attention to the preference shown in tax policies—a preference that is not touched by this legislation, or not adequately touched at all events—a preference shown in recent years in our tax legislation for corporations as opposed to people. In 1961-62 for example, 35 per cent of the revenues of the Dominion of Canada came from the taxation of people; and Mr. Kierans was quoting this from a return tabled in the other place by the President of the Treasury Board dealing with the first four months of this year. In the first four months of this year that percentage had risen to 41.4 per cent, whereas the share of taxation for corporations had dropped from 23½ per cent to 19½ per cent. I do not think this bill is going to reverse that trend or redress the inequities involved in it.

Mr. Kierans also drew attention to the fact that the capital gains tax was far less sweeping than appeared to be required by equity. I have already dealt with this, and I shall not say more about it.

Then he commented unfavourably on the provisions allowing corporations to deduct from their income the interest on borrowed money used for take-overs of other corporations. Now the intention of this, as he recognized and, of course, as I recognize, is to give to Canadian corporations a chance to get in on the ground floor in fair competition with American corporations who are proposing to take over industries. With this I heartily sympathize, but the difficulty about it is that the provision as drafted appears to apply to all Canadian corporations, even those which are foreign owned or foreign controlled. The result is that Imperial Oil, for example, would be able to get this very favourable treatment for a proposed take-over of some purely Canadian corporation which might then fall under foreign control whereas now it is under Canadian control. This, it seems to me, is a defect in the proposals in the bill.

Then, honourable senators, there was the further point that we really ought in a thoroughgoing system of tax reform provide for a higher rate of tax on outside corporations than on domestic corporations. The suggestion that Mr. Kierans made was that the rate of tax on British or foreign corporations—or perhaps I should say Commonwealth or foreign corporations—should be at the same rate as those corporations pay in the jurisdictions where their head office is; so that if you had corporate tax in the United States at 52 per cent, the corporate tax here on American-controlled corporations should also be 52 per cent, and if you had in the United Kingdom a tax rate of 40 per cent, then the tax rate on British corporations in Canada should be 40 per cent. It was suggested that we should, in an effort to increase our own control over our own economy, frankly discriminate, and on this considered, planned basis, against outside corporations in favour of Canadian corporations. I agree with that criticism, and I think it is a pity that the bill has not taken some account of it.

The last thing I want to mention from the case that Mr. Kierans made is a quotation—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Will the honourable senator permit a question on the last point he made? This was a problem before the committee when we were considering the reference of September 14—that is, the whole broad question of the need for foreign capital for development in this country. Is not that a matter that should receive consideration at the same time as the problem of Canadian control?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Well, yes, I think it should, but I am inclined to think that on the whole there has been a good deal of exaggeration lately about the need for foreign capital. I do not think this need is anything like as great as it was. I think there has been a considerable amount of discussion of this which has left upon my mind, at all events, the impression that nowadays we are in a position to supply a vastly larger proportion of our requirements of capital from our own resources than we were formerly, and that in fact some of the American-controlled corporations are financing their expansion very largely out of resources available to them in Canada without using their foreign capital at all. This is an enormous question which I am not prepared to go into at the moment, although I agree it should be given consideration. But I think this other aspect of it deserves consideration too, and I am sorry that this, as it seems to me, rather mild and reasonable way of promoting Canadian ownership of our economy has not been adopted in the bill before us. There may be all kinds of difficulties about it; I dare say there are all kinds of difficulties about a number of these things. I am merely mentioning certain defects in this bill, as I consider them, which are fairly fundamental and which I regret seem not to have received the consideration I hoped they would.

I am going to quote from Professor Dale of the University of Toronto for which I am indebted to Mr. Kierans in his speech of the other day. He said:

> —on its own, Canadian industry cannot provide an adequate response to the challenge of foreign competition. Strong and efficient competition is required in the area of taxation and beyond it as well. The alternative is a drift down the road toward a Venezuelan type economy—a large modern resource extraction industry that provides very little employment, a large unproductive government bureaucracy—

And I am not entirely subscribing to that, > —an inefficient weak manufacturing sector, increased imports of manufactured products, and rising government expenditures to provide for the unemployed.

I am inclined to think that a real defect in this bill is that it does not arrest a tendency which has been evident for some little time in that particular direction.

Honourable senators, I hope that before this debate is concluded some representative of the Government will give us some reply—possibly Senator Connolly would do it; he was ready to raise that one point and I hope he will deal with this—to the kind of criticism which Mr. Kierans made in his speech in the other place the other day, and which I think he has made on various occasions and with which I find myself in considerable sympathy. Perhaps there is a satisfactory answer to all these criticisms, and perhaps there is not. Perhaps there is a partially satisfactory answer. Perhaps some of the criticisms are warranted and some are not warranted. I should like to hear some discussion of this from some responsible spokesman for the Government before this debate concludes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Forsey if he is not of the opinion that some of the views expressed by Mr. Kierans may run counter to some of the considerations and recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

• (1250)

Hon. Mr. Forsey: It is perfectly possible, but I must say that I am not prepared to accept the infallibility of Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have the greatest respect for that committee and for the magnificent work it has done. I do not in any way wish to detract from what has been said on that score. I thoroughly agree with what has been said. However, I do not feel that because the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has reported, "Rome has spoken." I forget the exact Latin quotation, and even if I remembered it I do not think I would dare try to say it , especially in the presence of a classical scholar such as the Leader of the Government, as well as other distinguished classicists in this house.

My final question is, what can we do about this? What can the Senate do, and what can and should individual senators do? These positions are not quite the same. Despite what Senator Lawson has said regarding his privileged position as an Independent, and the fact that he does not have to consider the position of a particular party or the Government, I should like to assure him there are at least some members on the Liberal benches who, I hope and believe, are anxious to give this bill just as careful and independent consideration as he is. I suppose that as members of the Liberal Party we cannot totally disengage ourselves from the position of the Government if we believe this Government is better than any alternative government. It is not possible for us to say that because we do not agree with what has happened, or because we do not like a particular measure, we will vote against it and do our best to put the Government out and put in its place a government we regard as less satisfactory. I suppose we cannot avoid certain feelings of that sort.

However, in a matter as important as this, I am inclined to think very seriously about my own attitude on the subject, even though I am a supporter of the Government.

What can the Senate do about this matter? Well, of course, technically we can throw the whole thing out. We have the power to do this, and this power has been exercised many times in the course of the Senate's history. That power has been exercised within relatively recent years on very important matters. Frankly, I do not feel we can exercise that power on this bill. I think it would be unrealistic to suppose that we can do that. I think that the most perfervid opponents of this bill, even if they dislike it from stem to stern, from clause 1 to the very end, and every comma and semicolon, as well as the numbers of the subclauses, I do not believe that anyone in this house feels it is practical to speak in terms of possibly rejecting this bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Then why are you mentioning it?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am sorry if I am moving slowly. I must ask honourable senators to be patient for a little while longer.

What about fundamental amendments? Once again we have the power to make any amendments we like. However, I think we must admit that any fundamental amendments to this bill dealing with the basic principles of the bill are not practical at the present time, and this is just not going to happen. I do not believe that the most perfervid opponents of the bill are prepared to put in any such amendment with the expectation that it will be passed, or indeed are anxious to see it passed, in all the circumstances.

This leaves us with the question of technical amendments, detailed amendments which are covered, or partially covered, by the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. We are in a rather difficult position in this respect. Not only have we the right to pass any amendments we see fit, but I venture to say there may be amendments which, in the judgment of those better qualified than myself, are important enough for the Senate to insist upon. Some honourable senators may feel that the assurances given by the Minister of Finance, when he appeared before this committee, are not adequate. You may feel that something further needs to be done before this bill goes to committee, that perhaps some amendments should be inserted and that the Senate should insist on these amendments. I am not prepared to exclude that possibility, even though it may cause a certain inconvenience to those in the other place or to the Government. Once again, I feel it depends on the importance of those amendments and how strongly we feel about them. It may be that after due consideration there will be general agreement and the committee will not report any amendments to the Senate as a whole. But I do not want to take this for granted beforehand. I should hope that when the bill is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce they will examine very carefully the question of detailed and technical amendments, and that they will have the courage to say that certain amendments are absolutely necessary and report them to the Senate. And if we are convinced that these amendments are necessary, I hope we shall not be deterred from inserting them and, in due course, sending the bill back to the other place, simply because it might cause a certain amount of rumpus and brouhaha and derogatory accusations thrown in our direction.

I feel the position of an individual senator is as Senator Lawson has indicated. I have to make up my mind regarding the merits or defects of the bill and determine which are more important. If I feel the defects outweigh the merits, I should register my vote against the bill, as a protest against these defects. This is in effect what Mr. Kierans did in the other place a few days ago. I do not wish to imply any criticism of what Mr. Kierans did by voting against third reading in the other place. If I should decide to register my vote against the bill when I am pretty certain it will pass with only a certain number of technical amendments—and I can imagine the peals of derisive laughter of honourable senators to my right—should I allow myself the safe luxury of registering my protest vote against the bill? Frankly, I find it very difficult to make up my mind on this matter. I am inclined to lean in the direction in which Senator Lawson has leaned. I am inclined rather to agree with him. I must add, however, and this is a lamentable confession to have to make to honourable senators, that I am not yet entirely convinced what my course will be. Something will depend on what further points are brought forward in the debate on second reading. Something will depend, when we come to third reading, on what has happened in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, if the bill goes to it.

• (1300)

I think, on the whole, I shall probably vote for the bill. I leave open to myself still, however, the option of registering my dissatisfaction with certain defects, as they seem to me, in the bill as presented to us.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise, honourable senators, to ask the honourable senator a question arising out of his last remarks, that he has not yet made up his mind how he would vote. My question is: Will he come to lunch with me?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am afraid that this might be regarded as undue influence, pressure, subornation or something of the sort. I am grateful for the kind thought, but I think we should postpone it to a moment when it would not appear so much to threaten my independence.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Forsey if he is free for dinner?

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. Speaking in the house on Thursday I used these words:

> My good friend, Senator Carl Goldenberg, said at the outset of his speech that he did not wish to go beyond a certain date—

That is in consideration of this bill. Sometimes at the age of 82 one's hearing betrays him. I find in reading the speech that he did not use such words and, in fact, said the exact opposite. I rise now to offer him my apology.

I have no talent for meekness, but neither have I a talent for misrepresenting any of my opponents. I offer to him and to the house my apology.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I just wish to say that I would never suspect my old friend, Senator O'Leary, of being guilty of misrepresentations. I appreciate his courtesy.

The Senate adjourned to the call of the bell at 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, at a federal-provincial fiscal conference a number of years ago I recall an occasion, when proposals by the Government of Canada were under debate. Tempers were getting a little frayed, and a considerable degree of dissatisfaction was being expressed by various speakers. One provincial premier rose and prefaced his remarks by saying "I intend to speak with restraint under circumstances that do not invite restraint." I have often thought of those words over the years and have found them useful. I propose to keep them in mind today.

At the present time, we can only assume, I hope rightly so, that the Government majority in this house will agree to this important bill being referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Certainly, that is the normal procedure for any bill of this type.

We do not, of course, have any assurance that the Government majority on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will permit amendments to be adopted during the committee stage. While we are in the dark on this point, it is difficult to know whether we can contribute most by curtailing debate on the bill at this time, in order that it may move more quickly into the committee stage, or, if no amendments are to be accepted in committee, whether we can make our most useful contribution by a more detailed assessment of the legislation at this stage.

There is a matter regarding possible amendments to the bill which I had hoped might have been discussed by Senator Forsey in his address before the luncheon recess. I, as well as many other honourable senators, have a great respect for Senator Forsey's knowledge of constitutional and tax law. Perhaps the Leader of the Government may care to comment on this matter when he closes the debate.

It is my understanding that legislation requesting amendments to a money bill cannot be initiated in this house. If the bill is passed, our only opportunity for further presenting our views with regard to amendments will be when a bill comes to this house from the other place proposing certain amendments to the taxing act.

The point on which I am not clear, and on which I would like enlightenment, is whether at such time our deliberations will have to be confined to debate on the amendments proposed by the other place, and to any amendments to those amendments which we may care to make, or whether we will have the latitude in this chamber to propose amendments entirely outside of those contained in any amending bill which may come to us from the other place.

It is obvious, honourable senators, that if we will be restricted to consideration of only what is submitted to us from the House of Commons, then many of the matters about which concern has been expressed, and which have been covered so admirably in the studies of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, will go by the board for the simple reason that we will have no opportunity in any constitutional way to raise those points at a later date.

When the honourable Leader of the Government in this house closes the debate, I would appreciate some enlightenment from him on this particular point.

I am sure honourable senators have no interest in prolonging this debate merely as a delaying tactic in respect of this legislation which has been under consideration for so long. My experience in the field of parliamentary work has convinced me that in debate there is a point up to which objective argument influences the judgment and the position of other people, but there is also a point beyond which further debate does not change anyone's mind, nor does it alter the final outcome, but rather tends to more rigidly entrench the positions which the honourable members have already reached.

As far as this tax legislation is concerned, if we have not already passed that point we are certainly very close to it, and I doubt very much if any significant change in the Government's position, perhaps even in the position already taken by honourable members of this house, is going to result by virtue of further argument advanced at this stage.

I have sought to examine this legislation in the light of the background that gave rise to its birth. It was my privilege to attend every federal-provincial fiscal conference held in this country between the years 1943 and 1968. I well recall discussions at those conferences in which views were expressed regarding the unsatisfactory condition of the tax structure in Canada.

As the national Government moved more and more into the field of social welfare programs and various other cost-sharing programs the provincial governments found themselves faced with rapidly rising costs in order to meet their share of the cost of these programs. This eventually gave rise to concern and a great deal of debate as to what restructuring should take place in the Canadian tax system to enable the provinces and also their municipalities to meet these increased costs. In many cases they simply could not be met out of the sources of revenue available to the provinces, nor from the revenues received under federal-provincial tax agreements that were in effect at the time.

The trend to mass urbanization some ten years ago, which has rapidly accelerated ever since, has placed most of the municipal governments in this country in a serious financial position and they naturally have brought pressure to bear on their provincial governments for greater sources of revenue, which in turn the provincial governments could only satisfy if there were fundamental changes in the Canadian tax structure to put them in a position to meet such demands.

Another topic in these discussions was the inequities which, over the years, had become apparent in the tax structure. It would be fair to say that when the setting up of a royal commission was proposed to make a thorough investigation of the whole tax structure the major goals it was intended to attain were to help resolve the serious federal-provincial fiscal problems, to establish greater equity within the tax system itself, and to clarify and, as far as possible, to simplify what was even at that time regarded as a very complicated tax structure.

[Hon. Mr. Manning.]

• (1440)

Honourable senators, looking back at those objectives and reading the bill that has finally emerged I cannot help but feel a very deep sense of disappointment. The provincial governments of this country are certainly not happy with what this tax legislation does or rather does not do towards resolving the serious federal-provincial fiscal problems that have become increasingly serious over the years. As has been mentioned by other senators, the fact that a significant number of provincial governments have formally asked for deferment of the legislation does not indicate any great enthusiasm on their part to see this legislation adopted.

I can find little in this legislation that will be of any significant help to the municipal governments of Canada. I am puzzled why some of the recommendations made by municipal organizations and others apparently have not been considered. I recall one recommendation that was made by several organizations that seemed to me to have a lot of logic. The proposal was that the federal Government permit the income from interest on municipal bonds up to an amount of $1,000 a year to be deductible for income tax purposes. This would not have cost the Government of Canada a great deal of revenue, but it would have induced a great many Canadian citizens to buy municipal debentures.

At the prevailing rate of roughly 9 per cent, it would mean a citizen could qualify for such exemption on up to $10,000 or $11,000 of municipal bonds, which would generate roughly $1,000 of interest. This certainly would be a significant inducement to buy such debentures. If even 200,000 people across Canada, under such an inducement, bought even half of the allowable amount that would be tax free, it would create a demand for $1 billion worth of municipal bonds, which surely would go a considerable distance towards easing the problems that many of our municipalities face in getting the funds they require to carry on their responsibilities. But these proposals have for some reason been completely passed over, and they do not appear in the legislation before us.

In the matter of greater equity under the old tax system, I will not take time to discuss this point. I think at best it is very debatable. To be fair, I believe the bill has removed some injustices and inequities. I am fearful that in the process it has created other inequities as great and as serious as those we have corrected.

On the matter of clarification and simplification, if we thought we had a complicated tax system before, we did not have anything compared to what we are going to be faced with in the days ahead under this new bill.

I do not want my remarks to be mere negative criticism. I agree that there is much in this bill that deserves commendation. As I indicated in the house the other day, looking back over the experience of the past few years, I am convinced that the interests of the Canadian people would have better been served if, when it saw the difficulty that was arising in trying to get unanimity in a matter of this kind, the Government of Canada had spelled out an order of priorities. It should have acknowledged that resolving this problem was going to cause more dislocation than was initially anticipated and that the better approach would be to spell out an order of priorities and resolve the issues one by one, until ultimately we would have all of them under control.

I suggest that the first priority should have been given to two things. One is in the bill, that is, a measure of relief to the low-income group of citizens. I have not heard anyone disagree with that, other than the argument that it does not go far enough—and a case could be made for that point of view. Surely the need for tax relief to low-income people, in the light of the rising cost of living, is something with which no one can quarrel in any way. My submission is that that relief should not have been delayed even this long, by reason of its having been tied to all these other complicated tax measures which have resulted in the long delay which has already occurred.

The other matter I would like to have seen associated with relief to the low-income group is raised by the question often asked by the Government: If we are to reduce taxes on one group of people, how are we to make up the revenue that is lost?

I had the responsibility in the provincial field of serving ten years as provincial treasurer, and I have some appreciation of how a finance minister or treasurer feels when somebody suggests wiping out a part of his revenue. How is it to be made up? In this case, the assumption seems to have been that the only way to make up lost revenue is to shift the incidence of taxation to some other taxpayers. Certainly that is a valid conclusion, but I submit it is not the only way the Government can recoup its revenue position.

Hand in hand with tax relief for low-income Canadians, there should have been a concerted effort to see what could be done within the tax structure to stimulate greater economic and commercial growth. If this could be accomplished, Government revenue could be significantly increased without any change in the rate of taxation. If we are collecting from the industrial and commercial sector of the economy, say, $20 million in taxes in one way or another, and if we are able, by providing incentives, to stimulate an overall increase of such industrial and commercial enterprise of only 5 per cent, that would increase tax revenue by another $1 million, without any change in the rate of taxation. As I say, I would have liked to see combined tax relief to low-income citizens and tax provisions carefully thought out which would stimulate economic and industrial growth. Surely, that would be one effective way of combating inflation, because the higher our productivity the better standard of living people can have without forcing up the price of goods. At the same time, as I have indicated, such growth could bring into the public treasury additional revenue that might well be sufficient to off-set that required to give the tax relief for the low-income citizens of this country.

If those matters had been given top priority and legislation prepared to deal with them, such legislation would have gone through the other place and this place without any difficulty whatsoever. Both Houses of Parliament would then have been free to give their undivided attention to a series of other issues in the tax field that certainly do require attention, many of which this bill attempts to deal with.

The matter of capital gains could well have been dealt with as a second priority. I indicated in this chamber the other day that I think, personally, a capital gains tax is not in Canada's best interest, at least from the standpoint of enhancing the standard of living of the people, nevertheless I accept the argument of my honourable friends, Senator Lawson and Senator Forsey and many others, who maintain that in modern society we can no longer in fairness exempt entirely from taxation income coming from capital gains. But, as I indicated the other day, in my opinion the formula embodied in this bill is far from the best formula that could have been devised. I would like to think that, had this matter been dealt with as a specific issue independent of other pressures and considerations, the Government would have come up with a better and far less complicated formula.

The matter of the treatment of resource industries is another issue that deserved individual attention. I come from a province whose economy has been very closely linked for many years with the development of resource industries. That is generally true in the west. I am sure my honourable friend Senator Lawson would agree that it is true in British Columbia. It is certainly true in Alberta. I completely disagree with the philosophy that was advanced in the other place by Mr. Kierans when he argued that resource industries have been getting too preferential treatment and that we should be far more concerned about tax relief for secondary industries which are the large employers of people.

The fallacy of that argument is twofold. In the first place, if we are going to have a strong nation we need a tax structure that contributes to the development of every area. You cannot leave out of the tax structure provisions necessary to the development of primary resources in those regions of Canada in which such resource development is the backbone of their economy, any more than you can ignore the impact of the tax system on the industrial complexes in provinces like Ontario and Quebec which have the great bulk of manufacturing industries in Canada. In the second place, there is an inseparable relationship between resource industries and secondary industries. It is utterly absurd to suggest that you can have a sound, healthy secondary industry complex in Canada if you do not foster the resource industries which produce the raw products which in turn lead to secondary industries. I am disturbed by the provisions of the new legislation with respect to resource industries because these are provisions under which the final decision is left to regulations and to judgments by federal tax officials.

It was my privilege before I became a member of this house to appear in a minor consulting role, with others, before both the Commons committee and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in their examination of the White Paper that preceded this bill. I well recall, in the preparation of material for those submissions, we examined one area—it was only a casual examination—to ascertain to what degree industrial capital expenditures had been deferred in this country by reason of uncertainty created by the White Paper proposals. And in merely a casual survey across Canada we tabulated over $1 billion of proposed capital expenditures which were being held in abeyance, in whole or in part, because of uncertainty as to what the tax laws were going to be. The same situation prevails in our resource industries. In yesterday's edition of the Ottawa Journal honourable senators probably noted this news item: "New extraction plant for oil sands planned". It is a CP despatch out of Edmonton, and it goes on to say:

> A second oil extraction plant worth $500 million and employing 9,000 could be operating in the Athabasca oil sands as the result of a decision Thursday by the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board.

The article, and I will not take time to read it all, goes on to say:

> Between 3,000 and 4,000 workers would be employed during the construction phase, expected to begin in 1973, and 9,000 jobs would be created when the plant became fully operational in 1976.

Honourable senators, at a time when we are worried about unemployment in Canada and the millions of dollars of public revenue being paid out in various kinds of incentive programs, some of them very debatable, to generate employment, here is a case where private industry is asking for no expenditure of public money and is prepared to go ahead with a project that would create, during the construction phase, employment for between 3,000 and 4,000 workers and permament employment for 9,000 people when the plant is complete. This is why I was concerned to see the article end with this statement made by one of the senior officials of the company.

> However, the final decision will depend on how the federal Government intends to implement the mining section of the recently announced tax bill.

I am acquainted with this project and the uncertainty created by the White Paper which held this project in abeyance for a period of at least two years. Now, having proceeded to the place where they have the approval of the Energy Resources Conservation Board of Alberta, their officials still must say that before a final decision is made they need to know the disposition that will be made under the tax legislation.

Bill C-259, clause 124(4)(b) reads:

> "taxable production profits from mineral resources earned in the year in a province" means the amount determined under rules prescribed for the purpose by regulations made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance.

I will not labour this further. There may be valid reasons for drafting the legislation this way. My point is that this kind of legislation inevitably creates uncertainties. It may well be that the minister will make recommendations and spell out the regulations clearly. But in the meantime, this project, along with a good many other projects in this country, will continue to sit on the shelf because the legislation does not state precisely what the tax situation will be.

I will not take your time to dwell on estate taxes. This is another issue that should have been dealt with separately. This is important because it has a great impact on the provincial governments. Under the existing tax agreement between the provinces and Ottawa, 75 per cent of the money collected under federal estate taxes is rebated to the provinces. This represents a substantial amount of revenue. The provinces will have to do something to offset that loss. We should not be under any illusion that under this bill the federal Government is backing out of the estate tax field. All it is doing is transferring this into the capital gains tax field, and it will get its cut in any event. The provinces will now have to impose their own succession duties to offset the federal Government's removal of this source of revenue under the tax agreement.

In the case of the Province of Alberta, a number of years ago we decided to rebate to estates the 75 per cent paid to the province by the federal Government under the tax agreement. During the years this program has been in effect, it has attracted additional capital investment to Alberta that more than offsets the $6 million to $7 million annual revenue which we gave up by paying the 75 per cent back to the estates concerned. Under the new bill all this is washed up. There will be no 75 per cent of the estate tax paid to the province, so there is nothing to rebate to estates. Here again is a case where a province, trying to stimulate its own development by encouraging investment capital to its area, is thwarted by a change made by this legislation. There may be some arguments for it, but I doubt if the serious implications to the provinces were taken into account.

In the matter of clarity and simplification, in my view this bill in this regard is a total failure. The confusion and uncertainty that this bill will create arises from three aspects: one, many ambiguous clauses; two, many undefined terms in this bill; and, three, because so much is left to regulation and departmental rulings.

I am appalled to think of the extent of bookkeeping this bill will impose on Canadian taxpayers. My concern, which I am sure is shared by many other senators, is primarily for the individual taxpayer and the small businessman. Large corporations have tax departments and high-priced lawyers who do nothing else but figure out their tax problems. They can afford chartered accountants and tax experts to do this work. But what about the little businessman? He reads this bill and, unless he is very different from what I think he is, will throw up his hands in hopeless despair at ever being able to handle his own bookkeeping and file his tax returns. The same for that matter will be true of most individual citizens. They are not in a financial position to hire chartered accountants and tax experts to do this work for them.

Surely, if one of the objectives of this legislation is to create a better tax system, the Government should recognize the practical, administrative problems which this bill will put on the shoulders of the individual taxpayer. This is of particular concern to those I have mentioned who are not in a financial position to hire tax experts to act on their behalf.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Does he suggest that the small businessmen and individuals for whom he expresses concern currently read the existing tax law and understand it without assistance?

Hon. Mr. Manning: No, under the existing tax law there is a great deal of confusion on the part of individual taxpayers and small businessmen. I think it is infinitesimal, however, compared to the situation to be anticipated after passage of this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Honourable senators, I have picked out only a few illustrative concerns that I find in going through this legislation. These, to me at least, indicate that the interests of the Canadian people would have been better served if the Government had spelled out an order of priority and resolved these issues one by one.

Surely, however, we are not so naïve in this chamber as to believe that these problems, which have not been resolved in four or five years of commission and committee studies, will be resolved here this week, next week, or next year. They will not be resolved by this house or by a committee of this house. If they are to be resolved at all, it will only be over an extended period of time. Only time will tell whether the Government and the other place prove equal to the task which is still before them in this regard.

• (1510)

May I add, in closing, one further expression of concern. It is related to the debate, but it is not part of the tax issue itself.

A great many Canadian citizens, and I confess to be one of them, are deeply concerned by the deterioration of the parliamentary process in this country, which has been brought to light by the protracted debate on this tax legislation.

I am an avid believer in the democratic process and in our democratic form of government. The parliamentary process can work only if there is the degree of dedication to its requirements and the degree of self-discipline necessary to make the system work. If we reach the place where discipline has to be arbitrarily imposed, such action becomes self-defeating.

What does the parliamentary process pre-suppose? It pre-supposes that in the conduct of public business the Government submits a proposal to Parliament, perhaps in the form of a bill. The merits, or lack of merit of that proposal, are then open to free debate by all members. The intention of such debate is to have a full presentation of sound and logical argument both for and against what is proposed, and to have alternatives presented to what is proposed. That must be followed by a third stage, where a judgment is rendered. That judgment should be made once all of the pertinent argument has been advanced, and when it is made the decision of the majority must be accepted if our parliamentary system is to be preserved.

Honourable senators, what disturbs me is that there seems to be a tendency to reject both those propositions. So often it is no longer a case of reasoned, logical argument for and against a proposal which, when all the pertinent facts have been adduced, moves on to a judgment. Instead parliamentary debate becomes a matter of repetition and more repetition, and tactics and manoeuvres to obstruct and delay. This is what makes a mockery of the parliamentary process.

When a decision of the majority has been rendered, there is today an attitude in society, and reflected in our legislatures and Parliament by an unwillingness to accept the decision of the majority whenever they disagree with it. Whenever society takes a certain position on a controversial matter it is immediately branded as the establishment, and those who disagree frequently resort to measures, sometimes even violent measures, in order to challenge it. This is not the way to preserve a free society.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: We cannot preserve a democratic parliamentary system, of which citizens can be proud, unless the factors I have mentioned are respected.

I have confidence that this house by its conduct will not in any way contribute to the deteriorating process going on in parliamentary Government today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Please.

Hon. Mr. Manning: My own position in respect to the bill is that I agree that some of its provisions are good. However, having knowledge of the thousands of hours of work by governments, provincial as well as federal, and by organizations from one end of Canada to the other, that went into process leading to this bill, and the millions of dollars of expense which those lengthy studies entailed, I am forced to the conclusion that the Canadian people are not getting the quality of product which they are entitled to expect from the Government of this country.

For that reason, I feel I have responsibility to register my protest against the failure of the Government to produce a more acceptable bill than that which we have before us now. For that reason, I propose to oppose the bill on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Speak for yourself.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, in participating in the debate I should first like to congratulate those who have preceded me. If I may translate my comments into hockey parlance, Senator Martin last night gave an effective exhibition of stick handling. He made a number of very direct rushes and thrusts, and took evasive action at times with consummate skill. Senator Choquette's speech was perhaps the best he has made during the time that I have been in the Senate, and I congratulate him. Senator Langlois added a bit of piquancy and spice to the discussion, and was both provocative and challenging.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Indeed.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Senator Macnaughton, as he usually does, tried to pour oil on troubled waters, and this morning Senator Belisle opened the debate with a very proper presentation. He was followed by our friend and constitutional expert, Senator Forsey, who, in turn, was followed by Senator Lawson who gave a well-reasoned presentation. We have now heard the usual thoughtful presentation which we have come to expect from our colleague, Senator Manning.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: My only feeling is that with all this competition I may be at a disadvantage. In all the discussion that has taken place on the bill, both pro and con, I have been concerned about the treatment given the subject by the press. The press has sought to give the impression that the Senate has paid no attention to the bill and that it will ram the legislation through the Senate without adequate thought or care. That is a manifestly unfair assessment. It is not fair to the press, because, in fact, it reflects on the judgment of the press to take any such position. The press has gone further in trying to provoke a confrontation between the Senate and the House of Commons. I consider that unfair, but I shall say more on this subject later.

In participating in the debate, I am conscious of the fact that in the last few months we have talked a great deal about senators being responsible for giving more regional representation. I believe we should look upon ourselves as representatives of our regions as well as of all Canada.

• (1520)

As a consequence, I took the opportunity to call the Premier of Alberta, Premier Lougheed, a long-time personal friend of mine. I asked him what his government's position was, and whether it was a fact that he was anxious that the implementation of this bill be deferred for one year. His reply was, "Yes."

I have been concerned too that five provincial premiers, all young and able and all of different political stripe, have taken the same position. Premier Davis of Ontario, Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick, Premier Schreyer of Manitoba, Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, and Premier Lougheed of Alberta, all take the same position, regardless of their political stripe and regardless of their feelings about the pros and cons of the bill. They all want to see it delayed for another year so that they will have more time to integrate their programs with the provisions of this bill. As a representative of one of the regions of Canada, I feel we must not overlook that.

Honourable senators, Bill C-259, the so-called Tax Reform Bill, is, as I understand it, the most massive bill that has ever come before the Parliament of Canada. This massive, detailed, complicated compendium of 739 pages consisting of 332 clauses to which, up until December 4, something in excess of 133 amendments had been moved—and there have been a number since—is a bill of major importance to every citizen of Canada, and one whose complexity and implications have had few equals in the history of this country.

Tax reform has been under discussion for many years, but, specifically, since the Diefenbaker Government set up the Carter Commission in 1962. Since the Carter Commission we have had the White Paper, which has been under discussion for two years; and then in June, 1971, the Government brought in the draft bill.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce carried out a thorough analysis of the White Paper, and, in the main, were critical of many of its sections. To the credit of the Government, it can be said that they accepted many of the modifications recommended by our committee. In addition, our committee presented three major reports, the last one being tabled in the Senate on Monday, December 13. In view of all these things, I feel it can be said, without fear of contradiction, that our committee carried out the most detailed and thorough study of this bill that has been done in Parliament.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

The committee brought before it something in excess of 60 expert witnesses from whom it heard evidence, and it analyzed the bill in tremendous detail, after which the committee proposed a number of amendments to the Minister of Finance.

At an appearance before our committee on Monday afternoon, December 13, which I unfortunately had to miss, I understand that the Minister of Finance gave an undertaking to the effect that some of the amendments or modifications proposed by our committee would be incorporated in an amending bill to be brought before Parliament in the next session.

What I want to emphasize at this stage is that, contrary to the impression that has been left by many newspapers, the Senate committee, and other members of the Senate who, while not being members of that committee, were able to sit in on its hearings, have given the most considered and thorough study of this bill that any group in or outside of Parliament has been able to do. However, there are many members of the Senate who, because of involvement with other committees or because of their involvement in various other responsibilities, were not able to give time to the detailed study which this complicated bill required. For this reason, I feel it is important that the full Senate not only have the opportunity to discuss this bill to its fullest extent, but it should also have an opportunity to send the bill to committee, to call witnesses, and to go into necessary detail. For this reason, I hope the bill will go to committee, and I hope that the members of the Senate—as distinct from the members of the committee who have already studied the bill in greater depth that we could hope to do in the week or ten days before December 31—will take the time to discuss the bill in as much detail as they feel is necessary.

As has been said in the discussions on this bill, it is one of the most far-reaching and important bills to come before Parliament in many, many years. If the Senate is to be worthy of its name and of its responsibilities it must, under no circumstances, be put in the position of becoming an almost automatic rubber stamp for the other place. In this respect I would like to pay tribute to Senator Martin, because I feel he went out of his way to emphasize that the Senate is master of its own house. Of course, we were all aware of that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What do you mean by "out of his way"?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Senator Martin urged honourable senators to take as much time as they felt this study required.

I want to put on record that I am in favour of the general thrust of this bill. It contains many beneficial items, as well as many items about which there are obviously differences of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is a good bill?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: And at this stage no one can give an authoritative opinion as to how many of the provisions will work. This will only become apparent after enactment.

Among the good provisions in the bill, I would suggest, are the following:

Firstly, the removal of some 750,000 citizens from the income tax rolls.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not proven.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I am taking the only authority we have around here for making that statement.

Secondly, the increase in the exemptions, for income tax purposes, for both the single and married. These exemptions are not as large as we hoped they might be, but at least they indicate recognition of the fact that something must be done in this area.

Thirdly, the amendments to the proposed taxes on co-operatives and credit unions. This, I feel, is to the credit of the Government. However, let me say here: God help the Government if they do not put these amendments through.

Fourthly, the amendments to the bill as it affects small businesses. This is a step in the right direction.

Fifthly, the capital gains tax. There are many who are opposed to this tax, and I have never been able to understand why. Such opposition is understandable on the part of those who want to escape taxation entirely. In practice, in those countries where the capital gains tax has been in effect it has not been a large money earner, and I do not anticipate that it will be in Canada. I believe it is a fair tax, provided it is applied in a manner comparable to that adopted in other countries.

There are many negative factors in this bill. For example, the manner in which farmers are treated, particularly with respect to the basic herd, I feel is most unfair, unwarranted and unrealistic. Here again, however, I suspect that practice may have the effect of modifying this provision.

Another matter which is going to cause a great deal of difficulty is the valuation of assets on V-day. It is simply going to be a physical impossibility for thousands and thousands of people to get a reasonably accurate and authoritative evaluation of items which they possess in their total inventory of possessions.

The Minister of Finance and the members of the Government have made a great plea about the confusion that would exist if this bill was not passed by January 1, 1972. There seems to be a great feeling of solicitousness for the big corporations in Canada, and I can assure members of the Senate that this is not going unheeded in the country. There is a rapidly growing feeling that the Government is being a little too solicitous for some of the big corporations who are well able to afford tax and legal experts to take advantage of any possible loophole in the tax bill.

Let me say here that I am the first to admit that it is vitally important to the welfare of this country that we create a climate of taxation structure which is favourable to the encouragement of industry in this country. I simply reflect the opinion that has manifested itself to me. People ask the question: Why is the Government being so solicitous for the big corporations and not for the middle income group, which has been referred to earlier?

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not this Government.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have been informed that one prominent lawyer has said he has already found 149 loopholes in the tax bill that he can apply on behalf of his clients. As I said, there seems to be a great feeling of solicitousness for the big corporations, but I have heard very little from the Government or anyone else about the problems that will be created for the individual taxpayers, apart from those who are taken off the rolls, small or large, and for small businesses and farmers. Again I say that this oversight, if it is an oversight, will not go unnoticed by the people of the country.

The Government is making a great deal of play about the endless, repetitious talk that has gone on in the other place, and I agree this has been true to a point. Much of the talk there has been repetitious, a good deal of it irrelevant, and I think the Government was right in bringing in closure. But in fairness I want to say that in my judgment one of the reasons that the members of the Opposition in the other place took so long to discuss this bill, and felt so opposed to it, was its very complexity and lack of clarity.

I said earlier that there were 332 clauses, to which already more than 150 amendments have been proposed. I am sure there will be more before the bill reaches finality. In other words, the bill that will finally come out of the parliamentary mill, assuming the amendments that are being proposed will be accepted, will bear little relation in many of its major aspects to the bill we are being asked to pass today.

I was in the other place the day the house leader served notice that he was going to ask for closure. He indicated that the Government was prepared to bring in 78 amendments to the bill, that they were prepared to accept, if my memory serves me correctly, another 28 from the Opposition. This was on December 4. There have been further amendments since. The fact that the Government has indicated it is prepared to accept this large number of amendments, a number unheard of in the history of Parliament, indicates, in my judgment at least, that this is a bill of such magnitude, such complexity and such importance that it might have been wiser to have brought it in in a number of steps rather than at one time. However, the Government's decision has been to make this major move in one fell swoop, and that is the situation with which we have to deal.

However, as I indicated earlier, I think one of the reasons the Opposition have felt as they have with respect to the bill is its complexity and the fact that it is hard for a layman to deal with it intelligently. For example, section 248, Part XVII, on interpretation, is 16 pages in length. Clause 29, the special transitional rules, is 24 pages in length. There are literally dozens and dozens of sections that break down into clauses, subclauses, and subclauses of subclauses. It is one of the most difficult bills anyone could possibly be asked to deal with. This is, in part, one of the reasons the Opposition have felt constrained to attack the bill as they have.

In addition to the length and complexity of some sections, there are other sections in which one section contradicts another. This suggests that there was insufficient time, or insufficient staff in the Departments of Finance and National Revenue, to bring the bill to proper maturity. However, as I said earlier, I am in sympathy with the main thrust of this bill, and I think that in the increasingly difficult economic situation with which Canada is faced, tax reform is a necessity. We can only hope that this bill will be a step in the right direction. However, I believe we would be under the greatest of delusions if we did not recognize that this bill will bring about more trouble, more litigation and more confusion on the part of the ordinary taxpayer than anything that has happened in the history of Parliament.

I attended a tax seminar at Banff, at which 200 leading tax experts, accountants and lawyers, in Western Canada were present. After four days discussion they came to the conclusion that they could make neither head nor tail of it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: On November 14 and 15 I was in Vancouver at another tax session, at which 2,000 experts, lawyers and accountants, were present, and they came away with a feeling of utter confusion. I suggest to you that this is not good for the country.

I want to go back to the fact that the most thorough and detailed study that has been given to the bill has been given to it by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The people of Canada owe the committee a great debt of gratitude for what they have done. By their very competence they have demonstrated the importance of the Senate as an institution; they have demonstrated that the Senate is a body that is competent to deal with this kind of complex bill. It is unfair to say that the Senate has not given study to this bill, and I want again to emphasize that the Senate has given the most thorough study it has been given so far.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has come up with a number of recommendations for amendment, and I understand the Minister of Finance has indicated that he will do his best to see that these recommendations for amendment are incorporated in the budget. I would hope the Leader of the Government could get even more assurance than we have had so far from the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That will be the day.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Do not ask the impossible.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Unless you ask for the impossible you never get anywhere. When the Minister of Finance comes before the committee on Monday, or whenever it is, I hope he will be asked to commit himself as far as he possibly can to see that these amendments are incorporated in the amending bill when it comes in.

I do not propose to say much more on the bill itself at this time, but I do want to deal with the suggestion that the people are not interested, and that they were glad closure had been applied. I think a lot of them were; I think a lot of people could not care less what happens in Parliament until it hits them in the pocketbook, and there is no question that this bill will hit a lot of people in the pocketbook, in spite of the fact that over one million people will be beneficially affected by the bill.

I think it is true to say that the performance of Parliament on this bill is being watched, probably more carefully than has been the case for some considerable time, and the reaction on the part of the informed gatekeepers of public opinion in this country is exceedingly critical of the bill and the manner in which it is being handled by the Government.

By way of example I was going to quote some of the editorials that have been written, but I will not do so, although I have here the editorials that appeared in the Gazette, the Vancouver Sun, the Winnipeg Free Press, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Winnipeg Tribune, and so on. I will not take the time to quote them, because I am sure most senators have read them. These editorials, commentaries and feature stories are typical of a large number of newspapers in the country. While I know it is fashionable for some politicians to say that nobody pays any attention to editorials, columnists, feature writers and commentators, I recognize this is true up to a point, but there is no question in the world that when you find a great measure of unanimity against any particular measure, it is not without its effect. I think any government that ignored this would be doing so at its peril.

Lest anyone thinks I am being unduly critical of the Government, I personally think the Prime Minister has given more leadership and more initiative in giving new directions to Canadian foreign policy than any Prime Minister of Canada for a long time. One has only to think of the initiative he has taken over the new relationship to NATO, and I emphasize that he did not withdraw from NATO. As a western Canadian I am happier to have some of our armed forces up in the Arctic showing the flag and demonstrating our sovereignty there than sitting over in Europe doing nothing. There is also his initiative in recognizing the People's Republic of China, which was followed by their admission to the United Nations; then his visit to Russia, with the return visit of Mr. Kosygin, in spite of the controversy it evoked. There was also the visit of President Tito.

All of these things were initiated and at the present time they are critical to the Canadian economy and they would all react in favour of increased trade and better understanding as far as Canada is concerned. In saying that, if I may sound more critical than otherwise on some aspects of this bill, I try to keep my criticism in balance by gladly giving the Government credit where credit is due.

I come back now to the question of the bill itself. I said earlier that I felt this bill had not received the co-ordinated direction and study it should have received before coming to Parliament, and this places a responsibility directly on the Minister of Finance and his staff. I am increasingly concerned about the quality of legislation that comes over from the House of Commons—legislation put together by highly paid people in the Public Service. I am one of those who are increasingly concerned about the role of the Public Service today. I would be the first to admit that there are many dedicated, highly intelligent and highly qualified public servants serving the people of Canada and serving them well. But I am afraid we have been gradually building up a group in the Public Service who are becoming increasingly arrogant, who are exercising a role in the running of the country far out of keeping with their position. We are kidding ourselves if we think it is the people's elected representatives who are running this country—it is the public servants. I read an article in the press early last spring which was very critical of the government of Premier Robarts of Ontario, because out of 85 members of the Conservative Party in the legislature, he had some 54 members occupying positions on government boards, commissions, and other government bodies.

My first reaction was that this was patronage gone wild. However, a couple of weeks later, in response to the criticisms that were made, a member of the Ontario legislature put his finger on something which made a lot of sense to me. He said, "It could be argued that this is carrying patronage to an extreme, but in my judgment and in the judgment of the government, it is much better to have the people's elected representatives sitting on these boards than to have the boards made up of civil servants." He went on to say that some of the elected representatives who might sit on these boards might not be as competent as civil servants, but if they made mistakes, or if they demonstrated incompetence, the electors could at least deal with them at election time every four years, while you could not get at the civil servants.

Criticism has been made of the Prime Minister, about the large number of parliamentary assistants and other officials he has serving him in one capacity or another. Again, it is much better to have the people's elected representatives serving on commissions and boards than it is to have public servants, as far as it is possible to do so. I would go a step further and say we have reached the stage where we have given too much security to public servants and it might be desirable to see a change made in our regulations whereby about a hundred of the top positions in the service would be thrown open to change when a government changed. I think this would have a salutary effect all through the Public Service. We are at a stage today where public servants are not only drafting legislation, which they must do, but they are preparing the regulations by which statutes are implemented, and in effect they are becoming the czars of government administration.

One has only to think of the appalling misuse of power that the people in the national parks have had to put up with for years, by the interpretation of regulations by non-elected officials of the Government—and I use this as only one example among many others. I could go on at length but this is not the occasion to do it.

I want to make the point that this bill has been prepared, in the main, by public servants and it does not reflect any great credit on them, in spite of the fact that the general thrust of the bill is favourable. It may be that they did not have enough staff—I do not know—but we see the bill as a result.

I come now to something else that gives me great concern and that is the way the House of Commons, and the cabinet, is treating the Senate. I think it is fair to say that at no time in the last 16 years, since I have been here, has the Senate received the credit for the work it has been doing, to the extent it has in 1971. The Senate has been given credit for having made some major contributions to the discussions of and the solution of many of the pressing problems affecting Canadian life. One has only to think of the reports of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, on Finance, on Science Policy, and the work of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, and others.

The Senate has been playing the role for which it is intended, and doing it with credit to itself. It stands higher in the estimation of the public than it has done for many years. I have had the privilege as a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution to participate in public hearings from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, and from Milk River in Alberta to Inuvik in the Northwest Territories. There were certain Commons members on that committee who made no bones about the fact that they would like to see the Senate abolished, and the question came up in meeting after meeting, from one end of Canada to the other. It was an eye-opener to some of those Commons members that, while there were some people who would like to see the Senate abolished, the great majority—as I read the reaction when the question of Senate abolition or reform was raised—wanted the Senate preserved. They did want to see it reformed, and I concur with this view. However, it must give concern to every thinking Canadian, and to every member of the Senate, that the Government of Canada would, even through inadvertence or plain bad management, put the Senate in the position where it could not possibly give the kind of consideration this bill deserves.

I said a moment ago that one of the reasons for the great deal of discussion, confusion and argument in the House of Commons and throughout the country was that this bill is in a very unfinished state. There are sections that are so long as to be almost meaningless. There are other places in the bill where one section contradicts another and, while anyone recognizes that a tax bill is, of necessity, a rather complicated bill, with many amplifying clauses and subclauses, this one has certainly come to us in a very undigested and unco-ordinated state.

Some people have referred to me as an academic. Senator Connolly has done that more than once. I might qualify in that capacity, but I also qualify from the standpoint of being a businessman. If I may wear my academic hat for a moment, I would say that were any graduate student in economics or in political science to have turned in a piece of work to me that was in as unfinished and unclear a state as this bill is, I would fail him without question. I would have acted like Senator Forsey with his famous rubber stamp, so much so that I would have a cramp in my right arm from using the stamp whose imprint was: "See dictionary".

I think this is where we must put the blame. Either the public servants who have done most of the work in drafting this bill have not had time to put it in proper shape or to follow through the implications of a lot of the recommendations they were making and to compare one section with another and try and predict what the implications of the sections would mean when put in practice, or the cabinet in its mad rush to get this bill through has thrown discretion to the winds and is willing to take the risk of having complete chaos forced upon hundreds of thousands of taxpayers within the next year or two.

If this bill is passed in its present form, people who can ill afford it, small business people, private citizens, who cannot figure out what their tax position is, will have to go to high-priced legal or accounting talent to get some of the answers. Even then they might not get the answers because many of these accountants and tax lawyers will tell you that they do not know what the bill means. The implication is that the matter will be referred back to the public servants for an interpretation of the regulations, and there will be such an avalanche of these referrals that the whole thing will bog down from its own weight.

I feel that the Government has made a very serious mistake in trying to ram this bill through in its present incomplete state. The Minister of Finance has admitted under questioning that he does not know what the implications of some of the sections will be, and if he does not know then thousands of others do not know.

This bill is the kind of bill that, to do it justice, requires a lot of time. It requires detailed clause-by-clause and subclause-by-subclause study, and this cannot be done in a week or ten days. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has already done a magnificent job on this bill, having made over 50 amendments to it through the White Paper and its three additional reports, but even the committee admits that it has not covered the whole report. They have not analyzed the effects of many of the amendments, and yet we are asked to put this measure through. No member of the Senate is qualified to discuss this bill intelligently or adequately in the time at our disposal, and, if we accept that thesis, then it follows that we are going to pass what is, in effect, a premature bill. It will become law and we will then have an aftermath of litigation, confusion and costs which will be loaded onto the necks of the people.

I was here during the famous pipeline debate of 1956 and I went through that exciting but, nevertheless, sorry time. I recall vividly how some members of the cabinet, who were friends of mine, could not believe that the press and the media were reporting the facts when they reported that there was a rising tide of criticism and condemnation of that bill throughout the country. You could not tell those ministers anything at that time, and I sense this same situation developing today. While this is a much more complicated bill than the pipeline measure was, I sense particularly in the last ten days a rising tide of the same kind of feeling—a resentment of criticism, an unwillingness to listen and an intolerance of divergent opinions.

If you examine the press today; if you examine the editorials; if you examine the writing of knowledgeable columnists and radio commentators; if you make such examination you will find the large majority are critical of this bill. I know that the posture of some members of the cabinet, and many of the members of the Government, is to the effect that no one pays any attention to newspaper editorials or to columnists or to commentators. That may be true under certain circumstances, but once the situation arises when 90 per cent of these people are writing or speaking in a critical vein, then the storm warnings are up and the government of the day, regardless of what party it is, should ignore those storm warnings only at its peril.

I do not propose to go into any detail on the bill; that would be a complete waste of time. But this bill, and the manner of its presentation in the Senate, has raised another important issue, the role of the Senate itself.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

I said earlier that the Senate has been growing in prestige over the last few years. Much of that growth has occurred during the time of the leadership of the present leader, Senator Paul Martin.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have been one of those who have been very happy to see that changing status of the Senate; but I would be less than frank if I did not say that I would resent the Senate's being put in the position where it cannot deal effectively with a major piece of legislation—a position in which it is asked, almost under duress, to get this bill through by a certain date.

Personally, I take the stand that we must have all the time that is necessary to do the bill justice, and so I say that the Senate is being put in an impossible position and that this is being done by the cabinet and the House of Commons. Thus, it seems to me that they have raised an issue which must be faced: Does the Government really wish to have the Senate abolished? If it does, why does it not say so? There was a time when I might have gone along with that decision, and I hasten to say that if the Senate were abolished today or tomorrow or 50 years from now it would not make much difference to me personally. Like Senator O'Leary, I did not come to the Senate in order to obtain a guaranteed annual income. In fact, my income has been curtailed substantially since I have been in the Senate because I have given my time to the people of Canada. I have no regrets about that. I have enjoyed my work here and I have seen the increasingly important role the Senate has been playing and can play and the increasingly important role it could play in the future. But it certainly cannot play that role effectively if it is going to be put in this position time and time again. And bear in mind that this is not the first time that legislation has come over to the Senate with a deadline attached to it as if to say, "This must be passed by a certain date, or else." Certainly this has happened before, but never on a bill of such major importance. Money bills have quite often come over before adjournments at Christmas time, but, as I have said, never a bill of such major importance and never in circumstances such as these.

Consequently, I think the Government has raised an issue of major concern to the people of Canada. Does it want the Senate to remain a viable part of Parliament or does it want the Senate abolished? Let us come out in the open and ask this question. If it wants the Senate to continue, then we should serve notice now that the Senate will only continue on the terms that the Senate itself will lay down as to how the Senate will receive legislation and what time they will take to dispose of it. As a matter of fact, in many other countries, for example, Australia, they have their adjournments fixed. Nothing serious seems to happen as a result of that, and it is conceivable that we, too, could have fixed adjournments.

I do not want to prolong this debate, but I wish to say that I would like to see this bill go to committee. I want to be able to get information on a number of items from different sources, including the ministers and the various authorities. Just to mention some of the items I am interested in, there is the employees' profit-sharing plans, the effects of the rollover clauses with respect to the transmittal of farm property, the matter of the basic herd, the effects of the transaction taxes, the complications of the V-day valuations, the implications of the capital gains tax, and many others.

Yes, I want this bill to go to committee and I want the minister to appear before us in order that we may have more assurance than he has given us so far that a major portion of the 50 amendments submitted by the Senate will be implemented early in the next session. Unless the Senate can be assured that a major portion of its recommendations will be incorporated in the new legislation at an early date, I would feel constrained to vote against the bill. But if we get this assurance, or reasonable assurance, then I think the main thrust of the bill is sufficiently good that I can support it.

In the mad rush to get this bill through Parliament before January 1, 1972, we have lost sight of the responsibility that Parliament has to bring before the people carefully prepared legislation, the implications of which have been studied much more carefully than is obviously the case with this bill.

I recognize that it is easy for members of the Government to make excuses and to say that previous tax bills have been subjected to amendment in the past. This is true; but it is also true that never before in the history of this Parliament has a bill been presented to the people, the implications of which are so unclear and so indefinite in so many important areas.

The Government has made a great deal of fuss about the uncertainty which will be caused if this bill is not passed by January 1. The Government has done this without defining, or being specific in spelling out, just who will be affected and to what extent. Here I am not being snide. I am simply saying that I would like to see these things spelled out more precisely than has been the case so far. It may be that the Government is right, but I would like to know more about it.

In other words, as I read the statements that have been made, there has been a tendency to raise an undefined monster called "uncertainty" and to use this monster as a threat and as an excuse for rushing this bill through. I am sure that if the Senate does find it necessary to delay the passage of this bill beyond December 31—and I do not think it will—the heavens will not fall and there will be no great calamity to Canada or Canadians.

I think it is unfortunate that the impression is getting abroad that the Government is saying to the people, "After years of being in a minority position, we now have a majority and we are going to ram legislation through whether the people like it or not." The reading of history indicates that that is the road to disaster, and this Government, like many of its predecessors, has no claim to omniscience and it, too, could go the way of its predecessors. Make no mistake about it, the pipeline bill was a simple bill compared with this one. It was a bill that, while in its results it has been good for Canada, affected a relatively few people. This bill, in spite of the fact that it will ameliorate the tax position of, it has been said, one million Canadians, will nevertheless cause a great deal of uncertainty, a great deal of expense and a great deal of confusion to those thousands of other taxpayers who are inevitably going to have to pay substantially more in taxes than they have paid in the past. As I said a moment ago, the impression is abroad that the Government is being unduly solicitous of the big corporations and not sufficiently so of the middle group. I think it would be very unwise and very dangerous if they did not pay more attention to the thousands of people who are confused and uncertain and angry about the manner in which this undigested, unclear and uncertain bill has been prepared.

• (1600)

I said at the beginning that I was in favour of the main thrust of the bill. I still feel that way but I think that the good elements in the bill are being vitiated and prejudiced because the Government has not taken the necessary time to prepare the most important piece of legislation to come before any Parliament in many long years.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, it was interesting to listen to the speeches of the two previous senators who rose, and as I listened to the wise words of Senator Manning, coming like a chinook from the beautiful mountains of Alberta, I gathered as he gained momentum that he was almost ready to support the bill. He pointed out a variety of problems, but indicated that government should govern and that in fact there were many good things in the bill.

I then listened to my colleague, Senator Cameron, who proceeded in a very effective way to discuss some of the problems of the bill, and then to point out that in spite of these problems he thinks it is good legislation. His particular presentation emphasized his concern that the Government was involving itself too much with big business and not enough with medium-income people.

I for my part should like to stand in defence of the average taxpayer of the country. I should like to think of this bill, although some of my colleagues might disagree with me, as a tax reform bill, and I would remind all honourable senators that reforms are always very difficult to attain, and that the maintenance of the status quo is always the easiest course to take.

There is no doubt, as we have all heard in this house many times, that there are many complications in the legislation in front of us, but on the other hand we are proceeding, hopefully to put into law a new concept of tax on income that involves a major change, and one that undoubtedly will create further problems. The Government itself is the first to admit that this is not a perfect piece of legislation, and I should like to suggest that studies by committees ad infinitum may not necessarily make it a perfect piece of legislation.

I do not know just how long the bill should be delayed, or how long the studies should go on. It has been in the House of Commons for 50 days, and it has been before the people of Canada for some years.

In this regard I am reminded of a radio skit I heard not too long ago about a fellow who goes to a shoemaker with a stub to get his shoes. He said to the shoemaker, "You know, I left my shoes here three years ago to be repaired and afterwards I was drafted, and had to go to Vietnam. I wonder if you still have my shoes?" The shoemaker looked at the ticket and then said, "I have them, and if you come back on Thursday next they will be ready." I have a feeling that this is the type of situation that will develop if we continue to discuss every detail of every sentence of every article and every amendment in this bill.

Honourable senators, I think what we have to look at here are the basic principles, and I share Senator Cameron's view when he indicates that the continuity of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is of vital importance. I do not feel that if this bill is passed the possibility of the Senate's making very important changes to the legislation is precluded. We are only just beginning. The committee can continue to meet and to present proposed amendments to the Government.

I was interested in Senator Manning's views and I almost gathered from what he said that he was going to go along with the bill, particularly when he said that the Senate would not be asked merely to make amendments but that we would be in a position to propose amendments to amendments. I think we all agree that this would be a very desirable thing, and I compliment my colleague on pointing it out, because the process of developing the legislation and getting the correct interpretation put into words is not going to be easy. Already it has involved quite a considerable process.

Senator Manning has indicated the role of municipalities and pointed out the problems involved, and what he thinks would have been a good change to make by allowing the interest paid to the holders of $10,000 of municipal bonds to be tax exempt as a means of helping taxpayers. I happen to have been at one time the chairman of the finance committee of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities when we presented our views to the House of Commons committee discussing the White Paper. At that time it was pointed out, as it has been on many other occasions by several ministers of finance of various political views, that rather than being a form of equity it would in fact be a subsidy to those who were able to buy bonds, namely those who are in a higher income bracket, and that in fact they would consider it very poor legislation. I simply pass that on as the reaction to that suggestion, there are many who feel that if the objective is tax equity you do not make it easier for the rich or middle-income group to obtain tax exemptions.

We felt it would have been better to allow the first $300 of property tax on an owner-occupied home to be tax exempt. This would not necessarily help the rich although it is argued that by bringing that exemption in, because of their higher tax rate, the more wealthy people would benefit to a greater degree. I am sure all honourable senators realize that these are the kinds of questions that must face any minister of finance when he is trying to devise a program based on equity.

