POVERTY COMMITTEE

RESIGNATIONS OF PROFESSIONAL STAFF

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, recent developments concerning the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, of which no doubt you are aware, make it necessary for me as chairman to give some facts concerning what has transpired.

Four members of the staff of the committee resigned on Monday, April 5. Mr. Ian Adams, who joined the staff on November 1, 1970, is a professional writer who has published a book on poverty. Mr. William Cameron, who joined the staff on December 14, 1970, is a professional journalist. Mr. Peter Penz, who joined the committee when it was first organized, is an economist who was seconded from the Department of Manpower. Mr. Brian Hill, also an economist, joined the staff on December 1, 1969. All are competent in their fields of endeavour.

On March 9 the first partial draft of a portion of the committee report became available. Senator Edgar Fournier was ill and I asked Senator Carter to act as vice-chairman for the purpose of studying the document. He and I each independently studied it from Wednesday to Monday. We then compared our notes and spent a day re-studying the same draft. We agreed on changes that we felt had to be made before presentation to the whole committee.

I then met with all the members of the writing staff, the research staff and administration staff of the committee and spent considerable time outlining the changes that we thought had to be made and asked that the document be redrafted setting out our thinking.

The second partial draft was in my hands on March 29. Again the same routine was followed. Senator Carter and I re-studied it. We agreed the second draft was still unsatisfactory.

Meetings were then held with Ian Adams, Fred Joyce the Director, Senator Carter and myself, and we thoroughly examined and studied the revised draft document page by page. In fact, every page was read in the presence of the four of us. This took about two and a half days and we were about three-quarters finished when we adjourned to meet again on Monday, April 5.

On Monday morning, April 5, Mr. Adams said he was not prepared to proceed any further, that he had lost confidence in the committee and was tendering his resignation.

Later it became obvious that the decision had been agreed on by these four members of the staff. Mr. William Cameron, who had been brought in on Mr. Adams' recommendations to assist him, also resigned, as did Mr. Peter Penz and Mr. Brian Hill.

All this happened on Monday morning, April 5. I immediately convened a meeting of the committee on Monday, April 5, at 4 o'clock and Senator Carter and I explained the situation to the members of the committee. The members were quite determined that the report had to be the committee's report and that the committee would be the sole judge of what it would contain. That position has been maintained.

It became clear that the resignations had been planned to bring pressure to bear upon the committee. Earlier Mr. Adams had advised me that the second portion of the draft report was already under way and would be available the first week in April. It was not available and, as it turned out, he had not even started to draft it. It appears now that he did not intend to finish the work he undertook until his views prevailed and he was given his own way.

A committee report must be politically realistic, politics being defined as "the art of the possible." The recommendations of the committee's report must also be capable of being implemented. Although these men are competent within their own discipline, they are not "with it" in a realistic sense.

In all the circumstances, considering the over-publicized appearance on TV, the spoken words on the radio and the press conference, it becomes important to the Senate now and in the future that the terms of employment under which these men work should be placed before the Senate. These are the terms of employment, the conditions under which they were engaged. This is the document to which each subscribed, and I quote:

> It is understood and agreed that this agreement is a contract for the performance of a service and that the contractor is engaged as an independent contractor providing services to the Senate of Canada and is not engaged as an employee of the Senate of Canada.
> The Contractor shall treat as confidential, during as well as after the rendering of the services contracted for, any information of a character confidential to the affairs of the Senate of Canada to which he becomes privy as a result of his acting as a Contractor.

I quote now from May, 17th edition, at page 652:

> It is a breach of privilege for any person to publish any portion of the evidence given before, or any document presented to, a Select Committee before such evidence or document has been reported to the House.

All resource and research material which was gathered by the committee staff at considerable expense to the committee was made available to them. The rights to that material and research is vested in the committee. The taxpayer has paid for it. It is the property of the committee. The use of any of the material in any form, directly or indirectly, without express permission of the committee would be a grave misuse of privileged and confidential documents. The draft reports of committees and the documentation have long been regarded as highly privileged and indeed sacrosanct prior to their release to the Senate itself. I can only say to honourable senators that I regret what has happened, but it is one of the risks of putting together an ad hoc staff on very short notice.

Utopian reports are nice to read, but they are usually sent to a subterranean vault, indexed, microfilmed and filed, unheeded and unneeded. The report which must be submitted by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty cannot be destined for that Valhalla. The committee will buckle down even harder to complete its report. Unfortunately, because some momentum has been lost, there will be an inevitable delay. I am hopeful that the momentum will be quickly regained. I can assure the Senate that the delay will be minimal.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not rising to discuss the contents of the report which will eventually be made. I wish to associate myself with some of the principles submitted by Senator Croll. The report of a select committee of the Senate is the report of that committee and not of those whose services are hired to assist it. This is a very important question and in due course should be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to determine whether it is necessary to be more precise in the wording of contracts used in the hiring of staff for Senate committees. We must be specific with respect to the responsibilities of the committee and of its staff. In the event that those who have resigned are in breach of the rules of the Senate or of Parliament, this matter should be investigated.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of text, dated April 7, 1971, of the Joint Canada-U.S.A. reference to the International Joint Commission respecting the Skagit River.

Report relating to the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 41(2) of the said Act, chapter 111, R.S.C., 1952.

Report on the operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act and on "Special Area" incentives for the month of March 1971, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, chapter 56, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69.

Copies of Report of the Atlantic Development Council submitted to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion under date of January 22, 1971, entitled "A Strategy for the Economic Development of the Atlantic Region, 1971-1981."

Revised Statues of Canada, 1970, Volumes 1 to 7 inclusive, and First Supplement, together with copy of document outlining the history and background of the Statute Revision Commission and copy of a letter transmitting the said Statutes to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA, 1970

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, which I have tabled this evening, constitutes the fifth revision in our history and the fourth to be carried out in this century. Our federal statutes were last revised in 1952. Since that time we have added twenty volumes of statutes to the six that constituted the revision completed in 1952.

Yesterday my colleague the Minister of Justice tabled these eight volumes in the other place, representing current federal statutes enacted by Parliament up to October 7, 1970. Two additional volumes will bring the set up to date and complete it.

This event concludes the labours of over one hundred individuals working at the direction of the Statute Revision Commission. The revision will not come into force until after proclamation by order in council.

The physical preparation of this revision has involved interesting data processing and photo composition techniques, enabling the work to be organized much more efficiently and easily reproduced in both languages. This use of computers has provided us with a unique information retrieval system, and will facilitate the preparation of subsequent statutory revisions via the use of machine-readable magnetic tape.

Distribution will commence in May. When that has been completed, proclamation will take place. The completed bilingual text of ten volumes represents an important milestone in Canadian statutory history. It gives me much satisfaction, on behalf of the Government, to congratulate the members of the Statute Revision Commission on the successful conclusion of their monumental undertaking.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am very happy that at last we have these Revised Statutes of Canada. It is about time that we do not have to go through twenty volumes to find out the present law.

PROVINCE OF NEW BRUNSWICK

POPULATION AND FARM STATISTICS FOR KENT COUNTY—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. What was the population of Kent County, New Brunswick, in the years 1871, 1881, 1891, 1901, 1911, 1921, 1931, 1941, 1951, 1961 and 1966; and what was the latest estimated population for that County?

2. What was the total acreage in farms (woodlots included) and the total acreage in cleared, improved farmland (pasture included) in the said County for the years 1901, 1911, 1921, 1931, 1941, 1951, 1961 and 1966?

3. What was the total number of commercial farm operators in Kent County in the years 1931, 1941, 1951, 1961 and 1966?

Hon. Paul Martin: Answered.

(The answer follows.)

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that:

1. Population of Kent County, New Brunswick for the following years:

1871	19,101	1941	25,817

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill S-14, respecting the construction of an international highway bridge between Fort Frances, Ontario and International Falls, Minnesota.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, while speaking to this bill in an earlier occasion I asked a number of questions. The honourable sponsor, Senator Benidickson, has been good enough to assure me that he will give full answers to those questions during the debate. Therefore, I have no further comment at this time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, debate adjourned.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook for the second reading of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators, first of all I should like to compliment Senator Cook, the sponsor of this bill, on his very fine explanation. His explanation in general, and the figures he quoted in support of it in particular, will afford us the opportunity of discussing this matter much more thoroughly than would have been the case had he not given us such a lucid account.

I support the bill in general principle, but there are a number of clauses that I should like to have clarified when the bill goes to committee. In my opinion, some slight changes to certain of the clauses of this measure would be of benefit to the act itself, but it is not necessary to bring them to your attention this evening because we shall have a much better chance to consider them when the bill goes before the committee.

This is a very important bill. Not only is it important to the textile and clothing industry, it is important to the importers and exporters of those commodities, as well as to consumers themselves.

According to the law of the land, people are not allowed to go round in public in the nude. Nevertheless, when we visit some of the bathing beaches in various parts of Canada in summer, we tend to wonder if some people are not very close to breaking the law; not that I personally object, because I have enjoyed some of these sights myself.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: So long as they are young, it is all right.

Hon. Mr. Blois: The textile and clothing industry has an important place in the economy of our country, catering as it does to some 22 million Canadians. Apart from that, of course, there are many thousands of people who would be indirectly affected by this bill.

The new Clothing and Textile Board that is to be set up will have a very big job. It is to have authority to look into all matters affecting the importation of goods into Canada, as well as authority to study whether or not Canadian manufacturers of textiles and clothing are conducting their affairs in such a fashion that the people in the industry are protected. I am not so much worried about the industrial manufacturers themselves as I am about the individual people working in the industry who have been affected, and may in future be even more affected, by many of the goods that are imported into this country.

As I say, the board will have a difficult job. It is true that it cannot make any rules. All it can do is suggest to the Government what it thinks would be of importance and help to the industry, the workers, and the economy of Canada. Once the board makes its report, it is then up to the Government to decide what should be done.

Canada is a trading nation. I have said before in this chamber that trade is not a one-way street. If we wish to export goods to other countries we must be willing to allow the importation of goods. But sound judgment must be exercised so that imports do not adversely affect the thousands of workers in the particular industry. The board in its wisdom, in studying these matters, is going to have to consider the international situation. It is going to have to consider the importers, the exporter and, in general, the consumers. Above all, it will have to consider the 200,000 people employed in the textile and clothing industry. As I say, it is a big job, an important job, and one that can have even greater effect on the Canadian economy in future than it has in the past.

In his explanation of the bill Senator Cook quoted a number of helpful figures. He pointed out that about 12 per cent of the total number of people employed in Canada's manufacturing industries are employed in the textile and clothing industry. Senator Cook also said that in the textile and clothing industry there are more female workers than in any other industry in Canada. I believe he said there were almost as many females in that industry as in all other industries combined. Speaking from memory, I think he stated that 75 per cent of the Canadian female workers in the manufacturing industries in Canada were employed in the clothing industry, while 43 per cent were employed in the textile industry. By "textile industry" I mean, of course, the industry concerned with the spinning of yarns, and so on.

Another important item of the textile and clothing industry is that it is spread over most of the provinces of Canada, thereby giving work to a wider section of our people than any other single industry. The textile industry is one that is very often found in smaller communities and towns, and it is very often the mainstay of them.

It is true that there are many types of industry that have settled in or near the large centres such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, but the textile industry embraces a different type of work and it is quite possible that it is more widespread and of greater benefit to the Canadian economy than any other industry in this country.

There was a time when the textile and clothing industry was not considered to be as well looked after as others because we had sweatshops and bad working conditions. In recent years, however, the wages paid in the textile and clothing industry have been good and compare favourably with those paid in any other industry, except where special training or skill is required. The people employed by this industry in Canada are second to none. I have visited many clothing and textile plants in Canada, the United States and other countries and in my opinion the workers in our Canadian plants are equal to if not superior to those elsewhere in similar plants. I think that the Canadian textile industry is growing. We are doing more business in Canada and we are even achieving greater export business. Needless to say the export business has to be in the more highly priced items because we are not able to compete with countries where the wages paid are very low. It is not necessary to name those countries because honourable senators know which countries I speak of.

Some twenty years ago I had the opportunity, along with others, to make an intensive study of the textile industry in Canada. We found that one of the countries exporting large quantities of textile goods to Canada was paying its workers 16 cents an hour while the Canadian rate was $1.07 or $1.10 an hour. The situation has changed considerably since then. Last fall I visited Japan and Hong Kong and endeavoured to ascertain the rates being paid to their textile workers. I was not able to discover the specific rates, but I understand that they are about half what is being paid by the Canadian textile manufacturing industry. I cannot vouch for this; I simply had to take the information given to me and make the best of it.

One of the big problems facing the Textile and Clothing Board will be to decide just how far they can go in making recommendations to the Government. I for one am very much opposed to the idea that there should be some method worked out whereby employees of the textile and clothing industry who are affected by competition from goods imported into Canada should be paid for being laid off work. I think we should try to bring up our Canadian industry to the point where these people could earn this money rather than simply receive it as an outright payment from the taxpayer. The Government should make sure that they have the opportunity to do this. I say this, honourable senators, because this situation could affect not only the 200,000 textile and clothing employees and their families, but indirectly the retail merchants. If these people are not earning money, then they do not have it to spend. Furthermore, it could affect the farmer and the fisherman and, indeed, every segment of the Canadian economy.

I am not saying that the textile industry is more important than any other industry in Canada, but I am saying that it affects more people either directly or indirectly. Therefore I hope this board will be in a position to make recommendations that will be valuable to all Canadians.

Honourable senators, let me go back to the depression years. In the early thirties conditions were very, very bad in Canada and Canadian manufacturers in general reduced their employment by 32 per cent. As a result, the 1929 level of employment was not regained until the early 1940s. But the textile industry reduced employment by only 8 per cent and had regained the 1929 level by 1934. When war was declared in 1939, Canada was indeed fortunate to have a textile industry and the equipment to supply the sudden demands for the armed forces and for our civilian population. In those days, as I know from my own experience, we supplied the Canadian Forces and the Canadian people and we were also able to supply various items needed by many of our allies. In fact, when the United States came into the war they were not as well equipped to take care of the sudden demands made on their textile industry as we in Canada had been, and we were able to supply a number of articles they needed. I mention this to show the importance of the industry to Canada and to point out that it is not unreasonable to suggest that in these uncertain times a nation is wise to encourage the maintenance of an industry which is capable of transforming itself almost overnight to take care of wartime requirements in addition to those of the civilian population.

In 1939, the textile employees, realizing the country was at war, responded eagerly to the new demands made upon them. They worked willingly in the national interest. Of course, they were paid extra for doing so but the fact remains that they were willing to do whatever they could to gear the industry to wartime demands. In many instances they worked more hours than the law allowed, but since it was wartime it was not too difficult to get permission from the Government to do this.

Honourable senators, there are people who will oppose this bill, and I suppose one cannot blame them for that. You will hear it said, as I have heard, that the Canadian textile and clothing industry is not up to date. This is absolutely wrong. The vast majority of textile and clothing manufacturing plants in Canada are as up to date and have as modern machinery as you will find anywhere in the world. The industry has the know-how and is capable of turning out goods equal to anything that can be produced anywhere, and I say this without fear of successful contradiction.

In making these remarks I am not suggesting that all textile products should be excluded from Canada. There are a number of textile products that can be used, and which in the past were used in Canada, but there are also many items entering this country that can be manufactured here. In many cases such items manufactured here are equal and sometimes superior to those coming in.

I spoke earlier today to a businessman of long experience, who is also a member of the Senate. I suggested that perhaps the quality of the imported fabric itself might be as good as that manufactured here, but the workmanship, the fit, and the finish did not compare. He immediately replied, "I question very much if even the quality of the fabric is equal." He went further and said that on rare occasions he had purchased some of these items, and had reached the conclusion that Canadian manufactured articles in the textile and clothing industry were second to none in the world.

I am referring to a man who has had a good deal of experience in this field, my good friend the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth, Senator Isnor, who has been in the textile business for many years. He and I have many things in common. We have never agreed on politics, but that has been his fault and not mine. All he had to do was to change his party and we could have agreed on that point. However, I was never able to convince him to do that, and I do not think he ever tried to persuade me to change.

It has been said that the textile and clothing industry is over-expanded. Such a view is not correct. It is true that in the last 15 or 20 years the industry has introduced a good deal of new and modern equipment, but even so the capacity of our textile mills has not increased in comparison with the increase in our population over a similar period.

One could say a good deal about the valuable effect that this bill will have on Canada's future economy. As I said earlier, many of these points can be discussed equally well in committee. I do not know to which committee the bill will be referred, but I hope honourable senators will give it serious consideration because I firmly believe that it affects one of our best industries.

I repeat, I am not suggesting that all textile goods should be excluded from Canada. A number of items are useful to our everyday requirements. When I mentioned this to Senator Isnor this afternoon he replied "Name a few of them," and there and then we had a little argument. When the matter is before the committee, I am sure that all honourable senators will reach the conclusion that this industry is worthy of our wholehearted support.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sparrow, debate adjourned.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 2, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mrs. Casgrain calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada, dated 28th September 1970, and tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 8th December 1970.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, when the honourable Senator Casgrain was directing our attention to the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women she expressed the hope that there would be an extended discussion on it, and that there would be at least an interim statement made on behalf of the Government with regard to it.

I now rise to make a few remarks about the report. I am sure that all honourable senators appreciate the initiative that has been taken by those women senators who have participated in the debate and by other honourable senators who have directed their attention to the findings of this important royal commission.

I am sure we all find that this subject, the status of women, consists of legal muddles, economic injustices, social inequalities and blind prejudice. The more romantic differences between the sexes should be readily apparent and I profoundly hope that such will always be the case. I am sure that most honourable senators share this view.

Regrettably, in speaking on the matter under debate I must address myself to an altogether different world, to a difference existing between the sexes, a difference which has little reference to the charm and warmth of womanhood. The differences to which I refer are those relating to the sad fact that in respect of the sexes this country, and indeed much of the world, continues to be governed by a double standard. It is a standard of conduct, behaviour, opportunity, and responsibility which has been imposed by my sex and which until now has been accepted by the other.

I believe that the signs of the times are clear and that this situation is no longer tolerable. We have gone beyond that point, the debater's point, that women's rights cannot be won without the assumption of greater responsibilities by women. Privilege and responsibility are but two sides of the same coin. Today women seek full and equal participation in the daily round of our society. They seek rights and privileges commensurate with the great responsibilities which so many of them bear so unfairly.

Those of us—and this applies to most of us—who have concerned ourselves with the need for general legal reform in this country have been struck by the particular need for revision of our statutes as they relate to the rights of women. The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, appointed by the Pearson Government, has made numerous recommendations, the purpose of which is to do away with many of the legal restraints which our society has imposed upon women with varying degrees of injustice since time immemorial. They are restraints to which my sex is not subjected.

The royal commission's report has carefully stressed the need to ensure that in carrying out such reforms, especially as they affect the family, care must be taken to see that existing law respecting the responsibilities of the male does not become onerous. The woman must not be given the advantage of new privileges without distributing more evenly responsibilities which ought to be shared between male and female as persons and not as representatives of different and unequal sexes. Personally, I would like to see the gist of these reforms carried through as quickly as possible. I am not happy with the strident and unfeminine tones of Women's Liberation. I believe that the necessity for the removal of discriminatory legislation directed against women from our statute books is self-evident.

A few weeks ago, on the eve—as it turned out—of his own wedding, the Prime Minister of Canada reminded us that in 1928 the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the term "persons" as set forth in the British North America Act with respect to this chamber could not be interpreted to embrace women as well as men.

This, I regret to say, was indeed something about which to be strident. The situation to which the Prime Minister referred has, happily, changed because of a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and we have had 11 women, commencing with Cairine Reay Wilson in 1930 and most recently Mrs. Casgrain and Mrs. Heath, responded to a summons to sit in this chamber. We now have five able women senators here. There are, however, numerous other areas of life in our country where the sort of situation that existed in this place over 40 years ago still pertains. Indeed, we might note that in the other place there is today only one woman member of Parliament. There are some of us who recall very vividly the first woman elected to Parliament, Miss Agnes MacPhail, who entered Parliament in 1921 and adorned the other place with her charm and great ability.

There is extensive discrimination against women in such fundamentals as career opportunities, financial rewards, education and broad social responsibility. In addition, women are still expected to tolerate social discrimination in their personal lives.

There is much to be strident about. But we ought also to understand that piecemeal reform is not going to solve the problem or to preserve the tranquillity and civilization provided by the charm and grace of a woman's femininity.

It is not easy to change attitudes that are the result of centuries of practice, however unfair that practice may appear to many of us today. Nonetheless, if we do not accelerate the pace at which we are prepared to carry through our reforms we may expect to see a lot less charm and to endure a protest arising from an awakened sensitivity and a righteous indignation.

Permit me, honourable senators, to illustrate my point by taking one area, that of education. It is only within the life span of some of us in this chamber that women were first permitted to breach the outer defences of the ivory tower and gain the right to receive an undergraduate education in our universities. Today that right is commonplace. I note, however, that it is only relatively recently that women have been permitted to embark in any appreciable numbers on postgraduate programs. One ought to ask why. The answer, in some part, lies in the fact that numerous civilized and cultivated university professors have been reluctant to devote time and energy to encouraging the development of even their most brilliant female students, on the grounds that all too frequently the acquisition of professional training will be wasted. The girl will go off and get married and never exercise her skills and talents in the manner intended.

I well remember a distinguished professor at one of the universities, which I was privileged to attend for the purpose of postgraduate work, who rebelled at the presence of women in his classes and indeed their attendance at the university. Finding women present in the lecture room he invariably commenced his lecture by simply saying "gentlemen".

All too frequently in the past such attitudes have been defensible on the simple basis of looking at the record. We, however, ought to look further and realize that women have tended not to pursue the careers for which they have been prepared because they go out into a male world where their performance is automatically suspect, and where they are expected to marry, raise a family and do nothing else.

Now we are in a position to do something about this regrettable state of affairs. It was for the purpose of examining this problem that the Government of Canada appointed the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Women must be given the choice either to pursue a career or to raise a family, or indeed to do both. The Government is alive to the difficulties both of the present situation and to the potential complications of carrying through effective and desired reform. Nonetheless, after the matter has been given due consideration the Government will act.

In this connection, the Report of the Bird Commission is of the greatest value. The Bird Commission is a synonym, of course, for the royal commission because, as we know, the commission was headed by Mrs. Anne Bird. The report contains numerous specific recommendations—

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Mrs. Florence Bird.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, known as Anne Francis in her journalistic status, and Mrs. Florence Bird in her married capacity.

The report contains numerous specific recommendations to eliminate legal discrimination against women and to change the climate of prejudice and practical difficulties within which a woman must choose either to compete on the basis of an unfair book of rules, or else not to compete at all.

There are 167 separate recommendations which must be considered by every level of government within Canada as well as by private organizations and by business. Indeed, some of the recommendations of the royal commission report specifically relate to matters of housekeeping falling within the jurisdiction of our own chamber. I refer here to recommendations 51 and 52 relating to our practice concerning the appointment of messengers and protective staff, and the practice respecting the appointing of women to senior positions.

In reacting to the royal commission report, the Government has already stated that it is giving priority consideration to its recommendations. The Social Policy Section has been established in the Privy Council Office to oversee the Government's response to the report, and an interdepartmental co-ordinating committee is now at work examining its recommendations for consideration by the Government itself.

The committee comprises the following departments and agencies: the departments of Justice, of the Secretary of State, of the Solicitor General, of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of National Defence, of National Revenue, of Labour, and of Regional Economic Expansion, as well as the Public Service Commission, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and the Office of the Prime Minister. Other agencies and departments will be asked to sit from time to time as the work of the committee progresses.

This panoply of departments indicates that the Government regards these matters seriously. Indeed, the Speech from the Throne of last autumn anticipated something of what the royal commission report has to say in the areas of unemployment insurance, labour, citizenship, indigenous minorities, women offenders, and family planning. The co-ordinating committee has created working parties to aid it in developing specific recommendations for consideration by cabinet. These working parties are surveying the following areas as they relate to the status of women in Canada: economic life, political and judicial life, educational opportunities, family and community services, and the problems of the disadvantaged.

The Government is also giving consideration to amendments to the Fair Employment Practices Act as they affect women. Bills have been introduced—Bill C-228, an act to amend the Canada Labour Standards Code, and Bill C-229, an act respecting unemployment insurance in Canada. Among other things, the amendment to the Canada Labour Standards Code specifically forbids the maintenance of discriminatory levels of wages as between men and women who are engaged in the same, or substantially the same, form of work.

This bill further provides that all female employees with 12 months or more service shall be entitled to receive up to 17 weeks' leave of absence under the terms of a maternity leave clause. I am sure that this bill will receive the earnest consideration of all honourable senators.

The bill relating to the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act extends the foregoing legislation to provide unemployment insurance payments to women during 15 of their 17 weeks' leave of absence under the maternity leave clause of the amendment to the Labour Standards Code.

With respect to citizenship, the Government specifically proposes to abolish discriminatory legislation in this area affecting women.

The minister responsible for housing, speaking recently, has stated that he plans to introduce legislation ensuring that women have equal opportunity in securing mortgages for housing. He has also instructed the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to look into the feasibility of following the royal commission's recommendation, that the corporation should make loans available to augment the number of day-care centres in Canada. This is Recommendation 173 of the royal commission report.

The Government itself is encouraging the appointment of qualified women at every level in the public service. Directly and indirectly the Government is looking into the recommendations of the royal commission as they affect areas falling within the jurisdiction of the federal Government, to see what action can or ought to be taken.

Honourable senators, these are some of the concrete steps which the Government has taken to ensure that the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in our country will not be permitted to gather dust. As a Government we are concerned about the questions raised in the report. The actions which have already been taken indicate the determination to take prompt remedial action in this field.

The debate on the report has been and is one of great significance. The contributions made by Senators Casgrain, Belisle, Fergusson, Quart, Benidickson, Inman, Connolly and Sullivan have reflected the concern of this chamber. I trust that I have been able to impart to you something of the Government's determination to act in respect of the commission's recommendations.

Speaking in this place early in February, our colleague Senator Fergusson concluded:

> Women are not only demanding consideration because they have resented the discrimination from which they have suffered in the past, but they want equal rights to use their potentialities for the betterment of the country and of the world. If they are restricted to subordinate positions, as has happened so often in Canada in the past, they are unable to make the maximum contribution of which they are capable, and the country is poorer because it has not made the best use of all its human resources. Women want—as human beings—to enjoy equal rights and share equal responsibilities with men.

I might add that not only do women want to enjoy equal rights and share equal responsibilities with men, but it is the desire of the Government and, I am sure, of all honourable senators that they should do so. I am confident also that it is the desire of most people in this country.

Senator Fergusson could not have stated the Government's position with respect to the status of women in our society more succinctly than she has in the words which I have quoted. It is my hope that the country will see fit to move with the times and ensure that Canada makes full and equitable use of all the talent at its disposal, and that the graciousness and charm and warmth of women will not have to be sacrificed on the battlefields of a new extremist movement.

Honourable senators, the Bird Commission has reported, and the Government has established the necessary machinery to examine the practicalities of implementing the recommendations of the royal commission as they affect the federal Government. It is our responsibility to give this report the consideration it deserves. I have examined the record and I believe that the first legislative body in Canada to address itself to the consideration and study of this report is the Senate of Canada.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, April 14, 1971, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952.

HON. MAURICE LAMONTAGNE

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day I should like to say to the honourable Senator Lamontagne how happy we are to see him back in the house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C., seconded by the honourable Senator Paterson, for the second reading of Bill S-14, intituled: "An Act respecting the construction of an international highway bridge between Fort Frances, Ontario, and International Falls, Minnesota".—(Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I think it is the intention of Senator Benidickson to let this order stand. He advised me that he is awaiting certain information which he wishes to receive before proceeding.

Order stands.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook for the second reading of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I believe that on general principle this bill should be rejected. As a nation of free traders, and I am thinking particularly of western Canada and the Prairie region, Canada has endeavoured throughout its history to work for free trade in all commodities. I say the bill should be rejected on that basis. However, I am not prepared to say that I will reject it, nor that this house should reject it, because there are other factors involved. The survival of Canada, particularly the survival of western Canada, depends on exports. The important commodities that we export from the west are, of course, wheat, pulp, potash and numerous other resources. Trade is a two-way street and we cannot survive unless we have that trade. However, we must face the facts of life as far as our industries in Canada are concerned.

Our standard of living is one of the highest in the world. In the textile industry itself the average wage is $2 per hour. Compare that to our competitors in the textile and clothing industry and you compare figures such as those of Hong Kong, with a wage of 22 cents, Japan, 58 cents, Singapore, 19 cents, South Korea, 15 cents and Taiwan, 20 cents. These differences indicate that of necessity this industry must be protected by some form of tariffs or import restrictions. If there were no such restrictions and imports came into Canada freely we would, of course, see the downfall of the total textile and clothing industry in Canada, with the resultant effect of displacing 200,000 employees directly employed, plus the many other thousands in related industries. This industry employs approximately 12 per cent of the total labour force in manufacturing industries in Canada, which is a high percentage. Therefore, a close look must be taken at all times at restrictions on imports into our country.

The bill states that the board will have three members. I feel this is not sufficient, and I would ask the committee when considering the bill to look closely at the number of representatives on the board. I believe it is very important that each region of Canada have representation on the board. I refer to the Atlantic region, Quebec, Ontario, the Prairies, and British Columbia. I have no particular quarrel with the present appointments or with those persons who no doubt will be appointed under this bill, but they are all central Canadians and it would appear that they represent either the public service or the industrialists of central Canada. With so many millions of dollars involved in import duties that affect all Canadians, I think all of Canada should have representation on the board. We need people on the board who, when a decision is being made, will look at the problems of and the effects on each region of Canada—not only the economic effects but also the social considerations.

When we meet in committee I am sure that this point will be discussed. There will be objection to the establishment of this principle for such a board. No doubt it will be argued that this type of representation does not exist on other boards, such as the Wheat Board and the National Energy Board. However, this is an advisory board which affects all Canadians—the consumers—whereas boards such as the Wheat Board primarily deal with export rather than the import trade. I do not feel we would set a particular precedent so far as boards are concerned.

If it were decided to have regional representation, the Governor in Council should make the appointments, without reference necessarily to any provincial government involved.

Honourable senators, if we are a free trade nation or endeavouring to reach that stage, it is particularly important for the Prairie region. If trade is a two-way street, we must put all decisions on that basis. Western Canada survives only on the export trade. As our export commodities to Japan total in the neighbourhood of $1,500 million, and as we export to other Pacific Rim countries as well, we must expect that we have to spend heavily on importing from those countries. Under today's system some of our tariffs go up to 50 per cent on imports from those countries.

Recently, there has been a surtax of $2 on shirts. This has had the effect of restricting the balance of trade in the areas in which we do business in the world. It has also increased considerably the cost of living to our consumers. The clothing and textile industry has other protections. There are quota policies, and regional incentives and industrial incentives to protect that industry.

This bill concerns me for another reason. The minister in charge and the government in power may lay the blame for additional restrictive policies on the doorstep of the Textile and Clothing Board, and not take the blame themselves. If this is the purpose in setting up the board, then it is being set up under false pretences. On the other hand, if it really will view the problems of the industry, if it will view the regional differences and keep the consumers' interest at heart at all times, this board will be of value. I would hope that when this board is established it will act in the interests of all Canadians, and to effect that end it must have representation from all of Canada.

It is also stated in the bill that the head office of the board shall be in the national capital region. I am at a loss to know why bills presented to this house should state definitely by legislation that such boards will be located in the national capital. The obvious inference to be drawn from such a statement in a piece of legislation is that the national capital region is the only part of Canada where any board should be located. And if you doubt the logic of that statement, let me point out that of the 50 existing crown corporations and agencies, 46 are located in the national capital region. Surely, if we are going to talk decentralization in Canada the time to do so is when these bills come before this house. Surely the pertinent portion of the bill could say that the head office is to be designated by the Governor in Council, so that it could be decided outside the scope of legislation itself just where the best place would be to locate the head office.

In this particular instance, in my opinion, there is no particular need to locate the board in the national capital region. There are other areas in Canada where the textile industry is of importance and where a head office could quite appropriately be located. In saying that I am not in any way suggesting that the head office should be located in the Prairies or in western Canada. I am simply saying it could be located in one of a number of other areas of Canada. Especially in this age of computers and of telex and of direct line telephones, with the air line services we have, there is no longer the need of having head offices located in the national capital region. At any rate, I certainly think the committee, when it studies this measure, should give this particular part of the bill due consideration.

The textile industry is admittedly a slow-growing industry which is not in particularly good condition at the present time, but by no means has it been the slowest-growing industry in this country. Between 1964 and 1969 employment in the textile industry has gone up 4 per cent. Compared to that, employment in the agricultural industry has gone down 30 per cent. Agricultural output has been increased by 31 per cent. Compared to that, the output in all other industries has increased only 21 per cent. The per person output in agriculture has increased 67 per cent whereas in other industries it has increased by only 27.5 per cent.

Have we as Canadians looked at and compared all industries when we consider legislation to protect one particular industry?

We have for years protected Canadian industries under tariffs, import restrictions, surtaxes and agreements, and it would appear to me that this bill is designed to give even greater protection to the particular industry with which it deals. But in the interval and particularly at this time we have little or no protection for the most important industry in western Canada and, indeed, one of the most important industries of our country, namely agriculture. Agriculture deals internationally. It is difficult, of course, to have regulations on exports, but if the citizens and consumers of Canada pay a fair and reasonable price for their other products, particularly textile and clothing products, then surely the Canadian people should be and would be prepared to pay a fair price for agricultural commodities consumed in their own country.

Agriculture in the last short while has taken a back seat to our other industries. The drop in the exchange rate reduced the net farm income to the agricultural community by 25 per cent, while the drop in the international wheat agreement cost the industry 20 per cent. Meanwhile, costs of production over the last three years have increased by 21 per cent. It is hard to understand and equally hard to explain to these primary producers why there should be a surcharge of $2 on a shirt. If this board is only a stepping-stone in the formulation of a policy of protection for other industries—and I am sure the shoe industry and other industries will very shortly be at the Government's door asking for similar types of review board—then I think such a review board in looking at other industries in Canada should certainly not forget the industry that is so important to our primary producers of the west. If we are prepared to pay up to 50 per cent import duties plus surtax on products other than agricultural products, then would it be too much to ask for a reasonable two-price system for our own agricultural products? If you talk of $2 on a shirt, could we not talk of $1 on a bushel of wheat, which in turn would mean an extra two cents on the price of a loaf of bread? I am sure this is not too much to ask the people of Canada to pay towards the support of our very important agricultural industry. By doing this we would not be solving all the financial problems, but it would mean an increase of $60 million to $70 million to the coffers of the industry.

In conclusion, let me point out that I consider it to be very important that this board should have regional representation. Let me add that when other boards are being set up, either under this or a similar bill, the primary producers of our country should be considered.

I hope that these arguments will be kept in mind when this bill goes to committee, and when important discussions on tariffs, surtaxes and duties take place in the future.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, may I point out to Senator Benidickson that the chairman of the appropriate committee has made arrangements for the committee to meet on Wednesday morning next. I mention this because the minister is out of the country at the moment, and following next Wednesday he will likely be out of the country on Government business. In view of this situation it was hoped that we could get this bill to committee for consideration on Wednesday next. However, if we leave further debate on the bill until Tuesday night, there is a danger that it might not receive second reading in time for committee consideration on Wednesday. I am aware that Senator Benidickson has strong views on the subject matter of this bill. I wonder if perhaps he could express these views in committee and as well on the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I spoke to the Leader of the Government on this matter a few moments ago. I told him I was not sure that I would be in a position to speak tomorrow. However, when this item appears on our agenda tomorrow I shall have the option of speaking or not speaking.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, before the motion for adjournment is put, Senator Benidickson has informed the house that he has the option of speaking or not speaking to close the debate on second reading of the bill tomorrow. This, of course, comes within our rules.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: It could go on until Tuesday night.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was not controverting the statement made by Senator Benidickson, with which I am in complete agreement, but I would hope that there would be no suggestion that this bill should go to committee before Senator Benidickson has the opportunity of fulfilling an undertaking he gave me that he will answer certain questions before this bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Those questions arise out of a different bill, senator.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, debate adjourned.

PRESS REPORT—QUESTION

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask leave of honourable senators to revert to questions? The reason I ask for that leave, which is rather unusual at this point in our proceedings, is that a matter has come to my attention which involves perhaps the privilege of the whole house. I believe that an early answer would be of some importance to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, my question arises out of a report concerning a bill which is currently before the chamber. I seek the indulgence of the house to make a few brief remarks to explain the purpose of my question, as this is a matter which involves the whole house.