I very much appreciated the point raised by Senator Manning on the question of uncertainty, and I know that we were all pleased to hear about the great tar sands development that would provide up to 9,000 jobs in the Province of Alberta and result in the development of a great natural resource. I share with the former Premier of Alberta the pride that that province takes in the development of its natural resources, but I would point out that the only way that uncertainty is going to be dissipated and projects like this move into actual physical production is by the reduction of some of that uncertainty, and the first step is to get this bill passed into law. Some people may say this only adds to the uncertainty. I do not believe this. When this bill is passed the department will have to interpret it.

I do not know whether I am giving away a state secret, but I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether the Government was making preparations to answer the multitudinous questions it will receive so far as the implications of this bill are concerned. He indicated to me that every possible effort is being made to develop the staff to the greatest degree, in order to be able to answer the questions.

I feel the success of this bill, once it becomes law, depends to a large degree in the early stages on the policy of the Department of National Revenue in making clear to taxpayers what their position will be, and to do this with the minimum of delay. This is the extent of the commitment the Government of Canada can give. It does not mean they will answer every single question because that would be impossible. However, to a great majority of concerned taxpayers, answers should be forthcoming. This is what will make this legislation workable.

This morning, Senator Belisle indicated that the tax aid suggested in the bill was a farce. This upset me a little. I do not feel it is a farce when 800,000 working mothers will be able to claim a deduction of $500 for each child for day care costs for up to four children, or $2,000. It will mean a great deal to those who need this help. I have not heard many people say it is a farce that hundreds of thousands of our senior citizens over the age of 65 will be getting an additional $650 exemption. This is a significant amount, and it will eliminate income tax for many senior citizens who need this help. I do not think it is a farce that the guaranteed income supplement to the old age pension, which will raise the income of those who have no other source, will be exempt from income tax.

These are not farcical provisions. I suggest they are very real. I do not feel that the raising of the exemption for small businesses from $35,000 to $50,000, as a result of representations made by this body as well as many others, is a farce. It will help them very considerably. I do not think that Senator Lawson would agree that allowing working people a deduction of $150 for tools in their trade or extra clothing is a farce.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Everyone loves a Santa Claus.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Is that Santa Claus I hear speaking?

I do not feel that the allowance of moving expenses to workmen going from one job to another is something that should be treated cavalierly as it has been. I prefer to think of this as tax reform which will help 4.7 million taxpayers by reducing their income tax.

I represent the Province of Saskatchewan and I am aware, as Senator Cameron has indicated, that we have problems regarding the basic herd concept, and the rollover on a family farm and the gift tax involved. On the other hand, I am well aware that the bulk of our citizens in the lower income brackets are going to benefit from this reform. I would like to think that the Senate as a whole, along with the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, has played a vital part in this reform; that it is merely beginning to break new ground, and will continue to make this reform more efficient and workable.

Honourable senators, I suggest that if this bill goes to committee, and I hope that it does, we will have an opportunity to review and assess those areas that concern us, and they will still be considered by the Minister of Finance in due course. I hope we will continue to be as vigilant and active in the new year as we have been in the recent past in bringing to the attention of the Minister of Finance the amendments we feel are required to make this legislation completely workable.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I was pleased when the Senate did not choose to accept Senator Flynn's motion that we adjourn until January 10.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Go ahead and fill in time.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I was convinced the proper action for the Senate was to proceed with the debate, which it has done. I am sure all those who have been in the chamber will recognize that it has been a very useful debate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The results will indicate that.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Some excellent speeches and good suggestions have been made. I feel we are dealing with this bill as a responsible body and in the manner the Canadian public would expect the Senate to act.

I agree with those who have suggested that we should not proceed by exhaustive legislation. I would not agree to sit here hour after hour in order to force members of the Senate to vote a certain way only because they are too tired to continue debate. I do not agree that we should pass this legislation under pressure. However, I feel we have had useful, constructive discussion in this chamber and we will continue to deal with specific areas within the bill if it is referred to committee.

I express my thanks to Senator Flynn and Senator O'Leary for their comments on the motion of Senator Flynn to adjourn the Senate. Senator O'Leary has warned that the Senate will be abolished if we proceed along the course the Senate has chosen. Both senators have indicated we need to get to work but they suggest that the way to do it is to leave this place for three weeks. Well I have decided that once the Senate is abolished I will make application for employment to both Senator Flynn and Senator O'Leary. I like their definition of work, if they mean we should take off for three weeks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If that is the best you can do then you should do it.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: During the course of the last few days, honourable senators have been receiving various editorials from different parts of the country. We received two editorials from Senator Heath yesterday, and we received one from a Mr. Davis of Winnipeg, taken from the Winnipeg Tribune dated December 15. It is not my intention to read those editorials to the Senate. They have the same theme, and it has been repeated and inferred in a number of speeches in this house.

• (1620)

The first is that the Liberal senators in particular and the Senate in general have been subjected to pressure and that we must pass this bill and pass it at once. The second is that the bill is of tremendous size and that the Senate has not had time to study it. These charges have already been refuted by a number of speakers, notably the leader of the house on the Government side and again last night by Senator Langlois.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Leader of the Government; there is no leader of the house.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Yes. So I only refer to them in passing.

Dealing with the second charge, that there has not been time to study the bill, I find it almost amusing. It is as though the Senate were receiving a Christmas present from the House of Commons, all bound up, sealed and marked, "Do not open until 4 o'clock Friday afternoon, December 17." You would think honourable senators live in a vacuum, do not listen to the radio, watch television, read newspapers or have access to the House of Commons Hansard. It is as though suddenly, at 4 o'clock yesterday, for the first time we heard about this bill. Nothing is more ridiculous. A copy of the proposed bill was given to all of us back in July. The Senate when it reconvened on September 14 referred the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It has been studied in great detail. Some editorials do not make any reference to the Banking Committee, but imply that our first knowledge of the bill was on Friday afternoon. This is absolutely incorrect.

Also in passing, I note constant reference, particularly in editorials, to the length of the bill. It is constantly referred to as "That 707-page bill; how could anyone go through it?" The bill we received yesterday is a little longer, 740 pages, in fact. But it is printed in both the French and English languages, and I doubt that all senators will read both versions. So, if it were printed in one language only it would be 370 pages long. This is not of great importance, but it indicates that the constant reference to 740 pages is inaccurate.

With reference to the charge of pressure, I can state categorically that I have not been pressured, threatened, warned or ordered. I have not even been asked particularly to support the bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Do you have a caucus? Is it two, three or four?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: No one in caucus has told me to support this bill. I will deal with it on the basis on which I entered this house, that if I am satisfied it is the right bill for the people of Canada I will support it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you say you experienced no pressure at all, you are not flattering yourself. Pressure is imposed only on those who need it.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: The honourable Senator Flynn can deal with the question as he sees fit.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think this is a reflection on all honourable senators. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, who is a fair-minded man, would not wish to make this imputation against all members of this house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I said, recently, and I will repeat, that we are subjected to pressure, whether from outside, editorials in the press, or otherwise. We are all subjected to pressure and I think it is a useless argument to say "I have not been subjected to pressure." We know that we are all subjected to some type of pressure and to affirm this is rather naïve. It is in this way that I dispute the argument of my honourable colleague. I do not impute anything wrong, but just to ignore pressure would not be frank.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): You were more specific than that when you said pressure was exercised on those who needed it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is true between colleagues. You do not talk to those whom you are sure will share your views. I consult with my colleagues sometimes and suggest a course of action. I do not consult with those who agree with me, but with those who are inclined to disagree. What is wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I am in the habit of speaking to all and making no choice. I would even speak to the honourable gentleman at any time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think what you do is a very good example of what takes place here.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: If Senator Flynn is referring to everything that can happen with regard to public opinion, admittedly we are all subject to that pressure. If he suggests, however, that someone on the Government side has ordered me to do something, that is absolutely incorrect. No one has attempted to do it and I am quite sure no one will. That would be the surest way of ensuring that I would oppose the bill.

I wish to discuss one specific matter contained in the bill. This was referred to this morning by Senator Forsey and also by Senator Manning. It is the question of the tax on the natural resource industries. In this regard I recognize part of the validity in the arguments put forward, that the manufacturing sector provides more employment. One has to recognize, however, the different rate of development in the various parts of Canada. It is all well and fine for someone from the central part of Canada, where there is a large secondary manufacturing industry, to adopt that theme and say we should now change the tax rules because this would suit their area better. That kind of change, in my opinion, works to the disadvantage of certain parts of the country. I think it would work to the disadvantage of the Maritime region. I know that it would work to the disadvantage of my own province, because we have not reached the level of economic development of either Ontario or Quebec. We are still at the stage where they were some years ago when their basic development was in natural resources. Secondary manufacturing normally follows that development. The Province of Manitoba has a population of approximately one million people, which is too small in many cases for the establishment of any sizeable manufacturing industry. It has not a sufficient market and is too far from the large markets of eastern Canada to be able to compete in the field of manufacturing. Therefore, if we are to develop we must look first of all to our natural resources industries.

What happened, in fact, in past years? How did the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec develop? The tax rules which applied in many cases encouraged for example, the mining industry in northern Quebec and northern Ontario. Those areas were more accessible than ours, closer to the centres of population and easier to reach. For these reasons northern Ontario and northern Quebec developed very substantially in the mining and pulp and paper fields. Our development did not come as quickly. Until very few years ago basically in Manitoba there existed only one mine, Flin Flon. It is only in the past eight or ten years that there has been any sizeable development, such as Thompson, Lynn Lake, and so on. Development is now growing, but it is our opinion that if we change the tax rules at this time, and if the situation is more attractive elsewhere, mining companies will not continue exploration in our area. The resources may exist, but they will not be developed. We want to be in the position of getting every cent of taxation we can from our natural resources, but as long as they are undeveloped they will certainly not produce taxes and provide employment.

When dealing with the question of the natural resources from the point of view of taxation, we ask those in central Canada to accept the position that manufacturing must be encouraged. I agree with this. We would like to see manufacturing in our area, but we have to start off with the things that we can do. We must first build up our population to the point where manufacturing can follow.

Returning to the bill in general, like most senators and most Canadians, I have mixed feelings about it. There are some things in it that I like and some things that I do not like, but I suppose that applies to every bill that is passed, certainly every tax bill. I do not know many people who like to impose taxes, and certainly none of us likes to pay them.

I am prepared at this stage to support the bill in second reading and have it go to committee. When the bill reaches committee I hope to learn something about a number of items. For instance, is it all that serious to pass the bill by January 1 as has been claimed? What would be the effect of not passing it by that date?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Who would you expect to advise you on that?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I would expect that representatives from the Department of Finance, and no doubt the Minister of Finance, would be present to deal with the matter.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You could get that answer right away from the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I would like to hear from departmental officials about the effect of any delay in passing the bill. What would be the effect on the whole of Canadian development and Canadian employment?

If in committee we find that it would be unwise to delay passage of the bill, I would be prepared to support third reading on the condition that we receive assurances in committee that the amendments proposed by our committee, and any other amendments that we might wish to make at a later date, will be proceeded with. Some, of course, may not be proceeded with, but at least a good number of them will. Further, when those amendments are brought forward in an amending bill, should the Senate wish to make further amendments at that time, will it be able to do so? I assume any amending bill to come before the Senate will re-open the tax legislation and we will be permitted to deal with any item in the bill. That is my understanding of the standard practice. If those conditions are met in the committee stage, I will reserve my right to decide what I shall do on third reading.

Honourable senators, I believe that at this time we should send the bill to committee and receive assurances there, and if we cannot obtain them we should then decide what we must do. I trust that we can get those assurances.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Martin speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, as the last speaker has said, although at times the debate has been heated, it has been good and constructive. It is one that, generally speaking, has done honour to the Senate and should be so regarded by those outside the chamber who have sought to tell us where our duty lies.

Let it be re-asserted that, as members of this upper house, we have taken an oath of loyalty and have given an undertaking to discharge our functions in a dutiful manner. While what we do cannot be expected to satisfy everyone, let it be clearly understood that what we do is the result of our own individual judgment as senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And collective judgment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There has been no undue influencing, and I accept what the Leader of the Opposition said a moment ago when explaining what he meant by pressure, particularly pressure from outside.

We are masters of our own house. We make our own decisions in the light of our own consciences, in the light of our own responsibility. That is clear. In my own case, as a member of the Government I have the responsibility of outlining the Government's policy. That I have done, and that I will continue to do. But that in no way should cause any senator to register his vote in a way that does not fully comply with his own concept of obligation and duty.

A number of points were made by various speakers. I shall not take up the time of honourable senators by answering all of them, or all of the questions that were raised. However, there are a number that I should like to deal with at this time.

Senator Buckwold suggested that replies should be given by Government departments concerned, in anticipation of situations that fully mature. I point out to him that the Minister of National Revenue has said that many explanatory booklets have been mailed to taxpayers, and others will be distributed as soon as the bill becomes law. An effort will be made by the department, contrary to its traditional practice, to provide answers to questions, whether hypothetical or actual, related to problems faced by taxpayers.

Senator Cameron raised a point concerning V-day appraisals. It should be understood that for the large majority of taxpayers V-day does not have the relevance that Senator Cameron suggested, particularly in view of the fact that principal residences are exempt. V-day is relevant under the act only in respect to such things as stocks and bonds, business assets, second homes and cottages, land, and personal property worth more than $1,000.

• (1640)

With regard to the confusion which he suggested might apply to small taxpayers, his point is not well taken. For the millions of taxpayers who are on salary the new system will be as easy as the old system. It is just a matter of filling out a printed form. There will be increased complexity, of course, for businesses and corporations. That is why many of them have been concerned about the effective date. Much of this complexity can be attributed to relieving provisions.

Senator Manning said that there was much in the bill that deserved commendation. Senator Molgat also made this point, and this is a point I made myself.

As Senator Molgat pointed out he could not recall any tax measure that was fully acceptable. Indeed, many bills contain provisions that are not always in accord with one's judgment, but we have to look at the responsibility of the Government for the formulation of tax policy, in the position of an elected house as well as in the position of this house, within the context of the Canadian Constitution. With this as a background, we have to ask ourselves not whether every feature of the bill is satisfactory, but whether, in light of the obligations that face the Government, it is not in the public interest, notwithstanding individual views on particular provisions, that confusion be removed and stability established so that the economy can function without undue obstacles placed in the way, and uncertainty in the law itself removed.

I am sure no one understands this point better than Senator Manning himself who, for a long time, was the—

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: You have already said that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —was the Premier of his province. He made this point when he was Premier of Alberta, I am told, on several occasions, particularly at the end of each session of the legislature when he was faced with the crowded situation that always attends the Canadian Parliament at this particular juncture.

I agree with Senator Manning that the parliamentary process is criticized today. Not only this house but Parliament itself is being accused of not being relevant—that it has lost its meaningfulness. Senator Manning made a moving plea for dedication to the democratic parliamentary system. He said there was need for self-discipline, a need to recognize that at some point the decision of the majority has to be acknowledged, and that if we are going to make progress respect for that majority decision has to be noted. I thought that was valuable advice from an experienced legislator and former head of government. I find it difficult, however, to relate that to the next point in the syllogism, namely, that the Government itself deserved condemnation.

Not only has the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce spent a great deal of time examining this legislation, its provisions and amendments—even though we were not legislatively seized with the matter—but it spent a great deal of time studying the White Paper. There has been a general debate in the other place. We ourselves are engaging in one now. We have before us a number of days that exceed the time, for instance, that was taken in the British Parliament on a vital matter for the United Kingdom and for Europe—Britain's entry into the Common Market. That question took six days in the British Parliament. It was not a travesty of the democratic process, and it would not be a travesty of the democratic process, as the Montreal Gazette stated this morning, for this house to take the amount of time which was envisaged for it in order to deal with this legislation. This is a matter which the Senate will decide. This Senate will decide how much time it will devote to general debate on third reading. The committee will decide how much time it will take to study the legislation. These decisions will be made honourably.

I do not suspect for one moment, in spite of the action of honourable senators, that this will stop the criticism of this chamber, but at least it will be a satisfaction to honourable senators, wherever they sit in this house and whatever their political complexion. Whatever be the criticism, we will have discharged our duties.

Senator Manning made the point that under the bill the taxation of natural resource industries is dealt with largely by way of regulation. He is, I think, referring to earned depletion. However, it should be pointed out that the old method of automatic depletion was also dealt with by regulation under the old act. The regulations will be made public. The reason it is done by regulation, of course, is to permit a greater flexibility by the Government in adapting rules to current circumstances. There is no other way by which this could be done.

With regard to Senator Manning's point about death duties, we have steadfastly argued that capital gains are not a substitute for death duties. The former is a tax on a previously untaxed form of income, and the latter is a once in a lifetime wealth tax. The only problem arises when a man dies with an accrued but unrealized capital gain, whereupon two different taxes might be imposed at the same time. This was the reason why the federal Government decided to give up the federal estate tax. I might say to Senator Manning that the Province of Alberta has already indicated it will not impose a provincial succession duty. That decision is now clearly one for the provinces to deal with on an individual basis.

Senator Manning mentioned federal-provincial fiscal relations. I know he has had a good deal of experience in this area, and while I have not been a delegate at every federal-provincial conference, I have, I think, attended all that he has attended. The point he makes as to the elimination of the abatement system in the personal income field leaves the provinces completely free to apply as heavy a weight or burden of tax as they need to meet their fiscal obligations, just as we have to meet ours. The problem of exempting interest on municipal bonds was considered and abandoned, principally because the financing of municipal expenditures is essentially a provincial responsibility. If the federal Government adopted Senator Manning's suggestion, it would amount to a transfer from the federal Government to the provinces.

• (1650)

I think that the points that have been raised have been answered. At least I have answered them as well as I can.

It was suggested yesterday that most of the international measures in Bill C-259 were causing great concern. I would simply point out that most of the international measures in the bill are not effective until 1976, when a wider treaty network will have to be built up to assist in the expansion of Canadian business.

The suggestion is made that we should pass the bill in 1972 and make it retroactive to January 1, 1972, notwithstanding all the debate and study that has been undertaken. All I can point out is that there is strong evidence, on the part of the legal profession alone, not of agreement on the bill but of agreement that a bill which has not received royal assent may be lacking in the quality of enforcement. Such a situation could cause great confusion and uncertainty to businessmen, as they would not know which income tax law would apply to their transactions in 1972. I agree with Senator Molgat. That area is one I personally would like to see exposed. I think it is an important one, and indicates one of the reasons for the position the Government takes.

Some have argued that the bill should be divided into several parts. That proposal was made in the other place; it has been made here today; it was made in the careful statement last night of Senator Choquette. I only point out, as I think is clear on an examination of it, that all parts of this bill are intricately interwoven, and it would take months to split the bill into sections, as is proposed, and make them workable. I think there would not be anything more inimical to business stability, to certainty for business itself, and for the public generally, than if they were to be left in a state of uncertainty as to by which law their tax problems were to be governed.

I believe, honourable senators, that in the general debate that has taken place we have had an opportunity, in the perspective of the time we have had during these months since July 12 last—

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: And of last year.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And of last year—to appreciate the significance of the vital bill that is before us; a bill that is voluminous, but which seeks to create a new area of action, and serves to implement new reforms. It has gone through the process of parliamentary dialogue and parliamentary discussion, and we are now engaged in the same process here. We will take whatever time and whatever means are necessary to give this matter the kind of discussion the situation deserves.

We have before us, of course, the reference made by the Minister of Finance before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Monday. If, as I hope, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is asked to deal with the matter, an opportunity will exist to have the minister there again, and also some of the officials, who will explain some of the detailed points that I have covered in a general way, which are so vital in the conduct of good government, particularly in this area.

I would just say to Senator Manning that at page 38 of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce he will find in an exchange between the chairman and other members of the committee the chairman's view on the constitutional position of the kind of amendments Senator Manning mentioned in his speech.

Honourable senators, every upper house has been challenged, not only in this day of populist emphasis, but for a long time. This house, its integrity, its purpose and its function, has been challenged and criticized by many people over the years. I can attest, as a man who came from the other place after a long period there, that regardless of the vigour of debate there is no group of men and women more sincerely dedicated to the national interest than the senators of Canada. We are not open to pressure of any kind, whether from journals, the news media, or any other quarter. We are here to discharge our duty honourably and thoroughly. I am confident that is what we are going to do.

I believe there is a consensus that this bill should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This was my own view from the beginning. I felt, however, that if I suggested that it might be open to the suggestion that I was trying to tell the house what it should do. The suggestion to refer the bill to the committee came first from Senator Choquette. Most senators who have spoken today have concurred in that suggestion. It will be my responsibility at the appropriate time in our proceedings to propose that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration.

With these observations, honourable senators, I rest the case of the Government; I rest the case in which I believe. I believe that the measure before us is a good bill, as I said last night, and it is in the conviction that that is the case that I ask the Senate to proceed now to the next phase of our proceedings.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. What can be accomplished in committee outside of a discussion, enlightenment, and answers to questions put? Can we submit amendments, and will they be considered? Could they be implemented and integrated at this late stage?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am a little surprised that my friend Senator Choquette should ask that question, because he was the one who proposed that the bill should go to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not remember making that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If he will read his speech, which I thought was a carefully prepared and articulate speech, he will see that that was one of the points he made.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Even if I did, I am asking you now what can be accomplished.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is a matter for the committee to decide.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Some Hon. Senators: Now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I propose that this bill be not now a read third time, but be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, I believe it has now been moved that this bill be not read the third time—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Now.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: —but be sent to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion that this bill be referred to a committee?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, in amendment, I move that the following words be added to the motion:

> and that the committee be instructed to bring back to the Senate a report incorporating the amendments to Bill C-259 which have been drafted by the committee—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Have you a copy of the motion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No, I have not.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No copy?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I believe I have every right to make a verbal motion. If we have changed our rules so that verbal motions are not in order, I have not been informed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is unnecessary to have it written out.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Martin put a motion, and I understand that the honourable Senator Grosart is making a motion in amendment. I will have to have the motion in writing, unless Senator Grosart repeats it slowly so that I can write it down.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: With respect, Your Honour, I am not entirely sure that I can repeat my amendment—

Some hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: —in the exact words I used. Unfortunately, the train of my thought was interrupted. My amendment is:

> and that the committee be instructed to bring back to the Senate a report which will incorporate the amendments—

Hon. Mr. Prowse: On a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Here we go.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I submit, with all respect, that we can refer a bill to a committee and ask the committee to consider it, but how can we possibly, in good conscience or in good faith, say we refer a bill to a committee with instructions that the committee shall report back to do whatever Senator Grosart says.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would submit that the honourable Senator Grosart should put his motion in amendment, and it can be debated.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you. Before the interruptions and the point of order—

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The point of order was properly made.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It only complicated things.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I take it that Your Honour is ruling that the point of order is not accepted.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: No, no.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the honourable Senator Grosart is moving an amendment to the motion of the honourable Senator Martin. He should be given an opportunity to complete his motion in amendment, and any honourable senator will have an opportunity to debate it and the Chair will look into its acceptability.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: On a point of privilege, could arrangements be made to have Senator Grosart's amendment written out so that we can be provided with the details before we attempt to debate the amendment?

The Hon. the Speaker: This is precisely the point. Honourable senators, I wish to put the motion in amendment, but I cannot do so unless I have it in writing. I am trying to write it down.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, if the motion were in writing it would be helpful, but we have the sense of the amendment, which is that we instruct the committee to report back with a report that would include the so-called amendments which were drafted by the committee on previous occasions.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, we are in the process of dealing with a verbalized amendment, a process of amendment. I was interrupted by a point of order, before my motion was put to the house. I would respectfully submit that the proper procedure now, whether it be a verbalized motion or a written motion, is that I be permitted to conclude the wording of my amendment before His Honour recognizes points of order. Surely that is the normal procedure in any assembly.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is precisely the point. Since the honourable Senator Grosart is making a verbal motion, I would ask that he give it as slowly as possible so that I can write it down in order that I may put it to the house. I would ask all honourable senators to refrain from intervening until this motion in amendment is put.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thank Your Honour for your intervention. I now have the amendment in writing and can present it to you in this form. It reads:

> and that the committee be instructed to bring back to the Senate a report incorporating the amendments to Bill C-259, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act", which have been drafted by the committee and other amendments recommended to the Senate as "top priority" changes in the bill necessary to correct existing defects in the bill as reported by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

• (1710)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Martin, seconded by the honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

In amendment, it is moved by the honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the honourable Senator O'Leary, that the following words be added:

> and that the committee be instructed to bring back to the Senate a report incorporating the amendments to Bill C-259, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act", which have been drafted by the committee and other amendments recommended to the Senate as "top priority" changes in the bill necessary to correct existing defects in the bill as reported by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Honourable senators, as I indicated, this is a debatable motion. I now give the floor to the honourable Senator Prowse.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, we have just heard a very involved statement in English. It has been a long accepted practise in Canada that we have a proper French translation of an English document and vice versa. Could we not have this statement translated into French so that we can compare the two and be certain what it is the honourable member is trying to place before us?

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not necessarily. The question is posed and we can speak on it. It is a debatable motion. Do you have any objection?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. I am glad to hear the Leader of the Opposition speak. He has not spoken in the debate yet.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Very good.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I said that this was a debatable motion, but, if the Leader of the Opposition will permit me, I should like to deal with the point raised by Senator Prowse.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was a mere joke.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have read the motion in amendment by the honourable Senator Grosart. Does Senator Prowse insist that I should now translate into French the motion in amendment?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I will not insist.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit me a last remark? I must point out that while the debate goes on I will consult the authorities, because I have not so far indicated whether this motion in amendment is in order.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. If I understood the motion in amendment correctly, it includes two different suggestions. It is therefore a complex motion and as such is completely out of order. The motion should be divided. Moreover, since the motion is so complex and since we do not have it in front of us, I would ask His Honour the Speaker to be kind enough to read it again to the chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will read this motion in amendment again, honourable senators. In amendment it was moved by the honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the honourable Senator O'Leary, that the following words be added to the motion:

> and that the committee be instructed to bring back to the Senate a report incorporating the amendments to Bill C-259, intituled: "An Act to Amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act", which have been drafted by the committee and other amendments recommended to the Senate as "top priority" changes in the bill necessary to correct existing defects in the bill as reported by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have now had time to examine the authorities on similar amendments where instructions were to be given to a committee. In fact, although I cannot recall the exact circumstances, we did have a similar case one or two years ago. At any rate, I should now like to read from Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition, page 513. It reads as follows:

> Considerable misapprehension appears to exist as to the meaning of an instruction. An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power which, without such instruction, it would not have. If the subject-matter of an instruction is relevant to the subject-matter and within the scope and title of a bill, then such instruction is irregular since the committee had the power to make the required amendment.

Therefore, honourable senators, since the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has all of the powers to do what is the purpose of this motion in amendment, I must rule it out of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, for the time being I will not dispute the decision of His Honour the Speaker. It covers one amendment. I may move another one later on. I have a few things to say, however, about the referral of this bill to committee. It has been with great reluctance, of course, that the motion has been made by the Leader of the Government, because this morning he would not compromise himself. When he was asked very clearly whether it was his intention to refer it to committee he did not know whether it was his intention or not. He was just waiting to see whether he would have any problem in getting a majority behind his first intention not to refer the bill to committee, as was suggested by Senator Cook and Senator Macnaughton and others who had been members of the committee. I am not criticizing their opinion here, by the way. They were members of the committee and they said that the committee had dealt with the bill and that that was sufficient. Senator Cook has gone further and has said that it is useless to refer it to the committee.

So Senator Martin was waiting to see if he could get away without referral of the bill to the committee.

I have been amused all day by watching the honourable Leader of the Government waivering one way and the other, trying to decide whether he would have enough support to be able to get away without referring the bill to the committee. Finally, Senator Buckwold and Senator Molgat expressed their views, and Senator Forsey also. They are not used to the line of communications that should exist between the Leader of the Government and individual members of the Liberal Party. They did not get the message. They did not get the message and so there was no choice but to move that the bill be referred to committee. They will of course learn in due course; it takes a few years.

• (1720)

Again let me make it clear that I am not suggesting that Senator Forsey has no experience. He has had a great deal of experience, but it has been outside this house and outside the intricacies of this house; otherwise he would not have embarrassed his leader the way he did this morning. It was really amusing to watch the game all day, and I cannot refrain from putting on Hansard what cannot be registered other than by words, because we had a scenario again today that was really interesting.

Of course, His Honour the Speaker has said we cannot give instructions to the committee. It is an opinion which he based on another opinion by Bourinot. I am not discussing the decision here, but I have always understood that when a motion is made, for instance on third reading, that "the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred to committee" for the specific purpose of doing this or that—that that in itself constituted instructions to the committee.

My purpose in rising at this time is to try to find out if we cannot put in writing—and here I may move an amendment later on—what kind of work the committee will do. As Senator Cook and Senator Macnaughton and others have said, they have nothing to do, and Senator Langlois yesterday said the same thing—that they had done everything. He is now back in the chamber again and I am happy to see him because I want to deal with this and I do not like to discuss his remarks in his absence. He said yesterday that the referral of the subject matter of the bill last September was sufficient for the purposes that we are asking here and sufficient for the purpose of discharging our responsibilities. He quoted from what I said, but he quoted only part of it, and he knows very well that if he had quoted everything the situation would be different.

I refer honourable senators to Hansard of this house of September 14. At that time I said I was in agreement with the idea of the committee's looking into the bill for the purpose of studying its technical aspects, but we were not in that committee to deal with the problems involving principles. Now, I followed the committee work pretty closely in the time I had at my disposal and I remember well that I should have liked the committee to look into the question of the tax on capital gains. But it was said by the chairman that in accordance with our understanding of the terms of reference that had been indicated to us we were not to deal with any matter involving a problem of policy; we were only going to see whether the bill as drafted was achieving what the minister had indicated his intention was, and that that part of the White Paper which was being implemented was in fact really implementing it in the way we thought it should be implemented. This was exactly the point and that is why we proposed to refer the bill to the committee, because even if the terms of reference were not very, very restrictive in their wording, in practice and in our understanding and in the debate that took place, we were not to deal with any matter of policy.

My honourable colleagues know very well that if you compare the bill now before us with the report that the same committee made on the White Paper, you will find more recommendations made on the White Paper that were disregarded or set aside by the minister and the Government than were accepted. It is on these points that I think the committee should be able to do some good work. I suggest to my honourable friend, Senator Langlois, that he was wrong in suggesting that the work of the committee was exhausted.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I never said such a thing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You never said such a thing? As you yourself said yesterday, you should read your own speech.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have already done so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If that is what you meant, then I agree with the interpretation that anybody else can put on it. But I remember you quoted what I said on September 14 and I indicated my agreement as to the purpose—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Will you cite what I said?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The debate yesterday concluded with a vote of this house and that finished the matter. Let us get down to what we are dealing with now. You are referring to a matter which was debated and which was concluded with a vote in this house, and we are not entitled to go back to every debate we had since the year one. You know that too.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not know if I should even reply to that.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: It is easy.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is too easy, and that is why I am afraid. I will forget about it.

Now I have lost all my papers. However, I shall go to September 14 to try to please my good friend Senator Prowse. I think that was the date when the motion to refer the subject matter of the bill was moved.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the honourable senator can speak from his own desk. He is now sitting in somebody else's.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I sat because you rose on a point of order and I cannot do two things at the same time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us continue to study the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the discussion now is in order. We are on a motion that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I think that up to now the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition have been relevant, and I would hope that we could now proceed with the debate.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have now found the remarks I made on September 14, and at one place I said:

> We are faced with a technical problem which is, as Senator Hayden said, very important.

And then I continued:

> The comments we have heard from the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association and other meetings suggest that the drafting may be defective in many ways. Reading these comments and listening to Senator Hayden brought back a memory of Senator Pouliot's comment on the drafting of bills. It is very important for the Senate to consider the bill and discover whether it really achieves what is intended. If my understanding is correct, this committee will not deal with the principle of the bill. That can be done when the bill reaches us after consideration by the House of Commons. However, we will determine whether it is presented in the appropriate manner, which is a very important task. This task can certainly be handled in a better manner in our committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce than by any other committee, especially the Committee of the Whole of the other place. And I say that with all due respect.

It was made quite clear at that time that the committee was not to deal with the principle of the bill, and we did not deal with the recommendations contained in the White Paper which the minister disregarded. Many honourable members have not changed their opinions about this matter.

Some have suggested that the party to which I belong is against tax on capital gains. This is not true. It is in favour of an equitable tax. I feel that the recommendations contained in the report of the White Paper were much better than the provisions contained in this bill. There is no doubt about this. This is why I have suggested to honourable senators that if the committee is to do a proper job it should study this bill clause by clause, not in the sense that we spend an hour on each clause. That is not the point I am making, but if we are going to do anything worth while we must look at the whole bill and not restrict ourselves to the recommendations contained in the three reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. However, because of the amendment which was suggested by my colleague, Senator Grosart—and which Your Honour has ruled out of order—I think it is obvious that if the bill is referred to committee someone will move that the committee take a stand on the recommendation which has been made. It seems obvious to me that a vote will have to be taken. I am suggesting that the committee must do more than merely listen to the Minister of Finance who said that eventually, I do not know when, or I do not know why, or I do not know to what extent, but eventually an amending bill will come.

I quarrel with the issue raised by Senator Langlois in his speech yesterday. He quoted from the report of the committee and suggested that Senator Beaubien was satisfied that the minister indicated there will be an amending bill. I suggest if honourable senators read the entire proceedings they will see that this is not the case. We endeavoured to pin down the Minister of Finance to cause him to make a definite commitment, and he refused. He said:

> I do not know, I cannot promise anything. The only thing I can say is that there will be an amending bill. There is one every year.

Everyone knows that. He went on to say:

> There may be some recommendations which you have made that we may accept, but I cannot promise you that. But perhaps some of your recommendations will be accepted. There are corrections to be made every year.

Honourable senators, if we are going to refer this bill to the committee I feel we should do a good job and not just appear to be doing a good job. If we do not study it clause by clause I suggest the Senate will be judged by the public for not having discharged its constitutional responsibilities.

I am not worried about the pressure from outside and I will speak about that later. I would like to tell a story to my friend Senator Molgat who has suggested that if pressure had been put on him it would have been sufficient to have caused him to vote against the bill. I remember a case of a client and his lawyer who were discussing the outcome of a trial. The client asked the lawyer what he thought was going to happen and the lawyer said he did not know. The client asked, "Do you think if I should send the judge a present it would help my case?" and the lawyer replied, "For God's sake, don't do that, you would be sure to lose." Some months later when the judgment was rendered in favour of the client he went to see his lawyer and said, "We have won." And the lawyer asked, "What are you suggesting?" The client said, "You remember the gift you said I should not send to the judge?" and the lawyer said, "You didn't send one, I hope." The client said, "Yes, but I sent it in the name of the other party." Perhaps if Senator Martin had exerted pressure on Senator Molgat I would have won his vote.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Is honourable Senator Flynn offering to take me to dinner tonight?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am afraid it is too late as far as second reading is concerned, but I can offer you a drink.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I will reserve my right on third reading and will make myself available.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So much has been said regarding pressure. No one should be offended because there is always pressure on a legislative body. If you are offended every time the word "pressure" is used you will be offended all the time.

With all due respect to Your Honour, who may rule against my motion, I move in amendment that the committee be instructed to consider the bill clause by clause. I suggest that the decision Your Honour has quoted from is not necessarily the final decision. It is one decision, and it rules contrary to the practice of referring a bill to committee for a specific purpose. If Your Honour rules this amendment out of order I would be satisfied with the assurance of the acting chairman of the committee, Senator John J. Connolly, that this is the manner in which the committee will proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a few moments ago I ruled that a committee has the power to do anything it wishes within the framework of our rules. The authorities say and the Senate practice has been that it is not in order to refer a bill to a committee with specific instructions from the Senate when that committee has the responsibility of examining a bill and reporting to the Senate, the report again being debatable.

• (1740)

I have to declare this amendment out of order.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I will not call a vote; this is in Your Honour's authority. However, as we say in law, I take exception to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Martin, seconded by the honourable Senator Langlois, that the Bill C-259, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act", be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO DEFER FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-259 DEFEATED

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next order, we are still seized with Bill C-259. We have suspended Rules 45 and 46 in connection with all public bills. Since I am quite sure that the committee will proceed in the manner I have indicated, I wish to move that the Senate do now adjourn until January 10, 1972, subject to being recalled previously if that committee completes its examination of the bill before that date.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour, on a point of order. It was my intention to speak to the main motion. I was waiting—

Hon. Mr. Martin: It has been carried.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. The honourable Senator Grosart will recall that I put the question that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Someone said "Carried" and I waited a few seconds and said, "Adopté, Carried".

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My point of order, Your Honour, is that I was expecting that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) would reply to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition as an alternative.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He does not have to.

Hon. Mr. Martin: On the point of order, I do not mind Senator Grosart speaking, but I would like to know on what he is speaking? Is it the proposal to go into third reading?

The Hon. the Speaker: I declared the motion to refer the bill to committee carried. I waited because I was expecting that there might be a division, but it is carried. Now, of course, if the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) wishes to reply, it is up to him to do that, but the motion has been carried.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, I have put a motion.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I apparently have not had an opportunity to make my point of order clear. The point of order, Your Honour, is that I was not, in my view, given an opportunity to rise and discuss the motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: That could only be a point of privilege, not a point of order. Let us find out what you are doing.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Grosart has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It may well have been, Your Honour, my own fault. I may not have followed the proceedings as exactly as I should have. I may have misunderstood the speaking arrangements, which is not unusual here. I do not know what the disposition of the Senate is at this moment. I did not speak on second reading. It was my intention to speak on the motion that Your Honour has declared carried.

I have waited all day with the intention of speaking to that motion. It is, of course, entirely up to the Senate. I believe that with leave we can revert. I leave it in Your Honour's hands. I merely say that I, having waited all day and not having spoken on second reading, would like, with leave of the Senate—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No leave.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I ask leave of the Senate, notwithstanding the appropriate rules and Your Honour's ruling, to now speak on the motion.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am now asking the Senate for leave, notwithstanding the rules that might otherwise prohibit it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must repeat that the motion has been carried. We have a request from the honourable Senator Grosart, on a question of privilege, to speak. Unanimous consent, of course, is necessary. I ask is there unanimous consent that the honourable Senator Grosart now speak to the motion?

An Hon. Senator: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: I heard one dissenting voice, and the answer is no.

Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, my motion is that consideration by the Senate of Bill C-259 be postponed until January 10, 1972 subject to recall if the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has in the meantime completed its examination thereof.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the honourable Senator Macdonald, that consideration by the Senate of Bill C-259 be postponed until January 10, 1972, subject to recall if the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has in the meantime completed its examination thereof.

Those in favour of the motion, please say Yea.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Grosart wishes to speak to it.

• (1750)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I regret that the leave I asked for was refused. I think it is the first time since I have been a member of the Senate that leave on such an occasion has been refused. I can think of a good many occasions when leave, requested in exactly similar circumstances, was not refused. I therefore regret that the important matter, now before us in the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, should have brought us to such a low level of partisanship as was indicated in the refusal to grant leave.

Perhaps I may be allowed to quote from an eminent authority on taxation, Dr. Howard Ross, Dean of the Faculty of Management at McGill University. Dr. Ross is a former Chancellor of the university, and a former President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. In a publication just off the press, entitled Our Taxes—Lessons from Carter and Benson, Dr. Ross writes on page 1:

> On such a subject—

He is referring to taxes:

> —what we used to call "unbridled passions" run very close beneath the surface, and indeed often above it.

He continues:

> This is a good thing. Taxes are of critical importance to our whole way of life. If arguments get heated—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I hear many voices. The honourable Senator Grosart has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Dr. Ross continues:

> —and over-stated, and someone's feelings are hurt, it is too bad—but we need all the comments and criticisms and ideas we can provoke. The point is not simply that tax collection is, in itself, one of the vital processes in governing a country. It goes even beyond this, because if the citizen is not roused to his civic responsibilities when actually experiencing the tax bite, then there is no chance of ever stirring up his interest or concern in our way of life—and farewell to any prospect of good government.
> So we will get lots of talk. Some of it will be responsible and competent. We will undoubtedly still get new insights into old familiar problems, and we will get useful new ideas. What we may not get—and what is desperately important that we should get—is a calm, thorough, informed, and competent post-mortem on the whole business.

Honourable senators, my desk companion says that Dr. Ross might have added "courtesy". My reason for taking the time of honourable senators to read from that publication was really to calm myself down. I remembered Dr. Ross's plea that we should not take unbridled passions too seriously. I was perhaps inclined to react somewhat passionately to what occurred. My intention in rising at this time is to suggest that there might be a way out of the dilemma now facing the Senate.

I regret the impasse in which the Senate finds itself, although it is probably largely the fault of the Senate itself. Time and time again, because of a last minute recess or holiday situation, we have encouraged the House of Commons to assume that legislation could be sent to us under a deadline and we would knuckle under. I use the word "encouraged." We have protested over and over again, but we have never made our protests stick.

Senator Manning made the suggestion that the way in which to combat this in the future is to have a rule to prohibit it. I do not know how we could have such a rule, because we so seldom keep our own rules. The fact of the matter is, as I am sure Senator Manning is well aware, that under our rules any rule made by the Senate can be repealed with two days' notice by a majority vote in the Senate. Because of this, I do not know how we can prevent in the future the kind of impasse in which we now find ourselves.

Perhaps the only way is to take a stand against the imposition of a deadline at this time. It has been stated over and over again during this debate, particularly by the Leader of the Government, that we do not have a deadline, and we are free to discuss this matter as long as we wish to. I suggest this is not so. This bill comes to us with a deadline. It comes to us with a deadline announced by the Government of Canada. It comes to us with a deadline from the cabinet.

I understand the position in which the Leader of the Government finds himself. He is a member of that cabinet and he is bound by the decisions of it on the constitutional convention of cabinet solidarity.

We are under compulsion of a deadline, and I am sure the Leader of the Government has been the unwilling, but unfortunate, carrier of the message. I have great sympathy with his position. I am sure that he himself recognizes the essential conflict of interests involved. I am sure he is sensitive to the grave problem of reconciling, if it is at all possible, his two loyalties—the constitutional requirement of loyalty to the cabinet and the loyalty which I know he has to this chamber. He has amply demonstrated his loyalty to this chamber since he has been here.

In spite of the sympathy I have with his position, however, I suggest to honourable senators that there can be no doubt that in dealing with this bill we are under compulsion. I realize there are arguments to the contrary.

I have the greatest respect for honourable senators who have tried as hard as they have—and perhaps with success; I hope so—to create the impression that we are not under compulsion.

• (1800)

It is vitally important to the Senate—perhaps imperatively important to the whole future of the Senate—that the impression that is abroad be dissipated before we dispose of this bill. The impression that is abroad is that we are under the compulsion of a January 1 deadline. I will not argue whether that impression is a valid one. All I say is that if honourable senators will go to the reading room and read the headlines and editorials of the newspapers from across the country, if they will listen to the radio and watch television, they will know that that is the impression that has been spread across this country.

I say, therefore, that what is important now to the future of this Senate—and in that I include the public interest, because I believe there is an identity between the two—is that we dispel that impression. How do we do it? I make a plea to all honourable senators on both sides of the house that at this juncture we address ourselves wholeheartedly to resolving that impasse. I respect the views of honourable senators who have said we have a very good reason—I was going to say "excuse", but I am trying to be as objective as possible—for disposing of the bill now in committee in a reasonably short time, perhaps four, five, six or seven days.

It has been said over and over again during the debates on earlier motions that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has done a magnificent job in examining the substance of this bill. With that I am in complete agreement. I would say there is not the slightest doubt in the world that in the many sessions of that committee, starting with the White Paper and carrying through to the three reports we have had on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, it has given this bill more careful, thorough and detailed study than it has had anywhere else in Canada, or could for that matter have had anywhere else. There can be no question of that.

But is that the answer? It might well have been the answer. Unfortunately, great as the work of that committee was, it has contributed to the real impasse in which we find ourselves. It contributed by drafting amendments. It contributed, with the best intentions in the world, by reporting to this house that there are nine "top priorities" that must be dealt with to remove the defects in this bill.

I am not going to argue here as to whether the committee was correct in so reporting to us. What is important to us at the moment is that the committee has made that report. The committee has said the bill is grossly defective, and the message has gone out to the country that that is the view of this Senate about this bill, as expressed by this important committee.

Now it is going to committee. What we do there—and I am choosing my words as carefully as I can—and in the interim between now and the time that His Honour directs that a message be sent to the House of Commons will, in my deep conviction, determine the whole future of the Senate as an institution in the federal structure of Canada. I have thought carefully about those words. I do not want to be an alarmist.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, do not be.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Why do I say it? I say it because we are on the spot; we are under the spotlight of public opinion. Senator Cameron earlier today, in one of his finest speeches, saw some comparisons between the present situation and that which confronted Parliament in the pipeline debate. I am not going to labour that comparison. I think he said that 90 per cent of the communications media seemed to be of the opinion that the Senate must stand for its own conviction on this matter. If that is so, surely the future of the Senate is at stake.

Honourable senators, in the next two or three years the Senate will be under scrutiny, as never before. The question that will be before the Canadian people, as it has never been before, is whether the Senate has a useful function under the Constitution; whether, to use the famous words—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend permit me to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I finish, after which, of course, I shall be delighted to answer the question. The question, in the words made famous in one of the milestones of British history, will be whether this place is "useless, dangerous and ought to be abolished."

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does Senator Grosart not think that the way for this Senate to affirm its usefulness is by action, and by giving this bill the fullest consideration it can. While I understand his motive, I suggest that his present line of argument bows to the kind of comment we read in the Montreal Gazette this morning, which I regard as the kind of duress to which no parliament should be subjected.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1810)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In reply I will say that I have never been greatly concerned about the duress, to use the leader's word, that any parliament is subject to because of the press. There is no duress by the press whatsoever. I wish the Leader of the Government had not used the word "duress", because I will merely say at this time that whatever danger there is to Parliament, either in the House of Commons or the Senate, now or in the future, the danger or duress is not that which comes from the communications media.

One of the great historic functions of the second chamber everywhere is to stand between—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Honourable senators, it is six o'clock. Rule 12 states that if, at six o'clock in the afternoon, the business be not concluded, the Speaker or the chairman of the committee leaves the Chair until eight o'clock. I must, therefore, inform honourable senators that I am leaving the Chair, and that the sitting will be resumed at eight o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think, honourable senators, that we might regard the clock as not having reached six so that the senator may finish his speech. We can then perhaps dispose of the matter. It is not quite six o'clock. I happened to look there, and I have good glasses.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If I may make the comment, Your Honour, the parallel between what has just happened and what happened earlier is very interesting. Your Honour announced you were leaving the Chair. That is in exactly the same position as the passing of the resolution. His Honour announced that he had left the Chair.

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I have already said that under Rule 12 I am leaving the Chair, and that the sitting will be resumed at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until the call of the bell at 8 p.m.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that the honourable Senator Flynn is not in his seat. Perhaps we might wait a few minutes for him to arrive.

Honourable senators, when the honourable Senator Flynn made his motion I had nothing in writing, but I later obtained the text of his motion from him. I examined it during the dinner recess and I have very serious doubts as to its acceptability since Bill C-259 had already been referred to a standing committee. However, I think I can suggest to the honourable Senator Flynn a modification of his motion which would make it procedurally acceptable. It would then read as follows:

> That should the Bill C-259, intitled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act", be again before the Senate before 10th January, 1972, it be not considered before that date.

The reason for this is obvious as I shall show by now reading the original motion of the honourable Senator Flynn, which is as follows:

> That further consideration by the Senate of Bill C-259 be postponed.

At the time this motion was made Bill C-259 was not before the Senate; it had been referred to the Standing Senate Committee, and therefore this is one of the reasons why I said I had very serious doubts as to its acceptability. I think I have kept the spirit of the motion made by the honourable Senator Flynn. I regret that Senator Flynn is not in his seat because I would like to submit to him that I have kept the spirit of his motion, and if it is acceptable we could then proceed on this.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (de Lanaudière): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if you have examined the point that an amendment is a correction, and not a destruction. If the motion proposed by Senator Flynn is of such a nature as to destroy the main motion, then I think it is out of order. I do not say that is the case, and so I put it as a question.

The Hon. the Speaker: In answer to that I should point out that the honourable Senator Flynn did not move an amendment. He made a motion. And at the time he made the motion we had disposed of Bill C-259 by referring it to a committee. It is no longer before the Senate. Since the honourable Senator Flynn is now in his seat, I shall once again state the motion he made. It is:

> That further consideration by the Senate of Bill C-259 be postponed.

When I say that I have very serious doubts as to the acceptability of this motion, it is because this bill is not before the Senate any longer. It has been referred.

I want to be as fair as possible. When we adjourned at 6 o'clock the honourable Senator Grosart had the floor, but now I suggest to the honourable Senator Flynn that his motion should read, "... that should the Bill C-259 be again before the Senate before January 10th, 1972, it be not considered before that date." I ask the honourable Senator Flynn if that is acceptable.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is good wording.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree to amend the motion in those terms because my idea was to give the committee as much leeway as possible.

The Hon. the Speaker: We are now dealing with this motion, and the honourable Senator Grosart has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I rise on a point of order. With all due respect, Your Honour, this is such a simple principle of law that it hardly needs emphasis. But what you are doing is indirectly prohibited by law. When the Senate refers a matter to a committee for its consideration it is still in the hands of the Senate. It never leaves the Senate. The suggestion that by this device you can permit a debate which in ordinary circumstances would not be permissible is completely unacceptable.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will deal with the point of order which the honourable Senator Prowse has raised. Item No. 1 on the Order Paper is the second reading of Bill C-259, and we have dealt with second reading of the bill. There was a motion to refer this bill to a standing committee of the Senate, and this motion carried. As soon as this motion carried, the bill was referred to the committee. For this reason I cannot entertain the honourable Senator Prowse's point of order. This bill has now been referred to a standing committee.

Item No. 2 on the Order Paper should then have been called, but I entertained a motion by the honourable Senator Flynn who has graciously agreed to this procedure. I want to be fair to all honourable senators. We are now dealing with Senator Flynn's motion, "—that should the Bill C-259 be again before the Senate before January 10th, 1972, it be not considered before that date."

This is a debatable motion. I give the floor to the honourable Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you, Your Honour, for calling on me once again at this time. I heard Your Honour's wise ruling on the motion to which I was speaking when the Senate adjourned at six o'clock. I must say I was rather surprised that Your Honour entertained discussion following your ruling. Your Honour is extremely generous from time to time in an endeavour to accommodate all honourable senators. However, I would suggest, with the greatest of respect, that when Your Honour has given a ruling no senator has the right to rise and comment upon that ruling, unless he is appealing it.

Honourable senators, when the Senate adjourned, I was discussing the import of Senator Flynn's motion. I am sure it is obvious that the motion reflects Senator Flynn's concern that the Senate cannot discharge its duties in respect to the bill before the deadline imposed by the Government. I say that to bring the comments that I now make within the rules or relevance to which I know His Honour is dedicated. I hope, if I go beyond the rules of relevance, His Honour will not hesitate to call me to order.

The general proposition I was making to the Senate when the adjournment was called was that the Senate faced a dilemma. I am well aware that the Senate, the people of Canada and, perhaps, the Government of Canada face a larger dilemma.

There are really two issues at stake here. One is in respect to the bill: should this bill be necessarily passed under deadline before January 1? I shall not say too much regarding that at this time, because I shall direct most of my remarks to the second issue: what should be the action of the Senate from here on with respect to the dilemma it faces?

On the first point I shall merely say that there appear to be some compelling arguments on both sides of the proposition that this bill should pass before midnight on December 31. On the one side we have the argument of possible confusion and uncertainty if the bill is not passed. That argument has some validity, but it does not appeal to me for the simple reason that I think a good case can be made for saying there is not much difference between the uncertainty which may arise in the economy for individuals and corporations if this bill is passed or not passed by December 31. I think we can toss a coin to decide the effect of passing of the bill at that time, or delaying its passage beyond that date, and we would create more or less uncertainty.

On the side of the argument that passage of the bill in its present form would create more uncertainty there is, of course, the submission which has been made, and which I think is compelling, that this bill has so many loopholes that it will lead to real uncertainty. Senator Lang told us that an eminent legal colleague of his said he was impatient to have this bill passed because there are 120 loopholes which he wanted to get to his clients—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: A hundred and forty.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It was a very large number of loopholes, anyway. This was the attitude taken, as I understand it, by someone eminent and learned in the law.

I wish to comment on one aspect of that, because we heard an eloquent speech by Senator Lawson on the proposition that we must consider the human values inherent in the dilemma we face. He spoke of exemptions from and the lowering of taxes for a large number of Canadians. I agree that that is a most important aspect of the decision we will have to make in the days before us.

We should remember, in the first place, that no taxes will actually be collected under this measure until April 30, 1973. Of course, it may be said that in the meantime there will be deductions under the schedules sent out by the Department of National Revenue. That is a consideration. But we all know that if the bill were delayed and the Government were reasonable, as I think it could be, the bill—particularly the essential exemption and concession aspects of it—would be passed in the early part of next year. All parties in the other place would agree on that, as we do here. Therefore, if the Government has that reasonable assurance that it will be passed, it could make the necessary regulations under the Department of National Revenue Act to lower the deductions from salaries, and so on.

Even if it did not do so, the worst that could happen is that once again, as in war time, we would have some compulsory savings. Millions of citizens, about whom we are concerned, would in April or May receive a windfall of compulsory savings representing deductions that had been made, which, when these very good clauses in the bill are passed, would be redeemable.

I am not greatly concerned with that aspect of the bill. The aspect of human values is also a very important consideration which has been mentioned, but perhaps not sufficiently emphasized. It is said that the real beneficiaries of the income tax legislation and regulations, certainly in the next year, will be those who can afford the services of accountants, lawyers and management consultants. This point has already been made, so I will not stress it too much. However, it is quite obvious that these legal experts, who are now ready with their loopholes, will be passing on this valuable information to clients who can afford to pay, but they will not be passing it on to individuals who cannot afford to pay.

I merely make that point, and suggest that if we delay the bill the poor will not suffer. I hope we shall not hear that argument again, because in fact and in law it is not so.

I hope that honourable senators will believe me when I say that my main concern in speaking at this time is the resolution of the present dilemma. I am concerned by the fact that there is the impression abroad that the Senate is going to knuckle under, that it will not do its duty under the Constitution.

What is that duty? Surely the very minimum duty of the Senate in respect to legislation is to make any amendments it considers necessary, and to communicate them to the House of Commons. The fact is, of course, that we have communicated nothing to the House of Commons. Our obligation here is not to the Government of Canada, the cabinet, or the executive. Our obligation is to the House of Commons. That house has sent us a bill, and its members expect us to respond.

• (2020)

The House of Commons has sent us this bill and said, "Approve the bill with or without amendment." I would hope that at the conclusion of our debate His Honour will not be put in the position of having to rise and say, "It is ordered that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house that the Senate has approved this bill without amendment."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Repeat "without amendment."

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That would not be the truth. We would be asking His Honour to direct a lie to the House of Commons, because the reports we have from our distinguished committee are evidence of the fact that it is not the consensus of our experts that this bill should be approved without amendment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I rise on a point of order. Honourable senators, I do not believe it is right for us at this stage to comment on what the committee might do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The bill has been referred to committee for consideration. I do not want to interfere with what the honourable Senator Grosart has to say, but I tell him and I tell the house that at this stage of our debate it is quite improper for anyone to comment on what the committee may or may not do. Such comments would be interference with the work of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I hope that the honourable Senator Grosart does not persist in this line of argument.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there has been a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If Your Honour is going to dismiss the point of order I shall not detain the house further.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would like to hear from the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think the point of order raised by the Leader of the Government is entirely incorrect. When the Senate refers a matter to committee we can comment on what that committee may or may not do. I think we are resurrecting the question of pressure that was so ably dealt with by Senator Molgat this afternoon.

We can tell the committee what we think. The committee is doing the work of the Senate. If we cannot say what the committee should or should not do, or what will be the consequences of the report of the committee, then it is useless. The committee is not independent of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It is the servant of the Senate, and it has terms of reference.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If a Senate committee cannot hear from the Senate itself, then procedures are completely reversed. I hope that the Leader of the Government will not persist in his argument. I think he made an error in tactics in rising at this stage.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have made the point, but it did not sink in.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour, may I speak to the point of order?

The Hon. the Speaker: I hope I will have a chance to conclude the point of order.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The reason I rise now, as I stated earlier, is that I would not, under any circumstances, rise after Your Honour has made a ruling. I rise now merely to make a small contribution to the ruling Your Honour may make.

Honourable senators, the point of order, as I understand it, is that with respect to the motion before us I may not refer to what the committee might do. The motion before us is that the house adjourn to January 10. All I am saying is that there are alternatives to that proposition before the Senate, and surely one of them is responsible action by the committee.

Your Honour, I cannot see any possible way in which it can be suggested that because there is a motion to adjourn until January 10 any honourable senator is prescribed from discussing the reference to the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Throughout my life I have had a very deep concern for what we call freedom of speech. However, the authorities on this matter are very clear. Once a matter has been referred to a committee, all the authorities say that at the very least it is improper, inappropriate, or dangerous to deal with the way in which the members of the committee organize their work.

I would hope that the honourable Senator Grosart will not go too far in this matter. As I have said, I am all in favour of giving as much freedom of speech as possible. Having said that, however, I must also add that we are dealing here with some hypertechnical aspects of a report that will reach us at some time. I must also remind honourable senators that this committee will, one day or another, report to the Senate, and then honourable senators will have an opportunity to deal with and discuss the report of the committee.

Since Christmas is not very far away, perhaps I can appeal to all honourable senators to be as careful as possible, although it need not prevent our having as good a debate as we had earlier today, to take into consideration the practice of the Senate, and all the authorities who have dealt with this matter.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: These men of good will.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour, I need hardly say that I wholeheartedly accept your ruling. As I continue by suggesting the action I think the Senate should be taking in what I have called this dilemma, I hope that any honourable senators present who happen to be members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will close their ears, or at least assume that I am not speaking to them as members of the committee, but in their other capacity of senators sitting in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You do not have to make that distinction as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Are you deaf?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour has ruled, and if I should by a slip of the tongue happen to refer to the fact that this matter has been referred to the committee, I hope Your Honour will immediately call me to order. I shall do my best to address my remarks to the Senate as a whole. As I say, some of the suggestions I make might be ones that could be carried out in the committee, but that is purely incidental.

• (2030)

Honourable senators, it seems to me that we must consider what has caused this situation. The public of Canada, the press of Canada to quite an extent, and many of the outstanding experts in the tax field, including the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Retail Merchants Association representing small business, and many others, are asking that the Senate stand on this issue. This indicates very clearly that we face this kind of dilemma, and it is worth while considering its nature.

Obviously, the nature of the dilemma derives from the function of the Senate within the Constitution. If one were to construct a model of the kind of issue which might come before the Senate and on which the Senate should be expected to take a stand, it would be a model with characteristics close to those of this bill. There are many arguments as to the functions of the Senate, as to the rights of the Senate, as to the circumstances in which the Senate should reject or amend a bill coming from the Commons, and there are arguments about money bills, tax bills, and so on. However, if we were to construct a model of the kind of bill on which the Senate should take a stand, it would probably have some of the following characteristics.

In the first place, it would be a bill which has come to us from an "unfree" House of Commons. I do not wish to exaggerate the use of that adjective "unfree", but merely to say that this is not a bill which has come to us in the ordinary sense, from a free vote in the House of Commons. It has come to us under exceptional circumstances, where closure has been imposed twice, where a large number of amendments made by the Government to the bill were not considered by the Commons. I suggest that this is not the normal kind of bill that comes before us.

Secondly, it would be a bill to which we would have abundant evidence that at least five of the provincial governments in Canada are opposed. I need hardly remind honourable senators that, in the tradition of the Senate, one of our main functions—because we are the second chamber in the federal Parliament—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: The upper chamber.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator O'Leary uses the phrase "upper chamber." I prefer to use the words "second chamber."

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: We will not argue about it now.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Very well, but the trend around the world in constitutional discussions is to speak of the "second chamber" rather than the "upper chamber"—and I am not so sure that we are "upper". It is possible that Senator Choquette, who is our leading punster, might say that we are on our uppers.

Surely this provincial opposition is one of the characteristics of the kind of bill on which the Senate should take a stand.

This is also a bill on which there is considerable evidence of widespread public resistance. The press reflects it. I am not saying that the press is an exact mirror of public opinion, but to some extent it mirrors public opinion. As I said earlier, those who are most informed in the area covered by this bill are opposed to its passage in its present form without amendment and before the deadline.

I would suggest to honourable senators that nobody could devise for me a more complete model of the kind of bill on which the Senate should be expected to take a stand against.

Perhaps the most important consideration before us is that we are dealing with a bill in respect of which we have recommendations from 30 of our own members that the bill is defective. In deference to His Honour's ruling, I shall not give the origin of the recommendations, but 30 of our own members say that this bill is defective. Some 30 senators have reported to this house, first of all in the report on the White Paper, that there are essential amendments which should be made. I have them here and I could go through the list, but I hope the house will accept my statement that many of those recommendations put to us with respect to the principle of the bill by 30 senators are not incorporated in this bill. Senator Flynn, too, has indicated that many times.

Secondly, we have three reports before us from 30 senators. In one of those reports there is a statement listing nine items and characterizing those nine items as "top priority" amendments that must be made.

That is the recommendation we had, and when that recommendation came before us my impression was that it had the complete approbation of the Senate. I may be wrong, but I do remember the eulogies that were paid to the committee and to its chairman, and I agreed with them all.

We are faced, and will be faced in the next few days, honourable senators, with a dilemma in that we shall either have to repudiate those 30 senators or we shall have to say that we agree with them and are prepared to communicate to the Commons what we have been advised is the proper attitude of this Senate to take with respect to this bill. Will we do it? I hope so. I would like to see a solution to this dilemma because I do not want to see this impasse harm this institution.

This is not a dilemma for the Government; it is not a dilemma for the House of Commons; it is a dilemma for us. The circumstances in which this dilemma has been created are unfortunate. I have said before that we are to some extent to blame. Can it not be resolved? Can we come out of this situation with our heads up? Can we in the early days of the new year face those who will be telephoning us and speaking to us personally, "What did you do with that bill?" The press and the radio have asked, "Will the senators take a stand?" I want to be able to say, "Yes, we took a stand." The word, and I think it is a parliamentary word, "guts" has been used. It was used in a formal document on this question the other day. We are going to be asked, "Did you have the guts to stand up?" I want to say yes, and I believe it is possible to do so without any embarrassment whatsoever to the Government, and without any embarrassment to the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, there are three possible alternatives open to us, and in indicating them I shall conclude my remarks. The first, of course, is that we amend the bill; that we say that the recommendations that we have that the bill be amended make sense, and send the bill back to the House of Commons and say, "We approve the bill with the following amendments." The House of Commons will then deal with it in their wisdom. They will at least have heard from the Senate and the Senate will have communicated to them something of the truth and the sense and the sentiment of this house.

The second alternative is that the Minister of Finance be asked to come before those 30 senators—and he might come because he is a courteous generous man, who I am quite sure does not wish to see this house placed in this dilemma. Certainly if the minister did come before us again we would welcome him; we would welcome him because of the courtesy, consideration, and co-operation he showed when he was before us previously. I have not used the word "commitment" in putting forward my second alternative. But perhaps the minister might say to us, "Well we recognize your dilemma. We did not want to force you into a corner. It is one of those things that happens in the course of legislation. We thought this deadline was important and we had good reasons for thinking it was important, but perhaps it is not quite that important. Perhaps we can work the thing out another way. Perhaps we can give you a little more time. Perhaps we can listen to those others, the experts and the provinces, who are saying that it would be a mistake to enact this bill exactly on January 1." Perhaps the minister might say, "There are problems, computers are set up, notices are ready, and there are other problems. But, all right, we will resolve those problems and give you a little more time." That, honourable senators, is my suggested second alternative.

My third suggestion—and here I am speaking personally and I cannot say that I am sure it would resolve the problem, but it is my own small personal contribution to a possible resolution—is that it might be possible for the minister to come before us again saying, "I recognize your dilemma; I recognize your problem. I am prepared to go a little farther than I went when I was before you previously. I am prepared to give you what, as Minister of Finance, I will call a commitment." There is no reason why the Minister of Finance cannot commit himself. Anybody can commit himself.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: He should be committed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He could then give a commitment that there would be introduced a specific bill which would take into consideration the recommendations made by these 30 senators and apparently endorsed by the house, and the other suggestions that have been made. If that were to happen, I think we might be a long way along the road to resolving this problem. A big step will have been taken along the high and difficult road to resolving this dilemma if the minister suggests to us a way out. I think it would have to be based perhaps on the use of the word "commitment" because so many have said that he made no commitment, and on the word "specific" because one of the concerns raised by the generous statement he made before those 30 senators was that there would be an amending bill in the spring. I give him great credit for that, because he went as far as he could go. But to my mind he spoiled it a little when he said, "There is always an amending bill to the taxing act." So if he were to say, "I am prepared to make a commitment to the Senate that I will introduce a specific bill", this would engender in me a spirit of co-operation and I would say, "How can I go along with you to work this thing out and to do what we can to resolve the dilemma of the Senate?"

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I crave your tolerance for my making a two-minute footnote to what has been so ably said by my deskmate, Senator Grosart. I want to speak a word to the press. I am a reporter. I have been a part-owner of a newspaper; I have been president of a newspaper, and a publisher. But I remain and I am still a reporter, and as a reporter, and as president of my newspaper, I consider that editorial comments should be restricted to the editorial page. But in recent weeks I have been reading and listening every morning to young illiterate political reporters telling the country on a national hookup what the Senate was supposed to do about this particular bill. They said, "This bill is going to the Senate and despite some uneasy murmurs it is going to pass. Their opposition will end in a whimper." And this, mind you, is understandable to a certain extent.

I have heard the Leader of the Government in this house; I have heard representative Canadians speak of members of Parliament and senators, but, honourable senators, we are all members of Parliament. There are members of the House of Commons and there are senators, and that is it. The Senate is an integral part of the Parliament of Canada, and we are too inclined to forget it.

• (2050)

It has been a great day for the Senate because we have declared our independence of the House of Commons, our independence of the executive in our right and duty to consider legislation on its own merits as it comes before us.

It has been a great day for the Senate because we have heard speeches such as the one Senator Manning delivered, which I would like to hear delivered occasionally in the other place. I have been in this chamber for ten years and have listened to honourable senators who have greater knowledge and experience in public life than they happen to have in the House of Commons. That is too bad. But we are not establishing our position. Today we have united by submitting this bill to a committee of this house with instructions to report back to the Senate. I do not agree with the Leader of the Government when he says the committee should not be given directions. I was once a chairman of a royal commission. Every royal commission and committee has terms of reference as to what they can do and cannot do.

However, we have agreed to refer this bill to a committee. When we come to discuss the bill in committee I am sure we will give it our best attention. We have had our lovers' quarrels in this debate, but no scars have been left. Despite our differences, every one of us has a common affection for Canada and Canadians. We will never surrender that because this is Canada, and this is our common country, this is our common hope, and this is our common future. I am sure I share this feeling with members on both sides of the house.

Honourable senators, reaffirming my faith in the spirit of this house and in the position of this house, I would like to say that Senator Flynn is leaving in a day or two for France to attend the marriage of his daughter. I am sure you will join me in wishing him glad grace and joy.

I am sure I speak for everyone on this side of the house when I wish you all a happy Christmas, joy and glad grace, and I hope you return with a fuller understanding of the spirit of Parliament.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the honourable Senator Macdonald:

> That should the Bill C-259, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act", be again before the Senate before 10th January, 1972, it be not considered before that date.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since there is some uncertainty, those in favour of honourable Senator Flynn's motion will please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are not in favour of Senator Flynn's motion will please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: They have won by a "no".

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, the intention is that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will sit at ten o'clock on Monday morning and the house, of course, will meet at two o'clock. I suspect there will merely be a motion at that time, but I thought I should indicate that the committee will meet at ten o'clock, and notices will be sent out accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: I point out that we still have four other items on the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I ask that the remaining items on the Orders of the Day stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Items 2, 3, 4 and 5 stand.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, may I indicate that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that was scheduled for 9.30 on Monday morning has been cancelled in deference to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before a motion to adjourn is put, I wonder if I might suggest to the Leader of the Government that the time of the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be changed to eleven o'clock, because of plane schedules? Would this in any way impede the work of the committee?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I understand that notices of that meeting are already out and I am afraid it is too late to change the time, although I would like to accommodate my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Not learned?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, both honourable and learned.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Senator Martin, that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next, December 20, 1971, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to object. I do not feel this motion needs to be put at all because under the Rules we are to meet then unless a special order is given.

I would inquire of the Leader of the Government or the deputy Leader why the Senate is meeting if the only business for honourable senators is consideration of the bill in committee.

I would like to thank my good friend, Senator O'Leary, for his kind remarks. I will not be here on Monday, and I extend to everyone my best wishes. Thank you for your support, at least on some occasions.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I would like to reply to the Leader of the Opposition by saying that Rule 13 provides that when the Senate adjourns on Friday it stands adjourned until the following Monday. However, today happens to be Saturday, and that is why I made the motion. The Senate is meeting on Monday to be available in the event of a report from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Also, there are other items on the Orders of the Day to dispose of. When that business is completed, and if there is no other business, the Senate will adjourn to the call of the bell.

Hon. Paul Martin: Before we adjourn, I should like to say to the Leader of the Opposition that no one will miss him more than I. I extend my best wishes to him and his wife and to the new member of his family.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to inform you that I have just received word that I have become a grandfather for the first time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 20, 1971, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as you are all aware, Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, is now before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It was agreed that we would not interfere with the sitting of that committee, which will resume very shortly to continue its important work. Incidentally, honourable senators who are not members of that committee have the right to attend and take part in its proceedings.

I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure until the call of the bell at approximately 5.30 p.m. However, I do not wish to be held to that hour.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It could be sooner.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Following the sitting of the committee, we shall proceed with the work of this house. The committee will meet at 2.30 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The sitting was resumed at 6.10 p.m.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am about to move that we adjourn until tomorrow. The standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce met this afternoon and has prepared a report. That report is now being edited, and it is the intention of the chairman to present it to the house tomorrow.

My intention was to adjourn the house now until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon at which time we would proceed with the consideration of the report. There are also some other income tax bills at present under consideration in the House of Commons which will be coming to us. These, I am sure, will not take long in either place. Some honourable senators have indicated to me that they would prefer to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, and I have no objection to this. We would then proceed to consideration of the report, and when discussion has been completed we would proceed with third reading. At that point it might be necessary to ask that the house adjourn for a while during pleasure. As honourable senators know, especially anyone who has occupied the position I do in the Senate, it is sometimes difficult to arrange a satisfactory timetable at this stage of a session. However, in trying to meet the wishes of those who have spoken to me, I move, with leave, that we adjourn now until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would indicate to us what other legislation is likely to be before us, before we discharge our responsibilities this week?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The only other legislation which could reach us, before the Christmas adjournment, would be three fiscal bills which are being considered now in the other place. They are small tax relief bills.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: A sort of budget.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: These would have the effect of a mini budget. I do not think there will be much discussion on them. It is expected that we will get the first one of these three bills tomorrow. With this in mind, I would hope that we would finish the business of this house sometime on Wednesday or, at the latest, on Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If we could get these bills quicker it would enable us to arrange in a satisfactory way the period of adjournment, which I know senators are interested in. I can say no more than that, but I have in mind the same interests.

Hon. Mr. Everett: May I address a question to the Leader of the Government? Speaking about the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, he used the word "edit." He said that the report was being edited.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should have said "drafted." Thank you for bringing that to my attention. As a matter of fact, this just goes to show that a young man like me can be fatigued and in a moment of fatigue can say what obviously is not the situation. The report is not being drafted either. That has already been done. The report is simply being put into shape so that it can be presented by the chairman.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I wonder if the Leader of the Government could make a little clearer his distinction between drafting and editing. What exactly is the position as he sees it at the moment?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, perhaps it would be helpful if I, as Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, were to point out that the committee met this afternoon and considered its report and agreed on the wording of the report. There has not yet been an opportunity to have it put into typewritten form. However, the report will be available when we meet tomorrow and at that time it will be presented to the Senate for consideration.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of a Report entitled "Concentration in the Manufacturing Industries of Canada", published under the authority of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, together with copies of the Minister's statement and a press release relating thereto.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant, as follows:

Your committee, however, considers it urgent that the following observations be made.

As a result of a reference to your committee by the Senate on September 14, 1971, your committee considered the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation and the bill based thereon, being Bill C-259, which Bill received first reading in the House of Commons in June. The present Bill C-259, although amended in part, is in substance the same bill which received first reading in June in the House of Commons.

As this committee's first preliminary report states: "Your committee has heard a number of representations and has received a number of written submissions on the proposed legislation." As a result of its deliberations and studies your committee submitted to the Senate its First Preliminary Report on November 4, 1971, its Second Preliminary Report on November 30, 1971, and its Third and Final Report on December 13, 1971.

These reports include a series of recommendations for suggested amendments to Bill C-259. In approving this bill today this committee reiterates with the greatest possible emphasis that the recommendations for changes in the bill as contained in these reports are of continuing importance and relevance.

Your committee further recommends to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue the following:

(1) That a method be found to deal with the subject-matter of the distribution of corporate undistributed income accrued subsequent to December 31, 1971, in a manner similar to the method proposed in Bill C-259 for dealing with corporate undistributed income accrued prior to January 1, 1972; and

(2) That the Minister of National Revenue give binding advance rulings on a written set of facts as to:

(a) The exercise of ministerial discretion under the Income Tax Act.

(b) As to whether a receipt would be an income receipt or a capital receipt under the Income Tax Act.

Your committee, nonetheless, is of the view that the content and context of the bill urgently calls for a series of amendments which will clarify and simplify certain sections thereof and excise others.

In view of the statements made by the Minister of Finance before your committee on December 13 and this day, your committee confidently expects that the Government will give meaningful consideration to the recommendations of your committee in respect of Bill C-259 in amending legislation to be presented to the House of Commons as soon as possible in 1972.

It is therefore expected that the Government will give intensive and meaningful attention to the views expressed herein having regard to the important role that the Senate of Canada has played and is playing in the government of this country as one of its two constituent parliamentary chambers.

• (1110)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, perhaps it would be appropriate for me, as acting chairman, to say a few words in respect of the work done by the committee. I have been honoured to have been selected as acting chairman by the members of the committee. I hasten to assure the Senate that I was neither expecting to be able to fill Senator Hayden's shoes in this respect, nor could I.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, might I interrupt Senator Connolly, as I am a little confused about our procedure at the moment. I understood Your Honour to ask when this bill would be read the third time. Am I wrong in assuming that what is before the Senate now is the report of the committee, not the third reading of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You are right.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is there a motion, then?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am in the hands of the Senate, but normally when a committee has examined a bill and reports the same without amendment, His Honour the Speaker puts the question, "When shall the bill be read the third time?" On other occasions, when there is an amendment, there can be a debate on the report.

If honourable senators prefer to have the debate on the presentation of the report rather than on third reading, that can be done. I do not think that proceeding in either direction would make much difference.

If the debate takes place on the presentation of the report, it is just as effective as it would be on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The only point I was concerned about is whether, under the rules, it would be then in order for other senators to speak, should they wish to make comments on the report.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly they may.

The Hon. the Speaker: The point of order raised is a serious one. I must remind honourable senators that, for the balance of the present session, Rules 44, 45 and 78—and Rule 78 is in fact the rule which governs the present case—have been suspended.

The general rule is that when a committee reports a bill without amendment, we proceed immediately, and without delay, to third reading. That has happened on many occasions. There was a similar case a few weeks ago when Senator Hayden reported a bill without amendment and asked leave to make a statement. I immediately asked honourable senators if they agreed to this, and I said that any other honourable senator who wished to express his views would have the right to do so.

This procedure was agreed to. If honourable senators wish, we could proceed on the same basis now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, what I was saying, in effect, before we discussed the point of order, was that I wish Senator Hayden had been here yesterday to deal with the problems that presented themselves to the committee.

First of all, in the morning we had almost a two-hour discussion with the Minister of Finance. With him he had Mr. Cohen, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Finance, and Mr. Thorson, Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Justice. I think it is within reason to say that the evidence given by Mr. Benson was very helpful and impressive. It was also reassuring to the committee. Certainly, Mr. Benson displayed a very detailed knowledge of the bill—perhaps more than one normally finds with a minister. Indeed, he seemed to talk with as full a mind on details of the bill as any expert could be expected to speak. The minister was very high in his commendation of the work which the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce had performed in its three-month study of this legislation. That study actually extended from September until December 13, after which the committee made its final report on the reference made by the Senate to the committee of the summary of the tax legislation, to which was appended for the purpose of the study of the voluminous bill.

There were numerous statements by members of the committee as to the value of the presentation made yesterday by the minister. Senator O'Leary and others expressed pleasure at the kind of forthright talk the minister gave in respect of matters that were of genuine concern, and properly so, to members of the committee I think it also reasonable to say that the statements and undertakings given by the minister before our committee yesterday were clearer and more meaningful than those that had been given by him when he appeared before the same committee on December 13, before we actually had the bill before us for consideration. At that time Senator Hayden was quite satisfied with the undertakings that had been given by the minister, but there was difficulty and there were misgivings expressed both here in the chamber and privately by honourable senators as to whether or not the assurances that had been given by the minister on that occasion had gone far enough.

Some senators had been satisfied with the assurances given on December 13, but for me and for the majority of the committee, the further assurances given yesterday certainly reassured, if reassurance was required, the views of senators in respect of the commitments the minister had given along similar lines on December 13.

Yesterday some members of the committee proposed a series of amendments, some of which were debated at length. In respect of those proposals the main concern of the committee yesterday seemed to be that there should be nothing done that would in any way negative any of the official views expressed by the committee in its reports and in its formal documents as uttered and reported to the chamber by the regular chairman of the committee, Senator Hayden. I think that the conclusion reached was that this had not happened. The Minister had given assurances on the basis of recommendations made in three reports of the committee, one on November 4, the second on November 30 and the third on December 13. He was able to regard all three of those reports as being before him when he spoke to the bill. What was important to the committee was the fact that it was these recommendations which came from the committee that formed the basis on which he gave assurances to the committee. I think it is satisfactory for the Senate to know that there is an assurance that all the work that has been done this fall by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on tax reform is now globally, as a body, before the Minister of Finance. We have from the minister the promise to the committee that it will be given earnest, careful and meaningful attention, and that following the study made by him and by his officials specific legislation will be introduced in the House of Commons. The Commons, of course, has the undoubted right to introduce in the first instance tax legislation which will reflect not only the recommendations of our committee in so far as these can be reflected, but also reflect recommendations and proposals from other sources which come to the minister and to the department.

I think it is understandable that the minister should say, "I cannot promise to have this amending legislation by a specific date." He made it clear that it will take a considerable time to investigate the full implications of the proposals that came from the Senate committee alone. Our own consideration of this tax legislation demonstrates that it takes a very long time to prepare proposals and to draft specific changes in the legislation knowing what the consequences will be upon other sections of the legislation and—and this is something the Senate committee cannot judge—the consequences which it might have in respect of the revenue.

So, honourable senators, here in a tax bill you have an undertaking from a minister of finance, without in any way infringing upon his responsibilities not to disclose his tax intentions ahead of time until he gives them to the House of Commons, that he will give consideration to the serious and thoughtful proposals worked out by a committee of this house, very ably assisted by a highly competent and technical staff.

I have little more to say. I think it fair to comment that the views which were adopted finally by the committee in the report before the Senate today are the views which Senator Hayden held before he left here, on the basis of the work he had done and the undertakings he heard the minister give on December 13. I have no hesitation, therefore, in recommending this report to the chamber for adoption.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in reply to the remarks made by the Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I would say first that I do not feel a better case could have been made for the action taken by the committee. Senator Connolly expressed regret that Senator Hayden was not in committee yesterday, but I would point out that he himself discharged the very important function of Acting Chairman on that occasion in fairness, with great efficiency, and above all else, in good humour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would ask Senator Grosart to inform my boss about that.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If using the word "boss" refers to Senator Hayden, I am sure he will get the message not only from myself, but from a number of senators who were at the meeting yesterday, when he returns to this place, if not before.

Honourable senators, I shall deal only with the problems that arise as a result of the failure of the committee to amend the bill in the light of certain essential deficiencies which were reported over and over again to this chamber by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I suggest that no matter how many good reasons honourable senators may use to justify the action taken by the committee, as well as the action we will take shortly in approving this report and passing the bill on third reading without amendment, we shall still be doing a great disservice to the country, the House of Commons and the Senate. I can summarize the feelings of honourable senators who voted against amending the bill by saying that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has done excellent work over a long period of time in considering the summary of the bill and, to some extent, the bill itself, and it has achieved a measure of success in improving the bill. I do not deny for a moment that it is a better bill than it would have been without the incorporation of many amendments which were suggested by this committee. I suggest, however, that the issue now before us, if there is an issue, is not the amendments which have been made as a result of the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce; it is those which have not been made and which, I gather, it is not the disposition of the Senate to communicate to the House of Commons.

• (1130)

The second good reason—and I have no hesitation in calling it a good reason—for some honourable senators feeling that they can support this action is that the minister has given commitments. I do not think "commitments" is too strong a word. We questioned the minister yesterday and asked if he would accept that word. My recollection is that he did. His commitment was, as I understood it, that the amendments which the committee rejected, as it did, will be taken into consideration by him. I think it is fair to say he indicated that a substantial part of those amendments will be incorporated in an amending bill to come to us in the spring.

The minister went so far as to say that it would be a specific bill and, having heard his earlier commitment one week ago and that which he gave yesterday, I have to agree that we have made considerable progress in ensuring that these amendments will have careful consideration and some substantial degree of implementation.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is my impression.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Yes, but what assurance have we that we will be dealing with the same minister next year?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am now dealing with the "good" reasons; as I go along, I may possibly think of some of the bad. I say that we have made progress. I wish to be fair. I do not wish to take the position that the work of the committee over these months has been thrown away. It has not. The committee has done a good job and I regret that we are not now allowing that committee's work to be communicated fully to the public of Canada and, particularly, to the House of Commons.

Most of the amendments which were proposed yesterday to the committee were based on a certain document. I believe it is now agreed that that document was drafted by the staff of the committee, and is the document referred to in the final report of the committee, which came to this house on December 13, from which I read this paragraph:

> With the approval of the committee, a list of top priority items among the recommendations in our two reports was submitted to the minister, together with amendments which in the view of our expert advisers and our committee would incorporate the substance of the top priority recommendations contained in your committee's reports.

That is, this committee. I suggest it is at least regrettable that the committee rejected—as of yesterday; I am not saying forever—the proposition that those amendments, already drafted and incorporating what the committee in its report to this house described as top priorities, should be made by the Senate. It is regrettable that they were not incorporated.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): They were alluded to, but not incorporated.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Did the honourable senator say they were alluded to but not incorporated?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think Senator Grosart said that the amendments he is discussing were incorporated in the third report. They were alluded to in the third report. I should say to the honourable senator that I was a member of that committee, and I think I attended every minute of every meeting. I have not seen the draft amendments to which allusion is made in the report. The Honourable Mr. Phillips, the committee's counsel, was with us yesterday—and I take the opportunity of saying how grateful we are that he took the time to come back—and he had never seen them either. It is purely a matter of semantics. I say they were not incorporated in the report, but were alluded to. I never saw them before.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was coming to that point. If I said they were incorporated in the report, it is not what I had intended to say. I believe Hansard will indicate that I did not say that. I said it was unfortunate and regrettable that they were not incorporated in this report with which we are now dealing.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: When you say "this report", do you refer to the third report?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator Connolly has said it is a matter of semantics. Perhaps it is. I repeat, I regret—and this is my objection to the report as it stands before us—that the amendments made, to which I have referred, were not incorporated in the report with which we are now dealing. I regret that the committee has not come back to us and said, "We made amendments, we drafted them, we sent them to the minister, and we now recommend that this chamber send those amendments to the House of Commons".

I say that because—and I have tried to consider my responsibility in relation to the Senate as a whole—I believe that the minimum responsibility, the minimum duty, of the Senate in its legislative capacity when dealing with a bill from the House of Commons is to make whatever amendments it believes will improve the bill.

There is ample evidence that the committee believes these amendments will improve the bill. There is ample evidence that the committee regards the bill in its present form as deficient. It was argued yesterday that we should not recommend amendment now, and I voiced my objection. We have communicated with the minister. There is evidence of that. There is a statement in our third report to the effect that the specific amendments, which were rejected yesterday, have been communicated to the minister.

In my view, honourable senators, we fail in our bounden duty if we do not communicate those amendments to the House of Commons. It is not part of the chain of responsibility that we should communicate with the minister. I am not objecting to communicating with the minister. We are all aware that 200 amendments were made while the bill was proceeding through the House of Commons. In the circumstances, it made very good sense to go to the minister and say, "This bill is before the House of Commons. You are making all sorts of amendments, anyway. We suggest a few more."

I am not objecting to that. My objection is that we are not now going to communicate that to the other place. Surely it is our bounden duty, if we sincerely believe this bill to be deficient, to so inform the other place. I object to this chamber sending a bill which we know to be deficient back without that decision on the part of our committee being conveyed, and, as well, the conviction I believe all honourable senators have that this bill in its present form is in fact deficient.

Many arguments have been put forward as to why that might not be the wise course for this chamber to take. The main argument, of course, is that the Government has said there is a deadline. They have given "good" reasons in that respect. I do not agree with all of them, but there are good arguable reasons why the Government feels this bill must be passed by midnight, December 31. But, surely, honourable senators, that is not our business. Presumably, we will dispose of this bill today by giving it third reading. I do not understand why, having the conviction that these amendments should be made, we are not sending it back to the other place with those amendments in order that the Commons can decide. They have sufficient time between now and the deadline to decide what they will do with the amendments. I simply do not understand why this chamber is not sending the bill back with those amendments, and doing what I consider its bounden duty in the circumstances. The House of Commons would then be properly apprised of the good work that has been done.

The committee has done good work. We have praised it over and over again in this chamber, and we are now saying that we will not communicate that good work to whom we have a responsibility to communicate it. That is one of the serious objections I have to our procedure with respect to this bill.

Senator Connolly mentioned some of the problems—some of them humorous, in my opinion—that arose in connection with what I refer to as the draft which is referred to in the third report of the committee. He has said today, as he said yesterday, that he has never seen the draft and the committee has never seen the draft. Counsel for the committee also said he has never seen it. I am not going into any detail as to what I feel happened, but I am told on good authority that it was distributed after a meeting. However, that is not my point.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: The committee clerk informs me that it was never distributed. I made a special point of inquiring.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I merely say I was told it was.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Who told you?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Someone left it on my desk. That is not the point, as I say. The point is that this draft, to give effect to our top priority items, was not even communicated to members of the committee—if, in fact, that is the case. The point is, we believe that these amendments should be made, and yet I am told they were not even communicated to the members of our own committee, let alone to the public or the House of Commons.

I object to our passing this bill without amendment for several reasons which I shall indicate briefly. I have discussed them before, but I want them on the record at this time.

The first reason, of course, is that the bill is deficient. The evidence contained in our four reports, going back to the White Paper, is justification for that statement. Many amendments which were suggested as a result of our study of the White Paper and Bill C-259 are still not incorporated in this bill. We are aware of the top priority items as suggested by our committee, and these are not incorporated in the bill.

I object to the passage of this bill because there is an abundance of evidence that its passage in its present form is widely opposed across the country. There is evidence from the press, albeit not conclusive evidence but certainly important enough to give us cause for pause at this time. There is the documentary evidence that five provincial governments are opposed to passage of this bill in its present form at this time, and those five provincial governments represent 75 per cent of the population of Canada.

There is an abundance of evidence that those who are most aware of the problems of taxation are opposed to passage of this bill at this time. The committee has heard evidence from the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Retail Merchants Association, and so forth. We did not hear only from people who had great financial interests. We also have evidence that small businesses and individuals are opposed to the bill. In my opinion, we seem to be brushing all of this evidence aside.

We are told that we must not delay passage of this bill. I merely say this, honourable senators: If there is an historic function of the second chamber, it is to delay when delay is in the public interest. To me there is no validity whatsoever in any suggestion that a second chamber should not delay legislation if it is, in its view, wise to do so.

My third reason for objecting to passage of this bill is the matter of uncertainty. I realize it has been argued both ways—whether the uncertainty will be greater with this bill or without it. There are those who say this bill will make the uncertainty greater, and there are those who say it would alleviate some of the uncertainty. To me, they cancel each other out.

I recall the information carried to this chamber by Senator Lang who said that he had met a legal colleague who urged him to do what he could to get this bill passed as soon as possible because his firm had found over 100 loopholes in it, and they were anxious to put them into effect.

I mention that—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is not very convincing.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I mention that merely because it indicates it is quite possible this uncertainty will impose a heavy burden on individual taxpayers—those taxpayers who are not in a position to engage the services of the type of experts they require in order to comply with the act and escape the heavy penalties that are provided for tax avoidance; not merely tax evasion, I point out.

My fourth reason is that this bill comes to us—and here again I refer to the historic responsibilities of the second chamber—not fully considered by the other place. I do not intend to labour that point, except to say that probably two-thirds of the 200 amendments that were introduced in the other place were not discussed because the Government resorted to closure on two occasions to end free discussion on this bill.

I am sure there will be general agreement among honourable senators that if there was no compulsion of time in respect to this bill we would most certainly send it back with amendments. I do not believe there is any doubt about that. I am quite confident that the Senate would have amended this bill in keeping with its long history of improving, by amendment, bills of this nature sent us by the other place.

It has been said that any change in the bill by way of amendment would upset the Government's timetable. I suggest that that is an exaggeration of the situation. There were amendments recommended by this committee at various times which could have been incorporated in the bill, but which were not incorporated. To give just one example, there was the recommendation that no rules promulgated under this bill be retroactive in effect. That was a recommendation of this committee. To have carried that recommendation through, even as a token recommendation, would not have been subject to the argument that we have been given, that you cannot change this bill one iota without upsetting the whole bill. Another, of course, is the recommendation that fellowships and bursaries be exempt from certain provisions of the bill.

I do not know whether honourable senators noticed that the amendments put forward yesterday from one particular viewpoint—if you like, from one particular political viewpoint—were restricted to the Senate's own amendments. We on this side did not put forward amendments that had been moved by our political colleagues in the other place. As far as I am concerned, my own reason for that was to try to do what I could to resolve what I call the dilemma facing the Senate in a non-partisan way.

I have carefully considered whether it was or was not in the interests of the Senate that I should say this. I say now, with regret, I have reached the conclusion that if we pass this bill without amendment it will be a sad day for the Senate. I say that because, no matter how sure any honourable senators may be that the action now suggested to us can be justified by some of the reasons I have given and by others, that is not the impression that is going out across the country.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us correct it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator Martin says, "Let us correct it." That is what some of us have been trying to do for days.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I can see no other way to correct it than for the Senate to stand at this time and say, "We are sending these amendments back to the other place." I have looked at this problem from both sides. I hoped to be able to convince myself that we could correct it, as the honourable Leader of the Government says, in some other way, but I have to say to him that in the long history of confrontations in political institutions it is always what an institution does that goes abroad and into the history books, not what its proponents say they meant to do; not the justification they may have, but what they do. The word I hear on the radio and television and in telephone calls, and read in the press and letters, is that this is the time when the Senate should stand on its own amendments regardless of the consequences, regardless of the problems that that stand might create. In the interests of the Senate, we should have stood.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What about the interests of the country though?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I have discussed the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not very much.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps Senator Langlois is referring—and I had hoped to avoid this—to the suggestion that it is absolutely necessary to pass this bill before the deadline in order that a very large sector of the population, probably close to five million, may receive the benefits. Proposals have been made to the Government as to how that could be achieved. There is no question whatsoever that it could have been done. It was suggested in the other place that the bill could be split. That is only one suggestion.

If there was anybody on the Government side who was greatly concerned about this there were many ways in which they could have introduced separate bills much earlier in the session, or at any time, and those bills would have been quickly passed by the other place and this house. I say that the argument that amending this bill now is of detriment to the public interest is not a legitimate one. I do not accept that argument. If I did I would have been for third reading a week ago. I resent the suggestion that the position I am taking is one that is contrary to the public interest. My record in that respect is well enough known that I do not need to elaborate further.

We often complain here about the press. We hear over and over again that the Senate is a wonderful institution but nobody knows about the great things it is doing. I do not know whether I have ever made that complaint, but I do know that in future I will never make it anywhere. If we wanted good public relations, honourable senators, here was our chance and we have missed it.

We also complain at times about legislation coming to us from the other place at the last minute before recesses, before holidays, before prorogation, even shortly before dissolution, without adequate time for us to consider it. I think I have made my last complaint on that score, because surely in the action we are taking here today we are encouraging the Government and the other place to do it again and again, because they know we will knuckle under.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I have no intention at all of indulging in those comfortable phrases of mutual praise just exchanged between Senator Connolly and my distinguished deskmate (Hon. Mr. Grosart). In fact, I would be glad to take leave of this bill, because I am sick and tired of hearing of the great work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, when all that has happened is that the Senate Committee has devoured its own children and run away from its own amendments.

Furthermore, there is no question but that this bill comes to us through a form of closure. My friend the Leader of the Government shakes his head. In this house and in the committee he assured us again and again that the Senate would have ample time, all the time we needed, to examine and try to improve this bill. Honourable senators, when yesterday in my feeble way I tried to improve the bill by moving an amendment to it, an amendment in principle along the lines of an amendment sent here in the first place by Senator Hayden's committee—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Recommendations.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: A recommendation, and I put it in the form of an amendment. What happened? They rose in a body: "No, you can't do that. You can't move an amendment here." As a matter of fact, they told us, in effect, "You can move no amendments to this bill. You are here to examine it."

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As acting chairman of the committee yesterday, I think I have to object to that statement, because Senator O'Leary did move his amendment.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: He was coaxed to do it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You people said, "You can't do that, and anyway we are going to vote it down", which you did by an ample majority.

• (1200)

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the amendment was put.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: But then you voted it down. We were told, as a matter of fact, that we could not amend the bill at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised by Senator Connolly and I suggest that we hear the point; and of course honourable Senator O'Leary will follow.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would like to say to you—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I want to say that on the point you referred to, I do not recall your rising to make any amendment.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I did, and I said it in a voice which could be heard across the room. My good friend Senator Cook heard it clearly and he said something, and if the chairman did not hear me he was not doing his job.

Hon. Mr. Cook: I said that—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You said no, that it could not be moved at all, because you would vote amendments down—and you did vote them down. The one time we met to improve the bill, you said no, we could not do that.

Hon. Mr. Cook: No.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Well, now, that was no, and we all know what you said, and we all know the way you voted.

Hon. Mr. Cook: I voted against it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You were voting unanimously and you were against our making an amendment to the bill. Am I not right?

Hon. Mr. Cook: Read it; read what I said.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am not going to read it now. I am sick and tired of this bill. I had three telephone calls this morning, one from Halifax and two from Montreal. What was the burden of the message? It was, "The Senate has let us down again; the Senate has let Canada down." And I said, "My friends, we, the Conservative Opposition, did not let you down; a servile majority in the Senate let you down." It is becoming more servile every day—when we see the character of the appointments being made here.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This is a reflection on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: My good friend Senator Manning said the other day that there should be "meaningful" consideration given to this bill. When we tried to give it meaningful consideration, we were voted down. What in the name of common sense was the good of going into that committee yesterday and reading the bill. We tried to give it meaningful consideration. We tried to improve it. And we were told, no, you cannot do that because there is a deadline, meaning a form of closure, nothing else. Once you put a deadline on the consideration of a bill or document of any kind, you say that you can go "Thus far and no further."

That was all that happened yesterday. Oh, yes, we had the minister there and he was very interesting. I was agreeably surprised at the knowledge he showed of the bill. But, honourable senators, I require something more than a certificate of character from the Minister of Finance. I do not think that these promises he gave us yesterday were worth a tinker's curse. He is committed to nothing despite the fact that he went a little further than he went in the meeting before that. Even so, I say he is not committed to anything.

My late distinguished leader, Arthur Meighen, once said, "Had I a wish dear to my heart, the worst fate I could fear for it was that some day it might get into a Liberal platform."

I am suspicious of promises of Liberal cabinet ministers. I am sorry to have to say it about them, but I think that suspicion is borne out by the record. What does the report of the committee say on this bill. It says:

> The committee is of the view that the content and text of the bill urgently calls for a series of amendments which will clarify and simplify it.

All right. So we are asked for third reading here in this house, to a bill on which the committee says it urgently calls for amendment, clarification and simplification.

When we tried yesterday to give it that clarification, we were told, no, you cannot do that, you cannot send an amendment to the House of Commons. And the most vociferous man on that behalf was my friend Senator Cook. Why should I be asked to give third reading to this bill?

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are not being asked to do it now.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: The bill is up for third reading.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. We are discussing the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Oh, well.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, just to make the situation clearer—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Am I out of order, Mr. Speaker?

The Hon. the Speaker: We are discussing now the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are not out of order.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am out of order?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are not.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Do you say you are the custodian of order in this chamber? I was under the misapprehension that the bill had been presented for third reading, but everything I have said up to now I could say on third reading anyway, so I may as well say it now. The committee yesterday, after careful consideration, had able draftsmen who drafted their recommendation. This is what that the bill is urgently in need of—improvement. Well, what is the sense of saying that? We were in a committee and we were not allowed to suggest improvement. We were not allowed to move a single amendment. That is like a surgeon who is allowed to diagnose a case and then is not allowed to operate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The honourable senator should not say that. Amendments were moved, but they were defeated by vote.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: A majority was used to prevent amendments to defeat them.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is another point.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is not another point at all. You are splitting hairs, and there is too much of that sort of thing in the Senate. We were not allowed to move amendments that were meaningful. You made it clear to us that you would vote us down every time—and you did. Not a single member of the committee who sits on the other side of the house rose to support any amendment. The amendments were not allowed to go to the Commons. The country must know that this bill has been put through this house as a result of closure, the closure of a deadline. Oh, my friend can take down his notes, but a deadline is a form of closure, and nothing else. What is the use of anyone saying to me, "Senator, move your amendment," and at the same time putting a deadline on consideration of the bill because the House of Commons must go home for Christmas? There is a guillotine. This was not imposed by the Leader of the Senate but by the executive in the other house. They said, "We will send it over there and they can do what they like with it. The Leader over there, can tell them that they have all the time in the world." Well, we had no time, and we had no time in particular to improve this bill. When we sought to improve it, we were told, "You cannot do that." More than that, you voted two to one against it. Not a single member of the opposite group rose to support any amendment to improve the bill.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Was it two to one—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I cannot hear you. My understanding of the way a debate is conducted is that a senator should rise on his two feet when he wishes to take part. An interruption like yours puts the discussion on the level of a fourth-grade debate.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I have a question—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Certainly. If you get on your feet, I will give way.

Hon. Mr. McElman: The honourable senator has made a reference to how votes were conducted in committee, and that there was unanimity on one side. Was there unanimity with your group?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: No. We do not vote that way. We are not servile slaves. My friend behind me voted against.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am longing for the day when I will see a member on the other side of the house rise and vote against his party. They are as brave as lions when you meet them privately, but when they get on that side of the house and a proposition is brought before them they all rise like a pack of robots and vote for their party—and you are one of the worst.

Hon. Mr. McElman: It happened on second reading—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Now, honourable senators, all I want is to get this to the country. Although I am speaking to that side of the house, I know it is useless. No logic, no persuasion, not anything you can use, will ever convince those people that they dare vote against the party. They are in fact here as messengers of the East Block. That is what they are, and make no mistake about it. You may as well know the truth. I said it the other day, and I will say it again. I have seen this Senate operate with real leaders on that side of the house, the Government side, who did not think it was the job or the duty of members of the Senate to take their orders from the East Block. I said it the other day and I will say it again that I have seen this Senate operate with real leaders on the Government side, leaders who did not think it was their job, or the duty of the members of the Senate, to take orders from the East Block. I think of Senator Dandurand and Senator Arthur Meighen. They never did that. But I am not now blaming the leaders of the Senate. If I were a leader I would probably do the same thing if I could get a lot of servile slaves to do my bidding.

• (1210)

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is not true.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Oh, come on. That is what is happening and you know it, and, Senator Langlois, you are not the least of that crowd.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have voted against the Government on many occasions.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Well, why do you not vote on the right occasions?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Can you say the same for yourself during the time you were on this side of the house? You did not vote against the Government.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I have voted against my party before, and I will vote against my party again. That is why I came here. I did not swear any loyalty to a party when I came here. I swore loyalty to the Constitution. But you people think you swore your loyalty to a party or to a party leader who appointed you, and that is not the meaning of the Senate. I say to the country now that this bill has passed because a servile Liberal majority in committee would not permit us to do our duty.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I did not intend to take part in the debate at this point of our proceedings. It is clear that we are not on the third reading of the bill. We are properly discussing the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Senator O'Leary has allowed himself to be carried away, and I am sure that he will regret, on reflection in days to come, that he did allow himself to be carried away.

I certainly would not be worthy of the responsibility which is mine, if I allowed some of the things that Senator O'Leary said to go unnoticed and undefended. We allow a great deal, of course, in the emotions of debate but, while we may make allowance for such extravagant observations, we cannot justify failure to make defence.

Senator O'Leary has said that those who sit to the right of His Honour the Speaker are servile, that all members of the Government party are servile. He instanced as proof of this observation recent appointments to the Senate.

First of all, it is unfair to say that any member of this Senate, whether he sits on the Opposition or the Government side, is servile. I do not believe that to be the case. I believe every member of this Senate, as I said the other day, is as interested in Canada as anyone else in the country, whether he be a newspaper editor, a radio or television commentator, or a member of the political parties in the other place. And I say that without exception. I recognize at once that there is not any one who is a greater patriot than Senator O'Leary himself. But surely it is unfair to allow to go out to the country the allegations made by one of the senior senators of this house, a man who was for a long time one of the leading journalists of our country. I say there is no member of this house who deserves the appellation of servile.

Let us just take the argument that Senator O'Leary himself advanced as to recent appointments to the Senate.

Senator Manning is a recent appointment to the Senate. He is not a member of the party to which I belong. For 25 years he was leader of the Social Credit party in the Province of Alberta, and for many of those 25 years he was the Premier of the province. Who appointed him to the Senate? The present Government. The Government of this "servile group in the Senate", as Senator O'Leary has characterized it.

Sitting behind Senator Manning is Senator Lawson, who does not belong to this party. He is a respected, leading trade unionist in the province of British Columbia. Who appointed him to the Senate? This Government.

Then I see two senators who recently came into this house, Senator Bonnell and Senator Fournier (Restigouche-Gloucester). Senator Bonnell was a former minister of health in the Province of Prince Edward Island. True, he is a member of this party, but surely that does not constitute servility. He has had a distinguished career in that province. He was a member of the ministry, furthering programs of health and welfare in that province and supporting or collaborating with those charged with a similar responsibility in Canada. Sitting with him is Senator Fournier (Restigouche-Gloucester), another distinguished Canadian from the province of New Brunswick who also was a member of the provincial ministry. True, he is a member of this party, but he is a man who has rendered outstanding service and who, on that account as well as others, deserves to have been selected by the Government to sit in this chamber. Does that make him or mark him a man of servility?

I see Senator Lafond. He has served his party, yes, but in the time he has been in this house he has shown that he sees no distinction between service for a party and an honourable contribution to the country.

Senator Williams, whom I had not known until a few days ago, is one of the native population of our country. He is leader among the Indian population of Canada; a man who has fought for the Indians for many years. He is a member of this house. Is he servile because he happens to sit where he sits? Should we broadcast to the country that he is servile? Or should we emphasize and broadcast to the country that, because of the representative character of his membership in this house, he qualifies to serve here and make a contribution in our deliberations?

Senator van Roggen is a distinguished lawyer from British Columbia. He is a member of this party, but that is only one of the qualifications; it is not an exclusive qualification. He is a distinguished Canadian who has served in public enterprises with great distinction.

I look at Senator Goldenberg. Servile state? Servility in this house? Closure? Senator O'Leary has been the victim of his own eloquence and his own extreme passion on many occasions, but surely his passion has carried him too far on this occasion if he suggests that Senator Goldenberg is servile.

• (1220)

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Is not anger one of the cleanest of the passions?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Is Senator Carl Goldenberg servile? He is a professor of McGill University, and a distinguished lawyer. He has been an adviser to many provincial governments and to many royal commissions, and is an admitted authority in the field of finance, labour, and constitutional questions. Yet Senator O'Leary in the sweep of his brush included a man like Senator Goldenberg.

Honourable senators, I could go through every seat in this Senate, and the reason I take the time now is because those words will go out and join with those in some extreme editorials in picturing this Senate as a place of servility. No one can prevent any senator or anyone in this country from making that kind of argument and I certainly am not going to try. As long as I am in public life and a member of this house I am prepared to point out the weaknesses of the Senate—and this I have done—but I am also prepared to uphold its honour, its function, and its sincerity and in that way at least try to let the country know that while we disagree with some views that some sections in this country may take, that does not mean that the Senate is a rubber stamp, that it is servile, or that it is the victim of closure. Senator O'Leary said that we were applying closure. What rule is there in the Senate that authorizes the imposition of closure de facto or de jure?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It is what you did. It is not what is in the Rule Book.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let me tell Senator O'Leary that he and all the other members of his party have the right to take all the time they want to discuss this bill between now and any time in 1972, and there is no rule that can stop them from doing that.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I did not say there was a rule. I said that your meaningful actions yesterday prevented it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know what you said, and it was to the effect that there was closure, or a guillotine. We say the answer to that is that you can explain to the Canadian people why you have not taken every day between now and the end of December, on every day until next March, to try to have accepted your point of view in respect to this bill.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I will explain to the country all right, and I will take my time to do it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I said that you have the opportunity of doing it in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Your people voted down every meaningful suggestion I made. And now you are trying to save the face of those who would not consider this bill in a meaningful way.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You criticized Senator McElman a few moments ago when he took issue with you because he was in a sitting posture.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: He criticized this side of the house, and he did not have the manliness to take it back.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. When an honourable senator has the floor, any other honourable senator is always permitted to rise in his place, but when he does so I should like him to state whether he rises on a question of privilege or a point of order. I think this is the only way we can proceed in an orderly fashion, and I thank honourable senators for their co-operation in that regard.

The honourable the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know Senator O'Leary finds this difficult, as I myself find it difficult when I am under attack.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am enjoying it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But that is the nature of the dialogue and the debate process. As Harry Truman said, if you want to give, then you must be prepared to take as well.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You are doing better than you have ever done since I came to this house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If you cannot take the heat of the kitchen, then you should not be in it. It is a very well-known piece of advice given by him to others from time to time.

Honourable senators, now that we have disposed of this mythical allegation—and I notice Senator O'Leary says no before I even make my point—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Can I not even shake my head?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —that closure has been imposed here, let me say quite clearly for the country tomorrow, and let Senator O'Leary declaim it on the 17th of March or any other day, that every member of this house is free to speak on this and on all measures coming before us, and to do whatever he or she thinks appropriate.

Let us consider the charge made against such a responsible and genteel member as Senator Cook. The enfant terrible in the committee yesterday was Senator Cook. It was not a strong man like Senator Hays or a vigorous man like Senator Langlois; it was the epitome of gentility in this house, Senator Cook.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us see exactly what Senator Cook did and said in committee yesterday. I have here the transcript of the proceedings in the committee yesterday. First of all, let me give some meaning to it before I come to what Senator Cook said, and to do this I should like to read what Senator Beaubien said. Senator O'Leary will recall what Senator Beaubien said, and we all recognize Senator Beaubien as a very responsible man; a man who votes as he thinks. I hope the fact that yesterday his views happened to coincide with those of the Government will not make him servile in the judgment of Senator O'Leary. Senator Beaubien said:

> Mr. Chairman, just speaking for myself, I think what this committee would like to have is three very simple commitments. If the minister could convince us that for the good of the country this bill should pass before the end of the year, that would be a great thing for the Senate and would be a good thing for the country. After he has done that, if the minister would tell us that as soon as he found it practicable he would bring in a special bill, and that when he does prepare the special bill he will give full consideration to the recommendations of the Senate, especially with respect to our three reports, then, speaking for myself, I think that would help us tremendously in making up our minds on this bill.

And I have no doubt that it was partly with that in mind that the Minister of Finance went on to explain that he was aware of the recommendations of the committee, as he had stated a week earlier, that already some of the recommendations had been put into the bill and that others were going to be considered, and that in any event he will bring forward an amending bill. If further recommendations of the Senate committee met with his judgment and that of his colleagues they would be embodied in the amending bill. This is what Mr. Benson said inter alia:

• (1230)

> I went over this in some detail last week when I was here. The nine that I had seen in the Senate report were: Gifts, Bequests and Devises to Charities, Employees Profit Sharing Plans, Deferred Profit Sharing Plans, De Minimis Rule, which is somewhat related to the Passive Income, Tax-Exempt Non-resident Investors, Non-Resident Owned Investment Corporations, Private General Insurance Corporations and Deemed Realization on Ceasing to be a Resident of Canada. Those were the areas contained in the Final Report.

> Incidentally, I think that this committee does not receive enough credit for the amount of study that it has devoted to the contents of this bill. I have been concerned recently by such statements as, "Well, the Senate is only looking at the bill for four days." In my opinion, that is downgrading this committee, which has been considering the bill since September.

Let us inform the country that this bill does not come to us fresh, that it has been on our platter for as long a period of time as it has been in the House of Commons, and that we have given it more thorough consideration than they did in the other place. The House of Commons debated the matter in Committee of the Whole within the context of all the fervour and obstruction that comes from political debate. This was not the situation with the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Let us inform the public about that fact. The news media are present. Let them advise the country about the efforts of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. We are not dealing with this matter in one day on two days. We have been dealing with this bill, which was presented to the country on June 30, since the middle of September. Those are the facts, and Senator O'Leary speaks of the servile Senate, guillotine, closure and so on in the face of all these facts.

This is what Senator Cook said:

> My only point, Mr. Chairman—and I made this point on the floor of the Senate and I make it again—is that assuming we really desire to have the bill amended, I think we have a much better chance of getting it amended by having it passed now and having it in definitive form; then, when we receive the amending bill, to bring forward our amendments once again, because our recommendations have not been rejected by the minister. He has not rejected any of our amendments yet; in fact, he has agreed to give them consideration.
> In my view, the most sensible, practical and reasonable course to follow would be to allow the bill to become law now, instead of throwing it back again to the House of Commons—

And this is the relevant portion which I want Senator O'Leary to hear.

> —instead of throwing it back again to the House of Commons; and then to persuade the minister again in the new year to accept our recommendations.
> Let me make it clear that I am not against the principle of the amendment, but I am definitely against the amendment being pressed now. It may be that my only recourse will be to vote against Senator O'Leary's motion, which I will; but I wanted to give the reason why I would vote against it.

Surely, whether Senator O'Leary or Senator Grosart agrees with it, that is a reasonable position to take. This is not a result of compulsion on the part of Senator Cook.

Surely Senator O'Leary will help us to explain this matter to the country. I am sure that he and I will visit editorial offices informing those editors who write so glowingly without ever reading the debates which have taken place. I am sure Senator O'Leary will help us in this respect.

We cannot ignore what the witness, Mr. Thorson, said in committee yesterday, or are we about to pay no attention to important evidence that has been given? He was giving evidence regarding reasons why the implementation date should be met. This does not mean honourable senators have to agree with it. We can disagree with Mr. Thorson, and we can disagree with the Government. We have another ten days to debate this matter, and Senator O'Leary who is the champion of the democratic system has at least ten days to debate this issue to controvert what has been said by the witnesses. Mr. Thorson said:

> It will be seen that many of these taxes are conditional upon a corporation taking some particular action at a time when the new system is in effect. For virtually all of these new taxes the relevant time is the beginning of the new year.

He further stated:

> An example, which I insist is only one single example in terms of the total problem, is the tax imposed by Part XIII of the bill, on payments made by residents of Canada to non-residents—
> If this part of the act, for example, were not brought into force until some time in the new year, one might ask oneself what would be the position of an employer or an insurance company, or indeed, any other payer, who was directed by the substantive provisions of the bill to withhold tax from pension or annuity payments made at any time after 1971, which is the relevant date in the bill.

Please pay particular attention to this:

> If the employer withheld the tax provided for under Part XIII, he would have to do so without the authority of the Income Tax Act since Part XIII would presumably not yet be in force, and he would be, in the interim, presumably liable to civil action by the recipient of the payment, to enforce payment of the full amount that ought to have been paid.
> On the other hand . . . if he did not deduct withholding tax from the payment and forthwith remit it to the Receiver General, he would be in default under the law as it is now written, at such time as Part XIII came into force, because when it did come into force it would be clear that he should have deducted or withheld the tax from any such payment made after 1971.

This is only one single, simple example of the difficulties which would arise if we are not certain as to the commencement of this new scheme.

> If a corporation cannot be sure about the tax consequences of paying out dividends to its shareholders, proceeding with a re-organization of its business, investing its surplus funds in one kind of asset, as opposed to another kind of asset, et cetera, the corporation will be effectively paralyzed in many important aspects of its business.

This was the position taken by the Canadian Tax Foundation, notwithstanding the fact they did not agree with many features of the bill. This is also what Senator Cook was referring to when he suggested we should not drop the recommendations made by the Senate but use a device which, in his judgment, would likely be more effective in having these recommendations ultimately accepted.

The Minister of Finance, in dealing with the delay until March, said it does not affect in any way the nine priorities which have been outlined in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

• (1240)

I think we should address ourselves to this question of the reason for the importance of the implementing date. The proclamation of the regulations is dependent on the passage of this bill. The release of certain information and certain tax forms is dependent on the passage of this bill. A sense of certainty by the taxpayers as to what the law is for 1972 is dependent on the passage of this bill. If part of the bill is suspended for several weeks or months into 1972, many taxpayers, particularly in the business community, will simply not know, as Mr. Thorson pointed out, how to behave. They will not know if there are further amendments coming which will reach back and affect transactions taking place between January 1, 1972 and the date of the tabling of an amendment. They will not know whether to assess their position under the 1948 Income Tax Act or under the provisions of the 1972 tax reform bill. They will wonder what law prevails.

By the end of January 1972, he said, there will be about 15,000 corporations which will have completed their 1972 fiscal year. By the end of February this number will be close to 30,000. Therefore, for those companies, on which basis do they report their income? The old or the new? Similarly, there are undoubtedly thousands of partnerships whose fiscal year ends early in 1972, who will face the same problem.

Many examples of the consequences of this uncertainty may be cited. For instance, how does one deal with club dues and personal use of a company vehicle during the period from the effective date to the end of what is termed the hiatus period? How does one deal with interest paid by a corporation to purchase shares of a corporation during the hiatus period? Has a taxpayer who has disposed of capital property during the hiatus period realized a capital gain subject to tax? If the seller of that property is a non-resident and the buyer a Canadian, do the security provisions of section 116 of the act apply? Under which rules does a corporation operate during the hiatus period with regard to its surplus accounts; that is, the old or the new rules for distributions?

With regard to taxpayers making payments to non-residents—for example, withholding tax—which rules apply? That is one of the examples Mr. Thorson gave yesterday. Then he went on to point out that under this bill there are a number of transactions, particularly in the corporate sector, which require that forms of elections be filed with the Department of National Revenue. If the bill is not proclaimed, the forms will not be available; and therefore how can a corporation conduct its business? In other words, there are some transactions in respect of which a corporation simply cannot go ahead on the assumption that Bill C-259 will ultimately become law effective on the date designated by the Governor in Council, and so on.

Surely, these were considerations to which Senator Cook, or any other senator, had the right to refer when he considered the one, solitary amendment put forward by my eloquent friend, Senator O'Leary. It was not that there was disagreement with the principle of that amendment. Senator Cook and others clearly affirmed that they believed in this recommendation which had been brought forward by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. They desired the Government to consider it and were satisfied with the assurance given by the Minister of Finance. Surely, that is what my honourable friend Senator O'Leary ought to tell the country, both through his speech and his great capacity for writing? Let him become a guest editorial writer in the newspapers of this country and tell the country what the real situation is.