The bill to which I refer is C-215 on which comment has just been made. It is called an Act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments, and so on. The short title is the Textile and Clothing Board Act. Clause 3(1) reads:

> There shall be a Board to be called the Textile and Clothing Board,

My question arises from a report concerning the progress of this bill through Parliament which appeared yesterday, April 20, in the business section of the Toronto Globe and Mail. The report reads in part as follows:

> The Textile and Clothing Board, for which legislation has passed third reading in the Commons, is seen as recognition by the Government of the depressed state of the industry.
> The board, although not legally constituted until the legislation has passed the Senate, has been operating by order in council and has already held two hearings—one on cotton and cotton-blend yarns, the other on the shirt industry. Following complaints of injury from imports in these sectors, the board has made recommendations to the Government based on its findings.

On the surface that statement would appear to infringe on the authority of the Senate. Normally we would expect that a board established under an act would not be established until the act had received royal assent.

I believe there is an explanation of this. I gave notice of my question to the Government Leader only a few minutes ago. My question is: Will the Leader of the Government assure the house that the board mentioned in this newspaper report is not the board referred to in the act, and that a board has not been established by order in council pending the decision of Parliament to establish that board?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, it is true that Senator Grosart mentioned this matter to me a few moments ago. The answer to the question is found in the speech that Senator Cook made when introducing the bill. He recalled that in November last the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the establishment of a Textile and Clothing Board on an interim basis pursuant to section 18 of the Government Organization Act. Therefore, the board set up under that act is not the board contemplated by Clause 3 of this bill.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 11, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) calling the attention of the Senate to the Statement of Conclusions of the Third Working Session of the Constitutional Conference, held at Ottawa, 8th and 9th February, 1971, and tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 11th February, 1971.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, the Honourable John J. Connolly's speech of March 11 last on the conclusions of the third working session of the Constitutional Conference held at Ottawa on February 8 and 9, 1971, produced a deep impression. I personally realized once more how important Senator Connolly's contributions to Canada and to the Senate have been. This former minister, who was for many years Government Leader in the Senate, possesses a most remarkable legal mind, invaluable experience in constitutional matters and clarity, limpidity of expression, all of which he demonstrated again in that brilliant speech. With less skill, less experience, less directness and unfortunately in a more superficial way, I should like to express some thoughts on certain aspects of the third working session, after taking a bird's-eye view of some of the facts of our history, in order to arrive at a better understanding of their cause-effect influence on our present constitutional endeavours. First of all, I believe the meeting was indeed a most fruitful and constructive one. It was also the occasion of the first breach in that barrier of reticence which has often brought participants in such conferences near despair.

I will briefly mention a few relevant facts of our colourful, albeit turbulent history, which have deeply influenced our political thinking.

In the early days of our country, wars of long duration depleted our energies, arrested our development at its start and ruined our first trade relations with European countries. Furthermore, because of France's decision to give preference to the development of Florida and Brazil, in the hope of finding greater wealth in those regions, we were left in the hands of French development companies. France, our mother country at the time, had abandoned us, and, consequently, our development was limited while that of the English colonies in America was proceeding rapidly.

Before the conquest, we experienced four inter-colonial wars: 1689-97, 1701-13, 1740-48 and 1754-60, plus the so-called Fox War from 1728 to 1734. Thus ended New France on which our settlers had so legitimately based their hopes.

This was also the beginning of a new nation, with a new name "Canada", made up initially of some defeated people, exhausted, abandoned by the mother country, and even deprived of their properties, and concerning which Voltaire, with cynicism, in the midst of mocking from the French royal court, said that this was but the abandonment of a few acres of snow without any value. They were not even concerned with the 60,000 good French settlers that they were leaving there. They even failed to recognize the paper currency, in the amount of £41,000,000, used for New France by the French government. The economic situation in France, made worse by the ruinous prodigality and the scandalous corruption of the French court of the time, allowed but the redemption of a very small fraction of this issue of money. Thus, France has remained, since that time, indebted and bound toward our people of French origin. It is worth reminding ourselves that those were our ancestors at the time of the conquest.

[English]

And so when the British took over the country most of them were startled. They had not expected what they saw—a proud, though totally ruined nation but with strongminded, determined citizens.

After the conquest the former French "colons" or the colonials, the Canadians, first came under a 17-year military and unilateral government in which they had no say but for which they had to pay. In 1774 the Canadians were given the Quebec Act, a unilateral offering that gave rights along with the assurance of some protection of their language and religion in accordance with the treaty.

Revolution was then thundering south of the border. Rebellion was breaking out in New England. The decision had been reached to install a freer government here with certain basic freedoms. At last we saw the start of a new prosperity that had been quite unknown up to that time in our country.

Unfortunately, it was a government under an imposed unilateral constitution and it displeased the inhabitants of Canada. To us, so government-minded, it felt like the continuation of a form of autocratic rule by a governor who retained dictatorial powers, and members of a legislative council appointed by him. At the time of the war of the English colonies in America against Britain in 1812, as we know, we were invited directly and indirectly to side with the rebellious Americans.

It is interesting to recall here for instance, that the Gazette, founded in 1774 in Montreal by Benjamin Franklin and first published in French, had the mission of pressuring and stirring us into joining with the Americans in their fight for complete freedom from England. The French colonials, the "colons", refused to join the revolutionary movement, even though France was at that very time openly supporting the rebellious colonies. There has never been a Quebec disloyalty or a failing by Quebecers to this day.

After 17 years under the Quebec Act of 1774 we saw the birth of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, under the Constitutional Act. We became two independent Canadas each, however, under a governor who retained dictatorial powers. The then members of Parliament had only the right to suggest certain laws. At about this time history notes a succession of French constitutions all violently questioned, debated and tried by the people of France who were now constantly speaking of liberty, equality and justice. Then came Napoleon in 1799 with his string of victories in Europe.

May I say here in passing that it has always struck me strangely that the French government, at this very time, was "ridding itself" at a ridiculous price of its interests in the Louisiana and Florida territories.

Thus, in the few years before the birth of Confederation we saw the trying of four constitutions, the secession of the American colonies, an American invasion, the successive declarations of independence of American Latin countries and the abolition of slavery in the south, all of which, as I mentioned before, left their marks on our political thinking. Every nation in which we had an interest was either at war, in revolution, or striving for total independence.

There were basic changes everywhere that invited Canadians to make their own claims. In this light, the troubles of 1838 should scandalize no one. In any event, these troubles could have been avoided by a more practical approach to an earlier, truer and more democratic Canadian Constitution that would have recognized Canada as an associated country rather than as a colony. The political and tactical thinkers of those days made, in my view, costly policy mistakes that are not yet fully rectified. The economic crises of 1815, 1816, 1825, 1836-39, which had created unrest and dissatisfaction, had also left their marks on us.

When the troubles of 1838 became serious, the British Parliament suspended the Constitution of Canada on February 10, 1838. This was to lead to the Union Act of 1840. It created the independence of Upper Canada and the independence of Lower Canada. The legislative union which provided concessions of a federal character towards the French Canadian minority, as it was known, was now to spontaneously function as a federal union. The experience of the union in Canada, which at the beginning was to be unitarian but which later revealed itself as a dual régime requiring a dosage of federalism, made it more easily possible to divide the competences when the preliminary discussions on Confederation took place.

We then came to our present Constitution. It is very far from perfect, but it was then recognized as reasonable. This I would have personally debated if I had been there. It had some flexibility; it did not conflict with individual rights; it took into account the principles and conditions of the treaties that had been made before its enactement; it recognized the presence of the problems caused by the two founding nations; it divided quite equitably, at that time, the powers and fields of activities, even though these were to overlap in too many instances and create the foundation for some of our deep griefs. I honestly believe it should have been more generally democratic, and this could have been at no cost, as the loyalty of the Quebecers had been tested and the loyalty of the others could be assured without doubt.

The Canadian Constitution was primarily and to a large extent based on the 72 resolutions drafted in Quebec City in 1864 by the Fathers of Confederation. It provided for the federal union of the three provinces making up British North America, Canada, which included Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Section 146 of the act provided for the admission in the Union of the Crown colonies of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland on the Atlantic coast and of the united colony of British Columbia on the Pacific coast as well as the vast territory of the Hudson Bay Company in the northwest purchased by Canada for £300,000. Nevertheless, our Constitution thus brings together the responsible government system under a cabinet inherited from England and a Canadian adaptation of federalism as it had been practised in the United States for 80 years—the whole under the aegis of our monarchy. In addition to the original act, in accordance with the English concept, there is another part that some consider as more important and which appears, through historic development, under the form of well-established customs and conventions found in the unwritten provisions of the Constitution. The French concept of law does not accept the inclusion of customs in the Constitution. As for conventions, French requirements are that they should always be legally acceptable in order to be added by consent with enough value to bind constitutionally. Thus, there is definitely a basic divergence in the way we see our Constitution, the practices and conventions related to it and on which it is fundamental to agree as soon as possible. To some, the Constitution represents only a restrictive statement of basic laws and rules used to govern Canada. They say it is not comprehensive. Some do not consider it as a satisfying constitutional document. In its widest sense, we consider that the Constitution includes other laws of the United Kingdom such as the Statute of Westminster of 1931 and orders in council, for instance, those which sought to accept various provinces and territories into Confederation.

Contrary to written constitutions of other countries, the British North America Act does not contain any wide provisions on human rights. Even then, it was a shortcoming that was not recognized. The act nevertheless grants a precise constitutional protection regarding the use of the French and English languages and some special guarantees concerning denominational schools covered by treaties at the time of the conquest. I think we should now make greater provision regarding human rights especially to meet the requirements of the French conception of what a constitution should be.

At the present time, fundamental rights such as freedom of speech, freedom of meeting, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial before jury, and other similar liberties enjoyed by the individual, are not mentioned in the British North America Act either, as it is said according to the English scheme that fundamental rights rather derive from statute law and the common law heritage. It seems that the guarantee of these great liberties should now be also included and incorporated in our new Constitution. The student of French origin and the protester would more readily see in it, as all of us, greater and more binding guarantee and security on the part of our central Government.

However it must be said at this point that eleven years ago these rights were made more secure and were consolidated by the passing of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

The federal Government has often said that it is alone responsible for the administration of external affairs which constitute an integral part of national policies affecting all Canadians. The policy of the federal Government, which the latter emphasizes on every favourable occasion, shows that within the sphere of its jurisdiction this Government tries to promote the interests of the country as a whole, of all the Canadians from various provinces, within the general national context.

With regard to matters of particular interest to the provinces, the Canadian Government stated, again fairly recently, that its policy, in a spirit of co-operative federalism, is to do everything in its power to help them achieve their own aspirations and chosen objectives. The fact remains that, on occasion, rather serious difficulties crop up because our Constitution is not clear and, recently, we have witnessed unpleasant repercussions of this in the relations between Quebec and France. To be valid, an international agreement with a province should require the approval of the central Government, and the latter should refuse it only in cases where there is a major conflict of opinion. Thus, with regard to signing formal international agreements, federal powers and the general conduct of our foreign policy are necessarily involved, if the agreement or treaty initiated by a province is to be legal and operative. This should be kept at a minimum. I feel that this type of relation rests mainly with the central Government whose duty it is to consider them, taking Canada as a whole into account. To my mind, nothing should be ceded that could diminish or weaken the central Government in this field, because we have, there, one of the very requisites and justifications for the existence of a central state.

An important official publication, authorized by the Minister of Justice in February 1965 under the title The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada, sets out the following topics:

a) an outline of the inherent factors in the problem of the constitution;

b) an annotated list of the 14 occasions on which, since 1867, the Parliament of the United Kingdom has amended the British North America Act;

c) a concise account of the continued efforts which were made to work out a satisfactory amendment system for Canada, a subject which was considered on many occasions by the Parliament of Canada, and in a series of conferences and official meetings at the federal-provincial level in 1927, 1935-36, 1950, 1960-61, and 1964 and, more specifically, the text of a draft bill providing for the amendment in Canada of our Constitution, which incorporates the amendment procedure or formula which was unanimously recommended by the conference of attorneys general, and unanimously approved by the conference of premiers in October 1964. This unanimous approval is an indication of the possible scope that our amendments of the Constitution could now take, and ensure their higher flexibility.

Members of the parliamentary committee on the Constitution provided on December 15, 1964, an important outline on many Canadian constitutional problems. This outline is still valid in 1971 in most respects, judging by the evidence given by many participants from my own province in these conferences. Paragraphs C and D read as follows:

(C) The cultural weaknesses of Confederation

1. The texts on the French language are inadequate;

2. The texts on denominational education are not complied with;

3. Federal bureaucratic practice handles Quebec as a colony;

4. Economic practice handles the French-speaking Canadian as a colonial;

5. External policy practice shows only the English aspect of Canada;

6. Practice in the other provinces restricts the mobility of the French-speaking Canadian;

7. Judiciary practice impairs French written law.

(D) The federal weaknesses of Confederation

I quote:

1. It was not agreed upon by all provinces but imposed on several of them;

2. It confers residual powers to the central government instead of to the constituent states;

3. It subordinates the provincial executive to the federal executive;

4. It subordinates the provincial legislative to the federal executive;

5. It subordinates the provincial judiciary to the federal judiciary and executive;

6. It withers and alters the role of the Senate in a confederation;

7. It is inadequate with respect to provincial fiscal powers;

8. It is incomplete because it does not provide for a general declaration of rights to stand against all governments.

After having listed under (E) the basic values of federalism, the statement lists under (F) the significant anti-federalist errors which have been noted and under (G) and (H) indicates the condition for revision procedures and what should be the contents of a revised Constitution. I merely want to recommend its reading up to the page on constitutional revision to anyone doing research on the matter. This 1964 statement is most useful in establishing the position of each and every one involved and it could advantageously be revived in 1971 in a most constructive manner for all the participants.

[English]

The conference in its recent communique agreed that the federal Government and the provinces should proceed as quickly as possible to patriate the Constitution with an appropriate amending formula that would be applicable entirely within Canada. They also agreed to effect other remedial changes as soon as possible. This new approach, in my mind, provides a great breakthrough. Because of it there should now be less chance of a deadlock, and, if it is our wish, it will enable us to have a sovereign Constitution that will fulfil the ideals and the aims of all Canadians.

The formula whereby there can be amendments of concern to Canada as a whole plus one or more but not all provinces appears to me, in the present circumstances, justifiable. I am sure it will open up many interesting avenues where general solutions previously appeared unobtainable.

It is not easy to solve language rights problems where there is a disparate use of more than one language over an immense territory. Honourable Senator Connolly mentioned some important recommendations made in the Bilingual and Bicultural Commission Report on the question of languages. I, too, recently spoke on the language problems in Quebec. My own views are clear. They remain unchanged. They go unreservedly along with the B and B recommendations. Therefore I shall not repeat myself.

Travelling as I do, I am always fascinated by the culture and knowledge that multilingual nations provide to those around them. Such nations have more often than not shown evident general superiority which, I am sure, is a direct result of their added culture and knowledge. Canadians should strive to achieve these very important advantages and these internal peace-builders. To promote the learning of two languages in Canada could never be considered a mistake, either from a social, political or economic point of view. Moreover, now that we have language laboratories that make the studying of any language much easier than in the past, it seems a shame that any Canadian would advocate unilingualism for his sons and daughters—our Canadians—who would then miss the great, universal advantages of bilingualism and the knowledge that two cultures can provide. It would give Canada as a nation a distinct and most usable superiority of culture and knowledge and a relationship to the greater part of the world, and these things would bear their fruit in the many economic advantages that would derive from the greater knowledge of the peoples of all countries.

The United Republic of Soviet Russia comprises 15 republics speaking more than 15 official languages and 92 different dialects. Each republic has at least two official languages of its own as well as Byelo Russian, or the White Russian language, as it is called. I am informed that when they meet together to discuss their problems they use Byelo Russian. Although not everyone is conversant with it, it enables the majority to communicate and understand one another.

An analogous situation exists even in Germany, where there are seven or eight current dialects.

The point is that such multilingualism has not created troubles for these countries, and, in fact, has passed quite unnoticed by foreigners. Furthermore, there are many countries of Europe, Latin America, Asia and Africa where two or more languages are learned and spoken because it is the practical thing to do and has the further advantage of providing additional culture.

We should recognize the true cultural values existing in the world today and realize that the price of learning another language is small indeed for our sons and daughters.

I would suggest to you that to anyone who has travelled the world over it is obvious how much advantage can be derived from a second language. I disagree entirely with the current trend in the Province of Quebec towards unilingualism. Such a trend is destructive and negative and is cultivated mostly by revenge-seekers.

As I have said here on other occasions, I remain deeply concerned about the help unilingualism is receiving even from such an unlikely source as the Quebec authorities. And I say that advisedly because the Government of Quebec has recently announced a policy for French as the working language in industry. That is a negative, retrograde step for Quebecers. Quebec will be hurt economically by its own political stand on that. There is no doubt that the province will be the loser industrially and, even more unfortunately, culturally.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I for one will combat with all my strength all such retrograde policies which would limit our culture and knowledge to one language. We should rightfully fear in a young country like Canada any disintegration of mutually advantageous communications between Canadians.

It was agreed at the third session of the conference that the existence and independence of the Supreme Court of Canada should be entrenched in the Constitution. The conference further recognized the importance of provincial participation in the processing of its equitable candidates for appointment to our courts.

I unreservedly approve these suggested amendments. I already have expressed my views on the optional use of languages in the courts and in court procedures. I hope the optional use will be assured in our new Constitution; otherwise, how could we claim that there is equality among us?

The appointment of our judges through such provincial participation in the choice of candidates will constitute, in my view, an important step forward.

So far as I am concerned I believe the formula of provincial participation in the choice of our senators can also be applied in the consideration of candidates for the Senate. In a true federation, in a real and recognized democracy, the provinces should indeed be a party to the choice of senators who have a duty, for instance, to protect minorities and to defend their rights. The Senate would then, in my view, meet with more general approval everywhere in our modern democratic society.

The Constitution, I agree, will have to include a recognition of the importance of equality of opportunity for all Canadians. It is a basic universal, individual right, and its full recognition should prevent any misconception on the part of our old or our new Canadians. In my view the third session of the conference is indeed right in its suggestion that the preamble should state that one objective of Confederation is the social, economic and cultural development along with the general welfare and equality of opportunity for all, whatever region they may live in. I agree with these high-sounding words, principles and suggestions that in the body of the Constitution there should be such a statement of obligation on all governments, federal and provincial, "to promote the equality of opportunity for all, to ensure that public services of reasonable quality will be available to individual citizens and to promote economic development, which will reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities of individual Canadians wherever they live."

The voice, the conscience of the nation is speaking here. The conference is thus taking, as is desired, a true humanitarian and just position vis-à-vis the internal relationship of all the constituent members of the Canadian nation. All, to be sure, will want to implement such positive entrenchment in the Constitution and will recognize in it the goal towards a truly just society in words as well as in meaning as the transcendent objective for all its subjects.

The recognition of the importance of the role of intergovernmental consultation and co-operation in the effective working of Canadian federalism, in the mechanism of federal-provincial relations, such as is advocated, would again contribute to better relationships between the individual provinces and the federal Government. This would be a needed revision of our internal relationships that heretofore remained controversial. Many of our common problems, through the role of such intergovernmental exposures, would find quicker and better solutions. It will make the Constitution much more flexible and more operative. I am, of course, in full agreement with these constructive views.

In modernizing the Constitution, there should in my view be a wider and more profound study of our respective taxation systems. For instance, we should discuss and settle the borrowed emergency taxation powers that have now become permanent taxation avenues for the federal Government. Many years ago, in 1918 I believe, the federal Government started to use direct taxation through an emergency loan from the provinces of direct taxation rights belonging up to that time to the provinces. I am informed that this has long since expired. It is one of the powers that the federal Government keeps, as far as I know, against the directive of the Constitution and without an apparent continuing consent on the part of the provinces. It may be that there is now actually a taxing arrangement or a tax policy or even an established precedent, but I am of the opinion that it is not in any instance in agreement with the words of the present Constitution. The necessary amendment is now overdue. If we are to retain in Ottawa the use of this method of taxation, which I believe is presently necessary, then constitutional confirming authority should be incorporated in our charter.

The district of Bedford in the Eastern Townships is now represented in the Senate by the honourable Senator Beaubien. One of his predecessors, the late Honourable Jacob Nicol of Sherbrooke, a former provincial treasurer of the Province of Quebec, a member of the now defunct Legislative Council of Quebec, and at the same time a senator, once declared in this very chamber that when the federal Government borrows taxation powers from provinces because of emergencies and does not return them after the emergencies have passed, as originally agreed, the federal Government in reality is guilty of stealing what does not belong to it. A general clarification and revision of our taxation avenues for municipal, federal and provincial governments will have to be undertaken to clarify a general confusion that has not helped our federal-provincial relationships.

Each one of us has to recognize that when the Constitution was written in 1867 the needs were different, the facilities were different. The population was small and decentralized, and there were fewer participating minorities involved. Transport and communications were not comparable; radio and television, the satellite, and community cables were not in existence. Telephone and telegraph companies did not perform sophisticated duties as sidelines, and computers were not in use and could not dig into the private lives of each of us and store private information concerning all Canadians. Pollution of the air, land and waters had not to be considered provincially, nationally or internationally. The concept of welfare and dole had not replaced personal charities and had not become the octopus it now is. There was no air, bus or freight transport as we now know it. There was no fear of foreign control, and education had not outgrown its britches. But now all these are here and, in the opinion of many Canadians and indeed in my opinion, they are unconstitutionally dealt with in some cases. There is much confusion in many fields that are claimed to be of provincial or federal interest. National patriotism has now become meaningless and void. There should be ways of making the national charter more meaningful, warmer and more universally protective for Canadians.

Economically there are approved basic considerations for justifying constructive changes. Farmers now represent a negligible percentage of the population. Cities have grown immeasurably and the whole educational system with its thousands of school boards should be regionalized, reduced in number, reformed and fully streamlined, first at the level of federal powers to enable the federal Government to have a voice in education, and so on down the line.

Municipalities and provinces must be allocated wider fields of taxation and guaranteed greater administrative powers through the Constitution. Ways of curtailing the immensity of the Canadian debt that one day must be repaid have to be found, if we do not wish to leave a bankrupt Canada as the heritage of our youth.

I seriously advocate constitutional ceilings of debt in federal, provincial and municipal fields. Debts should be restricted to a per capita basis which cannot legally and constitutionally be exceeded by any government under any normal circumstances, and there must be consideration given to the true value of our changing money base, its deflated or inflated value.

Whether we like it or not within the next five decades it will be necessary to think of Montreal and Toronto as cities with populations of six million or even more, if the computers are correct. These cities—and there are likely to be others equally important—will require more elaborate and more complex administrations with far greater powers for their government and management. We shall have to consider what will have to be done when our rural population becomes less than 10 per cent of the total population.

Honourable senators recently saw the confusion resulting from dislocation of the work of federal, provincial and municipal police. Co-ordination appeared hardly possible because of the rivalry which existed between the forces and the way in which each operated. With the increase in population in decades to follow the whole concept of protective security must be reviewed and redetermined constitutionally. There is now a need for an auxiliary police force to meet unforeseen contingencies, and there will have to be a super-national security force with adequate authority, able to meet the challenges posed by any internal adversaries or enemies of our nation in whatever province those challenges may arise. At present Canada has a most questionable arrangement to ensure the mass protection of its citizens. It is quite remarkable and surprising that up until now we have been able to manage so well and for so long.

I should like to pay homage to the Fathers of Confederation for having given Canada the best governmental structure to be found anywhere. To this day its equal cannot be found elsewhere, and I am always proud to hear our American friends rave about our governmental structure, and refer to its superiority over their own.

Yesterday the media reported that rumours had leaked from the Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada that a recommendation by at least four of its members would be that the monarchy be dropped from the Canadian Constitution. Statements were made yesterday by certain members that no consideration was at present being given to such a recommendation. Last night the first strong warning was issued against such a move. Personally, I could not care less if we called the Prime Minister Mr. President, as I have heard suggested a few times. It would not change things very much, and it could be an innovation.

However, as I view the world I wonder if prime ministers do not command more respect in their respective countries at the present time than do presidents in theirs. My personal view is that our system of being an associated country, having royal representation, such as exists in Canada, acting on behalf of the Canadian people, has some very high intrinsic value. Canada would lose something important in the actual mechanism of Government. I do not think our system can be replaced by just changing the title of Prime Minister to that of the President. There has never been any embarrassment arising from the existence of our royal representation, but I can see that there would be embarrassment without it.

From my study of the Constitution and in tabulating all that was brought forth as being wrong about it, I have not found the monarchy to be a truly major objection. I would hate to think that we would recommend such changes merely because of the current trend to change generally. There should be adequate major reason for making a basic innovation and we should fully recognize its value to Canada.

I believe, however, that there may be important reasons for streamlining, improving and making our official representation even more useful and helpful to Canada in our non-political relationships with countries all over the world. There is no longer even the semblance of a reason for carrying on such visits with the old-fashioned pomp and fabulous costs that once were a must, a ritual, a kind of necessary protocol to follow. There is no need in a country of 20 million people to send along battleships or ceremonial troops to impress or make known our unbalanced extravagances. I do not believe our royal representatives ever required this. I believe it was the making of someone in authority in our establishment who was still following an undeserved age pattern, and arranging such expensive stage settings in accordance with ancient customs, which I would agree should be completely changed in these days. The royal representatives of the Queen of Canada should not be made to show that they are there beyond our means.

We must not content ourselves with a few amendments to the Canadian Constitution merely to elucidate some points. Our history shows that our Constitution has never really worked very well because it is still imperfect. A complete revision of our guiding principles in governmental life and in our federal-provincial relations should be considered in a practical way, if Canada is to remain what it is with all its advantages and if further development and prosperity is to be made possible. On account of the history of our Constitution, of the protest movements that have grown around it, it is important that our new or updated Constitution should meet adequately the desires, ideals and objectives of the participants, if we really want to admit that they are participants. Nothing less, I believe, will really satisfy the particular aspirations of the provinces and their citizens. One can find in the arguments of the separatist movement the bitterest criticisms against our Canadian Constitution, criticisms which find an echo among many excellent citizens working against the separatist movement. Of course, consideration and correction of our unrest are still at the basis of the success of the Canadian constitutional conferences. As for me, I have faith in our continuous Canadian unity and our brilliant Canadian future. I believe in an intelligent consideration of our problems and in reasonable means of solving them. In short, I believe everybody is aware of the need for a strong and a prosperous central government that could always reflect the glory of this nation throughout the world and make our Canadian star shine. I realize that there are not many provinces ready to participate in that to the prejudice of the new aims conceived by their governments in the interest of greater provincial prosperity, which is finally also that of the Canadian nation.

[English]

To avoid shocks, I believe revisions of our Constitution should be initiated and its study reactivated every five years, such review to last as long as required for deciding any necessary amendments. The mandatory or obligatory enactment of any approved proposals should then be required to be made a part of the Constitution itself every seven years. This should create an appropriate constant evolution of our constitutional guidelines, and it would avoid strains, even hardships in certain circumstances, on its participating members. It could equally avoid erosion of good communication and understanding between its participating members and evade provocative rigidity and intransigence in our constitutional guidelines.

The work of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada in the last few months should be commended here. Although some have debated the work of such a committee, I believe it is through this committee that Canadians as individuals, as associations, as patriotic, militant organizations, as critics, and as economists are expressing themselves and making known their views and recommendations in their own way. It is the forum of Canadians. To be sure, its great importance in this instance must be underlined, and it is even to some a buffer and a counterpart to provincial or federal governmental establishment representations.

When the committee went to Sherbrooke quite recently a small group, a very small minority of those present before the committee, created some tumult and uneasiness. As a Sherbrooker, I want here to apologize for the behaviour of that turbulent few. They did not represent anyone or any organization, nor did they offer any constructive criticism to the joint committee on the Constitution. They made no contribution to Canada, to their province, to their cause, or the joint committee. Although they had been provided there with a wonderful opportunity to express their constitutional views and their criticism in a constructive way, they refused to take advantage of these facilities to present a positive brief of what they thought their Constitution should be, and limited themselves to insulting, crude remarks and negative approaches to our problems.

Here is how a separatist commentator, using TV channel 7 in Sherbrooke, commented a few days after the disgraceful events, and it shows now how slanted their ways of thinking are:

> How could we bring these members of Parliament and senators on this committee to realize that for a number of Quebecers they are six or eight years late? How could we tell those spokesmen for Ottawa that as soon as the first bomb exploded in Montreal they should have come to Quebecers to talk constitution? How could we tell these politicians that when the first separatist movement, the RIN, was born and when a man like Pierre Bourgault emerged, they should have visited all the towns of the province of Quebec, from the smallest to the biggest, to beg Quebecers to rewrite the Constitution? How could we tell them that on a not too distant day, Quebecers will prove to them that instead of buying time they have lost their time in constitutional conferences and that they will never be able to regain this lost time? How could we tell them all this if not by resorting to the means used by several people from Sherbrooke, Monday night last? The highlight of this meeting was undoubtedly that some people in Sherbrooke finally dared to stand up and tell the members and senators on this venerable committee that they are not engaged in amending the Constitution but rather in performing its autopsy. Those people stood up and told the venerable committee that since they had accepted the proclamation of the War Measures Act, they are not trustworthy any more. They stood up and told the members of this venerable committee that all Confederation gave them was simply poverty and unemployment and they do not want to hear any more about it; this denotes a rather rude awakening and awareness, I do not deny it, but it is indispensable if these people want to regain their dignity and their pride as men, as citizens of Sherbrooke, as Quebecers.
> Finally, the cool welcome extended to the constitutional committee demonstrated that the times when we confined to the attic our poorer relatives when we had visitors from Ottawa are long gone.

[English]

On the present thinking of many Quebecers, here is what Mr. Marcel Faribault, a nationwide recognized constitutional authority, had to say recently:

> It will be difficult to find elsewhere than in Canada a more flagrant and more constant violation of all the principles of federalism. It is why a new Constitution or a deeply modified Constitution must provide a new text and new institutions.

I believe we must see the real challenge to all of us who want to keep Canada intact. I do not believe we should be insincere, or delay unduly the adding of approved amendments to our Constitution. I do not believe we should be afraid of strong, basic, constructive new additions and bold objective approaches, and far-reaching changes for the betterment of our country. Many Canadians have all the wisdom and foresight to give Canada a lasting, equitable and just Constitution.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Manning debate adjourned.

SCIENCE POLICY

CONSIDERATION OF VOLUME I OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 25, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Lamontagne, calling the attention of the Senate to Volume I of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Lamontagne should speak now instead of the honourable Senator McDonald?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Honourable senators, at the very beginning of my remarks I must ask for your indulgence, because I shall have to impose on you another long speech. Unfortunately, I must make it today because I will have no other opportunity in the near future to participate in this debate on Volume I of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

Honourable senators, by rising to participate in this debate on Volume I of the report of the Senate Committee on Science Policy, I would like to say first of all how pleased I am to be sitting here again after a lengthy absence due to illness and a convalescence longer than foreseen. Also I would like to most sincerely thank all the honourable senators who were kind enough to get in touch with me either verbally or in writing during my convalescence and who sent me their wishes for a speedy recovery. Finally, I wish to express again all my gratitude to my committee colleagues who, during a long inquiry, did their best to achieve a common objective, and I would like to congratulate particularly those who have made a contribution to this debate. I have, of course, taken due note of the congratulations extended to me but I have, above all, read most carefully the very appropriate remarks made about the nature and the contents of Volume I of our report.

I am sure that one of the first objectives of the Senate in launching this public inquiry into the Canadian science policy was precisely to bring about a debate on this subject and at least to attenuate the many solitudes which existed within our scientific community. I am now in a position to say that this objective has been reached and that, from several testimonies I have received from abroad, a number of countries envy us for having innovated at least in this field. This debate has forced several of our scientists and technologists to develop a political conscience which they did not have previously and a group of parliamentarians to seriously ponder over science, technology and innovation, those phenomena as mysterious as the human spirit and yet which will have a crucial importance on the evolution not only of this country but also of this planet.

[Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux.]

[English]

Before the content of Volume I took a precise form, I had serious reservations about publishing it separately and without the committee's recommendations. I have now no hesitation in saying that it was a good idea. I was also afraid that a volume of this kind on such a complex topic and containing no concrete proposals would receive very little attention indeed by the public, whom we were seeking to involve in this collective exercise of reflection and reconstruction. Here again I was pleasantly surprised. I cannot claim, of course, that this volume has received as much publicity as the Senate report on the mass media. In this respect, at least, we were clearly not in the same league.

Our first volume, however, has been widely covered by the media and for this I wish to express the committee's gratitude, especially to Canadian science writers who have done a superb job of reporting and who have successfully met the challenge of a difficult assignment on very short notice. Science Forum has devoted almost its entire April issue to the discussion of our report.

The March-April issue of Canadian Research and Development has done the same job. ACFAS, the French Canadian association for the advancement of science—and several other learned societies, including those representing the Canadian economists and the Canadian humanists, will also be discussing our report at their annual meetings in May or June.

My colleagues and I have received several hundreds of oral and written communications from individuals and highly representative national organizations. Our scientific and technological community has already held numerous public meetings—and probably more private ones—to review our findings. Thus, the interval between the publication of our critical views on the past and present and the presentation of our recommendations will have served a most useful purpose and will set a more appropriate stage for the major job of reconstruction which still lies ahead.

On the whole, I am very pleased by the reaction caused by our critical findings up to now. I would say that about 90 per cent of that reaction was favourable and strongly supported the themes and the conclusions that we pesented in Volume I. I will not bother you with a long series of quotations to illustrate this statement. I will use only one which, in my view, is typical of that overwhelming favourable reaction. It comes from Dr. Donald S. Scott who is professor of chemical engineering at the University of Waterloo, and it appeared in the April issue of Science Forum. Dr. Scott, speaking on behalf of his association, of which he is the vice-president, wrote:

> The Canadian Society for Chemical Engineering considers that the first volume of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy could be a milestone in the development of a rational approach by the Canadian Government to technological and economic planning. The analysis of the development of science and technology in Canada presented in the report is accurate and the conclusions drawn by the commit> tee from the evidence are, in our opinion, beyond dispute. It has been evident to those engaged in technology (as distinct from pure science) that Canada does not have a policy for science and technology, but only a partial and inadequate plan which is largely restricted to pure science. We will not repeat the arguments in support of this conclusion, as they are concisely presented and well documented in the committee's report.

I could, as I said before, give you a long list of similar quotations but they would merely confirm that on the whole the committee's critical analysis has detected the major weaknesses of the present Canadian approach to problems of science, technology and innovation and has clearly demonstrated the need in the future for an overall science policy in Canada.

Since we have been accused of leaving the impression that our country was the only one which had such a need, I shall also quote a letter received recently from the general manager of research and planning of an important Australian company. In this letter he says:

> I am not in the habit of writing to senators, but I agree so entirely with your philosophy of applied research that I feel obliged to write to you.
> I control a research organization with approximately six hundred people in this company and for several years have been advocating the theory that applied research can exist without a large involvement in pure research. Resulting from this philosophy we now have a research organization which is innovating strongly and interacting very effectively with production. Our research people, who are both engineers and scientists, draw widely from worldwide pure research in a most effective way. Five years ago when I took this position the majority were interested in pure research. Now they are equally enthusiastic to contribute to this company's activities through applied research, and in general they are happier people from feeling that they are making a real contribution.
> I was also interested in your opinions because I am actively involved with the Australian Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization. CSIRO tends to be orientated in much the same way as the NRC, and a few of us have been attempting to influence CSIRO towards a new outlook on applied research much as appears to be described in your report. There is no doubt that your report will have a great influence in this matter.

Honourable senators, at this stage I could merely report progress and sit down, for the simple reason that the committee ought to be satisfied to have received such general support for its work and should proceed to complete it along the lines already indicated in Volume I and so widely accepted by interested groups and individuals in Canada. Such a procedure, however, would not be satisfactory to me, because it would ignore the 10 per cent, those who have been critical of the report. It would be contemptuous to ignore these criticisms, which came almost entirely from the pure scientists in universities and the Government sectors, and illogical on my part to do so, since one of our major objectives in launching this operation was precisely to initiate and sustain a debate on this vital and complex issue.

I must say that the tone and the substance of the criticisms have surprised me, especially since they came mainly from pure scientists who are trained in their professional search for truth to be more rational and objective than they have been on this occasion. For instance, we have been accused of being unfair to Dr. Steacie and to have attempted to destroy his reputation. This of course is nonsense!