I thank Senator Connolly for his chairmanship of this committee. I thank Senator O'Leary for giving me the opportunity to expose the inadequacy of his argument.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You did well.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In paying attention to him I have paid him a great tribute, because I thought that what he said deserved comment, even though it deserved denunciation.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I, Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege merely say that the honourable Leader of the Government, before beginning his address, said that he had not intended to speak. I wonder how many documents and other items of preparation he would have brought with him had he intended to speak.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The day is young.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, I put the question to Senator O'Leary: when you write your next editorial, sir, would you like to include my picture?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I would not include your picture unless someone paid me.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe there are others who wish to speak with respect to the report. Accordingly, I move adjournment of the debate until 2.30 this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must make matters clear now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am simply adjourning this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the Senate do now adjourn until 2.30 p.m.?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the question is put, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he will indicate the program for the remainder of the day, as he sees it, and possibly thereafter?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I had occasion yesterday to inform honourable senators what was in store for us today. We will continue the present debate and consider third reading of the bill. I understand this will take most of the afternoon. Should we conclude that business before 6 o'clock, we could then deal with the remaining items on the Orders of the Day. I understand some honourable senators are interested in speaking to those items. Then we would adjourn to some time this evening.

We expect some legislation from the other place. We hope that one bill will reach us by approximately 6 o'clock. In all there are three bills to come from the other place. They are non-contentious, having to do with tax-relief, as I said yesterday, merely implementing the October mini-budget.

That is the program. We hope to be able to deal with it in a matter of days. There is no deadline or time limit to be observed regarding that program. We will take as long as is needed to exhaust our consideration of these items.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a further question? This is for the convenience of honourable senators who may wish to schedule their day. In the event that the tax-relieving bill does not arrive by 6 o'clock, is it the intention to suggest that we sit this evening?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, this evening or tomorrow morning.

• (1250)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Even if we do not get a bill?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I will discuss that with the honourable senator later today and arrange a program when we know exactly what is likely to come to us tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My specific question was, if we do not get an additional bill tonight.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If we have exhausted the items on the agenda, we will adjourn until a pre-arranged time tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I ask these questions because I know that many honourable senators are concerned about the scheduling of their own activities in the next day or so. Is it our intention, in effect, to sit right through, morning, afternoon and evening, until we dispose of the legislation and other business that will come before us?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is open to discussion between me and the honourable senator, but I would be inclined to believe that honourable senators would prefer to dispose of these other pieces of legislation as soon as possible. I understand, from what the honourable senator has just said, that he is concerned, and rightly so, about transportation for senators to their places of residence. I am pleased to announce that arrangements have been made by the Government to provide air transportation for members of the Senate and of the House of Commons whenever they are free to leave for home. Therefore, honourable senators need not feel concerned about this matter. We will keep in touch with the other side of the house through Senator Grosart, who will be kept posted on what has been decided and on what is likely to happen in the final analysis.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when we adjourned at about 1 o'clock we were discussing the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as presented by the honourable Senator Connolly.

Is there any other honourable senator who would like to speak on this debate? If not, I will put the question as to when this bill shall be read a third time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We will get to that later.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I must admit that I was rather taken aback by the remarks made by my friend, Senator O'Leary, before we adjourned for lunch. I refer particularly to what he said about the Senate.

I have a high respect for Senator O'Leary. He does not remember when I first met him, but I was a young student at the time. It was 45 years ago to be exact. I have great respect for him, but after hearing what he said about my fellow senators and about the Senate I began to wonder whether it was wise for me to accept my appointment to this house. I consoled myself, however, in the belief that if Senator O'Leary really believed what he said he would not continue to be a member of this house. I note he is still with us, and I hope he will be with us for a long time to come.

Senator O'Leary is a man of outstanding reputation in Canada. I regret that he said what he said, because he was, in my humble opinion, feeding the people who like to believe that this house serves no purpose and should be abolished. Coming from Senator O'Leary, I am sure that is exactly what will be concluded by some of his fellow newspapermen.

Senator O'Leary also spoke about the meeting of the committee yesterday afternoon. I am a new member of that committee and I attended my first meeting yesterday. I certainly cannot agree with Senator O'Leary's statement that amendments were not allowed. It is true that the amendment he moved was defeated, but the fact that an amendment is voted down by a majority is no indication that amendments were not allowed.

To prove my so-called "servility" I must admit that I did not vote on all amendments. There were a number of votes and in one case I could not make up my mind on the amendment proposed so I chose not to vote. As I recall, towards the end of our meeting a whole series of amendments were submitted in a batch in a document of which no one would admit paternity. In any event, these amendments were not even read, and we were asked to vote on them. Certainly, I for one would not vote for amendments in those circumstances.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, I am going to vote for it, but I say here and now I am not voting for it because I agree with every one of its clauses. There are clauses which I question and there are certain tendencies which I question but, on balance, I am satisfied that the merits of this bill outweigh its demerits.

I feel, for example, that this measure aims at more equity in taxation, and that is something we all desire. As has been pointed out again and again, it will also have the effect of reducing the tax burden on lower income earners. For these reasons, I propose to vote for the bill.

The suggestion continues to be made that the Senate has been taken by surprise, in effect, because the final bill arrived here only the other day. To say that the Senate has been taken by surprise is, in my opinion, a reflection on the intelligence of honourable senators. We all know tax reform has been before us since 1962. There have been a whole series of commissions, beginning with the Carter Commission, a federal commission, and provincial commissions. There were hearings all over the country. The press has given wide publicity to the discussions. Surely we are not going to assume that senators disregarded all these discussions and knew nothing about the measure or the proposals until the final bill was submitted.

I shall not remind you again of the very extensive work done on this measure by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee made a very full study of these proposals. I note that the committee consists of 30 members. I assume all did not attend all the time, but more than one-third of this body could have participated in the studies made by that committee.

I come now to two constitutional considerations that are of particular interest. It is to be noted that this bill has been discussed by nearly everyone as though it were an ordinary piece of legislation. Honourable senators, this is a tax bill, and I do not think anyone will question my statement when I say that in matters of taxation the elected house has greater rights than the Senate. The Senate may not introduce a money bill; money bills have to be introduced in the other place. The Senate may defeat a money bill, but it is not established that the Senate can amend a money bill. It may have done so, but when this happens problems arise. In my view, it is wise to adhere to the traditions of the Constitution, and to remember that a tax bill, when it comes to this house, is different from any other measure. It is just 60 years since the wings of the House of Lords in England were clipped because of confrontation with the House of Commons on a money bill.

My second point has reference to the commitment made by the Minister of Finance. There have been suggestions that while the minister said he would give full consideration to the recommendations of our committee, he did not commit himself sufficiently. Honourable senators know that a minister of finance cannot and must not announce prospective tax changes in advance. If the minister told us that the changes we recommend are going to be implemented, are going to be legislated, he would be violating his oath of office.

You will remember that Hugh Dalton, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer some years ago, had to resign because, as he was walking into the House of Commons at Westminster to deliver his budget address, he in effect said to a newspaperman, "You had better be prepared to pay more for your cigarettes." It was held that Hugh Dalton had disclosed a budget secret, although it only happened in that way, and he had to resign.

I think the Minister of Finance, whom I heard yesterday, went as far as he could to show his respect for the work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and his intention to give it more than mere casual consideration.

• (1440)

Honourable senators, I have read the documents related to the tax measure. I have been interested in taxation for years, both as a lawyer and as a member of Royal Commissions on Taxation. I conclude by saying again that I think the committee has made an ample and thorough study of this bill. It is said that it did not have the final bill, but it is now agreed that the final bill is in substance the same as was given first reading in the other place last July.

We must admit that the Senate committee has influenced the legislation, particularly after its report on the White Paper. In my humble opinion, we are proceeding in the most effective way to continue to influence the tax legislation in the days, months, and years ahead when it will have to be amended again and again, as happens to tax legislation at all times.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on a question of privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator O'Leary, on a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: My honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, constantly falls into the curious state of mistaking righteous indignation for anger. I have nothing against anger. Anger is the cleanest of passions, and at least denotes conviction. So if I claim to be what he calls unduly angry in this house, it is because there are certain things which I think should not be tolerated in this house. One is the setting up of straw men, and then knocking them down with great vigour. Actually, I enjoyed the speech made by the Leader of the Government. It was a credit to the chamber, a credit to the good old art of cut and thrust in debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What is the privilege in all this?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: If you listen instead of interrupting you will find out.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: A good old Tory habit.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I was going to say to my friend that every evil has its exceptions, and I am glad to say here that the notable exceptions to the evil I was complaining of—and I do not withdraw it at all—were my friends, Senators Goldenberg, Manning, and Lawson—who would be salient figures in any parliament in the world—and, last but not least, my long time friend Senator Forsey. I do not accuse them of being servile at all, but I do accuse the men who sat on that committee yesterday and shouted down every attempt to improve that bill. I said they were messengers of the East Block and were servile, and those statements I stand by, unrevised and unrepented.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I intend to vote for this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Therefore, I think I should explain my position. I shall not detain you more than ten minutes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Take your time.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Not servile.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Not on our side of the house.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Nor on this side.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Beaubien.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, in examining this bill the first thing I wish to say is that on the matter of principle there are many instances of where I am not in agreement. As Senator Goldenberg pointed out, the Senate has every power, but I also think that on a question of principle the Senate has to be very careful. To put it just in a few words, if the man in the street does not like the laws, he can vote out of power the people in the other place. If we are going to make the laws and he does not like them, he cannot vote us out. So it is not fair to him.

The next thing I want to say—and I am repeating what I said before—is that it makes no sense for the House of Commons to disregard completely this house and send us a bill of this importance in the last few minutes of this session. As I said to the Leader of the Government, I do not know what he said to his colleagues, but it did not work. I do not think that is right.

Fortunately, knowing what to expect, we studied the bill long before it was actually sent to us for our consideration and, in studying the technical end of it very carefully, we proposed nine amendments. However, those nine amendments have not been enacted.

Honourable senators, the situation as I see it is that in looking at this bill we must ask ourselves the question: If we amend it as we think we should, will they in the other place, in the sloppy way they do business there, be able to send the bill back to us before the end of the year? Everybody can have his own judgment on that, but my judgment is that it would never come back in time. I may be wrong, but that is what I think. Having once decided that, the next thing to decide is whether the deadline of December 31 is important or not. We had the minister and his officials before us. Everybody can interpret what they said in his own way, but so far as I am concerned I am very much of the opinion that the deadline is important.

If we feel that we cannot amend the bill because it would not come back in time, and we feel that the deadline is important, then we must ask ourselves what we should do next. The next step then is to get the minister before us to see if he will agree to bring in an amending bill.

I do not want to tell honourable senators what to think about the minister's statement. You heard the minister. Personally, I was satisfied. Naturally, that is a terribly important factor, because when the amending bill comes to the Senate, the Senate will not have lost control of the situation. If the amending bill is not to our liking, we can amend it. To my mind that is the terribly important point. Each one can in his own way make up his mind whether he thinks the minister will or will not bring in an amending bill. I decided in my mind that he would.

The third point, which is not nearly so important, is whether the minister will consider our amendments. I say it is not so important because, if I am correct and an amending bill does come forward and we have control over the amending bill, then, if the minister does not do what we have asked him to do in respect of our amendments, we can amend that amending bill. So that point is very much less important, as I say.

Honourable senators, we have reached the point where in considering Bill C-259 we have just one thing to ask ourselves: Will this country be better served by our passing this bill than not passing it? The bill is certainly not one hundred per cent, but will we do less harm to Canada in passing this bad bill than would be done by letting the uncertainty continue.

That is the reasoning on which I base my judgment, and so far as I am concerned I think the country would be better served if we pass the bill. Therefore, I am going to vote for it.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, what has just been said has pretty well expressed the thoughts which I have formed in listening to the debate on this matter, not only today but earlier. Frankly, I do not feel that we are serving the public interest in any way in further prolonging debate on this subject. Really, all we are doing is fighting a rearguard action against the decision that already has been made by the majority in the other place and by the majority of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Our main concern, surely, is to end up with the best possible tax structure that can be developed for the people of this country. If we were now debating specific amendments to the bill, further discussion would be worth while, but as everyone knows it has been the judgment of the majority of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to reject any amendments to the bill at this time. The bill certainly is in need of a large number of important amendments. There are many that go beyond what has been recommended by the committee, but they are certainly among the more important.

Our concern now should be how we can best ensure that the amendments which are required are secured. We are not going to secure those amendments by arguing here at this stage whether the bill should or should not have been amended in committee yesterday. It had been my hope that at least the more obvious and important amendments would have been recommended by the committee to this house and in turn by this house to the other place. Had that been done, because of the short time the bill was in committee it still would have allowed the House of Commons time to deal with at least several significant amendments. But that is now water under the bridge and the decision has been made not to proceed on that basis.

Reference has been made to the commitments made by the Minister of Finance to the committee, and to whether those commitments went as far as we desire them to go. I must concur with what has been said by several senators, that is, that a minister of the Crown could not go further than the Minister of Finance has gone in this case, because there are very definite restrictions on any minister committing his government and the members of the House of Commons in advance, particularly in a matter as important as a major tax bill. While we may not be satisfied with the degree of commitment, in fairness it needs to be repeated that the minister went as far as the members of this house could reasonably expect him to go.

I voted against this bill on second reading because, as I indicated, it is my firm conviction that the Government and its advisers did not produce the quality of legislation that the Canadian people had a right to expect as the end result of almost ten years of detailed study and consideration. However, having registered that protest, now that the majority has decided it is going to proceed, I for one do not intend to oppose it further. But I do intend to do everything I can, and I believe that in this I am joined by many other senators, to see that the important amendments recommended by our own committee, and others with which we are familiar, are given the consideration they deserve when the amending bill to this legislation comes before us in the next session.

I do not wish to take more of your time, since I have laboured this point before, but I do want to emphasize the importance, the impact that the debate on this bill has on the institution of Parliament. I can only reiterate that in the last analysis it is the elected representatives of the people who have the right to say what the laws will be in this country, and particularly in the matter of taxation. Certainly as an appointed member I would never place myself in a position which would override the decision of the majority of the elected members of Parliament. In the last analysis, they must answer to the Canadian people for their judgment or lack of judgment. Our parliamentary structure is such that we in this house have been assigned the constitutional right and responsibility for serious second thought to legislation passed in the other place. If we are to preserve our parliamentary institutions, we must not only make them work but such must be evident to the eyes of the Canadian people. Otherwise, we will not preserve their respect for our parliamentary government. No matter what the feelings of this house may be, unless the Government of this country and the House of Commons, as the other integral part of the parliamentary system, recognize and respect our role we cannot preserve our position in the eyes of the Canadian people. Frankly, the crux of this entire debate is their failure to recognize the role of the Senate. Surely, in light of the role which has been assigned to us we are not unreasonable in expecting the Government and the House of Commons to consider the Senate when they are preparing timetables involving legislation where deadlines are concerned. We must have legislation in our hands in sufficient time to permit us to do what is required to be done without giving rise to the kind of debate which we have had on this measure where the constant spectre of time has been hanging over our heads. It is all very well and good to say there are no deadlines and we can deal with the matter as long as we wish. Everyone is aware that while this is technically true, the deadline is still there. The reason the committee rejected any amendments to the bill was that in the judgment of the majority it was expedient and important that the bill be enacted before January 1, 1972. The spectre of time has been at the crux of most of our concern.

May I come back to my appeal to the Leader of the Government and to the Senate as a whole. I am not clear in my mind what steps the Senate can take to ensure that this situation does not occur again, but I for one have no interest in being a member of this house if the other place is to continue the practice of disregarding the responsibility and right of the Senate in its timetables with respect to important legislation.

• (1500)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: I hope that this will be conveyed to the Government and Parliament in such a manner that they will avoid creating this situation in the future, as they can so easily do. Certainly they had to resort to closure in order to get the bill here. I would remind the honourable members again, however, that the executive arm of Government cannot impose closure. Closure could be imposed in the other place only because a majority of elected representatives supported the Government's motion to impose it. When the majority speaks the majority rules or we will not retain a parliamentary system of Government.

If I may add something in a lighter vein in closing, honourable senators, I enjoyed the debate this morning. I enjoyed the vigour with which my good friend Senator O'Leary presented his righteous indignation, some of which I confess I share. I enjoyed tremendously the vigour of my honourable friend the Government Leader in this house in the defence which he made of his party and the Senate as a whole. I appreciated some of the statements he made. If I ever found myself in a position where it was important to argue that black is white, east is west or up is down, I would first of all enlist the debating vigour of my good friend the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. George C. van Roggen: Honourable senators, if you will permit me, I will depart from the subject of the debate for a few moments to simply thank all honourable senators who have been so kind in the warmth of their greeting to those of us who were recently sworn in. I thank them also for their consideration and assistance to me and all the others who have recently arrived.

On a light note, before entering upon the remarks I wish to make this afternoon, I might simply say that some years ago I read with great interest—and I do not suggest that I had any aspirations to this place at that time—articles written by Senator O'Leary on the virtues of certain appointments that had been made to the Senate, and the virtue of having political personalities in this chamber. It came as a revelation to me this morning when he inferred that this might not be the most desirable consideration now. I was even more surprised at the inference I have to draw from such a statement that this consideration did not apply at the time he and other senators on the other side of the house might have been appointed. I say that, Senator O'Leary, in the lightest sense, and I hope it can be taken in that way.

The first point I would stress, honourable senators, is that I am not a tax expert. While I am a lawyer, taxation has not been my field. However, in the course of the last number of months, particularly since my appointment here, I have made it my business to seek the advice of tax experts, so as to equip myself to deal with and vote on this matter. In the course of doing that I have consulted not only my partners who are concerned in tax matters, but several chartered accountants in the City of Vancouver who have been seconded by some of the leading firms of this country to deal exclusively with this question. Since the bill was first brought down last June, they have spent four or five months on this question, and two or three of them have been advisers to the Vancouver Board of Trade. On two occasions I was a member of a delegation of the Board of Trade that visited Ottawa in this connection. Not being a tax expert myself, I have been in close contact with people whose advice I respect and am willing to accept on this matter. Their advice and views have been of great assistance to me in concluding whether or not I should support the bill.

Before I express those views, may I deal with a question that seems to have been the subject of a good deal of discussion during the past few days. I refer to the motivation of honourable senators in voting on this particular matter. Neither now, nor I hope at any time while I am a member of this chamber, will I be influenced by editorial writers, by the Government, by the other place, by my own leader in this house, or by what I think the public thinks I should do. I shall not be influenced by even the rights of the Senate, or by threats or concern that this chamber might be abolished.

I have been a lawyer for too long to have difficulty in distinguishing between my duty and winning popularity contests, and I shall vote on this matter, as I hope on all other matters, on the basis of one criterion only, and that is what, in my opinion, is best for all the people of Canada.

May I digress for a moment, in speaking directly on the passage of this bill, to touch on a matter connected with the subject of the bill. I refer to tax incentives for mining companies and the oil and gas industry.

As a westerner, I wish to express a few thoughts in this regard. I do so in part because the subject has been touched on during the last few days by a number of honourable senators including Senator Manning, Senator Lawson, Senator Molgat, and Senator Forsey. I want to refer particularly to the remarks of Senator Forsey, and wish that he were present to hear what I have to say. As I recall his remarks, rather than being critical of the fact that tax incentives for these types of industries had been lessened in the bill, he was critical of the fact that any remnant of a tax incentive remained for them. I think he asked: Why should an extractive industry have any tax concession? Why should it not be taxed in the same fashion as a manufacturing industry?

I point out that a tariff for a manufacturing industry is just as important to that industry and just as expensive to the consumer as a tax concession for the extractive industry. The difference between the two is simple. The manufacturing industry, particularly in Canada, and mainly in central Canada, sells its product in a protected domestic market, while we in the west sell almost every single thing that we produce at world market prices, without any ability to pass laws that would protect those prices. The tax incentive is the only assistance given by the Government to those industries, and it is no more than the benefit given to manufacturing industries by tariff structures. That is the point I wish to make.

I am looking forward in the months ahead to some challenging and interesting discussions with Senator Forsey on this point, and other closely related points.

Honourable senators, coming back to the choice that we are faced with today in voting on this bill, it seems to me that we have two simple courses of action. One is to pass this bill without amendment, and the other is to send it back to the other place with amendments. There may be some other permutations, such as whether we pass it before January 1, 1972, or after that date, or whether it is amended before January 1, 1972 or after that date, but there are only two courses of action that face us. In order to decide how to vote, I have to put the factors on both sides on the scale.

Some of the remarks I shall make now may be simple repetition of what other honourable senators have already said. After the excellent presentation by Senator Beaubien a few minutes ago, I wondered if I should speak at all.

In my view, we cannot amend any bill intelligently in a parliamentary chamber such as this. It would be necessary to put it in the hands of a committee and, I would suggest, leave it there for several weeks so that it could be carefully studied and, hopefully, improved, and then sent back to the other place. However, this would consist of little more than an on-going process of amendment of which we have had a good deal this fall, to say nothing of the proceedings over the last seven or eight years.

I was impressed by the distance which the Minister of Finance appeared to go yesterday with respect to an amending bill. I do not agree with every aspect of the bill, nor do I agree with everything the Minister of Finance has done in the last few years, but I do consider him to be an honourable man. He was quite specific, I felt, when he appeared before us yesterday. He said there will be a specific amending bill coming forward some time in the next few months. At that time, as Senator Beaubien has already said, we can amend that bill, and send it back to the other place.

I say to Senator O'Leary that if, in my view, that amending bill is not sufficient, and we amend it in this chamber and return it to the other place, then he will not find this particular senator servile in refusing to follow that course. I believe the opportunity we are being presented with here is an opportunity for an on-going process of amendment and, in my opinion, we should take advantage of it.

Another thing I was impressed with in the minister's remarks yesterday—and I do not know whether this has been mentioned yet—is that proposed amendments in the amending bill to be introduced in the spring which are of benefit to the taxpayer will be made retroactive to the first of January 1972, and those amendments which might be considered to be not advantageous to the taxpayer will not be made retroactive. If we can persuade the Minister of Finance, through the logic of the work of our committee and otherwise, to incorporate into the amending bill advantageous amendments, the Canadian taxpayer will have the advantage of those amendments from the beginning of the year, notwithstanding that the amending bill would be passed some months later.

That would be one process. On the other side of the scale we have the situation in which we could deny the benefits that flow from this bill to over five million Canadians. We would still have with us the business uncertainty which, from the evidence of many people in Canada, has created a degree of slowdown in our economy in recent years because it has seriously interfered with the ability of business to make decisions and proceed with programs.

A third result would be the difficulty created in Parliament. We can all imagine the situation that would result if we sent this bill back. The other place would be in turmoil, and we could be faced with an unwanted election or other things which would not be of advantage to the Canadian people. The Canadian people would be denied the attention of Parliament to other pressing problems while it continued to deal wholly with this matter—and there are many other pressing problems to which the Canadian people are entitled to have Parliament devote its attention.

By putting this bill into effect, obscure sections of it will be put into practice, and the necessary amendments will become evident. We must consider also the evidence which we received yesterday in the committee as to the legal consequences of bringing this bill into law at a later date.

When I put all of these matters on the scale I have no difficulty in deciding that the scales tip heavily in favour of our passing this bill before January 1, 1972, subject to the firm undertaking of the Minister of Finance as to an on-going amending procedure, which I suggest the Senate and its committee played a major part in bringing about.

In conclusion, I would ask only that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce proceed with its study of the bill and the amendments brought forward in the other place in the last month or two. I suggest that this work should commence from the time we reconvene after the Christmas recess until the amending bill is before us.

On the basis of advice I have received, and for the reasons I have given, I intend to vote for the passage of this bill. I may have received wrong advice and my judgment may be wrong, but it is my own judgment.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators will recall that Saturday morning I raised the matter of the exclusion of trade unions from the bill. It is my duty to now report the disposition of that matter. However, before I do, I wish to make a few brief remarks arising from the debate today and on Saturday.

I have always thought of myself, to use a football term, as a member of the second team, but I am indebted to Senator O'Leary for his elevating me to the first team as he did so graciously a few moments ago. Having been elevated to the first team I feel I am now in a position to make a criticism of journalists—I trust a constructive criticism.

Honourable senators will recall that the other day copies of an editorial from the Vancouver Sun were distributed in this chamber. I must confess I was responsible for bringing that editorial here and for making arrangements, through my colleague Senator Heath, for its distribution. I did not do this because it reflected my views on the bill, but I wanted people in this part of Canada, who might not otherwise have an opportunity of reading it, to have the benefit of its views. I hesitate to say it, but it has been my view that the Vancouver Sun is one of Canada's truly great newspapers. Many people may disagree with that view.

When I left here on Saturday evening and went back to Vancouver to attend a very important function, there was another editorial, very similar in its rather vicious attack on this chamber, except that the term used was "supine senators." Not being well educated and a high school dropout, I went to the only instant reference I could find for the meaning of "supine." I went to Senator O'Leary, who said that it means "damned weak." I take it, therefore, they were saying once again that we were damned weak senators in the way we were dealing with this bill.

The function I had to attend was an annual gathering of trade unionists. They said to me, "So you voted for the bill. How could you have voted for it?" I asked how they knew how I voted and they said they had read it in the Vancouver Sun. I asked, "Did they tell you about the Government Leader's statement about the length of time the Senate and already reviewed the legislation?" No, they said, that was not reported. "Did they tell you about the three reports filed by the Senate committee?" No, that was not reported. "Did they tell you of the matters I was concerned about that helped me to arrive at my decision? Did they tell you about the adjustment in benefits for low income people?" No, there was nothing specific on that. "Did they tell you I voted for the bill because it provides that working mothers can deduct from taxable income an amount of $500 per child per year up to a maximum of $2,000?" No, they were not aware of that. "Did they tell you that workers can get an allowance for tools and clothing up to 3 per cent of their gross earnings or $150?" No, they did not say that. "Did they tell you there was a special exemption of $650 for people over 65?" No, that was not reported in the press. "Did they tell you about another concern of mine, that the cost of moving from one job to another job will now be a deductible item of expense?" No, the newspaper did not say that. "Did they tell you about the provisions for the kind of people we represent, loggers, miners, construction workers, who can have as an allowable expense the cost of keeping two homes?" No, the paper had not said that. "Did they tell you about the pension benefits and the additional allowances made there?" No, they were not told about that. "Did they tell you the precise formula for capital gains? Do you think the editorial was so vicious because it was opposed to capital gains?" No, they had not been told the formula for capital gains. "Did they write about the outstanding speech made by Senator Manning, and what caused him to vote against the bill on second reading?" No, they did not have the benefit of that. "Did they report the speeches of Senator Bélisle and others?" In almost every case the answer was no.

I believe that the Vancouver Sun or any great newspaper has a right and a responsibility to examine us microscopically. They have a right and responsibility to criticize us and castigate us if we do not properly discharge our responsibilities. They have the right to do that; they should do that; and I think the Canadian people are entitled to rely on the newspapers discharging that role and that responsibility. But on the other side of the coin they also have a responsibility fairly and accurately to report what takes place here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: They have a responsibility fairly and accurately to report what gave rise to Senator Lawson's decision to vote for the bill, or Senator Manning's decision to vote against it on second reading, or Senator Beaubien's decision today to vote for it. They have that responsibility.

I know there is talk of pressure. The only pressure I have felt in the last two weeks has been, not from the Government or from the deadline of closure but from the constant reference to what was being said in editorials. I would be very concerned by what was being said in those editorials if I felt it was an accurate reflection of the Canadian people, after having been given all the evidence, all the facts and all the positions we have taken here, or even a summary of our positions. But on my examination the editorials did not reflect this position; they did not fairly and accurately represent to the Canadian people the positions we have taken.

Even with respect to the role of the committee yesterday, I wonder if the Vancouver Sun had someone there who could accurately report that. I did not see much in the morning papers here about what took place. The newspapers have a responsibility to report not only what the minister said and the questions that were posed to him, but also the matter Senator O'Leary raised this morning, that honourable senators did, as faithfully as possible, make their case for an amendment but they were voted down, and it was a majority decision.

No one quarrels if all that is reported is accurate. But I say it is a responsibility they have to discharge, and, based on that, to let the Canadian people decide if we are properly discharging our responsibilities as members of this chamber.

I read with great interest in the Toronto Star on Saturday a whole review of the highlights of the legislation, an in-depth review of the capital gains provision and what it meant. I have no affiliation or association with the Star, although I read it from time to time, but its reporting was journalism at its best. I think the conduct of the Vancouver Sun in its editorials, without first having given the people all our positions, was journalism at its worst.

I left Vancouver Sunday evening at 10.30 on the midnight flyer in order to arrive here in time to attend the committee meeting on Monday morning. I do not consider that any great sacrifice. I did it for my own benefit, because I wanted to hear with my own ears whether the minister was going to waffle, or how he would answer the questions put to him. I also wanted an opportunity to raise the matter I was concerned about. I listened carefully to the questions posed by the members of the committee. I noted the very skilful conduct of the meeting by the acting chairman, Senator Connolly, who I regret is not here at the moment. He chaired the meeting fairly and impartially, and gave everyone an opportunity to present his or her view. I was impressed by the doggedness of Senator Grosart in putting forward the matters he and his people were concerned about. I was particularly impressed with the very frank and forthright response of the minister. I was surprised. I did not really expect that he would go as far as he did. Many major confrontations with which I have been associated have been resolved when the commitment was not as strong as that given by the Minister of Finance yesterday morning.

I had the opportunity to raise my own concern about the question of trade unions not being included in the bill. When I raised that matter here the other day the Government Leader indicated that he would attempt to find out something about it. He was kind enough to arrange a meeting with Mr. Cohen, one of the minister's aides, who appeared at that meeting, and I had an opportunity to discuss it. However, for the record I wanted to raise it with the minister once more at the committee meeting yesterday. He was frank to say that the matter simply had never been raised before. Notwithstanding all the many days of discussion in the other place the matter had simply not been raised. It was something they had not given consideration to, but the minister indicated that upon presentation it would be given consideration.

I am left with simply asking myself, not only on that point, which is only one vested concern, but in my greater responsibility to the bill as a whole as it affects the Canadian people, as a reasonable, fair-minded man, what should my position be? My position should be to support the bill, and in the best interests of the Canadian people I intend to do so.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Martin, seconded by honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since there appears to be some uncertainty, those in favour of the motion will please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the motion will please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I was informed a few minutes ago that substantial progress had been made in the other place on Bill C-260, and it is expected it will reach us within one hour. I suggest that we adjourn until approximately five o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I hope it will be possible for all honourable senators to meet with me some time between six o'clock and seven o'clock this evening on a matter of great importance. I hope to indicate at five o'clock the location of that meeting.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.15 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I have just returned from the other place where I learned that Bill C-260 has passed the Committee of the Whole and is now receiving third reading. It is expected that this bill will reach us at around 6 o'clock. In the circumstances I suggest that we adjourn to the call of the bell at approximately 8.30 this evening to consider that bill.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, before the question is put, would the Deputy Leader inform us if there is any possibility of our having to deal with the Farm Products Marketing Bill?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have no definite information about the possibility of this bill's reaching us before the adjournment. I think we will have to play it by ear and see what happens. At this time I am not in a position to say what will happen.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-260, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the second time now.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should point out first that you have on your desks copies of this bill as it was introduced in the other place on first reading. Copies of the bill as passed by the House of Commons are not yet available, but as it was not amended in the House of Commons the copies we have will serve our purpose this evening.

This bill contains three amendments of substance to the Excise Tax Act, the first of which exempts from the tax machinery and apparatus sold to or imported by manufacturers or producers for use by them in the reduction of pollution. The second amendment exempts margarine and other spreads from sales tax. The third amendment repeals the special excise tax of 15 per cent on radios, television sets, and electron tubes.

These amendments arise from the proceedings of the Ways and Means motions relating to the Excise Tax Act and Old Age Security Act tabled by the Minister of Finance on June 18, 1971.

In addition to the changes in the Excise Tax Act there is an amendment to the Old Age Security Act and the Excise Tax Act to transfer 3 per cent of the sales tax from the Old Age Security Tax Act to the Excise Tax Act. It does not involve any increase or reduction in the sales tax, but simply removes it from the provisions of the Old Age Security Act and inserts it in the Excise Tax Act.

The other amendments which honourable senators will notice are purely technical in nature and are required to cause the existing acts to comply with the foregoing amendments. They ensure that the present sales tax exemptions will continue to exist. They apply the necessary technical adjustments to the acts to implement these changes.

That is really the essence of the bill before us. It is comprised basically of three parts: (1) amendments to the Excise Tax Act to exempt certain products and items from the sales tax; (2) the transfer from the Old Age Security Act to the Excise Tax Act of three percentage points of the sales tax; and (3) a series of technical amendments required to bring the acts into compliance.

I think that is really all I need to say at this point. If there are questions, I shall endeavour to answer them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would the sponsor of the bill be good enough to tell us when Bill C-260 was introduced in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: First reading was on June 30, 1971.

[Hon. Mr. Stanbury.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the bill represents what is commonly called a tax relief bill incidental to budget statements made in the other place by the Minister of Finance. By and large, it embodies technical changes, as the sponsor of the bill explained in a brief but excellent summary.

The bill is divided into three sections, one dealing with machinery and apparatus intended for use in pollution control, one leading with the excise tax on margarine, and the other repealing the special excise tax on radio and television apparatus.

In relation to the first section, perhaps the sponsor of the bill would tell us the relationship between the Old Age Security Act and the Excise Tax Act. I am not clear in my mind why this transfer is made from one act to the other. They would appear to be two acts which are not normally related.

Secondly, in connection with the tax on machinery and apparatus used for the reduction of pollution, I should like to know if municipalities using these kinds of apparatus for pollution control will receive the benefit of this decrease.

Thirdly, is there any loss to the Consolidated Revenue Fund involved in any of these tax relief measures? I presume there is. If my presumption is correct, what will be the loss of revenue from cancellation of the special excise tax on radio and television apparatus?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I shall try to deal with the questions in order. With respect to the relationship between the Old Age Security Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act, there has been for some time a 12 per cent sales tax, but under our tax laws 9 per cent of the sales tax is imposed under the Excise Tax Act, and 3 per cent under the Old Age Security Tax Act. The bill now before us repeals the old age security tax on sales imposed under the Old Age Security Act. This is done simply to bring the sales tax into the same pattern as income tax. Instead of having a portion of the sales tax imposed under the Old Age Security Tax Act, it is brought into the Excise Tax Act.

The transfer makes no difference to the amount of tax. It is simply a tidying up measure, putting the Old Age Security situation into the same pattern, as was done in the Income Tax Act.

Senator Grosart mentioned pollution control apparatus, and asked whether municipalities will have the benefit of this measure. They will to some extent, but this is not intended as a general exemption for all pollution control apparatus. If that was the case it would cover a broad range of equipment, and would, perhaps, be difficult to define. It would take into account many items, some of which are suggested here—for example, parts which are used in motor vehicles to control emissions, sewage equipment, and so forth. There are many things involved with respect to municipalities which would be difficult to define in these terms.

• (2040)

The municipalities, however, do have a substantial exemption for pollution abatement equipment, by reason of the exemption from sales tax for municipalities with respect to the purchase of such equipment. I refer here to equipment to be used in sewage or drainage systems, including equipment for sewage treatment plants. This is, perhaps, the largest single item with which the municipalities are concerned.

The basic purpose of this measure is to recognize pollution control as a cost of production to manufacturers and producers. Its purpose is to assist industry in doing the work which has to be done in order to control pollution.

The third matter referred to was loss of revenue. There will be, of course, losses of revenue; some of them substantial, some of them not so substantial. I believe Senator Grosart mentioned the one which is the most substantial—the loss in revenue resulting from the repeal of the excise tax on radios, televisions, record players, electronic tubes, and so forth. The section in the act which covers the special excise tax levied upon a good deal of that kind of equipment has been repealed.

The total revenue to the Consolidated Revenue from that source in 1970-71 was $38.6 million, and if it continued through 1971-72, it is estimated that it would have produced about $40 million in revenue. That is the largest of the individual items. It is, of course, expected that the reduction in tax will mean a reduction in cost to the consumer of these various items.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I do not believe this amending bill comes as any surprise to us. It is similar to what we were told in June.

The sponsor of the bill did, however, make reference to such items as radios, televisions, record players, and so forth. I am not a Santa Claus this year as a purchaser, but I rise as one who is always interested in the consumer's position. To what extent do these budget proposals, which date back to June, relate to what I understand is a shortage of electronic equipment prior to Christmas. I think there would normally be a more competitive market than there is. Perhaps the honourable sponsor could say something about that. He said he thought prices had been reduced, as we would expect, because of the change in the tax. I have just read the pre-Christmas shopping list, and I am told there is little competition in respect of television sets and so on.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: I am not sure I can answer the question Senator Benidickson has asked. At the time of the budget announcement there was speculation that the reduction in price would be approximately the amount of the 15 per cent of the tax reduction. There were, of course, inventories on hand, and since this tax is at the manufacturing level the tax reduction was not taken into account immediately. I am informed that within a month or two after the announcement of the budget resolution, there were reductions in the range of $75 on $500 television sets. However, we do not have control over that situation. This is a free market. I am a little amazed that competition does not exist, because we hear so much about Japanese imports, and the difficulty American and Canadian companies have in competing in that field. I would have thought the competition would be quite fierce. I am afraid I have no other comment or observation that would be helpful.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INCOME TAX ACT

NEWSPAPER AND TELEVISION COMMENT ON CONSIDERATION BY SENATE OF BILL C-259— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Last night on the television, certainly on CTV and I think too on the CBC's National News, a gentleman from the other place, Mr. Stanley Knowles, was commenting on the work of the Senate in connection with the tax bill. Among other things he said that the Senate had spent only a few hours on the bill on December 20.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: He forgot about the months.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He said that scarcely enough time had been spent to allow the members of the Senate to leaf through the pages in the bill. Mr. Bruce Phillips, correspondent for the CTV, on the late news last evening on television referred to the fact that the Senate had spent only four days on the tax bill, as against 50 days spent by the other place.

This morning, on the front page of the Montreal Gazette, a correspondent by the name of Tierney—and God forgive an Irishman for doing something as irresponsible as this—writes that the Senate dealt with the "hefty 739-page tax bill in just three days."

Honourable senators, I know perfectly well that the raising of these matters, which affect the privilege of all senators, at this time will probably have no effect in the press at all. Nonetheless, I feel that in the interests of this chamber and of the institution to which we belong it should be raised.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, when I spoke in this house on the final report I gave a few statistics of the work of the committee. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, became seized of the tax bill—not in a legislative way, but for purposes of inquiry—on September 14 of this year.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: And made three reports.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Our committee did not issue its final report until December 13. In other words, it had the bill and studied it actively for a period of three months. The committee held some 26 or 28 meetings. These were not routine formal meetings. Those honourable senators who are members of the committee know that these meetings lasted hours.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Usually twice or three times a day.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We often sat more than once a day. We heard 30 briefs and examined 129 witnesses, and the examination of witnesses was not a formality in any sense of the word.

Every member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is not a tax expert, and if I single out a few of the members who took an active part in this work the others will not feel slighted. Senator Hayden is a tax expert, as are Senators Molson, Flynn, Cook, and Beaubien. These men examined the witnesses in great detail in respect of the presentations they were making to the committee. They exhausted the points that were raised so that they could make reports upon them. We had not only experts to advise us, but also the most eminent counsel in Canada, a former colleague of ours, the Honourable Lazarus Phillips, as chief counsel. He had with him Mr. Poissant, a chartered accountant from Montreal and a member of one of the outstanding accounting firms in Canada. There was a team behind these two gentlemen, the names of which I gave when I spoke on December 14, all of whom are experts.

• (1110)

This hardly constitutes a few hours' work on the tax bill, honourable senators. I say nothing about the debates we have had on the reports, or the fact that we spent practically all of last week discussing the third report, and this is quite apart from our debate on the bill itself.

Honourable senators, I suppose I am down to the point of almost making an argument on the basis of "my father can beat your father." But when I consider the juxtaposition of these two statistics—50 days in the House of Commons, one day in the committee of the Senate—I must conclude that that is not accurate reporting.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): One of the things correspondents and some politicians completely overlook is the special constitutional position of the Senate, indeed of any upper chamber that is not elected, in respect to tax measures. Let us suppose the Senate had made an amendment and sent the bill back to the House of Commons for consideration. I venture to say that the first man to rise in his place and object to this step would have been the same Mr. Stanley Knowles. I can well imagine him on his feet quoting to the Speaker of the House of Commons Rule 63, which reads as follows:

> 63. All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

I have no doubt whatever that this rule would have been extended to tax bills.

Senator Manning in his speech yesterday alluded to the primacy of the House of Commons in respect of this area of legislation, taking into account the position of the Senate. Notwithstanding this, honourable senators, the fact is that the content or the spirit of that rule is not universally accepted. It is not fully accepted in this house, and the proposition is not accepted universally by constitutional authorities in this country.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Including our chairman.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, certainly including the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Hayden.

I do not desire at this stage to generate a debate on a constitutional issue. I have heard it said by a responsible member of the other place—who, incidentally, does not sit on the government benches, and who sat through nearly all the debate that took place in that chamber over the 50 days—that probably all the good and pertinent speeches made on this bill could have been made in the space of one afternoon and one evening. The speeches made and the questions asked in our committee meetings during the past three months could not have been made in any less time than the committee took to do its work.

I feel the comments to which I have alluded are unfair. They fail to take into account not only the time spent in committee, but the fact that we have examined a broad cross-section of witnesses from the private sector of the economy. We heard representatives of agriculture, credit unions, co-operatives, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the pulp and paper industry, the mining industry, the petroleum industry, life insurance companies, the construction industry, and architects, and discussed problems concerning multinational corporations. All the witnesses made a great contribution to our consideration of the tax bill. If there were no Senate committee meetings, these representatives could not have presented their briefs.

I say these comments are unfair. They are more than unfair; they are misleading. While I do not say they are wilfully misleading, I am inclined to think they might very well be malicious. The political commentators of this country and, at times, politicians themselves show a very immature attitude toward the established institutions of our bicameral system. Their comment is without sophistication.

I feel the work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the tax reform measure has been of great benefit to this country. I do not say the committee will be completely vindicated in what it has done, but I hope that when an amending bill is passed some of the critics will come forward and indicate their approval of action taken by the Senate. The committee has been responsible. It has done its work of revision extremely well, and I feel this work will continue to improve tax law of this country, and in time, the citizens of Canada will appreciate the contribution the Senate has made to tax reform.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, we are all grateful to Senator Connolly for his remarks, with which we agree. He mentioned the names of a number of honourable senators but with his usual modesty he omitted his own. Members of the committee will agree that when it comes to knowledge of tax reform, Senator Connolly's name should appear just below those of our chairman (Hon. Mr. Hayden) and the Honourable Lazarus Phillips.

• (1120)

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I appreciate the concern expressed by Senator Connolly. I understand his determination to justify now the action taken by the Senate in respect of Bill C-259 and I congratulate him on the efforts he has just made. However, I am afraid, regretfully afraid, that it is an exercise in futility. I said that during the debate when I drew attention to the impression that had gone abroad as to what we appeared to be about to do. The stand I took, I took because I feared that this reaction, unfair though it may be, would blanket all the good work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Not only the work of that committee but the other achievements of the Senate, particularly in the last few years, would seem to me were on the way to correcting some of the wrong impressions which were abroad in the minds of the public and the press in respect to the usefulness of this chamber.

However, we have done what we have done and I am afraid that anything we say now is unlikely to change that impression. I hope that is not so. The impression has gone abroad that it would have been better had we acted other than as we did. I would not for one moment at this stage, after the Senate has taken its action on this bill, cast any aspersions whatsoever on that action. I have the fullest appreciation of the reasons which motivated honourable senators and the committee regarding the points they brought forward. I agree with Senator Connolly that it is a matter of great regret that this impression has been created, but it is likely to continue and I am afraid there is very little we can do about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we pass on to the program before us, may I ask the honourable Senator Connolly—I would like to be perfectly clear about this—if the comments to which he has taken objection were made on a television program only?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I heard these comments personally. The other comment to which I took objection appeared on the front page of the Montreal Gazette this morning. Other than that, the two comments made by the other two gentlemen I heard and saw on television.

The Hon. the Speaker: Outside Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. Probably the program was filmed in the Parliament Buildings, but I was not commenting with respect to a proceeding in the other place.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, I think it might be proper if His Honour the Speaker, or the Leader of the Government in the Senate, were to obtain from the television stations a text of what was said. We do not all have occasion to hear everything said on the radio or television, but in the case of newspapers you merely have to keep the press clippings. I am sure that I interpret the desire of most honourable senators when I suggest that we should have the text of these statements before us in order to study them and take action if necessary.

If the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Grosart) will permit me, I should like to remind him of the words of Theodore Roosevelt who said that progress is made by those who do something, but not by those who tell others they should have done otherwise.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I could not agree more.

Hon. Keith Davey: May I ask Senator Grosart a question regarding his statement, which concluded on a rather gloomy note? In his statement he twice used the expression "The impression has gone abroad." May we be perfectly clear that it is simply an impression that has gone abroad, and not the fact that has gone abroad? If it is simply an impression, why is the honourable senator so gloomy about our ability to dispel the impression?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That is a very difficult question to answer. I do not know why I feel gloomy about an adverse impression of the Senate, any more than I would feel gloomy about an adverse impression of my own conduct. I merely say that I have heard many protests expressed in this chamber about what has been called our bad public relations, that we do not get our story across. When I speak of impressions, that is what I am referring to.

As to the facts, I am an old newspaperman, and I do not remember a single occasion in the reporting of any story at any time over a period of many years when all the facts on either side, on a pro and con basis, were presented. That is why I am concerned, and have been concerned for some time, about the impression that is widely held concerning the work of this chamber. I am more concerned now than I was a week ago.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of 1971 Report of the International Joint Commission on the environmental and ecological consequences in Canada of raising Ross Lake in the Skagit Valley to elevation 1725. (English text).

Copies of a communiqué issued following the Ministerial Meeting of the Group of Ten, held in Washington, D.C. December 17th and 18th, 1971. (English text).

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the Town of Grand Centre, Alberta, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970. (English text).

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

UNITED NATIONS

SELECTION OF KURT WALDHEIM AS SECRETARY GENERAL—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, as we have some time at our disposal, would the Leader of the Government comment briefly—I hope he will not misunderstand my use of the word "briefly"—on the important news concerning the selection by the Security Council of the United Nations of the Honourable Kurt Waldheim to the highest secretarial post in that organization. My recollection is that earlier in his career this distinguished international diplomat was at the United Nations and later was the Austrian Ambassador to Canada.

• (1130)

I am sure the Leader of the Government knew Kurt Waldheim in both capacities, and perhaps he can give us some information about him and about the prospects of his carrying on the great work that has been done by his predecessors at this critical time in the history of the world.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, it is a fact that Kurt Waldheim, the Austrian Ambassador to the United Nations, has been selected by the Security Council to act as Secretary General in succession to U Thant. Kurt Waldheim will be the fourth Secretary General of the United Nations, succeeding in turn Mr. Trygve Lie of Norway, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold of Sweden, and U Thant of Burma. He follows a worthy succession of constructive and great world statesmen.

Kurt Waldheim is known in Ottawa. As Senator Grosart pointed out, he was at one time the ambassador of his country to Canada. I was first introduced to Mr. Waldheim when he was an observer of Austria at the United Nations in 1955. He was then a young man, as he is still a young man.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He is 53 years old, I believe.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, he is now 53 years old. It was in 1955 that the Canadian proposal to break the log jam with respect to membership was accepted, resulting in a number of western countries becoming members of the United Nations, among which was Austria.

Kurt Waldheim ran for the presidency of his country this year, failing in that effort. He was the foreign minister of Austria for a number of years, and now that he has been selected to succeed U Thant I am sure that the nations of the world will rally around him and support him in this difficult and important assignment which, I know, will be confirmed by the General Assembly within the course of the next few days.

Canada attaches great importance to the Charter of the United Nations, as it does to the United Nations itself. It goes without saying that we will do all that we can to strengthen the position of the Secretary General, particularly at this juncture in human affairs.

Kurt Waldheim has our good wishes. He will likely see what has been said in this chamber today, as I propose to send him a copy of our proceedings. I should also like to use the forum of the Senate to extend not only the wishes of the Government and of the Senate, but also my own personal good wishes.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DISTRIBUTION OF TAX FORMS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to give several answers to questions that were asked and taken as notice.

Earlier in the month I was asked a question by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) concerning the distribution of forms relating to provisions of Bill C-259. My answer, as prepared by the Department of National Revenue, is as follows:

> Action has been taken by National Revenue, Taxation, to provide employers with 1972 TD1 forms necessary for the implementation of the tax deduction tables to be issued, which will reflect the new rates and exemptions.
> The Department has begun preparation of all other necessary forms, but the final copy will not be approved until Bill C-259 becomes law. They are being prepared in advance so that they can be distributed as soon as possible after the revised law comes into effect.

Bill C-259 only becomes law, of course, after royal assent. It is expected that we will have royal assent tomorrow, and I know we will have a strong representation from the Senate at that ceremony.

An Hon. Senator: What time will that be?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am hoping it will be between 4 p.m. and 5 p.m., although conceivably it could be earlier.

COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator O'Leary on December 17 in these terms:

> In view of the sanctions, does the Leader of the Government know how much chrome was imported into this country last year, and where it came from?

As this was an oral question, I have to reply to it orally.

The following are the preliminary figures for 1970 of imports of chrome, in ore or concentrates, into Canada:

		Value Cdn.
From the U.S.	13,226 short tons	$1,127,000
From the Philippines	7,616 short tons	514,000
From the U.S.S.R.	6,670 short tons	458,000
From Turkey	1,671 short tons	120,000
From Cyprus	1,064 short tons	88,000

This will please Senator Connolly.

From Ireland	198 short tons	24,000
Total	30,445 short tons	$2,331,000

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Was this in the context of Rhodesia?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes. These figures, which are preliminary, represent somewhat of a drop from the final figures for 1969. The 1969 figures are 41,924 short tons, valued at $2,889,000 Canadian dollars. The biggest difference between the two years is accounted for by a very significant drop between 1969 and 1970 in imports from Turkey.

Senator O'Leary was anxious to know if chrome imports from the Soviet Union might represent in part transshipments from Rhodesia, and my reply on behalf of the Government is that the Government has no evidence which would support such a proposition.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill C-260, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, the information from the other place is that very little progress has been made on the bills that are expected to be sent to us between now and the Christmas adjournment. In these circumstances, I would suggest that the Senate now adjourn during pleasure until approximately 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Before we adjourn I should like to stress the importance of all honourable senators being in attendance in this chamber, both today and tomorrow, when it is expected that we will have royal assent and finish our pre-Christmas schedule of work.

I now move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to await the call of the bell at approximately 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the question is put, may I ask Senator Langlois or the Leader of the Government to indicate the program that may be before us in certain eventualities? I am speaking now of what we hear only in the corridors, that one of these bills, namely, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies bill, may not be disposed of in the other place by tomorrow night. There are some indications that it is the intention of the other place to adjourn whether that bill is passed or not, and to resume its discussion perhaps next Monday. Presumably, this could be a quite long debate, if certain negotiations that have been going on through the usual channels are not successful. On the other hand, it could be reasonably short.

The question I ask Senator Langlois or the Leader of the Government is: In that event, what would be the intention with respect to further disposition of that or other bills by the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, my information is, although I have not seen it, that notice was served yesterday in the other place to the effect that the adjournment will take place after royal assent has been given to the three fiscal bills, one of which has already been passed by this chamber, and the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill. I am also informed that the latter measure is very important. It is being enacted at the request of all provinces of Canada, which are in agreement. I am also told that there is urgency because the Province of Ontario will have to pass enabling legislation some time during the month of January in order to implement its provisions.

It is my understanding—although I can give no definite information to honourable senators—that if this measure is not disposed of between now and Christmas, the other place could be recalled before the end of the month to pass it early in January at the latest.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My question is: In that event, is it the intention to resume the sittings of the Senate in order to pass that bill when it is passed in the other place?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is no question about the constitutional obligation of the Senate to meet to pass legislation received from the other place as quickly as possible. Apart from that, I want to know more about what is going on. I understand there are now, or there have been, meetings between the leaders in the other place. Perhaps later in the day we shall have a better appreciation of the situation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I should make it clear that I am not raising any objection to any particular way of proceeding. I was asking for information, because I know honourable senators are concerned.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think Senator Grosart will agree with my statement about our obligation with regard to legislation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Most certainly.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons to return Bill S-9, to amend the Copyright Act, and to acquaint the Senate that they have passed this bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Rubber stamp.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-261, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be now read a second time.

Honourable senators, Bill C-261 proposes changes in 45 items in the Canadian customs tariff. These changes include the implementation of two Tariff Board reports, without amendment, and a number of changes designed primarily to improve the competitive position of important Canadian industries.

May I direct attention to the table which has just been distributed to honourable senators, setting out rates of duty applicable to the goods or tariff items proposed by Bill C-261, and the corresponding rates in effect prior to the 1971 budget. This facilitates comparisons of the present rates and the proposed rates. So that the table may be readily available for reference, I would ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: As honourable senators are aware, the Canadian Customs Tariff is comprised of three schedules. Schedule A enumerates the goods subject to duty or which enter duty-free; Schedule B provides for drawback of customs duties on certain goods when used for specified purposes; and Schedule C lists those goods which are prohibited entry into Canada.

Clause 1 of the bill amends Schedule A to the Customs Tariff and should be considered with Schedule A to the bill.

There are 42 tariff items in this schedule. The most significant changes remove the duty on certain heavy fuel oils for a two-year period, establish a duty-free entry program for logging and sawmill machinery and implement the recommendations of the Tariff Board in its Report No. 141, on fractions of petroleum for petrochemical manufacturing, and Report No. 143, relating to polyethylene.

In its Report No. 141, the Tariff Board recommended that the existing rates of three-quarters of a cent per gallon British preferential tariff, and one cent per gallon most-favoured-nation tariff, on petroleum fractions, be reduced to one-third cent per gallon. This is the rate proposed in item 26910-1. Petroleum fractions represent a very significant element of cost to petrochemical manufacturers. For example, naphtha represents well over half the cost of making ethylene. The reduced rates should enable Canadian petrochemical manufacturers to compete more favourably with foreign manufacturers.

With respect to polyethylene, the Tariff Board, in its report under reference No. 143, recommended that the duties on polyethylene resin, item 93902-3, be increased from 7½ per cent to 10 per cent with corresponding increases from 10 per cent to 12½ per cent on moulding compounds, item 93902-42, and on sheet, film, rod, et cetera, item 93902-82, from 15 per cent to 17½ per cent. These new rates will be in line with the tariff on other Canadian-made plastics and with the rates established in the Kennedy Round. They will improve the competitive position of Canadian polyethylene producers who, according to the Tariff Board, have been faced with declining prices and higher raw material costs than those which producers in other countries are required to pay.

For the benefit of those who may be wondering what tariff reductions have had to be offered as compensation to our trading partners for the increases we are proposing in the tariffs on polyethylene, I would point out that the proposed new rates are those agreed to and bound under the Kennedy Round, and consequently do not require renegotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

So far as heavy fuel oils are concerned, provision is being made for the duty-free entry of numbers 5 and 6 heavy petroleum fuel oils for a two-year period. The current duty of one-third cent per gallon, item 26906-1, on these oils is equivalent to 11.7 cents per barrel. Canadian production has not been sufficient to meet domestic requirements. In 1970 Canadian production totalled 85 million barrels and about 34 million barrels had to be imported. Heavy fuel oil prices have been increasing sharply. It is expected that the pulp and paper industry alone—one of the principal applicants for tariff reduction on heavy fuel oils—will benefit to the extent of over $3.5 million annually.

With respect to logging and sawmill machinery, honourable senators are aware that in the course of the Kennedy Round of tariff negotiations a new program was established providing for the duty-free entry of production machinery when the machinery is not available from Canadian producers and when it is in the public interest to do so. The provisions of this program are now being extended to machinery used in logging and sawmill operations, item 41100-1. The existing rates of duty applicable to this machinery are 10 per cent British preferential and 12½ per cent most-favoured-nation tariff, items 41100-1 and 41105-1. Annual imports of logging and sawmill machinery in the amount of $20 million will now be eligible for free entry when not available from Canadian producers.

There are other amendments in the bill, but most of these other changes are of a clarifying or relieving nature and are of a relatively minor character. For example, provision is being made for lower duties on a diverse range of products such as paper pads for packaging fresh fruits, item 19947-1, machines for tanning or embossing leather, item 42000-1, patterning devices for the treatment of children suffering from cerebral palsy, items 47825-1 and 47826-1, and certain musical instruments, items 59745-1 and 59755-1. Duty-free entry is being extended to cover films, video tapes and sound recordings imported temporarily for dubbing into other languages, item 65820-1, and to a broader range of works of art, items 69515-1, 69516-1, 69520-1, 69525-1 and 69526-1.

• (1710)

Clause 2 of the bill introduces amendments to Schedule B to the Customs Tariff. As I have previously indicated, Schedule B consists of a number of items which provide for the drawback or refund, at varying rates, of the duty paid on certain goods used in specified Canadian manufacturing. Six existing Schedule B items (97003-1, 97011-1, 97019-1, 97020-1, 97027-1 and 97057-1) have not been used in recent years and are being deleted from the Customs Tariff. A new item (97045-1) is being introduced to provide a 99 per cent drawback of the duty paid on fire brick used in the construction or repair of coke ovens. An existing item now provides for a similar drawback on fire brick used in iron and steel furnaces. Drawback item 97008-1 is being amended to include pre-cut ribbons for the manufacture of hat bands.

Clause 3 of the bill amends Schedule C to the Customs Tariff by permitting the Governor in Council to waive the prohibition on the importation of metallic trading checks in certain instances.

The tariff changes set out in this bill came into effect on June 19, 1971, the day following the presentation of the 1971 budget. This, as you know, is customary when there are tariff changes. The relevant provision is contained in clause 4 of the bill.

Honourable senators, the copy of the bill on your desks is as at first reading, but no changes were made in it in the other house.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am sure that at this late hour of the day, month and year I will not be expected to offer any detailed criticism of the bill. Senator Goldenberg made reference towards the end of his remarks to clause 4 which to me, from a parliamentary point of view, is the most interesting clause. This is the clause which, once royal assent has been given, states that the bill shall be deemed to have come into force on June 19 last. As Senator Goldenberg said, this is customary, but it seems to me it is one of the customs we could do without. This and related bills which are intended to implement the ways and means motion of June 19 are some of the reasons we are in this difficult if not impossible position, and why we are here at this time waiting for bills to pass through the other house, some of which could have been passed a long time ago. At this stage it has taken the House of Commons only a day or so to pass this bill, and perhaps the same will apply to Bill C-272 which is within this same grouping. I make the same comment with respect to Bill C-260, which we passed this morning. I feel all of them could have been expedited through the House of Commons a long time ago.

Why does this custom persist? The obvious reason, of course, is that the ways and means resolution permits the clauses of this bill to be put into effect before the bill itself is approved by Parliament. One of the strangest consequences of this custom is that the more fully accepted it is, the longer is the period between the actual enactment by Parliament and the effective date of the bill. Perhaps this is human nature, but I suggest there is something wrong with our entire system of Parliament as well as with the introduction of bills into Parliament by the Government. Since the Government's intentions can be implemented by a ways and means motion, it is more likely to stretch the period of time between the enactment of the bill by Parliament and its effective date.

Honourable senators, I suggest that if there is anything which we in this chamber can do—and Senator Manning has suggested that there may be—I feel we should do it. This may be a matter which can be taken up by our Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, as Senator Manning has suggested. I do not know how effective that might be, but I hope the Senate will entrench rules to prevent bills being sent to us at the last possible moment when there are so few of us present to deal with them. There may be other honourable senators interested in discussing this bill who cannot be present.

This, of course, is one of a group of bills, and we are awaiting another. I do not know how long we will wait because that is up to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If Senator Grosart will allow me, I am advised that these amendments, in form, fit into the pattern of the amended Income Tax Act, and because that act has just been passed there has been a delay in bringing these other bills forward. This is the information given to me.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you for your intervention, Senator Goldenberg. But as you indicated earlier, this is customary, and whether it relates as it does in this particular case to problems regarding Bill C-259, this does not in any way change the general thrust of my argument. Whether or not we have had a long delay in dealing with problems relating to Bill C-259, if my recollection is correct we would be faced with this same situation.

• (1720)

The bill and its schedules are in themselves an indication of the complexity of legislation. Senator Goldenberg referred to some of the items, but not to others.

Honourable senators, to indicate the complexity of this type of legislation I might indicate some of the other items. In fact, the first is:

7801-1

Palms, ferns, rubber plants (Ficus), cannas, dahlias, paeonias, rhodedendrons including azaleas, pot-grown lilacs, araucarias and laurels.

7802-1

Gladiolus, as corms

7803-1

Hydrangeas and other pot-grown plants, n.o.p.; rose stock and other stock for grafting or budding, n.o.p.; bulbs, corms, tubers, rhizomes and dormant roots, n.o.p.

7804-1

Hydrangeas—

There is something, in a way, for all. There is plenty for the gardeners and, as I look through the bill, I see something even for youth in that glass beads are now exempt under the schedule to this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I heard some applause, and thought it might be from Senator Argue.

The major items covered by the bill seem to be intended to give relief from taxation and, therefore, some incentive in the domestic and export markets, to the petro-chemical industry. I have to say that the spokesmen for that industry have regarded it as rather picayune relief, far from the type of incentive the industry has requested of the Government and which it, in the view of many, has a right to expect.

That is all I have to say regarding this bill, honourable senators. I see no reason why it should not be dealt with expeditiously at this time. As far as I am concerned, the same comment applies to the other bills which we expect to receive.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I would ask the honourable sponsor of the bill for some information with respect to item 99208-1 in Schedule C. He may not have the answer to my question now, but perhaps he could obtain it.

I understand that Schedule C of the Customs Tariff contains prohibited articles. One item in that schedule is metallic trading checks in circular form, the description of which is to be changed by adding the words:

> —unless in any particular case or class of cases exempted from the provisions of this item by a regulation of the Governor in Council.

Does the honourable senator have information as to the type of regulations that may be enacted? On what basis will metallic trading checks in circular form be allowed to be imported into Canada?

I ask this question because during the past year a number of shipments of metallic coins have been held up at the border and refused entry into Canada. I believe the reason for the new provision is that it will allow them entry. I wonder what the regulations might provide for the future?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I can tell the honourable senator that with respect to metallic trading checks, the intention is to ensure that the imports are of the souvenir or memorial type, with respect to which the department received representations, and will not include the type of token which, for example, could be used illegally in vending machines.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I assume the honourable senator is referring to the very small print in Item 99208-1?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, there is still Bill C-275 to come to us from the other place. It is presently being dealt with. I am informed that it has reached the second reading stage, and it is anticipated that it will come to us early tomorrow afternoon. Later in the afternoon we shall have royal assent.

I assume it will be in order for us to adjourn now until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, and I so move. I stress the importance of the attendance of all honourable senators tomorrow to deal with that legislation, and also for royal assent.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the question is put, may I ask Senator Langlois if he has any information on the disposition in the House of Commons of Bill C-176, which was included in the motion of the leader of the house in the other place, and the Government's intention with respect to that bill and the time when the current session might end?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My information is that discussions are still taking place among the leaders of the various parties in the other place concerning the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. The vote on this piece of legislation appears to be quite uncertain. It is unlikely that the bill will reach us before we adjourn for Christmas, in which event the house will be recalled later in the year, or early in the new year. Honourable senators may be recalled between Christmas and New Year's Eve, or early in January, to deal with that bill.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

23351—113½

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 9, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Welch calling the attention of the Senate to certain shortcomings in the agricultural policy of the federal Government.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to take advantage of having adjourned this debate to make a few remarks particularly about the recent large sale of wheat to China that was announced on Saturday by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Honourable Otto Lang. This is the largest single sale of wheat ever made to communist China. Together with the excellent sales made to date this year, and the terrific movement of grain, it assures, barring strikes or something unforeseen, that during the present crop year there will be exported from Canada the largest quantity of grain in our history.

This is certainly a turnabout situation for the grain farmers so far as exports are concerned, and it is exceedingly welcome. I should like to point out that this accomplishment has not been easy. It has been made in the context of a very difficult world market for grain. It has been made in the context of a world market for export grain that has dropped 10 per cent this year.

Over the years it has been felt that Canada was not doing a good job of competing in the world market for grain, and there probably was a measure of truth in that sentiment; but today Canada is doing an outstanding job in the marketing of our grain in the export field and is now leading all the world in its accomplishments.

I have in my hand the latest Wheat Review, which is for November. It gives the total exports of wheat for this year from August to October. It shows that Australian exports this year as compared to last year were reduced from 91 million bushels to 80 million, a reduction of 12 per cent, American exports fell from 192 million to 146 million, a drop of 24 per cent, and Argentine exports dropped from about 22 million to just about five million, a drop of about 80 per cent.

While our competitors were losing sales in the export markets, Canada was increasing its exports from 131 million bushels one year ago to 160 million bushels in the same period this year, an increase of 22 per cent. I think that constitutes a very outstanding achievement for all those connected with the grain business.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Argue: A few years ago when the Honourable Alvin Hamilton was Minister of Agriculture he was regarded as an excellent salesman. Almost everyone said that he was doing a terrific job. In his first year as minister, Canada exported just over 428 million bushels of grain while in the following year, 1962-63, Canada exported 394 million bushels of grain. Exports were in the neighbourhood of 400 million bushels of grain per year. But a conservative estimate is that Canada will export 725 million bushels this year. As I say, everyone said that Alvin Hamilton was a supersalesman, so apparently Otto Lang is twice as good a supersalesman. I do not know what word you would use to indicate his outstanding success, but the success is not his alone; it is due to all those connected with the grain business.

I said in this chamber a year ago when I was being quite critical of the LIFT program that I thought the so-called surplus situation had been overemphasized. I would suggest today that for 80 per cent of the farmers of western Canada, as far as they are individually concerned, at the end of the current crop year there is no surplus problem. Their granaries by and large will be empty. The markets are fabulous as far as farmers, marketing and sales are concerned.

General wheat quotas are six bushels per acre, Durum ten bushels per acre, flax quotas 8 bushels per acre, barley quotas 10 bushels per acre, with many extra quotas for specific types of grain, and this in the first four months of the present crop year. There is still a surplus problem for a small percentage of farmers who have large quantities of grain on their farms, but for the bulk of the farmers there is no particular individual surplus.

But there are difficulties in the export markets for grain, and the great difficulty is that the price has weakened. The price for number 1 northern wheat is now $1.66 per bushel which is 16 cents over the established initial price. The selling price for durum wheat is $1.53 per bushel, just three cents over the initial price. All this indicates that there will be no final payment or else a very small final payment. There has been an excellent job of selling grain in a very difficult and conservative market, but certainly there will be no large payment and perhaps none at all by way of final payment.

If the Government, as I anticipate it will, does have to pay anything out of the federal treasury into Wheat Board accounts in order to cover the deficit for this year, then the Government will be asking itself whether or not the present initial price for grain should be carried forward into the new year or whether there should be some adjustment, and there will be those who will say, "Lower the initial prices." Some will say that we should lower the initial prices. Before any announcement is made, I would like to state that it would be folly to lower the initial prices from any standpoint. These prices are rock bottom as far as the farmers are concerned. Their total income per bushel of wheat will be considerably less than it was two or three years ago. Their costs go up every year, so it is essential that these initial prices be maintained.

I am appealing to the Leader of the Government in this chamber, the Honourable Paul Martin, that when this matter is being considered, he make such representations regarding the maintenance of initial prices. The farmers are making a tremendous contribution to the balance of payments through the sale of wheat. They have not in any way contributed to inflation in this country. In fact, their entire operation has assisted in controlling inflation. I suggest that this is the very minimum which should be done. I have mentioned other matters which we could deal with.

There is one other item in the general agricultural field which I would mention at this time, and that is the welcome prospect of the establishment of a Roumanian tractor plant in Canada, namely, in the Province of Saskatchewan. The component parts will be imported to Saskatchewan from Roumania and will be assembled and sold within this country. This is a very important development for a number of reasons. It promises to bring industry to a province which is greatly in need of industrial development. It promises competition in the field of farm machinery where there has been little effective competition in the past. The report of the Barber Royal Commission indicates, at page 133, that the prices for larger tractors seem to be unduly high. The report indicates that a company operates on a gross margin of 32 per cent for a 90 horsepower tractor. They use the higher margin on larger tractors to offset smaller profits on smaller tractors. The Roumanian plant will be building tractors up to 100 horsepower. One of our colleagues, the Honourable Sidney Buckwold, played a personal role in the negotiations which led to this prospective plant being established in Saskatchewan. He has played an outstanding role and should be congratulated. The report indicates that this plant may reduce prices up to 40 per cent on some tractors, depending on horsepower.

Apparently the Government of Saskatchewan is prepared to play a considerable part in the establishment of this industry. I feel this is a welcome move. The Premier of Saskatchewan, in announcing the establishment of this plant, was not clear as to the precise role his government would play, but he indicated it would be substantial.

• (1420)

In a news story on the establishment of the tractor plant, the Regina Leader-Post of December 17 quotes the Premier of Saskatchewan as saying:

> We don't regard it as the type of industry where the government should necessarily have a majority voice . . . . To achieve its objectives—

The objectives of the tractor plant.

> —it must maintain a measure of control over its project—

In another place he is quoted as saying that the Saskatchewan Government may take an equity position of between 30 to 49 per cent of the shares of the company.

I would suggest that the federal Government should give a good deal of attention to this prospective plant for Saskatchewan. A good deal of attention may already have been given; I do not have any inside information. The Canada Development Corporation has now been established. Perhaps a minority interest in a plant such as this is not the type of involvement that the Canada Development Corporation could undertake as it would not be in the control of a Canadian company. Nevertheless, the Canadian Government has played and is playing an important role in the development of the Arctic through PanArctic Oil, in which it has a 45 per cent equity interest. I think the federal Government should consider participating in a minority way on an equity basis in this plant. I would think that very good results would flow from that participation. It would add to the prestige of the plant and help sell the tractor production in other provinces. Active promotion by the federal Departments of Agriculture and of Industry, Trade and Commerce would go a considerable distance in assisting the plant to enter markets on the North American continent and elsewhere in the world.

The federal Government obviously feels it has a role in and a responsibility for doing something about high agricultural machinery prices. It would seem to me that it should consider, if invited, playing a role in the promotion, operation and eventual success of this important undertaking. The main benefit that can flow from it is a reduction in prices of agricultural tractors. There is some indication that if this company is successful it may enter the field of manufacture of other large farm implements.

I rise in the Senate at this time for two purposes. The first is to point out the excellent record of Canada in the grain markets of the world. The second is to request the Government to consider seriously whether or not it could successfully participate in the establishment of an important new industry in Canada which might well lead to a substantial reduction in the prices of farm implements.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable senator be good enough to tell us the main reason for the large increase in grain sales last year? Was it because of price? Secondly, who determines the price?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Well, Canada certainly had to be competitive. I do not know all the details of this operation, but certainly Canada has had to be competitive in prices at all times. Perhaps in the past we have held our prices a little too long and a little too high, and in so doing have missed some sales. On this occasion we have been exceedingly aggressive, and at times our prices have come down.

The extra effort of the Canadian Wheat Board in making trips abroad, the effort by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the efforts of the Prime Minister and others to maintain and improve our relations with other nations have no doubt contributed to the success of our exports. Part of that success has resulted from co-operation within this country in delivering to market the type of grains required at a given time. Sometimes we have lost sales because we were unable to place a particular grade of a particular grain on the export market at a particular time. Price has also been a factor, and Canada has been very competitive in this regard.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I believe this is the first occasion I have spoken on a matter concerning agriculture. I do so now because of circumstances which honourable senators will, I am sure, understand. Before the session ends we may receive a very important bill relating to Canadian agriculture, and perhaps it will not be taken amiss if at this time I get in a little practice.

I am sure that members of the house were delighted to hear Senator Argue speak on a happy and sweet note in connection with the policy of any government on agriculture, particularly with regard to grain. I thought that high note of sweetness might be maintained, but before he had proceeded very far his speech turned to what I might call a sweet and sour note.

Senator Argue found it necessary to refer to prices. I am in no position to say whether it is better for Canada to sell less wheat at high prices, or more wheat at low prices. That is something entirely beyond my sphere of knowledge on this subject. He made generous reference to those whom he called supersalesmen who over the years had played a part in this regard, and referred to the Honourable Alvin Hamilton and the Honourable Otto Lang. It occurs to me that at a time when we in the Senate need all the aid and comfort we can get, he might have referred also to the greatest supersalesman of all, Senator McNamara, who unfortunately is not present in the chamber at this moment.

I have followed, in a cursory manner, the record of sales to the People's Republic of China, in which I have a long-standing interest, and I have always been amazed by the skill of Senator McNamara, in his capacity as Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, in dealing with what was then usually referred to as mainland China when conditions for selling abroad, particularly to that country, were not the easiest.

I noticed that the Leader of the Government frowned when Senator Argue, in his opening remarks, referred to that country as "Communist" China. Senator Argue's comment was understandable, arising from habit, and no doubt he will be under continual correction by the Leader of the Government as time goes on.

• (1430)

In connection with the Roumanian tractor plant I am not clear, and I do not think Senator Argue made it clear, as to just what the position is in relation to the ownership and capital investment in that plant. To me it has always been an anomaly with respect to foreign ownership that on the one hand we have people decrying the influx of foreign capital into Canada, but whenever a situation arises where capital comes into Canada to build plants—and even, as in this case, where the plant will compete with our own existing industry—we rise up and cheer. I am not taking one side or the other at the moment in this argument, but it is a fact that over and over again the very people who are most concerned about foreign ownership seem to be the first ones to rise up and cheer if foreign ownership provides us with additional industrial or agricultural capacity.

In saying this I do not for a moment want to dampen Senator Argue's enthusiasm. This is the season of good cheer, and I am sure we are all grateful to him for having introduced this cheerful note into an atmosphere which might otherwise be slightly lugubrious.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, it is quite appropriate for Senator Argue to raise this matter at this particular time, coming as he does from Saskatchewan which is an area that has probably been affected more adversely than any other part of Canada as a result of the decline in wheat prices and wheat markets in the last few years. It is one of the best Christmas presents that could come to the farmers in that particular province. Farmers are good spenders, and anything that helps the farmers in this country helps every other element of the economy as well. I join with Senator Argue and Senator Grosart in saying that this is indeed a very good Christmas present.

Senator Argue touched upon a quite serious aspect of the situation, and that is that the farmer is generally at the bottom of the cost-price squeeze. His situation in relation to other elements of the Canadian economy has not improved in terms of his share of the dollar received for his product. While the farming population is continuing to decline it does, nevertheless, represent a segment of the Canadian economy which has a high capital investment, a segment of the Canadian economy which makes high expenditures in proportion to the number of individuals involved. The farmers contribute a major share to the welfare of industry in Canada as well. In my opinion, it is time that more attention was paid to the welfare of the farm economy. The farming population, particularly on the Prairies, has not been getting as fair a deal as it should in terms of the percentage of the dollar it receives for its product.

This is a time of good news. It happens that I had the good fortune in 1966 to take a group of Canadian businessmen to China and at that time—and I think Senator Martin will recognize this—with the co-operation of Mr. Frank Hamilton and Mr. Vic Martens of the Board of Grain Commissioners, we had some little influence in helping to bring about a particularly large sale of wheat.

On this occasion Mr. Chris Vogel of the Canadian Wheat Board and my good friend, Mr. Charles Gibbings have done a magnificent job, as Senator Argue has said. These two men have succeeded in getting a greater share of the total wheat market than anyone else. Much of this has been due to the fact that in the person of Charlie Gibbings particularly, we have a very able, attractive, and effective salesman for Canada. He does a good job wherever he is, and we are fortunate in having a man of his calibre in that position.

On this same note, I received word the day before yesterday that the People's Republic of China has agreed to allow me to take another group of Canadian businessmen to China, leaving on March 31. Possibly we can extend our market to other things besides wheat. You can be assured that we will be in there pitching for all we are worth.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As long as you do not go before royal assent.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I can assure you that you are safe.

While good news is abroad I should like to refer to one other thing—the announcement which Senator Manning mentioned the other day about the development of the Syncrude oil plant on the tar sands at Fort McMurray. This is a tremendous operation. Senator Manning said it will employ 9,000 men, but it will go beyond that. He was very modest in what he had to say. Mr. Spragins, the head of one of the oil companies associated with this development, said only this afternoon that his company alone would be spending $365 million on that plant, and it is only one of the group. He said that the population of the town of Fort McMurray, which now is about 7,000, will increase to at least 16,000 or 20,000 in the next five years.

This is good news for all of Canada, but I am particularly happy when good news comes for Western Canada because we can stand it. This is good news not only for Western Canada, but for all of Canada.

It is most appropriate that Senator Argue should raise this matter. It could not have come at a better time. I hope my colleagues in the Senate will remember, however, that a great deal of adjustment needs to be made yet in the return that the wheat farmers get for their product in relation to its costs. If we rectify that we will have done something to further the economy of the country, and also the image of the Senate at a time when it has been much maligned.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be allowed to make a brief response to some of the remarks of Senator Grosart. Certainly I acknowledge with him the great contribution Senator McNamara has made as Chairmam of the Canadian Wheat Board in selling Canadian grain. Over the years in the other place and in the Agriculture Committee, and in the Senate, I have continuously paid appropriate tribute to Senator McNamara for his wonderful work. If I overlooked it today, I apologize, but I think I did include him in a very general way by saying that all sectors of the grain business contributed to this achievement.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Senator McNamara also played a part this year during the course of his trip to China with the trade mission.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Yes, when he went to the People's Republic of China as part of an official delegation.

My own stand on foreign ownership is that while I am certainly in favour of Canadian ownership, I do not think I have ever said we should exclude foreign ownership. One of the strongest advocates of Canadian ownership, the Honourable Walter Gordon, used to say that if we had a 25 per cent interest in a given industry it was a substantial measure of Canadian ownership, and would probably influence the policies of that industry. The Prime Minister of Canada has said that in promoting Canadian ownership and considering foreign ownership there would be a different emphasis on particular investments from a particular country at a particular time. In other words, if investment in some industry is made by countries other than the United States, that might be preferable to larger and larger investments being made by that single country.

• (1440)

As to the competition of this tractor plant with Canadian industry, I suggest it would compete only in a very minor way. I do not believe Canada has a large tractor industry. In Winnipeg, it is true, there is a versatile manufacturing company which puts out an excellent tractor, but it is of extremely high horsepower. The Roumanian plant, as far as I know, would not be competing with any tractor industry in our country.

Honourable senators, I certainly welcome Senator Grosart's contribution to this debate. He has a wide knowledge of economic affairs in Canada. I do not know whether he would have to make two or three speeches to become an expert, but I am sure that in a very brief time, if he is not already one, he would become an expert in this field and would make a more valuable contribution.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, at the risk of appearing to join the mutual admiration society, I would like to associate myself with the comments made this afternoon regarding the wheat sales, with the compliments to the minister responsible, the Honourable Otto Lang, and also with the comments made in the other place about our colleague the honourable Senator William McNamara.

I must confess that I was somewhat disappointed at the publicity the wheat sale obtained here in the eastern provinces. This was the largest single wheat sale ever with China. In western terms, it is an extremely important sale, but from an overall Canadian standpoint we must recognize that this is a major step forward once again. Not only does it make a great difference to the prairie farmers in respect to cash income, but it is also for the port of Vancouver, the railway companies, the whole of the western economy, a tremendous injection of cash.

The effect of this on Canada's balance of trade is one that must be recognized.

At times in the west we have the feeling that the contribution of western agriculture to the whole Canadian trade pattern is not sufficiently appreciated. As I have said, I really felt that the press in eastern Canada did not understand the importance of this sale and the impact that it will have on the whole of the Canadian economy.

In this regard we have to look at what Canada has been doing on the overall scene to achieve this. I recognize that some people have been critical of the approach of the Canadian Government in the foreign affairs field with regard to Russia, and some have been critical of the recognition of the People's Republic of China. I hope that none of this would ever be considered to be anti-American, anti-British, anti-Common Market or anti-anyone, but simply sound common sense from a Canadian and, in fact, from a world standpoint.

We are now seeing the benefits of the Canadian attitude. We are seeing the results of the sensible long-term Canadian foreign affairs approach, of the sensible world approach. We have to compliment all those who have participated in this development. At times, it required a great deal of courage to stand up for what in some quarters would be considered a radical attitude, but I repeat that this is a sensible attitude from the Canadian standpoint and from the world standpoint. I am proud that the Canadian Government has taken this approach. I am pleased that this approach is now showing concrete results within Canada.

Honourable senators, we must recognize that the Canadian Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners also deserve great commendation in this regard. In the past there has been criticism that the Wheat Board, the Board of Grain Commissioners and our trade services have not been sufficiently aggressive in agricultural sales. When we look back over the years, we see that, there again, the pattern has been one of sound development, going back to the first wheat sale to China. Our colleague Senator McNamara was immediately involved in that; he was the man who went to China for that first wheat sale.

Beginning with that sale, and then the subsequent changes in the grading system for Canadian wheat, the establishment of protein grading, we became more aggressive. All this is now being reflected in a far larger movement of Canadian grain than ever before. In fact, the movement of Canadian grains this past season has been such that our transportation system simply could not handle any more.

There are other honourable senators present who can speak with more knowledge of this than I—notably, the honourable Senator Paterson, who over the years has been intimately involved in this question of the movement of grains. The Canadian Government will have to consider what might be done in the future to ensure that this movement continues.

This fall—again with no complaints from our side, because we were selling all we could—the Americans were able to enter into a major corn contract for the sale of corn to Russia. One of the reasons was that at that stage we were unable to supply feed grain. Our transportation system and elevator system were working to capacity. At that time we thought we would have to consider improvements in that area, which might include more terminals, to facilitate shipping. Again, it might involve changes in the internal transportation system. We had a discussion the other day about the unit train moving prairie grain to seaboard.

A very close look must be taken at this whole field. It would appear that the demand for grains, and particularly feed grains, will continue at a fairly high level. Very recently—in fact, in the last week of November and the first week of December—a group of Canadian parliamentarians spent one week in Washington dealing purely with agricultural matters. I was pleased to be able to represent the Senate, along with four members of the House of Commons and one member of the Saskatchewan Legislature. We went to Washington under the auspices of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade. Our time was spent in the United States Department of Agriculture dealing directly with those involved in all the areas we wanted to discuss. We were impressed by the aggressive attitude of the United States Department of Agriculture in its sales approach. We were pleased to learn from them that there were many things in our system that they admired. They frankly admired our Wheat Board system of handling grains. They admired the programs that the Canadian Department of Agriculture had put through some two years ago to deal with our then surplus of wheat—that is, the LIFT program—and the subsequent program of the Board of Grain Commissioners for going on to protein standards.

• (1450)

From our point of view, we were impressed by the emphasis that the United States Department of Agriculture places on feed grains. They emphasize one area, in particular, that to many Canadians is not of as great importance as it might be, and that is their soybean crop. Soybean meal for feed purposes has become a major export item for the United States. They told us that they were watching Canadian oil production. The comparable crop for us is rapeseed, which, in the final analysis, will be the crop to compete with the soybean.

Up to this time we have not been able to produce out of our rapeseed a meal that can be used for feed. At the moment, from a Canadian standpoint, rapeseed is basically an oil product, not a meal product. It would appear, however, from what we learned in the United States, that technical changes can be effected to make the rapeseed meal useable for feed purposes, so that Canada will, in that instance too, be able to take a major step forward in producing export products.

The demand for feed is increasing throughout the world. As the so-called underdeveloped countries move from a vegetable diet to a meat diet, the demand for Canadian feed grains increases. Hopefully, as I have mentioned, once the technical details have been overcome for the production of rapeseed meal, Canadian agriculture will take a great step forward.

This brings me back to the point I made earlier, that we must have either a truly efficient transportation system or a sufficient storage system in order to handle the grain. Because our production is basically centred in the Prairies, we must have either the means of rapid movement of grain to the seaboard, in order not to miss out on potential sales, or we must have an adequate seaboard storage system to permit us to hold grain for sale on demand.

I think we can look with optimism at the Canadian grain situation today, and that is a far cry from the situation two years ago, when we did not know what to do with our surplus. I recognize the risk in making such a statement, because I know that in the past our farmers have been told, "You grow it, and we will sell it", and they have grown wheat which has not been sold. It did not always work out in the past, but I think the picture has changed; the more aggressive attitude we have taken on sales and the improvements we have put through have given us good cause for optimism. Nevertheless, this must be backed up with appropriate programs to ensure that we are able to deliver, because there is no possibility of building up a permanent foreign market unless we can guarantee delivery of the kinds of grain our foreign purchasers want, when they want them.

I believe there is a challenge here both to the Canadian agricultural industry and the Canadian Government to ensure that we do not miss out on a wonderful opportunity.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: May I ask Senator Molgat a question? To what extent is rapeseed oil used for cooking? I understand it is used by Canada Packers to some extent, but I also understand that it could be used in greater quantities. What move has been made to put rapeseed oil on the market for cooking purposes?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I must confess, Senator Inman, that I am not an expert in food oils, but my understanding is that rapeseed oil is now completely competitive with all other edible oils. At one time there was a problem in using rapeseed oil because of the presence of erucic acid, but I understand that has now largely been eliminated by the development of new varieties of rapeseed. I believe rapeseed is now completely competitive in the edible oils field.

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, a little light has been thrown on foreign trade, and I should like to point out something rather new, which would be of interest to Senator Grosart and other honourable senators.

You have all heard it said, again and again, that the United States has $53 billion in paper money in Europe and Asia, but only $10 billion in gold to repatriate it. So it has been said time and again that the United States is bankrupt. Well, it may be bankrupt up to a point, that of repatriating that money. Up to now there have been only two ways to repatriate it—either with gold or with trade. Another way has cropped up, and it has become apparent that while some European countries were satisfied with the monetary situation and were willing to bide their time with respect to the value of the American dollar, nevertheless, some of them are weakening slightly and are beginning to buy American securities. It will not be long before they will want to buy more Canadian securities, if they have not already done so. To what extent that will happen, I do not know; but the point I wish to make is that the United States must sell its wheat—it must sell its wheat, its corn, its soybeans and everything else. It is not a question of whether they can sell it; they must sell it. They must sell every kind of export product they can find a market for, otherwise they will be ruined. They have to find ways and means to repatriate that money. It is a serious situation because, as you all recognize, if they cannot repatriate that money it will start going down, and we would not be in a very comfortable position here if the American dollar were to go down to 50 cents. We do not want to see that happen. So they have to correct their balance of trade. If you watch the statistics they will tell the tale, that if the Americans cannot correct that adverse balance of trade, then their dollar will not maintain its value.

• (1500)

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to this discussion. At the outset, I also would like to commend the Wheat Board for its outstanding sale of some 117 million bushels of wheat to the People's Republic of China, and, in congratulating the Wheat Board, also to congratulate the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang. We must also commend the Government of the day for its policy affecting trade generally and trade as far as western grain producers are concerned. We can have an aggressive Wheat Board selling policy and we can have an aggressive minister, as we have; but unless our nation, through its other governmental departments, has aggressive trade policies and international relations that lend themselves to co-operation with other nations, such sales will not be possible.

Honourable senators, I should also like to stress at this time that as welcome as the sale of 117 million bushels is, and as great as the sales may be this crop year and next, it does not mean that the problems of agriculture affecting grains has been solved. I would not like members of this chamber, members of the Government or members of the public outside of western Canada, to feel that the problem is solved as far as the grain industry in the west is concerned. We do want and we do need sales, and a great number of them, for our grain producers. But these sales are of much less value—and, in fact, may get to the point, if they have not done so already, of being harmful rather than helpful—if the price is not sufficient to return to the farmer his cost of production and a reasonable return on his time and invested dollar. We are dealing with a situation today where there is, in fact, no world agreement on the price of wheat, and I think the figure Senator Argue used for sales at the moment was somewhere in the region of $1.60 per bushel. The International Wheat Agreement we were operating under previously was set at $1.95½ cents per bushel, and if the price was even close to a realistic figure it would certainly be $1.95½ cents rather than $1.60 which we are now realizing for that grain.

Honourable senators, I would encourage this chamber, and through it the Government of Canada, to continue to work, as I know they are working, on the international scene to see that we do have a world price agreement established that will give our farmers a fair return on their time, work and investment.

Some time ago the Government of Canada established what can be referred to as a two-price system for wheat, and at that time the regulation was such that the Wheat Board must sell to Canadian mills, regardless of the world market price, at a price of $$1.95½ cents per bushel. This would add, I would estimate, to the Wheat Board pool upwards of $12 million to $20 million per year. If we are going to welcome sales, which we are, we must see that the farmer gets a fair return for his production. There are two ways of doing this: the first is to endeavour to get a fair price on the world market; and the second is to have the consumers in our own country pay a fair and reasonable price for farm products. In the discussion today I shall refer directly to wheat and wheat products for use in bread.

There have been many resolutions forwarded to the Government by farm organizations and political parties asking for a two-price system for wheat that would see to it that the mills in Canada paid at least somewhat upward of $3 per bushel for home consumption rather than $1.95½ cents.

Assuming we use for consumption in Canada somewhere around 60 million bushels per year—and I understand that in the last year or two the figure was somewhat less than that—then, at a $3-per-bushel figure it would give the wheat producers, through the Wheat Board, an additional $60 million. This is not a great deal of money and it will not solve the price problem of the farmers, but at least it is $60 million more than the farmers are receiving today.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board stated, according to the press report, that the sale to China would give to the western farmers $100 million. My figures show that it should be at least $150 million. If Senator Argue wishes to make a statement now, I would ask for his comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Argue: My understanding is that the amount that should be received is $100 million in this crop year, and I think part of that grain will be sold in the next crop year, the calendar year 1971-72. I think that some balance of that crop agreement will be sold during the next crop year, the calendar year 1972. As Senator Sparrow indicated, the total amount of money will be $160 million or more, of which $100 million will come into the current wheat year which ends July 31 next.

• (1510)

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Thank you, Senator Argue.

In all fairness to the Prairie wheat producers, I believe the Canadian consumer should pay a greater share of the farmers' operating costs than he is presently paying. Although on many occasions the Canadian farmer asks for and receives subsidies from the Government in large amounts, I believe the consumer could pay more directly for the product he buys, I refer to the two-price system for wheat which raises the per bushel price to at least $3. This would bring $60 million more to the Prairie producer and, in turn, only raise the price of bread approximately two cents per loaf. I do not feel this is an unreasonable amount to ask the consumer to pay.

Having made that statement, I will back it up with some figures. I am referring to the cost of bread per loaf. I have obtained figures illustrating the working time required to purchase one loaf of bread in Canada and in other countries. It costs the Canadian four minutes of work while in the United States it costs the consumer six minutes of work. In France a loaf of bread costs 11 minutes of work, in Japan 27 minutes. The price varies from the product of four minutes' work in Canada to that of 27 minutes' work in Japan. This indicates that the Canadian consumer is able to obtain a cheaper product than consumers in other countries. Perhaps this is unfair to the agricultural producer.

Between the years 1961 and 1969 the farm output in Canada increased by 31 per cent. The per person increase for an agricultural workman rose by 67 per cent. The man-hour output in agriculture rose by 76.5 per cent. Let us compare these figures with those for commercial industry in Canada. The output of Canadian industry rose by only 21.4 per cent in the same period of time—that is, a 21.4 per cent increase as compared with a 31 per cent increase in the agricultural industry. The number of man-hours in commercial industries rose by only 27.5 per cent while the comparable increase in farming was 76.5 per cent.

It seems very unfair to me while the agricultural industry is so efficient and has had such an increase in output and man-hours, and yet the farmers end up with less net income than they enjoyed previously.

The Government, through the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture, proposed an income stabilization plan for the western producer. That plan has not been put into effect. It was either withdrawn or not proceeded with due to pressure from some farm organizations and from Opposition parties. The result is that has been delayed and I hope it is only a delay—a delay that has cost the western producer some $60 million.

Senator Argue has asked the Leader of the Government in this house to carry a message to his colleagues in the cabinet. I request the leader to take a further message to the cabinet to the effect that western agriculture needs a stabilization plan for income. I hope, if it is not possible to bring this matter before the other place during this session, that it will receive top priority in the next session of Parliament.

Western Canada agriculture requires a stabilization plan for income. Although the stabilization plan which was previously proposed did not meet all the criteria, and has not have solved all the problems, I am sure that many—and perhaps the majority—individual farmers in the western provinces felt it was a good basic plan that should be on the statute books. From such a plan would flow additional plans and additional funds which would benefit western agriculture.

Once again, I request the Government to bring in that plan, even without any changes. If there should happen to be changes for the better, I am sure they will be well received. I feel, as many of the western farmers feel, that it was a good basic plan which could be built upon to the advantage of western agriculture. As I have mentioned, some farm organizations took exception to it; some discounted it entirely, while others agreed with it in principle but opposed the bill itself. These organizations were not considering the welfare of the western producers, but were looking inward at their own political structure, hoping to improve their image with their membership, and the additional membership they hope to obtain, to the detriment of the farmer himself.

• (1520)

In my opinion it is time that the farm organizations and the farmers of the west organize on a better structure—perhaps on a one-farm basis—that would represent not only the farmers but also the agro-business. There could then be for Parliament one strong voice from the west.

I have great sympathy with the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. They receive so many differing opinions regarding farm programs that I am surprised the agricultural industry in the west has made as much progress as it has in the last year or two.

Certainly, prices for farm products must be increased. Apart from that, however, the agricultural policies of the federal Government have solved many problems for western agriculture. They have, at least, laid the foundation for the solution to many of the problems. One, of course, was the stabilization bill which the Government attempted to bring in and which I hope will be brought back. In the last two years the transportation organization for the movement of grain has been made more efficient. Increased marketing aggressiveness is reflected in greatly improved sales. Our storage and handling facilities are much more efficient than they were even three years ago.

Protein grading will be a boon to our farmers because of the openings in the international market it will produce. The proposal of the Minister of Agriculture for a farm adjustment program, making it possible for farmers to retire in a dignified manner and for young farmers to begin farming, is a worth while one. I hope to see in this session of Parliament national marketing legislation passed in both houses.

I wish to comment on Senator Argue's statement with respect to the possible Roumanian tractor plant in the Province of Saskatchewan. Perhaps he will answer when I am finished, but I understood that it was to be only an assembly plant.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: It is not a manufacturing plant?

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, it is to be only for assembly.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: In any event, I shall certainly welcome the plant into the Province of Saskatchewan, as I would welcome any industry from anywhere in the world, be it American or otherwise.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I rise briefly to comment on one or two matters which have been directed to me as a member of the Government.

First of all, I say to Senator Grosart that whatever may have been the discomfort that attended his observations with respect to this item, he need not apologize. I would inform him that I would sooner hear him speak of agriculture than on some of the items to which I heard him address himself in recent days.

In my opinion, it is appropriate that we should almost terminate our discussions in this session with a consideration of Senator Welch's inquiry with respect to federal agricultural policy. We are all indebted to Senator Argue for his contribution today, which was a continuation of the observations he made earlier on the same subject, though in a different vein.

The vagaries of human affairs are pretty well demonstrated by Senator Molgat's reminder that not many months ago we were all concerned with the formidable wheat surplus that reposed on our prairie lands. Today we have seen such a diminution in that surplus, in such a relatively short time, as to arouse our hopes and justify our optimism. The reason for this has been stated by several honourable senators. Senator Argue referred, quite appropriately, to the work of a former Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Mr. Hamilton and, if I may say so, particularly to the work of my colleague, the Honourable Mr. Lang and the ever-present work of the Wheat Board itself.

It must not be forgotten that the Wheat Board is the main wheat salesman of the Government and its work under Senator McNamara and his successor deservedly has won the commendation of senators.

As Senator Argue mentioned, recently when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made the first official visit by a minister of the Government to the People's Republic of China, Mr. McNamara was a member of the delegation. He was perhaps more familiar with our commercial relationships, particularly in connection with wheat sales, than any other member of the delegation.

Senator Cameron, quite appropriately, mentioned his several visits as head of private delegations of businessmen. He told us that he has recently received word that a further visit by him and a group of Canadian businessmen has been agreed to. All of those contacts have paid off and are part of a never-ending process by government departments concerned to bring about increased volume of sales on behalf of our country, which depends to such a large extent on its exports.

• (1530)

Senator Argue referred to plans for the establishment in Saskatchewan of a Roumanian tractor plant. I am not familiar with this particular project, although perhaps I should be, but I will make myself familiar with it and will bring it to the attention of my colleagues, as well as the observations made by Senator Argue.

It must be remembered that trade is a two-way street. We cannot hope to just sell our wheat. We have also to be prepared to import either goods or services and, depending upon the arrangements made concerning this plant, it could be regarded as an import of services. Canada has a trade agreement with Roumania, and although our volume of trade is not great, we have a balance in our favour. We must give consideration to ways and means of narrowing the gap and to making the arrangements more worth while for that country, just as we have done in respect of China and the Soviet Union, both of which countries are heavy buyers of our wheat.

We cannot go on indefinitely selling but not buying, whether it be goods or services. We were forcefully reminded of this fact during the visit to Ottawa of Mr. Kosygin. He pointed out that we have a trade treaty with his country which has twice been renewed, that we were the beneficiary by far on the positive side of the balance sheet, and that we should give consideration to better equalizing the arrangement. Both federal and provincial governments have been concerned about this problem, because the Soviet Union is an important potential and actual market for Canadian wheat.

The same is true of China. The recent purchase of wheat by China, which as Senator Argue mentioned is a very large one, represents part of a commercial treaty which demands an effort on our part to balance the arrangement. That we will endeavour to do, taking into account our other interests.

Let no one underestimate the importance of these two large markets, the Soviet Union and China. When Mr. Kosygin was in Ottawa he told us, without equivocation, that if the price were right Canada would be given first consideration as a vendor of wheat. This places Canada in a very important and preferred position of which we must take advantage. However, that advantage must be taken in a responsible manner by the recognition by Canada of the two-way character of trade itself.

Senator Sparrow, in asking me to carry a message to the cabinet, pointed to the improvement in arrangements during the past year or so. He mentioned improvement in the marketing organization, in transportation, and in storage arrangements. These and other improvements have been effected by the Honourable Mr. Lang who comes from Saskatchewan and who, on that account, might be expected to have a special appreciation of the problem.

Senator Argue urged us not only to sell more wheat but to bring about, through our policies, an improvement in the revenue position of wheat farmers. I can assure the honourable senator that this matter is the subject of concern not only to the federal Government but to provincial governments. The welfare of our economy is dependent on each section of the country. The prosperity of western farmers is reflected in all other sections of the community.

Senator Sparrow suggested that the matter of stabilization of farm income should be given top priority during the next session of Parliament. I assure him that I will convey his message to the Government as well as to the ministers concerned. Senator Sparrow also mentioned the Farm Products Marketing Agencies bill, which is not yet before us. We do not know when we shall be called upon to deal with this measure, but we know that it is of interest to all ten provinces. I can assure Senator Sparrow that when the other house has dealt with the bill, which is likely to be debated between Christmas and the New Year, there will be no delay on the part of the Senate in giving the measure full consideration.

We are all grateful to Senator Argue for raising this matter. I assure him that his interest is shared by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, it has often been said that one of the great advantages of prolonged discussions is that if one listens carefully one will come to understand the subject matter much better at the end than at the beginning. A number of senators have echoed Senator Argue's praise for the Government's activity. However, I am particularly grateful to Senator Molgat, Senator Sparrow and others for making it clear that obviously there is a great deal of room for improvement in Government policy as it affects western agriculture, so that whatever Christmas toasts may ring around the homes of western farmers, one of them will not be to $1.60 wheat.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, in the light of what has been said, may I be permitted to make a further brief comment. When speaking previously, I concentrated largely on the movement of our agricultural products from the Prairies, because I consider this to be a serious long range problem. We have had a problem in the past, we have it presently, and, in my opinion, it is going to be with us for a while yet, unless prices change drastically. We are facing the problem of the cost-price squeeze. This is a problem that can be understood only by visiting a farmer, and ascertaining the prices he is getting today for his products and the prices he is paying for the products he has to buy.

• (1540)

It is expected in any industry today that every year there is going to be a wage increase of 5, 6, or 7 per cent, and our whole economy seems to be geared to that annual wage increase. However, farmers' prices are not geared to such an annual increase. The Western Canada farmer today is not getting any more for his grain. In fact, he is getting less—

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He is getting much less.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: He is getting less today than he was 15 years ago. There is no comparison between the cost of the products he buys, and the prices he receives for his products. This problem is a continuing one, and one that we shall have to face if our agricultural industry is to survive as a prosperous industry and not as a poverty industry.

The Hon. the Speaker: This inquiry is now considered as having been debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, as we have now exhausted our business for today I think an explanation is due with respect to what is expected of us for the remainder of the day. I need not remind the house that it is quite difficult to get definite and reliable information from the other place as to what progress is expected there. I have done my best, but so far I am not in a position to inform the Senate as to what we may expect. It seems definite that only one additional piece of legislation is likely to reach us before the Christmas recess, Bill C-275, to amend the statute law relating to income tax. This bill has now reached the second reading stage in the other place, and it is expected that it will reach us before 9 o'clock this evening.

As I understand it, the legislation dealing with the farm products marketing agencies will not be coming over to us before the Christmas recess. It is possible that the other place will be recalled next week and/or in the first week of the new year to deal with that legislation, in which event it is highly possible that the Senate will also be recalled.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is also conceivable that we will be recalled next week.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is expected that when the Senate adjourns today it will stand adjourned until a date well into the new year which could take us into the first part of February, subject to recall either next week or the following week.

Having this in mind, and while I am somewhat reluctant to ask the Senate to adjourn to a time which is not too precise, I move that the Senate do now adjourn to reassemble at the call of the bell between now and 9 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the question is put, may I ask the honourable Senator Langlois or the Leader of the Government if, in the event the first bill referred to is disposed of by the Senate tonight, will His Excellency or His Deputy favour us with a visit to give royal assent?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As soon as this legislation is disposed of by this chamber we will have royal assent; it will be later this evening.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In that event, I am advised that Senator Grosart will be expected to be in His Honour's chamber with His Excellency the Deputy Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 6.40 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-275, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the second time now.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to implement the following measures announced by the Minister of Finance in his statement to the other place on October 14, 1971: First, a 7 per cent reduction in corporate income tax; secondly, a 3 per cent reduction in individual income tax; and, lastly, the training-on-the-job program.

The 7 per cent corporate tax reduction and the 3 per cent individual tax reduction will be effective for the 18 months from July 1, 1971, to December 31, 1972.

The training-on-the-job program applies to salaries and wages incurred on or after November 1, 1971.

The 7 per cent corporate tax reduction has been designed to give Canadian firms greater flexibility in responding to the special difficulties that have confronted them in recent months, and to give them confidence to create a sustained growth in job opportunities. It should also aid our corporations in remaining competitive in both domestic and international markets.

The 3 per cent individual tax reduction will also provide an important stimulus to the private sector by sustaining and encouraging increased demand for goods and services.

The training-on-the-job program will provide an opportunity for many of our unemployed to acquire more solid skills, which will enable them to take advantage of new employment opportunities. It should also be of great assistance to employers in preparing for future economic expansion.

By way of additional comment I would like to add that the information which has come to hand since the statement of the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on October 14 confirms the growing strength of the Canadian economy. For four consecutive quarters the real value of the goods and services produced by Canadians has increased at an annual rate of at least 6 per cent. This is a rate substantially in excess of our longer-term trends. The tax reductions proposed in this bill will make an important contribution to this forward thrust of the economy. Their announcement has no doubt already begun to affect the economy. Their enactment will ensure that their full effect will be realized in due course. This full effect will show up in higher demand, higher investment, and higher employment.

The portion of the costs of the tax reductions covered in this bill are lower than those quoted in the statement of October 14, 1971 since this bill, as honourable senators will realize, implements the 7 per cent corporate reduction and the 3 per cent individual reduction for 1971 only. The tax reductions for 1972 will be incorporated in a later bill.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators. I am quite sure that no one expects a long speech from me at this particular time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It will be a good speech, in any event.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you very much. Since moving from the Government side to this side, one of the things that has become obvious to me is that it takes only a very short speech to commend a Government bill, but it takes a rather long speech to point out the many usual deficiencies.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And your speech is short because you cannot find any.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This occasion gives me the opportunity to take the short speech route.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What is your perspective?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I join with the sponsor of the bill in welcoming the news that the economy is moving upwards. The figures he gave with relation to the last four quarters indicates that perhaps the times are not as bad as they might have been, and that possibly some of the policies the Government has now belatedly accepted may be doing more good than harm. I say that because there is reasonably strong evidence that, in dealing with the problems of unemployment and inflation, and the complexity of the different ways in which the two seem to affect the economy, the Government has not, over a long period of time, been altogether successful.

Therefore, I welcome this bill because it gives clear indication that at long last the Government has listened to what economists, the public, and a distinguished political party were saying—that probably the best palliative to the problems facing the economy would be tax reductions. I am quite sure that the sponsor of the bill would be the first to agree that the substantial improvement in the economy to date does not reflect too much this particular bill but, like other honourable senators, I trust that it will.

There has been considerable criticism of the bill, on the score that the reduction of individual personal income tax is 3 per cent, while the corporation tax reduction is 7 per cent. That is the position taken by some. I must say that personally I am not convinced that that is a valid argument. In fact, I have been surprised to find those who argue this position most vehemently have also complained that the relief for individual taxpayers is not very great. For example, the figures I have indicate that the taxpayer with two dependents, having a taxable income of, say, $6,000 would be relieved to the extent of no more than $4.53 in a year. Even a taxpayer with a taxable income of $9,000 would be relieved only to the extent of $20 in taxes in a whole year.

That, of course, is not the whole story, and I admit that at once. The cumulative effect of this reduction in personal income taxes is intended to spur consumer spending. And if anything is clear it is that consumer spending is normally the first spur that is given a recovering economy, and I trust that this will be the effect of this bill.

• (1850)

It is also clear that the reduction of corporate income taxes should have a similar effect. I have long believed from studies of the tax policies of other countries such as Sweden, Switzerland, and Japan that the key to a really viable economy in these modern times is a tax system which permits a substantial portion of corporation profits after taxes to be ploughed back into the economy to provide for an increase in productive capacity and market penetration. I trust that this will be the effect of this bill.

I shall not quarrel here with the fact that its duration appears to be limited. It applies only to the 1971 taxation year, which of course is drawing very close to its end, but I understood the sponsor to say that in effect these tax reductions will be carried on under the income tax reform bill. If that were not the case, I would say then we were deceived here respecting Bill C-259 and its aim at tax reform. If we are going to be in the position that the tax reductions we are to vote from now on are to run out as of the end of the 1971 tax year, which will be the end of April, we will have to find another name for that tax reform bill.

Honourable senators, the bill is again one of these omnibus bills—in fact you might call it a mini-omnibus bill—in that, thrown in with the personal and corporation tax reductions, we find some provisions relating to the manpower program. It can be argued that certain subsidies to on-the-job training and the two methods indicated in the bill are, in effect, deductions from corporate taxes. It does point up, however, the fact that our whole legislative program as it comes to us now in Parliament is a mess. There is no way of knowing what is included in any bill. Many have objected to this omnibus type of legislation. The excuse is given that there are great problems in moving legislation through the House of Commons. I wish the Leader of the Government would use his influence, I know it is great influence, to make sure that in future we do not encounter these omnibus bills.

I am surprised that the legal profession has not complained more than it has. In connection with this particular bill, for example, there is manpower legislation. I would have some sympathy for any lawyer whose client asked him about his eligibility for subsidized training under the manpower legislation. He might refer carefully to the act, reply in the negative and find out later that in this type of bill there are major changes in the whole manpower training program. I hope that the Leader of the Government, who is an eminent lawyer, will carry that complaint to the cabinet and ask it to relieve us of the impossible responsibility of facing these omnibus bills.

Honourable senators, I said I would make a short speech and that I was therefore under the constraint of commending the Government for the bill more than objecting to its deficiencies. With that qualification I can say that on this side we are prepared to expedite the passage of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, in opening his remarks, the Acting Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Temporary.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —mentioned that this bill, although—

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the honourable Senator Langlois understand that if he speaks now—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is not my intention at all to close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I might say that if there are any other honourable senators who wish to take part in this debate, if the honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise not so much to make a speech, as to ask a question concerning the success, or lack of success, of the on-the-job training program. I would appreciate it if the honourable sponsor of the bill could advise us how many individuals have been engaged, or are undergoing on-the-job training, the method of determining who is eligible for re-training, and how the rate of pay is determined?

I ask those questions because, unfortunately, I have attempted to refer a number of these problems to the department but to date have not received a reply from any of the correspondence.

• (1900)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, the Acting Leader of the Opposition, in his opening remarks, commented that the legislation was rather belated. In reply, I might suggest that his own appreciation of it might be termed belated. After hearing what I have to say, the honourable senator might agree that the bill is at least timely.

I should like to remind the house of the comment made a few days ago by Senator Lawson, who, when speaking on the taxation legislation, said that autonomy is like virginity, that nothing very significant happens until after it is lost.

One could argue at length that measures remedying shortcomings in the economy could be belated, that measures to correct shortcomings were also timely.

The October mini budget was a timely measure, and its effects are now being felt because, as everyone knows, the economy is on the upswing.

Regarding the possibility of extending the effects of the present legislation, I need not remind my honourable friend that this is a matter of government policy. The mini budget was designed to take effect over a period of 18 months commencing July 1, 1971 and ending December 31, 1972. With the present legislation we are dealing with the first six-month period, from July 1 to December 31, 1972.

There cannot be already legislation amending Bill C-259 dealing specifically with these income tax reductions before royal assent, which will be given later this day. The present bill covers only the period from July 1, 1971, to December 31, 1971. A later bill will cover the remainder of the 18-month period.

With regard to the matter of extending the legislation, the policy of the Government will be announced in due course. It is very unlikely that there will be such an extension in view of the improvement in economic conditions since the October mini budget was announced. I should now like to reply to the comment made on section 5 of the bill dealing with a tax reduction regarding expenses of an employer in connection with the training-on-the-job program.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Sections 5 and 6.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This is merely a tax reduction. This bill simply makes it possible for an employer who incurs expenses as a result of on-the-job training programs which have been approved by the Department of Manpower to deduct those expenses from his income. The employer is left with a choice; either he can apply for a subsidy from the Department of Manpower with respect to expenses incurred for on-the-job training programs, or he can claim such expenses as a tax deduction.

For those reasons I see nothing unusual in finding this type of provision in a tax bill.

Next, I come to the question raised by my honourable friend, Senator Phillips. Senator Phillips inquired as to the number of jobs which are available under these training programs and the rate of pay enforced as far as the Department of Manpower is concerned regarding these jobs. In this respect, I am afraid I will not be able to satisfy my honourable friend, because those matters are outside the scope of the Department of Finance. This program comes under the direction of the Department of Manpower. I can tell my honourable friend that these programs provide for a salary for trainees, as prescribed by that department. No tax incentive is provided unless the program is approved by the Department of Manpower.

That is about as far as I can go at this stage, but I would be pleased to provide this information to my honourable friend if he wishes to put the question again at some later time.

I believe that covers the points raised by my honourable friends opposite.

Hon. Rheal Belisle: I rise to compliment the Deputy Leader of the Government, and to say that he should not go into too much detail in trying to answer the bona fide question asked by Senator Phillips. After all, the Opposition is minimal—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: But very good.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: —and the Opposition is in the Christmas spirit, even though we have not been granted the courtesy of being provided with a copy of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If you look in your file, you will find that you do have a copy.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: We have not been provided with copies.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, if you look in your file you will find one.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: We do not have a copy.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course you have a copy.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: The bill was approved only a while ago in the other place, and we have not received a copy of the bill. I feel the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government should be tolerant—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not understand why my honourable friend is asking me to be tolerant. I was simply trying to answer questions put to me by my honourable friends on the other side, and I was trying to give the best answers that I could at this stage.

As far as this bill is concerned, we are dealing with a bill which was filed and distributed following first reading in the other place on December 20. This is not a bill that has just been printed today. It was printed on December 20 and distributed at that time, and every senator should have a copy. If my friend would care to look in his file I am sure he will find it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On the point raised, in terms of the rules of the house, Senator Belisle has a good point. He has quite properly brought to the attention of the chamber that the bill before us is as it was on first reading in the other place on December 20.

• (1910)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There has been no change to it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There has been no change.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Just a moment. We have every right here to insist, if we wish to, that before we discuss a bill we have it clearly marked as passed on third reading by the other place. I say that only because of the reaction of honourable senators opposite to the quite legitimate point raised by Senator Belisle. I point out that in introducing the motion for second reading it was not brought to the attention of this chamber that there were no amendments on first reading, second reading, or in Committee of the Whole in the other place. Senator Belisle's point is well taken. We have no way of knowing, when a bill comes to us, when third reading has taken place only within a few minutes, that there have not been substantial changes.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There has been no amendment at all.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am not arguing this point at all now. I am only raising it as my answer to the not very Christmas-spirited reaction that was taken to Senator Belisle's quite legitimate point.

While I am on my feet, may I just say that I raise the matter of the continuation of these tax reductions into on-going months, because I would hope that the benefits Senator Langlois has indicated will flow from these reductions will convince the Government that this is a much better policy to meet the problems of the economy that the Government has created by other policies. I hope the Government will be convinced by the benefits that will flow from this that this is a much better way of tackling some of the problems than some of the policies we have had in the past.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Honourable senators, may I further say that we are here during this recess hour of 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., and, unless the rules have been amended, never in the history of this house have we sat between 6 o'clock and 8 o'clock in the evening in order to accommodate the pleasure and good will of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin).

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is ridiculous.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: If we are to sit here to be lectured by the Leader of the Government—

The Hon. the Speaker: I ask for order, please. All honourable senators are aware, or should be aware, that there was an order of the house to adjourn during pleasure from the time we left this chamber after 2 o'clock until 8 o'clock or 9 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You had to be in the house to know that though.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must state this, for I know that the honourable Senator Belisle would not like to leave an impression that was contrary to the order of the house.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I accept your ruling, Your Honour, but I am convinced that you are not completely impartial when you say—

Hon. Senators: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Martin: There must be no reflection on the Chair in any way.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: This bill should have come to us at 8 o'clock at the call of the bell. The bell should be rung before 6 o'clock or after 8 o'clock. We are here to accommodate the Government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Oh, no, you are not here to accommodate the Government. You are here—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, order, please. I think this is a matter for the Chair. I have already explained what has taken place today. Of course, Senator Belisle is free not to accept my explanation, but I want to put on record again that it was an order of the Senate that we adjourn to re-assemble at the call of the bell at any time up until 9 o'clock this evening. The bell could ring at any moment during this period of time. I cannot say anything further, and I hope that this explanation will settle the issue that has been raised.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour, I am quite sure that the point on which Senator Belisle has risen is a good one.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This is Christmas, and when a senator on this side rises on a point of procedure it is my duty to support him, if I believe he is right.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And if he is wrong?

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I will challenge you any time you like.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am ready. You were not in the house, senator. That is why you do not know what took place.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have given the floor to Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would not have risen to support him if I thought he was wrong, but in this case I think he is right. We have a rule prohibiting sittings between 6 and 8 o'clock. Senator Belisle has said that on this side we accommodated the Government—and, of course, we did. We accommodated the Government by not raising that objection at the time. Again, I do not want to argue the point.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would Senator Grosart permit me—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: When I have finished, yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would he not agree—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is no question now.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If the Leader of the Government had risen and asked to put a question—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He has done that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did ask.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I will yield to him when I have finished my statement.

Hon. Mr. Martin: All right.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The statement I am making is that the point raised by Senator Belisle was that we were trying to be co-operative here, and his objection, as I understand it, was that from the other side we were not getting the same kind of co-operation. As an instance of that, I will indicate that while I was still speaking to the point two honourable senators opposite rose, and I had to look to His Honour to intervene, to keep the rules of the house.