We have said in our report that he was an "internationally known and greatly respected scientist." I had the great privilege of meeting Dr. Steacie personally and I know that he was also a great humanist. He certainly made an essential contribution in helping to produce in Canada a growing number of pure scientists. These aspects of Dr. Steacie's qualities and services are clearly indicated in our report, and I am sure that Canadians will always be grateful to him for what he did in this respect. However, and unfortunately, no human being is perfect, and our committee, whose main responsibility is to look at the formulation and the organization of science policy, had to examine Dr. Steacie's role as a science administrator and co-ordinator, since he was not only a scientist but also the President of NRC and in that capacity in those years he was directly responsible for the administration of a complex of testing and industrial laboratories. He was ex-officio the Government's main advisor on the whole spectrum of science policy, and he was Chairman of the Advisory Panel for Scientific Policy charged with the responsibility for co-ordinating all government scientific activities. But Dr. Steacie did not believe in a specialized training for engineers, he put a low priority on industrial research and development activities and he was against administration and co-ordination. He admitted it himself and we merely quoted his own statements to that effect. According to our information, the advisory panel on co-ordination very seldom met while he was its chairman. As science administrator, advisor and co-ordinator, Dr. Steacie kept the attitudes and the priorities that he had developed as a pure scientist, and what we did as a committee was to conclude that this was the wrong approach to follow for an overall science policy which cannot be limited to the support of fundamental research but which should also respond effectively to economic and social objectives.

I believe—and this is confirmed by many of his former associates—that Dr. Steacie was realistic enough to agree with that conclusion, if he were still living today. Therefore I believe that we have treated Dr. Steacie fairly as the great scientist he was but also as a man who detested administrative directives and co-ordination mechanisms and who feared that the Canadian science effort could be distorted if it became too much involved in practical missions.

A few scientists expressed strong opposition to our report and, surprisingly enough, their reaction was much more emotional than scientific. According to press reports Dr. McTaggart-Cowan, a well-known public servant, described Volume I as, "wrong, dreary, hopeless and a literary disaster". The Leader of the Official Opposition in the other place could keep this quotation in his files and use it in his comments on the next Speech from the Throne. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition in this place could do the same.

Hon. Mr. Smith: They originated it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was probably taken from a speech of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I had always been under the impression even at the beginning of my long academic career that scientists did not use such language, at least in public, when talking about a serious matter. Moreover, since I contributed to the writing of the English version of the report, I was sorry to learn that my English style was a disaster. I might decide with my colleagues of the committee to release Volume II only in French. Then Dr. McTaggart-Cowan might accuse me of using "joual" which would at least give me some support in certain separatist circles in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That would be something new.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Some other attacks were made, more moderate in their language but which were also rather sterile and difficult to deal with because they were not accompanied by any real attempt at substantiation. I will mention only three of them just as illustrations, and because they are fairly representative of the vocal minority. They came from Dr. Herzberg, an NRC physicist, Dr. Gunning, a professor of chemistry, and Dr. Reuber, a professor of economics at the University of Western Ontario. Dr. Herzberg of NRC has said that:

> —the senators perhaps do not understand science or scientists and they certainly do not understand how scientists work or how science is organized.

Dr. Gunning, head of the Department of Chemistry at the University of Alberta, expressed the same view in almost similar terms:

> The Senate report falls into all too many parochialisms that scientists associate with the great mass of scientifically illiterate politicians. The present Senate committee undoubtedly knows a great deal about economic theory, but its insight into science and scientists leaves very much to be desired. And, as usual, the void of ignorance is filled with prejudice.

I wonder why these two great scientists did not even bother to appear before the committee. Perhaps their presentation would have contributed to reduce our scientific illiteracy and to fill our void of ignorance, or perhaps what they expect from the illiterate politician is not understanding but more funds.

I would like finally to quote Dr. Grant Reuber, a professor of economics at the University of Western Ontario. He says:

> In several ways, I find (the report) a simplistic and tendentious document. I think that it is somewhat lacking in perspective, that it draws a number of unwarranted conclusions about past performance, that it too uncritically accepts current conventional clichés about science and that it is weak in its analysis.

Professor Reuber, in his capacity as past-president of the Canadian Economics Association, appeared before our committee. I wish he had read again the brief submitted to us by his association and himself before writing these comments about our report. He might have been less olympian and more humble.

I will not dwell on this type of sterile criticism because there was so little of it. I did want to refer to it, however, to show that this is not the way to engage in an intelligent and useful debate on science policy and that those who pursue this line of criticism can do a lot of damage not only to their colleagues but to the cause they are trying to serve. Criticism which appears to be only the reflex response of a vested interest, or the primitive but all too human response of preserving the status quo, and preventing change at all cost, will find little support by a public, which more and more perceives that there are only two alternatives in the face of today's exponentially growing number of problems: change by the organized wit of man, or change eventually wrought by chaos and anarchy.

The criticism brought to bear on the problems of Canadian science policy must be coloured, I believe, by a thoughtful and humble appreciation of the contemporary human predicament, as well as being based on the study of the growing literature concerning science policy. I say this only because if the debate were not to extend in the direction of a thoughtful dialogue, we, as politicians, could use pretty strong and immoderate language too, and this would provoke a serious misunderstanding which would prevent the partnership between the scientist, the engineer, the technologist and the politician, to which we refer in our report as an essential relationship if we want to develop a balanced and dynamic science effort in Canada. As far as I am concerned, as chairman of the committee, I am satisfied that we did not use such language in our report and that we attempted to substantiate to the best of our knowledge our critical analysis.

Before I come to the more serious criticisms which have been made against the report, I should like to comment on another point, raised by Dr. Gunning, and which is basic to the whole discussion on science policy. Dr. Gunning, in his article published in the April issue of Science Forum, comments with a sarcastic tone on the distinction made in our report between the search for scientific discovery which we described as being contemplative and passive and the search for new technology which is creative and active.

Dr. Gunning adds with his sarcastic tone, "The foregoing (distinction) is important since it illustrates the level of understanding of science that the committee has acquired after three years of hearings and deliberations." I would be tempted to use the same sarcastic tone and to say that if Dr. Gunning refuses to accept this distinction, he has also a lot to learn yet about the theory of knowledge.

I still maintain what all experts since Aristotle have asserted, that the two intellectual processes leading to a scientific discovery and to a technological innovation are quite different. Moreover, the distinction between the two in my view, and I think in the view of the members of the committee, is basic to a proper formulation of a realistic science policy. The purpose of science and the task of the scientist are to take reality as it is and to discover the laws which explain the behaviour of man and nature. This explains why the scientist must be passive and contemplative if he is to observe and explain new phenomena, but this methodological attitude does not make basic research inferior as a human activity, as Dr. Gunning apparently believes we consider it to be. On the contrary, in my view, basic research and scientific discovery is the noblest human endeavour which requires freedom to attain excellence. At the other end of the spectrum of science activities, the search for new technology is based on man's innovative genius and its purpose is to change reality. It is creative and active because it is essentially an agent of change and it cannot be left uncontrolled because it can have, as we all realize now, great beneficial effects but also a tremendous negative impact on man, society and nature.

I hope that, on reflection, Dr. Gunning will accept these distinctions as meaningful and will understand the important implications they have for science policy. The Government, as the guardian of the public interest, cannot accept the application of the premises of the Republic of Science to the search for new technology and innovation. On the other hand, if it were to apply a strategy appropriate for the development of new technology to basic research, it would be the end of the Republic of Science so cherished by Dr. Gunning.

If these distinctions made in our report had been more seriously considered by our critics, a good deal of misunderstanding could have been avoided. It is not our fault if internationally accepted definitions of science policy cover basic science, technology and innovation. These definitions are justified because these three different types of activity are more or less related to each other, but even politicians can understand that they should not be subjected to the same government strategy and the same kind of supervision. Thus the approach that we recommend to sustain our whole science effort is pluralistic, not simplistic as Dr. Gunning contends.

At the beginning of our inquiry there was much confusion about this broad concept of science policy. Engineers told us, for instance, that they were not scientists and therefore they were not concerned with science policy. When scientists heard about science policy, they immediately thought that "the Russians are coming" and that if such a policy were to be formulated systematically they would inevitably be subjected to regimentation and lose their freedom. I was under the impression that these confusions had disappeared after the views that several members of the committee expressed in public and as a result of the publication of Volume I.

In the report, for instance, we did not express any opposition to the freedom that the concept of the Republic of Science implies for the pure scientist. But we said: "It is when the concept of the Republic of Science is proposed as a general strategy for the organization of the national R & D effort that it becomes completely unacceptable."

We also referred to Polanyi's description of the Republic of Science as a system in which "each scientist keeps making the best contribution of which he is capable and on which no one can improve," and we stated that when such a condition is met, "most people would agree that the scientist should be left completely free, within certain financial limits, to determine his own activities." We went on to say: "Excellence is so rare that it must remain free." In other words, while we are opposed to uncontrolled grantsmanship, we firmly believe in the freedom for real scholarship.

To me, this is a clear and straightforward statement. Yet, Dr. Herzberg, who is a very distinguished scientist, after having read the report, had this to say:

> It is the thought of a centralized structure... that so frightens the scientists, since they are only too aware that no country in the world has been able to reconcile successfully a vital and creative science with bureaucratic centralization... If the senators think that politicians should have a hand in scientific decisions and the control of scientific laboratories, they only invite disaster as far as the development of science in Canada is concerned.

How can Dr. Herzberg raise this false issue after he had read what I have just quoted from the report: "Excellence is so rare that it must remain free."

Dr. Herzberg also quotes the British Council for Scientific Policy which stated in its first report:

> Science policy does not direct the advance of scientific knowledge, though it may well be concerned to encourage or to direct the application of the results of scientific advances. The tasks of science policy are of another kind: to maintain the environment necessary for scientific discovery; to ensure the provision of a sufficient share of the total national resources; to ensure that there is balance between fields and that others are not avoidably neglected; to provide opportunities for interfertilization between fields and between the scientific programs of nations.

Dr. Herzberg approves this quotation but then adds: "I fear that the senators would not agree with this definition." I do not really know what is the basis for his fear. Personally, and I am sure that I speak for all members of the committee, I fully agree with the definition given by the British Council for Scientific Policy. In addition, I share Dr. Herzberg's concern about the fasionable search for major science programs and his faith in what is usually called "little science".

We made it clear in our report that such major programs had not been too successful in Canada in the past. Thus, I fail to see any real disagreement between the committee and Dr. Herzberg on how pure scientists and basic research should be treated within the framework of a pluralistic strategy for science, technology and innovation. Perhaps, on reflection, he might come to the conclusion that senators do understand science better than he thought at first and that the misconceptions which appear so clearly in his critical analysis of our report probably originate from the fact that he does not understand senators too well.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He would not be the only one.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I can assure Dr. Herzberg that the communist ideology of bureaucratic and central control over the activities of the pure scientist, if it exists in the Soviet Union, will not originate in Canada from the Senate.

I would like now to deal with the critical analysis of our report as presented by Professor Reuber. Honourable senators will recall his olympian condemnation which I have already quoted. Of the seven pages of comment that he wrote, he devotes two pages to the different purposes served by science activities, and while he uses a slightly different terminology his observations are very similar to those contained in the committee's report. It is probably not here, therefore, that our report was "lacking in perspective" and "weak in its analysis".

Further on, Professor Reuber makes a point which intrigued me very much. He says:

> A whole chapter on Canadian science in international perspective at some points seems to imply that we should duplicate the pattern followed elsewhere. This makes no more sense than to argue that the pattern of Canadian production and trade should duplicate that in other countries.

This is where, in Professor Reuber's view, the report "is most deficient".

Surely Professor Reuber does not suggest here that in the committee's views Canada should duplicate the R & D projects and programs which are being carried out elsewhere. This, of course, would be nonsense. It goes without saying, although Professor Reuber says it, that Canada should, like any other country, apply the principle of comparative advantage and select those R & D programs which correspond to our capacity, ability and needs. The whole purpose of chapter 6 was to show precisely that, as compared with most other countries, Canada had not organized her national science effort along these lines and that our failure to do so explained to a large extent the poor output of our R & D activities in terms of our economic and social goals. In that chapter the committee described the rising R & D budgets in the developed countries as an international scientific and technological race aimed more and more at promoting innovation and economic growth. We showed, with the figures provided by OECD, that Canada was lagging in that race and that the organization and distribution of our national effort, as compared with those of other countries, were not conducive to the maximization of our international comparative advantage, since our R & D activities were, in relative terms, too much concentrated on research in universities and government laboratories rather than on development work in industry. We underlined exactly the same point that Professor Reuber emphasized and yet, according to him, it is precisely in this respect that our report "is most defective". I cannot see how our country can apply the principle of comparative advantage in this competitive international race otherwise than by adjusting the common pattern prevailing in the most innovative societies to our capacity, our ability and our needs. Thus, this criticism made by Professor Reuber is either misleading or unjustified.

In the last section of his critical analysis, Dr. Reuber raises five issues which deserve some mention. First, he refers to the committee's observation about the relatively low support given to the social sciences and he says: "The report suggests that this is inadequate, and I agree." Therefore, on this first point he is in agreement with the report.

Secondly, he mentions our suggestion to funnel "more science activity through industry" and he adds: "In general I agree with this approach, provided that in the process, the broader external effects of scientific endeavour are not lost sight of."

Thirdly, he raises "the question of pure versus applied research". He states: "And it may well be, as the report implies, that the present level of pure research in Canada could now support a much larger volume of applied research." Thus, he agrees with us again on this third point. He goes on to say: "But it does not follow that the appropriate policy is to increase applied research by reducing the scale of pure research." I want to emphasize here that the committee has not suggested this method of establishing a more balanced effort, as Dr. Reuber seems to imply.

Fourthly, he admits that our report "does provide us with figures which indicate that during the 1960's Canada devoted fewer resources to all areas of science than any other major industrial country with the exception of Belgium," but he complains that the report "says relatively little" about that issue. What else can you say about it except to recommend that Canada's total effort should be increased, but it was not the purpose of Volume I to make recommendations.

Finally, Dr. Reuber raises the question of centralization versus decentralization as systems for formulating science policy. He says: "No one disputes the need for greater co-ordination and general direction about broad priorities from the centre. At the same time, I think it is essential that specific science activities be subjected to detailed examination in the light of the particular needs of government agencies, universities and business enterprises." Then he claims that in the report these two systems "seem to be posed as alternatives, which I believe is wrong". This proves that Dr. Reuber is confused, to say the least. We have said repeatedly that an overall science policy and specific science policies should not be considered as alternative but as complementary systems. In the last chapter of the report, we stated on page 281:

> It must be emphasized again that the role of an overall science policy, like that of a macro-economic policy, is not to replace specific policies but to support them with a basic framework, broad terms of reference and criteria to assess their efficiency.

If Professor Reuber had read our report carefully, he would have seen that our approach to science policy "instead of relying on a single channel, ... is based on a variety of methods and allows for 'buffers' between the government and the researcher."

Thus, on the five issues raised by Professor Reuber, he agrees with us on three of them. On the two others, he repeats the substance of our views but distorts or ignores them in order to appear to disagree. I am tempted to apply to his memorandum what he said about our report and to conclude "that it is weak in its analysis."

I could go on and point out irrelevant criticisms made by others, but I will mention only an additional one because it concerns the Science Council. A group of biologists said in their response to our report as it appeared in the journal Science Forum:

> The virtual dismissal of the Science Council as a body operating in a vacuum, out of touch with the realities of the problem of science policy, seems also, to us, an immoderate condemnation.

This is, again I am sorry to say, another distortion of our report. We never said that the council was "out of touch with the realities of the problem of science policy". This is a pure invention. We asserted, however, that the council was operating in a vacuum, but this assertion was based on Dr. Solandt's own admission when he told us: "There is no use in the Science Council making recommendations, if nothing happens." The context in which we made that comment that the council was operating in a vacuum clearly shows, as it appears at page 184, that our criticism was not addressed to the council but to the inefficient government machinery designed to deal with the council's recommendations.

I want, finally, to deal with the accusation that our report is wrong and inaccurate, as Dr. McTaggart-Cowan has asserted, "filled with prejudice" according to Dr. Gunning, that it "is in the nature of special pleading" and that it leads "the general public and all the news media to believe that it represents a fair and objective statement of Canadian science," as Dr. Herzberg has said.

It is not true to say that the committee tried to give the impression that we were presenting a fair and objective statement of Canadian science. As a matter of fact, we said very little of Canadian science in the sense that Dr. Herzberg defines it. According to our terms of reference, our purpose was to study science policy in its broadest sense, not Canadian science. We made this very clear in the first chapter when we said:

> The report is not designed to provide a detailed or even a broad picture of the science activities and programs of government departments and agencies. A detailed description of these operations is contained in the committee's proceedings—As to the broader picture, it has been provided by the OECD report on Canada, and that is still valid.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: That is the basic erroneous idea that was picked up.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Well, it is there at page 15 of our report. Our critics, I assume, did not see this statement.

What we were expected to do and what we did was to consider the development of Canadian science policy, the evolution of the government central machinery for its formulation, the results of that policy as considered in a broad international perspective and as perceived by those Canadians who appeared before us. This was really the essence of our mandate.

I will not argue that the history of science policy in Canada which is presented in Volume I is complete. As a matter of fact, we had to bring a draft of 700 pages to about 100 pages. But, as a broad picture of the different stages of that history, nobody has shown to me yet that our report is not a fair and objective statement. It shows that the main objective assigned to science policy since 1916, which was to promote technological development in industry, has never really been attained, that we have failed during the last five decades to develop an overall science policy and an effective central machinery for the formulation, implementation and evaluation of such a policy, that successive Canadian governments had abdicated their responsibility in this field and that as a result we have had in Canada a hidden policy or a policy by accident. These are the main themes of our historical review, and I challenge anyone to refute these statements. These findings were revelations for many Canadians and that is why at a press conference I described our first volume as a "shock treatment".

We attempted to substantiate these conclusions and their consequences in three ways. First, we considered three programs related to nuclear energy, military aircraft development, and computer technology. A few pure scientists have criticized us for our selectivity and for showing a partial picture of Canadian science. I would remind them that these cases are all related mainly to technology and innovation, not to basic science. We did not even try in our report to appraise the results and the performance of fundamental research in Canada. Perhaps we should have attempted this operation and estimated the number of Canadian prize winners, the number of Nobel prizes that we have in Canada, and estimated the number of articles published by Canadian scientists in internationally renowned journals, and so on. But we did not do that because of the complexity of the operation, and mainly because our mandate was to study science policy in the light of its assigned mission, which was, as I have said before, to help promote technological development in industry.

Within this perspective, basic research may be an important ingredient in the long sequence leading to innovation but it is not the end result of that process and cannot provide a tangible basis for appraising the success or failure of that policy, whose main aim was to promote technological development in industry. Thus, the pure scientists can accuse us of not having attempted to evaluate the quality of their work but not of having presented case studies throwing a bad light on their scientific reputation, because we did not.

Nor would we wish to infer that the work of thousands of Canadian engineers and technologists has not been creditable and of great value to this country. Again, what we looked at was science policy in Canada, and in cases where, for almost 50 years, certain policies and outlooks have been promoted on the claim that they would produce economic growth through industrial innovation, we could not avoid the simple criterion of success. The great British parliamentarian Edmund Burke, born in Dublin like Senator Grosart, called success: The only infallible criterion of wisdom to vulgar judgments.

We justified our selection of the three technological programs previously mentioned as follows:

> Nuclear energy and military aircraft have been selected because they were the two major initiatives taken by the government in the 1950s; the computer technology was on a smaller scale but demonstrates much the same lesson.

Nobody can deny that the first two programs—namely, nuclear energy and military aircraft—were the two main programs of a technological character undertaken during the postwar period. We never pretended, as Dr. Herzberg and others seem to imply, that Canada was the only country to make mistakes in this field of high technology; on the contrary, we said:

> Other power reactors in the western world have also experienced difficulties, but this is little consolation to Canadians.

Later on we asserted that:

> Most other western countries were in the same position,

In analyzing these cases, our purpose was to show—and the context made that very clear—that after having seriously neglected our industrial innovation potential, and without an effective central control machinery for science policy, the Government could not rely on industry to make Canada self-sufficient in the sector of fabulous technology. And we concluded our analysis of these cases by saying:

> ...the first major government attempt to promote R & D in Canadian industry had failed to a large extent, except when government contracts had been used within the framework of our sharing arrangements with the United States.

Who can seriously reject this conclusion as applied to the conditions and the experiences we went through during the 1950s?

We could have presented a much longer list of mistakes and failures based on the evidence before us, if we had wanted to. But our purpose was—and I repeat it, because apparently it has not been understood by our critics—not to present a complete list of all the failures and successes of Canadian science and technology. Our purpose was to discuss science policy. We did, however, refer to the immense contribution made by the Department of Agriculture to the opening of the West, and we did present a list of successful inventions made in Canada, as Appendix 2 of Chapter 6 of the report. I readily admit that this list, based on J. J. Brown's book Ideas in Exile, is also far from being complete, but there are a number of others contained in our proceedings which are available for everyone to read.

I must stress that the committee clearly instructed every department and agency of the federal Government to include in its brief, detailed case histories of what it considered to be its most notable success stories, whether in the field of fundamental research, applied research or development. We placed no limitation on the nature or extent of these requested success stories, and we published them all exactly as we received them. The only limitation was the suggestion that each agency should limit its success stories to 15 in number, a rather liberal restriction. In other words, the committee played the role of impresario in being the agent through which government departments and agencies, as well as organizations in the other sectors, could place on the public record their own story of their successes. This is the first time in Canada that such an opportunity has been opened for the detailed documentation of the successes of Canadian science and technology. The committee did not ignore Canadian successes; if any valid criticism in this area were warranted, it might be based on the premise that objectivity might be endangered because we published organizational autobiographies in which successes could be freely described by those who claimed them.

Secondly, our findings also prove to be right when the main components of our national science effort are compared with those of other advanced countries. As I said before, these comparisons show that Canada stands not only behind but aside from the international scientific and technological race. Moreover, when we compare our output in terms of patents and innovative success, again we find that our performance has been very poor and that our science policy has failed to develop innovation in industry, which up to now has been its main ultimate objective.

Thirdly, the core of the evidence presented to us by representatives of the public and the private sectors also supports our conclusions. We have been accused of having made a misleading presentation of that evidence and of having quoted people out of context. To my knowledge, these accusations have not been substantiated. Of course, we could not in 100 pages adequately cover more than 10,000 pages of evidence. But I submit that we duly warned the readers about this in the opening paragraphs of Chapter 7. We said:

> It is not the committee's intention to sum up the descriptive content of the briefs. The OECD report on Canada's national science policy contains a recent and comprehensive description of the R & D activities and duties of government institutions and a general account of conditions prevailing in Canadian universities and industries, and there is no need to duplicate that effort.

We went on to assert:

> It is important to extract from our proceedings the criticisms and constructive proposals we have received from Canadian individuals and organizations most directly concerned with national science activities and policy. This review of the evidence > may appear to over-emphasize the criticisms. The committee wish to underline again that its mandate is precisely to detect the weaknesses of the Canadian situation and try to correct them.

I contend that the criticisms and suggestions that we quoted in our report were a fair and balanced sample of the views which were presented to us.

One criticism of the report surprised me so much that I almost forgot to mention it. It came from Dr. Goldak, associate professor of engineering at Carleton University, who wrote an article in Science Forum entitled: "The major weaknesses: failure to emphasize technology's importance." He claimed that unfortunately we did not recognize that "the fundamental failure of Canadian science policy has been our inability to transmute knowledge into marketable products and processes." When I read this comment I came close to agreeing with Dr. McTaggart-Cowan when he said that our report was "a literary disaster".

Honourable senators, I am sorry that in this long speech I have not been able to refer to all our critics. Perhaps there will be other occasions to analyze their comments. Before I resume my seat, at this late hour, I still have some additional remarks to make.

At the end of his article in Science Forum, having described us as "scientifically illiterate politicians", Dr. Gunning says:

> Let us hope that when our government moves toward major reforms in our science policy structure, one of its first actions will be to call together the best scientific, technical and political brains in the country for consultation. And when I use the term "scientist," I mean practising scientists at the forefront of their field.

My first question to Dr. Gunning is: where were these practising scientists when our committee, through its hearings, sought to consult them? Were there some among the representatives of the 40 universities who appeared before us? If so, what were their specific recommendations regarding major reforms in our science policy structure? If they were not there, either they were not very interested in consultation with parliamentarians or they did not have much to contribute in terms of reforms. They still have an excellent opportunity, however, during the present public debate, to put forward concrete and positive proposals to improve present conditions. If Dr. Gunning's article and others that I have reviewed here were to be interpreted as the positive contribution that "practising scientists" can make to reform, I doubt if it would be worthwhile for the Government to consult with them.

Apart from the vindictiveness that Dr. Gunning shows in his article, the only positive statement he makes is that "basic science is the foundation of any meaningful national science effort." I agree with this proposition, but I do not find it very original since it has been stated repeatedly in our country since 1916. Meanwhile, as we contend in our report, we have forgotten in Canada to erect the building and, as Dr. Gunning says, "A foundation is not a building". But his article shows that he does not have too many ideas on how we should erect the building, after we have worked for 50 years to build the foundation.

As a matter of fact, the whole tenure of Volume I can be described as a plea to erect the building without destroying the foundation. Those few "practising scientists" who have exhibited violent and emotional reactions to our report have contributed little to this vital task. If that reaction were typical—and fortunately it is not—then I would share Professor Donald Scott's pessimism when he says on behalf of the Canadian Society for Chemical Engineering:

> There is a real and very probable danger that the present furor about science policy may become just the current contribution of this particular decade to the preservation of the status quo.

But Professor Scott and his association do not need to worry. As I said at the outset, more than 90 per cent of those who have expressed their views about the report fully support our message. And that message in its essence is very simple indeed. We must now proceed to erect the building so that our national science effort will be in a better position to serve the public interest and to solve our mounting economic and social problems. To achieve this we need in Canada not only a series of specific science policies but also a coherent overall science policy with a proper central machinery to define its targets and strategies. This message is now accepted by the vast majority of the scientific and technological community in Canada, even by many pure scientists. For instance, a highly representative group of biologists have stated:

> We agree that there is a need for greater support of good research and innovation and accept that a rational overall science policy could contribute to achieving selected national goals.

Again I repeat that this is the essence of the message that Volume I was designed to convey.

Finally, I want to say that I am in complete agreement with the Science Forum's editorial written by Dr. Bachynski, a well-known physicist. I hope that honourable senators will allow me in these closing remarks to quote extensively from his article because I think that it is quite important especially for the immediate future. Dr. Bachynski said:

> There is considerable validity to much of the criticism of Canadian science and technology contained in the first volume of the report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy...There is little to be gained and much effort to be wasted on bickering and defensive rationalization of past decisions. We should view Volume I of the Lamontagne report as the last of the various 'hindsight' studies. Armed now with the experiences resulting from the 'old' wisdom and the ideas of the 'new' wisdom, we should realize that the time is overdue for the implementation of national policies and programs that will enable science and technology better to serve the economic, cultural and social needs of > Canadians. A necessary step must be a reversal of our current attitudes of retrenchment if we are indeed to look ahead...Volume I of the Lamontagne report is thus a milestone—a time to stop looking backward, and a time to proceed with constructive action.

This is precisely what the committee intends to do in its Volume II. Unfortunately, its publication will be delayed as a result of my illness, because on my doctor's orders I have been unable to work on it since the publication of Volume I last December. A good deal of the preparatory work has been done but I am afraid that it will take a few months yet before this second volume can be released. So far as I am concerned, I am now in a position to devote most of my time during the next few months to the completion of the work. I will try to find with my colleagues a method by which perhaps we could be authorized by the Senate to release the report as soon as it is ready, even if our chamber is not sitting at that time. I am certainly not an expert on our own rules and I do not know if that can be done.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Senator Grosart will let us know

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Such a method would enable us to avoid unnecessary delays. A great number of people, including the Government, are anxiously awaiting our recommendations.

Meanwhile, I hope that the Canadian scientific and technological community will follow Dr. Bachynski's advice and use this period not "on bickering and defensive rationalization of the past," but to put forward constructive proposals when, as he says, "the times thus cry out for leadership and statesmanship in Canadian science." There will always be a small minority in our scientific community reacting negatively to preserve the status quo, but my colleagues and I invite the vast majority of that community to join with us in our attempt to build a better future for science, technology and innovation in our country and to chart, as Dr. Bachynski says, "the course that science policy will take in Canada."

Prayers.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 27, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PACIFIC AREA STUDY—PROGRESS REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Aird: Honourable senators, the Easter recess has provided a valuable opportunity for stocktaking and planning in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I would like to take a few minutes now to bring the chamber up to date on the progress and the outlook of our committee's Pacific inquiry.

In line with the pattern of our Caribbean study, the committee has proceeded with an in-depth examination of the varied aspects of Canada's relations with the Pacific countries. It is no great confession to say that none of us on the committee has found this an easy task. The area is so vast and complex that a clear focus is only obtained very gradually. However, I believe that this is now happening as a result of sustained effort by the committee and excellent contributions by our witnesses.

I must pay tribute to our members. They have maintained their interest throughout, and our meetings have been consistently well attended, with wide participation. In addition, the committee and its compact staff have continued to work as an effective and cohesive team from the outset of the inquiry.

Once again it has appeared that the committee can serve a special role as a continuing forum for discussion of particular aspects of Canada's foreign relations. Once again this continuing dialogue has been of value in updating and assessing contemporary Canadian thinking and, hopefully, formulating proposals for action. On the whole, then, I am sure that all committee members feel justified in our original initiative in undertaking this specific inquiry.

It seems particularly appropriate to comment on this study at this time in view of the dramatic developments taking place in the foreign relations of the People's Republic of China. I need hardly recite the events in question. They have been a source of daily fascination for most Canadians and for others all around the world. Obviously it is not yet possible to be certain of the full meaning of these happenings, but it seems clear that there are some new grounds for optimism about China's place in the world.

To Canadians, and to the Western world generally, the means chosen for signalling these changes may seem strange. It appears, however, that great significance is given to these gestures and to the subtle nuances that they convey. It seems safe to say that China's leaders are opening up their vast country to the view of the West and are permitting and, in fact, encouraging expanded people-to-people contacts. A ready response should be forthcoming. It is my view that through this kind of contact—that is to say, people-to-people contact—communication and mutual understanding can be best advanced, and the most durable base laid for future relationships on a wider scale.

The members of our committee are all aware of the need for greater knowledge and understanding of the countries of East Asia. This has been one of the main objectives of our hearings to date. In particular, the committee benefited considerably from the insight of two Canadian experts who are now revisiting Peking. Mr. Mark Gayn, chief of the Asia Bureau of the Toronto Star, appeared last November, and Mr. Chester Ronning was heard at the end of February. I commend the proceedings of these two meetings to all honourable senators. They give a great deal of perspective to these recent events.

Naturally, our concentration in the committee has been largely on Canadian relations with the countries of the Pacific. In recent days I think it has become apparent that, in dealing with China, Canada is still in an exceptionally good position because, in fact, the lines of communication have never been completely closed. Canada and China have for years engaged in mutually beneficial trade, and journalists have been exchanged.

In this context I might mention particularly the first-rate coverage maintained over the years by Mr. Norman Webster and his predecessors of the Peking Bureau of the Toronto Globe and Mail. I have here this morning's edition, under Mr. Webster's by-line, which I call to your attention, "Life's Not So Bad in Peking." It is a most interesting article.

The successful conclusions of negotiations for diplomatic recognition clearly involved significant Canadian initiative and example, which a number of other nations are following. The recent appointment of the respective ambassadors testifies to the continuing importance attached to Canadian-Chinese relations by both governments.

Honourable senators, it is not unlikely that Canada will serve again to break new ground in widening western relations with China. I believe that we should willingly undertake this role which could have major implications for East-West understanding.

At the same time, Canadians should never overlook the established fact of our healthy bilateral relationships with the People's Republic. Canadian rapport with that country has built historic friendships, brought about by the patient effort of successive Canadian governments and many dedicated individuals. In the trade field, Canada's hard-won place in the Chinese market is a standing tribute to a number of men—and I would single out Senator McNamara and his Wheat Board colleagues in particular.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Honourable senators, as China's relationships with other western countries expand, we will presumably have to meet increasing competition in a number of fields. I do believe that Chinese memories are long and that the pioneering efforts of these Canadians will stand us in good stead as China's economy grows and prospers.

In addition to the current excitement about China, it must be stressed that there are other areas of comparable interest and concern to our committee. Japan, of course, has been a major focus of our deliberations. That country is rapidly becoming an economic super-power and is already Canada's third largest market. We have learned that Japan is undergoing a number of fundamental social changes but it is obvious that it will continue to be a predominant factor in Pacific affairs generally.

Like the rest of the world, our committee has been trying to analyze Japan's "economic miracle". I think we have all been most impressed and have learned a great deal from the workings of "Japan Incorporated". One of our witnesses claimed that the source of this dynamic record finds its origin in what he labelled the "Avis complex". I can assure you that our committee will also be much concerned with recommending ways in which Canada—our country—can "try harder".

At the other end of the western Pacific Rim the committee is vitally concerned with Australasia. Australia, as few people realize, is already Canada's largest overseas market for fully manufactured products. It shares many of our concerns in international economic relations. With New Zealand it is sure to occupy a place of growing importance in our overall foreign relations.

Between these geographical extremes there remains a wide range of countries at different levels of development with diverse types of relationships with Canada. It is here that the committee will be directing its attention in the near future, with a special view to assessing Canada's potential contribution to development co-operation.

We have already had a detailed introduction to Indonesia, another substantial and growing Pacific power. This and other developing countries of the area will be studied further in planned meetings with representatives of CUSO and CIDA in the next few weeks. Once again, I am sure, the committee will adopt a comprehensive approach to development questions—as it endeavoured to do in the Caribbean study.

[Hon. Mr. Aird.]

In conclusion, I am pleased to report that the Pacific inquiry appears to be progressing in a reasonably satisfactory manner. As I said earlier, a focus has now been established and we should soon be able to turn our attention to formulating conclusions and recommendations. I am hopeful that these findings, based on the accumulating evidence, will form a constructive critique and useful supplement to the government policy paper referred to us by the Senate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, my remarks will be brief. I wish merely to suggest that the time to make a comprehensive comment on the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is not now. It will come when the report appears. That will be when the committee finishes its deliberations on the problems generally described as the problems of the Pacific Rim.

I think it would be appropriate at this time to emphasize, for the benefit not only of this chamber but of the public at large, the importance of the contribution being made by Senator Aird and his committee to this vital aspect of our national life.

In past years the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs could have been used effectively to achieve important benefits for Parliament and for Canada. It has always had that potential. But because of Senator Aird's dynamism and energy that committee now has a new look and a new vitality. I think it bodes well for the future as to the kind of work the Senate can do, particularly in this field. There are many people in this house who are interested in foreign affairs. We have senators who belong to and regularly attend meetings of the Canada-United States Parliamentary Organization, the Commonwealth Parliamentary Organization, the NATO Parliamentarians, and the IPU and the UN. There is a great deal of capacity and know-how in the Senate and, indeed, a great deal of sophistication which can be brought to bear upon Canada's international relations. I think the vehicle through which this can be done most effectively is being exploited successfully by Senator Aird. We owe him much for having taken the initiative and having done so much in this regard.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not forget the work of the Deputy Chairman, Senator Grosart, who has been most interested in this and has supplemented the work of Senator Aird. Nor do I forget the very able staff available to the committee.

We are fortunate indeed in having the calibre of witnesses before us in our study of the Pacific Rim that Senator Aird has made avilable to us. Those who have attended the meetings of the committee feel gratified, I am sure, that the witnesses heard in committee were experts on the subjects which they undertook to discuss for our benefit.

This is a good committee. It is well run and is not attempting to be pretentious. It may not have some of the public appeal that other committees have, but it is doing a job which I consider to be fundamental. It is important to Parliament that it should continue to do that job.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I agree with what Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has said and the assessment he has made of the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I join with him in congratulating the members of that committee, and in particular the chairman, for the work they have done in their examination of Canadian-Caribbean relations and their current examination of our relations with the Pacific Rim.

I thought I should participate in this debate for a few moments, not only because of the fact that as a former Secretary of State for External Affairs I would be expected to have an interest, but also because in the absence of my colleague, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is in Europe at the present time, I act in that capacity. So, on behalf of my colleague, as acting minister I should like to say that the Government considers that parliamentary committees such as this serve a valuable purpose. In the long period of time that I have been in Parliament there has been an outstanding complaint, sometimes justified, that the Government did not provide enough opportunity for the discussion of foreign affairs. Certainly when I was Secretary of State for External Affairs it was a charge often levelled against me as minister.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is it valid?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There was a valid excuse on most occasions. An excuse that can be offered by governments, frequently legitimate, is that today the Government's program is so heavy that it is not easy to find time in the other place for discussion on foreign affairs. It may not always be a justifiable excuse, but generally it is. However, in this chamber that excuse is not open to any one of us. It is not open to the Government, nor is it open to any individual senator. Since becoming a member of the Senate I have felt that one of the opportunities available to us is in constituting ourselves as a forum for the discussion of public issues both domestic and foreign. We have an opportunity that is not open to private members in the other place in either the domestic or foreign affairs field.

This does not mean that we have to resolve questions by vote every time an issue is raised. That is not the most effective way of settling a foreign policy question, but it is valuable in a free society that there be discussion of foreign affairs as a means of obtaining information, promoting self-enlightenment, trying to influence government policy, and participating generally in the great decisions affecting the world at the present time.

We therefore owe Senator Aird much thanks for initiating a foreign policy discussion today. It need not be only on the particular report he has launched. Perhaps it could be open to him and to other senators from time to time to take advantage of the Senate and to debate matters of importance and concern in this field. There are many questions that could be discussed: our relations with the Middle East and problems affecting that area. Canada has a concern in such problems. Our interest in what is happening at Helsinki and Vienna regarding the strategic arms conference might also be a subject for discussion. We may not be a member of that body, but as a member of the 18-power commission on disarmament in Geneva we have a vital interest. What do we think about that kind of question?

Therefore I take advantage of this opportunity to suggest that regardless of the experience any one of us may have in a particular area—and all of us have had experience in one field or another—we owe it to our country to participate in public discussion of these matters, and there is no more available official public forum in Canada than the Senate. There is no upper house in the world that has the opportunity for discussion of these matters that we have.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Except the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Even in the House of Lords there are limitations. Although they have a good deal of discussion on foreign problems, as can be ascertained from an examination of their debates, they do have rules which are not as generous as those available to us.

An Hon. Senator: And they keep them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Aird has directed our attention to recent events evolving particularly in Asia, including the quiet diplomacy of a group of ping pong players from a certain North American country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you very good at that game?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is part of a development which, as Senator Aird has said, gives ground for encouragement that our outward looking policy may be developing. We have recently established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China. This is an official stamp of approval on what has taken place during the past few days, and one which we hope is an indication of greater collaboration between that part of Asia and the rest of the world.

We say to the People's Republic of China that we recognize that this is a two-way street involving action not only by the Republic of China but also by other countries.

As Senator Aird has mentioned, we have as a member of this chamber Senator McNamara who, I suppose, has had more experience with commercial China than any other man in this country. I doubt whether many in the world, apart from those in some Asian countries, have had as much experience with the People's Republic of China as has Senator McNamara. I know of no greater service that he can render Canada at this time than in giving us the benefit of his rich experience as it affects past and future relations.

Senator Aird mentioned our relations with Japan. He referred to Japan as our third trading partner. It has been our second trading partner. The volume of trade between Japan and Canada has risen considerably since the end of the Second World War. In 1963 the total volume of trade between Japan and Canada amounted to $600 million. Today it is approaching the $2 billion mark, which is a forceful indication of the increase in our commercial relations with that country.

Much of this increase is due to the combined efforts of Canadian businessmen and governments, regardless of party.

Ministerial meetings set up by former Prime Minister Diefenbaker as a result of arrangements made with Prime Minister Ikeda of Japan, have not only given Canadian and Japanese ministers an opportunity of exchanging views on foreign policy questions, as Senator Hays well knows, but has enabled trade and finance ministers to discuss policies calculated to improve trade between our two countries.

Japan has a special relationship with Canada. The fact that she has been a constant market for Canadian wheat is, as Senator McNamara knows, part of the uniqueness of her relations with us. Japan is a member of the OECD together with Canada and other countries. This gives us a substantial bond which we enjoy with Western countries in the OECD, including Japan.

Japan is vitally concerned in other problems of mutual interest. I had word the other day from Mr. Maurice Strong, who was appointed by the Secretary General of the United Nations to prepare for the World Conference in 1972 on the problem of world environment. Japan has a serious problem, as have all the developed countries. The exchanges that have taken place between Mr. Strong and Japan, exchanges somewhat the same as the exchange of views between his organization and Canada and other countries, may play an important part in the outcome of the environment conference which will take place at Stockholm in 1972.

I suggest to Senator Aird that this aspect of the problem, while it has a worldwide dimension, might be of very special interest in the study of Canada and her relations with Asia. So I say to Senator Aird that we welcome this report which he has made today; we welcome the opportunity that it affords to initiate a discussion on a wide front of our relations with other countries. Many senators attend various international conferences, as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has emphasized. A meeting with our opposite numbers in the United States, members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, will take place shortly. These are valuable meetings, as Senator O'Leary reminds us, but so are these other meetings.

Senator Molson has given notice today of his intention to report on his work as an observer at a recent meeting of the Council of Europe, an organization designed to promote unity among the nations of Europe. While we are not members of that organization, we have a serious interest in the outcome of its work. It will be valuable to hear, as we will from Senator Molson, not only of his direct experience but the impressions which that visit has given him, and to hear his views of common market developments. Surely there is no question that is more important in terms of our future trading relations than what will happen when Britain enters a common market in Europe, if she does. How will that affect us in the short and in the long term? I do not suppose that there is any more important question for us in economic terms than what that kind of enlarged common market will mean to a country such as Canada, which enjoys the geographic propinquity that we have with the large North American market at our doorstep to the south. These are vital questions which we discuss in our boardrooms, which we discuss in the universities and which we should not hesitate to discuss in the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is my intention to move the adjournment of the debate. I regret that I was not present to hear the chairman of the committee begin his report. I was attending a meeting sponsored by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association with His Excellency the High Commissioner for Trinidad and Tobago.

Honourable senators will be interested to hear that His Excellency gave it as his impression that the Government Leader, Senator Martin, may have recovered the ball after the colossal fumble of the Government with respect to the Caribbean sugar agreement. He was highly laudatory of the accomplishments of Senator Martin on his recent trip to the Caribbean, and indicated that he may have come back with that fumbled ball. I think he deserves our congratulations for that.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Molson has asked me to remind you that he has scheduled a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for Thursday, May 6. During the past session there have been several suggestions with respect to possible changes in our rules, and Senator Molson is anxious to have a good attendance at this meeting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will the Government Leader promise not to attend, so that the committee can decide freely?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am not in humour for that today; I cannot be in good humour all the time.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook for the second reading of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, as it is the wish of the Government Leader that this item be referred to a committee today and I am not prepared to proceed, I yield my place on the Order Paper.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Cook speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing this debate.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, we have had a good debate and as a result we are all much better informed on the subject matter before us. We are particularly indebted to Senator Blois, who speaks with the knowledge gained from a lifetime of experience in the textile industry. Whenever Senator Blois speaks he makes a valuable contribution to any debate. Without dealing in detail with his remarks, which are still fresh in our minds, I would say that it is good to remind ourselves of the value of the textile industry during wartime. This point, in my opinion, stresses the fact that it is of great importance to all countries that everything reasonably possible should be done to ensure that all types of industry are encouraged to continue to operate. If our textile industry, or any other industry, ceases to function, we may well see the day when Canada has cause to regret our failure to take the proper steps to keep the industry alive and active.

We are also indebted to Senator Sparrow for his constructive contribution, which I am sure will receive the close consideration of the Government. While I shall make further reference to Senator Sparrow's objections, I would at this point merely say that I welcome his sensible suggestion that it is not necessary that the office of the board be in the national capital region. If the Government does agree with Senator Sparrow, I would strongly urge upon the minister the fact that there are vast areas of suitable real estate in my Province of Newfoundland and Labrador which may be acquired at a very reasonable price, and upon which a desirable headquarters for the board may be erected.

Honourable senators, this bill seeks to assist in the solving of a national problem. Unfortunately, this is an area where the Government is damned if it acts, and damned if it does not. Those who support all measures that will encourage free and freer trade will be troubled by the bill, while those who argue for a reasonable degree of protection will welcome it.

This bill is, of course, enabling legislation. Before any action may be taken, each case must be thoroughly examined on its own merits. After all interested parties have been heard and the tribunal reports that in its considered judgment sound reasons exist which warrant action, then and only then will the Government decide what should and will be done. In so deciding the Government will also give serious consideration to, and review the five aspects of, the problem to which I referred when introducing the bill. To refresh your memories, these five aspects are:

(1) Canada's international obligations; (2) The interests of our own consumers; (3) The employment factor; (4) The conditions prevailing in international trade; and (5) Action will only be taken to assist lines of production which can and will in due course become viable.

Therefore, to those who worry because they fear Canada has turned away from the desirable objective of encouraging freer trade between all nations, I say that the walls of Jericho have not yet fallen. Canada's trade policies have not changed. To support this statement I refer to a release issued yesterday. The release deals with the speech of the minister delivered to 300 German financial, business and industrial leaders at a luncheon in Bonn on Monday, April 19, 1971, which reads:

> Mr. Pepin said Canadian prosperity is very much dependent on a liberal international trading environment. He said: "This fact is reflected in our trade policies. We are obstinate proponents of freer trade on a multilateral basis."

In view of this very clear statement of the Government's policy no doubt many of the fears of Senator Sparrow, and of the many others who do not welcome the bill, will be set at rest. This bill does not mean we have abandoned the goal of freer trade. I have quoted the minister's recent statement to that effect. It does mean, however, that suitable steps will be taken and reasonable guidelines established to prevent our own markets from being unfairly and improperly exploited. The only result of such exploitation is that Canadian capital will be lost, industries that may be urgently needed in times of emergency will disappear and, most important of all, tens of thousands of Canadian men and women will not obtain gainful employment. To prevent these things happening, the Government must act, and this bill will give the Government the necessary power to act. If the Government does not use these powers wisely and well, then Parliament can intervene, and in the final result the voters of Canada will have the last word.

If the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. At the committee's hearings I understand that the minister and representatives of the department will be available to answer the numerous questions that have been touched on during this debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

JURY DUTY

INELIGIBILITY OF QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND WOMEN—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the honourable Senator Casgrain calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland women are not called for jury duty.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this order is standing in my name. I had already spoken to the part that was initiated by Senator Fergusson. I would normally have suggested that perhaps the matter should be taken off the Order Paper now. But I suppose it would be better not to do that until Senator Casgrain is in her place. For that reason, I ask that this matter stand until Tuesday next.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, there are several other items that we had hoped to be able to proceed with today. Information is being sought in respect of one of them by an honourable senator. As is well known, many honourable senators are attending the meetings in Quebec of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada. This explains why two other items are not being dealt with today.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 27, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 27, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45 (1) (a), that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, April 28, 1971, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might offer a word of explanation. Bill C-218, which is commonly referred to as the "Bail Reform Bill," has been referred to this committee. The Honourable John Turner, the Minister of Justice, has been conducting constitutional discussions with some of the provincial premiers across the country, and will be available tomorrow afternoon to appear before our committee. That is why we are asking leave to sit tomorrow at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (h):

That the name of the honourable Senator Grosart be substituted for that of the honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

LEASE AGREEMENTS FOR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WAREHOUSES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Thomas J. Kickham inquired of the Government pursuant to notice:

1. On what date was a lease agreement entered into between the Department of Transport at Charlottetown, P.E.I., and the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company for space accommodation in the Government frost-proof warehouse at Georgetown, P.E.I., and on what date was it terminated?

2. What was the amount charged per cubic foot of accommodation; what was the total amount paid by Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company; and to whom was payment made?

3. On what date was a lease agreement entered into between the Department of Transport at Charlottetown, P.E.I, and Biroid of Canada for space accommodation in the Government frost-proof warehouse at Georgetown, P.E.I, and on what date was it terminated?

4. What was the amount charged per cubit foot of accommodation; what was the total amount paid by Biroid of Canada; and to whom was payment made?

5. Are producers of perishable farm products entitled to priority in leasing space over producers of non-perishable goods in Federal Government frost-proof warehouses in P.E.I.?

Hon. Paul Martin: Answered.

1. Entered into February 1, 1970 and terminated January 31, 1971.

2. Six cents per square foot of shed space occupied per month; one cent per square foot of outside open area occupied per month; lease also provided for payment of utility charges and applicable wharfage and berthage rates in accordance with Government Wharves Regulations. Total amount paid for period February 1, 1970 to January 31, 1971—$12,005.13. Payment by cheque payable to the Receiver General of Canada and delivered to appropriate officers of the Department of Transport.

3. Entered into February 1, 1970 and terminated September 30, 1970.

4. Six cents per square foot per month, total amount of rental paid for period February 1, 1970 to September 30, 1970—$2,025. Payment by cheque payable to the Receiver General of Canada and delivered to appropriate officers of the Department of Transport.

5. No. The Department endeavours to give some preference to potato shippers at Georgetown, as at other similar ports in P.E.I., but the general public also has a right to request and be given the use of space in the sheds.

Supplementary Information to Question 1:

A new lease arrangement is in effect with Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Ltd. effective February 1, 1971 for a term or period of two years for space in the Georgetown shed and for an open area on wharf property.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

MOTION FOR STUDY BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Earl Hastings moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs examine and report on the operation and administration of the Criminal Records Act, chapter 40 of the statutes of 1969-70, and in particular upon the operation and administration of subsection (2) of section 4 thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, in addressing myself to the motion and in explaining my motive for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate, I can do no better than refer to remarks made in this house by my colleague and desk mate, Senator Prowse, as recorded on page 790 of the Debates of the Senate and March 29, 1971, when he said:

> If we have any responsibility to this country and to this society, I suggest that the highest responsibility we have is not just to sit here and to pass our opinions on laws that come before us but to see aggressively that the laws we make and the way that they are administered reflect credit upon the institutions which they are supposed to protect.
> Everything that everyone in this country cherishes depends on the efficacity of our laws. Usually the usefulness of a law depends on the opinion which people have of the law. If we allow arrant abuse to go unchecked, people will rightfully hold the law in very low esteem.

It is in this spirit that I suggest to you that the manner in which the Criminal Records Act is being administered is not such as to reflect credit upon society or upon the Parliament that enacted it. The very worthwhile purpose for which the Criminal Records Act was passed is being defeated in the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a law enforcement agency, to carry out the investigative provisions of the act.

The act provides that anyone who has completed his sentence and then has lived a life of good behaviour for a certain term may apply to the National Parole Board for a pardon. Section 4(2) of the act provides that the board shall cause proper inquiries to be made in order to ascertain the behaviour of the applicant since the completion of his sentence.

As I have suggested previously, it is the matter of investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that concerns me. The investigation involved here is not one related to the normal functions of a police force, dealing primarily with prevention and solution of crime, but because the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are utilized the investigation takes on the appearance of a criminal investigation. It no longer has the character of an investigation of good behaviour of a Canadian citizen.

There is also the real and ever present danger of unnecessarily exposing a man's past, which he by his own initiative has kept secret and hidden from public scrutiny, thereby causing him unnecessary embarrassment, difficulty and hardship. In addition, we are running the risk of inflaming old attitudes and resentments, thereby causing more harm than any good we might do to the individual concerned.

In this regard I should like to bring to your attention and place on record certain views as contained in letters written to me by two people who are particularly interested in this act and its administration. The first one is from a Canadian businessman who writes me that he applied to the Parole Board asking for a pardon and on the form they sent him he had to give five references, and the investigation was made by the RCMP. He goes on to say:

> I was never visited by the investigator—

Is that not consistent with a criminal investigation where the suspect is never confronted until the investigation is completed?

> I was never visited by the investigator but those five people were, and to my knowledge three told me about it and were told about my past which they didn't know. I have been in business since 1950 and I am presently doing over half a million dollars worth of work a year. I am sure I am rehabilitated and would like to have a pardon, but how many more people will find out about my past.

The other letter, from western Canada, is as follows:

> The use of the RCMP to investigate people who have made application for pardon in seeking relief from a criminal record is very wrong. I will use my own case as a classical example. Over forty years have past since I was released. I have not been in trouble since, so what can be achieved by any investigation by anybody? I trust you will understand my concern, because I feel that bringing the police into this matter will undo what is trying to be done to give people who deserve it another chance to have a decent life. However, psychologically I find I am still under attack. I am still being forced to walk the razor's edge and I will have to live out the rest of my life with the fear that I might stub my toe. In other words, I cannot feel that society is at long last saying to me "All is forgiven, go and sin no more". As a result of the RCMP doing the investigating, I have not sent in my application because I have been afraid to.
> I am 61 years of age. I was given a criminal record at 14 for stealing. There was no such thing as legal aid, and as I look back I cannot think of anything that anyone could do that was not done to criminalize a young boy. After getting out, I went east and, with another boy, stole a car and was given two years. I have since had a lifetime to think of all these things, and many more. I have had no further charges since my release the second time. I have raised a daughter and two sons to be good law-abiding citizens. In business I gave a job to a boy to assist in his parole and I have lived an exemplary life within society. I am one of those who has lived a life with a criminal record, and the psychological effect of the name 'criminal' no longer rightfully applies. In the cause of true justice there is much to be desired in the area of legislation on the granting of pardons to make it possible for a smooth transition from an ex-convict to an accepted citizen without the fear of exposure always imminent no matter how discreet an investigation may be.
> There is not much left for me now, but perhaps in some way my writing this letter may help prevent what has happened to me from happening to others in the future.

In another case that was brought to my attention, a young man requested in his application that no inquiry should be made of his employer because he was unaware of his past record. His request was respected by the investigator. They did not interview his employer, they interviewed his fellow employees, and now everyone including his employer is well aware of his record. As far as he is concerned, he told me that the board could keep their pardon. The word "keep" is my own, not his. He used a much more descriptive verb—one pertaining to the anatomy.

There is also the case brought to my attention of a young man who seven years ago was arrested and convicted of obstructing a police officer in connection with a student fracas. Today this young man is completing his education in the United States. He is completing his internship, and is about to make application for admittance to a recognized college of physicians and surgeons. In giving consideration to applying for a pardon, he decided not to do so in the knowledge that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be brought in to carry out an investigation of his character and activities and would no doubt call in the FBI.

In effect what we are doing and saying to each of these applicants is this: You made a mistake in the past; you have paid for your mistake, and through no fault of ours but by your own initiative and ability you have successfully re-established yourself. We are now ready to wipe the record clean as an indication of your complete and unqualified acceptance as a member of society. But we do not want to make a mistake, and because at one time you committed a crime we think it best to investigate your conduct since that time. We still do not trust you and to make certain that the inquiry is done properly and extensively we are going to send the RCMP around to see what kind of life you are leading, regardless of any embarrassment the inquiry may cause you.

The use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is unnecessary and repugnant to anyone with an appreciation of the journey these people have had to make. The logical and only agency to perform this task, if an investigation is necessary at all, is the National Parole Board and its officers. These men have shown evidence of being able to work effectively with parolees and inmates of correctional institutions.

> These officers interview inmates, supervise parolees, assist in the work of rehabilitation and offer professional recommendations to the National Parole Board on various matters pertaining to the correction and rehabilitation of offenders.

Those words are taken exactly from a Public Service Commission of Canada poster advertising for applicants for the job of parole officer. These are the men who should be carrying out the job, as they have a profound knowledge and a deep understanding of the men with whom they work. They have a genuine appreciation of what they have been through and are in a much better position and are better equipped to make an objective judgment on the life that an individual or applicant is leading.

In support of my suggestion that the Parole Board should be used, I call on no less an authority than the former Solicitor General of Canada who, when speaking in the other house on January 30, 1970, as recorded on page 3044 of the House of Commons Hansard, said this:

> The bill itself approaches the problem in this way.
> It provides that the person concerned make application and the National Parole Board, which we believe to be the body best equipped to examine into these kinds of problems and with the most experience in this field, examine into the particular case and make the recommendation for the grant of pardon if the facts warrant it.

If this be the case as indicated by the minister, why would the Parole Board find it necessary to enlist the aid of a law enforcement agency such as the RCMP? Is the Parole Board still not "best equipped," as indicated by the minister, and does it not still have the "most experience in this field," as indicated by the minister? I am given to understand that the reason we are not using parole officers is that they are not able to carry out these investigations because they are presently carrying a heavy case load. There are, however, 150 parole officers in 38 offices in Canada. There are approximately 100 applicants for pardon per month. This would mean an average of less than one investigation per parole officer per month, which could easily be completed in a few hours with a check of police records to ascertain the absence of crime, and an interview with the applicant himself in his home and his personal environment. In only a few cases should it be necessary to carry the examination further, and in a small number of cases police assistance might be justified and necessary.

If our parole officers are carrying excessive loads, one might ask why they carry the responsibility of community investigations. This is an investigation that is carried on in the community before a man is released from prison to ascertain the attitude of the community towards the prisoner and his pending release. Should we not be consistent and have the RCMP carry out these investigations? Why do we use parole officers in that investigation, yet when we affect the lives of men who have been rehabilitated we call on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

If our parole officers are overworked, then perhaps the time is opportune to provide assistance and relieve them of the burden of these inquiries. I suggest the qualifications for proposed assistant parole officers should be very simple, so simple in fact that it would probably completely escape the attention and interest of the analysts, appraisers and evaluators.

I consider the following to be satisfactory qualifications or basic requirements for persons acting as assistants to parole officers in this investigative and related work. He must have at one time been convicted of an indictable offence and served at least three years in a federal penitentiary or correctional institution. He must have shown, as a result of imprisonment, an ability to adapt and successfully rehabilitate himself with good conduct, industry and maturity. He must possess a sound knowledge of institutional programs, parole procedures, qualities of leadership and an ability to effectively communicate and understand in assisting clients of the parole board.

There is an old Scottish saying that "One must have walked the walk to be able to talk the talk." The man I have just described is such a person. He could deal effectively with these people and assist them in their rehabilitation. His performance might just equal or even surpass that of the sociologist, criminologist, and psychologist.

I have also been given the explanation that the Criminal Records Act is a federal statute and the logical agency to carry out the investigation is the federal police force. That explanation or observation is as inane and ridiculous as the investigation procedure itself. In only one other area of which I am aware, the security of the state, do we use peace officers in such a role. In all other aspects we use people with a particular knowledge or expertise in the matter being investigated.

Time and time again we are called upon to pass acts and legislation providing for a host of investigators and inspectors to make certain the provisions of acts and regulations are being fulfilled. Only when the law is broken do we call in a police force to enter the investigation with a view to prosecution. In the case of former inmates who have rehabilitated themselves, we do not hesitate to call in the RCMP and send them galloping off on this investigative procedure.

I am also advised that an investigation is necessary to make the pardon a valuable, worthwhile instrument.

I am wondering exactly to what use it is anticipated the instrument will be used. I doubt that it will be utilized as a letter of recommendation for employment or as a supporting document for a credit rating. I also have second thoughts that it will ever be framed by the recipient for public viewing, and if we issue the pardon with a view to impressing police officers we might just as well repeal the act forthwith. The fact is that 88 per cent of those who have succeeded in rehabilitation have done so by hiding their past from a society that will not understand them, and the same fate no doubts awaits the pardon. There is evidently but one reason for using the RCMP, which is economic and budgetary in nature.

It is a strange and weird reflection of a society that abandons all budgetary limits in spending $10,000 per year to keep a man incarcerated and in punishment, but in the matter of rehabilitation this same consideration looms as an impossible obstacle.

It is for these reasons that I have introduced the motion. I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, or a subcommittee thereof, should investigate and report on the administration of this act and, in the light of their investigation, recommend reforms they may find needed or desirable.

In closing, I should like to permit the inmates to speak for themselves through Leo, an inmate at the Leclerc Institute near Montreal. Leo gave the valedictory address at the graduation ceremonies about two weeks ago on behalf of his class, which had completed and graduated in a data processing course offered to 15 inmates at that institution. By the grace of God and the National Parole Board these men may possibly rejoin society and useful employment in industry in the coming months. This is the third class to graduate at the Leclerc Institute. Approximately 30 had graduated prior to this year in a course offered by the Data Processing Association of Montreal, and 29 of those 30 are now usefully employed in industry in Canada. They are out of institutions, and their families are off welfare. As I said, Leo was the valedictorian for the class, and here is part of what he had to say:

> We seek to forget the past, yet we do not wish to deceive. We have done what we have done, we are who we are, our biggest desire is to regain our place in society and live the lives of normal men. We cannot accomplish this by ourselves; we need the confidence of others, they must be willing to accept us as we are and as we will be.

Leo and others like him will no doubt be applying for pardons when the time limit has passed. These are people who have paid their debt to society, who have overcome all obstacles and stigma that can be placed in their path. I submit to you that they are entitled to every consideration possible from a grateful society or a grateful people. I make no apology for taking the time of the Senate to bring their plea to your attention, with the request that consideration be given to righting a wrong, and on their behalf I move the motion standing in my name.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I hope the honourable Senator Hastings will forgive me if I say that I have never disagreed more with a speech than the one I have just heard, except perhaps the first speech he made to us on this subject.

What are we looking at now? We are looking at an act that is going to destroy the record of a criminal. As honourable Senator Hastings told us, the first man he mentioned has been rehabilitated for 30 years; he has never had any problems. Why would he appeal then, if he has never had any problems, to have his record obliterated? Simply because he is going to fool somebody? And who are the people who will be there to say he is going to fool somebody, and who we are so anxious to keep out of the action? The RCMP, the only police force that polices all of Canada, knows what is going on. I have never in my life heard such a lot of nonsense as we hear now, and right along the line.

Are any of these bleeding hearts gushing over the wives of policemen who have been killed? No society has ever survived if law and order has not been maintained. Are we keeping it? A few years ago, in our wisdom, we came up with a most extraordinary thing—that there were two kinds of murder. Some filthy crooks strangle the life out of a minister of the Crown and that is considered non-capital murder. However, if you look at the record you will see that it really does not make much difference whether a murder is deemed capital or not. A few years ago a ruthless gangster dressed up in a Santa Claus suit stood over a wounded policeman as he lay motionless on a sidewalk in front of a bank and blew his brains out with a submachine gun. And the cabinet of Canada, greatly to its discredit, commuted the sentence.

Now what are we talking about? We are talking about the Parole Board. A seasoned judge gives a hardened criminal so many years in prison, and then these bleeding hearts come around a few years later and let him out and he starts all over again.

If you want this civilization of ours to go on, if you want law and order to go on, you have got to stop sob-sousing about crooks, you have got to protect the honest citizen. The honest citizen is not being protected, and all this talk about being kind to criminals is just a lot of nonsense. You have got to stand up and be counted. Are we men or are we a lot of sob-soused bleeding hearts?

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, the question is: are we men or are we gods? Unfortunately this Government does not have the responsibility for making laws that would be applicable to gods. We are men, and men who are in prison are men. If they have been more human than us, if they have been found in weaknesses where we have escaped detection, this does not give us the right to stand here and deny those who would climb closer to God the right to make the attempt. I had not intended to speak tonight following my friend Senator Hastings until I heard the impassioned plea by Senator Beaubien.

Two kinds of murder? Obviously the honourable senator was talking about the Laporte murder and about the Santa Claus murder. He was talking about one kind of murder—done by the action of fools. Is he going to say to this house that we were wrong when we decided not to condemn a man to death for being a fool? Is he going to say that we should now retract that decision and say that anyone who does something so completely ridiculous and outside of human behaviour, something that is obviously the act of a mad man, should die? Hitler had a simple way of getting rid of people who were insane.

Let us go a little further. Is my friend the honourable Senator Beaubien suggesting for a moment we should say that the criminally insane should be destroyed? If he says that, then who shall decide who is criminally insane and who is merely criminal? I am sorry that the honourable Senator Beaubien is leaving and does not want to listen to this—because it might do him some good. In every case involving capital murder where the cabinet has exercised its prerogative and commuted the sentence of death to one of life imprisonment, the decision was not made by "bleeding hearts", as Senator Beaubien put it, but by people acting on the recommendations of psychiatrists who said that the condemned men were not responsible for their actions.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask a question, before I walk out on you, like my honourable friend. Are all criminals insane? If we are going to believe you, it seems that at least the murderers are.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: There are times when I think that it is not only criminals who are insane.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is a smart alec answer.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: To answer your question, yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Well, that is fine.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I would say that any man who can murder another human being is an insane man. There was a debate on this years ago, and I do not propose to embark on it again.

I do not know how good a life everyone here has lived, but I can tell you that the police generally believe that any person who reaches the later years of life, or the age when he is ready to retire from the Senate, without getting a criminal record is not of necessity a completely honest, law-abiding citizen, but one who has lived a life of undetected crime.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You should not have added that.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What about the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: They did not get caught. It is true I spent two hours in an iron cage in a little jail at Redpass in 1936, when they took us off the freights and said, "You cannot go west; you have got to go east." They thought we were going to Vancouver to get on relief, when all we wanted to do was go out and look at the boats. We were Prairie boys. If that confession does not worry you I can probably get a better one, but it will do for now.

Those of us who have lived lives of undetected crime—those who have the right to walk across the border, and who, when applying for a bond or a job, have the right to answer no to the question, "Have you ever been convicted?"—cannot possibly understand the penalty that is imposed on a man who, when faced with the same question and imbued with a sense of responsibility to be honest, must answer yes. So he stole a car when he was a kid. Perhaps your father gave you a car, provided you with "wheels", but not one of you ever surrendered to the desire to get yourself some wheels from some unguarded place and not put them back. It is only those who do not put the wheels back who may be penalized for a lifetime.

Honourable senators, the law which my friend is talking about recognizes that men are not gods, that much as we might like to walk on clouds, we do not, that most of us walk something less than a perfect course through life.

Where a man has walked something less than a perfect course and has been caught and penalized by the law—particularly if this happened when he was young—is he forever to walk in shame and shadow; is he to be forever denied the right to walk upright like a man? Can we not put into our law the ability to forgive a man for human weakness? Can we not put into our law the ability to show a little mercy and forgiveness? Must we besmirch a man so as to prevent his whole life from being useful because of a momentary youthful indiscretion?

This is what my friend was talking about, and this is what my friend on the other side of the house completely misunderstood.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am glad you explained it.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the honourable Senator Hastings wish to close the debate?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Does the honourable senator wish to close the debate now? I am prepared to have the question put now, because I am in favour of the motion.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thompson, debate adjourned.

CYPRUS

UNITED NATIONS PEACE-KEEPING OPERATION—QUESTIONS

On the Question Period:

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to have the indulgence of the Senate in order to put certain questions to the Leader of the Government concerning the activities of our Canadian forces in Cyprus and their role in the United Nations peace-keeping operation there. I should like to place before the Senate, verbally, the following questions:

1. Are Canadian forces still participating in the United Nations peace-keeping operation in Cyprus?

2. If so, what is the total number of Canadian military personnel engaged in this operation?

3. What is the total cost per year of maintaining the Canadian contingent in Cyprus?

4. Who pays for the maintenance of the Canadian contingent in Cyprus?

5. For how long does Canada intend to maintain a peace-keeping force in Cyprus?

6. What other countries, if any, are at present participating in the said peace-keeping operation?

7. What are the respective sizes of the forces of these countries in Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Desruisseaux this afternoon gave me notice of his intention to ask these questions and I am now in a position to reply. The answers are as follows:

1. Yes, Canada does participate in the United Nations peace-keeping operation in Cyprus.

2. The total number of Canadian personnel at the moment is 583.

3. For the fiscal year 1971-72 the estimate is $1,727,500.

This, of course, does not include pay and allowances, which would be paid whether or not the forces in question were in the United Nations peace-keeping operation. The pay and allowances total $4,300,000.

4. So far as the Canadian forces are concerned, they are maintained by the Government on behalf of the people of Canada. The recoverable amount from the United Nations this year is $580,000.

5. The mandate of the force was set last June 15 for six months. The mandate will end on December 15 next, and it will be up to the Security Council to decide whether the force should be renewed for a further three-months or six-months period.

6. The following countries participate in the United Nations force in Cyprus:

Ireland, Finland, Sweden, the United Kingdom, Denmark and Canada. Austria has a medical contingent present and Australia has a police contingent present.

7. The largest contingent is that of the United Kingdom. The second largest is that of Canada. The other contributing countries have contingents numbered below the Canadian figure of 583.

I am sorry I do not have at my fingertips the exact figures.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are they kept very busy?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, they are kept very busy. The United Nations force in Cyprus has been able to maintain peace in that disturbed island.

NORTHERN OIL AND GAS

The Senate resumed from Monday, April 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue:

That this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

Hon. John Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I thought Senator Argue gave a powerful speech and that his reasons for moving the resolution were very sound and most convincing. As I place before you my reasons for supporting his motion, I am sure you will notice that they bear a strong resemblance to his, although I go into greater detail in some instances and approach the matter from a different point of view in other instances.

Honourable senators will have noticed that this motion can be divided into three parts. Part 1 is simply that this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project. Part 2 urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological studies of alternative routes. Part 3 requests the Government to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that, in the Government's opinion, may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

Honourable senators will also have noticed that the first point of the motion expresses opposition to a project which is not under the control of the Government of Canada. Those seeking to build the pipeline do not need a permit from any government in Canada. Parts 2 and 3, however, are matters within the competence of the federal Government of Canada.

As you are no doubt aware, the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker system is a proposal to build a 789-mile pipeline from the great oil fields of Prudhoe Bay south across Alaska to the all-weather port of Valdez on the south coast of Alaska. The oil which would be pumped through this 48-inch pipeline would be taken by huge tankers to a new refinery at Cherry Beach, which is about 12 miles from the Canadian border and about 32 miles south of Vancouver.

If the United States is prepared to grant permission for this pipeline to be built across Alaska, that is their business, and it could only be of interest to us if it had some adverse effect on the ecology of our territory. I have not seen anywhere that Canadian opposition is caused by any direct or indirect adverse effect which the pipeline might have on the ecology of Canadian territory.

However, if it is decided to carry that crude oil in huge tankers from the terminus of the pipeline along the coast of British Columbia to the proposed refinery, even if it is outside our territorial waters, then it becomes very much our business and very much our concern. It is of great concern to us because in the opinion of many people such tanker voyages would constitute a threat, an ever-present menace, to the coast of British Columbia. One accident—and there will be accidents as long as ships ply the sea—involving one of these tankers could cause so much pollution as to contaminate the whole coast of British Columbia. One such accident could destroy the marine life of a great area and as a result destroy the industries based on it.

Is the threat exaggerated? Is the danger overstated by those who oppose the project? Have modern methods of shipbuilding and navigation eliminated the threat of pollution from these tankers? Do they now have so many built-in safety features as to make our concern unwarranted? Honourable senators, I do not think so. You may have seen the description in a recent issue of Time magazine of the new Esso of the Netherlands tanker Europoort. It is the world's largest ship being just over 1,141 feet in length. It carries 243,000 tons of crude oil. I do not know how many gallons this would amount to, but obviously the pollution which would be caused by the escape of 243,000 tons of crude oil would be considerable. According to the Time story, it would be enough to pollute the beaches all the way from Holland to Spain. This great ship carries a crew of only 30 men. It does not need more as it has an automatic pilot, automatic radar, and an automatic steering adjuster. An officer of that ship is quoted as saying "We stay in our staterooms. This ship runs itself and when something does go wrong, it is too complicated to fix anyway." One can imagine the result if such a ship carrying 243,000 tons or more of crude oil was involved in an accident off the coast of British Columbia or if something went wrong that was too complicated to fix, and oil escaped.

I believe the concern felt by Canadians on account of the proposed tanker system is justified, and Canadians are justified in trying to prevent it. Yet there is a distinct possibility it will be proceeded with in the near future if the necessary permits to build the pipeline can be obtained from the United States Government. On March 20 a Canadian Press story from New York quoted Dudley Knott, Vice-President of Public Affairs for B.P. North America Incorporated as saying his company's basic concern is with the extraction of oil from Alaska to meet the increasing requirements of the United States market, and the United States interests demand that the oil come from Alaska. Mr. Knott further stated that the oil companies do not care how they get the oil out—whether by pipeline, tanker or submarine—but the method must be economical and they believe the best way is by pipeline across Alaska. On April 7 there was a story from London which quoted Sir Eric Drake, Chairman of British Petroleum Company, as saying it was hoped that some time this year the United States Government would authorize construction of the planned pipeline from the North Slope to the ice-free port of Valdez on Alaska's south coast.

People of influence in the United States are in favour of the TAPS project. I have read that Mr. George Lincoln, Chairman of President Nixon's oil policy committee, wants this done in a hurry to meet the anticipated petroleum needs of the west coast of the United States. The United States Federal Power Commission also thinks Alaska oil should be brought to market as speedily as possible, and that the TAPS system is the most economical way of doing this. Mr. Edward Patton, President of the Alyeska Pipeline Service Company, which is the consortium of companies wanting to build the pipeline, has stressed the fact that since the Mackenzie alternative was proposed, there has been no new evidence that this alternative is sounder than TAPS.