As I say, it is Christmas. I think Senator Belisle had a good point but unless honourable senators wish to argue it further I suggest we leave it there and forget it. I would say that we all had the very best intentions in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Very encouraging.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Grosart a question? I am not going to persist in the question, he knows what the question is. He has suggested that we ought to let the matter drop. I am prepared to do so, but he knows perfectly well the conversation that he and I had as to when we should meet. I will pursue it no further. I do not want to embarrass him. I know that he must seek to defend his cohorts.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I object to that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is doing it with vigour and with great ability. But he knows the circumstances of our meeting at this time. First of all, there is the motion of the house that we meet at the call of the Chair, but he will recall the conversation that he and I had not very many minutes ago, before we came into this chamber. Having recalled it to him, I will leave the matter there.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I suggest that we can hardly leave the matter there. In the first place, I have some doubts about the propriety of raising in an issue like this conversations through the usual channels. However, I will not argue that. All I was saying on the matter was that we had agreed to an accommodation, and that was exactly the purport of the conversations that the Leader of the Government refers to. We did agree. I do not deny that for a minute.

• (1920)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This was a mutual accommodation.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Will the honourable member permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us get on with it.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Does the honourable senator understand, as I understand, that what we are discussing is a bill to reduce taxes? Is that what he is talking about? Are we talking about the same thing?

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Prowse, we were about to discuss a point that has been raised by the honourable Senator Belisle. I thought that the matter had now been settled.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: With all respect, I have asked a question. The house now has before it in a general way a bill which is intended to reduce taxes. Am I correct?

The Hon. the Speaker: It will be up to the sponsor of the bill to answer that question, of course.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I just rise to complete my answer to the question put to me a few moments ago by Senator Phillips. I have been reminded, and now do recall myself, that last week a complete report from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was distributed to honourable senators giving all the information concerning the expenditures made by his department in connection with the on-the-job-training programs, giving the number of those who benefited from these programs, the wages they were paid for them and the time which they spent under this program, and so on.

I think, if Senator Phillips cares to consult this booklet, which was delivered to all of us last week, he will find that it contains all the information he desires. I say this by way of completing the answer I gave him a little while ago.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I wish to thank the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But the fact that I saw the note coming into him is a good indication that he did not have much more time than I did to study the booklet.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My friend has not been called upon to sponsor many bills. When one is working under pressure like this at the end of a session, one cannot be expected to be put in the same place as a minister, who is living the situation from day to day. My friend will understand that, if he is ever called to sponsor a bill. If he ever is asked to do this job, I will be tolerant with him because I know what is involved, which is certainly not the case with respect to my friend.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

23 December 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, December 23, 1971, at 7.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this may be the last opportunity before the end of the year to afford us the occasion to express our thanks to His Honour the Speaker and to our officials for their collaboration. It could be that we will be back next week, but this depends upon the progress made in the other place with respect to the national marketing bill. However, the uncertainty in that regard is such that I beg leave to take this opportunity to express our warmest thanks to His Honour the Speaker for the able way in which he has presided over our sessions since we began our meetings and which have continued uninterrupted since September 14 last.

It would be well, when we have some of the news media making a rare appearance in our presence, to let them know that we have been sitting here repeatedly and without interruption since September last engaged in some important work affecting the welfare of our country. We have had no legislation whatsoever to deal with this session because of the preoccupation of the other place with the income tax bill. It is not the fault of the Senate that the other place has taken practically all of the autumn months in its deliberations on that measure, thereby denying us and themselves as well the opportunity of dealing with various projects of legislation which are of concern to the country.

• (1930)

Nevertheless, the Senate has met and discussed important items of foreign affairs, finance, poverty, science and agriculture in a manner that does credit to this house. The credit is due not only to those sitting to the right of His Honour, but also to those sitting to his left.

During this session we have received the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which was welcomed throughout Canada as one of the most sophisticated and mature documents of its nature presented by any body, legislative or otherwise, in the country. It is well that that should be recalled at this time.

Likewise, we have received the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, under the chairmanship of Senator Croll, which continues to be the subject of much discussion in the country and which is still being debated in this chamber.

As we come near to the end of this portion of the session, we should recall the constructive work that has been done.

Above all, we should recall, both to ourselves and the country, because the country is interested, the fact that for 3½ months, since September 12, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been engaged in a parallel study of the tax reform bill. That is longer than the time taken in the study of that measure by the House of Commons. In addition the committee has called before it almost 100 witnesses who have made representations, not available to those in the other house, in respect of that tax measure. Three reports have been delivered by the committee embodying recommendations presented to the Minister of Finance. Whether or not we agree with these, I believe I am speaking for all senators when I say that we have no reason to feel that we have not discharged our duty during these months in a way that should be noted by the Canadian people.

It is not our fault that these facts have not been noted. There are, however, those in our country who have the responsibility of impartially conveying to the public what has been done. I do not for one moment expect that anything I have said will prompt this to be done. I wish, however, to make this observation because of the nature of remarks made by some outside this chamber and by those who, charged with the responsibility of recording events parliamentary and otherwise, should unhesitatingly regard as part of their obligation an adequate reporting of what goes on in both Houses of Parliament.

I wish to thank in your name, Mr. Speaker, all members of the Senate staff, the stenographers, the messengers and the ladies who clean our offices and corridors. I wish to thank the page boys and the two page girls—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —for their loyal and energetic help during the course of this session. To each and every senator I would like to extend my best wishes for a very merry Christmas.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

[Translation]

I take this opportunity to express to every one in the Senate, senators, personnel, pageboys, to all of you, first on behalf of the Government, best wishes for a merry Christmas and, on my own behalf, heartiest wishes for a pleasant and fruitful yuletide.

[English]

The Acting Leader of the Opposition has had over the past few days, a very difficult role to perform and has discharged that role well. Whatever I may have said about him concerning some of his speeches and ingenious arguments during the past weeks, I would like him to know that I regard him as one of the most hard-working and industrious members of this house. He has been faithful to the end in discharging his responsibilities. I am sure I express the views of all honourable senators when I say that we greatly admire the character of his work and his industry, even though we do not fully appreciate the errors into which he has occasionally allowed himself to be unnecessarily plunged.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Un bon garçon.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We thank you for presiding over our deliberations. If it is necessary for us to return next week to deal with legislation coming over from the other place, we will do so dutifully and on time. In the meantime, we express to Your Honour our best wishes.

Nos meilleurs vœux pour un Joyeux Noël.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his kind words. I can only say they were not necessary. We all have our areas of duty, and I am sure that all honourable senators discharge that duty as they see it.

It was characteristic of the Leader of the Government to draw attention to the work performed by the Senate during this session. He could have done no less. I am one of those who believe that Senator Martin, during the many months that he has been in the Senate, has been to a very large extent responsible for much of the good work that has been achieved by the Senate. I give him full credit for that. He has worked hard and believes in the Senate as an important institution in our federal system. He has given the fullest proof of that belief in his conduct of the affairs of the Senate as Leader of the Government.

I take pleasure in offering the compliments of the blessed season to everyone, particularly to Your Honour for the grace and wisdom with which you have presided over our affairs during the 230 or more days of this session. I thank you, sir, for the many occasions on which you have prevented me from falling into transgressions, to which Your Honour knows I am prone and with which you sympathize.

• (1940)

To my colleagues on both sides and, if I may be Irish for a moment, those on no side, because we have some who are apparently on no side in one sense of the word, our thanks for their fellowship during these long days. Whatever be our disagreements here we all know that there is a spirit of fellowship and good will among honourable senators. That is one of the many great rewards for service in this chamber.

To our staff, both within and without the Senate, we owe more thanks and admiration than we normally render. This is not the time to detail those to whom I refer, but it will not be taken amiss if I add to the observation by the Leader of the Government that when we think of our staff now we all think particularly of these two beautiful young ladies who have added a dimension of youth and beauty to this chamber, along with, of course, our lady senators.

In expressing our thanks to our staff, both within and without the chamber, I think immediately of those wonderful words of Robert Browning who, in what I feel is his greatest poem, Pippa Passes, said:

All service ranks the same with God—

With God, whose puppets, best and worst,

Are we; there is no last nor first.

Then there are our fellow members of Parliament in the other place, to whom we owe felicitations. We might have some doubt as to the degree of thanks we owe them because of the situation we found ourselves in during the last few days. However, we might say to them, as was once said by George Herbert: "They talk of Christmas so long that it comes". And, apparently, it has happened. We know they have laboured long, and in my view the public of Canada generally is not aware of the long labours of the members of the House of Commons. I am sure at this time we all join in wishing them the speediest possible rest from those long labours.

I would also add my best wishes at this time to our friends of the fourth estate, the members of the press. Whatever they may think of us, they should at least have our thanks for having to sit long hours and listen to us. I am sure that in the year ahead they will find occasion to commend our work.

Finally, to all men and women everywhere, on behalf of the Senate, I wish to express our good wishes at this season, particularly to those who through no fault of their own are not going to have a good Christmas because of the great holocausts that are sweeping the world at the present time. I am sure that the sympathies of all honourable senators go out to those millions of unfortunates whose Christmas is going to be very much less than we would wish for them.

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until February 16, at 8 o'clock in the evening, subject to recall at any earlier date during that period.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Likely next week or early in January.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to add that it is very likely this chamber will be recalled to perform its legislative duty some time next week, depending on the progress in the other place on the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill; otherwise it is anticipated that the house will be recalled during the first week of January, on January 3 or 4. That is the best estimate we can give at this stage.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I thank both leaders for their kind words. I should also like to thank all honourable senators for their co-operation. My task has been an easy one, and I am grateful to all for this.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Copyright Act.

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff.

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act.

An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, February 16, 1972, at 8 o'clock.

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

MASS MEDIA

SALE OF INDEPENDENTLY OWNED NEWSPAPERS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I have a question for the Government Leader which I believe is of such urgency that it should be asked now rather than later this day. Therefore, notwithstanding Rule 19, I ask leave of the Senate to put my question now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Davey put his question now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, more than two months ago, on October 28 to be exact, pursuant to the disappearance of three independently owned Ontario dailies into chain ownership, I asked the Government Leader if he did not agree with me that it was regrettable that the Government had failed to implement the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Mass Media calling for a Press Ownership Review Board. In reply, Senator Martin assured us that he would again draw this matter to the attention of his colleagues in the cabinet.

Meanwhile, at the end of November, still another independently owned daily, this time the Cape Breton Post, fell under chain ownership when it was purchased by the Thomson Newspapers Limited. Earlier this month in the other place the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said that the recommendations of the Senate Mass Media Committee were under study, although the Government had not yet prepared its position with respect to these recommendations. In view of all these developments and in view of the fact that Parliament is presumably going to adjourn for about six weeks, and in view of the rumoured chain acquisition of still more of the few remaining independently owned daily newspapers, I wonder if the Government Leader could comment on the situation generally or at least give us his undertaking that he will do everything he can to expedite the Government study of the Senate committee's recommendations for dealing with the problems of media concentration.

• (1100)

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Davey was kind enough to give me notice this morning of his intention to ask this question, which I acknowledge is an important one. I brought the matter to the attention of the Government the day after a question was put to me a few weeks ago. Senator Davey will recall that I expressed some doubt about the constitutional position of a review board in respect of the locus of a particular arrangement within a province. The matter is being studied by the Department of Justice. It could be that even my reservation is wrong. In any event, it is being examined. Certainly the Minister of Justice will be giving the matter his personal attention.

I shall also bring the matter generally to the attention of the Government. In the meantime I should point out that action has been taken under the Combines Investigation Act regarding a newspaper organization in the Province of New Brunswick. That matter is now before the courts. It would be improper, therefore, for me to comment beyond the statement I have made regarding that situation.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with whom I discussed the matter this morning, after I received a notice of Senator Davey's intention to ask this question, has advised me that under the Competition Act, both as it is and as it will be, provisions exist for the establishment of a tribunal through which this kind of question could likewise be examined.

I assure Senator Davey and all honourable senators that I shall bring this matter to the attention of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a supplementary question? The Leader of the Government referred to the Competition Act "both as it is and as it will be". I assume he refers to the Competition bill as it is in its first reading form in the present session. It has been indicated that that bill will be revised and presented again in a subsequent session. Is it to that that Senator Martin refers in saying "as it will be"?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, that is right and I thank Senator Benidickson for giving me the opportunity to make that clear.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-176, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière), that this bill be now read a second time.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Your Honour, it is not that I object, but I would like to confirm that I intend to support the second, the third and the fourth reading! Do with it as you will.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, have we gone through Routine Proceedings including Question Period? I realize that we have done away with all our rules, but surely we are not going to dispense with Routine Proceedings? I have a question or two I wish to ask.

The Hon. the Speaker: This is the first item of business, a message from the House of Commons. After this is completed, of course, we will proceed as usual.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, I apologize for being in a hurry but the farmers really need this bill, so I hope I will be excused. I wish to present some background regarding Bill C-176. I realize that many honourable senators are familiar with the bill and have followed the debates in the other place, but it seems to me that it would probably be well to have some of the background of the bill on the record.

Orderly marketing of farm products has been a major problem for farmers since the beginning of agriculture in Canada.

At one time each farmer produced for his own consumption, and acted independently in marketing his own small surplus production. However, as the urban population increased, this situation changed dramatically. Large chain stores developed, requiring a continuous guaranteed supply. Consumer tastes changed and more and more food required processing. Processors also required a guaranteed supply. Transportation has changed, creating a demand for large quantities of some foods to be transported thousands of miles from the point of production. Farmers began to specialize. The average size of many farms increased rapidly, and production and technology advanced rapidly. All of these changes have made it increasingly more difficult for the individual farmer to market his product directly to the consumer.

As the need for a marketing service between the producer and the retailer developed, this position was filled by brokers, wholesalers, packers, as well as by processors. These are the people who buy from the farmers, assemble, process, locate markets, guarantee supply, and so forth, and they do an excellent job. Nowhere in the world is there a higher quality of food available at such low prices as we have in Canada.

However, when the farmer lost his position in the market place he lost control of the realities of marketing. He became out of touch with the consumer. He is unaware of changing consumer preferences, changing production volumes, and changing trade patterns, until these changes affect the price of his product. As a result of there being no co-ordinated effort on the part of the producer of any one agricultural product, even small changes in volume, trade patterns, or consumer preferences often have a disastrous effect on the producers' receipts.

In times of overproduction, acting as individuals, some farmers—in particular those selling perishable products—rush to the market place and are forced to take unreasonably low prices in order not to be left without a sale, and the selling price is often driven down below production costs. In times of underproduction, the reverse is true. Buyers rush to the farmers in an attempt to obtain the volumes necessary to meet their commitments, the price is driven upwards, and this nearly always triggers another cycle of overproduction and low prices.

These are not new problems. It was recognized many years ago that if agriculture was to be a stable industry then, in addition to producing, the farmer must also understand and have some input in the market place. He cannot continue to take the position that he will produce as much as possible without regard to demand, and simply assume that someone else will surely sell the product for him at a price he needs to make a profit.

Faced by these pressures in the market place farmers have searched for methods to stabilize prices over the long term in order that they might stabilize their income and plan investments wisely. There have been steps in this direction. Farmers have invested heavily in marketing co-operatives ranging from grain elevators to feed mills to creameries. Co-operatives, however, were frustrated in their efforts to promote industry-wide orderly marketing for individual commodities because some farmers participated and some did not. Those who did participate reaped the benefits but also bore the cost of establishing and running the co-operative. Those who did not participate often reaped the benefits and bore none of the costs. When prices came under pressure the co-operatives were only partially successful in holding the line against a decline because they did not have complete control of supply.

The next step was for farmers to turn to stronger agencies in their pursuit of orderly marketing. They asked governments to give them the right to market the entire production of individual commodities. Producers of some farm commodities also asked for the power to limit production to prevent surpluses from driving prices below the cost of production.

The first attempt to establish such agencies for farmers came in the form of legislation passed by the federal Government in 1934, but the Supreme Court subsequently ruled that the federal Government could not interfere with provincial rights to control marketing within the provinces, and the legislation was nullified. Since then every province has passed legislation—and I want to emphasize this—to enable farmers to set up provincial marketing boards. Some 122 marketing agencies have been established under these provincial acts. The provincial acts are enabling legislation, and cover all farm products. There are no exceptions for individual commodities.

There is only one national marketing agency established on the federal level, the Canadian Dairy Commission, which deals with the marketing of industrial milk. The commission has no power to control production volumes, but it does exert an influence on production because it offers subsidies to promote production of the amount of milk the market requires, and it reduces subsidy payments if farmers overproduce the market.

I should like to digress for a moment while dealing with the Canadian Dairy Commission. When I had the honour of being Minister of Agriculture I, with both Deputy Ministers of Agriculture, made an almost world-wide trip visiting such countries as Denmark, Holland, France, New Zealand, Australia, and the British Isles. We checked their legislation and saw how they handled their dairy surpluses.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): We know you did a good job.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Thank you very much. You will remember that at that time the price of milk for manufacture was from $1.50 to $2 a hundred pounds. The Canadian Dairy Commission Act was a most forward-looking piece of legislation, and as a result the dairy industry today is one of the most thriving industries in Canada. We have balanced consumption and production, and although sometimes we may run into shortages we have continuity of supply, which seems to me important for the producers, and it is certainly important for the consumers.

I have just mentioned the Canadian Dairy Commission. At the federal level, the next thing was the Canadian Wheat Board, which exercises marketing powers over wheat, oats, barley, and grains on the Prairies. Its main influence is over prices and the flow of grain to market through the use of delivery quotas.

When provincial marketing boards were established a loophole was found which enabled producers who were marketing their products in another province to bypass the provincial marketing agency. The federal Government provided legislation to overcome this problem back in 1949 by passing the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. A large number of provincial marketing agencies have made use of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. By the mid-1960s provincial marketing agencies were well established for several commodities, and in particular for eggs, tobacco, some fruits, vegetables, and hogs.

But now a new level of competition emerged. Instead of individual producers fighting for markets, in the case of eggs the provincial marketing agencies were fighting each other for the Canadian egg market. Egg producers asked for national legislation to enable them to establish a national marketing agency to put a stop to this scramble for the Canadian egg market. At a meeting of provincial Ministers of Agriculture with Mr. Olson in 1968 full agreement was reached that federal enabling legislation was needed so that the provinces could introduce orderly marketing on a national basis.

After the Regina meeting, work to put together a national marketing bill began. There was an initial difficulty between federal and provincial ministers and the officials as they began to work out the kind of legislation that would best attack these problems, taking into account the constitutional requirements regarding jurisdiction at two levels of government. Several proposals were discussed, among which was a proposal to introduce a separate bill for each individual commodity as the demand on behalf of the producers of that commodity built up for a national scheme. This proposal was rejected because of a possible long time lag between the time a problem arose and the time the solution could be applied. Everyone realized that this time lag could result in serious financial damage to the producer.

The main aim of the bill was to co-ordinate the orders of provincial agencies in various provinces, so the bill was finally written to resemble as closely as possible the provincial marketing legislation already in place, in order to deal with this problem in a practical way without running into constitutional difficulties. So, instead of introducing a bill that would set up only a national egg marketing agency, the federal Government introduced legislation which would cover all commodities. Farmers producing any other commodity could then set up a national marketing agency, if and when they were ready to do so.

Honourable senators, legislation was prepared and introduced in the House of Commons on March 17, 1970. A long and heated debate ensued, both inside Parliament and within the agricultural industry. Some farmers were strongly in favour of the concept of national marketing agencies, while others were strongly opposed to it, particularly to the possibility of production controls.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture discussed the legislation, known at that stage as Bill C-197. They discussed it for many days, they received letters and briefs and listened to representatives of farm organizations, one provincial government, and consumer groups. The bill failed to receive third reading and died on the Order Paper when the second session of this Parliament ended in October 1970.

The legislation was re-introduced as Bill C-176 in October 1970, when the third session of this Parliament began. This is the bill we are dealing with now. The debate in the other place was resumed from where it was discontinued on Bill C-197. The Honourable Mr. Olson, the Minister of Agriculture, indicated he was willing to give favourable consideration to a number of amendments. The bill was again referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for further consideration. That committee travelled throughout all areas in Canada, and held open meetings with provincial governments and interested citizens.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable gentleman tell us in what year the travelling by the committee was done?

Hon. Mr. Hays: I cannot give exact dates, but I can say that after the bill was introduced the committee travelled across Canada and heard hundreds of witnesses.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It was in this year.

Hon. Mr. Hays: In March 1971 the bill was reported back to the House of Commons from the standing committee and remained at the report stage until quite recently.

At a meeting held on November 23 last, nine of the ten provincial Ministers of Agriculture agreed that Bill C-176 should receive speedy passage. An amendment suggested at that meeting would limit the supply management feature of the bill to poultry and poultry products.

The bill provides specifically, first, for the establishment of a National Farm Products Marketing Council and, secondly, for the establishment of national marketing agencies for specific agricultural commodities.

The National Farm Products Marketing Council will consist of between three and nine members appointed by order in council, and at least 50 per cent of the membership will be farmers. Several proposals for the election or appointment of members were discussed, and rejected. These members must act in the national interest of all producers and therefore cannot be put in a position where claims or charges of preference can be made, as may be the case if appointment is made by a particular regional or provincial group.

I shall refer now to the duties of the council. The council will (a) provide advice to producers and producer groups with respect to establishing national agencies; (b) supervise the operation of agencies under the act; (c) work with the agencies to promote more effective marketing in interprovincial trade; (d) consult on a continuing basis with all provinces to promote orderly interprovincial marketing; and (e) the council may recommend to the Governor in Council that (i) a national agency be established; (ii) a national agency be given certain authorities to regulate or promote trade; and (iii) the authority of a national agency be broadened or extended.

The council, however, is prohibited from making any such recommendations until it has definitely established that a majority of the farmers involved agree with the recommendations. In addition, the Governor in Council, or the cabinet, is prohibited also from accepting such a recommendation from the national council until it is satisfied that a significant majority of producers is in favour of the recommendation. In order to establish the position of a majority of producers, the national council shall hold public meetings and may hold a plebiscite or other form of vote.

Turning now to the membership of the national marketing agencies, the bill provides that (a) each agency will consist of between 3 and 12 members, the majority of whom must be producers; and (b) members may be appointed in order to get the agency started, but as marketing plans are developed by individual agencies, provision is made for the marketing plans to include a method for appointment or election of members from the producers involved.

With regard to duties, an agency will administer the approved marketing plan for any one designated product. The approved plan, and, therefore, the authority of any one agency, may take many forms, depending on the wishes of the producers involved. The agency may prepare a marketing plan for the approval of the national council. It may prepare and implement a plan. It may undertake to purchase, package, store, process, export and sell the product. It may undertake an advertising and promotional plan to improve sales, use and quality of the product. Under the bill as amended, no agency, except one for poultry and poultry products, can operate a national supply management system.

In its present form, Bill C-176 reflects the needs and wishes of the great majority of Canadian farmers, and nine of the ten provincial ministers. The safeguards against misuse or regional preference in the matter of interprovincial trade are more than adequate.

The bill provides an adequate mechanism for the producer to take an active part in the promotion and marketing of his product. It allows all producers to share as fairly as possible in the total Canadian and export market. It provides an effective and satisfactory solution to provincial trade barriers which have been established by many provinces. However, the bill is not presented as the complete answer to our marketing problem. This can only come about when farmers and others involved recognize that it is a Canadian problem, not a provincial or regional one, and when all Canadian farmers recognize that the Government cannot legislate co-operation, but can only provide the mechanism and environment to make co-operation possible.

The Minister of Agriculture recently introduced an amendment which removed supply management from the list of powers that national marketing agencies can exercise, except with respect to egg and poultry products.

Honourable senators will agree that constitutionally it is the responsibility of senators to serve the provinces. Nine out of ten provinces agree with this legislation. Manitoba agrees with the broad principle of the marketing agency, but would like to be able to veto any agency. This is their only objection to the marketing bill.

• (1130)

I believe this legislation has been thoroughly debated and amended to meet the vigorous demands of the multitude of interests within agriculture and industry. Any delay on our part in providing the Canadian agricultural industry with the legislation it needs to establish national marketing agencies for farm products would, in my view, be unwarranted and unjustifiable at this time.

This bill was debated from early last night right through until a quarter to seven this morning, when it was finally passed in the other place. As Bill C-176 stands now it contains the amendments, and this is the form in which it is presented to this house.

If the bill receives second reading I intend to move that it be referred to a committee where honourable senators will have an opportunity of having their questions answered.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the sponsor of the bill? Last evening I received a copy of one amendment which, I believe, was passed by the House at that time under clause 18. Does Senator Hays know if there was another vote later on in the morning at which time this "limitation amendment" might have been moved under Clause 18? Unfortunately, the House of Commons Hansard covering that will not be available until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Are you referring to the new bill or the old bill, senator?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The amendment as originally received by me is different from the amendment included in the bill we have before us now. Therefore, I am asking if there was one vote or if there were two votes on the amendment to clause 18 which, in the old bill, was found on page 13, line 38.

Hon. Mr. Hays: The amendment as I have it reads as follows:

> (3) A proclamation referred to in subsection (1) or (2) that designates a farm product other than eggs or poultry or any part of eggs or poultry shall not set out as a term of the marketing plan that an agency is empowered to implement any term that would enable the agency to fix and determine the quantity in which any regulated product could be marketed in interprovincial or export trade by persons engaged in such marketing thereof.

Is that the way you have it?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: No.

Hon. Mr. Hays: I believe the minister will be present before the committee and that question can be put to him, but I think what this says is simply that an agency will not be able to set quotas and so on in respect of products other than eggs or poultry or any part of eggs or poultry.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I do not wish to involve Senator Hays in an argument at this point. No doubt in my later remarks I will have ample opportunity to do that. I have here a copy of the "blues" of the House of Commons for last evening which indicate that Mr. Olson, the Minister of Agriculture, requested unanimous consent when he moved the amendment to clause 18. I now find the amendment is listed under clause 2. My question, therefore, is: Was there a second vote in the House of Commons? How do we account for the difference between the House of Commons "blues" of 7.30 last night and the bill as we have received it this morning? Was there a second vote or did someone just automatically change the "blues" and the bill?

Perhaps this is really a point of order, Senator Hays, rather than a question, but it is most important that we find out when and how that amendment was moved.

Hon. Mr. Hays: I did not attend the debate last night, Senator Phillips, so I cannot answer. I assume that what we received is correct. Certainly, if it is not correct, we can go into that in committee.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Senator Phillips referred to clause 18. That clause covers two pages. Can he tell me exactly what part of it he is referring to?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I shall do my best to explain to the honourable senator the point I am raising. To Bill C-176 as amended and reported by the Standing Committee on Agriculture of the other place there was an amendment moved in the house yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture in respeect of clause 18. In the unamended bill., Senator Fournier, you will find that clause beginning on page 12 and continuing on page 13 to the bottom of the page. On page 13, after line 38, an amendment was inserted. However, today we have it in an entirely different clause, and I am asking what happened between 7.30 last evening and 11 o'clock this morning that would cause the amendment to have been moved from clause 18 to clause 2.

Hon. Mr. Hays: There were three amendments; there were three votes. If you wish, I can read them into the record. There was an amendment to clause 2, on page 1, which reads as follows:

> (b) "Council" means the National Farm Products Marketing Council established by section 3;
> (c) "farm product" for the purpose of Part I, means any natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product and, for the purpose of the other provisions of this Act, means
>
> (i) eggs, and poultry, and any part of any such product, and
> (ii) any other natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied, as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise, that the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency under section 17 with powers relating to that product;

• (1140)

That was the one that presumably you were concerned about, Senator Phillips.

Then on page 13 of the bill before us, under the heading "Limitation" another amendment has been introduced which reads as follows:

> (3) A proclamation referred to in subsection (1) or (2) that designates a farm product other than eggs or poultry or any part of eggs or poultry shall not set out as a term of the marketing plan that an agency is empowered to implement any term that would enable the agency to fix and determine the quantity in which any regulated product could be marketed in interprovincial or export trade by persons engaged in such marketing thereof.

I think that was subsequently added.

Then on page 18 we find clause 24 which reads as follows:

> 24. A marketing plan to the extent that it allocates any production or marketing quota to any area of Canada, shall allocate that quota on the basis of the production from that area in relation to the total production of Canada over a period of five years immediately preceding the effective date of the marketing plan. In allocating additional quotas for anticipated growth of market demand, the marketing agency shall consider the principle of comparative advantage of production.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): It takes a good farmer to understand that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I thank Senator Hays and point out that some of the confusion probably arises from the fact that Hansard of the other place is not available at this time, and understandably so because I understand it was 20 minutes to seven when the other place rose this morning. It has not been possible to read the debates of the other place to follow the intention of the amendment. Perhaps after the luncheon recess there will be a further opportunity to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I wonder if the sponsor of the bill will permit a question. I am aware that he may not be in a position to answer it at this stage, because I have no doubt that he like many other honourable senators experienced difficulty in answering the summons to this sitting because of the heavy storms yesterday afternoon and evening as a result of which air travel was rather difficult. Therefore, he may not have had the opportunity to listen to the radio this morning.

I mention that fact because during the 8 o'clock newscast of C.B.C. there was a statement by Mr. Roy Atkinson, President of the National Farmers Union. I made quick notes as he was speaking, and his remarks were to the effect that the bill was carved up—and I presume he meant yesterday—so that it is now doing little more than providing markets for chickens and eggs but that it should cover all commodities.

I wonder if Senator Hays would consider that question, and if the house would permit him to answer at a later stage when he has had an opportunity to consider it.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, I heard Mr. Atkinson speak on television last night, and I think that this morning's broadcast merely contained a quote from what he said at that time. If I remember correctly, he said that the bill was completely emasculated and now covers simply poultry and poultry products. But, according to the provisions of the bill, it can cover everything if the producers so desire. They will have to decide whether they want to have an agency or not. Indeed, they have power under provincial marketing legislation which permits them to have a marketing agency even now. If they want to come under this umbrella they can hold a referendum and act accordingly. You may remember that I said this morning that there are provisions which allow them to come under the scope of this measure if they so decide, because it can safely be said that this is a bill for farmers.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am aware, honourable senators, that it is not normal at this stage to discuss the clauses of the bill, but in view of the amendments to which Senator Phillips has referred and in view of the fact that in many respect they change the whole complexion of the bill, I wonder if the sponsor, before the motion for second reading is put, would explain the effect of the three amendments to which reference has been made. I refer to the amendments made last night and in the small hours of the morning to clause 2, clause 18 and clause 24.

I ask this because of the comment attributed to Mr. Atkinson, and because of the fact that there still remains some confusion as to the scope of the bill, particularly with respect to the amendment to clause 2, paragraph (c). Senator Hays gave me the impression that a plebiscite was required before the declaration by a provincial government. Now it would appear that the amendment says "plebiscites, or otherwise". Would he just explain the effect of the whole scope of the bill in the light of these three amendments.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Is Senator Grosart referring to the insert which we have received containing amendments to the bill?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, we have been provided with some amendments, but it appears that the amendment to clause 18 (3) is not contained in the insert.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, I think the amendments to the bill encompass all commodities, but in so far as poultry and poultry products are concerned, under the terms of the bill control is taken of supply and quotas and that sort of thing. I think what the amendment is meant to do is not to include other commodities unless the producers want them included, and in order to do this they have to go to Parliament and indicate to Parliament that there are enough people interested in the inclusion of beef, calves, or that sort of thing. As the bill is now it covers poultry and poultry products with provisions for the inclusion of other products on the same basis, providing the producers want them included as demonstrated by referendum or otherwise.

• (1150)

Clause 24, having been added, is new. It provides:

> A marketing plan to the extent that it allocates any production or marketing quota to any area of Canada, shall allocate that quota on the basis of the production from that area in relation to the total production of Canada over a period of five years immediately preceding the effective date of the marketing plan. In allocating additional quotas for anticipated growth of market demand, the marketing agency shall consider the principle of comparative advantage of production.

This is to provide that in the event there occurs in the Maritimes, for instance, a 10 per cent increase in egg consumption, necessitating a like increase in production, the allocation of that quota can be changed to satisfy the demand. This applies equally to other provinces. The agency would not necessarily grant the 10 per cent increase. If it is possible to produce potatoes more cheaply in the Maritimes, a province such as Alberta or Saskatchewan would receive that increase. That is why it was insisted that this provision be inserted.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What is the effect of the five-year averaging in the new clause 24?

Hon. Mr. Hays: Every five years the quotas may be adjusted. If it were found that there was a 10 per cent increase in demand, the production requirements of the old quota holders would be so increased.

I could probably explain this point best by the illustration of the Canadian Dairy Commission. There are two classes of production, one being home delivery. The other is manufacturing milk, from which butter, cheese, and other commodities are produced from the same original product. When the consumption of milk in Toronto increases, the quotas are raised, more milk being produced to satisfy the demand. Almost all cheddar cheese produced in Canada is from western Quebec and eastern Ontario. Very little manufacturing milk is produced in Saskatchewan, for instance, or Alberta. An increase in quota would benefit the Canadian people if it were produced in the area in which better quality cheese could be produced more economically.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry for continuing to come back to these questions, honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to have your decision as to whether I am obliged to listen to the honourable gentleman when he is not speaking from his seat.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I do not think the Senate would be any poorer if you did not listen.

May I now put my question?

The Hon. the Speaker: I should hear from the honourable Senator Grosart on this point of order. These are very special circumstances and we should take this opportunity to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, in my opinion the point of order is well made. The rule requires, although I have not read it recently, that a senator shall rise in his place. It makes no reference to any numbered seat, nor does it define "his place". In view of the fact that on this side at the moment we have a temporary acting leader, a temporary acting deputy leader, and a temporary acting whip, I suggest to His Honour that we are all speaking from our places, as the rule requires.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that, although Rule 25 requires that a senator desiring to speak in the Senate shall rise in his place, because of today's special circumstances the rule may be disregarded?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): With unanimous consent. It is a pleasure, because otherwise he would be so far away.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, it should be understood that His Honour's ruling is of a purely temporary nature.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. I open my remarks by thanking the sponsor of the bill—

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Is the honourable senator speaking on second reading?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: I would like to address a question to the sponsor. Perhaps he could explain a little more to me and, in turn, to the Senate, the supply management features of the bill. I ask this particularly because he suggested it is a good thing for poultry, eggs and turkeys, but not necessarily for other products. I ask him to explain in a little more detail the supply-management features?

The honourable sponsor seemed to indicate that there is some urgency in the passing of this legislation. I am wondering what he meant by that. Would he also say whether it is necessary for the provincial legislatures to meet before action by way of complementary legislation can be taken with respect to the provisions of this bill? If that be the case, and in order that we shall be in a position to co-operate with the provincial governments, may we know when the provincial legislatures are to meet?

Hon. Mr. Hays: Clause 18 of the bill allows supply control only in respect of poultry and poultry products. Of course, clause 24, as I explained, provides the guidelines for the quota allocation. Clause 2 does not alter the effect of the bill, but makes it explicit that a plebiscite is required for products other than poultry and poultry products. This plebiscite must be taken in the case of anyone wishing to opt in.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Or something else.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Yes, or something else. The words are "plebiscites, or otherwise".

In reference to the need for provincial legislation, I understand that the Minister of Agriculture and Food of the Province of Ontario, Mr. Stewart, has been telephoning the Minister of Agriculture regarding legislation he is presenting, which requires the passage of this bill as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: What does that mean?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Like February.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Are you suggesting that the Ontario legislature has passed legislation, or is planning on passing it?

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Mr. Hays: I believe their plans are to pass legislation. I am sorry for not being familiar with it. However, it is necessary that this bill fits in with their proposed legislation.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Do you know when the Ontario Legislature will sit?

Hon. Mr. Hays: No, I do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before I give the floor to the honourable Senator Phillips, I must say that we are on second reading of the bill, but because of special circumstances—the bill having reached us very early this morning containing amendments—questions must be allowed at this time. I understand that Senator Phillips has not completed his questions.

• (1200)

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: This questioning is being done under special circumstances, but even if it were not a special day it seems to me that it would be quite in order to put a question after the sponsor has spoken, because the answer might determine whether it would be necessary for a senator to speak subsequently.

The Hon. the Speaker: I made my remarks because I am aware that some honourable senators do wish to speak on this matter. I am suggesting that if we get through the questioning of the sponsor we can then ask honourable senators who have prepared a speech to proceed. Honourable Senator Phillips?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: In reply to Senator Benidickson's remarks, I can only say that we would not be asking the number of questions we are if it were not for the fact that we have not had an opportunity to study the debate in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: My point was that it would be in order whether it was an unusual circumstance or not.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Senator Benidickson referred to the insert in the bill. This creates confusion in my mind when I compare the insert to the "blues" that I have been able to obtain, which disclose that two amendments were passed. The sponsor stated there were three amendments. Can you clarify this for me? I should also like to know who is responsible for the printing of this insert.

Hon. Mr. Hays: There were two amendments and then a new clause was added to the bill, and that is the one I gave you. I did not hear the second part of your question.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: My question pertains to the first amendment, the one calling for a plebiscite or otherwise. What does "otherwise" mean? Does this mean that a decision is made by a majority of producers across Canada? For example, if two or three provinces were opposed to some action but a majority of the producers in other provinces were in favour—the larger provinces having a greater number of producers—would their decision then be imposed on these two or three provinces?

Hon. Mr. Hays: I understand that the referendum, if it were dealing with cows and calves, for example, would have to be across Canada, and the majority would rule.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: You keep saying a referendum.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Or otherwise. Provincial legislation now provides for marketing agencies, and this is simply a federal arm to such agencies. Any province can have a marketing agency if it wishes.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I have a question for the sponsor of the bill. Am I correct in believing that the new clause 24 will, in view of the provisions of clause 18(3), apply only to poultry and poultry products, including eggs, of course? That is the way it appears to me. Am I correct in that belief?

Hon. Mr. Hays: I will have to read the clause again.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Surely that is there for the benefit of the beef producers who do not want to be included.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe so.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Yes.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to open my remarks by thanking the sponsor of this bill for a complete and precise presentation of this legislation. He gave not only the purport of the legislation but its background.

This legislation is important and it has come to us at the request of the ten provinces of Canada, although one province has some reservation with respect to one particular aspect. Here the honourable Senator Hays referred to the attitude taken by the Government of Manitoba. I also thank the sponsor for the explanations he gave in answer to questions put to him, and I hasten to add that we could not have had a better sponsor in this chamber for this piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are grateful to him and we are fortunate to be able to benefit from his expertise in this area.

I should like to draw attention to a slight error in the bill as distributed to us. The title page reads that the bill was passed by the House of Commons on December 30, rather than on December 31. I understand that the bill was printed last night, and that is the reason for the wrong date.

With regard to the typewritten insert setting out the two amendments made to this bill by the House of Commons, I have only cursorily examined the insert but the only difference I find in this wording and the bill as printed is in clause 2(c)(ii) where the number "17" has been added in the last line. The bill as printed simply referred to "section" without specifying the section.

I wish to express the concern of some honourable senators for being recalled at this time of the year—this last day of 1971—to deal with this legislation. We on this side of the house understand that some senators have been put to great inconvenience because they have had to cancel trips abroad in order to return to the capital. However, once this bill was passed by the House of Commons it then became the constitutional duty of this place to reassemble in order to be legislatively seized with this legislation, and, in my opinion, a good way to close out 1971 is by working in this chamber. It has been a long and busy year of legislative performance.

I know all honourable senators will understand that although this bill is coming to us in the dying hours of 1971, it does not mean that there is any pressure on the Senate. There is no deadline on this legislation. The Senate can deal with it in its own time. If we close our debate today, all to the good. If not, we can come back later on in the new year to complete our legislative work. I want to stress that honourable senators are free to speak for as long and as often as they wish on this legislation, and deal with it in their own good time.

I support the suggestion made by the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Hays) to send this bill to one of our committees. In my opinion—and I am merely expressing an opinion—that committee should be the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. We have no committee on agriculture. This is not only a matter of agriculture, although the bill deals with farm products; it is a matter of interprovincial trade, and I think it is a bill which should go to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. I am informed that the Minister of Agriculture and his officials will be in attendance. Honourable senators will have an opportunity to ask them all the questions they want about this piece of legislation.

That is about all I have to say at this stage on this bill. I reiterate my thanks to the sponsor for his description of the bill in introducing it to us.

Hon. Rhéal Belisle: Honourable senators, having listened to the comments made by the sponsor of Bill C-176 (Hon. Mr. Hays) and of the other senators who have made a contribution to this debate, I should like to make one or two observations on the bill.

Since we have been recalled at this late date in 1971 and the Government seems to be very anxious to get early passage of this legislation, I must again say to the house that we are not doing justice to important legislation. I know this bill has been before the other place for a long time. Nevertheless, I believe our duty is fully to scrutinize every piece of legislation that comes before this chamber. After a very brief reading of this new bill, which was given to us as we entered the chamber, I must say it is a much better bill than the one originally presented in 1970. I read the bill at that time, and I think it is fair to say that it was a classic in terms of sloppy drafting, sloppy translation, complexity and inequity, and was another agency for the already heavy political patronage machine of the Liberal Party.

This bill was the best example of a package deal ever brought before the other place. Unfortunately, it was a package deal without wrapping.

Honourable senators, I think this bill is so important that if we attempt to deal with it today we will again do injustice to ourselves as legislators. We will not have the opportunity, as is our prerogative, to call outside witnesses before us.

I sincerely think that the crux of what a farm policy should take into account are social and human considerations. Obviously this Government policy in terms of agriculture ignores that concept completely. I personally would like to see this bill go to a committee next week. Why is the Government so anxious to rush everything through before midnight tonight? We all love holidays, but let us bear in mind that legislation should come first. As Senator Benidickson said, this compromise of last night or early this morning should be studied in the light of the comments made by farm organizations and others.

Honourable senators, if the Deputy Leader of the Government was sincere in saying that there is no rush—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Do you mean I am not sincere?

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I say, if he was sincere—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Why do you say that?

Hon. Mr. Belisle: —that there was no rush, let us deal with the bill next week.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You do not have the courage to make the charge.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us proceed with our work and see where we are at the end of the day.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): If the honourable senator will permit me—

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I am finished.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): You are finished, but not completely. If you want to be logical and practical, why do you not submit an amendment? We would vote on it. It is not enough just to go on the street and talk, like you are doing here. Be logical. Put an amendment forward and we will decide on it.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: That observation and those made from the very beginning this morning by the Honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) do not need any comment, because they have been made in such a fashion as to be derogatory to this chamber. I always practise what I preach. Whenever I speak, I speak from some knowledge of the subject at hand. Unfortunately, most of the time Senator Fournier takes advantage of our good nature, and we always permit his uncalled for and not too enlightening interruptions. Patience is a virtue. I wish the honourable senator would practise it. If he did, he would do something to enhance his prestige in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I thank the honourable gentleman. It is the first time I have had such kind remarks from someone in a blue suit and a red shirt.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, a short time ago we were criticized for having dealt with a major bill, the income tax legislation, much too quickly, and the Senate was given a very bad press. I think it was unjustifiably given a bad press, because the record shows that the Senate did study that income tax bill on many occasions, and studied it thoroughly. It debated the bill and the report of the committee in a comprehensive way, so I say that we were criticized unjustifiably.

I think it fair to say that the other place has not always conducted itself in a way that one could say was beyond reproach. The manner in which the other place has conducted itself regarding this bill is a prize example, and the result of that type of conduct has been virtually to bring the legislative process of this country to a standstill. If in this or the other chamber we are going to debate one bill for months at a time, and then a second for months at a time, when we are faced with perhaps 40 or 50 pieces of required legislation, it means that public business has not been dealt with efficiently. Because of protracted debate, because of filibuster, because of the tactics of certain individuals in the other place, I think that the consideration of this legislation has prevented other necessary legislation being dealt with in a proper, thorough and expeditious manner.

• (1220)

We are not in control of the other place, but when the press comments on this chamber, I suggest that they also compare the democratic process in this chamber to what occurs in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Order!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that the honourable Senator Grosart is raising a point of order having to do with certain reflections and attacks contained in the remarks of a member of one house on what is taking place in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I think the course that Senator Grosart is taking is right. On the other hand, there were certain individuals—including one who had held high office in this country—who, outside Parliament, did go out of their way to criticize this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There were no reflections on the other house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We are not talking about what went on in the other place. It will be recalled that Senator Connolly took exception to some remarks made outside that chamber by certain persons belonging to political parties, and I think it was that fact that Senator Argue was seeking to establish.

I am sure his view is that we have work we must do and that we do it conscientiously. I think that what he has been saying up to now has been within the context of what I have just said.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am glad Your Honour understood immediately the point of order on which I rose. With all due respect to Senator Argue, I suggest that his remarks were completely outside the accepted rules of procedure. It is a general rule, custom or convention that we do not criticize individuals in the other house for what they say in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Individuals or groups of individuals in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That custom is not observed by them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: At times it may not be observed by them. The Leader of the Government has referred to remarks made outside the other house. I believe that reference was completely unnecessary and a mile away from the point of order. Obviously, my point of order has nothing whatever to do with what might have been said by any member of the other house, outside that house.

My point of order was that we do have a rule, custom or convention that we do not engage in such criticism, for the simple reason, as has been explained by the authorities over and over again, that it would merely lead to accusations being thrown backwards and forwards between the two houses—which would have the very effect to which Senator Argue objects, that is, the impeding of the legislative process.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will hear Senator Argue on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. Argue: On the point of order, at times in this chamber I have listened to outstanding spokesmen of the Conservative Opposition, both its Leader and Acting Leader, complaining that the other house had sent us legislation at the last moment, and that it was so inefficient in the conduct of its affairs that the Senate could not function properly. I have listened to the House of Commons and the Government of the country being run into the ground on that basis. So I am a little taken aback when I, a member of the Liberal caucus in this house, wishing to say that there has been delay in the other place, am told that it is not possible for me to say that in my own way, just as other honourable senators have done when complaining about actions taken in the other place that have inconvenienced us from time to time.

Furthermore, we hamstring ourselves, when honourable members in the other place run down the Senate, if we do not take the position here that we are able to reply. In such instances they refer to us as "the other place", and in similar instances surely we should be able so to refer to them.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I understand that the honourable gentleman, the acting Leader of the Opposition, is an expert dans le droit parlementaire, and I would like him to quote from the books the basis of his argument.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was referring to custom and convention, not to our own rules. I will leave it to His Honour, who is an expert on that, to decide whether he wishes to quote authorities.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think the point has been dealt with.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is an unwritten rule of Parliament, followed from time immemorial, that when a member of this chamber makes disparaging remarks about a member of the other place, or the other place, the Speaker should immediately intervene. Otherwise we would find ourselves in a very difficult situation. I think this does not need emphasizing, as all the authorities are unanimous, and this practice has been followed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you will recall that, when the honourable Senator Connolly rose on a question of privilege last week and took objection to some remarks made by members of the other house, at the conclusion of his remarks I asked him if those words were pronounced inside the building or in the other chamber and he said specifically that he heard those words on television. This changed the matter completely.

Before I complete my remarks, I feel I should say that I have given some thought to this point. I have been reading the House of Commons Hansard and I think that if this rule must be applied rigidly it must be applied in both houses. There is no doubt about that; otherwise, I will be in a difficult position here, if some remarks are made in the Commons, in wishing to prevent honourable senators rising in this place.

Senator Argue should proceed now and he should avoid any reflection on the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Or on the members, or on the way they conduct their own business.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I agree very much with His Honour's ruling. I think it is an important one, namely, that while we should not be aggressive, as I take it, we should be in a position to defend ourselves. That is a pretty sensible attitude.

The bill now before us has been before the House of Commons for an exceedingly long period of time. It was introduced on October 28, 1970. Presumably the country wanted it dealt with expeditiously, but the bill has taken 14 months to reach us. The Senate should therefore take a reasonable amount of time in studying the bill thoroughly. In the light of the very major and far-reaching amendments which were passed by the House of Commons—

• (1230)

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: As of yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Argue: —in fact, overnight and almost too quickly for the printers to produce them. The Senate committee would be wise to make itself available next week to hear representatives of major farm organizations on this legislation as it comes to us in its final form after 14 months of consideration in the other place.

The legislation is required in that sphere of agriculture where it is designed to be used, the marketing of poultry and eggs. Having said that, we then get into an area of severe disagreement. Producers in many parts of Canada, particularly on the Prairies, are seriously concerned that the legislation will be in the hands of a bureaucracy with the right to establish quotas and prices and to manage the production of beef, which until now has been managed by the producers themselves.

It is very difficult for any government to decide what the farming community really wants, or to determine who speaks for the farmers. Do the co-operatives speak for farmers when they say, "Give us marketing boards under certain circumstances"? Does the National Farmers Union speak for farmers when it says, "Give us marketing boards"? Do egg producers or the Palliser Wheat Growers speak for the farmers when they say, "Keep away from marketing agencies and marketing controls"? The difficulty for any government lies in the fact that farmers themselves have not made up their minds, or, to be more accurate, have made up their minds in a number of directions.

Cattle and grain producers who may attend a meeting and vote in favour of the Wheat Board may then attend a meeting of stock growers and vote against a marketing board for beef. However, farmers are not as inconsistent or as mixed up as they may at first appear. Their attitude is: "The Wheat Board has been a good system. We like it, let us keep it. The cattle and calf industry has operated quite well in the past 30 years, so let us not take a chance on causing trouble within the system." From a business, political or philosophic point of view, it is not a bad attitude to adopt. Their attitude is: "If it works, we want it. The Wheat Board works, so let us keep it. The present system for marketing cattle has worked, so let us be careful before we change it."

The Government should take care in moving into this field. I am no authority on the bill, but the principle behind it, from the day it was first drafted, was to provide supply management, that in the event of a surplus in a given commodity a board should take over the marketing of that product, establish quotas, prices, and adjust the supply to fit the market.

Such a system may be best for poultry and eggs, but in recommending supply management we are saying that we have been defeated by the present system and therefore must try something else. The answer to so-called overproduction is to increase markets. That is where the emphasis should lie.

A year ago I opposed the principle of supply management in the grain industry, under the LIFT Program. I did so because I did not think that it would do a good job. It hurt a number of producers, and I considered it unnecessary.

The problem facing grain producers will be solved not by establishing rigid quotas or supply management but by increasing markets. That should be our first step. The Dairy Commission is often mentioned as having done a great job. Admittedly, it has done some worthwhile things, one of the reasons being that it was given some real money. In 1971 the commission received $129 million. When a board has that much to give away, it is bound to help those who come under its control; otherwise it would be severely criticized.

What has happened to the dairy industry since the program came into effect? I recall doing everything I could as an individual senator, including introducing a bill, to prevent the adoption of marketing quotas and the eligibility ruling affecting marketing quotas as a criterion for producers receiving the subsidy. I maintained that producers should be free to come in. However, it was decided that cream and milk producers should sell 12,000 pounds of milk per year or 420 pounds of butter fat to be eligible for the subsidy. Under the quota system a producer of butter fat could receive approximately $1, while a producer who was without the quota would get 65 cents. That is a severe way of allocating production.

When that legislation first went into effect there were 65,000 industrial milk producers in Canada. The latest figures which I obtained from the Dairy Commission this morning indicated that in April 1971 the figure had been reduced to 50,000, representing a reduction in four years of 23 per cent. It would appear that we are solving the problem of the dairy industry by getting rid of it.

Hon. Mr. Hays: May I ask the honourable senator how many cows it takes to produce 400 pounds of butter fat?

Hon. Mr. Argue: That depends on whether it is a Harry Hays cow or an Argue cow. If it is a Harry Hays cow it only takes half a cow, but if it is a Hazen Argue cow, it takes two or three cows. I only have ordinary cows like ordinary farmers. It might even take half a dozen cows if milked only in the summer months. Of course, this is just an illustration.

• (1240)

Hon. Mr. Hays: You say it takes about half a cow?

Hon. Mr. Argue: It takes about half a Harry Hays cow, but not half an ordinary cow.

But if I produce butter fat with my cows at almost zero cost, that is much more efficient than Senator Hays can produce butter fat. As farmers do in my part of the country, I can go out in the summer and just chisel the calves out of their milk. The farmers sit under the cows, milk whatever milk they can, take it in and separate it and send a few cans of cream to the creamery. The actual cost of such production over and above other costs is very little. So they are very efficient.

On the other hand, they get very few dollars for that, but it is important to many. Four hundred and twenty pounds is not very much. Thirty-five cents a pound on 420 pounds is not very much. It amounts to a little over $100. The trouble is that the $100 does not go to the person who needs it the most. The Dairy Commission has been keeping the $100, and passing it on to the big producers.

I objected to it before and I object to it now. I must say that there are more who agree with me today than was the case when I first made my objections four years ago. The provincial governments then went along. The major farm organizations went along, and this is what happened. But the Dairy Commission only a few weeks ago announced that it was now going to let back in those with a quota for 420 pounds or over who had lost it because of non-fulfilment. In other words, the Dairy Commission is going to open the door a little for some of the small producers.

Therefore, simply to say that the Dairy Commission has been an outstanding success, and as a result we must pass this legislation because it is the same kind of legislation, does not tell the whole story.

In the four years that the commission has been in operation, 23 per cent of the industrial milk producers quit producing. Their number is down from 65,000 to 50,000.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Senator Argue, have you any figures with respect to consumer prices over the period since the Dairy Commission was established?

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I am sorry, I do not have any more information on that than you, Senator Benidickson. I know that prices have gone up, although the dairy producers' prices have remained roughly the same.

In 1967 there were, in round figures, 89,000 cream shippers in Canada. This program has been in effect for four years, and there are now only 54,000 cream shippers. That is a reduction of 39 per cent. So we can stand up and say that the Dairy Commission has been a great success for the 54,000 who are still in existence, but what about the 35,000 who just gave up and said that there was not enough in it to continue producing, or who found that the rules were so difficult that they could not get the quota they needed and just had to go out of business.

I am not opposed to the principle of marketing boards as such. They can serve a useful purpose. The Dairy Commission can serve a useful purpose. But I think that the commission, in its so-called supply management, should be exceedingly careful not to make it impossible for the very small producer to earn a few dollars while at the same time making it easy for the big producer to keep on getting the lion's share of the subsidies.

It happens that the vast majority of producers are located in central Canada, and some years ago when this was being discussed I felt that it might be a kind of gang-up affair by them to get control of the market at the expense of producers who happened to be in the region. I am not sure that I was right then, but I think that that is a great danger. It is certainly a great fear and it is one of the greatest reasons for fear among the beef producers on the Prairies.

Producers on the Prairies were told over and over again by Government experts, until they were tired of it, that they should get out of the grain business, or reduce their grain production, and get into livestock. We used to ask for support for the grain producers, and people would say, "Oh, those lazy guys just want to farm for a few months in the summer and then take off for Florida in the winter." I doubt that even one-half of one per cent of those grain producers have ever been in Florida or any other place with that kind of climate, but the point is that they were advised to go into beef production and, following that advice, they have gone into it in a great way and have been very successful.

The farmers who count in the main so far as I am concerned, and the ones we should be interested in, are those who have under 100 head of cattle. They form the bulk of the producers, and we should be very careful not to load them with a marketing agency that reduces, either deliberately or otherwise, their opportunities to earn a living in the beef business by transferring their production to the larger producers.

Having said that, I must say that I was very pleased, in looking over the bill, to see that the Government has gone a considerable distance in endeavouring to make it impossible for that kind of thing to happen. The Government has established a council, which will have at least three members, but not more than nine. One-third of the members of the council will come from the four western provinces, one-third from the four Atlantic provinces, and one-third from the central provinces.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And 50 per cent of them should be producers.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Yes, 50 per cent should be actual producers. That is a good step in the right direction. Certainly, as one from the far reaches of Canada, I cannot complain about the representation for central Canada. I think they would have a strong case for a slightly larger representation than one third.

All that aside, I think there should be further amendments to this particular section of the act. Personally, I would like to see that council comprised of more than nine members. Furthermore, there should be some indication of the method by which the producers themselves will be represented or be selected. I am not arguing that the present provision is not a good one, but I am saying that, if it is possible, there should be some rules to determine who chooses the farmers who are to be on the board.

The reason I say this is that we all know that you can go out and choose three or four farmers of any particular type of mentality. The only thing common among those farmers would be that they are farmers. Simply because a man is a farmer does not necessarily make him a typical representative of the ordinary farmer. For that reason I think there should be some method for choosing these people.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Does he agree it would be a good thing if this bill were amended to provide that those who are appointed to this council should be selected first by their own organizations?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Perhaps, but that does not necessarily meet the point I have in mind. You can name any organization you like—and this may be woolly thinking, in your opinion—but I am not 100 per cent sure that the person that organization would choose would be the typical person. However, I certainly admit that if the four sections of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in western Canada, for example, were to have an open meeting to discuss the merits of some person they were recommending, and then had general agreement on that person, that would carry a great deal of weight with me. The method of selecting the council might be spelled out a little more adequately in the legislation.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Would you agree that they would be less political appointees?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I do not know whether the Government will appoint political persons or not, but I would not discount a person because he is political. I do not think it is a crime to have been in public life in this country. I have the greatest respect for many members of parties other than the one of which I am a member, and I would be very happy with the appointment of certain persons not of my political persuasion, because I know they could do a good job. I would hate to think that any person would not be appointed simply because of his political persuasion. I would also hate to see the council loaded with members from one political party. That would not do the farmers any good.

• (1250)

Another thing I should like to suggest, honourable senators, is that consideration be given to a limitation on the term of office of the people appointed. It seems to me that if you appoint somebody to this council—a farmer or any other good person—and he is appointed for, say, 30 years, he is not going to be quite as good or quite as effective at the end of that term as he was at the beginning. Therefore I feel that farm organizations and farmers generally would be happy to see a limit imposed on the term of office which would give the opportunity of having new faces and new ideas in the council from time to time.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I ask the honourable senator to what political party he belongs? If we knew that we might know where he stands.

Hon. Mr. Argue: As I have said, I think there should be a larger council, and also that the members of that council who are to represent farmers should be selected by the producers themselves, and the term of office should be limited.