Another factor to be remembered in discussing this matter is the large investment already made in preparation of the Alaska pipeline. An article in Time magazine of March 29 had this to say:

> Anticipating U.S. Interior Department approval, the Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., a consortium of oil companies with stakes in Prudhoe, has already invested in ground surveys and tanker contracts; in fact, 80 per cent of the 48-in. pipeline that would be required has already been delivered.

When we are discussing this matter, and especially the part dealing with our opposition to the Trans-Alaska pipeline tanker project, one other consideration must be kept in mind and that is that the United States needs this oil and is determined to transport it by some means or other in the near future. That the need is there is emphasized by a Canadian Press despatch from Vancouver which said in part:

> The continental United States desperately needs oil from the North Slope of Alaska, Edwin C. Hurd, President of Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Co., told the annual dinner meeting of the University of British Columbia Alumni Association.
> Mr. Hurd said the "growing militancy" of other oil-producing countries of the world means that the resources in those countries may not always be available to the United States.

I think Mr. Hurd's words carry a lot of weight as he is also President of Mackenzie Valley Pipe Line Research Limited, a company conducting research into the feasibility of constructing a pipeline from the Arctic Slope to Edmonton.

In my view, there can be no doubt that the United States wants, needs, and is determined to have that oil from Alaska, and I do not think they are willing to wait too long to get it. It is apparent that the United States oil industry favours the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker system as the one to move that oil in the cheapest and quickest manner. If we are opposed to this project, can we hope to prevent it? There have been some roadblocks thrown up against it by the conservationists in the United States. The permit to build the pipeline has not been granted and there is no indication that it will be granted in the near future. Various individuals and groups in the United States have presented serious objections to the proposed system. These objections are of interest as all or some would apply to a pipeline built in Canadian territory. Such objections are based mainly on ecological-pollution and social grounds. Conservationists in the United States have apparently been able to prevent the granting of a permit to construct the pipeline by arguing before the courts that pollution dangers have not been adequately weighed and examined as required by the new United States National Environmental Policy Act. Some of the apparent reasons for a revaluation of the Trans-Alaska pipeline system appear to be:

1. A study of the future tanker traffic in Puget Sound by the Honeywell Corporation of Minneapolis has predicted two to four tanker collisions in this area in the next ten years.

2. Canada's concern about possible oil pollution on the Pacific coast.

3. The ecological harm to the Alaskan countryside caused by the melting of the permafrost from the heat generated by hot oil passing through the pipeline. It is estimated the oil would have to be heated to 180 degrees Fahrenheit to be pumped through the pipeline.

4. The frequency of earthquakes in Alaska and the possible effects of such earthquakes on the pipeline. The United States National Earthquake Information Centre has reported that Alaska had 68 reported quakes in 1970.

5. A report by the United States Corps of Army Engineers has indicated it might prohibit the construction of port facilities at Valdez although no reasons have been given for such a decision.

For one reason or another, but chiefly because of strong opposition by groups within the United States, the Department of the Interior has not yet issued a permit to build that pipeline across Alaska. This has given us time to make our views against it known to the Government of the United States, and the passing of the motion may be of some assistance to those who are fighting to prevent its construction. In view of the fact that Alaskan oil is going to go to the continental United States in one way or another it is not enough simply to oppose the pipeline tanker system. It has been suggested, therefore, that a pipeline be built across Canadian territory down the Mackenzie River valley to Edmonton. If this were done it would, of course, eliminate the objections of Canadians to the pollution threat.

Senator Argue's motion urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological studies of alternate routes. The only alternate route which merits serious consideration at present is the pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley. The two voyages of the Manhattan proved that oil could be moved from Prudhoe Bay by tanker, but that it would be an expensive as well as hazardous operation. The proposal to move the oil by tanker submarine or by ice-breaking tankers has not apparently merited serious consideration. If Canadians wish to have the United States accept the Mackenzie Valley route to move the Alaska oil to market then we must be prepared to provide the answers to the questions they will raise, and this will require further study and research.

For example, in order to persuade conservationists in the United States to accept and promote the Mackenzie Valley route it will have to be proved that this route has fewer ecological hazards than the Alaska pipeline. How can this be done? For the past three winters studies have been carried out in the Northwest Territories by Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Research Limited to assess the damage to the permafrost by the heated pipeline passing over it. This must be ascertained because if any serious damage resulted it could upset the feeding and migratory pattern of Arctic birds and animals. I understand that in the tests conducted 4,500 barrels of heated oil are passed over a 2,000-foot loop of pipeline up to 200 times a day to discover if it can be adequately insulated and thus prevent damage to the permafrost. The whole research project has another year to run, but the results to date are satisfactory. Indeed, I think they must be as the Canadian Government has laid down certain guidelines for construction of pipelines in the north.

There are other considerations which require further study on what problems will have to be overcome in building the line from the Alaskan oil fields to Inuvik. As the Mackenzie Valley line would be at least twice as long as the Trans-Alaska one, the financing of its construction might be difficult. It would certainly require a large participation by United States capital.

It is obvious that more study and research is needed on the Mackenzie Valley route. We can all agree with the second part of Senator Argue's motion which urges the Government to proceed with such studies. Indeed, I hope that such studies will be proceeded with at an accelerated rate, because while we are studying the route the United States might build the Trans-Alaska pipeline, for they are people of great drive and energy when they undertake to build anything.

I do not intend to comment at this time on the third part of the motion, which requests the Government to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps to be taken, in its opinion, to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas. Of course, a study of the prudent and efficient transportation of northern gas and oil opens up a large field. It could well be a complex study as it would have to include the transportation of oil and gas which might be found in the Canadian Arctic islands as well as in continental Canada. If such studies were completed it would be of interest to have the results made available even if the Government did not wish to endorse the conclusions.

I believe that a consideration of the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and the apparent effects of the system suggests that Canada should seriously oppose the proposed transportation system, on the grounds that severe ecological harm will result to Canada's populated west coast from predicted collisions or other accidents involving supertankers carrying oil cargoes. As I have mentioned, it is not enough to approve this system; we must also be in a position to advocate an alternative one, which at present would seem to be a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley.

I know that Canadian opposition to the proposed project has been registered, and that fairly high level discussions are to take place next Monday. I hope that such discussions will be fruitful, and that the United States and Canada will join together, as good neighbours should, to arrange a system of transporting oil and gas from the north to our mutual benefit.

Honourable senators, I simply want to add that I am pleased to second the motion so eloquently moved by Senator Argue.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 21, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) calling the attention of the Senate to the Statement of Conclusions of the Third Working Session of the Constitutional Conference, held at Ottawa, 8th and 9th February, 1971, and tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 11th February, 1971.

Hon. Ernest Manning: Honourable senators, I will not long detain the house in making a few comments on the subject matter of this inquiry that was placed on the order paper by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). However, I am sure all members of this house feel, as I do, that we are indebted to him for the clear and lucid explanation he gave of the work of the Constitutional Conference, and the emphasis that he placed on the issues that are inherent in the subject we are discussing.

I suggest that this matter is among the major national issues confronting this country today, although not in the sense that there is any real urgency or necessity to amend or rewrite the BNA Act. On the whole, I believe most of us could agree that that document has proven to be a good and sound basis for the Canadian Constitution. We cannot help but be impressed by the obvious wisdom and foresight of the Fathers of Confederation in anticipating as well as they did the problems and circumstances that would develop in a new nation as it grew to maturity, and providing a framework sufficiently complete to enable most of those problems to be reasonably well accommodated.

It is my belief that if there is the will to make the federal structure work within the British North America Act, then that structure can be operated effectively within that framework. Therefore, I suggest that the reason this matter is of such tremendous importance is not because there is great urgency to rewrite the Canadian Constitution, but because constitutional review and reform in recent years have become symbolic of the divergent viewpoints and interests with respect to federalism and the future of Canada as a federal state.

Today whenever the question of constitutional reform is mentioned the first thing that comes to the minds of most people is the relationship between proposed constitutional reform and the divergent viewpoints that prevail in this country with respect to federalism. These conflicting viewpoints and interests tend to centre on two major questions, the first of which is: Is the federal structure on which Confederation was built in 1867 a viable structure in the 1970s having regard to the vastly different set of social, economic and financial circumstances which now prevail?

The magnitude and complexity of the current social, economic and financial problems have imposed formidable new responsibilities and obligations on both levels of government. These problems have become so complex and large that they can no longer be regarded as mere concerns of either the federal or provincial governments alone. The inter-relationship between the problems and responsibilities is such that the line of demarcation between the exercise of federal jurisdiction and provincial jurisdiction has become obscured. Certainly there are many provisions in the federal-provincial agreements that have been negotiated in the past 15 or 20 years which are outside the specific allocations of responsibility defined in the British North America Act. These are agreements that have been worked out as matters of necessity. Some of them have worked reasonably well; some have led to controversy and dissatisfaction. Certainly all of them have tended to obscure the dividing lines between federal and provincial responsibilities. This in itself becomes a very strong argument for meaningful constitutional reform.

During the same period there have developed the problems now faced by the municipal administrations of Canada. These have been generated largely by the trends to mass urbanization. It was pointed out recently in this house that we have cities in Canada with larger populations than some of the provinces. These municipal administrations are faced with tremendous responsibilities, often without the financial resources necessary to discharge them. All this points up the need for some meaningful revision of the tax structure of Canada, and the sources of revenue available to the respective levels of government. These needs in turn become pressures for constitutional revision and reform.

The second question around which interest in this matter revolves is even more serious, and therefore more important, and it is: Can the major segments of the Canadian population find satisfactory accommodation within the kind of nation the present federal structure envisions? We have, of course, three major groupings of the peoples of Canada—the Anglo-Saxons, the French-Canadian citizens, and those who name neither French nor English as their mother tongue. We must not overlook the fact that in this latter group there are some six million Canadian citizens today whose mother tongue is neither English nor French. These people have their human concerns and human aspirations. They have fears of what their position may be within any significant restructuring of the Canadian nation.

It is a simple fact of history, of course, that the greatest concern and the greatest dissatisfaction has been voiced by French Canadian citizens. Because they are the majority of the people of the Province of Quebec, Quebec has become symbolic of this group and their concern within the federal structure. The demands for special status for the Province of Quebec and for the French Canadian people range all the way from special status by way of autonomy in fiscal, cultural and economic matters, to the province being granted full national status, or even becoming independent of Canada altogether.

Honourable senators, I know from experience that these great concerns, and what they can mean to the future of Canada, have always cast their shadows over the various constitutional reform conferences that have attempted to come to grips from time to time with this issue. It is my belief that these shadows are becoming longer, which indicates that perhaps we are now getting into the twilight of the day in which we have an opportunity to resolve these matters in a manner that will be satisfactory to all concerned.

It was my privilege to attend all federal-provincial constitutional conferences between the years 1943 and 1968. These were held under the leadership of four Canadian prime ministers: King, St. Laurent, Diefenbaker and Pearson. Having attended and participated in that long series of conferences, I know something of the sense of frustration that so often emerged when these issues were debated—issues which, by the end of the sessions, were still as far from solution as when the conference began. I have listened from time to time to the statements of men who have said that what we need to do in Canada is scrap the whole business, and write a new Constitution. I suggest to you that people who talk that way have had no experience whatever with the practical realities of getting the kind of agreement that is essential to bring a new Constitution into being. I submit that in the light of the experience of this country in the past 25 or 30 years it is utterly unrealistic for anyone to think that in the foreseeable future it will be possible to re-write the Constitution of Canada, or develop a wholly new Constitution for Canada, and have it accepted by the divergent interests among the Canadian people.

In commenting on these endeavours to repatriate the Constitution of Canada and develop a formula for its amendment within this country, it is fitting that tribute should be paid to the efforts of two earlier ministers of justice. I refer to Mr. Davie Fulton and Mr. Guy Favreau. These men spent a great deal of time and effort in this field of work, and became the architects of what was commonly spoken of as the Fulton-Favreau formula. Whether that was a good formula or not—and I for one suggest it was far from a perfect formula—it led to the one occasion in all the years of effort when unanimous agreement was finally arrived at, first at the conference chaired by the minister of justice with the attorneys general of the provinces, and secondly at the entire federal-provincial conference.

There was one chapter in the closing part of that long procedure with which I am particularly familiar, and which I do not think is generally known to the Canadian people. There had been a series of these conferences in one form or another from 1950 until the early sixties, when the whole matter came to an impasse largely because of a strong position taken by the then Government of Saskatchewan, who felt that the suggested amending formula would impair too severely the power of the central government, and that the suggested amending formula was too rigid. The matter came to a standstill largely over that difference of opinion.

There was then a change of government in the Province of Saskatchewan. It so happened that in the year 1964 the Province of Alberta was the host province to the annual premiers' conference, and that was the first premiers' conference attended by the new premier of the Province of Saskatchewan. As chairman of that conference, I had an opportunity to discuss with the Prime Minister of Canada before the conference the question whether in the light of the change of government in Saskatchewan there might be some different position with respect to the points upon which the former government of that province had felt strongly, and which had led to the impasse to which I referred.

At that premiers conference we had an opportunity to discuss among ourselves whether there was a possibility of now getting a greater measure of agreement. The Government of Saskatchewan felt they could in general accept the proposals that had been developed up until that time. I had the pleasant task, as chairman of the conference, of conveying to the then Prime Minister the view of the premiers that now there was unanimity as far as the provinces were concerned.

Following that, and I think largely as a result of that encouraging indication, the Prime Minister convened a conference in Charlottetown, at which the Minister of Justice was directed to reconvene the Constitutional Conference with the attorneys general for the provinces of Canada, and a strong appeal was made for them to make an all-out effort to reach agreement on an amending formula, especially in anticipation of Canada's centennial year. We all felt that nothing could be more appropriate than to come to the end of our first hundred years with agreement on the means of domiciling the Constitution in Canada, and agreement on a formula for its amendment.

The then Minister of Justice, Mr. Favreau, reconvened the conference of the attorneys general. Two or three meetings were held, the last being in Ottawa on October 14, 1964, the same date as that on which a federal-provincial conference was in session here in the capital city. At the final session the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general reached agreement on what was called the Fulton-Favreau Formula, and it was reported to the full session of the federal-provincial conference that such agreement had been reached.

Honourable senators, I hold in my hand the communiqué that was issued by the federal-provincial conference on that occasion. I will not detain you by reading all of it, but a couple of paragraphs might be of interest. They are:

> The conference of the federal and provincial governments, meeting in Ottawa on October 14th, unanimously agreed on a formula to repatriate the Constitution of Canada. This formula, when it has become law, will mean that any future amendment of the Constitution will be made in Canada instead of by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. As a result, our Constitution will have become, for the first time in the history of Canada, truly and wholly Canadian.

> This milestone in the evolution of Canada's government is the culmination of the series of discussions between the federal and provincial governments which began in 1950 and were carried on in 1960-61.

The communiqué ended with this paragraph:

> The constitutional formula was recommended unanimously by the Attorneys-General of Canada and the provinces and accepted unanimously by the Conference.

There were pretty high hopes at that time. It was said that at last it looked as if we were making some progress. It was agreed—although this was not made a condition—that the provinces would submit to their legislatures a resolution endorsing the proposed amending formula, so that this would have not merely the concurrence of the executive arm of the provincial governments but also that of the people's representatives in the assemblies across Canada.

Some of the provinces carried out that step. I well recall that in the Legislature of Alberta I discussed this with the then leader of the Opposition. He willingly agreed to second the motion for the adoption of the resolution, when he saw that this would not be a partisan matter. I proposed the resolution of the Government, he seconded it, we had a good day's debate on it and it was carried unanimously. Something similar happened in other legislatures across Canada.

Honourable senators are aware of what transpired at that time. The Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec was the Honourable Mr. Lesage. He, along with all the others, had endorsed the proposed formula. I believe I can say he was enthusiastic about this progress. But when he went back to his own province he was met with criticism from his opposition that he had sold out to Ottawa and the rest of Canada.

This opposition became articulate and strong, until finally it was necessary for him to come back to the Government of Canada and advise that it would not be possible for him to take a resolution into his legislature asking for approval of the formula. The whole thing ended at that point. It was a deep disappointment to millions of Canadians. I am quite certain that the Prime Minister of Quebec was realistic in his assessment. There was no point in taking a resolution to his Assembly if the Assembly would not endorse it. He felt that such was the case.

Honourable senators, we have read in the press, and heard in the outline given so ably by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), that again a constitutional conference recently arrived at the point where there is general agreement. Again, they have a means to domicile the Constitution in Canada, and again there is a proposed amending formula—not too different in its basic principles from that of 1964. In June of this year there is to be another conference, in British Columbia, at which it is expected this matter will be finalized. I sincerely hope that conference will be successful, but I wonder whether we are being realistic in such a hope. The present Prime Minister of Quebec, if I read the reports correctly, is facing the same kind of criticism with respect to this latest conference as his predecessor faced in 1964. This time he has not only the opposition of the Union Nationale which Prime Minister Lesage faced, but he has also the even stronger opposition of the separatist movement in the Province of Quebec.

I am wondering if it is realistic to think that Mr. Bourassa will be able to go to the conference in June and say: "I can take into my Legislature a resolution which will be adopted on behalf of the people of Quebec, and which will endorse this formula to domicile the British North America Act in Canada and to provide for its amendment." I hope he can, but I wonder if such will be the case.

If he has to go to the conference and say the same as Mr. Lesage had to say following the previous attempt, then I am very deeply concerned about what the reaction in this country may be. Several of the provincial governments have said already that if no progress is made towards finalizing this matter at the June conference, there is no point in pursuing the question further. Even more serious may be the reaction of the Canadian people. We cannot go on building up people's hopes time after time, and each time have them dashed.

I believe it is correct to say that during the years since the breakdown of the Fulton-Favreau formula there has been a long series of actions on the part of the Government and people of Canada to accommodate the desires and the aspirations of the Province of Quebec. We have had the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission, we have the Official Languages Act, and we have the provision of opting out privileges from federal-provincial agreements, with a choice of tax abatement or fiscal equivalent, as it was called. We have extensive programs of federal economic aid in which the people of Canada as a whole have contributed millions of dollars, the greater part of which has gone to try to build up the underdeveloped areas of the Province of Quebec.

I could add many more things to this list of which honourable senators are aware. Many of these have placed a heavy strain on the people in other regions of Canada. I do not want to digress into this matter tonight; perhaps on some other occasion we might discuss some of these things in greater detail. But I merely mention as a slight illustration of the effect of the Official Languages Act that in my part of Canada it is certainly having a more divisive effect than a unifying effect.

Some of you have read recent newspaper reports concerning a community in the north-central part of Alberta. Here French Canadian citizens and non-French Canadian citizens have lived and worked together in complete harmony and fellowship for years without the slightest disagreement. Now, because the B and B Commission has designated the area as a bilingual district, problems are beginning to develop. The people in the town happen to be predominantly French Canadian citizens while the people of the adjacent rural areas are predominantly citizens of Ukrainian origin. They are now getting into wrangles over whether they are going to have the street signs in two languages, and all that kind of thing. Disagreement has come into a community where never before had there been any such kind of disagreement. And that is not an isolated case.

All I am pointing out is that this series of steps that the Government of Canada has taken to try to accommodate the aspirations and concerns of the people of Quebec, has imposed a heavy strain on the people in many other regions of Canada.

We have been reading what I feel are very unfortunate statements by our press in the last few days about the possibility of severing the rest of our ties with the monarchy. I am not going to get into a debate on that subject tonight, but I draw to the attention of honourable senators that that is the kind of thing, in my view, that should never be raised under the circumstances that prevail in Canada today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: When you start raising highly emotional issues of that kind, you do a lot of unnecessary harm. The people who want to sever Canada's ties with the Crown are not going to gain anything by the severance. There is not a person in Canada today who is restricted in any way or whose way of life is altered in any way by virtue of the fact that historically this country has had a long traditional association with the Crown. These ties are in the realm of the abstract so far as their application to Canada is concerned in this day and generation; but these ties are related to the emotions and heartstrings of millions of Canadian people, and when you cut these strings or try to cut them you create a resentment, you create a reaction that is totally unnecessary because you have not gained a single thing in the process.

It reminds me of the principle the poet had in mind when he said:

> Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

What I think he was trying to say was that when you take away from a man his reputation, you are no better for what you have taken away from him but you have robbed him of something that meant a great deal to him.

Analogously, if the minority groups of this country, or those who have no feeling for the Crown—and I have no quarrel with their attitude because that is their right—think that by taking away from the millions of Canadians to whom these things do mean a great deal, they are furthering their cause, they could not be more wrong. They are not going to be enriched by a severance of our ties with the monarchy, but others would be made poor indeed by such severance. That is not the way to get unity in Canada.

I could go through the whole list of these things. For example, we have had disagreements at the federal-provincial conferences over the opting-out privilege. You cannot give such privileges to one part of Canada and not to another. You cannot argue that there is that much of a fundamental difference between provinces of Canada.

Economic aid is another example. I do not begrudge the money that Canadian taxpayers are spending to try to improve the economic conditions of Quebec, but I can understand the people in my province, and in Saskatchewan and elsewhere in the west, being more than a bit concerned—and I am sure the same is true in other regions that are much younger than Quebec—that a province which is rich in resources and which has had over a century to develop now has to have the aid of other, younger areas of Canada.

I am not quarreling with what we have done in this regard, but I am simply pointing out that all these things have exacted a price, emotionally, financially and otherwise from the people in other parts of Canada.

If having done all of these things we could meet here tonight and know that the aspirations of the French Canadian people of Quebec had been met and that everyone had now found his accommodation, then I am sure every honourable senator would say that it was not too big a price to pay for a result of that kind. But what is the irony of all of this? The irony is that we cannot say that. If we are realistic, we must acknowledge that notwithstanding all these and other actions which have been taken by this nation to meet the concerns and demands of Quebec, there is little if any indication that Quebec is any happier in Confederation today than she was five years ago. In fact, if we are to be completely honest, we may be compelled to admit that the reverse appears to be true.

The danger of all this is the backlash that may well develop in other areas of Canada if this situation continues much longer. In this set of circumstances, when the June conference is held, if Quebec is the province that rejects the revised formula or demands changes which other regions of Canada cannot accept, the consequences may well be serious not only for the hopes of constitutional reform but for the future of Confederation itself.

I confess to you, and I have some reticence in saying this, that if anyone had come to me five years ago when I was Premier of Alberta and had suggested that there was a danger of Confederation breaking up, I would have said, "Man! Your judgment could not be worse." I simply would not have believed that that was a real danger. I could not say that tonight, because I think that danger is there and we are only blinding ourselves to reality if, we refuse to recognize how real that danger is.

For these reasons it seems to me that there have been few constitutional conferences at which a heavier responsibility will rest upon the shoulders of the participating governments. Certainly a special responsibility will rest on the government and people of Quebec in the light of what happened following the 1964 agreement. No one hopes more sincerely than I that the June conference will be crowned with success. But I say the time has come for us as Canadians to be realistic and to think ahead to what the implications of failure may be. There is cause for concern, and Canadians will be foolish to shut their eyes to the hard facts with which we are faced in this country today.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 20, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, for the second reading of Bill S-14, respecting the construction of an international highway bridge between Fort Frances, Ontario, and International Falls, Minnesota.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since the honourable Senator Benidickson introduced and spoke on second reading of this bill, I must remind honourable senators that if he speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, on April 7 we had a debate on second reading of this bill. At that time the honourable Senator Grosart addressed to me some pertinent questions, and it was understood that I would not move that this bill be sent to committee until I had answered those questions. He properly challenged me because I, perhaps rather flippantly, said that I did not know where the money to build the bridge was coming from. I said that, honourable senators, because of some experience connected with these international bridges.

The money seems to come from private lenders through the sale of debentures and bonds, and 95 per cent of the funds emanate from the United States. But we in Canada benefit from the traffic resulting from tourists travelling into Canada by way of these bridges. We also benefit from having these bridges connect with our highway system so that Canadians are faciliated when travelling to visit our neighbours to the south. So, honourable senators, I cannot answer that question of Senator Grosart's any more fully now than I could at that time, but seemingly even the State of Minnesota is prepared in the territory that I know, in a parliamentary way, to finance two bridges between Ontario and Minnesota.

The second question that Senator Grosart asked with respect to money is related to the clause of the bill which deals with possible liability by the Crown in connection with financing of this bridge. He drew our attention to clause 18 of the bill, which says:

> 18. The bonds or other obligations of the Authority are not obligations of Her Majesty, nor is Her Majesty liable on such obligations.

Furthermore they are not obligations of Her Majesty's servants or agents.

Senator Grosart further asked what we heard as to the views of the owners of the existing 65-year old bridge on the suggestion that there should be a new bridge somewhere in that vicinity. I said then, and I repeat it now, that this has been talked about for ten or 15 years, and to my knowledge the owners of the original bridge have registered no complaint. At least, they certainly have not registered any complaint with me.

There is no haste in the consideration of this bill. As I have said, it has been talked about for some time. Financial arrangements have to be worked out. A site has not yet been determined with any exactitude. Therefore, I think that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will have every opportunity of inviting the private owners of the existing bridge to make any representations they may choose. Furthermore, in the following weeks we can obtain the necessary information as to the financing arrangements required to facilitate the construction of this bridge.

I may say that I shall repeat during the committee stage my very strong objections to the policy of the Canadian Government incorporated in clause 26 of the bill. That clause reads:

> 26. The Authority shall provide and maintain at its expense such suitable office, warehouse and other accommodation, with adequate light and heat,
> (a) as the Governor in Council or any Minister designated by the Governor in Council may from time to time require for Canadian customs and immigration purposes;

I say that we are accepting too much of the "big brother" principle when a facility of such advantage to Canada is provided by our friends to the south, in large part, and we have this continuing policy of saying that we will not even provide them with Canadian customs and immigration facilities.

I raised this question on December 17 when my honourable friend Senator Kinnear was dealing with an amending bill to another international bridge act, namely, the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company Act. It was the second last day of the sitting prior to the Christmas adjournment. The members of the Senate committee felt that there was something very wrong in adhering to this principle, and I propose to raise it again when we discuss this bill.

I have to the best of my ability tried to answer the very proper questions raised by the honourable Senator Grosart. If the bill receives second reading I will propose that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. A former bridge bill was referred to the Senate Committee on National Finance, but it is more appropriate that this bill go to Transport and Communications.

I will have conversations with Senator Haig, Chairman of that committee, who is very familiar with that part of the country, frequently visiting relatives there. He knows the situation well and we will be able to work out a schedule under which the private company and all interested parties will have an opportunity to make representations.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Benidickson thinks that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I should have anticipated this, but I did not. Perhaps the honourable senator has looked up the rules to make sure to which committee this bill should be referred. I thought that the bill should be referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee or the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Perhaps the Clerk of the Senate could tell us the rule under which this would come.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I did not consider that this bill should go to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the rule?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There is no finance involved.

The Hon. the Speaker: Perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words on this matter. As the Leader of the Government knows, a few days ago we looked into this matter and we thought that this bill should go to the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs or the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Perhaps the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders could throw some light on this situation?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I call the attention of the house to Rule 67(h), which sets out the terms of reference of the committee. I will not read the whole rule, but it says in part:

> ... to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers, and other matters relating to transport and communications generally, including:
> (i) transport and communications by land, air, water, and space, ... or any other form, method or means of communications or transport;
> (ii) tourist traffic; ...
> (v) navigation, shipping and navigable waters.

Honourable senators, I would suggest that the committee on Transport and Communications would in this case be appropriate, but that is only my personal view.

The Hon. the Speaker: If I might be allowed to add a word: I took it for granted that there would have to be an international agreement after this bill is passed, so that the Foreign Affairs Committee might be the appropriate committee.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: It is immaterial to me which committee the bill is referred to. It is true that Washington and Ottawa have carried out certain negotiations regarding international waters, but when it comes to the construction of facilities the important negotiations will take place between the State of Minnesota and the Province of Ontario who will each provide approaches to the bridge.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have great respect for the judgment of Senator Molson in this matter, but I wish to make sure that it is the view of His Honour the Speaker that this matter comes within the purview of the Committee on Transport and Communications. If that is so, then I am satisfied. Personally I have some doubts, but I will abide by His Honour's ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: I examined the rules with my advisers and I feel that the bill could go to either committee.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on Scientific and Technological Cooperation. Done at Bonn April 16, 1971.

Report on proceedings under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 68 of the said Act, chapter 152, R.S.C., 1952.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL—FIRST READING

Hon. L. P. Beaubien presented Bill S-19, respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h):

That the name of the honourable Senator Croll be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h):

That the name of the honourable Senator Hastings be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

NATIONAL FINANCE

FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICY STUDY REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the question of methods by which fiscal and monetary policy in Canada may be exercised to achieve full potential growth and employment without inflation; and notwithstanding Rule 83A

That the budget approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of 18 March, 1971, for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee on National Finance with regard to its examination of the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1972, be applicable as well in respect of its examination of the said question of fiscal and monetary policy in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NEED FOR A REASSESSMENT OF CANADA'S POSITION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I rise to direct your attention to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Few other developments in the field of international co-operation will more profoundly influence Canada's future as a sovereign nation than the relationships we establish with the great world power with whom we share most of the land mass of this continent. There is today a growing public awareness that this is so, and that awareness has given rise to no small measure of concern. This concern finds expression in many divergent viewpoints and is not without its controversial aspects. Some honourable senators may not agree with certain conclusions I will seek to express. I present these conclusions and the reasons for them not in the spirit of controversy but in the hope they will contribute something to your own objective assessment. Above all I sincerely hope that our discussion of this vital question will result in a re-examination by the Government of Canada of the course it presently is pursuing in this important area of Canadian foreign policy.

I am particularly pleased that the Government Leader in this chamber is the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, and is therefore eminently qualified to appraise the arguments I wish to advance and to urge the Government to give this matter the serious attention it deserves.

May I start by stating the obvious. Canada-United States relations are unavoidably influenced by the difference in status as between the two nations. Canada has a larger geographic area but in almost every other respect the status of the United States eclipses that of this country. The population of the United States is ten times greater than ours. America is a world leader in technological and industrial progress. She possesses the greatest financial resources of any nation on earth. She is capable of unleashing the world's most powerful and devastating military might. In short, we live next door to an industrial, financial and military giant, one of the most powerful and highly developed nations of the modern world, and forced by these circumstances to assume a role of world leadership and bear a major share of the world's burdens.

Two facts emerge from these circumstances. The first is that while Canada's influence on the United States is understandably limited, United States influence has a profound impact on almost every facet of Canadian life. Canadian cultural and social patterns are inevitably influenced by American radio and television programs which daily fill Canadian airwaves. Most of the magazines and books that we read, the recordings we listen to, and the films we watch, are American productions. The majority of the cars we drive and the appliances we use are either produced in the United States or are Canadian counterparts of American designs. Canada's education system is patterned largely on earlier experiments in the United States. A high percentage of professors in Canadian universities are Americans or former American citizens. The Canadian economy is influenced significantly by economic trends in the United States, and fluctuations on the United States stock exchanges and money markets are quickly reflected in Canada.

The second fact is that because of this imbalance, Canada in some respects has more to gain from good relations with the United States than the United States stands to gain from her relations with Canada. When two nations co-operate in mutual friendship and goodwill, the weaker usually benefits to a greater extent than the stronger.

There are many situations where if necessary the stronger can successfully "go it alone", but this is rarely true of the weaker. For example, the United States could get along without Canada's assistance in such matters as national defence, technological know-how and financial resources. Canada is not in a comparable position and therefore in such matters stands to gain disproportionately from good relations with her powerful neighbour.

Under these circumstances it is fortunate for Canada that there are so many mutual interests which foster friendship and co-operation between the two nations. In the first place, there are strong affinitives which stem from our common heritage. Our basic ideologies are comparable and in many respects almost identical. We share a mutual love of freedom and respect for human dignity. The social structure of both nations is based on the rule of law, the impartial administration of justice and respect and due regard for the institutions and processes of democracy.

The vast majority of citizens in both countries speak the same language and embrace much of the same culture. The economies of both nations have been developed by responsible individual and corporate enterprise and both recognize the superiority of inducement through legitimate reward over compulsory enterprise enforced by an authoritarian state.

We must recognize on both sides of the 49th parallel that these natural ties and mutual interests are not in themselves sufficient to guarantee enduring friendship and co-operation in the turbulent world of today between two nations which in many other respects are significantly unalike.

These natural affinitives need to be strengthened by wise and realistic negotiated relationships in major areas of mutual interest and concern. It is in this respect that the official course Canada is pursuing today in some important areas is unwise and contrary to our own best interests, and in my opinion gives cause for legitimate concern.

Last year the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, Secretary of State for External Affairs, published a set of White Papers on Canadian Foreign Policy. These papers discuss foreign policy from a philosophical viewpoint, but fail to come to grips with the major issues pertinent to strong and mutually advantageous relations between Canada and the United States. Let me quote from the first volume of the White Paper entitled "Foreign Policy for Canadians":

> Externally there is the complex problem of living distinct from but in harmony with the world's most powerful and dynamic nation, the United States. The political, economic, social and cultural effects of being side by side for thousands of miles of land, water and airspace are clearly to be seen in the bilateral context. In addition, the tightly mixed, often magnified and wide-ranging interests, both shared and conflicting, bring Canada into contact with the United States in many multilateral contexts. It is probably no exaggeration to suggest that Canada's relations almost anywhere in the world touch in one way or another on those of its large neighbour. This has both advantages and disadvantages for Canada.
> Canada's particular situation requires a certain degree of self-reliance and self-expression if this country is to thrive as an independent state in a world of rapidly-shifting power structures and relationships. This special requirement has a very direct bearing on how the Government of Canada should manage its complex relations with the United States, especially as regards trade and finance, energy and resources and continental defence. The key to Canada's continuing freedom to develop according to its own perceptions will be the judicious use of Canadian sovereignty whenever Canada's aims and interests are placed in jeopardy—whether in relation to territorial claims, foreign ownership, cultural distinction, or energy and resource management.

This is all very interesting philosophy, but I submit it indicates no resolve and certainly no sense of urgency on the part of the Canadian Government to develop mutually acceptable positions on matters of concern to either or both nations. The White Paper goes on to advance the theory that Canadian foreign policy primarily should be an extension of domestic objectives, and I quote:

> In undertaking this review the Government has been constantly reminded of its need and responsibility to choose carefully aims, objectives and priorities in sufficiently long and broad terms to ensure that essential Canadian interests and values are safeguarded in a world situation where rapid and even radical changes can be anticipated as normal rather than exceptional conditions. Canada, like other states, must act according to how it perceives its aims and interest. External activities should be directly related to national policies pursued within Canada and serve the same objectives.
> In essence, foreign policy is a product of the Government's progressive definition and pursuit of national aims and interests in the international environment. It is the extension abroad of national policies.

In my opinion this is fallacious reasoning. The domestic policy of any nation is developed and implemented within the perimeter of its sovereign right to manage its internal affairs as it decides. When it comes to relations with other nations, this right and the power to implement it no longer prevails. For this reason international relations must of necessity start with a recognition of each nation's right to its own domestic positions and proceed from that point to develop international policies and agreements acceptable to both because they are reasonable and mutually advantageous. Such international arrangements rarely, if ever, can be the mere extension of one nation's domestic policy into the international field.

A second and more serious concern is the emotional brand of negative nationalism that is being fostered in this country today by federal spokesmen and by significant sections of the nation's news media.

Let my remarks on this subject not be misunderstood. I am intensely proud of being a Canadian. With millions of other Canadians I want to see Canada preserved and respected and developed as a strong and independent sovereign nation. I do not favour and would vigorously oppose any form of political union with the United States. I say this, not because of any anti-American sentiments but because many of the goals and aspirations of Americans and Canadians differ significantly. For this reason the divergent goals and aspirations of the citizens of each nation can best be realized by their remaining separate sovereign entities. This position, which I submit is in the best interests of both nations, is in no way incompatible with close international co-operation in matters of mutual interest and concern.

It is disturbing to see this desirable co-operation being prejudiced, and in some cases sabotaged, by those who seize every opportunity to create the false impression that the United States is an international villain with calculated and sinister designs on Canada's independence as a nation. The emotional brand of negative nationalism which is now becoming evident in Canada is largely a backlash generated by this false but widely held impression. Too many Canadian politicians and news commentators seem incapable of discussing Canadian sovereignty except in a context of anti-American sentiment.

America's unquestioned impact on Canada's economy and culture and way of life is not the result of some sinister United States design to interfere in Canadian affairs. It is the natural and inevitable consequence of a young nation with limited human and financial and technological resources living next door to a major industrial and financial and military world power. Because this is so, no amount of vocal sabre rattling about Canada's sovereignty and national identity will have any meaningful effect on the social, economic and financial impacts which invariably stem from our close proximity to a highly developed nation of over 200 million people. The sooner this fact of life is recognized the better, for perhaps we will then stop fighting windmills and concentrate on developing realistic Canada-United States relations which will best serve our mutual interests and enhance the ability of each country to attain its own domestic goals.

May I comment on two or three areas of common concern in which efforts should be made to arrive at mutually acceptable agreements as quickly as possible.

One of these, mentioned in Mr. Sharp's White Paper on Canadian Foreign Policy, is the matter of hemispheric security and defence. Surely this is an area in which an intelligent decision can be reached as to what properly should be the responsibility and role of each nation. Two facts are obvious. One is that the United States in its own interests must of necessity be prepared to repel any attack that might be lodged against any region of North America. The other is that Canada lacks the military resources to defend its thousands of miles of coastline against any major military aggressor. This is something that should be kept in mind by Canadian spokesmen when they are vigorously asserting Canada's sovereignty over Arctic waters.

What we presently possess in the Arctic is paper sovereignty. Suppose for the sake of argument the Soviet war fleet moved into Canada's Arctic waters, precisely what would or could Canada do? It would be no defence to quote the federal statute under which we affirm our sovereignty, or to tell the commander of the Russian fleet that the Arctic waters are ours because the royal family visited the region and our Prime Minister spent a night in an Eskimo igloo. In any real confrontation, paper sovereignty becomes meaningless unless it can be backed up by the physical resources and power necessary to enforce statutory claims to ownership and control. Canada does not possess this military strength, and for this reason if any powerful aggressor ever seriously threatened our territory we would be dependent almost entirely on the United States for our defence.

This, I submit, is something for Canadians to think about before joining in the clamour of those condemning the so-called American military establishment, or sharing the enthusiasm of those inviting and welcoming United States army deserters and draftdodgers into Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Obviously Canada should not try to become a military power capable of defending the northern half of this continent, but if we are going to "do our own thing" under the protective shield of United States military strength, surely we have a responsibility to extend reasonable co-operation in matters relating to America's role in preserving hemispheric security and defending the right to self-determination for the peoples of nations in the remaining free world who do not have the military strength to assure that right for themselves. For this reason I most strongly disagree with the Canadian Government's present policy of reducing this country's military strength to insignificance and curtailing Canada's role in NATO and NORAD to a mere token involvement.

Let us now consider for a few moments the matter of Canada-United States trade relations. This is a subject of obvious importance to both nations. Canada is a major purchaser of United States manufactured goods, while the United States provides a market for a substantial volume of Canadian primary products. Many Canadians feel that this country's interests would be better served if we processed more of our raw materials in Canada and exported more finished products, while at the same time decreasing our imports of foreign manufactured goods. This would be an ideal situation, but to attain it would require that we find an effective way to offset the realities of population distribution and geography.

Our relatively small population does not provide adequate markets for mass production of manufactured products, and the vast distances between the location of primary resources and the large population areas of Canada frequently make transportation costs excessive. These disabilities could be offset by higher domestic prices for Canadian manufactured products to permit the balance of our industrial production to be sold in world markets at competitive prices. This course has been pursued successfully by Japan, which is perhaps the leading example in the world today of a nation that imports both raw materials and the fuel and energy resources necessary for their processing, and still competes successfully in selling manufactured goods in competitive world markets.

Would the people of Canada be prepared to pay higher domestic prices to enable this country to become a major exporter of manufactured products? I suggest the answer is no. The attitude of Canadians to the greater domestic utilization of their own petroleum resources is a case in point. The unwillingness of the Canadian Government to extend the market for western Canadian crude oil into the eastern regions of central Canada, through fear of adverse public reaction to even a small increase in the price of gasoline from Montreal east, indicates the Government's belief that Canadians are not prepared to pay higher prices to make possible the greater domestic processing and utilization of their own resources. This position has a direct bearing on United States' reactions to Canada's efforts to market more of our oil in the midwestern States.

The petroleum industry in western Canada has been producing at approximately 50 per cent of its capacity. The vast tar sands reserves of northern Alberta, containing some 300 billion barrels of recoverable oil, remain largely undeveloped, primarily due to lack of markets. At the same time Canada continues to import over 50 per cent of her domestic petroleum requirements. This paradox is due to the fact that production and transportation costs prevent western Canadian oil from competing successfully with oil from Venezuela and the Middle East moved by ocean tanker to markets in eastern and east-central Canada. The mid-central and western United States represent the only other available market for western Canadian crude. To ensure a healthy domestic petroleum industry, the United States has restricted the volume of off-shore oil that can be imported. This action increased the price of gasoline products in the eastern States, which could have been served more cheaply with ocean-borne foreign crude. Canada's present policy is an attempt to gain the best of both worlds. The Canadian Government has consistently declined to place meaningful limitations on off-shore oil coming into this country, because it wants to retain the lowest possible prices for petroleum products in eastern and central Canada. At the same time it is pressing the United States to buy more Canadian crude to ensure the health of our domestic petroleum industry. I submit that this is not a realistic position and therefore not one we can reasonably expect the United States to accept.

More recently, the United States has become anxious to obtain a substantially increased volume of Canadian natural gas. This places Canada in a favourable position to negotiate a Canada-United States trade policy with respect to these two vital energy resources that would be beneficial to both countries. Unfortunately the Canadian Government, at least until recently, has been prone to interpret any request by the United States to discuss natural gas in connection with crude oil purchases as sinister pressure designed to force an international energy policy which might in some way prejudice Canada's independence. In my view, this is setting up straw men and hindering the development of a realistic Canada-United States oil and gas marketing agreement from which Canada would stand to gain more than the United States. I say this because, as far as oil is concerned, while we are wholly dependent on the United States for an export market, the United States has access to other sources of foreign oil to supplement its domestic production.

Finally, let us consider briefly the moot question of United States capital investment in Canada. This is a subject of deep and legitimate Canadian concern. The ideal situation in any nation is for its citizens to own and control their own industrial and commercial enterprises to the maximum extent possible. In Canada's case the practical problem is our lack of sufficient domestic capital to meet our requirements. We therefore must choose between slower economic growth and the wise utilization of foreign capital. Some might be prepared to accept the lower standard of living that slower economic growth would dictate, but the fact remains that most Canadians undoubtedly want a sustained high rate of economic growth and the better living standards it makes possible. To fulfil this desire, Canada must continue to have access to substantial amounts of foreign capital.

This is a matter in which the experience of the Province of Alberta may be of interest. In the late 1930s the provincial government made a concerted effort to stimulate energy resources development. Serious attempts were made to pursuade financial houses in central Canada to encourage the investment of Canadian capital in the search for oil in Alberta. These appeals met with very little response. At that time the mining industry in Ontario and the pulp and paper industry in Quebec were the main centres of attraction and there was little interest in what was regarded as the highly speculative risks involved in searching for oil in the Canadian west. Failing to interest Canadian capital, the provincial government and the petroleum industry in 1938 sent a joint delegation to England to try to interest British investors in the potential inherent in the search for oil. Unfortunately the time was not opportune. War clouds already were forming over Europe and the Second World War was in the offing. These uncertain conditions deterred any interest that might otherwise have been aroused on the part of British investors. It was at this point the Government of Alberta turned to the United States as a source of investment capital for the development of natural resources of vital importance, not only to the province but to Canada as a whole. The results of the response are now facts of history. Suffice to say, the transformation in Alberta's economy and standard of living which has taken place in the last quarter of a century has been due in no small part to the substantial infusion of American capital that started at that time.

The social and economic improvements which that transformation produced may not appear significant to a generation that has come to regard these advantages as not only a matter of course but of right, but to those who endured the privations of the grim depression years before this development took place, the contrast is seen in a very different light.

At the same time it must be recognized that there are important factors pertinent to the wise use of foreign capital. It must be made clear to foreign investors that they will be expected to be sensitive to Canada's legitimate national aspirations, concerns and interests. As an evidence of such sensitivity they should be willing to accept a minority equity position in Canadian corporate structures and be prepared to enter into joint ventures with Canadian companies rather than establishing new corporate entities in which the majority of equity stock is held by foreign interests. American companies desirous of doing business in Canada should, as a matter of policy, utilize Canadian management and Canadian labour to the maximum extent possible. It goes without saying that such companies should conform in every respect to Canadian domestic policies as evidence of good corporate citizenship.

The Government of Canada on the other hand should drop its negative attitude to foreign capital and should concentrate on ways and means to ensure maximum benefits to this country from foreign investment. We should avoid arbitrary blanket controls of a nature that makes Canada unattractive to international investors. We should not make the mistake of assigning broad regulatory powers over foreign investment to bureaucratic government agencies. We should reject the ill-founded proposition that the Government should restrict the free movement of corporate ownership between nations by erecting statutory "Berlin walls" to forcibly retain such ownership in Canada.

It is significant that those who claim to be the great champions of civil rights and who make the loudest protests against any curtailment of the right of individuals to do as they wish and to move freely and at will between nations, even if their interests are subversive, are the same people who clamour for government restrictions to prevent Canadian citizens from exercising their legitimate right to transfer their joint ownership of a company to foreign investors.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: A nation that professes to be a free society can best retain within its boundaries the ownership of its corporations by means of the same inducements which effectively retain the domicile of its citizens, namely, a social and economic and financial and political environment that makes such domicile or ownership desirable and beneficial.

Above all, our prime objective should be to develop a positive program to encourage and facilitate investment in national economic growth by the maximum number of Canadian citizens. This, I submit, requires two things: first, a tax structure that does not discourage individual Canadian investors or put Canadian companies at a disadvantage as compared to their American counterparts.

This is one of the serious weaknesses of the present Canadian tax structure and of the federal Government's White Paper proposals for tax reform. In too many circumstances American investors and American corporations enjoy greater tax advantages than their Canadian counterparts which has the effect of putting them in a position to outbid Canadian interests in acquiring control of Canadian companies.

Second, if we really want the participation of the maximum number of Canadians, we must take the steps necessary to restructure the traditional procedures used in raising equity and debenture money for corporate enterprise. The present practices provide only limited opportunity and even less inducement for individual investors to get involved. Too often when a stock or debenture issue comes on the market it is tailored to the convenience of the institutional investor. Underwritten issues frequently are placed privately with large institutional buyers and little or no effort is made to meet the interests of small investors and actively solicit their participation. This practice ignores two pertinent facts. First, it is very much in Canada's interest that the largest possible number of individual Canadian citizens have a stake in the nation's industrial and commercial enterprises, especially those associated with the development and processing of natural resources. Second, the millions of Canadians capable of making at least a small investment, if encouraged to do so, in the aggregate represent a vast pool of largely untapped investment capital which could significantly decrease Canada's present dependence on foreign sources.

Some years ago, when the Alberta Gas Trunk Line structure was created to gather and transport natural gas within the province, there was a significant demonstration of the readiness of citizens to participate in a viable enterprise involving their resources, if given an opportunity under circumstances which encourage their participation. Alberta Gas Trunk was set up by a special statute of legislature. It is not a crown corporation and no public money was put into it. The Government required that the equity stock in the company be offered exclusively to residents of Alberta. The share purchase price purposely was kept low to bring the stock within the financial reach of almost everyone. The initial issue was in the aggregate amount of approximately $17 million. The significant thing was that applications for over $70 million worth of stock were received from Alberta citizens.

Such a response certainly proved that small investors, if given an appropriate vehicle, can and will provide vast sums of investment capital for viable projects. We have failed to provide such vehicles in this country as a whole. If this deficiency were corrected, the response of small investors would go a long way toward lessening Canada's present dependence on foreign capital.

I do not regard the proposed Canadian Development Corporation as a desirable or satisfactory vehicle to accomplish this objective. Its employment of public funds will impose additional demands on Canadian taxpayers and the direct involvement of government will make the corporation subject to inevitable political pressures. A preferable alternative would be legislation providing simple regional corporate structures independent of government, and expressly designed to encourage and facilitate maximum local citizen participation in specific enterprises in which they have a mutual interest. Such structures would be a positive approach to greater Canadian ownership of Canadian industry, and could do much to establish and maintain a satisfactory balance between domestic and foreign investment capital.

Let me emphasize in closing that there are no political or economic or financial problems between Canada and the United States which are incapable of solution if approached intelligently and in a spirit of mutual co-operation and goodwill. Instead of magnifying our minor disagreements and exaggerating those routine problems which are normal when a large nation and a small nation live in close proximity, let us thank God that the people of both countries have so much in common. There are no other two nations living side by side anywhere on this earth whose open boundaries and common aspirations and ideals make co-operation and mutual goodwill so natural or so easy to attain. How different the circumstances would be for Canada if we shared this continent with a totalitarian world power dedicated to burying the capitalist system and given to overrunning its weaker neighbours by brute military force. Under such circumstances the international boundary would bristle with tank traps and gun emplacements instead of signs welcoming Canadian visitors as neighbours and friends.

It is my sincere hope that this new decade will see the governments and people of both countries rise above negative and retrogressive nationalism, that our progress in Canada towards true national greatness may be enhanced by wise and constructive relations with our great and friendly neighbour. As a step to that end I urge the Government of this country to undertake without delay a meaningful reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations. I ask the Government Leader in this house to bring this request to the attention of the Prime Minister.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary, debate adjourned.

PENSION ACT AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

EFFECT OF DELAY IN GIVING ROYAL ASSENT—QUESTION

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can now answer the question I asked him on March 31 last as to the reason for the delay in giving royal assent to the act to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, and if as a result of the two-week delay the pensioners under that act lost benefits for those two weeks.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think honourable Senator White is quite right in asking that question. I must admit that I had forgotten about it. I shall make enquiries and endeavour to have the answer available tomorrow.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hastings that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs examine and report on the operation and administration of the Criminal Records Act, chapter 40 of the statutes of 1969-70, and in particular upon the operation and administration of subsection (2) of section 4 thereof.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with the consent of honourable Senator Thompson, I ask leave to resume the debate on his behalf.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It must be perfectly understood that if honourable Senator Hastings speaks now, since he has introduced a substantial motion, his speech now will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on the motion which I introduced yesterday, I have just two or three remarks to make with respect to the views expressed by the honourable Senator Beaubien.

My first observation is that I do not think in any of my remarks I referred to criminals, as Senator Beaubien seems to have understood. I think he misunderstood what I said. I referred to the treatment of individuals who had at one time or another run afoul of the law, served their sentences and as a result of their incarceration had benefited from their sentence and had resumed worthwhile lives within society. I cannot imagine that in this day and age men who go through that experience and travel that journey should still be referred to as criminals. It is that premise that is causing Canada to have more criminals and more prisoners in proportion to its population than any other country in the world. If we accept that premise, that because you were once in prison a criminal you were, a criminal you are and a criminal you will always be, then, honourable senators, go on building your prisons and penitentiaries bigger and in the wrong places, for the wrong purpose and for the wrong people. Continue to use outmoded ideas of prison reform and Canada will maintain the record of having proportionately more people filling its prisons than any other nation in the free world.

Senator Beaubien also referred to "bleeding hearts," and I make no apology for standing here and being described as a bleeding heart. I told you last night of the work undertaken in St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary by a group of Montreal businessmen, the Montreal chapter of the Data Processing Association of America. These businessmen take two nights a week to go to that institution to teach men a worthwhile course, to give them confidence in applying for employment, and when they successfully complete that course, assist them in getting employment in industry. These men do this work two nights a week throughout the winter. It is done on a voluntary basis, without pay, and as a result of their efforts, as I told you last night, 29 men out of 30 have been rehabilitated.

So, honourable senators, those men are bleeding hearts, and I will proudly join them. They give their time voluntarily in an effort to help other men to reform, and I will join them at any time. Can any one show me any course undertaken by the Canadian Penitentiary Service or any other program in these institutions that can show that kind of record for returning a man to a worthwhile life and worthwhile employment? As I say, I will join those bleeding hearts at any time.

I will join people like Allen MacLeod, the former Commissioner of Penitentiaries, who time and time again urged former governments to make changes in our penal reform and penal acts and in the treatment of prisoners. I will join bleeding hearts like Justice Ouimet, who studied this whole problem and presented the Government with a voluminous report on reforms and changes needed in the treatment of these individuals. I will join a bleeding heart like Warden Pierre Jutras of Drumheller Penitentiary who as a result of his efforts with these men and adopting new ways of treating men can point to the fact that the men coming out of Drumheller institution have a 20 per cent lower recidivist rate than those coming out of any other penal institution in Canada.

By treating men as men and giving them a little responsibility and challenging opportunities. We need reform or we will have more Kingstons, and I do not apologize to the correction officer in that institution who blamed his difficulties on bleeding hearts and do-gooders.

Honourable senators, I accept the premise that if you treat a man as a man he will react as a man. Treat him as an animal and he will react as an animal, as was vividly shown at Kingston penitentiary.

The motion that I put before the Senate was to give consideration to what I thought was a needed change in the administration of the Criminal Records Act, to accept the premise that to err is human and to forgive is divine, and to stop using the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the investigative procedure of that act. If I did that, then, as a bleeding heart I have no apology to make.

Motion agreed to, on division.

MASS MEDIA

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE —DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 24, consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, perhaps I should begin my remarks by outlining the approach I propose to take. I shall begin with some general remarks about Senate committees, after which I shall say something about the posture of our report. I shall then explain how it was covered by the newspapers and the radio and television stations across the country, and say something about how the media responded editorially. Following that I propose to discuss the actual debate which has already taken place. Indeed, the main thrust of my remarks this afternoon will revolve around the debate on the media that we have listened to in this chamber. I propose to conclude my remarks with a discussion of some of the things that I honestly believe have been accomplished by the committee's report.

In expressing my profound belief in the value of special Senate committees I am not even momentarily downgrading this chamber's pre-eminent legislative function. I find it necessary to say that, honourable senators, because of the dramatic increase in the activities of Senate committees, which prompted one of my colleagues to say almost defensively that our legislative function remains. Indeed it does. I think its value was well underlined in Senator Aseltine's retirement statement when he informed us that the Government had accepted in his time here 1,000 amendments from the Senate.

It should be possible for us to perform this legislative function while doing a still greater degree of effective committee work. This is exactly what is happening at the present time in this chamber. I honestly believe that the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media worked as effectively as any royal commission, and for far less money and in far less time.

It is worth noting in passing that of our carefully budgeted expenditure of $600,000, approximately 50 per cent was used in printing and production. Royal commissions are not, of course, required to publish their evidence on a day-by-day basis. However, I hasten to add that special Senate committees are by no means perfect instruments. May I suggest, therefore, with great respect, one or two ways in which they might be improved.

First, why do we insist on structuring our committees to a comparable size of those in the other place? When our committee was formed the number of senators was less than 90, and yet we insisted upon a membership of 15 and a quorum of five. Surely a membership of seven and a quorum of three would have made far greater sense under the circumstances. So I for one would be in favour of smaller committees.

Most members of our committee, and most certainly its Chairman, continue even to this day to be inundated with letters, speaking engagements, academic interviews and articles to be written. Meanwhile an invaluable staff has disappeared, leaving the senator—and here I speak personally—unable to crawl out from under a mound of priorities. As I am sure honourable senators realize, I personally considered that taking the position of our committee before the people of Canada across the country was worthy of my priority and attention. I can only apologize for articles that I promised and which are past due, for unanswered mail, and for speaking engagements which still await fulfilment.

Secondly, I would make a plea for more help for the committee. Indeed, I would argue for more help for senators generally. Certainly I wish it had been possible for me to retain some of our staff for a longer period. In fairness, I should say that I did not ask that they be retained, but certainly I wish I had.

May I be allowed to say one word about Senate committees generally? I confess that this relates rather directly to the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media. I was very much in favour of the new agency known as Information Canada when it was first announced. I felt at the time that most Government information services could benefit from greater correlation, modernization, a general overhaul and an upgrading and improvement. I still believe this. I did not share, and still do not share, the view of some that Information Canada might become some super propaganda arm of the federal Government or, worse still, of the Liberal party. I can assure honourable senators that, based on recent experience, Information Canada poses no such threat. It is just not that well organized. When it came to the handling of the distribution of our report I must confess that the services of Information Canada were less than satisfactory. I believe that our report was one of the first to be distributed by Information Canada and I would be less than honest if I did not inform the chamber that I was keenly disappointed.

One of two specific examples will make my point. The following letter to the editor appeared in a recent issue of the Globe and Mail. I do not recall the date, but it was within the last few weeks. The letter is signed by Michael J. Divers of London, Ontario, and reads as follows:

> Following the publication of the Senate Committee's Report on the Mass Media, Senator Keith Davey urged the public, in numerous interviews, to purchase and read a copy of the report. On the day of publication, December 10, 1970, I sent off an order to the Queen's Printer for two copies of the report. On March 17, 1971, I finally received a reply stating that the report was unavailable and to inquire again in two months' time.

He wrote on December 10, and the first thing he heard was on March 17:

> I finally received a reply stating that the report was unavailable and to inquire again in two months' time. From newspaper accounts of the Davey Report it would appear that all was not well with the industry of the mass media. I wonder if the terms of reference of the Davey Committee should not have included an investigation into the Government's own publishing procedures.

Let me give you another example. This is a letter from a lecturer at the University of British Columbia. A little later in my remarks I will quote the comments contained in this letter, but now let me put this before you:

> The only negative note associated with your Committee's Report is the rather fantastic difficulty we've had procuring copies of it. On the day of its issue Queen's Printer-Information Canada here—

This is, of course, in Vancouver:

> —had precisely twenty-four copies which were, of course, sold out immediately. A concerted phone campaign by me (three times a day for one week) resulted in about seventy coming out later; these quickly sold out and for quite some time copies of the Report simply haven't been available here.
> I had the University Bookstore order eighty copies (of Volume One) and the Bookstore was told by Information Canada here that their three-volume sets could not be broken—besides, sufficient copies had not filtered out here from Ottawa to fulfill the order. Therefore we contacted Information Canada in Ottawa and my eighty copies were trucked out here—two weeks later the truck arrived and my students were able to purchase their copies—six weeks after the report was tabled! We're already sold out and I'm afraid my nervous system simply can't take another marathon procurement battle with Information Canada.

Some weeks ago an advertisement of Information Canada appeared in a number of newspapers. I saw it in all three Toronto newspapers, "The rest of the family is coming to Toronto", and the announcement of the opening of the Information Canada bookstore. There are two things that distress me with respect to this announcement. First of all, listed in the corner is "Mass Media, Report of the Special Committee, three volumes $13.50". What is missing is the statement that Volume I is the report, which I would hope most Canadians can read and which can be obtained separately for only $3.50 instead of three volumes at $13.50. If that was not enough, on the day this advertisement appeared in the three Toronto daily newspapers the report was not available at the Information Canada bookstore in Toronto.

I had a really difficult time finding out how many copies have been printed and how many sold. We found out this morning that a third printing of this report has now been completed in response, I understand, to a heavier demand than Information Canada had expected. I do know that a number of private bookstores across the country were in fact prepared to stock the report. They were not, of course, approached by Information Canada. I wonder why? Ultimately a few private bookstores in the Toronto area stocked the report because of my own initiative in making sure they received copies. It is not a very attractive track record and I hope, Senator Croll, that you will not say you have not been warned when the time comes to table the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

There is one footnote I would like to insert with respect to Information Canada. I was concerned to read the following in the current issue of Marketing:

> The Federal Government's proposed advisory board on advertising does not intend to discourage presentations from U.S.-owned agencies with Canadian branches.
> Information Canada director-general Jean Louis Gagnon said the function of the advisory panel—to be incorporated within IC—will be to guide government departments in the best possible ad spending direction.

Mr. Gagnon was asked about presentations from U.S.-owned agencies, and he replied:

> If they have the Canadian outlets which can work efficiently and can provide a practical and economic service then they will not be discouraged by our panel,—

I would be curious to learn in time from the Government Leader if the Director-General of Information Canada was speaking for himself or, in fact, voicing Government policy. I hope it is not the latter, given the fact that in the report we dwell on our concern about the Americanization of Canadian advertising.

Let me say in summary that I think Information Canada is an excellent concept. It is staffed, to my understanding, by sincere, capable people who still need, however, to find some way of putting it all together.

Before I turn to the debate in the chamber it might be useful to recall what I conceive to be the posture of our report, and then perhaps turn momentarily to a discussion of how the report has been received across the country. As you know, we really had three concerns. The first of these was to achieve, and find ways and means of encouraging, a multiplication of media voices. We were concerned when our research informed us that 66 per cent of the daily newspapers in Canada and almost 50 per cent of the television and broadcasting stations are involved in some form or other of common or concentrated ownership. As I said many times, I do not believe that most owners and managers of the mass media in Canada lack a sense of responsibility or tolerance for a diversity of views. I do not believe that there is a small group of men who gather for breakfast every morning and decide what it is they will make the Canadian people believe on that particular day. Emotion often outruns the evidence of those who argue a conspiracy theory of propagandists' manipulation of the masses. On the other hand, one reason evidence is so hard to come by is that the media tend to give less publicity to their own abuses than, say, to those of politicians. The media operate as a check upon other institutional power centres in our country; there is, however, no check upon the media.

Just as it is a mistake to overstate the existence and potential for abuse, so in my judgment it is a mistake to ignore the evidence that it has existed.

With that background, as I am sure honourable senators will realize, we proceed to a series of recommendations, which included such matters as a publications loan development fund and a press ownership review board. The first part of the posture concerned ways and means of achieving a multiplication of media voices. Secondly, we wanted to bring forward ideas which would result in an escalation in the quality of all the media voices and all the messages of those voices. I think that inevitably this brought us to a very significant judgmental conclusion with regard to the quality of media voices. What, in fact, is a good newspaper; what is a good radio station; what is a good television station? As honourable senators will recall, we decided that it is one which is preparing its audience for the onslaught of social change. I would like to deal with that in just a moment or two.

However, the committee also believed that freedom of the press must be accompanied by responsibility of the press, the press being the first source of responsibility and the public the second source. Some may argue that if press and public cannot make newspapers perform as they should, then government should intervene to make sure that the press behaves responsibly. A glaring weakness in that theory, however, is that it makes the mistake of invoking government as the guarantor of freedom. Responsibility must come from within and not be imposed from outside.

One thing was very clear from our research, and that was that the media collectively and on the average, because of their profitability, possessed the resources to do much better. As you know, in Volume II we outlined these resources in considerable depth. Canada's newspapers by and large aspire to quality. Where they differ is in performance. If there is a distinction to be made in this respect, it lies in the extent to which commercial considerations affect editorial excellence. A newspaper is a business. It must pay or perish. The desire to make money and the desire to make a good newspaper are not mutually exclusive, but some publishers are unable, and some are unwilling, to give excellence an equal priority with profit. It is not that the companies are charging too much, but that they are spending too little. One of the most thoughtful analyses I have seen of those sections of our report dealing with profitability of the media is contained in the December 19, 1970, issue of the Financial Post and I would like to quote from it briefly:

> Many media men prefer to measure profitability by expressing profits as a percentage of revenue. The Davey Committee report calculated this too—

As most certainly we did.

> —but emphasized return on equity in concluding that newspaper publishing and broadcasting were highly profitable industries.

Then here is the crunch paragraph:

> As the accompanying charts and table show, newspapers and large broadcasters fare rather well no matter which yardsticks are used.

There is one footnote to our discussion of profitability that I would like to deal with in the course of my remarks, and perhaps this is the time. I would like to quote an editorial written by the publisher of the Winnipeg Tribune, which appeared in his paper on December 11, 1970. I would like to read the key excerpt. Referring to our profitability comments he said:

> I don't question DBS figures. But I do fault the Davey committee for using them to make a generalized statement which is misleading, to say the least, as far as The Tribune is concerned. This newspaper has never made that kind of money.
> During the period 1958-65, The Tribune's profit as a percentage of equity was less than four per cent. You could do better in a true savings account.
> Since 1967, The Tribune's profitability has decreased. Last year we lost money and we will this year too. For the first time in many years, The Tribune is not able to give its staff a bonus of a week's pay for Christmas.
> If Senator Davey had been unaware of our position, his generalization might have been excused. But the committee had the information at least for last year. For reasons of omission or commission—the sins they accuse us of—these facts are not made clear.

I have two comments to make about that charge, and I would like to put them on our record. First of all, we said in the introduction to the report:

> Our relationship with the media has been cordial and upon occasion frank and confidential. That confidentiality has been respected.

Indeed, we did receive from the various newspapers, radio stations and television stations a great deal of confidential information, much of it financial. That information, however, was kept under lock and key at all times. It was coded so that my colleagues on the committee were not aware in detail of its specific contents, or which information related to which newspaper. The material has since been destroyed, and the confidentiality we speak of has been totally protected. Indeed, the figure I was quoting was released by the Tribune itself in that article. It seems to me that had we released any of this information, particularly about confidential financial data, we would have failed to keep faith with the people who supplied it to us in confidence that it would not be so released.

Again at page 63 of the report we say:

> There are a number of individual newspapers and broadcasting stations that are having trouble meeting their payrolls. But—

Then the next three words are in italics.

> —on the average, media corporations are onto a very good thing indeed.

So, with great respect to Mr. Williams, I honestly do not think the complaint voiced in that editorial holds water.

There was just one other aspect of our posture: First of all, ways of achieving multiplication of media voices; secondly, ways and means of achieving an escalation of quality of the message, the quality of the media voices; and thirdly, a very real concern, not for economic nationalism—which Senator Manning was discussing earlier this afternoon but rather economic nationalism's twin brother, cultural survival.

As I have done so often—indeed, in almost every major city in Canada since Christmas—I would like to put before you the Canadian-American relationship, at least as we conceived it. Certainly in many ways it does not do a great injustice to the remarks we heard earlier this afternoon. I quote from page 11 of the report:

> We all know the obstacles involved in this task. Geography, language, and perhaps a failure of confidence and imagination have made us into a cultural as well as economic satellite of the United States. And nowhere is this trend more pronounced than in the media. Marquis Childs on the editorial page. Little Orphan Annie back near the classified ads. Nixon and Tiny Tim and Jerry Rubin and Johnny Carson and Lawrence Welk and Timothy Leary on the tube. The Beach Boys and Blind Faith and Simon and Garfunkel on the radio. The latest VC bodycounts courtesy of AP and UPI. The self-image of an entire generation shaped by Peter Fonda riding a stars-and-stripes motorcycle. Need we continue?
> We are not suggesting that these influences are undesirable, not that they can or should be restricted. The United States happens to be the most important, most interesting country on earth. The vigor and diversity of its popular culture—which is close to becoming a world culture—obsesses, alarms, and amuses not just Canadians, but half the people of the world.
> What we are suggesting is that the Canadian media—especially broadcasting—have an interest in and an obligation to promote our apartness from the American reality. For all our similarities, for all our > sharing, for all our friendships, we are somebody else. Our national purpose, as enunciated in the B.N.A. Act, is "peace, order and good Government," a becomingly modest ideal that is beginning to look more and more attractive. Their purpose is "the pursuit of happiness," a psychic steeplechase which has been known to lead to insanity.

How did the newspapers, radio stations and television stations across this country greet the report? I think it is fair to say that the coverage, as I am sure you realize, was extensive, and I would dare to believe that on balance it was favourable. Each medium tended, of course, to be rather parochial; that is, the daily newspapers focusing in on the comments we had to make about newspapers, the radio stations concerning themselves with our comments about the radio stations; the weeklies worried about what we said about weeklies; each medium tending, with the exception I suppose of the daily newspapers, to ignore by and large the comments we have made about other media.

I am sure honourable senators will realize that some of the newspapers were extremely parochial in their coverage and in their comments. There was inordinate interest in the very limited box score we supplied to newspaper, radio and television stations across the country.

For example, the Montreal Star found it reassuring to assure its readers, in a box on the front page, that the Senate Committee on Mass Media thought the Gazette was a mediocre newspaper.

The Vancouver Sun, on the day we tabled our report, had this rather astonishing headline:

> Press probe (blush) likes The Sun

And the ticker across the top:

> Aw Shucks, Senator Davey

The leading paragraphs in the story say that the committee recommended that more newspapers in Canada should be like the Vancouver Sun—a statement which I have not been able to find anywhere in the report. The interest in this box score phenomenon rather surprised us because wherever we spoke specifically about a specific newspaper or radio station or television station we carefully said that these were examples. It was apparent from the response of the media people across the country that there is a good market for some one, I suppose, annually to probe the reputation of the newspaper, radio and television stations across the country. It would be tempting, indeed.

There is only one comment about this so-called box score that has been referred to by some, which I think I should insert at this time. A great many of the smaller newspapers—those not in Toronto and Montreal—responded by saying: It is fine to talk about the excellent newspapers in Toronto and Montreal, but how can you expect us to be like they are; how can we, for example, perform like the Montreal Star?

The answer to that, of course, is that the comparison which should be made is not with some big city newspapers—the Toronto Star, the Montreal Star, The Globe and Mail—but rather with newspapers of cities of comparable size elsewhere in the country, with excellent newspapers, for example, of the kind we have in London, the kind we have in Kitchener, which are examples of excellent small city newspapers.

Television coverage was, of necessity, inadequate. I am talking now not about the response to the report in terms of editorial comment—I will return to that in a moment—but rather about the coverage the tabling of the report received.

Television coverage was barely adequate. Canadian Television did a more effective job than the CBC. That should be said, in fairness. Doug Collins in the new publication Content rather effectively summed up television coverage. He said:

> Television's performance was abysmally bad. Neither network gave the report enough space, and with what space it gave, CBC did a worse job than CTV. One would expect more from the public network. But it didn't even have an interview with Davey (CTV did), and it compounded this omission with the gratuitous suggestion that there wasn't too much interest in the report since only twenty or so reporters turned up for the press conference. Obviously, somebody didn't know or care that the multitude arrived at 8 a.m. to get the report and remained locked up with it for six hours. Also, both networks played the Vancouver Sun—Charles Lynch game. CBC had to mention the great news that if it didn't exist it would have to be invented, and CTV had to mention that its nightly newscast was "creditable".

I do not think we could seriously expect that television, in the nature of that medium, could cover this kind of document in a way that would be meaningful.

As I am sure you will realize that in order to understand the report properly it really must be read. However, before I leave television, is it not a mind-boggling thought to realize that it is clear, in one of these studies in Volume III, that for the majority of Canadians, television is the first source of finding out what is happening in the world.

I wonder if these people regard themselves as well-informed citizens of Canada. I am sure most members of this chamber will realize, it has not been roses, roses all the way, all the editorial way.

Before offering the following observation, I want to stress that I have absolutely no quarrel with the editorials written in a free press and a free society by people who are outraged or outrageous.

In any case, most editorial writers across Canada retained their dignity as well as their equilibrium. However, those who did not, I am confident, will get their second wind and look at themselves, as well as at me, critically.

Halifax understandably has been an especially interesting case in point. I have here the December 10 front page of the Halifax Mail-Star. As you will see, there is an editorial running the full length of the column, down the left-hand side. I promise I will not read all of it. One or two quotations will make the point. It says:

> The report of the Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media contains a harsh, unfair, unsubstantiated and often vicious attack on the Chronicle-Herald and the Mail-Star . . .
> Nothing in the committee's report, least of all its plethora of cheap, offensive rhetoric and Madison Avenue jargon, will divert us from this purpose . . .
> In a free enterprise system, to which Senator Davey may or may not be dedicated, newspapers, like magazines, are either profitable, or they cease to exist. Under a different system, in which journals are subsidized by the state—there exists plenty of examples of such government-aided newspapers, in countries such as Russia.

You get the idea. It goes on, in similar vein. Fair enough. That is editorial comment.

The Chronicle-Herald returned the very next day—

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That is the evening paper.

Hon. Mr. Davey: That is the evening paper, but the same editorial was in the Chronicle-Herald. It was in both papers. The same day the Chronicle-Herald returned to the fray, this time not in editorial comment but rather in the news pages. And this is a front page which I will treasure and treasure always. It was in the left-hand corner. Senator Cameron can see it. There is a story headed by pictures of three people—Spiro Agnew, Martha Mitchell and me. It was rather stunning indeed.

There is a story in the centre of the page of the Chronicle-Herald, which reads: "Senate star Davey cut after 54 days." That of course refers to my career in professional football, when I served as Canadian football commissioner for 54 days. I should add that Halifax was not alone in drawing attention to my career in football. Even the august Hamilton Spectator had the same thing in an editorial which appeared on December 12: "The Davey Burlesque". It begins with a comment:

> The reaction varies from disappointment to amusement, and even contempt. Perhaps a few excited yawns.

This refers to the reaction of the staff of the Spectator. My friends at the Spectator tell me that the editorial was written by the publisher himself. He was yawning so hard that he wrote the longest editorial in the history of the Spectator. It also says:

> Davey then got the $30,000 a year job of Canadian Football Commissioner, which lasted for 54 days. The press had a good deal of fun with this, which enraged him. Davey by then had achieved the reputation of a clown prince of failure.

That was written by the publisher.