I also notice, honourable senators, that one of the major amendments to this bill is found in the new clause 24 which reads as follows:

> A marketing plan to the extent that it allocates any production or marketing quota to any area of Canada, shall allocate that quota on the basis of the production from that area in relation to the total production of Canada over a period of five years immediately preceding the effective date of the marketing plan. In allocating additional quotas for anticipated growth of market demand, the marketing agency shall consider the principle of comparative advantage of production.

This is an amendment the NDP moved in the other place, which was taken up by the Government, and now finds its place in the legislation. But to me it seems that even those who are fervently supporting marketing boards recognize the dangers of giving a board the power to establish quotas and prices, and therefore they say, as they did with respect to the Wartime Prices and Trade Board during the war years, it should be governed by performance during the previous five years.

Honourable senators, with all these questions in mind I think we would be performing a useful service if we were to hear even at this stage representations from farm organizations, particularly in light of the major amendments made in the last few hours.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I am not rising to speak in the debate at this stage; I simply want to make a comment. I am not prepared to speak on second reading of this bill today because I do not have sufficient knowledge of it at the moment. It is very difficult to go through the bill in the time between its passage in the other house and now.

Therefore I move, seconded by Senator Molgat, that this debate be adjourned until Tuesday, January 11.

Hon. Mr. Argue: At 11 a.m.?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: At 11 a.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the honourable Senator Molgat, that this debate be adjourned until Tuesday, January 11 at 11 a.m.

I must say at this time that the motion to adjourn the debate is not itself debatable. It is votable, but not debatable.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): With Your Honour's permission, I rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it a question of privilege?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): It is not a question of privilege because I do not feel that my honour is concerned in any way. But if Your Honour will permit me, I should like to rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will listen to the point you have to make.

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): This is an important time, and I would like the honourable gentleman who moved the adjournment to give us his reasons for doing so.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: It is not debatable.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): If he has no reason at all, why adjourn it until January 11?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must point out that we are governed by our rules, and under the rules the motion to adjourn the debate is not debatable.

A motion has been made and I am going to put the question now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is uncertainty, will those in favour of the honourable Senator Sparrow's motion please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those against please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It is one o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, since the debate is apparently concluded, and we have heard the last speech on this—

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: It is my intention to speak on second reading. Are we to proceed now, or break for lunch?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I move the adjournment of the house until two o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m.

At 2 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the brief recess allowed me to examine as best I could one of the essential amendments made to this bill, and it is possible it was made in the wee small hours of the morning. I refer to what is described as the first amendment, clause 2 paragraph (c) which defines "Farm product".

The reason I rise at this time—and I will speak only on this amendment—is that this amendment seems to have created a great deal of confusion as to the scope and effect of this bill. I am sorry that the sponsor of the bill is not present yet, because it was my hope to direct a question to him to clarify, if possible, the effect of this amendment.

The amendment is to the interpretation section of the act, and the purport of the amendment is to define a farm product. This is definitive as to the meaning of farm product throughout the act and, indeed, in the title of the act itself which is "An Act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products".

The essential question before us is, what is a farm product? I see that the sponsor of the bill is now present. As I said, it is my intention to direct a question to him as to the impact of this amendment and I refer, of course, to the amendment to clause 2, paragraph (c) which now reads, having in mind the additional inclusion mentioned by Senator Langlois, as follows:

> "farm product" for the purpose of Part I, means any natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product and, for the purpose of the other provisions of this Act,—

And I emphasize that.

> —means
> (i) eggs, and poultry, and any part of any such product, and
> (ii) any other natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied, as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise, that the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency under section 17 with powers relating to that product;

It has been suggested to me that this amendment creates, in fact, a new bill. If my interpretation of this definition is correct, we have before us a completely new bill. This was the suggestion made by Senator Benidickson in the quotation he made from a statement by the President of the National Farmers Union. It would seem to me, upon reading the amendment, that the only farm products that come automatically under this act are eggs, poultry, and any part of any such product.

The second subparagraph of clause 2 sets out certain conditions under which any other product can be described as a farm product. I believe all honourable senators have the amendment before them. The conditions, I suggest, are that it must be a natural product of agriculture or any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied, as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise, that the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency under section 17 with powers relating to that product.

Surely, coming in the definitive section, this makes it clear that we now have a provincial veto which is almost at variance with some of the statements that have been made as to the effect of the act and certainly at variance with the minister's statement when he originally introduced the act. I would ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Hays) to comment on this, if he will, because it seems to me that this amendment has completely confused the bill. There is, I suggest, no way of knowing clearly what the bill now means. For example, to be a farm product the Governor in Council must be satisfied "as a result"—he cannot be satisfied any other way; this is my interpretation—he can be satisfied only "as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites", and so on, that the majority of producers want to come under the bill. Does this mean that one provincial government can veto the whole product nationally? Does it mean that one provincial government can veto the intervention of the federal board only in that province? I suggest there is so much confusion apparent, superficially at least, in this amendment that we need much more time to consider its effect.

I say that because this is a new bill. If this amendment is interpreted as I have suggested, the Senate must, in committee at least, call this to the attention of national farm organizations, and anyone who may in any way be affected by this complete change, so that they can make representations to this chamber. This is particularly important, as I think Senator Sparrow said earlier, because of the responsibility of this house to consider the interests of the provinces as such.

I have asked some eminent authorities, in the Senate and elsewhere, to give me their interpretation of this amendment. All I can say at the moment is that the interpretations vary from A to Z. Obviously it would be helpful if one could read the proceedings in the other place to see what was the intent and the understanding of the meaning of this amendment. Unfortunately, the proceedings are not available. In the recess I made an effort to obtain the proceedings, but I was told by the Assistant Editor of Debates in the other place that the printed proceedings would not be available until four or five o'clock today at the earliest. I then asked if it would be possible for me to obtain the "blues", the unrevised transcript of proceedings, relating to this amendment, but I was told that the copy was not available. I am not being critical, because a very good explanation was given to me as to why it was not available.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It would be required for the purpose of printing.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I say, a very good explanation was given to me why the copy was not available. However, we are then faced with a situation in which we have an amendment that seems to go to the heart of the whole intent of the bill. We have no way of knowing how it is interpreted by the minister, who presumably moved the motion. As a matter of fact, we do not know who moved the amendment. We have no way of knowing at this point who moved the amedment, whether the minister accepted it, whether it was on a vote against the minister's wish. Therefore, to clarify the question, I would now ask the sponsor of the bill to give his appraisal of this amendment, as I know he has studied it and is an expert. Does it provide for a provincial veto in respect to the intervention of the federal marketing board, or does it not?

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I can answer all of the questions Senator Grosart has posed. This morning I probably misled the house if I indicated that a commodity could be put in under this umbrella, by an agency or otherwise. It does have to be a declaration, as the senator pointed out, by the province, stating that a certain group of producers, by plebiscite or otherwise, have convinced the province that they would like to be part of Bill C-176. This is a correct assumption.

It seems to me that the honourable senator asked about all natural products or all animal products. That could be deemed to be beef, turkey, poultry, hogs and all the various things of that kind that come into the world naturally.

I would suggest that as the minister will be here today and will have his top officials with him, that would be a suitable opportunity to obtain this information. We could send the bill to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where these questions could be posed and could be answered, and we would all be more enlightened at that point.

Honourable senators, I can scarcely agree that this is a new bill. We are still living with the constitutional problems in regard to an overall act to replace all the provincial acts. One thing I am concerned about, and I am sure all the provinces are concerned about, is that the provinces want this legislation. It is fairly urgent. I realize that the Senate can discuss this as long as it wishes, and it may be that this is desirable. At the same time, it would be well if these questions could be put when the minister is here. He is prepared to stay as long as the Senate wishes, and he will have his officials with him.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, the point I was making is well illustrated in the remarks made by Senator Hays. I should say at this stage, first of all, that we are debating the principle of the bill. The point I am making is that this amendment changes the whole principle of the bill and it is at this stage that we have to decide whether this bill in principle has the approval of the Senate before it goes to a committee. While it is helpful, it is not a conclusive argument that we should wait until we get the explanation from the minister.

Hon. Mr. Hays: As far as poultry and poultry products are concerned, there is no change. This is the part of the bill which the provinces are very anxious to have. Other provinces have to opt in, as Senator Grosart mentioned, by a declaration of the province, if they have sufficient proof to indicate that their producers want to be part of the scheme.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I agree with that entirely, because over and over again we have heard it said by the minister and others that one of the reasons this bill should be passed by both Houses of Parliament is that it has the approval in principle of the ten provinces, leaving aside, perhaps, the qualification by Manitoba. But Manitoba's qualification, as I understand it, was a request for a provincial veto. I think that has now been provided. That, of course, raises the point whether the agreement of the provinces to have this federal authority granted in principle now applies. Does it apply to the old bill or to the new bill? I do not know. Nor do I know what the attitude of the provinces may be to this bill, which I say is a new bill. If it is now introducing a complete provincial veto—and I do not know whether it is a veto in one province or a veto of the whole national marketing scheme—it is certainly not implicit in this amendment. That is why I say I do not think there is the least hope in the world that this chamber can deal adequately with this bill unless it is prepared to give an opportunity to every person who may be affected by the fundamental change—because even if it does not create a new bill it certainly makes a fundamental change in the whole concept of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In adding a new product only.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we are dealing with the very principle of this bill, may I be permitted to put a question to the sponsor? In the light of his having said that the minister is available today, is he suggesting to the house that we should be satisfied only with the minister's views, or is it possible that the minister is not available next week?

Hon. Mr. Hays: I cannot answer that question. I know that he is available today. I would hope that we could question him today, because I think it is very important.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: What about Mr. Atkinson and the others? Are you going to be satisfied only with what the minister has to say?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That would be a matter for the committee to decide. We cannot answer for the committee in this place.

Hon. Mr. Argue: But surely your opinion is important, especially as a member of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Because you are not a member.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is right. Farmers are excluded.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, having had somewhat of a Presbyterian indoctrination, may I ask the sponsor if it is pre-ordained that we must question the minister today and not next week?

Hon. Mr. Hays: I would not say that, but he is available today and there are some senators who would like to question him today. The matter is certainly fresh in his mind.

Hon. Mr. Argue: May I be permitted to ask the Deputy Leader (Hon. Mr. Langlois) a question? Some of us who are vitally interested in this bill are not members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I wounder if some substitution might be made so that we could go to that committee as members of the committee and not just as visitors to it? I believe there are members of the committee who are not here today so that there would be a sufficient number of vacant chairs for those of us who would like to be there as members of that committee for the purpose of dealing with this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. There is a disturbance in the gallery. May I ask the officer in charge of the gallery to see to it that the persons causing the disturbance are removed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Before answering your question, Senator Argue, I should first like to know if there are any vacancies on the committee.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the honourable sponsor of this bill is a very knowledgeable man not only in the field covered by this bill, but in the whole field of agriculture. I do not pretend for one moment to have the degree of knowledge that is his in the field of agriculture.

He indicated this morning in explaining the background of this bill that there had been long discussions not only in the other place but in the Canadian agricultural industry, and that this has been a very controversial bill. For that very reason the Senate owes it to itself and to the people of Canada to study the bill carefully in order to know before it is passed exactly what it will do.

• (1420)

Two of the categories covered in the bill have created very little controversy, as I have followed the debate. These are the chicken and egg categories. There seems to have been general agreement across Canada that something needed to be done in this field. Certainly the "chicken and egg" war last year was not in the interests of Canada; it was destructive of good Canadian internal trade patterns. It was questioned, as we all know, in the Supreme Court of Canada. It is something which in my view we have to be very careful about, and steps should be taken to ensure that this type of provincial restriction on trade does not continue.

In this area I can support the obviously general agreement that we should move ahead. There has, however, been great controversy in the field of cattle and hogs, and the objections here have come from the producer groups themselves. This in many ways reflects the traditional Canadian problem, the problem of regionalism—the fact that our regions are not identical, that they are not at the same stage of economic development, and that they do not follow the same farming practices.

Therefore, a bill to cover the whole of Canada is difficult to achieve if you are going to satisfy the bulk of the producers involved. That does not mean that the federal Government should not act. I think it is proper to have some enabling legislation so that the provinces can in fact proceed if there is a genuine desire on the part of the producers to establish national boards.

For many years the provinces, including my own, have been involved in provincial boards. They can operate to a certain extent, but they are limited in the final analysis. When we talk about the cost-price squeeze in agriculture, one of the elements that is most obvious is the increase in price. Marketing boards, by their system of operation and control of production at times, and control of marketing procedures, can obviously produce a better return for the farmers. If the farmers want to proceed in that direction, then I am anxious to have the legislation passed so that they can do so, but there is a real problem whenever you establish a producer marketing board.

First of all there is the question of identifying a producer. Does the man who has one sow and raises a few pigs per year qualify as a producer compared to a man with an operation involving 500 sows? Is someone with three head of cattle entitled to vote on the same basis as a rancher in Alberta who may be running 500 head? Is someone who is a part-time farmer regarded as a producer in the same sense as one who is depending completely on a farming operation? Is someone who is a partial producer of, say, cattle, in the same position as a man whose whole operation depends upon livestock? This is why there is concern in western Canada about the effects of this bill.

I will be frank and admit that the present bill is a big improvement over the one that was first introduced. The regional considerations of the council in particular are very important to western producers. The provision that one-third of the board members must be Westerners and one-third Maritimers is, in our opinion a very important change. It recognizes the need for regional representation. We agree with that, but are still concerned as to the total effect of this bill on our agricultural production. It may not be bad; I do not know. That is my problem.

I know this much, that due to other agricultural policies my own province, Manitoba, suffered badly. The Canadian Dairy Commission has been considered to be a success. In its totality I think it has been a success, but in the Province of Manitoba it certainly has not been so for a large number of producers. In past years we were exporters of butter, and we now find ourselves in the position of being importers. In past years many farmers in the marginal areas were able to operate small herds—not as a means of livelihood, but as part of a total farming picture—which they milked, and the cream kept local industry going in the form of small creameries dotted around the Manitoba farming areas, and now these activities have ceased. The creameries are closed, and our province is in a deficit butter position.

We cannot agree, therefore, that this type of centralization policy. imposed by a bureaucracy. is to the advantage of our province. That is the reason for our concern when we see a movement towards centralization. That does not mean we will not accept it. We may in the final analysis decide that it is in our best interests, and those of Canada. We do not intend to be dog in the manger with respect to this, but we do not wish to be pushed into it without knowing what we are getting into.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is the concern of the western groups who opposed the legislation as it was originally presented. They are important groups, such as the United Grain Growers, a very old and reputable western producer grain company, Unifarm in Alberta, the four provincial hog producer groups—one in Manitoba, two in Saskatchewan, and one in Alberta—and the three stock growers' associations, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association also took exception to the original bill.

Although changes have been made, we are faced today with three amendments which we did not see until today. I arrived at 10 o'clock this morning and immediately sought out the amendments, which I obtained through the office of a member of Parliament. I attempted to discover exactly what they mean by making telephone calls to Manitoba to discuss the amendments with the concerned associations. I was successful in reaching only one. The offices are, by and large, closed and will remain so tomorrow, Sunday, and, in some cases, Monday. Nevertheless, I feel that I have a responsibility to consult with those who objected in the past to this legislation, in order to find out from them the effect of these amendments.

This is why Senator Sparrow moved, and I seconded, his motion this morning that the Senate should adjourn this debate and meet on January 11, which would afford an opportunity to discuss the bill with those who have objected to it in the past, in order to discover the effect of these amendments. I recognize that it may seem to be a long period of time between now and January 11. We feel, however, that this time is needed to enable us to make contact with the producer groups. The Senate decided this was not to be, and I respect that choice.

• (1430)

Quite frankly, I would prefer another course of action. I suggest that the bill be referred this afternoon to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with the understanding that the committee be asked to sit next Thursday at 11 a.m. Although I am not a member of the committee, I would undertake to consult, between now and next Thursday, with those groups in my province who are concerned about this matter, including the provincial government, and to return to Ottawa to attend the meeting of the committee.

It seems to me that if we proceed immediately I shall not be in a position to discuss the amendments knowledgeably, because I am not be in possession of full details. This is not my field of enterprise and, in fairness to my province and to those groups who are concerned about the matter, I should be permitted this opportunity for consultation. No doubt my colleagues from other provinces would wish the same.

That would be my first choice. However, if we complete our debate on the principle of the bill this afternoon, and agree that the committee shall meet next Thursday, I will undertake to be present. If agreement cannot be reached, I am prepared to support a motion that the Senate meet on Wednesday or Thursday next, but it would be preferable to establish the committee this afternoon on the understanding that it should meet again next Thursday.

We owe it to ourselves and to the areas we represent to properly assess the effect of these amendments. When meeting with the minister we should be in a position to question him intelligently in the light of information we have been able to obtain from those most directly affected by the legislation, namely, the producer groups.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise on a point of order. We have just heard an interesting suggestion made by Senator Molgat that the committee be instructed on when it should meet. I recall to mind some rulings by His Honour on similar motions made earlier. In order to clarify the situation, perhaps His Honour would rule on whether a motion to so instruct the committee is acceptable.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I do not believe I used the word "instructed". I was cautious not to use that word, because as I understand the rules—and certainly this was my understanding when I was a member of the Manitoba Legislature—we cannot instruct the committee. However, it is possible for the committee to be asked by mutual consent.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I do not rise to discuss the merits of this bill. Since I am a Montreal lawyer, honourable senators would not expect me to be an authority on farm products legislation. I want to deal with only one point, which was raised by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Grosart), and which he was good enough to discuss with me before the luncheon adjournment. I refer to the interpretation of the first amendment, that is clause 2(c).

Senator Grosart asked the sponsor of this measure whether declarations from provincial governments would be necessary in order to determine whether any other natural product should be covered in the same way as poultry and eggs are covered. Senator Hays replied that declarations from the provincial governments would be required. The Acting Leader of the Opposition then said that this means a provincial veto, and that it introduces an entirely new principle. I submit, with deference, that this does not mean a provincial veto. We have but to read this amendment to see that it does not change the principle of the bill at all. What this says by way of definition of "farm product" is:

> (ii) any other natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied—

Following this there is a conditional clause, but the important words, I submit, are that the Governor in Council is satisfied that "the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency . . ." The Governor in Council has to be satisfied that there is a majority, and the Governor in Council will be satisfied "as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise." This does not say that any provincial government has a right of veto. Having received declarations from all the provincial governments concerned, the Governor in Council will then decide whether or not a majority of the producers across Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency.

I submit, with deference, that that is the meaning of this clause, and that it cannot mean that any individual provincial government can veto a proposal if the declarations by all the governments across the country show that the majority of producers want the establishment of an agency.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: You used the words "all governments". The word "all" is not in the amendment. Do you interpret clause 2(c)(ii) to mean all provincial governments?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: No, not necessarily all provincial governments. The provincial governments involved, yes. There could be two, three, four or more provincial governments involved. It does not say "all provincial governments".

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of clarification, I was interested to hear Senator Goldenberg use the phrase "all provincial governments". I believe Hansard will show that Senator Goldenberg used that phrase. His argument was that this was not a veto granted to any particular government, because if all provincial governments agree, then the Governor in Council can act. Well, if all provincial governments have to agree, then that is, of course, a veto. This is not the whole point, of course.

I suggest that this definitive clause leaves the whole thing up in the air. Does anyone know whether it means that one provincial government can veto a whole scheme?

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon Mr. Grosart: I am just asking. Does it mean that? Does it make clauses 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 completely inoperative unless there is a declaration by provincial governments? Does this mean by any one provincial government, by two or three provincial governments, or by all provincial governments?

The point I am making is that because this amendment was probably drafted in the small hours of the morning, it is completely impossible for any person knowing something of the interpretation of statutes, which I believe I do, and knowing something of the English language, which I believe I do, to interpret it.

It has been suggested that we call the minister to find out what he thinks it means. Well, that is meaningless. What the minister thinks it means will have no effect whatsoever on the interpretation by the courts of this amendment, and it will have no effect whatsoever on the scope and effect of the amendment. I do not care what the minister thinks it means; I do not care what the House of Commons thought it meant. The only thing that counts and the only thing we are concerned with in our capacity as a second chamber examining the language of legislation is, "What does it mean?" This is a matter that we have to speak to now on the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: By way of correction, when I said "all provincial governments" I meant all provincial governments concerned. There is a definition of regulated products in section 2(g) which states:

> "regulated product" means any farm product to the extent that it is grown or produced
> (i) anywhere in Canada, if an agency is authorized to exercise its powers in relation to any such product grown or produced in Canada, or
> (ii) in any region of Canada—

This means that it might be all of the provinces of Canada or only the provinces included in the region. Nowhere does this bill say that there must be unanimity. All that the provinces are doing is making declarations, from the sum total of which the Governor in Council will decide whether or not a majority of the producers is in favour of the establishment of an agency.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is clear.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I attempted to rise earlier, but, unfortunately, as in the past, no one seems to recognize us on this side of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I will not accept that, Senator Phillips. I cannot accept an honourable senator telling me that I did not give those to my left an opportunity to express their views.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (de Lanaudière): Perhaps you could ask the honourable senator to speak in clear English.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am just attempting to point out that there was a question of order raised, and I do not believe there was a ruling made on that point of order. The debate switched into what I would call the "Martinization" of the Senate. Once a point of order is raised, it is my understanding, after 15 years in Parliament, that there should be a ruling made on that point of order. I have a great deal of sympathy with the attempts of the honourable Senator Molgat, and I would appreciate Your Honour at this time making a ruling on that point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: There was a suggestion by the honourable Senator Molgat that the committee be instructed by the Senate to meet on a certain date. There was no formal motion. He was suggesting this as a course of action to be followed by the Senate, and then the honourable Senator Grosart rose on a point of order, saying that a week or two ago I decided that a committee should not receive instructions from the Senate. Immediately after that the honourable Senator Molgat rose and he clarified his position, saying that there would be no instructions to the committee, but that this would be done by agreement. Since there was no formal motion I decided that the point should not be pursued, and that was my ruling. I stand by the ruling made earlier that a committee should not receive instructions from the Senate.

• (1450)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I have several times tried to catch your eye. I make no complaint, because I know how difficult your position is; it is very difficult to recognize everyone who rises in this place during a debate of this kind. My purpose in rising at this time is not to comment on the point of order raised but to comment on the suggestion made by my honourable friend Senator Molgat.

If I understood him correctly, he was seeking an understanding of some kind, although I do not know with whom. I am trying to understand his position. I know that he and his colleagues who have taken a similar attitude are not members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. As I am a member, I would be prepared to move his suggested motion in committee. I cannot give an undertaking that my colleagues on the committee will vote for the motion. That is as far as I can go. There would also have to be agreement by the committee members on the date of adjournment; that would depend on what the committee decided to do. If the committee decided to call witnesses from western Canada or eastern Canada, the delay of a week, as suggested by Senator Molgat, might not be long enough; the committee might need a longer period, until, say, the middle of the month. I am prepared to move a motion to that effect as soon as we know what the committee intends to do. As I say, I can make no commitment and give no undertaking on behalf of my fellow members of the committee. I repeat, I am ready to move the motion he suggests, if he wishes me to do so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And you have a lot of influence there.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I would further suggest that if the committee decides to agree to such a motion, the Senate should adjourn to a date sufficiently far in the future to allow the committee to do its work and make its report. The Senate should be subject to recall whenever the committee has completed its work. If the suggested motion is carried in committee, I further undertake to move, later this day, the appropriate adjournment motion in this chamber. I would suggest that the bill go to committee as soon as possible in order that it may be able to decide its own course.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I am completely in accord with what Senator Langlois has said. However, before I take a decision I should like to hear from the honourable Senator Molgat why we should send this to a committee. We have not heard anything about that yet.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I thank Senator Langlois very much for his proposal. Since it comes from a man in his position, both on the committee and here in the Senate, it would be an acceptable suggestion to me. I think the other members of the committee would see the reasonableness of the request. In those circumstances, I am prepared to accept his proposal, and would not suggest that we perhaps adjourn the Senate until next week; rather, we should adopt his proposal that the Senate adjourn subject to recall once the work of the committee is completed, on the understanding that he will move that the committee sit, if not next week, at some later date.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This can be discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, so far I have spoken only shortly on a motion for adjournment, and I want to discuss it again, as I believe is my right, because according to recent changes in our rules a senator may speak as many times on motions as is desired.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not want to object to Senator Sparrow speaking, but our rules have not changed. They were changed up until the end of June last. If Senator Sparrow speaks now he will be speaking on second reading. He made it clear when he spoke earlier that he was not speaking on second reading but on a particular proposal. He is now speaking on second reading, and under our rules he can speak only once on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order. I would ask Your Honour's ruling on the statement made by the Leader of the Government as to the termination of the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is a question of fact.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Rule 28 has been suspended for the balance of the present session. This extract can be found at page 286 in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, May 13, 1971. Therefore, since this rule has been suspended an honourable senator can speak more than once.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think that is the situation, but we will look into it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order. Your Honour has ruled. I would suggest that it is quite improper for the Leader of the Government to rise and question Your Honour's ruling, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He was not questioning it. He did not question it. You did not hear him.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My understanding is that Your Honour ruled that the rule prohibiting a senator from speaking twice on a motion has been suspended for the balance of the present session. Am I correct, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, do I understand I have the right to speak as many times as I wish?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Speak as often as you like.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Thank you, Your Honour.

Earlier today the Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Langlois) assured us again that there was no pressure on the Senate to pass this bill in any hurry. He said it could be discussed for as long as we desired in this chamber, and for as long as we desired in committee. I would beg to differ somewhat with that statement. Not being aware that the Senate may be sitting today, I received a telephone call in North Battleford, Saskatchewan, at seven o'clock Wednesday evening, and a telegram about an hour later, informing me that the Senate was meeting at eleven o'clock Friday morning. At this time of the year, with reservations as tight as they are, I had no idea whether I could get to this important session. Immediately after receiving the telegram I phoned for a reservation on an aircraft to get me here in time. I went on the waiting list, and fortunately—or unfortunately, as the case may be—I am here.

• (1500)

Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which it is hoped by many that this bill will be referred today, has but one member from western Canada here today. I refer to the Honourable Harry Hays, the sponsor of this bill.

Two other members of the committee, Senator Buckwold from Saskatoon and Senator Everett from Winnipeg, are not here. I do not know why they are not here, but I can understand their absence knowing the trouble I had in obtaining a reservation. So we have in that committee, which is going to consider and study this important legislation, the voting power of one senator from western Canada.

Hon. Mr. Argue: And only 8 out of 30 altogether.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I do not want to go into the defeat of my motion. I have been in this chamber for nearly four years and never have I been forced to speak to a bill which was so recently passed by the other house. I have never been expected to become knowledgeable enough to discuss such an important bill within a few hours.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: I think this chamber owes me and every other senator the right to speak on second reading in a knowledgeable manner, after having had an opportunity of studying the bill itself and the amendments. I am not in any position to discuss this bill clause by clause, and I do not think any senator would expect me to be capable or qualified to speak in this debate. This bill was passed by the other place at 6.30 this morning. I did not get up until 7, and I had to leave at 9 for our meeting here at 11.

We should have an opportunity to study the bill, and discuss it on second reading. If I have not that opportunity, how are the members of the committee to know the opinions I or others have on this bill so that they may vote intelligently in committee?

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was voted down today. That motion was intended to provide an opportunity to study the bill, to meet with our people and talk to those concerned about it. I feel we shall have no opportunity to do that, if this has to be considered by the committee this afternoon, and reported back for third reading today.

I have not had an opportunity of studying the bill and, therefore, I do not have the knowledge which would enable me to ask intelligent questions in the committee this afternoon. No matter how strong may be the powerhouse referred to by Senator Hays, who said that the officials will be there to answer questions, what good is that when I have not had time to develop the questions I may wish to ask of the minister and the officials?

Senator Goldenberg mentioned that in the amendment to the bill the word "plebiscites" occurs. I need time to talk to people, the provincial government and the initiatory people, about this. The amendment reads in part:

> (ii) any other natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied, as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise, that the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency under section 17 with powers relating to that product;

I do not have the figures, and I need the figures, as to how many producers we have in western Canada, how many producers in Ontario, and how many producers in the Maritimes. I am not so sure that I am prepared to ask any particular individual to answer those questions, or that I expect them to be answered today. There is need for time to get those figures.

Is there a majority of the producers of this country congregated in one province, or is there not? I do not know. If this is a "majority of the producers", it does not have to be a majority of the provinces that apply for it? At least, that is the way I understood what Senator Goldenberg said. The text says a "majority of the producers". If there are 1500 producers in western Canada and 1501 in Ontario, then the western provinces do not have a say. It may be that we have more producers, or that there is an equal number. I do not know the answer to that question and wish to have the answer, since without it it is impossible to argue intelligently.

All the producers in Canada would be anxious to have a marketing board which works for the benefit of all Canadians. We do not want one that may very well be a detriment to some provinces or some regions of the country. That is one of the reasons why we need those answers.

I do not think I can get those facts and figures in either the house or the committee between now and the time that rumour has scheduled royal assent, for which everyone is waiting, at 6 o'clock. The members are all ready to pile in, so I do not think I shall have the time in committee to obtain the information I need. As I mentioned, I need sufficient time—at least all of next week—to try to get the answers to these questions that are in my mind.

I do not want to speak out of turn, but I think it is correct to say that in our area of the country there is not a farm organization official who will be found in his office today. This is New Year's eve. I doubt if one of them will be found in any office on Monday. We may be lucky enough to find such people in their offices on Tuesday next. Even if this house meets on Tuesday next, we will not have sufficient time to obtain the information.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I ask the honourable senator a question? What is the item of the bill to which he is referring? I cannot follow him unless I have the reference.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: I am speaking about the insert that is made available with the bill. That may be more familiar to the honourable senator. I am referring to paragraph (ii) of subclause (c).

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Would you kindly read it, please?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: It is the third paragraph of the insert provided with the bill.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Your Honour, if I understood correctly the observation made by Senator Sparrow, one of his constituents had received information that we were to be called back at 11 o'clock on Friday morning. If my memory is correct, the telegram I received from Your Honour read in that way. I received a phone call first and then the telegram at 10 o'clock at night. Could you inform us, Your Honour, whether you received that same information last Wednesday?

• (1510)

The Hon. the Speaker: So far as the telegram to reassemble today is concerned, I am afraid I would have to ask the Government Leader to give you further information because I, personally, cannot. The rule is that when the Senate is recalled, a telegram under the name of the Speaker is sent to each senator informing him of the time of the sitting. In this particular case it was 11 o'clock today. That rule was complied with. I cannot say any more than that.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I understood that the question was directed to me pertaining to whether it was Saturday or Friday. Is that correct? My telegram read "Friday morning at 11 o'clock." If I happened to say that it was Saturday, then I was in error.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: But did I not understand you to say also that you had received a telephone call from one of your constituents informing you that the Senate would be meeting?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: No, I was the only constituent. I received the telephone call and the telegram both. The telegram read "Friday at 11 o'clock." What I was saying with respect to the telephone call is that I had an office phone call from Ottawa informing me that it was very likely the Senate would meet. I appreciated very much having that telephone call, because it was a little bit of advance notice. The telegram came shortly after that calling the Senate into session at 11 o'clock on Friday morning. My reason for raising this matter was that, owing to the fact that I was preparing to go away, it was only by chance that I was even able to be here.

I must say that I appreciate Senator Belisle's having put his question to me, because it had the effect of slowing me down, which is probably a good thing.

If I may just finish my remarks, I should like to state very simply that I am really not in a position to look at this bill and to discuss it intelligently today, either here or in committee, and I do hope that I will have the opportunity later to discuss the details on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I do not intend at this time to make my main remarks on the bill. However, I find myself so much in agreement with the remarks of Senator Sparrow that I feel I should say to him that I wish he would make that type of speech more often. If he did, he would very much enhance this honourable chamber.

I understand the problems this bill raises for both Senator Sparrow and Senator Molgat, and I will attempt to deal with those problems for a few moments later on. At this time I should like to follow the traditional pattern and congratulate the mover of the bill. When the tax bill was before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Hays, in reply to a question I had raised, said that he had sold a good many bulls during his lifetime. I replied that, yes, he had sold a lot of bull and had made a lot of profit on it. And he really did not disagree with that.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I ask to whom is the honourable gentleman referring?

[Hon. Mr. Belisle.]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: He did not disagree with that. In fact, he received it in the jocular vein in which it was given.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Would the honourable gentleman repeat what he said?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I suggest to Senator Fournier that he accept a bit of professional advice. He needs to develop his masseter muscle. Your masseter muscle is the one which allows you to bring your lower and upper jaws together or, in other words, keep your mouth shut. Have I made myself clear, sir?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Well, then, accept the advice or I will send you a bill for it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Are you a dentist?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Yes, I am. Moreover, the honourable Senator Hays knows me well enough that he would not expect me to throw him a bouquet without putting a bit of a brick in it.

To continue, I should like to say that, as Minister of Agriculture, Senator Hays was outstanding as is the present Minister of Agriculture outstanding. The only thing is, unfortunately, they are both outstanding failures. If you want to verify that, just go to the farmers of this country and realize their plight.

Another point I should like to make at this time is what I refer to as the in-rank crossing of the aisles here in what I call the "Martinization" of the Senate. Recently the Senate received a great deal of criticism, much of it justified, but most of it unjustified. That criticism was based on the assumption that the Senate had not studied the tax reform bill before it was passed. That was unfair criticism.

Hon Mr. Benidickson: It came from your side of the floor in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That unfair criticism also came from your side, senator. I can name Mr. Whelan and Mr. Hogarth and others. Do you want me to go on and name them?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: They did not know the facts.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Not any more than anyone else knew them, but they talked just the same. I should like to have on the Senate record at this time that the Senate was criticized in the other place for making an agreement with the Government. Yesterday I happened to be in the Senators' Gallery in the other place when the motion for a time limit was moved. At that time there was some reference to an understanding. I want our record today to bear out the fact that the Senate was honest, above board, and put its understanding on record. As against that, the understanding in the House of Commons was under the table. No one quite knew what it was. In fact, it is still open to interpretation.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, in my capacity as a senator I have the right to know what the honourable gentleman is talking about. We are discussing a bill and I think he should confine his remarks to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: As I was saying, our agreement was above board. The House of Commons agreement was under the table, and those who have criticized us should remember that. At least we can say to the public that we were honest and sincere, whereas the motives of the House of Commons are open to question.

I was impressed by the fact that Senator Langlois offered to move motions for Senator Molgat in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. But may I point out to him that I, too, have accepted that suggestion in the past. In fact, my honourable friend Senator Connolly, when he was Government Leader, was kind enough to move motions for me. But you have no idea of the frustration and the futility of having made a motion and having to sit there and not to be able to vote on that motion. You are not a member of the select group that is allowed to vote, so why bother going? Why go? I can fully understand the attitude of Senator Molgat and Senator Sparrow. If I were in their shoes I would absolutely refuse to attend that committee. It is a disgrace that anyone representing a large area, as they do, should have to ask someone to move a motion in their name and then not to be able to vote on it. It is not fair to the area of the country which they represent, or to any area of the country for that matter. Therefore, I suggest, regardless of the rules—and we have broken all of them in the last week or so—that every honourable senator who wishes should be allowed to attend and to vote, or at least that these honourable gentlemen who wish to make these representations on behalf of the areas which they represent be appointed to that committee in very short order.

• (1520)

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is a very good idea.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Let me repeat once again that it is useless to say, "You can attend the committee." I have attended them and I absolutely refuse now to attend a committee unless I am a member of that particular committee. It leaves one wondering why one bothered to go in the first place. In all honesty I must admit that even when one is a member of the committee, one sometimes wonders why one went.

The idea of an adjournment has been discussed. I am not referring now to a specific date, in an effort to stay within the rules, but the fact that one date was mentioned does not prohibit us from having another date set. It could be Monday, January 3. I, like Senator Sparrow and Senator Molgat, attempted to get in touch with the people from whom I normally seek farming advice and I was unable to do so this morning. In addition, I still have not been able to obtain a copy of yesterday's Hansard of the House of Commons. I think it is a disgrace that we are in this position. We are told that we cannot get copies of that Hansard before 5 o'clock this afternoon or perhaps later.

I know there is a great deal of incompetence in the running of both houses, but surely there is a more competent method of doing things. The Queen's Printer must have been just as aware of the situation at 7.30 last night as I was. I had spent the last two days preparing for this debate, but all of a sudden at 7.30 last night I found that we have a new bill. And it was only 20 minutes before coming into this chamber that we had an opportunity to study this new bill. Admittedly this house is part of Parliament, and Parliament is considered the high court of the land. But we are not justices who are going to hear an argument from counsel and having the opportunity to consider a verdict and render it at a later date. This morning on the CBC news it was stated that royal assent was planned for 5 o'clock this evening. Let me say to the Leader of the Government here that hell will freeze over before we have royal assent this evening.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No one in the Senate has even suggested that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. There is a disturbance in the gallery. I would ask the officer in charge of the gallery to see that the persons causing the disturbance are removed.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: It is the NDP in the press gallery.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Well, at any rate it is nice to know that even if it does contravene our rules, one has some support in the chamber.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): On a point of order, I feel very happy about the support for the honourable gentleman. If it were not for that, we would have nobody here.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I want to go on now to the point raised by Senator Sparrow and Senator Molgat that they would like to hear witnesses from the various agricultural organizations. Reference has been made to Mr. Roy Atkinson, President of the National Farmers Union, and his statement that the bill was completely emasculated.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I made intervention a moment ago in which I mentioned the NDP. I would be the last person to make a general observation or condemnation or any derogatory remark of a general nature with respect to that important political party. I should have been more clear when making my intervention. To my great astonishment and regret it is my suspicion and conviction that the unseemly interruption from the gallery was caused by visitors who are actually members of the other house. I am extremely surprised that they, knowing the rules, would do in this house what they would object to if it were done in contravention of the rules of their own house.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of privilege, I appreciate the fact that this incident may be regarded as a contravention of our rules, although I am not sure what rule it would contravene. However, I am rather taken aback by the adjective "unseemly" as used by the honourable senator who has just spoken. I did not feel at all that this or the earlier interruption of applause from the gallery was in any way unseemly. My own feeling is that at any time and from anywhere that the Senate can get applause, I personally will be all for it.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: If I had been in agreement with the speaker, I too would have applauded, but I have a right to do so. I would have done so in the normal fashion by pounding my desk. But we have rules which say that expressions of approval or disapproval may not be made by visitors in the gallery, and, as I say, I think it was all the more offensive as it came from members of the other place.

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What rule would the honourable senator cite?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I think the NDP or CCF, whichever you prefer, are becoming Tories. I do not mind, they are welcome.

The Hon. the Speaker: A point of order has been raised. I have instructed the officers in the galleries to see that this does not happen again. If it does, those responsible for it, whoever they are, are to be expelled. With regard to the authorities, it is very simple. I have the responsibility for order and decorum here and must act accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am very glad to have the opportunity to finish the few remarks I wish to make at this time. Later on in the day I will again be speaking. However, with reference to the applause, I find myself in complete agreement with the viewpoint expressed by Senator Grosart. I very much question whether we do have a rule. If the Senate receives applause from anywhere after the last couple of weeks, I think we should welcome it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow the honourable senator to go on with this. He stated that he had 15 years' experience as a parliamentarian. The first rule of Parliament is that order and decorum should be maintained. That order and decorum must be kept on the floor and in the gallery. It is my duty to intervene immediately when such an occurrence takes place, and this I have done.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I did not wish to reflect on Your Honour's decision, but merely made a remark by means of which I hoped to recall the point at which I had arrived in my speech. After so many interruptions it is pretty damned difficult to remember where I was. If I recall correctly, we were coming to the point of calling witnesses. Last evening I watched the CBC news broadcast and at 8 o'clock this morning listened to the CBC news. I head Mr. Roy Atkinson, President of the National Farmers Union, state that the amendments have completely emasculated the bill. Perhaps I cannot agree 100 per cent with that, but as a former farm boy I would like to point out that emasculation is in effect a form of supply and management, which seems to be the main tenor of this bill.

In addition to experiencing the difficulty mentioned by the honourable Senator Sparrow in obtaining copies of the amendments this morning, I asked for the assistance of our law counsel. I am sure you will all be glad to know that our regular counsel is on holiday, in a much happier atmosphere than this. The individual supplied by the Department of Justice was most co-operative, but still rather confused concerning the draftsmanship of the bill. I will make the point that the bill must have been drafted by persons under the Opportunities for Youth program. I do not believe anyone else would present that type of draftsmanship.

After the last occasion I attempted to deliver a major address in this chamber, a member of the press gallery asked me not to be quite so long the next time because he found it rather boring having to read a speech of that length. Many senators have been asked from within the chamber not to be too lengthy. I have the distinction of having been asked by a member of the press gallery not to be too lengthy. Therefore I will yield the floor to anyone who wishes to rise, with the understanding that I will speak again later in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon I gave Senator Molgat the assurance that in view of the fact that he is not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I would move his motion for the adjournment of that committee to a time later in the New Year in order to further study this bill. I am prepared to go even further and give him the undertaking now that as soon as we have disposed of this debate and before the bill is referred to committee, if that is the wish of the house, I will move that the names of Senators Molgat, Argue and Hastings be added to the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The honourable Senator Molgat would then be in a position to move his own motion. I will not back away, however, from my understanding. I will go further and support his motion.

Hon Mr. Molgat: I thank the honourable Senator Langlois very much, not alone for keeping to his original proposal but even improving on it.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On a point of order, I believe the motion requires unanimous consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: No, that is not so. Is it the understanding that if the honourable Senator Hays speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No Your Honour. I believe other honourable senators wish to speak.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: I must have missed the Deputy Leader's comments. Was it his suggestion to change the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, in order to add western senators.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: When to you propose to do that?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This afternoon. As soon as we have closed this debate I will revert to motions and move that these changes be made.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to yield the floor to the honourable Senator Hays, providing it does not close the debate. In view of the number of questions which have been directed to him, he may wish to speak at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the intention of the honourable Senator Hays to close the debate?

Hon. Mr. Hays: Yes, that is my intention.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps the most remarkable aspect of the debate on second reading is that we have so far hardly discussed the principle of the bill. I for one would hope that this bill will not go to committee until we have had an opportunity for a full discussion. No one at this moment is in a position to discuss properly the principle of the bill. I have raised certain matters of ambiguity in the amendments, which have come to us at the last moment. We are in posession of no record of the proceedings of the other place. We are completely in the dark as to how the amendments will affect the principle of the bill. I suggest, therefore, that the Senate, in due course, should adjourn and, when we have had an opportunity of digesting the changes in the bill, debate the principle more fully before sending the bill to committee.

• (1540)

We have not discussed the principle of government intervention in a normal marketing operation which, in many ways, is the core of the bill. Is it wise, in view of the problems faced by Canadian agriculture, to encourage at this stage further government intervention?

There has been a long history of government intervention in normal marketing processes. Sometimes the intervention has been successful, but often it has been unsuccessful. We heard some examples of this today when Senator Argue spoke on the operation of the Wheat Board and the Dairy Commission, where there is clear evidence of a reduction in the total number of producers brought about by Government intervention of the type suggested by this bill.

This is a very serious problem. We have no evidence before us of the effect of the bill over the long term on marginal producers. We have not been told whether it will increase or decrease the number of producers in the farming community.

The evidence is that the tendency will be to reduce the number of producers. Is that a good or a bad thing? There are those who say that it is a good thing, but there are others who say that it will introduce inequities, and will mean injustice to the small farmer, the small producer, who has every right to carry on his business as he sees fit without being forced to accept quotas and marketing schemes, or to relinquish what has always been a great quality in the farmer's character, his independence.

The point can be argued both ways. Independence can cost money. It can be expensive. The history of farming in this and other countries demonstrates that farmers by and large have been prepared to pay the cost of independence. I will not at this moment argue the pros and cons of this situation. I merely point out that we should have the opportunity of obtaining information on this important aspect of the bill, which we do not have at the moment.

I would welcome particularly any information concerning a decrease in the number of producers of wheat and dairy products which might be brought about by the bill when it becomes effective.

At the moment we have not the faintest idea of how effective the provisions of the bill will be. I have questioned this strange amendment which, after listening to all the explanations, remains unclear to me. I do not know whether the provisions of the bill exclude all farm products other than poultry and eggs in any situation where there is not a declaration by the provincial government. I do not know what is the scope of the bill.

It was said, "Well, we will hear the minister." I do not care what the minister has to say. No one has yet told us what the amendment means, and with all due respect to the sponsor I do not think he is entirely sure himself. I have no wish to be critical in that respect. I do not think it is possible for anyone reading the amendment to be sure about its meaning. I do not know how many lawyers or experts from the Department of Justice would have to appear before us before we know what the bill means in respect of the vast majority of natural farm products, as they are termed in the bill.

We do not know whether the bill, to the extent that it invokes the setting up of a federal marketing board, applies only to eggs and poultry, or whether, without provincial declaration, it can be applied across the board.

There has been no discussion on the bill's effect on competition. When discussing other acts we hear over and over again official pronouncements by cabinet ministers that it is a policy of this Government to encourage competition. There is reference in the bill to competition, but it is not the kind of competition that will result in benefit to the consumer. The competition referred to in the bill is the competitiveness of one industry in various markets. We have clear evidence of opposition from powerful consumer associations.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: To this bill?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, to this bill. There have been presentations by consumer associations objecting, among other things, to the fact that there is no provision for a consumers' representative on the council. The proposed council of not less than three and not more than nine members makes no provision whatsoever for consumer representation.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: It should.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I agree with Senator Benidickson when he says that it should.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We might change that in committee.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: We might, but I am speaking on the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend permit me a question? Bearing in mind the important principle he laid down when speaking this morning on our responsibility as spokesmen for the provinces—he said that although we might not necessarily agree with the views of the provinces, we had a constitutional obligation to represent provincial points of view—does the honourable senator not attach any importance at all to the position taken by the Ontario Minister of Agriculture, and indeed the Minister of Agriculture of every province, with the exception of the caveat entered by the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I attach the greatest importance to the general agreement of the provinces on the bill as it was, but I have no evidence that any province has approved the bill as amended.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Do you not think it a good idea that we should go into committee and ascertain what the effects will be in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am not concerned at this moment with what the committee should do. I am concerned with the principle of the bill. Whether the committee discusses the principle in detail, or discusses the bill clause by clause, is not my concern at the moment. I am speaking now to the principle of the bill, and I suggest to the Leader of the Government that it is not a viable intervention to say "we can discuss that in committee". Of course we can discuss it in committee, but that does not for one moment absolve me of my responsibility here to discuss the principle of the bill as I see it. I hope the Leader of the Government will not again suggest that this or that can be discussed in committee.

• (1550)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would you not agree that the principle of the bill is a simple one? The principle of this bill is whether or not there should be national marketing as envisaged by the bill. The incidences of the bill are something else altogether about which my friend and members of the committee may disagree, but the principle is whether or not there should be enabling legislation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is quite a simple principle, but I am amazed to hear the Leader of the Government say that in discussing the principle of the bill I should not discuss the incidences of it. What is the sense in discussing the principle of a bill if you do not discuss the incidences? Surely the Leader of the Government is not suggesting that I am prohibited from discussing what the principle of the bill will do to Canadians?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course not.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course not. So let us not hear anything more about the difference between the principle of the bill and its incidence. The incidence of the bill is part of the principle.

Hon. Mr. Hays: I rise on a question of privilege. Are you aware of any bill, in your experience in this house or in your political career, that has received the 100 per cent endorsement of all of the provinces as has this bill? I do not recall any other such endorsation of any bill, and I am wondering if you know of any bill that received the blessing of all of the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I cannot recall any at the moment, but I am sure there were some. My answer is the same as I gave earlier, and that is that the endorsation by all of the provinces was of another bill, and possibly a totally different bill. There is no evidence that the provinces have approved these fundamental amendments which go to the core of the bill.

Another principle, of course, that arises from any consideration of this bill is that sometimes discussed under the vulgarism of balkanization. I would have been interested to hear some indication that the criticisms regarding balkanization have no foundation.

An Hon. Senator: You are using big words.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In looking at the bill my conclusion is that it is going to balkanize Canada even further. In the first part of this bill we have Canada divided into three regions. It seems to me that it would make more sense to have divided it into the traditional four regions, but that is not a question of principle. However, when we come to clause 24 it seems someone has forgotten that the operative word throughout is "region", and is now using the word "area". This further indicates the utter confusion that has arisen in connection with the amending of this bill. The word "area" has no significance whatsoever in terms of the bill itself. The word "region" is used in various ways throughout the bill, but it is not adequately defined, so that when you read the bill you never know whether you are talking about one of the three regions described in the first part or some kind of ad hoc region which the minister may, from time to time, in his wisdom decide is to be a region or, if the bill is passed in its present form, some area.

I do not know what is proposed in this bill. I do not know, having in mind the amendment which we have been discussing, whether the intention is to give every province the right to set up what are in effect agricultural tariffs under marketing boards.

Hon. Mr. Hays: On a point of order. I am led to believe that all of the provinces endorsed this bill on the basis that the amendments that have been made would be made.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I will have to accept the word of the sponsor of the bill for that. I know that miracles can be achieved by this Government, and I compliment them on what is probably the most astounding miracle of all of having an amendment that was drafted all through the night, the wording and import of which was never really certain until quite late, approved by the provinces. I congratulate the sponsor of the bill on the information he has received, and on that miracle that occurred at some time between—

Hon. Mr. Hays: Thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is an astounding miracle. It does not, however, remove my basic objection. I should like to have some indication of the approval by the provinces in a more concrete form than the statement just made, but which, of course, I accept in deference to my respect for the sponsor of this bill. I should like to have evidence or some indication that the provinces have approved this bill as they did the original bill—that is, formally stated and documented.

This bill has been called "enabling legislation". What it does, in effect, is enable the federal Government to establish a board which will have the right, to use the terminology of the bill starting at Part II, to set up agencies. Here, of course, we have the old problem of delegation of authority. It has been said by those who are experts on the problem of delegation of authority that the problem always starts with enabling legislation. Throughout this bill I find evidence of delegation of authority to non-elective bodies. This concerns me. It concerns me that this aspect of the bill has not been discussed thus far in our debate on the principle of the bill.

At this point perhaps I should pause to congratulate the sponsor of the bill. I forgot the usual compliments when I rose to speak. I pay them now, not because they are usual, but because they are well deserved. He gave an excellent presentation of the bill.

I do not think he said so, but my recollection is that Senator Hays, as Minister of Agriculture, introduced a bill similar to this back in 1964. I am sure at that time he was, as he has indicated today, in full agreement with the necessity for this type of legislation. However, I rather doubt if this bill is exactly the type of bill that he had in mind back in 1964.

On the question of enabling legislation I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators clause 23 of the bill. This is the operative clause under Part II which deals with agencies. The maginal note is "Powers" and one of the powers that is given to an agency that might be set up under this act is as follows:

• (1600)

> (f) where it is empowered to implement a marketing plan, make such orders and regulations as it considers necessary in connection therewith, but all such orders and regulations shall, in the case of orders and regulations that are of a class to which paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 7 is made applicable, be submitted to the Council before the making thereof—

I object very strongly to any agency being given the power to make such regulations as it considers necessary. Surely the wording should be "as are necessary", because that means that the agency can never exceed its powers. If it considers them necessary under the bill, they are necessary. There is a much better wording in paragraph (n), which says:

> do all such other things as are necessary or incidental to the exercise of any of its powers or the carrying out of any of its functions under this Act.

Honourable senators,I think the time has come when the Senate, in examining legislation, should refuse to pass any legislation that gives any delegated body the authority to take any action that it considers necessary. The phraseology should always be "that is necessary" or "that are necessary", so that the matter can be subject to interpretation by the courts. I hope that is an amendment that will be made to this bill in committee.

No reference has been made to the costs of this marketing scheme. There is a limitation on the total amount, which at the moment, I think, is $1 million, that the federal Government is authorized to expend on what I will call the federal board. There is no limitation whatever on the expenditure of the agencies, and there has been evidence of extraordinarily high administrative costs incurred by some of these agencies in their total operations. That has no limitation whatsoever. In fact, under the wording of the bill these agencies can collect money and spend it, they can impose any fees they like, and one fears that this means more bureaucracy. I am sure that the sponsor of the bill, who has had great experience in this area, is aware of that danger. I see nothing in the wording of the bill as it stands to give any protection against that.

There is no requirement for cost benefit accounting. There is a general requirement. There is no right of members to question the accounts. It may be said that these will come in the regulations, but to me it is an essential principle that the basic protection for people affected by any act of Parliament should be written into the act, and not left to the mercy of those who in due course will make regulations which, incidentally, will never come back to this Parliament under the legislation as it stands.

That is one of the reasons why I have always opposed a wide grant of powers to boards, bureaus, and agencies, even crown corporations, to make regulations. We hope the time will come, as it may well come, when statutory orders and regulations will be subject to parliamentary review, if not control. There is no assurance whatsoever under this bill that the regulations, however harsh they may be, however inequitable, however much they may be objected to, will ever come back to Parliament for review.

Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the discussion any more. I have a note indicating a very good reason why I should perhaps continue a little longer, but I have come to the end of my major remarks. I know that Senator Phillips has a few comments to make, which may accommodate the request I have in the note.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak again on this bill, but I believe it is only fair for me to say that, as I said this morning, this bill should not at this late hour go to a committee this afternoon. I do not apologize if we have indisposed the minister, who is in the gallery. We have been indisposed before waiting for the other place.

I say to the Leader of the Government that before he makes the final decision that this bill must be processed this afternoon he should first bear in mind that the motion made this morning was not made by a member on this side of the Senate, but was made by the Chairman of the Council of Prairie Senators, and was seconded by honourable Senator Molgat, a farming expert. Last week the Leader of the Government praised honourable Senator Argue for his farming knowledge. If that expression meant that he is knowledgeable—and I am convinced that he is—I suggest that this bill be not reported today, that we should come back next week or whenever is the will of the Government. We are here to accommodate the Government, and we will wait here until they have finally disposed of the small and loyal opposition that supported us this morning. After all, the vote was 20 to 10, so that must be considered. There was much more opposition this morning than there was last week. I move that the bill be not reported, if Your Honour will accept a motion at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that a motion has been made by the honourable Senator Belisle?

Hon. Mr. Belisle: I am willing to make a motion if you are willing to entertain it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the motion?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is no motion before the house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Question.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): There is no motion, nothing.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, before beginning my remarks may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Several times this afternoon he has suggested that it would be advantageous to have the bill before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where we could ask questions and get further information. This I accept, but may I ask him not to be his usual evasive self in replying to me now. Will the honourable leader give the Senate an assurance that the committee will have time to call witnesses and representatives of various organizations who may wish to appear? I expect he will get up and say "I am in the hands of the committee". I have seen him in operation too often here to accept that reply. I would like an assurance from him that the committee will be allowed to call representatives of organizations who may wish to appear—not call but extend an invitation, and they could accept or reject it.

• (1610)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, would you permit me a moment. I wish to ask the constable in the gallery to remove the person who applauded, whoever it may be.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Remove him. He has not been removed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I ask the sergeant in charge of the gallery behind the Chair to expel the person or persons who have just applauded, whoever they may be. Is there an officer in charge there?

Hon. Mr. Argue: More than one constable is needed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I ask the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to look in the gallery behind the Chair, please, and see that the officer there follows the instructions given.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I can only say to Senator Phillips that, as he knows, the committee will have to decide. I imagine that is what it will decide.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before honourable Senator Hays speaks, I must ask if it is his intention to close the debate?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before beginning my general remarks on the bill, may I say that at noon Senator Grosart and I had a discussion as to who would speak first. I am sorry I suggested that he should speak first, because most of my speech has been covered. Unfortunately, I left my notes in his office and I am afraid I gave him an unintended assist there.

If I recall properly, Senator Grosart began his remarks by saying that our discussion today really had not centered on the need for the bill. In this I think there is one point that the Senate has completely overlooked; that is, why do we need a bill of this type? I would refer honourable senators to a report submitted to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in July 1970. Incidentally this report was financed by the department and it outlined very extensively the situation of the family farm in rural communities, the difficulties that arise if people leave the family farm, the family farming community.

They state in here—I paraphrase it rather than read the full statement—that the question is not whether people leave the family farm, the rural community, and migrate to the city, but the question is how rapid the transfer should be and what the effects are on the social and human aspects of that transfer. The report also reminds the Government of the well known fact that the residents of rural communities receive lower incomes than those in other sections of the country. For example, a person living in a small village in one of the Atlantic Provinces receives an income of approximately 25 per cent less than his counterpart living in a city.

Another section of the report refers to the so-called cost-price squeeze and says that it is made worse by inflation. Very often, in either chamber, I have spoken on this fact, but I would like for a moment to illustrate the cost-price squeeze by referring to the potato producers in my province. During the last five years they have received an average of one cent per pound. During this time their costs have increased considerably. The cost of a potato combine has risen from $8,000 to between $13,000 and $15,000. The cost of chemical sprays and pesticides has increased by about 40 per cent. They have had two successive increases of 6 per cent each in transportation costs, and labour costs have increased by about 30 per cent; yet the average price remained approximately one cent per pound. During this time the farmer attempted to meet the increasing costs by expanding, using an expensive machine such as a potato combine, over a larger acreage, to get a greater yield to justify his investment.

Other farmers have ceased production. There have also been greater efforts to increase orderly marketing or, as the term now favoured says, "supply management". Supply management has failed for a very important reason, and this relates directly to the bill.

American potatoes enter Canada duty free the year round. Canada in turn can export to the United States a limited amount of potatoes, and thereafter there is a 75 cent per hundredweight tariff. I mentioned the fact that there is no import quota in the bill. This is a very great deficiency. When potato prices rise in Canada, the American surplus moves in. One cannot sell Canadian potatoes at 2 cents a pound when one can import American potatoes at 1 cent a pound.

Therefore, in attempting to rectify the agricultural problem, one must take into consideration our imports plus our foreign currency situation. If the American dollar is higher than our dollar, our primary producer has an advantage in their market. When the situation is reversed, the Americans have the advantage.

I mention these things to emphasize that Bill C-176 is based on unsound principles and it has very limited chances of being successful. In fact, I would describe it as being merely political marijuana in the hope that the farmer will believe that he has something to look forward to during the next election campaign.