One more football editorial would make the point, but I am not sure that my career in football was germane to the discussion. Listen to this one:

> Senator Davey's performance in the Senate seems to be as disastrous for the integrity of that body as his brief commissionership of the Canadian Football League promised to be for Canadian football. Unfortunately, it's more difficult to get rid of an inept senator than it is to induce the resignation of an erratic football commissioner.

That is from our friend Ron Gostick up there in Flesherton.

Honourable senators, so much for coverage. What was the reaction of the media? When one asks that question, one almost immediately asks, how did the daily newspapers respond? But of course there are many other measures of how the media responded, and while I want to look at the daily papers let me for the moment look very specifically at the weekly press.

Here is an editorial from a specific weekly paper that I will burden you with. It is from the January 14 issue of the Huron Expositor of Seaforth, Ontario. The editor is Andrew Y. McLean. It reads:

> The report of the Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media provides emphasis on the problems facing the weeklies at a time when the weekly industry is undergoing more changes probably than at any time since William Lyon McKenzie published his Colonial Advocate in Toronto more than a hundred years ago.
> While a relatively small portion of the report is devoted to weeklies the conclusions which are reached suggest a sympathetic and informed knowledge of Canada's community newspapers as excerpts from the report which appear on page 10 of this issue indicate.

This editorial concludes:

> The Senate committee report serves a most helpful purpose not only in highlighting the changes that are occurring but also emphasizing the role of the weekly and the significant community contribution it makes.

Honourable senators will be interested to know that the publication of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association, the Canadian Weekly Publisher, devoted almost its entire issue of January 1971, to comment on and coverage of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media. Indeed, the actual section of the report dealing with weeklies is reprinted in its entirety. I will read you only a sentence or two from what was written by the President of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association, Mr. Charles Hawkins. Here is the way he began his comments in this report:

> CWNA's self-analysis brief to the Senate in 1970 and their revealing views about the state of the weekly press in Canada was the greatest thing that happened to us in several years.

> The Senate report devoted several pages to the community press. They were critical of CWNA in certain areas. But let's not be like so much of the fourth estate today, particularly the daily press which when under criticism always wants the last word in self-defence.

What analysis of comment of the weekly newspapers across Canada could be complete wthout some reference to Ma Murray? I have here the December 17 issue of the Bridge River-Lillooet News. As some of you no doubt know, each issue of this paper has in the centre of it an editorial entitled "Ma Says". In this particular issue Ma was talking about our report. Before she came to the nub of her remarks she gave this lead:

> According to the Senate, it's the people of Canada who let the press 'let them down'. Report good, but won't help, now the barn door is locked. Senate now takes the cue. God knows there's lots more to investigate.

This is a long article and I will read only the opening paragraph or two. It says:

> For 50 years, the public of Canada have been condemning the Senate.
> The Senate, or Upper House means just that; to hold a brake on democratically governed people—and thus it had a reason to be there.
> We'd say, that the recent Senate committee on the mass media of the country ought to whittle a decade of criticism off that august body for doing it.
> The last 25 years, there's been out and out blackguarding of the Senate, partially sparked by the Socialists, but pursued by the press.
> Now the Senate can go on and investigate other abuses of public interest and not blush for the audacity of attacking something that is cheating on the confused and distracted people of Canada.
> Canada is not the only country that has let the reins of government get wrested out of the hands of the people. The people let themselves be hoodwinked out of a natural heritage when they let greed and avarice hide the real objective of democracy.
> This Senate committee was headed by Keith Davey, a youngster in the realms of the Senate procedures, but young enough to see and courage enough to admit that there was a great need for the public eye to be turned on his own profession, the press!
> It took a year to compile the Senate press report and anyone who listens or reads is now hearing a good deal about it. It cost the people a couple million, maybe!

Ma's estimate is about four times too high.

> It is bulky and will be no best seller but the virtue of it is the Senate had enough fortitude to act, and only the Government could draw such information out of the tycoon-publishers and get away with it.
> Regardless, well intended and now completed, the media report is too late to correct much of the iniquity now entrenched in the press and electronic distributors of the news. It was costly perhaps but not in vain, as well as the Senate now finding a use for itself. This investigation should agree with every taxpayer and should not now stop. The Senate can engage in many such public services and find out what makes the system tick and this would justify the Senate in the public mind. The people cannot abolish the Senate, tho to read the critics, it would seem a push-over. In the implementing of democracy, the Senate will have to remain.

I was grateful to Senator Yuzyk, who took the section of the report dealing with the ethnic press and had it specially prepared and distributed to every ethnic editor in the country. I am sorry he is not present this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is at the meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I hope he will learn of my remarks.

Honourable senators, one measure of daily newspaper thrust and acceptance in Canada is the fact that most Canadians still look first to the written press when it comes to measuring any kind of editorial response. How did the daily newspapers treat this committee editorially? First of all, they were more favourable than you might have imagined. Perhaps, I could give you one or two examples, because for the most part it was judged to have been a useful exercise. One or two quotes will suffice. The Calgary Herald on December 10, 1970, had this to say:

> No reasonable person can object to constructive criticism and advice from responsible quarters.

On December 10, 1970, Christopher Young of the Ottawa Citizen put it this way:

> It is good to have our shortcomings and failures set down by objective men who sympathize with our problems, share our goals and seek what we seek: a better performance in the public interest.

The Montreal Gazette of December 11 states that the report was presented in the spirit of constructive criticism.

Claude Ryan of Le Devoir wrote on December 12 concerning our report, but I do not have the English translation and I should not like to attempt the French. Let me just say that Mr. Ryan had many favourable comments to make about the report, its timing, and its value.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Davey a question? He mentioned Claude Ryan of Le Devoir. I understand that in the Province of Quebec a press council has been or is to be formed. Can Senator Davey say whether there is any relationship between that and the views of the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media?

Hon. Mr. Davey: I thank Senator Martin for his question. A press council has in fact been formed in the Province of Quebec. With Senator Martin's forebearance I will continue my present remarks and turn to that subject in a moment.

The Vancouver Sun on December 11 remarked that the committee was to be commended for the scope of its job and the speed with which it discharged it. An editorial in the Edmonton Journal of December 11 said:

> Exhortations about improvement of the press by the press are salutary.

The editor of the London Free Press wrote as follows:

> The Uncertain Mirror, however, is an excellent short course in journalism. Most of journalism's faults are laid bare, but fortunately the writers and those who approved it also mentioned the good points, too.
> If you spend $3.50 and read it, you'll be in an even better position to argue with newspapermen or broadcasters you know.

Gerald Waring of the Vancouver Sun on December 16 said:

> —valuable as a social and historical work, as a documentary on the ways the media function at this stage of our social and national development—The Senate has held many inquiries over the years, but with rare exceptions it has not paid much attention to the question of how well specific industries and professions meet the needs of the society they serve. This is what the media inquiry does, and in fathering this probe, Sen. Keith Davey must have set a pattern for further Senate inquiries of vertical rather than horizontal nature.

The editor of the Woodstock, New Brunswick, Bugle Gazette-Times, Mr. Frank Withers, in a letter to the editor of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, said:

> The best evidence of the need for the media inquiry was the improvement in the Irving papers since the inquiry started.

Needless to say the style of the report came in for a great deal of comment and was almost universally praised. The only negative views came from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which described the report as being "turgid". But most people liked the welcome change from Royal Commission prose: "vivid style", (Ottawa Citizen, December 19): "catchy reading, full of phrase-making and bon mots", (Michael Harrington in St. John's Telegram): "le ton, précis, direct—le style, vif, parfois cavalier", (Claude Gravel, La Presse, le 12 décembre): "readable, mod-mod report", (Anthony Westell, Toronto Star, December 10, and the Star itself said:

> The style is never less than clear and direct—the better to puncture the pieties and platitudes of media owners—the pace is sprightly, and the tone ranges from urbanely tolerant to downright scathing.

Dalton Camp, writing in the Toronto Telegram of December 14, said: "The writing style is contemporary and remarkably readable," though he called the report "probably the first of its kind to be praised for its tyle and damned for its content."

Senator Martin asked a moment ago about press councils and I shall come to that subject in a moment, but I want to tell you first of the reaction of the press of Canada. Reaction ranged from enthusiastic support, through "yes, but," to "no way," but without predictable division into the respective groups. Those in favour of such a move were the Edmonton Journal of December 11:

> —such a council in Canada, free from government influence, would be a useful experiment. It could be a safety valve for citizens who felt they were seriously wronged in the press and probably could do constructive things for the profession.

The editor of the Winnipeg Tribune wrote also on December 11:

> I feel strongly that readers and the public in general should have a forum for voicing their complaints and dissatisfaction with the newspaper. By the same token, the newspapers would have a forum in which to show that many of the complaints are groundless or based on misunderstanding.

Then on December 21 the Windsor Star said the following!

> The Windsor Star's brief to the Davey Committee on mass media, presented more than a year ago, traced the development of press councils back to 1916 in Sweden, explained their function, and suggested three levels of council: local, provincial and national. The section of the brief which discussed press councils ended with this statement:
> "The responsible newspaper has nothing to fear from any press council, government agency or public opinion in a democratic society."

Hon. Mr. Martin: You took that from a good paper.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I know it is highly regarded by some of my colleagues.

The main condition sought by the newspapers which were doubtful about a national press council was, of course, that such press councils should be set upon a regional basis. This view was expressed in the Toronto Star of December 10, and I quote:

> —because of differing journalistic traditions in English—and French-speaking Canada, press councils would better be organized on a regional than a national basis . . . this venture in press self-discipline is overdue.

Again the regional view was upheld by the Calgary Herald on December 11, the Montreal Star on December 11, and the Winnipeg Tribune on December 11. Three Quebec papers, which stress the fact that the province has already agreed to set up a council, agree with the regional basis. These were Le Soleil, La Presse and Le Devoir.

Suprisingly enough, our proposal for a press ownership review board found support from the press. The Ottawa Citizen of December 10 finds it "a positive proposal," which would provide "machinery at once more specific and more flexible to deal with the special problems of press ownership than that which is now available under the Combines Act". The Globe and Mail of December 10 finds the recommendation "a good one", and Claude Ryan was in favour of this particular recommendation. The Toronto Star of December 10 explains its support in the following terms:

> The proposal—does not stem from any conviction that chain newspaper ownership is necessarily bad. The committee finds the arguments for and against chains very closely balanced, and believes as the Star does that a chain newspaper is better for a city or town than no newspaper at all (which is sometimes the alternative).

As far as our recommendations on Time and Reader's Digest are concerned—and with which I shall deal in some detail in just a few moments—the Toronto Telegram was one of those who came out flatly against curtailing the advantages, though the discussion on this issue was not widespread, and carried three items dealing with it. It is a curious posture for the Telegram when one considers the position on broadcasting taken before the committee. However, Ron Haggart and Dalton Camp both commented favourably on removing these privileges.

Our recommendation, however, was endorsed by the Edmonton Journal of December 11 in these words:

> Many feel that this would give Canadian magazines a new opportunity to get on their feet and this newspaper has supported this position.

This particular recommendation was also supported on December 11 by the Ottawa Journal in the following words:

> But in general there is a welcome atmosphere of help for the underdog in the report. We admire its endorsation of Grattan O'Leary's support nine years ago of small Canadian magazines against Time and Reader's Digest.

The Calgary Herald of December also supported our recommendation in these words:

> The committee is on more solid ground in advocating removal of special tax privileges for Time magazine and Reader's Digest—certainly, this form of competition for Canadian advertising dollars can be considered inimical to successful domestic magazine publication.

Needless to say the Toronto Star supported the proposal for their oft-repeated nationalistic reasons, both in their main editorial on December 10 and again in a special editorial on December 14, but the Globe and Mail came out particularly strongly in favour of this recommendation, not for nationalism's sake, but "to attack special privilege". They have, they say, fought these privileges since they were first proposed, and feared that the measures would be ineffective. They quote the following figures in favour of their argument:

> Ten years ago Time and the Digest accounted for 43 per cent of the advertising revenue received by all major consumer magazines in Canada. By 1969 they had built their share up to 56 per cent. And it wasn't just the national Canadian magazines that were under fire. Time was publishing 12 regional editions on a regular basis, so that it was skimming off not only national advertising but local advertising that might have gone to regional Canadian magazines. The legislation designed to protect Canadian magazines had been vastly more effective in protecting Time and the Digest. Indeed, by executing their U.S. competitors, it had placed them in the unique position of being the only magazines in the country which got most of their editorial matter cheap, from across the border, and thus were in a unique, preferred position to compete with Canadian magazines. To oppose this was not to favor nationalism but to attack special privilege.

That, of course, could be considered an example of some of the more positive newspaper editorial comment from across the country.

I wish now to turn to the debate on this report which has already taken place in this chamber. I intend to comment specifically on some issues and some speeches, and most especially those that were critical of the committee or of its recommendations. I will content myself with only three general observations. The first is comment on the quality of the debate in this chamber.

As far as I am concerned it has been most encouraging. Keen insight into the workings of the media has been evidenced by many speakers. I was also encouraged by the degree of involvement. About 20 per cent of our membership have participated in the debate. I am also extremely grateful for the many generous remarks which were made in my direction.

I wish Senator Flynn were in the chamber. Perhaps Senator Macdonald will assure him that I was flattered by his description of me, of which he has the copyright, as a slave driver.

I have read each speech given in the debate and I have read most of them several times. Although it is tempting to comment on each speech, this obviously would not be possible. Senator O'Leary is well aware of my profound respect for him. I have mentioned it on a number of occasions and in a number of places. Also, although he may reject it on the spot, he has my affection. For that reason I was especially pleased that he began his remarks in the debate in the way that he did. I remind the house of what Senator O'Leary said in his opening remarks:

> —my first word must be to say that I think on the whole, the inquiry undertaken by Senator Keith Davey into the Mass Media has been a good thing. I think it has been a good thing because, on the whole, it rescued the press from a state of complacency and euphoria in which it had dwelt all too long. Socrates once said that the unexamined life was unfit to be > lived. That applies to the communications media, to organizations as well as to individuals.

> I am afraid that as a journalist I have to say, quite frankly, that in my view the press of Canada has been living an unexamined life.

Certainly that statement, as well as any other, explained our purpose. I think that in a sense it also confirmed the reason for our existence. Senator O'Leary took eloquent issue with two of our central recommendations, each of which I now propose to discuss for a moment.

After conceding, on page 416, that "I do not think that a lot of amalgamations are a good thing," he then went on to reject our proposal for a press ownership review board in these words: "Surely the anti-combines legislation should cover that".

Well, that fairly well sums up the publisher position on this question of concentration. It fairly well sums up the position which has been taken by any number of publishers across the country. We asked the same question of almost every media owner in Canada who appeared before the committee: "How much is too much?" At the hearings there was, of course, no clear agreement as to the amount. No one advanced a tentative formula, but one thing did happen. Practically all of the media owners who appeared before the committee conceded that yes, there were in fact some points on which common ownership was no longer in the public interest, and yet most were prepared to concede that this ongoing trend towards concentrated press ownership was in fact a problem.

Our Committee did make a recommendation which was not a pat mathematical formula which we rejected as an approach because it was incompatible with the reality of Canadian economics and geography. We proposed an ad hoc solution: a press ownership review board, whose criterion should be that all transactions to increase common ownership in the mass media are undesirable and contrary to the public interest unless shown to be otherwise.

Very few publishers agreed. Most did not. Most took the position described by Senator O'Leary, the majority favouring some form of application of the existing combines legislation.

It seems to me that there is one thing basically wrong with the existing combines legislation as it relates to newspapers. Simply stated, it is a fact that it has not worked. That is apparent by the very extent of existing press concentration in this country. The press ownership review board might not be an ideal solution. I am not married to that concept, nor are the members of the committee. However, I am vitally concerned about solving the problem by means which are preventive before the fact rather than—as applies with the existing legislation which does not work anyway—punitive after the fact. Perhaps, as Senator O'Leary went on to suggest on page 417, the anti-combines legislation should cover that, and if it does not it should be amended. Perhaps that is the solution. Perhaps the existing legislation should be amended to produce a workable format.

The point that we wished to register, and I should like to underline it here today, is that the time has now come for action in this important area.

Both Senator Walker and Senator McElman asked me a question relating to retroactivity. If they will bear with me for a few moments I will refer to that when I discuss the magazine industry.

Almost all honourable senators who addressed themselves in the debate to the issue of a press council were in favour of it. However, Senator O'Leary was not. At the risk of repeating some of the arguments that were extremely well advanced by our colleague Senator Petten, I should like to say a word or two about the idea of a press council.

Such a council would have two great virtues. It would serve as a watchdog to monitor the press in much the same way as the press now monitors society. An incidental value would be that for the first time journalists and publishers would come together on a more or less regular basis to discuss something other than monetary matters, something other than salaries, as is the case with the working press; something other than advertising revenue in the case of the publishers. They would discuss standards, ethics, professionalism and quality. The press council would consist of publishers, working journalists and media consumers. There would, of course, be absolutely no government involvement. I repeat that there would, of course, be absolutely no Government involvement. This fact was very clear in our report, so I was astounded when Senator O'Leary said he would be very much opposed to the idea of a press council with Government involvement. So would I, Senator O'Leary; I would object as strenuously as you. However, it is important to understand that it is not the nature of our proposal; there would be no Government involvement in the press council.

Between the kind of petty grievance that can best be redressed by a letter to the editor and the major complaints that are better adjudicated by the courts, there is a large area of medium-sized problems where a press council would be most effective. Regretfully, however, many publishers, but by no means all, continue to reject even this minimal degree of reader involvement in their activity. A great part of this comes from one city where they should know that if a newspaper treats badly or harasses its readers there is practically nothing they can do about it.

One of the more familiar arguments advanced by publishers before the committee in opposing the press council was the contention, which is at variance with the fact, that the Press Council in the United Kingdom has not been very effective. Kenneth Bagnell, editor of the Globe Magazine, asked the other night on television where have mediocrity and superficiality gone in the United Kingdom now that there is a Press Council. In fact they have not disappeared nor will they in a free press operating in a free society but they are less, and make no mistake, for public credibility as between readers and the media in the United Kingdom is far greater. I should add that is a first hand impression gained in the United Kingdom last spring. Several of us were over there; we spoke to publishers, journalists, politicians and people. There seemed to be a uniformity of opinion that the Press Council had significantly improved British journalism.

I well recall, as I am sure Senator Petten will, the day that we had lunch with Lord Thomson in the dining room of the Times. Lord Thomson, whom I had known in Canada in his earlier days as a friend, was indeed a gracious host. He received us very well indeed. I remember when the luncheon was over and the plates were pushed back the discussion began and Lord Thomson said, "I know why you fellows are here. We want to give you some of our views and ideas. First of all, this idea of a press council is utter nonsense. Surely you are not going to propose that for Canada? It has not worked here." There were 18 of his colleagues present. He asked the gentleman on his right, whose name I do not recall but who was a senior person in the Thomson organization, if he agreed, and the reply was, "No, Your Lordship; I do not agree. I think the Press Council in the United Kingdom has been singularly effective and welcome." The other gentlemen present disagreed with his Lordship, and each said that the press council has been effective. Lord Thomson, of course, calmly picked up the ball and said, "You see, senator, that demonstrates the freedom of opinion that exists within this organization." Indeed it did, but it also was a further demonstration that most journalists in the United Kingdom think that that particular Press Council does work.

We say at the completion of the section of our report which deals with press councils:

> A sensible place to begin would be at the next annual meeting of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association.

That meeting, of course, is taking place this very week. The paragraph continues:

> The better financed such an organization is, the better are its chances of achieving something. We have already noted that Britain's Press Council operates on less than $60,000 per year. We hope the Canadian industry—whose daily-newspaper members in 1968 had total revenues of $295 million—can find it in its heart to do a little better than that.

As I say, the meeting which is now taking place in Toronto, about which I will speak in a moment, may in fact make progress in this direction. If it does not, then the ball will be back in the court of concerned Canadians such as the Consumers Association of Canada, who may very well take this kind of important initiative.

Senator Desruisseaux, whose absence I regret and acknowledge, is, of course, a gentleman in every sense of the word. He is understandably one of our most popular colleagues. He is able, articulate, informed, a friend of each one of us, and I certainly know that I am included. In this debate he delivered one of the most widely publicized of his speeches in the Senate, and one of his most intemperate. At page 427 of the Debates of the Senate Senator Desruisseaux is reported as follows:

> The report on mass communications is, as Michael Barkway said, glib, wordy and subjective.
> Many Canadians have said there are questionable sweeping judgments on some ill-defined criteria, with little stated evidence. Men in the trade, including many serious journalists and experienced administrators, brand it, as have some other Canadians, irresponsible, amateurish, self indulging, tacky and flabby, lacking of discipline, purely subjective judgments, pretentious, pseudo-mod, and ghost pop writings.

I trust that honourable senators will understand, as the honourable Senator Desruisseaux will when he reads my comments in Hansard, that while my response is as tough and frank, I can assure you and Senator Desruisseaux that it will be no less cordial.

One of the causes of the senator's unhappiness derives from the fact that he was taken off our committee. He says so in so many words in his speech. Not so much that he was removed from the committee, but that he heard of it not from the chairman of the committee but from a third party—another senator. Not seeing Senator Desruisseaux at the time was, of course, unforgivable, although I did try to see him. Of course, he will know the difficulty each of us has had in getting together during the ensuing months. There is no excuse for not notifying Senator Desruisseaux personally of our decision. I can only apologize which, of course, I do. However, I most certainly do not apologize for the fact that the senator was removed from the committee, notwithstanding his solid background in media. Indeed, this self-same solid background in media was substantially the reason for his removal.

Let me explain. Very early in our deliberations, indeed before our hearings even began, the committee, for practical reasons, was reduced from 18 to 15 senators; three had to leave. While I concede that the senator's admitted expertise in media would have been useful on our committee, one rule of the Senate was explicit and very clear. Rule 84, which has since been amended, at the time read:

> No senator who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, in the inquiry to be entrusted to any Select Committee, shall sit on such Committee, and any question of interest arising in the Committee may be determined by the Committee, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

In the course of the debate Senator Desruisseaux confirmed, as we knew at the time, that his one-time extensive media holdings had been substantially reduced, but at least a limited amount of what he has since divested himself did in fact remain. We had access to the Parliamentary Guide at the time, which listed, I believe, four separate media involvements of the senator. Perhaps some would argue, and perhaps Senator Desruisseaux might argue, that some fine question of timing entered into the picture, some determination of which media interest was dropped and when. Frankly, some of us felt differently.

First of all, given the nature of the study, what was the fact also had to appear to be the fact. Whether or not committee membership would have embarrassed

Senator Desruisseaux was no doubt a decision he would have to make, but it was for us to determine how objective could be the insights of someone who was surely in a unique position, someone whose extensive media holdings had relatively recently been sold into an even more extensive media empire.

Our decision is a matter of record. So is my observation that although Senator Desruisseaux was not a member of the committee, he was free to attend our sessions and to speak at our sessions. To my recollection, he attended only once, and then he remained silent. In any event, there is one virtue in all of this. Senator Desruisseaux has been able to say, as he did in his speech in the chamber, the fact he had not been on the committee left him "freer to comment on this report, without being taxed with being an associated party in any way imaginable", and he said he appreciated this.

Let me then turn to the substance of the senator's remarks. In the circumstances, I shall ignore Senator Desruisseaux's apology for everyone from Lord Thompson to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. Clearly we disagree; it is as simple as that. I have the greatest of respect for Senator Desruisseaux. Simply stated, it is an honest disagreement.

So, no doubt, is Senator Desruisseaux's disagreement with Senator O'Leary. Listen, if you will, to two quotations. Here is Senator Desruisseaux, at page 431 of the Senate Hansard:

> I have participated in all the activities of the press and the broadcasting industry. I have attended their meetings, taken part in their discussions, and reports, and the studies of their national associations, over a number of years, and I certainly cannot agree to such views as those contained in the committee's report.

Contrast that with the comment of Senator O'Leary in his opening statement:

> I have attended many meetings of editors and publishers, mainly held once a year, and what you got from such a meeting was a pentecostal feast of self praise, a sort of mutual admiration society. If they admitted to guilt at all, they swept everything under the rug of venerable and sanctified cliché about the freedom of the press.

There are two positions as to these meetings—the position of Senator Desruisseaux and the position of Senator O'Leary. Clearly the majority on the committee supports Senator O'Leary's position.

On another matter, I should like to quote Senator Desruisseaux at page 431 of the Senate Debates. Turning to the substance of his remarks, he said:

> At one place in its quest for excellence the committee's standard for judging performance is said to be this: How successful is that newspaper or broadcasting station in preparing its audience for social changes?
> With some serious members of the press I question whether this is an adequate approach.

After some fanciful use of weapon words like "mould" and "brainwash", Senator Desruisseaux comes on to complete his position thusly:

> It is the function of the press and the function of broadcasting to assure freedom of the views of its public in the light of faithful, truthful and completely reported events from everywhere in the world.

No one could disagree with that position, but surely honourable senators there is something more. Surely, any newspaper worthy of the name must perform thusly. Surely these are absolutely rock bottom minimal requirements, and surely such obvious minimal requirements are not those against which we should measure performance and quality. Change is ubiquitous; the velocity of change engulfs us all every day. Indeed, one of the things that has happened in the past 24 hours, one of the facts of the past 24 hours, is change.

I want to be very clear on one thing. Our report says:

> To insist that this is the media's main job is not to suggest any built-in bias for or against any notion of progress.

I thought Senator Prowse said this simply and effectively when he spoke in the debate as follows:

> Let me now deal with that phrase that has been the subject of discussion. What is the responsibility of the newspaper to prepare people for change? To prepare a person for change does not mean that you have to advocate the change which may be coming; but, surely to goodness, if you are running a good newspaper you have a responsibility to let people know that change is about to take place.

In my view, our colleague Senator Stanbury effectively summed up the entire argument in this rather compelling statement at page 462 of the Senate Hansard:

> Change need not be feared if it is understood, but if day after day we are assaulted with the news of violent events which we have not anticipated or whose causative factors have not been explained, we can hardly expect to avoid the feeling that events chase each other across our lives without rhyme or reason and are so far beyond our ability to affect or control that we might just as well lapse into apathy or seek change or authority through violence.

Honourable senators, Senator Desruisseaux also had much to say about broadcasting; much about the CBC, which he does not like. I shall return to the corporation in a moment, but first of all I would make a point that I think is self-explanatory. Senator Desruisseaux at page 430 said:

> I would have appreciated analyses and more particularly recommendations with regard to another problem of unpleasant competition by the hundreds of American radio and television stations all along the 4,000 miles of the Canada-United States border.

That particular recommendation is, of course, made specifically, and in some detail, at page 209 of the report.

The very recommendation Senator Desruisseaux says he wishes we had made is, in fact, contained in the report.

Senator Desruisseaux also made the point that he did not like the idea of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters finding it necessary to correct the facts and figures in the documentation on profitability contained in our report. The senator had received a release from the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, and he was appalled to think that the CAB had to correct the facts and figures contained in our report. Indeed, I had the same report that was put out by the CAB that Senator Desruisseaux had. Of course, the answer is very simple. We were talking about two different years. This CAB document, in fact does not in any sense indicate it quarrels with the facts and figures contained in our report, but the document which Senator Desruisseaux referred to in this chamber, was for 1969. The base year in this particular report, analyzing the media industry, is 1968. So of course we are talking about two different years. There is no conflict at all: there is a simple misunderstanding. I think Senator Desruisseaux felt he had a point, maybe a debating point, maybe more than a debating point. In the chamber on that day, and again on a subsequent day, he promised to supply me with information which would demonstrate that our figures on profitability are incorrect. It should be a matter of record that I received no such documentation from the honourable senator. I do not quarrel with that. I think there was a simple misunderstanding.

Senator Desruisseaux does not like the CBC. For that matter, as is well known, neither does my friend Senator Beaubien. I would digress momentarily to say that no committee chairman has ever had a more co-operative deputy chairman than I had in Senator Beaubien. Our association was close, far closer of course than had been possible prior to the committee's formation. In that friendship both Senator Beaubien and I agreed on almost everything, but not quite. One of the happy by-products of the committee has been my closer association with him.

Honourable senators, Senator Beaubien, like Senator Desruisseaux, does not like the CBC. For that matter, neither does my seat mate, Senator Sparrow. Neither do a lot of other senators, judging by the debates we have listened to in this place.

Of course, the corporation has always been fair game for members of this chamber. Senator Sparrow even suggested that members of Parliament—members of the other place and members of the Senate—should sit in judgment as members of the CBC board. That one was too much even for the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. They did not even include it in their February 17 multi-thousand word précis of this debate. It was really, more accurately, a précis of the remarks made in this chamber by Senate Desruisseaux.

This document, which is an absolutely typical Canadian Association of Broadcasters' release, is sub-headed: "Broadcasters have a number of friends in the Senate."

In rejecting Senator Sparrow's idea—that is, having members of Parliament sit on the CBC board—these private broadcasters realize, as do each one of you, and as I am sure Senator Sparrow does, that television and radio are already terribly vulnerable to government pressure. This of course is no less true for public broadcasting. So editorial freedom must be preserved at all costs. But let us not in this chamber or elsewhere have a grade-school debate about which is better, private broadcasting or public broadcasting. The fact is simple: in Canada we need both dimensions. In the private sector we need a far more enlightened and a far less profit-oriented approach to broadcasting. Senator Forsey spelled that out in his speech—none of which, sad to say, qualified for inclusion in the CAB bulletin.

Perhaps I could quote Senator Forsey, as reported at page 440 of Senate Hansard, speaking of his years as a member of the Board of Broadcast Governors:

> ... the impression left on me was that the theme song of private broadcasters could very well have been taken from that Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "The Pirates of Penzance".
> Oh! I am a pirate king.
> Yes, I am a pirate king;
> And it is, it is a glorious thing > to be a pirate king.

You will remember Senator Forsey breaking into full song—a delightful example of Canadian talent. He was able to do it, but I will not attempt it.

Honourable senators, this has been a useful debate, but it has not been without its share of nonsense, much of it relating to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Our report makes it clear that the CBC is not a perfect institution. Far from it. So we made a number of hard-nosed recommendations. But fair is fair. For heaven's sake, let us retain our perspective. For that reason, for the purpose of underlining, I would like to quote two comments from Senator Frosey's excellent presentation. First of all, he said:

> I cannot share the views of Senator Desruisseaux about the deficit of the CBC. I do not think there is a deficit. There is a grant made out of public funds. To my mind the grant should be placed on the basis the report suggests. Indeed, the suggestion is, as the report recognizes, by no means a new one. There are grants to the CBC as a public service. It was never set up to be a paying commercial proposition; that was not the intention at all, and I challenge anybody to produce any evidence that it was. Just as you do not expect the National Gallery of Canada to show a commercial profit, so it seems to me you cannot expect the CBC to show a commercial profit.

The second point which Senator Forsey made about the corporation, the one I wanted to stress, is one which I do not have at hand. I would urge honourable senators to re-read Senator Forsey's speech, which was an excellent documentation of the need for, and the virtues of, public broadcasting in this country.

Perhaps I could complete my remarks on the CBC very briefly. The CBC is the national communications medium in a country that has no national newspaper. It is the only true national broadcasting enterprise in Canada offering service to all but a tiny minority of Canadians, and in both official languages. We feel as Canadians that we have it as the strong fabric of Canadian society. We also feel that we are in a special position in that the CBC as an entity is unlike any other in the world. Yet let any backbencher like me, in this chamber or in the other place, get up and say anything at all critical of the CBC, and it is absolutely certain to be included on the CBC national news, both radio and television. Let any backbencher in this place or the other place get up and say anything positive about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—I take Senator Forsey's excellent speech in point—and the CBC will ignore it utterly, totally and completely. It is either the death wish of the corporation, thick-headed public relations, or an inverted form of snobbery, or perhaps all three. In any event, I turn from the problems of the corporation and the comments I have made, with the greatest of respect, about Senator Desruisseaux.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There must be some exceptions on the CBC television staffs.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I am not aware of any.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I see a couple of them looking down at us. They ought to come here more often.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I am especially grateful to Senator Walker for raising the Reader's Digest issue in this debate. As he did at our hearing, Senator Prowse, I thought, dealt most effectively with the issue in this debate. But, as Senator Walker is aware, I feel keenly on the issue and I propose to deal with it for just a few moments.

Magazines are special. Magazines constitute the only national press we possess in Canada. Magazines add a journalistic dimension which no other medium can provide: depth, wholeness and texture. Magazines, because of their freedom from daily deadlines, can aspire to a level of excellence that is seldom attainable in other media. Magazines, in a different way from any other medium, can help foster in Canadians a sense of themselves. There are very few Canadian home consumer magazines that can claim with any degree of certainty that their survival is assured. In the whole country there are only four large circulation consumer magazines whose prospects and financial conditions are such that they could be described as healthy. They are Time, Reader's Digest, Chatelaine and Toronto Calendar.

Between them, Time and Reader's Digest account for more than half the advertising revenue that all major consumer magazines receive in Canada, and it is reasonable to anticipate that Time and Reader's Digest will continue to grab off larger and larger portions of the available revenue.

The position of the Canadian editions of the two magazines has long been controversial in Canada. Section 12(a) of the Income Tax Act prevents Canadian business from deducting advertising expenses in all foreign magazines except Time and Reader's Digest. It is of course these very special privileges which we think should now be removed. We recommend exactly what Senator O'Leary wanted nine years ago. We recommend that the exemptions now granted to Time and Reader's Digest under section 12(a) be repealed, and the sooner the better. Even if Time and Reader's Digest did find it possible to continue to publish their Canadian editions despite the removal of the exemptions, they would at least be competing on a more equitable basis than before. The massive cost advantages they enjoy from the spill-over of advertising content would be at least partially off-set. If this did not improve the health of the Canadian magazine industry, the committee suggests that the two magazines could be required to sell 75 per cent of the stock of their Canadian subsidiaries to Canadian residents, after the example of the CRTC which requires 80 per cent Canadian control of broadcasting corporations.

This competition from Time and Reader's Digest is of course becoming even more uneven. There is a neat statement for you: "even more uneven". It is becoming more uneven because of the split-run factor and the regional editions. These split-runs and regional editions spell competition with local media for local advertising at the local level.

Particularly since the committee reported, some people have advanced the argument to me that we should have been more concerned about Time magazine than about Reader's Digest. There is of course some logic in that kind of position. The Reader's Digest unquestionably has been a better corporate citizen than has Time magazine. Nor, I suppose, should we be as sensitive about a digest kind of magazine as we are about a weekly news magazine. Each week Time magazine provides a great many Canadians, including this one, with an outstanding window on the world. But honourable senators should make no mistake: it is a view through American-tinted glass. As such it is a view which we will still require but which we will still have even after our recommendations have been implemented. Then Time magazine would still sell in Canada, just as Newsweek does at the present time, but without the Canadian content and without the so-called Canadian section, which, to be fair, is well done but which is not the reason why most of us buy Time magazine.

I wonder how many of you have noticed how Time magazine has suddenly, recently, shifted its promotional gears—perhaps as a result of the message some of us have been taking across the country, although perhaps on the other hand we flatter ourselves in thinking that. Certainly, for a long period Time's promotional activities were built around the advantages of its local advertising. I have an ad here from the March 8 issue of Time magazine. It is entitled, "Why Pay for Canada If You Only Want Ontario?" This advertisement concludes by saying:

> In fact, wherever an advertiser sells, there is a TIME to match his market. After all, why should anyone pay for more of the world than he needs?

Why should you pay for Saskatchewan and Alberta and Manitoba, if you want the big markets of Toronto and Montreal? Well, the promotion has suddenly shifted gears and now a new promotional compaign has begun which is built around Time's straight editorial virtue. Here is an ad from the current issue of Saterday Night. This is a paid ad. As you know, Time magazine is anxious to keep Saturday Night in the business, even as we all are, and it is anxious to the point of subsidizing that magazine. Here is the ad: "We Cover a Lot of Ground in a Year." This is a completely different approach from what I just read in Time magazine. It says:

> Once every seven days TIME/Canada reports on the Canadian news scene. And the subject matter ranges from one end of the country to the other. From the Prime Minister to Geneviève and Paul. From unemployment to the environment. Toronto's Sam the Record Man to American tourists. The paintings of New Brunswick's Alex Colville to B.C.'s superport. An election in the N.W.T. to turmoils in Quebec. The Manitoba Theater Center to tax laws and the economy. The Senate. Snowmobiles. Cable TV.
> It's a unique editorial mix that means an unparalleled view in print of happenings all across the country.
> And there's an added touch. For in covering the obvious and ferreting out the obscure, TIME's writers tell the news in a way that leaves a lasting impression. It may be succinct or poetic or biting; inevitably, it helps bring the person and the event to life. Take this expert, for instance, from Correspondent Geoffrey Stevens' profile of The Honorable Stanley Knowles:
> That is an excellent profile and there is indeed a long quotation from it. At the conclusion the ad states:
> Issues that range Canada wide—and local events that deserve national exposure. They're all part of TIME's domain. And in reporting on them, TIME's correspondents indeed cover a lot of ground. In a year. And even in a week, for that matter.
> TIME
> It's hard to do without it if you care about the world.