• (1620)

Senator Grosart referred to the various recommendations and asked who would make those recommendations. I suspect that they will come from the so-called farm economist within the bureaucracy of the Department of Agriculture. I do not think there is such a thing as a "farm economist", other than one who tries to make a living on a farm. The farm economist's advice to various governments in the past has been as helpful as thalidomide is to a pregnant woman.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, on a point of order, Senator Phillips alleged that potatoes came in from the United States almost duty free. United States potatoes do not enter Canada duty free at any place in Canada or at any time.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I thank the honourable senator for the correction. My information came from the Department of Agriculture yesterday, but perhaps I was misinformed. I appreciate very much his correction.

Throughout the bill the Government conveys the idea that agricultural surpluses are caused because there are too many farmers producing too much. This Government position is really not surprising in view of the attitude this Government took with respect to unemployment. Its excuse for unemployment was very simple: there were too many people looking for jobs. That was why there was unemployment.

Many of us have criticized the number of members in the cabinet. There has been no restriction in that regard. The cabinet keeps on growing and growing. These political creatures seem to have a tendency to roll along and keep on growing.

Recently, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance presented a report in which it most emphatically rejected wage and price control. It stated quite wisely that the Canadian people would not accept that. The people were not in a mood to accept it. They were not ready to accept wage and price controls. Nevertheless, in this bill, we are asked to give consent to the establishment of boards and agencies which may introduce such regulations as they deem advisable, which could include quotas, limitations on the amount of produce the farmer can market, and any other regulation they wish. This is, in effect, applying wage control to one specific class of persons—the farmer. No one but the farmer is under any wage control.

Incidentally, I intend to skip certain portions of my speech until we get into committee. I would not want the committee to meet thinking that it could report back in 15 minutes. Therefore, I leave some of my questions for the committee meeting.

Senator Grosart has already referred to the marketing council which consists of not fewer than three and not more than nine members, at least 50 per cent of whom must be primary producers. That amendment was made in the committee in the other place and I am in complete agreement with it. However, the committee in the other place suggested that the commission be not appointed at the pleasure of the Governor in Council. I find myself asking two questions in this regard: first, are the primary producers to be political appointees? Senator Argue stated this morning that he saw nothing wrong with a person being political. I do not either. But I would remind Senator Argue of his later statement that he did not expect the nine members to come from one specific party. I suspect if Senator Argue were to add up the appointments of the Governor in Council he would not find too many people appointed to any office unless they were well known Liberals. Second, if a member of the marketing council disagrees with the Minister of Agriculture, or indeed disagrees with the Prime Minister or any other member of the cabinet, can that member be removed to be replaced with a more docile and submissive member? Moreover, I do not think you will find any member there for 30 years, because I do not think any individual could go through 30 years without disagreeing with this Government, and if he does disagree I expect he will be removed.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Do you expect this Government to be here for 30 years?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: No. If you have another 30 weeks, you are lucky, Senator Benidickson. Not only would you be lucky, I think the Canadian people would be lucky, sir.

The definition of marketing causes me some concern. I will leave my questioning in that regard to the committee. I shall also set over for the committee my question with respect to the section dealing with records and books, except that I want to point out to this honourable chamber that it has been a long-standing tradition that no individual be required to reveal his income other than to the Department of National Revenue for income tax purposes. But Clause 7(1)(h) gives the committee or agency authority to direct questions. Nor is there any limitation on the type of questions they can ask. Of course, we get the story that this applies only to producers of chickens and eggs. But take the case of someone running a poultry farm; with about seven questions the agency, without any oath of secrecy, can obtain the full facts and figures of that individual's operation and that individual is in no way protected. When we come to committee, therefore, it is my intention to move an amendment in that regard.

I will also ask in committee for a definition of "enabling legislation" and "permissive legislation". Since we are going to have the pleasure of directing such questions to the minister, I do not wish to reveal all my questions in advance. And I should point out that I have a great many questions to ask. However, I join with Senator Grosart in asking this question: What happens to the consumer under this bill? There is no mention of "consumer" throughout the bill, and unless a great many things change in our present marketing scheme there is only one effect to follow from increased farm prices—and God knows the farmer needs increased prices—and that is an ultimate increase in the cost of groceries to the consumer. I hope that when Senator Hays sums up he will include that point in his discussion.

As I have said, honourable senators, there are many more questions and points that I could raise but I want to make sure that the committee meeting lasts more than 15 minutes. I would not want to begin the new year or end the old year co-operating with the Government in any respect. Therefore, I shall leave any further questions at this stage, and ask them when we are in committee.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I think we have had a very useful discussion on this whole measure today, and I think we have made some real progress in the discussion back and forth, in that we have had some important assurances that the bill will go to committee, and that the committee, by general agreement amongst the senators here, will be prepared to call witnesses from farm organizations and hear them. I believe that the committee in its own judgment will consider the possibility of suggesting amendments. I think from the standpoint of those of us who wish to have this bill considered thoroughly by the Senate, from the standpoint of those who would like to hear from farm organizations, and from the standpoint of those who would like to hear the expert legal witnesses, the law officers of the Crown, give their opinions on some of the legal points in the bill, that much has been accomplished by this discussion.

His Honour the Speaker, a few minutes ago, had to take some rather drastic action to clear the Senate gallery because of an unnecessary interruption. The noise came from a man who happens to be Mr. Frank Howard, the M.P. for Skeena. I think that interruption from the gallery today was a disgraceful exhibition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I should think it was done to achieve publicity, and rather cheap publicity at that. It was done because the other place is adjourned at this time, and not being able to get this publicity there the Senate gallery was used for this purpose. I think in the circumstances His Honour was justified in the action he took.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It is now 4.30 and, as I say, we have had a really good debate. I do not think anybody will be inconvenienced if at this time this bill is sent to committee. I think after the committee meets it will be meeting again on further occasions to hear witnesses and to discuss the bill. In so doing we will be doing a good job on behalf of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I believe that my honourable friend was referring to a remark which I made when he referred to assurances that were given today. I do not wish to put words in my friend's mouth, but I want to make it quite clear that no assurance was given that the committee would be instructed to call witnesses. What was said was that the committee would be free to call witnesses if it wished to do so.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I take it from the remarks that were made that there was agreement on this.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Hays speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hays: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on this very important bill I congratulate all members of the chamber who have taken part. I know that their contributions will prove most helpful so far as the committee is concerned when it comes to dealing with the bill and questioning the Minister and the officials.

I am not going to take very long in speaking at this stage, but the history of marketing boards for the most part has been very successful. A few that come to my mind are the Canadian Wheat Board, the Ontario Tobacco Board, the Poultry Board, the Canadian Dairy Commission, the Hog Marketing Board, the Sugar Beets Board, and there are many others. I think in all there are some 122 agencies involved in marketing. To my recollection not one of these groups has ever withdrawn from their marketing legislation.

Marketing legislation for farmers, in my view, is particularly important in Canada where we have only about 120 frost-free days. I think in practically all of the countries I have visited, and that is a great number, there is some form of marketing legislation. The legislation we are studying today is similar in many respects to some of the legislation that has been successful in Europe, in South American countries, in Australia, New Zealand and some of the countries of Africa which have marketing legislation.

Honourable senators will realize that there are 350,000 farmers in Canada, and it is difficult for each farmer to have his own little business and to sell his own produce. There has to be a togetherness, and they have to get together to market their produce in the best possible way.

Senator Phillips mentioned consumers, and stated that there is no reference to them in the bill. However, I refer him to page 15 of the bill where it says:

> (b) to have due regard to the interests of producers and consumers of the regulated product or products.

Honourable senators, if you have a proper marketing legislation you have a continuity of supply, and you eliminate the problems of highs and lows. Even the consumer is better able to budget for grocery purchases. I have known instances of where in one year cattle prices have varied from 18 cents a pound on the hoof to 37 cents. Then when the price reached 37 cents the consumption dropped, but when prices dropped, consumption rose again. But we must keep in mind that once a consumer discontinues buying a certain product because of the price, it takes quite a long time to get him to resume the purchase of that product. Furthermore, if the consumer changes from beef to chicken, it will take a long time for him to reverse and change from chicken to beef.

I have been a farmer all my life, and I have had a fair amount of luck and some success but, believe me, I am all for marketing boards. I have not had any difficulty in the market place and I have been able to get along, but I have known neighbours and others, particularly in the Maritimes, who have met many problems, and for whom a marketing board would have been an excellent agency through which to market their produce. If a potato grower in Prince Edward Island with 30 acres under cultivation knows he is going to have as a quota so many tons of potatoes at a certain price, it would be a lot better for him to know this in advance.

Honourable senators, I humbly submit to you that this is a good bill, and I suggest that it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I know that the officials of the department will be in attendance. This is a bill which I feel is good for the Canadian farmers.

• (1640)

Before I resume my seat, I would remind honourable senators that all provinces have agreed to, and asked for, this legislation. Those who have done this are all elected representatives. The bill passed the other house, which also consists of elected members. We are appointed. How are we to judge? We should pass this bill on to the Canadian people who, surely, will judge whether it is right or wrong.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion on Hon. Mr. Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h):

That the names of the honourable Senators Argue, Hastings and Molgat be substituted for those of the honourable Senators Burchill, Gelinas and Giguère on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF MEETING

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, if I am permitted, I would now like to announce that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will sit in Room 356-S when the Senate rises. I understand that notices are in preparation for distribution to honourable senators.

I now move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On a point of order. We proceeded with Notices of Motions and are left with Inquiries, Motions, and Question Period.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If you have a question, please proceed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO PAKISTAN—QUESTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a question which I would like to direct to the honourable Leader of the Government. Supplementary Estimates (A), recently passed by this house and studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, contains an item of approximately $20 million for relief in Pakistan. By whom and how are those funds administered, and was any effort made to include surplus potatoes and chicken as part of the grant in aid?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will take that as notice. Perhaps when we return at 8 o'clock tonight I shall be in a position to reply.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am not sure what is proposed for the business this evening. I may have missed something when it was announced. I am not clear as to why we should return at 8 o'clock this evening. This is no doubt due to my own deficiency of some kind or other.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I ask my honourable friend to be patient. I was waiting for the question to be put before giving the explanation. The motion is not before the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the honourable Senator Bourget, that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The motion speaks for itself. Depending on the decision of the committee, we will return at approximately 8 o'clock. It may be later, or earlier; I do not know. In the event it is the recommendation of the committee that the bill receive further study we shall have to decide what the Senate will do in respect to adjourning to a later date. I cannot prejudge the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have to wait until I know more before I make a normal motion of adjournment, and that may be at 6 or 7 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It may be at 5 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The sitting was resumed at 6.40 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until February 16, 1972, at 8 o'clock in the evening. This is, of course, subject to being recalled earlier if necessary.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Which it will be.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Belisle: May I be permitted to ask a question of the Leader of the Government? Having just returned from a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I hope the committee will meet, as decided, next Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Martin: At 11 o'clock. There is no doubt it is clear that the committee has decided to meet next Thursday morning at 11 o'clock. The members of the committee were present when they raised the problem that faces those of us who are responsible for the management of the house. Subject to whatever disposition is made of the bill by the committee, the Senate as a whole has to come back. I do not see how that will be possible before the following week. I may be wrong, but that is the way I see it now.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I would add to what the Leader of the Government has said, that the committee already has power to sit when the Senate is not sitting. This was done on September 16, as reported at page 380 of the Minutes of Proceedings. Therefore, the Senate itself need not reassemble for the committee sitting.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, those who are absent do not know about the resolution that has just been passed. May I therefore suggest to His Honour the Speaker, or to the Leader of the Government, that we let every senator know when we are to reconvene.

The Hon. the Speaker: Your suggestion is well taken.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, in the committee, in a moment of anger I said I would never again take the word of the Leader of the Government. After the vote and the result of the committee meeting, may I express my regrets in that regard and modify my statement to say I will trust him so far in the future. On behalf of the Opposition, I wish him and all his colleagues a Happy New Year.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Phillips very much. I know that whatever he says about me is always said in the thrust of battle and does not represent his true convictions. This pertains to all of us. I have been in this business long enough to know that one gets bouquets that are often not deserved, one gets criticism often not deserved, one gets bouquets that are deserved, and one gets criticism that is deserved. If that applies to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I assure you, with all the magnanimity at my disposal, it applies to each one of you as well.

I simply wish to say to Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) that I am now indicating to those senators present that all the members of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be here on Thursday next, and they will deal with their business and they will determine how long that business will take. When that is done, it will be the responsibility of His Honour the Speaker to send messages to all senators, wherever they are, to join those who are here, so that we can join with those in the other place and have royal assent to this bill. It will require the presence of both houses. But that will be done. I know that Senator Sarto Fournier, who is so useful, and happily contributed to our proceedings today, will be among the first to be here.

I would like to say to the acting Leader of the Opposition, or to the two acting Leaders of the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is much more appropriate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —that we on this side extend to them our warmest good wishes for 1972. I also extend to each and every senator, wherever he sits in this house, my wish for a very happy and useful New Year.

I am sure that the Senate has every reason to be proud of its work in 1971. Notwithstanding what criticism comes to us as part of Parliament—because criticism against the Senate is criticism levelled against Parliament—we will continue to do our job as we see it requires to be done.

[Translation]

To all of you, our best wishes for 1972 and, once again, to y ou, Mr. Speaker, our thanks and best wishes.

[English]

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, February 16, 1972, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 11, 1972

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Honourable Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of Agriculture Act, chapter A-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 95(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, chapter U-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a document entitled "Bilingualism and the National Capital".

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, December 22, 1971, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter R-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Report by the Textile and Clothing Board, dated November 18, 1971, relative to an inquiry respecting sweaters, cardigans and pullovers requested by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 9 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-176, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Now.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Later this day.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Why not now?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Can we not go through the Question Period first?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am in your hands; you are master of your rules.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: With all due respect, I have directed a question to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, and the question is pertinent to this bill. I would like to have an answer to my question before I begin my remarks on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are referring now to the question regarding Pakistan?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: You will have an appropriate opportunity later because Inquiries and the Question Period follow Reports of Committees. The honourable senator will have all the time he needs to ask any questions after we have dealt with Reports of Committees.

Hon. Mr. Haig: What Senator Phillips is asking for is an answer to a question he asked of the Leader of the Government. Then third reading could be proceeded with. I would request that third reading be postponed until after the Question Period.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is all I am requesting.

The Hon. the Speaker: This is not the normal procedure, but you are masters of your own rules. Is there unanimous consent to proceed as requested by Senator Phillips?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I have no objection to answering Senator Phillips' question now if it will have a bearing on his speech. If it is the wish of the house, I have no objection to giving my answer now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO PAKISTAN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: On December 31 I took notice of the following question put by Senator Phillips:

> I have a question which I would like to direct to the honourable Leader of the Government. Supplementary Estimates (A), recently passed by this house and studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, contains an item of approximately $20 million for relief in Pakistan. By whom and how are those funds administered, and was any effort made to include surplus potatoes and chicken as part of the grant in aid?"

The answer is as follows:

> The supplementary Estimates to which the honourable senator refers will enable the Government to help in meeting the needs of refugees in India and to facilitate their repatriation to East Bengal. Canadian assistance for the relief of refugees from East Bengal in India has been administered through a number of different channels. The funds are provided by Parliament through the Canadian International Development Agency, which has responsibility for the allocation and disbursement of emergency relief assistance.
> The Canadian Government has provided approximately $22 million for relief of the refugees in India. Of this total some $5.26 million has been disbursed through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees acting as the focal point for co-ordination of U.N. related relief activities. This money has financed the procurement and distribution of shelter material, relief supplies and food by UNICEF, WHO and the World Food Program in accordance with priority needs of the refugees as determined by relief personnel on the sub-continent.

Canada has provided rapeseed and wheat as foodstuffs for the refugees. Consideration has been given to the provision of other foodstuffs in consultation with the officials concerned with determining priority needs. They have indicated that there is no need for other commodities which Canada would be in a position to provide at the present time.

An additional $3.575 million in disbursements has been arranged through Canadian voluntary agencies operating relief programs in the area. These organizations include the Combined Appeal for Pakistani Relief, a number of church-affiliated groups, CARE and the Canadian Save the Children Fund.

Disbursement of an additional $600,000 through the Canadian Red Cross is financing the provision of urgently required medical facilities in co-operation with the League of Red Cross Societies.

The channels of disbursement of additional funds from the approximately $22 million Canada has agreed to provide will be selected in the light of the priorities as they emerge over the next several weeks. Announcements will be made by the Government in due course.

In addition to the $22 million in relief for refugees in India, Canada has also made available $7 million in the form of wheat for the population of East Bengal. Some of this wheat remains in storage in Singapore but will be shipped as soon as port facilities permit.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, with your indulgence may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? Am I correct that he said there was no need for other commodities in the Pakistani relief program?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I said that consideration has been given to the provision of other foodstuffs in consultation with the officials concerned with determining priority needs. These officials have indicated that there is no need for other commodities which Canada would be in a position to provide at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Thank you very much.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since we are in the Question Period, are there any other questions to be asked?

LEGISLATION

CONSULTATION BETWEEN HOUSE LEADERS—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, I have given notice to the Leader of the Government of my intention to ask the following question:

In order to avoid a recurrence of what has happened recently in connection with the Income Tax Bill and the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill, would the Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Martin) consider it advisable to arrange a conference of the house leaders in the other place and a committee of this house, so as to avoid in the future the haste and apparent lack of attention to important legislation that reaches this place?

I know this problem has arisen in the past, and some solution should be found immediately.

Hon. Paul Martin: Senator Haig was good enough to give me notice of this question earlier today. In reply I would say that I do consider it to be advisable to arrange for such consultations. I propose to make arrangements accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you, Mr. Leader.

IMMIGRATION

DETENTION WITHOUT ACCESS TO COUNSEL—QUESTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I will not attempt to achieve the correct pronunciation of the name involved. Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) says that he has difficulty understanding my Maritime accent. If I attempted to pronounce a foreign name it would be even more difficult to understand. However, recently I have noticed in the press and have seen much on television concerning a certain case in which an individual who was supposed to be a spy for Russia and, in turn, for the CIA, sought political refuge in Canada. I give those details for the information of honourable senators.

• (2010)

My question is: Is it normal practice to incarcerate a person for three to four months without the aid of legal counsel? From reading the newspapers and watching television, I gained the impression that this individual was incarcerated without the aid of legal counsel. The leader knows what I sometimes think about legal counsel.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Exactly what we think about dentists.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: They can be useful. I should like to know whether this is normal practice in immigration cases.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not know anything about the case. The individual has not been identified.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I attempt to assist the Leader of the Government? It is always my wish to attempt to assist him. The person's name is Seebag Montifiore. Does that name mean anything to the leader?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is not French.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The name is now on the record.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will look into the matter or will see that it is looked into at once.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall Bill C-176 be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Now.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, perhaps it might be useful if I said a few words about the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which Bill C-176 was referred on December 31. It will be recalled that the Senate adjourned some time after 4 o'clock that afternoon, whereupon the committee assembled and sat until approximately 6.30.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Six forty-five.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The committee heard from the Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable H.A. Olson, and the Deputy Minister, Mr. S.B. Williams, and many questions on policy and other matters were discussed. It is fair to say that on that occasion many members of the committee felt it desirable to have an opportunity of consulting with interested farm groups in their own areas of the country, with reference not only to the amendments proposed in the later stages of the proceedings in the other place but also to the principle and policy behind the bill.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: This was Christmas Eve.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This was New Year's Eve. The committee therefore adjourned until Thursday, January 6 at 11 o'clock in the morning. On reassembling it sat until 7 p.m. with a short break for lunch. In addition to the minister, the deputy minister, and Mr. C. R. Phillips, the Director General of the Production and Marketing Branch of the Department of Agriculture, four outside witnesses presented themselves. They were Mr. Roy Atkinson, of the National Farmers' Union, Mr. C. A. Gracey, of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, Mr. David Kirk, Executive Secretary of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and Mr. Joseph Hudson, a very substantial egg producer from Lyn, Ontario. In addition, submissions were received from the Consumers Association of Canada and were considered by the committee.

I think it fair to say that the examination of this bill was most extensive. I would go further and say that there was not a minute of time lost by the committee in the work it did. The questions asked, by both the members of the Government party and the Opposition party, were searching, probing and critical. They were designed to supply as much information as one normally gets in a committee of this house that is reviewing a piece of important legislation, as this bill is.

The report of the proceedings of the committee, I understand, has been available to honourable senators since this morning. In this connection, I should like to commend Mr. Georges Coderre of the Committees Branch for his assiduity in arranging this. I should also like to commend those in the Printing Bureau who did a very quick job of work in making this material available to the Senate this evening.

Perhaps it would be proper for me to say that the committee was impressed with the witnesses we had, and with the views they gave. I think honourable senators will also be impressed with the consideration the committee gave to those views. Without wanting to differentiate between the witnesses, I think it would be highly appropriate to say that the impression the Honourable Mr. Olson, the Minister of Agriculture, left with the committee was a very favourable one indeed. The minister came to the committee with full knowledge of the principles involved in the bill, as well as a detailed knowledge of the individual clauses. He performed as an expert, and with great expertise. He discussed some of the legal ramifications as capably as any senior counsel in the legal profession could discuss them. I think that all in all the committee was very impressed with his performance, not only on December 31 but also when the committee was dealing with the bill clause by clause.

I think that is a fair statement of the work done by the committee. I certainly commend honourable senators for their work. I was impressed with the kind of incisive questioning conducted, and not only by members of the Opposition. I commend the honourable Senators Grosart and Phillips for the patience they showed, and for the deliberate objectivity that characterized their work. I also commend many members on the Government side, including Senator Molgat, Senator Sparrow—who is not here this evening—and Senator Goldenberg. I am afraid that now I have mentioned three or four I perhaps should mention every member of the committee, because every one of them took a prominent part in the work, which was extremely well done.

• (2020)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Including Senator Argue.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, Senator Argue. Unfortunately, I do not see him here at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Just name the whole committee and leave it at that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. I am sure that would be the best thing to do.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before I begin my remarks on the bill I would point out that this is the anniversary of the birthday of Sir John A. Macdonald. Therefore, it is appropriate that I, as a Tory—and I do not mind being described as a Tory—should be opposing this bill on Sir John A.'s birthday.

My remarks may sound disjointed, because of some confusion this afternoon. I wished very much to go home to be present at a dinner for my son Robert, who is 15 today, and I have not had an opportunity to straighten out my notes. In any event, I do not usually follow them, and that may improve my speech.

Honourable senators, on December 31, when this bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the acting chairman was Senator John J. Connolly. At this point I digress to thank him for his courtesy to us on this side. We were a small number. In the house that day, at the time when the bill was about to be referred to committee, we had a feeling of frustration, but we also had hope and a certain feeling of anticipation. Senator Connolly gave us every opportunity we could wish in the committee; indeed, he bent over backwards. For all that, I thank him publicly now.

At the point of the commencement of the committee's consideration of the bill on December 31, Senator Connolly said he sensed a certain mood in the committee. So did I, but the mood I detected was one not so much of opposition as of mistrust. It was a feeling that the bill is useless; that it is doomed to failure.

At the adjournment of the committee meeting I hoped that when we resumed that mood would continue. However, it did not. It is interesting to note that at noon on January 6, the day the committee met again, the senators supporting the Government had a caucus, and it was after that caucus that the whole mood changed. I do not know what happened or what took place in that caucus; I simply know that the mood changed.

I do not know whether it applies to the whole of Canada, but in the Maritimes at least we have an expression in the English language that is very descriptive of what I think has happened. When somebody takes the narrow, little loopholes to get out of a situation, in order to excuse him, we say that he "weaseled out of it". I should like to point out that certain species of the weasel family, the martens, change their colour during the winter for protection. They become white, and very inconspicuous in winter. That is exactly the way the Liberal caucus has come out of this situation—very inconspicuous.

I should point out that we on this side did not go into that committee meeting on January 6 looking for a fight with the Government supporters. I particularly do not believe in that. I believe it is the Senate's function to improve legislation, if possible—and God knows there is enough in this bill that could be improved. No, we did not go into that committee meeting looking for a fight; we went in there to attempt to improve the legislation. But I am afraid that does not hold true for some of the Government supporters. I could name them, but I am not going to do what Senator Connolly did. I am not going to put those names on the record. I shall simply sum it up by paraphrasing a biblical saying: In your questioning you were as wise as serpents, but in your voting you were as harmless as doves.

On all the amendments moved and in all of the questioning in committee there was, to my knowledge, only one vote from Government supporters. Are those supporters really that much in favour of the bill that there would be only one vote in committee, and that on merely a subclause? I ask each and every one of you: Are you that much in favour of socialism that you could only give one vote in committee?

• (2030)

You knew the bill was going to pass. You knew it because the honourable Senator Martin had put the whip on. He "Martinized" you in that caucus, but you could have given us, the Opposition, a few votes. You could have allowed those from western Canada and indeed those from the Atlantic provinces to vote for our amendments, to show concern for the various regions of Canada. But no, the Senate had to be "Martinized". I am probably using the wrong term—it should be "Martinizing" which I understand is a term used by a dry cleaning establishment, or, in essence, whitewashing. That is essentially what the honourable senators opposite went though.

The bill itself does nothing for the farmer. It is, honourable senators, nothing more than political marijuana. You smoke the bill and get dreams and hopes for the future, but you do not get any profit from it. I a| n greatly concerned that this is being presented to the farmers of this country as a solution. But it cannot be a solution without an import quota.

Later, when I sum up my remarks, I shall probably come back to this, but I want to digress for a moment to refer to the remarks made by Professor MacGregor of Guelph University yesterday before the Ross Inquiry into egg and poultry production in the Province of Ontario. I had intended to bring with me the press clipping, but unfortunately I left it at home. However, I am sure that honourable senators will at least allow me to give my interpretation of what that newspaper report states. It states that Professor MacGregor said that he could see no further tariffs on agricultural products—that is under the bill we are now discussing,—unless there was actual dumping, and he went on further to confirm my viewpoint when he said there is no price advantage. The only advantage under this bill is stability of production, not stability of price.

Professor MacGregor stated further that there are other ways of marketing instead of the quota system. In other words, you could take out the supply management feature that is so heavily emphasized throughout this bill and go after exports. If you have a surplus of something, then you sell it somewhere else. To me it has always been confusing that if you have a surplus of cars you sell them some place else, but if you have a surplus of potatoes, chickens or beef, there seems to be no effort made to sell these commodities in foreign markets. I think we are making a great mistake in this regard.

Honourable senators, with your indulgence I should like to move on briefly to certain objections that I raised on the second reading of this bill. I shall be somewhat less lengthy, I hope, than I was on second reading. I want to reiterate these objections, and say why I am voting against this bill. I do not propose to give all my objections because if I did we would be in continuous session until about this time next week.

I emphasize, first of all, the fact that there is no quota on import control. Throughout the committee meetings I was intrigued by the fact that various people kept referring to an editorial in the Globe and Mail.

Are you with me, Senator Martin?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Everybody is with you. Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Or are you with the page?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am with you now.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Could I ask your indulgence? Thank you.

The Globe and Mail, published an editorial that referred to the effects of the passage of this bill, and it laid particular emphasis on the quota system. Throughout the bill you will find that the quota system is the answer.

• (2040)

Honourable senators, before you vote on third reading, I would remind you that the quota system has failed drastically. In the past, dairy farmers on the quota system have been able to produce only so much milk and so much butter fat, and have been paid according to a certain schedule. If you go over the schedule, then down the scale you go until it is not profitable to overproduce.

What have been the results? I remind honourable senators of those results. The Dairy Council is paying 64½ cents per pound to the American producer. On top of that, they are paying transportation costs. This is far more than the Canadian producer receives. There are many questions that I could ask, but I shall limit myself to one. Since Canada is importing butter from the United States, what has happened to all of our experts in supply management?

Honourable senators, I refused to watch a program in which the Prime Minister was featured on Sunday evening. However, I have listened to several radio broadcasts since that time in which he indicated the main issue in the next election will be American domination of Canada. Our Government has experts in supply management, and with the number of farmers we have in Canada we still end up importing butter from the United States and paying the American farmer more than we pay the Canadian farmer. When you come out fighting in this regard, I will be there to meet you.

Earlier in my remarks, I mentioned there were no import controls. I also referred to a Globe and Mail editorial which pointed out that the Americans were now able to produce broilers at 14½ cents per pound and ship them almost anywhere in the world, and still end up with a profit. Under this bill, we are restricting our broiler quota. We are inviting American efficiency to come in and compete with us.

A witness who very much impressed me stated that in 1942 he had 35 hens on his farm. He gave us a history of his farm and indicated that he moved from beef to broilers to eggs and had, at the present time, approximately 300,000 hens. He was wondering how our quota system was going to deal with the two-way traffic system.

The plan outlined in this bill is not national in scope, and I would like to emphasize the word "national" while it is still in the description of the bill. It is not carried forward throughout the bill. Any area—and "area" has not been defined—can participate under the bill, or any area can refuse to participate, according to answers given by the Minister of Agriculture who appeared before the committee. However, they are entitled to their additional market.

Honourable senators, I do not want to mention any particular province, but can you imagine the confusion which would occur if province A does not participate in this bill, but province B does and accepts the political marijuana you are giving it. Participation is not mandatory; it is up to the particular province. Province A can still ship into the area of province B. But the producer in province B is under the quota system. His production is restricted.

I would emphasize that this is in direct contradiction to the special report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which indicated that the Canadian public was not ready for wage and price control restrictions. However, this is exactly what is done when a producer in province B can produce only so many hens or broilers, or only so many eggs. On the other hand, however, in area A anyone can take advantage of the Senate recommendation and undercut the producer in province B. If it is your wish to pass this legislation, pass it; I will not approve it.

• (2050)

During the committee meeting Senator Grosart and I raised the question of the first amendment, which deals with clause 2. During the debate Senator Connolly, as acting chairman of the committee, said that he hoped the Senate would not become "hung up" on a comma. Admittedly, a comma is very insignificant and can easily be passed over when reading a sentence in the English language. May I, Senator Connolly, reverse the question and ask whether you would like the Senate to fail because of a comma? In that regard I would point out that the very situation argued against by Senator Grosart and me has occurred in various provinces. British Columbia has established marketing agencies by authority of order in council. Ontario has done the same thing. There was no vote with respect to the Ontario Milk Commission, no plebiscite; just an order in council establishing it. Do you still think, Senator Connolly, that the comma is as insignificant as you thought when you were presiding over that committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You do. Well, I hope for the sake of the producer that you are right. I think you are wrong, and that time will prove it.

I expressed, particularly in committee, great concern that the council will have power to establish quotas. It is fine to think of quotas as representing the large production of individual farmers. However, honourable senators, let us go on from there for a moment and consider the effect of establishing quotas. Here I would like to refer particularly to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture before the committee. He stated that he hoped potatoes would be the next product to be covered by the provisions of the bill. I am greatly concerned. I represent a small province, admittedly, but I still like to feel I represent it. I hope I understand its problems and that I can present them to Senate which, in its wisdom, will give them sympathetic hearing. Our economy is based on the production of potatoes, of which we have two types. We take a particular pride in our seed potatoes, which are for the large part exports. On the other hand, we produce a superior type of table stock, which are marketed in central Canada.

It concerns me, honourable senators, that the bill contains a clause empowering the Council to decide the quota, not from province to province but from area to area. I ask you to consider the effect on the economy not only of my province, but that of New Brunswick, immediately a quota is accepted. It would be, in my humble opinion, economic suicide for the two provinces to enter into such an agreement.

Unfortunately, we did not have the opportunity to have a witness really involved in the potato industry appear before the committee. This was probably due to two factors—the time element plus the fact that the bill is at present restricted to eggs and poultry. The Maritime provinces, not being large producers of eggs or poultry products, have overlooked the full implications of the bill.

• (2100)

A further objection is in the fact that the plan, through its quota system, locks in certain farms. It was pointed out in committee that certain farms controlled a percentage of the production quotas within Ontario. Evidence was given that feed companies had moved in, had purchased those quotas, and were now in a position to control the market. I shudder to think what would happen in my province if producers of fertilizers used the quota system in the same way that feed companies have used it in Ontario. Feed companies in Ontario now control 50 per cent of the quota in poultry products, and I predict that within two years of the passing of this legislation fertilizer companies will control 50 per cent of the potato production of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. That, to my mind, is nothing short of economic suicide.

Senator Martin, when the Bill of Rights was being debated in the other place, set himself up as a champion of individual rights and maintained that an individual should have the opportunity of doing as he pleased. He even suggested that it should be written into the Bill of Rights. I am sure that the honourable senator recalls his speech on that occasion. He may even have moved an amendment in that regard.

How will a young man who wishes to farm, who has passed through agricultural college or has taken a special course at one of our community colleges, obtain a licence to farm? Under the provisions of the bill one must have a licence in order to produce or to market one's products. There is no equivocation in this regard.

May I ask Senator Molgat if he is interested in what I am saying?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Certainly. I am discussing the matter with your house leader.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Send him back to his seat. The point which intrigues me is that we have so many lawyers interested in the bill. I have a son studying to enter the legal profession. At the moment there is a surplus of lawyers. I ask those members of the Senate who are members of the legal profession whether they are willing to consider a bill that would limit the amount of practice they may carry on.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Would honourable senators be willing to do that? If not, they should not impose a similar limitation on someone who is willing to work on a farm and produce.

I am concerned also about the fact that a province can opt in and out, and I attempted to move amendments in this regard. Provinces can join the scheme for three or five years, and then opt out. On the other hand, under clause 39, the federal Government, through order in council, has the right to opt out on 90 days' notice. To my mind that is absolutely ridiculous. No one enters into a contract where the other partner can opt in and out at his or her pleasure, or in which one partner can terminate his partnership on 90 days' notice.

I turn now to the division of the percentage of quotas. If Senator Lamontagne has anything to say, perhaps he would say it out loud so that I can hear. He is usually ashamed of his remarks, but he does not need to whisper them. I have forgiven him in the past. If he has anything to say, perhaps he would say it out loud. What were your remarks, senator? Since Senator Lamontagne has now become silent, I will move on to the point that I wanted to make.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I was contributing to that discussion. I hope it did not interfere with the remarks of my esteemed friend. I was merely saying that in the other place there was one hundred per cent representation from my honourable friend's party. They dealt with the bill for two years. I am a little surprised that the honourable senator has so much criticism of it, when they apparently accepted it on December 31.

• (2110)

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I do not think the honourable senator was rising on a question of privilege or a point of order. He was trying to obtain an explanation. I would point out that he will later have all the time he wants to do that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I appreciate Your Honour's remarks. I am sure that the honourable Senator Benidickson was, as he always does, attempting to contribute his best to the discussion in the Senate. However, I know he will forgive me for asking, if we are to accept every decision of the other place and rubber-stamp it, what the hell are we here for?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am here to raise objections after the bill has been passed in the other place, and that is what I am attempting to do.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You agree, sir. Thank you very much.

I had begun to discuss the question of how a quota will be divided between various areas. It will be recalled that I raised certain objections to members of the marketing council holding office during pleasure. In fact, in the committee, if my memory serves me correctly, I moved an amendment to the effect that they hold office for ten years.

I ask your indulgence, honourable senators, to refer to an article in the publication Farm and Country, on page 8 of the edition of December 21, 1971. I would like to read the whole article into the Senate record, but I think that would be unfair. I would, however, be glad to supply anyone with a copy of the article. It states that the broiler producers in Ontario are greatly concerned about the negotiations going on with the Province of Quebec. It is interesting to note that the negotiations have been going on prior to the passage of this bill.

The article states that the Province of Ontario has a population of seven million, the Province of Quebec has a population of six million, and therefore there should be a split of seven to six. It goes on to point out that the two provinces between them have 74 per cent of the broiler market in Canada. There have been several meetings, as a result of which Quebec asks for 39 per cent of the market, and Ontario can have 34 per cent. In turn, Ontario has suggested an agreement whereby they each take, I believe, 37½ per cent. The total figure comes out to 74 per cent. It has been recommended that the Ontario producers have given the City of Ottawa to the Province of Quebec. It is complained that the Quebec producers want a certain section of the Toronto market, which is considered unfair.

The article also states that the Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Quebec is backing the Quebec producers. It is logical to assume that the Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Ontario will in turn have to back his producers. If he does not, he will have many problems on his hands, not only his own re-election but the re-election of his government in Ontario, as indeed will the Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Quebec. Who will adjudicate in that dispute? Who will settle it, and on what basis?

Honourable senators, are you going to take the population basis for the distribution of quotas? If you are, we in the Atlantic provinces are through. We will have committed economic suicide by agreeing to this bill.

Prior to the passage of this bill the arguments, dissensions, and distrust have already begun throughout the various regions over this matter. I emphasize that as a representative of the Atlantic provinces I must watch this. It is not up to me to tell the western representatives what to do, but I strongly suggest to them that they had better have a good look at that clause and watch it very closely.

• (2120)

I predict that when it comes down to the final allocation, whether it is 39, 34 or 37½ each, the Governor in Council, through the Prime Minister, will have sticky political fingers in there, and will allocate according to the need for votes. That is why a member of the council holds office during the pleasure of the Governor in Council.

I cannot emphasize more emphatically my fear of the allocation of quotas to various regions. It is based on this article, which is by no means hypothetical and is one which I have checked out.

Honourable senators, it has always been my custom, in closing my remarks on legislation, to state those features of which I approve, those which cause me some concern, and those to which I am diametrically opposed. In this bill I can find but one thing, and I ask you to accept my remarks in the spirit in which they are made. Earlier I accused honourable senators opposite of having gone through a "Martinization". However, this bill provides not only for a quota but for a cancellation of items. And if such a sudden reversal of attitude should occur again, I have at least one appeal. I can go to the marketing council and ask it to do one of two things—either put a quota on the number of senatorial chickens, or cancel Senator Martin's licence to produce senatorial chickens.

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, I wish at this time to express my pleasure in being able to support the legislative measure now before this house, Bill C-176. One gratifying aspect of this proposed legislation is the degree of unanimity with which it has been requested or supported by the provincial governments.

I was particularly pleased to hear that the ministers of agriculture of the Maritime provinces had endorsed the bill. It need not be emphasized at this point that the Maritime provinces during past years have had their share of problems in the field of agriculture. Expressions of concern have been voiced recently from all sides, particularly with regard to egg and poultry production and hog production in those provinces. Nova Scotia has been encountering difficulties in its own specialized crop of apple production. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, on the other hand, are concerned mainly about the market situation affecting the potato production, which is a specialized crop in those two provinces.

As is well known by most honourable senators, the best table potatoes on the continent are grown in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Potatoes are, by far, the most important and most valuable farm crop grown in those two provinces.

It should be noted at this point that the annual potato production in the Province of New Brunswick stands between 7 and 8 million barrels. In dollar figures, this means approximately $20 million, which also represents 30 per cent, approximately, of the annual farm income of the province. When prices and markets for potatoes are reasonably good, the agricultural sector of our economy flourishes. When markets and prices are bad, the farm community and the whole economy suffer.

For several years, domestic markets and prices for table potatoes have been soft and farm losses have been substantial. Hundreds of potato farmers have been forced out of business. Although this affects agriculture and the general economy of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island most severely, it also has a serious effect upon the economy of central Canada and the nation.

Potato farming is one of the heaviest users, or consumers, of fertilizers, agricultural chemicals, implements, tractors and numerous other items of heavy farm machinery and equipment. Honourable senators will appreciate that when hundreds of potato farmers are forced out of business, the manufacture and sale of such machinery and products must also diminish. The result, of course, is lost markets and lost jobs in the manufacturing sector in central Canada—and the whole economy suffers.

The National Farm Products Marketing bill, which is now before us for third reading, is basically only permissive legislation. It provides a vehicle, or umbrella, to be used by producers and provinces in attempting to bring an end to wide fluctuations in both markets and prices for farm products.

It is my opinion that this legislation, if properly utilized by the potato industry and the grower provinces, could prove highly beneficial in overcoming the now chronic market and price problems of that industry.

Traditionally, Maritime-grown table potatoes have enjoyed a major share of the central Canadian market. Their unexcelled quality, within an organized marketing structure, should almost guarantee to Maritime producers a continuing principal share of that market.

• (2130)

As soon as this legislation becomes effective, I would urge the potato producers and governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to get on with the necessary co-operation and organization that will be required in order to take full advantage of this enabling legislation.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it has often been said and written that the national, human and social value of agriculture is greater than its economic value and that it was therefore important to ensure the existence of a healthy and prosperous agriculture in our country. The federal Government as well as provincial governments are aware of this importance. Here is what the federal Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable H. A. Olson, stated recently in this regard:

> The pressures brought to bear on agriculture in all developed countries have forced thousands of farmers off the land within recent years. Canada is no exception. Canadian agriculture has recognized that the approach to the problem should be bold and imaginative.

And further on, he added:

> Economic studies and experience indicate the family farm to be the best type of agricultural operation and it is within that context that we have set up a complete program to assist the small farmers of Canada in building up profitable family farms.

It may therefore be hoped that the bill now before us, Bill C-176, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, will contribute to arriving at the solutions required for the many present agricultural problems of our country, thus offering a better future to Canadian farmers.

[English]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to express my thanks first to the honourable members of the Senate for having agreed on December 31, New Year's Eve, to refer to committee the bill we are now debating, and, second, to members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for having agreed to discuss the bill in committee at a later date. Senator Langlois had made the commitment here in the house that he would be prepared to move that in committee. Subsequently, the Senate agreed to put some of us who were concerned about this bill on the committee itself so that we would be able to participate fully. I much appreciated that and I have wanted to express my thanks for the action of honourable senators in that regard.

This particular bill is of major concern to certain regions of the country; certainly, it is of major concern to my own province. However, before going into a discussion of the bill itself I should like to say that I listened with some regret to certain comments made by Senator Phillips this evening. In fact, I was tempted on one or two occasions to rise on a question of privilege because of certain comments he made regarding the caucus of the Liberal Party and the supposed pressure that was put on members of the Liberal Party.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It would really not have disturbed me if you had.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Had I risen, it would not have disturbed Senator Phillips, he says. Well, that is the reason I did not get up. I realized that what Senator Phillips was describing is what actually goes on in the Tory caucus. Had I thought for one moment that he was describing what was going on in the Liberal caucus I should have objected, but he was obviously describing what goes on in his own party circles.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt my friend.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Order.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: It was not necessary for me to object, because that is not what goes on in our group.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Order.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: However, I cannot resist asking this question of Senator Molgat.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Order.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Senator Molgat, are you now prepared to tell us what went on in that caucus?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss what goes on in our caucus, but I think I can say quite openly that no one in our caucus, including Senator Martin, pressures anyone else. My colleague Senator Phillips described Senator Martin as "Martinizing" people. He does no such thing within the Liberal caucus, and to my knowledge he has never done so at any time. I sit within the Liberal caucus in a very comfortable position—not being forced to do one thing or another, but simply discussing things absolutely openly and agreeing, if I so wish, or disagreeing, if I do not care to agree. That is the situation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That to me is the proper way for a party caucus to function within the framework of the Senate structure.

I might also say that Senator Phillips referred to a news story. I believe it was from the Farm and Country. If I am not correct, I would ask him to correct me, but if I am correct, I should like to refer him to a letter to the editor in the Globe and Mail of January 5 from the editor of the Farm and Country, Mr. John Phillips, in which he specifically states the following:

> Agriculture is probably the last major industry in Canada and the United States without production planning. No sensible businessman sees virtue in producing to the limit of plant capacity if there is no profitable market for his output.

Later on he asks:

> Why should farmers be criticized for adopting the same techniques?

Basically, Mr. Phillips supports the bill.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Mr. Phillips is no relation of mine.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Regardless of whether Mr. Phillips supports the bill, a number of us from western Canada had reservations about this bill. I state again that I still have certain reservations about this bill. Our concern is that marketing boards can become inward-looking; that instead of looking towards the expansion of markets and towards the greater development of the agricultural industry, the tendency of the marketing board will be to look towards the restriction of production in order to achieve a higher price for the producer. Certainly, we want a higher price for the producer, but we see a danger in putting too much emphasis on getting that higher price by restricting production. Rather, we would prefer a more open and outgoing approach, looking to the expansion of production and going into the export markets more aggressively. I suppose this is the basis of the fear of most westerners who have expressed concern about this bill.

• (2140)

There are some specific matters in the bill itself which concern us as well and to which we have already spoken. For instance, the definition of producer. Who is a producer? In the bill itself, recognizing that it is an enabling bill and that we are merely permitting provinces to do certain things within a federal statute, the provinces have the right to determine who is a producer. But, honourable senators, there can be different decisions by different provinces as to what constitutes a producer. This is one matter which concerns us. We would rather see a national definition so that there would be, at least, equality. We are also concerned that any decision should be made to establish a marketing board without a clear-cut vote by the producers, that is to say those people who are primarily concerned in the industry, the people who are producing, be it hogs or chickens or eggs. We are concerned to see that those people involved in production should not be forced into a marketing system or a marketing plan without a clear-cut vote on their part. The bill did not completely satisfy us in that regard. We are concerned lest this bill should lead to a balkanization of the Canadian market. We believe that the Canadian market, since we consider ourselves to be one country, must be open to the producers of every part of this country. Just as we would not want to say that shoes for Manitobans must be produced by Manitobans, neither do we want to say that hogs or cattle for the people of Ontario must be produced in Ontario. We want free access to all markets in Canada for all producers in Canada.

I have already expressed my thanks to honourable senators for agreeing to send the bill to committee and to having the discussion some days after its introduction here, because it gave to those of us who are particularly concerned about this an opportunity to speak to various producer groups. I spent the time between New Year's Eve and the resumption of the committee hearing discussing this bill with as many people in western Canada as I could possibly reach in order to obtain their point of view. In general those who we have been told are primarily concerned—that is the poultry and egg producers—expressed the view that they wanted the bill passed. They were not absolutely convinced—at least those I spoke to were not—about all of its details, but at least they felt it was a forward step and they were prepared to proceed on the basis of seeing what the bill could do. Others who had exhibited some reluctance from the outset, that is the hog and cattle producers, were still concerned about the bill, but the amendments particularly in paragraph (c) of clause 2 and the new subclause (3) of clause 18 seemed to provide sufficient protection that they would not be forced into a program that they did not want. So that period provided at least an opportunity for additional consultation which I particularly wanted. I think it would have been possible to have many more representations before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce if there had been more time. One group in particular from western Canada, that is the United Grain Growers which represents a large body of western grain growers, would have been prepared to appear before the committee if there had been more time. I learned this from their president. This organization still expresses substantial reservations about the bill, and I personally should have liked more time for consultation with them. But all things considered, honourable senators, the problems in the chicken and egg industry, the particular sections and the amendments put in the bill, and the fact that there is no compulsion on hog and livestock producers, I believe that it is in the general interest of agriculture to pass this bill at this time.

But I want to put on record very clearly as I did in committee the reservations that we have. I want to make it abundantly clear that should there be at any time in the future any indication of an inward attitude on the part of any board that may be set up, or should there be any indication of an attempt to balkanize trade within this country, to set up specific protected markets within Canada for agricultural products, I personally, and I am sure the producers of western Canada, would totally oppose any further extension of this bill and would come back here asking for it to be repealed. We do not view Canada simply as ten separate markets; we see Canada as a united whole. I want to make it very clear at this point that keeping in mind the reservations that have been expressed by western producers in the various briefs presented to the House of Commons and the statements that have been made before our committee, the comments made here in this house by my western colleagues, we are prepared—at least I am prepared—to see the bill pass at this time. However, it is with the clear-cut understanding that if the fears we have expressed materialize in any way in the future, then we want to be able to come back on the floor of this house and say to honourable senators at that time that that was not the understanding on which this bill was passed at this stage.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Martin, seconded by honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT
NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

January 11, 1972

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber tomorrow, the 12th day of January at 11:00 a.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau,

Brigadier General.
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

SCIENCE POLICY

STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN RE PUBLICATION OF VOLUME II OF COMMITTEE'S REPORT

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would ask leave to make a short statement regarding the publication of Volume II of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would like in the first place to thank you for having adopted in my absence the motion presented by my honourable colleague Senator Cameron. It will enable the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy to publish Volume II of its report while this house is not sitting.

We had hoped in December that this volume would be published early in January. As a matter of fact, it was precisely the object of the motion presented by my colleague Senator Cameron. However, the absolutely unusual situation which has developed in both houses during the last part of December has given a great deal of extra work to the Queen's Printer thus delaying the printing of the committee report.

[English]

As it stands, Volume II of our report will be released to the press in page proof form next Tuesday at 9 a.m. This will be followed by a press conference at 10 o'clock at which members of the steering committee will be available for questioning. The final printed volume will appear on January 24 or 25, and I will be pleased to table it as soon as this chamber reconvenes in February.

The second volume will bear the title: A Science Policy for Canada—Targets and Strategy for the Seventies. It will deal with what has become known as the first generation of science policy which covers not only basic research, but also research and development activities leading to economic innovations. It will also include about 60 specific recommendations, some of which will deal with reorganization of federal agencies responsible for that policy.

Finally, in a subsequent volume which, I hope, will appear some time this spring, the committee will deal with what has been called the second generation of science policy which covers the entire field of social innovations.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 12, 1972, at 10.50 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10.50 a.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, January 12, 1972

The Senate met at 11 a.m., Honourable Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem in the Chair.

Prayers.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your wish that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 11 a.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

> An Act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, February 23, 1972, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I would like to add a word of explanation. Although this motion calls for the Senate to adjourn until February 23, it is almost certain that we will be recalled for February 16 for the purpose of proroguing the present session and very likely opening a new one.

Owing to some ambiguity that still exists about the exact date of prorogation of the present session, it has been deemed necessary to adjourn and have a week to play with in case some change occurs in the decision of the Government as to prorogation of the present session. Should the present plan of the Government not materialize, the Senate will be recalled for February 16, with the usual notice from His Honour the Speaker to each and every one of you.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT HILL

SNOW REMOVAL FROM SIDEWALKS—QUESTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I hesitate to bring up an unimportant matter just before a lengthy adjournment, but I would like to call the attention of the Leader of the Government to the fact that on November 25, 1971, I asked him if some provision could be made to keep a clear approach to these buildings on the east side. During the last two years for some reason snow-ploughing on the path to the east of the East Block has been discontinued, and cars are parked on the sidewalk at the back of the East Block. As a consequence, pedestrians coming here to work, including some senators, have to walk on the roadway. At night particularly this can be very dangerous, and moreover walking in the slush is not pleasant.

I do not think it is too much to ask the Leader of the Government to follow through my previous inquiry, and see whether the responsible authorities can do this simple thing.

I might add that the answer of the Leader of the Government to my question on November 25 last was that he would look into the matter. My question now must be: Did he look into the matter and, if so, what does he expect in consequence?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am pleased to be able to give Senator Molson the assurance that his complaint has been looked into and his request is receiving due consideration. I shall be pleased to have a reminder sent to the appropriate authorities in due course.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I thank the acting leader.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, February 23, 1972, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 16, 1972

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

14th February 1972

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber at 2 p.m. on Wednesday, February 16th, for the purpose of proroguing the Third Session of the Twenty-eight Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler

Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

PROROGATION SPEECH

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to close the Third Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The Third Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament was opened on October 8, 1970. The 496 days that have elapsed since that time represents the longest period in history to pass between the opening and the prorogation of a session of the Parliament of Canada. During this period, the Senate has held 138 sittings, more than in any other session, and the House of Commons has held 244. You have enacted much important legislation and approved many government actions of great significance for Canadians.

During this session, Canada was honoured by the visit of Her Majesty the Queen, the Duke of Edinburg and Pricess Anne, all of whom participated in the celebrations of the Centenary of the Province of British Columbia.

The session began at a time when the peace and order of the nation was threatened. You approved actions to deal with these dangers and as a result the use of violence to attain unlawful objectives was discouraged and the rule of law maintained.

In the sphere of external relations, the Government has continued its policy of seeking new friends while strengthening relations with old ones. Canada exchanged ambassadors with the People's Republic of China and voted at the United Nations to install the Peking Government in the China seat. The Prime Minister visited the Soviet Union and in return the Soviet Premier visited Canada. The Prime Minister and his colleagues received the Presidents of Yugoslavia, Nauru and Niger; the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Ceylon, Ghana, Malaysia, Fiji, Senegal, and Israel; the Foreigh Ministers of France, Ireland, Roumania, Trinidad and Togabo, and Poland; and the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The Prime Minister visited the United States and the President of the United States has indicated that he will visit Ottawa this year.

Consistent with Canada's desire for closer relations with the countries of Latin America and with its determination to assume a more positive role in the Western Hemisphere, the Government applied for, and was accorded Permanent Observer status within the Organization of American States.

Aware of the significance for the world as a whole and for Canada in particular of the enlargement of the European Economic Community, Ministers have had frequent consultations with the European Economic Commission, the Government of the United Kingdom and the governments of member countries. The Prime Minister and his colleagues also received the President of the European Economic Commission.

The Government signed a Protocol on Consultations with the Soviet Union and entered into agreements for scientific and technological exchanges with Belgium, the Federal German Republic and the Soviet Union.

In furtherance of the priority Canadians have accorded to disarmament and arms control in the maintenance of world security, the Government has continued to take a leading part in the work of the Committee of the Conference on Disarmament, particularly in the efforts to reach a comprehensive Test Ban that would prohibit the testing of nuclear devices in the atmosphere, the oceans and underground.

To assist the developing nations of the world you have increased the total aid budget. In the recent tragic events in India and Pakistan, the Government moved quickly and effectively to bring humanitarian relief to the refugees in India and to assist in the rehabilitation of the war torn area.

Conscious of the need to explain to Canadians the changes taking place in defence policy and in defence planning for the future, the Government tabled in the House of Commons a White Paper on Defence.

In the past year, the growth rate of Canada's real Gross National Product has exceeded that of any industrialized country in the world. The rate, too, at which Canadians entered the work force surpassed that of all industrial nations. It is a matter of continuing concern to the Government that the rapid increase in the labour force has left many Canadians without work notwithstanding the impressive increase in the number of jobs created. The rise in output and in employment has been attained, however, without jeopardizing Canada's unmatched achievements in the area of price stability.

You have had to deal with some unusually difficult economic problems including a major crisis of the international monetary system. You passed the Employment Support Act to assist companies adversely affected by the temporary import surtax of the United States. In order to ensure continuing expansion of the economy, increasing employment and decreasing unemployment, the Government invoked a series of measures including a reduction of individual and corporate income taxes. To meet the special requirements of certain segments of our population, stimulate employment and encourage initiatives at the local level, Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs were implemented.

To assist further the development of Canadian industry, you have approved the Textile and Clothing Board Act, and you have amended the Export Development Act, the Anti-Dumping Act and the Canadian New Zealand Trade Agreement Act.

You approved amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and the Small Businesses Loans Act to facilitate, by means of a government guarantee, the provision of term credit by the chartered banks and other designated lenders to farmers, small businessmen and fishermen.

To assist the orderly conduct of business you have passed the Investment Companies Act and the Co-operative Association Act.

Consistent with the Government's policy of encouraging the economic development of the less prosperous parts of Canada, you have amended the Regional Development Incentives Act.

To help develop and maintain strong Canadian-controlled and Canadian-managed corporations in the private sector and to provide Canadians with greater opportunities to participate and to invest in the economic development of Canada, you have approved the creation of a Canada Development Corporation.

Much of the time of this session has been occupied by the question of taxes. You have approved eight acts affecting all manner of taxation in Canada and affecting some international tax agreements. The approval of one of these acts resulted in the complete revision of the Canadian system of taxation and in a more equitable distribution of the tax burden amongst all Canadians.

You have also responded to the needs of Canadians for improved social services. You have provided more adequate income support for older citizens of modest means by amending the Old Age Security Act. You have made better provision for those who served their nation in time of war by amending the Veterans Pensions and Allowances Act, the Civilian War Pensions Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act. You have provided workers with better employment conditions by approving amendments to the Labour (Standards) Code and you have given working Canadians improved income protection by amending the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

Aware of the increased protection required by the Canadian consumer, you enacted the Packaging and Labelling Act and amendments to the Weights and Measures Act.

Your respect for the principle of equality before the law and your desire to protect Canadians in their dealings with the law caused you to enact the Bail Reform Act.

To protect the cultural diversity of Canada and to encourage Canadians of all cultural inheritances to contribute of their values and traditions to our society, the Government established a policy of multiculturalism.

During this session you have addressed yourselves to the concerns of the agricultural community. You have considered the problems of the marketing of agricultural products and you have passed the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. Appreciative of the particular problems of prairie farmers, you have revised the Grain Act and you have amended the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. You have passed the Crop Insurance Act. Farmers have also benefited from the introduction of a two price system for wheat.

Your deep concern for the preservation of the environment for present and future generations of Canadians has led you to establish a Department of the Environment. To combat pollution you have amended the Canada Shipping Act. You have also passed the Clean Air Act and the Weather Modification Information Act. Recognizing that all nations must act in concert if the earth's vital resources and environment are to be preserved. Canada has continued its efforts to gain international agreement that will result in better protection of the interests of coastal states and in measures that will safeguard the quality of the environment.

In order that government respond more quickly and more sensitively to the needs and aspirations of Canadians in the seventies, you approved a measure establishing the Ministries of State. To enhance the quality of our urban life and to meet the new and immense challenges of technology, you have enacted measures which have resulted in the creation of Ministries of State for Urban Affairs and for Science and Technology.

As further evidence of your desire to adapt our legal and governmental institutions to the contemporary needs of our society, you have amended the Judges Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act and you have passed the Federal Court Act. You have approved the Statutory Instruments Act and to supervise its implementation you have established a Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

During this session, both Houses of Parliament have permitted their Committees to continue the important task of reviewing Government policy and administration.

A number of other significant initiatives and items of legislation were approved in this Third Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament. The laws which you have enacted and the policies which you have undertaken are amongst the most important in our history. Though we have accomplished much, we have yet much to do. The pace of legislative reform and innovation must continue rapidly if we are to meet the challenges of the future. By applying ourselves to this task with energy and imagination, together we will make a lasting contribution to the strength, justness and prosperity of Canadian society.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for the public services in the previous and in the current fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence continue to bless our country.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is the will and pleasure of the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that this Parliament be prorogued until ten-thirty o'clock in the forenoon tomorrow, Thursday, the 17th day of February, 1972, to be here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until ten-thirty o'clock in the forenoon tomorrow. Thursday, the 17th day of February, 1972.