Of course, I care about the world but I also care about the Canadian magazine industry. I am prepared to do without that Canadian section of Time magazine if somehow somewhere along the line, because Time has left the scene, some enterprising person or group or company in a new climate of possibility will launch a Canadian news magazine.

Still, fundamentally the problem is economic, and I should stress my continuing belief that the special privileges of both Time magazine and Reader's Digest should be removed.

Now, the Time magazine and Reader's Digest lobby—in which, Senator Walker, I do not include you—has been predictably and understandably opposed to our recommendations. To protect their profitable flank they tended to concentrate on three themes: first, that what we are proposing is a form of retroactivity; second, that it would not work anyway, but, indeed, would make the climate for Canadian magazines less attractive; and, third, that the Canadian magazine industry itself did not even favour the removal of these special privileges.

Well, first of all, let us look at the "it won't help anyway" argument. Indeed, it goes much further than that. It says that if you take Time and Reader's Digest and remove their special privileges and thus take them out of Canada you will not have any magazine budget at all. It will be the beginning of the end of magazine advertising in Canada. That position is buttressed by a study referred to in our report, and I should like to refer to that. The report suggested that a view, supported by a private survey which the committee saw of Canada's 100 largest advertisers, indicated that even if Time and Reader's Digest folded up their Canadian editions, only 13 per cent of their advertising expenditure would be diverted to other Canadian magazines. The revenues from Time magazine and Reader's Digest in 1969 amounted to approximately $14,642,000. Some $1.9 million only of this $14.6 million would have found its way into Canadian magazines.

That private survey is now ten years out of date, and ten years is a long time. The bloom is off the television rose and now for the first time in a long while there are television availabilities in just about every major market in Canada. Indeed it has been possible for a media organization to send out this letter:

> Many advertisers believe that since television has sight, sound and motion it has to be superior in impact to magazines which have sight alone.
> This hypothesis overlooks many offsetting qualities of magazines, among them permanence and believability. In magazines your advertising can sit down with a prospect like a friend and present your full case.
> If you have only 30 seconds you can't present a full story. You can't even sound relaxed. Particularly if you're sandwiched among several other hard breathing advertisers.
> Credibility of advertising today is under heavy fire. Magazines give you the opportunity to use the other dimensions of communications, to tell your story fully, factually and believably.

That, of course, is a release, as you might have guessed, from the Reader's Digest.

So, things have changed in ten years. Indeed, in our country now there is running a very distinct and growing concern about cultural survival. That is why I was so delighted in this debate—and I mean that quite sincerely—to hear Senator Walker describe himself as an economic nationalist. I do wish, however, that he was equally concerned about cultural survival. This Canadian concern about Canadian identity has increased dramatically in recent years, and make no mistake, honourable senators, it is still growing. I also dare to believe that Canadian magazines themselves are better than ever, and certainly better than they were ten years ago. Chatelaine proves each and every month that Canadians can do it with the odds approximately even by consistently outselling Ladies Home Journal and McCall's combined. Macleans too has a new lease on life. There are many other new titles on the stands. These new titles come and go with amazing consistency demonstrating both the difficulty of survival and also the willingness of Canadians to try. By the way, with regard to that amount of only $1.903 million which could be saved for Canadian magazines by the implementation of the recommendation, what on earth is wrong with $1.903 million going into the Canadian magazine industry in the form of advertising? What about the argument we heard that even the Canadian magazine industry did not seek the removal of these special privileges. It is true they did not, at least not the corporate magazine establishment.

It is ten years since the O'Leary report and in that time the magazine industry had completed one complete somersault. They told us, yes, they can live with Time and Reader's Digest; they have learned to live with them. Well, it was a strange posture. Or was it such a strange posture? I would never accuse these Canadian magazine publishers of speaking with a forked tongue. Perhaps it seemed that way because their tongue was jammed so far up into their cheek. Certainly Maclean-Hunter did achieve certain minimal objectives as a result of Senator O'Leary activity. First of all, the Canadian business press industry was in fact saved at a time when McGraw-Hill was ready to pounce into Canada. I need hardly point out that the fact that the Canadian press industry was saved is proof positive, if any were needed, that Senator O'Leary's recommendations were extremely practical ones.

Secondly, in the consumer magazine area, Maclean-Hunter also achieved something by the implementation of Senator O'Leary's recommendations. A further full-scale invasion of American magazines with Canadian sections was forestalled. It is true that Time and Reader's Digest were legitimized, but that was that. As was apparent from the editorial I quoted earlier from the Globe and Mail of December 11, it so legitimized Time and Reader's Digest by allowing it to happen that the Canadian magazine industry suddenly realized to their horror that Time and Reader's Digest had a clearly open market. Let me just quote very briefly from that same editorial:

> The legislation designed to protect Canadian magazines had been vastly more effective in protecting Time and the Digest. Indeed, by excluding their U.S. competitors, it had placed them in the unique position of being the only magazines in the country which got most of their editorial matter cheap, from across the border, and thus were in a unique, preferred position to compete with Canadian magazines.

The working press as opposed to the corporate magazine press most assuredly disagreed with the corporate position, as was apparent from the petition we received from 364 working magazine people representing 186 publications.

I would like to place on our record two letters which certainly impressed me, and I hope they will impress you. The first, which I shall read in part, is from Doris Anderson, Editor of Chatelaine. When Mrs. Anderson appeared before the committee, you may recall I asked Mr. Ron McEachern how he explained the remarkable success of Chatelaine, given the problems of the magazine industry here and, indeed, all over the world. Instead of replying, he simply pointed to Mrs. Anderson and said "That is the reason for the success." She did not say before the committee what I am about to read now; I have received this from her since the committee published its report.

> I think few people would suggest today that it was a good idea to allow the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest to compete in Canada for advertising on equal terms with completely Canadian periodicals. Unlike Canadian magazines, the Canadian editions of Time and the Reader's Digest offer a small amount of Canadian-originated editorial content in their pages. The remainder is dumped material. That is, it is commissioned, written and edited for the United States (or sometimes international editions of those magazines). Already paid for, the same editorial material—and typewritten pages—is then shipped across the border to be set up again in printer's type in Canada and run as the major editorial content of the Canadian editions of these magazines. There is very little extra editorial cost involved; it is nowhere equal to the cost of the original U.S. material or the cost to originate the same amount of Canadian material in Canada. Yet this "dumped" editorial material is used as a vehicle around which to sell complete issues full of Canadian advertising. In economic terms, this is dumping which is against all international economic practice.

Then she concludes her letter by saying:

> The continued presence of Time and Reader's Digest in Canada is crippling for the Canadian magazine industry. During the twenty-three years they have been competing with Canadian magazines in Canada for Canadian advertising, many Canadian magazines have died. That magazines die is not unusual. Badly edited, badly run off dull magazines should die. In the United States over the past ten years approximately 182 publications have died and 682 new publications have been started. But in Canada today it's extremely difficult for any new Canadian publication to be launched. As long as Time and the Digest are here enjoying a favourable and a competitive situation, I cannot see this situation changing. In fact, the situation will almost certainly deteriorate. I think if we care about Canada and a strong periodical press (and I don't think the two can very well be separated) then action to end the special Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest must be taken.

Then she goes on to say that she is expressing her own position, and not that of Maclean-Hunter.

The other letter is dated February 25 and is from Peter Newman, now editor of Macleans magazine, who is well known to most of the people in this chamber. He said:

> Dear Senator Davey:
> You have asked for my comments on the section of your report dealing with the special privileges granted Time and Reader's Digest in this country, and while I cannot and do not speak for Maclean-Hunter, I will be glad to give you my personal reaction.
> While I do not agree with the publishing philosophies of either of these two magazines, I have no objection whatsoever to their overwhelmingly successful attempts to attract readers in Canada, and any more than I object to Newsweek, Playboy, Popular Mechanics, or any other U.S. magazine being circulated in this country. But as the new editor of Maclean's, highly conscious of the fact that every word and every photograph and illustration that goes into the magazine is originated and paid for in this country, I find it incomprehensible that two American magazines should be allowed, with government sanction, to pass off what are almost entirely American publications (which cause their domestic operations here virtually no editorial costs) as Canadian magazines, attracting Canadian advertising. These two publications now drain off about 56 per cent of the advertising available to Canadian periodicals, seriously threatening our ability to compete.
> Since the local editors of Time and the Digest are directly responsible to their American head offices where the final decisions about what goes into their magazines are made, they do not and in fact, can not accurately reflect the Canadian reality in the very few pages they relegate to Canadian news. Only truly Canadian magazines can fulfill this essential mandate.

He goes on to talk about some of the things that he hopes to do with Maclean's magazine, and concludes by saying:

> In my personal view, this will be achieved in the long run, only if Time and the Reader's Digest revert to what they really are: American magazines which should be coming into this country on exactly the same basis as all other U.S. publications.

Both Senator McElman and Senator Walker asked me about retroactivity. Senator Walker said it would be retroactive and hence unfair to remove from Time and Reader's Digest these special privileges. Meanwhile Senator McElman wondered why the press ownership review board should not have power retroactive to dismantle existing media concentration.

I have an answer, but I doubt whether it will satisfy either of the honourable senators. However, it is an answer. Senator McElman knows that I am a sports fan and not a lawyer. I can only say to him that I have never believed that the rules of the game should be changed at the end of the second period.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Surely you are not suggesting that there is a contradiction between being a sportsman and being a lawyer?

[Hon. Mr. Davey.]

Hon. Mr. Davey: There is no contradiction. It is an unusual blend. My answer to Senator Walker is also simple. Surely, when Parliament grants special privileges it does not grant them in perpetuity. I am sure that my answer will satisfy neither gentlemen, but that is the position as I see it.

I think that with one exception I have dealt with all of Senator Walker's various questions. The one exception, however, is on page 471. He quoted the report which said:

> We are also reading fewer magazines. In 1959, we bought 147 million copies of American magazines. Ten years later the total had declined to 130.5 million copies. But the decline for Canadian magazines has been even steeper. In 1959 we bought 45 million copies of Canadian magazines. In 1969 we bought about 33.8 million copies.

Senator Walker said what I wish to point out, that the figure of 33.8 million copies should be 42 million copies. He argues that the decline in sales of Canadian magazines in ten years is from 45 million down to 42 million, and not to 33.8 million as stated in the report. There is a simple explanation. Our figure is for English-language Canadian magazines, whereas his figure is for Canadian magazines as a whole including French-language magazines. I think he will find that that explanation stands up. I hope he will look into it and let me know.

Senator Walker expressed a great deal of amusement at the way in which this particular section of the report was written. In fact he was almost beside himself because, faced with the choice between love and logic, we on the committee chose love. Apparently Senator Walker would have chosen logic. After thinking about this a great deal, it appeared to me that perhaps in the final analysis it is how we respond to the question of love or logic which actually distinguishes a Grit from a Tory.

I am optimistic that the Government will do something about this particular set of recommendations. They have before them an almost unanimous recommendation of the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media, with the exception of Senator Beaubien. It is similar to the unanimous recommendation of the all-party committee of the other place.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What was the date of the recommendation of the committee of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Davey: I am sorry, I do not have that. We issued our report in December and the House of Commons committee's report was issued, I believe, in July. I can check that, and get the information for the Leader of the Government.

Thirdly, we also have the opinion of the delegates to last fall's policy convention of the Liberal party. The Prime Minister who has a profound belief, which I accept at face value, in participatory democracy, wrote the following letter to a young lady who attended the convention:

> —the views of the delegates to the 1970 Liberal Policy Convention will not be shelved somewhere to gather dust for years.

Part of that letter was underlined and sent to a young girl in suburban Toronto who attended the convention. How did that Liberal convention vote on this issue? The vote was 817 for ending the concession, 57 against, and 78 delegates were not sure. When the Government comes to examine this issue, and examine it I believe they must, they will be faced with this overwhelming vote of the Liberal party convention. They will be faced with the unanimous all-party recommendation from the other place, and with the recommendation of our particular committee.

Honourable senators will expect me to say something about Halifax. I shall simply say that I still very strongly support the views expressed in our report. As far as I am concerned, they still stand, as does my respect for Senator Macdonald and for Senator Welch.

In his solid speech on December 16 Senator Macdonald asked me two questions. I am not sure whether or not those questions were rhetorical, but for the purpose of this discussion today I shall assume that they were not. He asked, first, why the committee chose these newspapers and condemned them in such strong language. One might ask: Why did not the committee name others rather than give the full vigour of its denunciation to those newspapers? We chose Halifax because we thought at the time that it had the poorest of the so-called big city dailies.

Secondly, Senator Macdonald asked whether the committee actually believe there was no place in a newspaper for comment, even, God forbid, good comment. The answer is that I agree with Senator Macdonald, that there is most certainly a place in newspapers for good comment.

However, Senator Welch made two comments which I felt answered Senator Macdonald's questions. In the course of his speech, in which he agreed with Senator Macdonald and not with the committee, he said that both newspapers, the Chronicle-Herald and the Mail Star might not be on the ball due to lack of competition, that the newspapers failed to give coverage in certain areas, and at times did not report in great depth.

Most certainly the report did generate a storm of controversy in Nova Scotia. I believe that that in itself was useful. I did receive some letters from Nova Scotia disagreeing, sometimes violently, with the position we took, but I must say they were in the minority. Two troublesome themes recurred in most of this mail, and perhaps I could share my concern with you. First of all, many of these letters said, "Here we go again; another wiseacre from Toronto telling us how things should be done in Nova Scotia". Soon after the report was published the New Glasgow News rose to the defence of the Halifax dailies with really the ultimate in this kind of logic. I will not quote this editorial at length, but it says:

> —as a good Toronto-type—of the kind beloved in the far West as in the far East—he (Davey) knows better than the people in the Maritimes what they should be reading their papers.
> It is not that he wants to censor these papers; it is just that the people who run them and work on them ought to be consulting him as to how things should be.

Incidentally, other honourable senators did not escape lightly, because as a group we were described as "politically-pensioned legislative misfits".

Still another point that troubled me in some of the mail I received from people who disagreed with our position on Nova Scotia was, "The Chronicle-Herald is Tory; you are a Grit. What on earth could we expect?" The fact is that the Chronicle-Herald professes to be independent and, as Senator Bourque said in this very debate, most of us here are not motivated by partisan considerations.

It was my privilege to visit Halifax last month; it was a rewarding experience. Almost everywhere I met people familiar with and enthusiastic about our report. I concede at once that I was meeting a special community—information, communications, academic and public relations people—and perhaps they were not representative of the majority of Nova Scotians. On the other hand, it is a simple fact that most of the mail I have had from Nova Scotia supports the position we took in this particular document. Indeed, a letter to the editor from someone I do not know, Dan Campbell of 1462 Summer Street, Halifax, which appeared in the Chronicle-Herald of December 15 states the position extremely well. He wrote:

> It is really gratifying to have my personal evaluation of the Halifax dailies confirmed by a Senate royal commission report. I have been most amused at the plaintive screams of the Chronicle-Herald in the last few days because in reacting to the Davey commission's report, you have proved its point in a graphic manner.
> Though you bannered a charge of "dictatorial motivation," the fact remains that the commission had no reason to be prejudiced against the Chronicle-Herald, but that you have every reason to be prejudiced against it.
> How did the Chronicle-Herald respond—did it openly challenge the accusations of the Davey commission and prove them wrong? No, it launched a ridiculous personal attack on the commission. The Chronicle-Herald technique is first to have as a lead story not the report but an attack on the report.
> In typical fashion, you run stories on the sayings of your favorite politicians as if they were news stories. (Note: what a politician says is rarely news. Reporting of such sayings is not news, but promotion of those ideas.) Two Nova Scotian senators quit the commission earlier in the week, and when the Chronicle-Herald finds the report unfavorable, this is front-page news. A third Nova Scotia senator supported the report, but this is on page 19, no picture, with a small headline. After all, he's only a Liberal. How can you deny the Davey commission charges of news management?
> In the same issue you carried a story mentioning the "scars of last winter's encounter." The scars, presumably, of the criticism received by the newspapers. Last week, in a report on the Maritime union study, The Montreal Star blasted the Chronicle-Herald for its poor coverage. This was repeated on the CBC's Sunday From the Papers program. And now Davey.

Do you notice a trend, Sir? Somehow, your righteous indignation is losing all credibility.

As a footnote to my trip to Halifax may I draw attention to the following quotation from the Moncton Times of April 2. It is one short paragraph; the speaker was Robert Coates, M.P. for Cumberland-Colchester. Please note that this was not a question; it is a statement of fact:

It was more than coincidence that at the same time that federal investigators were raiding the newspaper offices in New Brunswick, Senator Davey was holding forth in Halifax providing a forum for others to attack the two Halifax dailies.

Needless to say, I knew nothing of the activity in question while I was in Halifax nor, indeed, did I visit Halifax to attack the Halifax newspapers. Indeed, as I said repeatedly throughout my visit, I dare to believe that these Halifax newspapers are gradually improving.

I cannot leave Nova Scotia without mentioning two more of our colleagues. I was grateful to Senator Smith for his intervention in the debate. His speech and press release of December 9 have done much to clarify the position of the committee. His Senate speech was most incisive.

My entry into this debate has been delayed for a long time for several reasons, one being very special. Frankly, I had rather expected some intervention in this debate from my friend, Senator Orville Phillips. However, none has been forthcoming. Since I arrived in the Senate I have always liked Orville, but it is apparent that he does not think very much of me. I had expected the senator to speak, given the nature of the remarks attributed to him, which were subsequently carried across Canada by Canadian Press. I first saw them in the Globe and Mail. You will be interested in what they were:

Senator Orville Phillips (PC—Prince), who resigned six months ago, said in Ottawa he took action because he resented the "dictatorial" powers asserted by Senator Keith Davey, chairman of the commit ee . . .

Senator Phillips said in an interview he resented the fact that the committee was operated by a chairman and had a staff which he (Senator Davey) personally hired.

"I resented being told beforehand who was going to do the questioning and what the questions were going to be, "Senator Phillips said.

"It left me with the distinct impression that the committee was organized for a specific objective before it even met."

Senator Phillips said for those reasons he made his views known to Senator Davey and he quit.

[Hon. Mr. Davey.]

Honourable senators, I think, will agree that these are extremely serious charges. I regret that Senator Phillips is not present in the chamber. Senator Phillips did not choose, as surely he should have done at the very moment of this discontent, to document his displeasure and his grievances before this chamber. No mention was made at the time; no mention has been made since by the honourable senator. This, of course, left me with an option: should I ignore the comments, or should I raise the matter myself here today?

Surely Senator Phillips should have come before the chamber, as I have said, at the very moment of his discontent. No doubt, however, my dictatorial motives had not occurred to him at that time, because the Chronicle-Herald had not begun its desperate search for people who would knock either the committee's report or its chairman.

Honourable senators, I dislike very much being unpleasant. However, I do not exactly relish having dictatorial motives attributed to me. In fact, at no time did Senator Phillips make these views known to me. He did not resign from the committee until we asked him to leave so that we could make room for Senator Yuzyk. Senator Phillips was on the committee from December 19 to June 29. He attended exactly five of seven sessions during the week of January 20, and that was that. Honourable senators will understand why I wish to place these remarks on our record.

Senator Quart was, of course, a delight to have on the committee. She was appointed to the committee late in its life, but she contributed much. Her comments in this particular debate were useful. She felt, as you will recall, that we had been too lenient with the underground press. The underground press is of course continually shifting and changing. Indeed, in our report we mentioned four underground newspapers, three of which, as I recall—Logos, Octopus and Harbinger—no longer exist, and the fourth, the Georgia Strait, is struggling with a very heavy burden. That burden is whether or not an underground newspaper can make money and survive as a member of the underground press.

Speaking of the Georgia Strait, it appears that in the section of our report dealing with press freedom we have unfairly criticized the newspapers in Vancouver. Therefore, may I set the record straight by quoting in part from a self-explanatory letter I received from St. Clair Balfour, the President of Southam. He says:

At page 103 it is stated that "The media have been vigilant in attacking some of the threats to freedom of the press. Others they have ignored—especially those instances where their own revenues weren't affected. We're thinking here primarily of official harassment of the 'underground' press." A description follows of some of the legal proceedings taken against the publisher of the Georgia Strait and its employees.

Reference is then made to a statement by Pierre Berton that the underground press has been subjected "to what I can only describe as unbelievable, scandalous and continual harassment by municipal authorities and police of several cities in this country."

The letter goes on to say:

> The report continues "We concur in his choice of adjectives. It saddens us to report that most daily newspapers have either been luke warm in their editorial approach to this issue, or have ignored it altogether. We find this reticence strange..."

Mr. Balfour then contends, quoting only part of the letter, "This statement is completely untrue." He then goes on to list a number of editorial instances where both the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province did express themselves forcefully on this issue, and I am delighted to set the record straight.

Two examples will suffice, each from September 30, 1967. The Vancouver Province in an editorial said:

> The paper, however, misguided, is the voice of dissent, and as such should be jealously protected by a free society.

The same day the Vancouver Sun said in an editorial:

> It is not sufferable in a free democracy that a publication be silenced because bureaucrats do not like what it says or how it is distributed.

Here is how Mr. Balfour concluded his letter:

> Such conclusions will undoubtedly do damage to the Province and to the Sun and, indeed, to all newspapers. Unfortunately, the damage will be continuing as the report of the Senate committee is likely to be regarded as an authoritative source on newspapers. I am confident that you will agree that it is most unfair that the Vancouver newspapers should be branded as being capable of ignoring a question involving freedom of the press. I would also hope that you would agree that the editorials which have been quoted in this letter could hardly be fairly described as "luke warm". If you do agree, I respectfully suggest that you issue an addendum to the report which at the least corrects the factual errors and shows what the Vancouver newspapers actually said on the question. If this were done, the public would have the opportunity of judging the Vancouver papers on what they actually did, rather than on a misstatement of what they did.

I apologize to Mr. Balfour, and I am of course delighted to set the record straight. Indeed, given the nature of the matter we have been discussing, I am in a sense delighted that our report was wrong about the position of the Vancouver newspapers.

A moment or two ago I mentioned the shifting and changing structure of the underground press. Indeed, its very basic posture seems to shift from time to time. I saw this excellent quotation in the March 26 issue of the Christian Science Monitor, which says in part:

> Underground writing stews in its own underground these days—an underground of self-examination, if not self-condemnation. A mood of uncertainty seems to hang anxiously, subversively over every page. The Movement—the young extrovert of the '60s—is going introspective in the '70s: trying to get its bearings, trying to find where it's at. Who would have predicted it?

Then finally this on the underground press from an excellent book in the parliamentary library, which some of you might want to read. It is The Underground Press in America by Robert J. Glessing; it is published by the Indiana University Press. I just quote a few lines from its introduction, and I wish Senator Quart were here:

> The Underground Press does suffer from serious faults. For one thing, the underground papers openly practice deliberate bias as an integral part of their creed. The facts are often marshaled to fit the theory, whether or not they represent a full and balanced picture and whether or not they check out. Furthermore, known facts sometimes are deliberately withheld because they might contradict the theory. For another thing, many of the underground papers confuse rather than clarify because they fail to focus on given issues. Instead, free love, Vietnam, pollution and the dirty speech movement are all mixed into the same article. Too often, none of the issues comes across with any depth or acumen.
> Another criticism of underground papers concerns their indiscriminate employment of sexual materials and overindulgence in tasteless language. The obsession some have for using a half-dozen or so four-letter words raises not only questions of taste but even more serious doubts about the creative resources of their writers and editors. Journalists of dissent across the ages have been able to attack injustices in society without resorting to such low-level diction, and the results have been more efficacious than most yet produced by the current Underground Press.

Notwithstanding those criticisms, the author concludes his introduction on this note, to which I subscribe—

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sorry to interrupt, but who is the author?

Hon. Mr. Davey: The author is Robert J. Glessing, and the book is published by the University of Indiana Press. He concludes on this note, which I certainly subscribe to:

> Whether any aspects of the Underground Press, let alone its slogans, will prove viable remains to be seen. It already has exhibited some strengths, however, including: (1) the ability to attract and hold youth while regular newspapers are floundering with that audience, (2) enough inventiveness in layout and design to influence the professional media, and (3) demonstrated ability to gain access for dissenters to the marketplace of ideas long after press experts had decreed the old libertarian principle dead.

Finally, as far as the Senate debate is concerned, I would like to say something about New Brunswick. It occurs to me that in our activity here one man may have inadvertently done himself a disservice. That man, of course, is Senator McElman, who in terms of this committee, at least in the public mind, may very well have become regarded as a one-issue man, that issue being the conglomerate control of English language media in New Brunswick, which I will discuss in a moment.

First I want to say something about Senator McElman. He was one of the most valuable members of our committee. His attendance was very nearly perfect. He was actively involved in every single issue that came before our committee. He was not a one-issue man in any sense of that description. That said, however, Senator McElman was, and is, passionately concerned about New Brunswick. Listen, if you will, to the way Ken Bagnell began an article that he wrote in the June 14, 1969, Globe Magazine a publication, incidentally, which he now edits. He says:

> You are, let us say, rolling out of bed in the old city of Saint John, misty and grey in the New Brunswick morning.
> You reach for the morning paper. It is K.C. Irving's paper. You switch on the radio. Chances are good it is K.C. Irving's station. You turn on the TV. It is K.C. Irving's channel.
> You stroll to the drydock. It is K.C. Irving's drydock. You walk to the famous Reversing Falls and lift your gaze to a belching pulp mill. It is K.C. Irving's mill. You scan a hill and a sprawling oil refinery. It is K.C. Irving's refinery. You board a bus. It is K.C. Irving's bus.
> After dinner you buy the evening paper. It is K.C. Irving's paper. You pick up the out-of-town papers, from Moncton and from Fredericton. They are K.C. Irving's.

The point I want to make, of course is that that is where Senator McElman lives. Hopefully his courage will become contagious. I know something of the remarkable response his most recent remarks in this chamber evoked in New Brunswick. Letters to the editor, which have been plentiful, are almost all hostile to Senator McElman. This he will not thank me for saying. His personal mail, which I have seen, is running more strongly in his favour, and that, is counting the usual volume of accepted unsigned hate mail. The merits of the issue are well discussed in our report and needless to say I share Senator McElman's concern, not only in substance but also the degree.

For the purpose of my remarks today I shall content myself with six questions, which hopefully might be answered by Mr. Ralph Costello, the respected past president of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, who is almost certainly the senior journalist in the Irving empire.

These questions are:

(1) Given any credibility gap which may exist and could conceivably develop, why does Mr. Costello not take the lead in establishing a New Brunswick Provincial Press Council?

(2) What is Mr. Costello's association and/for relationship, direct or indirect, with the Fredericton Gleaner?

[Hon. Mr. Davey.]

(3) Presumably, there was considerable province-wide interest in Senator McElman's most recent speech in this chamber. Certainly New Brunswick newspapers played it in that way. However, they used a carefully edited, and highly abbreviated version of Senator McElman's speech. Why was it not possible that this important speech be published in entirety?

(4) Mr. Irving is justifiably proud of being the person in New Brunswick who wants to keep the New Brunswick media in New Brunswick hands. Given that philosophy and five daily papers, why is it not possible for New Brunswick papers to staff at least one man, full-time, here in the Ottawa parliamentary press gallery?

(5) I would like to quote from an editorial from the Moncton Times of March 12:

> The New Brunswick senator complains of a lack of information following the transfer of ownership of a provincial daily to K.C. Irving. Yet he noticeably fails to say that in business cards are generally held close to the vest and often changes of ownership in any field of business are not trumpeted from the rooftops.

Would Mr. Costello subscribe to that kind of journalistic philosophy or would he agree with me that the people of New Brunswick deserve to know who it is that is talking to them? Finally, I have in my hand the March 25 edition of the Telegraph-Journal. I should like to quote briefly from the lead story:

> New Brunswick's social welfare programs are "woefully inadequate" to solve the problems of poverty, says a report tabled in the Legislature Wednesday by Youth and Welfare Minister Brenda Robertson.
> In hard-hitting terms, it calls for sweeping changes in the approach to, and administration of, welfare in the province.
> The report, dated November 15, 1969, was prepared for the welfare department under the previous Liberal Government by MDI Associates, a team of socio-economic consultants. Until now, it had been kept under wraps.

The question is simply this. It is about something we found out, not in the issue of the 25, but subsequently. I saw it in an article the next day in the paper. The report also said something else of extreme interest, and perhaps I could just quote it. This is also in the same report. Why was it given to us, not in the Telegraph-Journal on the 25 but in the following day's paper, the 26?

> People employed by industrialist K.C. Irving of Saint John are dissuaded from promoting the United Fund under threat of losing their job, according to a welfare report tabled in the Legislature Wednesday.

I have no quarrel, and I do not intend to discuss the merits of the issue, but what I wonder is why that particular information was not carried in the Telegraph-Journal, which is the provincial paper of record, on Thursday, March 25? Am I being too cynical to suggest that perhaps this 24-hour hoist took place in order that, when that story did run, alongside it could be another story saying "Absolutely false, says Irving".

Honourable senators, enough of New Brunswick, enough of the Senate debate, to the relief of you all, I am sure. I am now going to turn to my concluding remarks.

I would like to say something about achievements. Has anything really happened as a result of all this very considerable activity? Yes, I honestly think so. The two most important things which have happened I shall leave to very near the completion of my remarks.

Meanwhile, a trifle immodestly and a trifle self-consciously, an immodest self-consciousness which I share with my colleagues in the committee, I hasten to put it—I would like to tell you of some of the interesting and good things that have happened.

First of all, the response from the academic community has been almost overwhelming. Let me read a letter which I received from the Columbia School of Journalism, in the City of New York, one of the most prestigious schools of journalism in the world. It says:

> We have been cogitating over the excellent Senate Committee Report on the Media, and have concluded that we should reprint some 5,500 words of it rather than merely describe it and enthuse....
> The issue, inaugurating our tenth anniversary, will appear in mid-April.

I am sure my colleagues on the committee will share my enthusiasm that the report will be carried in that prestigious journal.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Whom is that letter from?

Hon. Mr. Davey: The Columbia School of Journalism. The reprint will be in the Columbian Journalistic Review, the Tenth Anniversary issue.

I have had a lot of letters from the academic community generally and perhaps just a sampler will suffice. Let me assure you, however, that it is only a sampler. Earlier in my remarks I mentioned a letter from the University of British Columbia. The letter is from a lecturer at that university. The first part of it reads:

> As I re-read the report I become more and more convinced that the $600,000 spent by the committee was one of the best investments ever made by the Government. Of course, I have a somewhat selfish reason for my enthusiasm—at last I have a comprehensive and superbly-written text which I can use in my Political Science 304 course here at the University. The course is entitled "Press and Politics" and, while there's a huge amount of American reference material available, there has until now been a noticeable absence of material on the broadcast and print media here in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Martin: From whom was that last letter?

Hon. Mr. Davey: From Mr. Russell L. Patrick, a lecturer at the University of British Columbia.

Now, from the other end of the country, from Dr. Norma Ellen Verweg, Memorial University in Newfoundland, there is this comment:

> Bravo! Your report on mass media is extremely helpful to sociologists like myself who teach a course in mass communication. Our first Canadian text in this field! I am glad you found the funds and authority to do what we would have liked to have done—particularly your thorough investigation of ownership. Now that this is done, sociologists have a secure foundation on which to base our more theoretically-oriented research on the effects of the content of mass media. Your report will assist in furthering both psychological and sociological theory in this new and important field of social research.
> And your report is so readable that my students read it like a novel, not a textbook.

From Loyola University, Montreal, there is a letter from the Reverend John E. O'Brien, S.J., Chairman, Department of Communication Arts:

> I think you will be interested to learn that the Report on Mass Media became required reading for the students in the Advanced Television Seminar as soon as it was published. Subsequently, two sessions were devoted to exploring the ideas in the report and the students are now completing a documentary television program on the results of that study. Next year the report will be a text for one of the courses in first year.
> Best wishes for success in your campaign to bring greater awareness to the Canadian public about their role in media.

Let me mention just one more. It is from Professor J. L. Wild, Head of the Department of Journalism, University of Western Ontario. He says:

> As to the future, Professor C. E. Wilson will build the framework of our Journalism 21 course—an introduction to the mass media—around the report. Volume I will be the required textbook. Volumes II and III will be required reading. The pattern of the report will be the pattern of the course. Naturally many other approaches and many other readings will be required but the course will be basically centered on the committee's work. If this proves successful with the course during the summer session, it will become more or less the permanent approach in this course.
> Parts of the report will unquestionably be used as source material in virtually all of our courses for some time to come.
> Volumes II and III especially will continue to be valuable source material for a wide range of research projects, particularly when our MA program is inaugurated and our research facilities developed.

Well, there is even some indication of acceptance of this in the nature of a textbook at the high school level.

Longman Canada Limited have written to us informing us that they are preparing a book on the newspaper for use in Canadian secondary schools, tentatively entitled "Now, the Newspaper". They suggest that their author would like to use a selection from the Davey Report on Mass Media. Of course, that request has been acceded to.

If I may speak candidly for just a moment, I must say that since the beginning of the year I have particularly enjoyed speaking across the country to a number of student audiences. It is an especially rewarding experience to speak to perhaps 100 students, each one of whom is armed with a copy of the report and each one of whom is thoroughly conversant with its contents. However, there have been other tangible results. Senator Martin made reference to one earlier, and I should like to talk about that.

At pages 117 and 118 of the report it says that Quebec "is already close to the formation of a press council for that province." You realize that since the tabling of our report that the Quebec press council has become a reality and it is Canada's first such council. Of course, moral suasion is its only tool.

Our particular report went on to state that Canada's special position makes it desirable and inevitable that that province have its own regional organization. We think it is equally desirable that a counterpart organization for English-speaking Canada be formed and that the two bodies somehow affiliate themselves to form a national body.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Is Senator Davey aware that in Windsor there is to be established a press council there under the leadership of the Windsor Star?

Hon. Mr. Davey: Thank you, Senator Martin. We are. Mr. Farrell, who is the very progressive publisher of the Windsor Star, appeared before the committee and informed us of his intention of forming a regional press council in Windsor. I am sure you realize that he is one of the most progressive publishers in Canada.

I must say, also relating to the press council, that I have been extremely encouraged by a gallup poll which appeared recently in the newspapers across Canada. I wonder how many of you saw it. The question was put:

> The Senate Committee on Mass Media—that is newspapers, TV and radio—has suggested that a voluntary press council should be established to examine complaints from the public about them. Do you think that this would be a good idea, or don't you think it necessary?

With the rather limited amount of publicity the press council has had, only 26 per cent of Canadians thought it was not necessary. Fourteen per cent were undecided. And I am delighted to report that 60 per cent of Canadians already support the creation of a voluntary press council. So most certainly in this area there are stirrings.

As you know, the committee also said a great deal about the absence of professionalism in Canadian journalism. We said it in these words:

> The basis of professionalism, surely, is that there are certain things a professional will not do, and other things he must do. The recognition and definition of these standards, and the definition of the practitioners to whom they apply, is what separates accountants, teachers, physicians, and lawyers from steamfitters, plumbers, garage mechanics, TV repairmen—and journalists. As a matter of fact, steamfitters, plumbers et al have taken a more professional approach to their trade than journalists have; they at least insist on minimum standards of training. Apart from the two cases we've described, there appear to be no other instances where journalists, as a group, assume a collective responsibility for the quality of their product as, for instance, the medical profession takes responsibility for the quality of medical care. We don't think the journalistic environment is going to change very much unless and until journalists start assuming—or demanding—such responsibility.

Well of course that very thing is happening. On this coming weekend in Ottawa there is going to be a conference of journalists, called Media 71. I dare to believe that this conference is at least partially inspired by our committee's activities. I should like to quote from the publication content on Media 71:

> Well, at this stage things are promising for the first general conference of Canadian journalists—scheduled for Ottawa, May 1 and 2, at the Skyline Hotel.
> Certainly the core planning body of journalists from Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, and the ad hoc steering committee of communications people from across Canada, are optimistic.
> Response to the story carried in last month's Content and to a hundred letters dispatched to key people in all provinces has been encouraging. People do agree that the Special Senate Committee's Report on Mass Media merits further study and elaboration. The thrust of the conference in Ottawa will be two-pronged: an examination of the Davey report and a look beyond the committee's conclusions.

I will be attending that conference, and I hope that some of you will be coming along. There is no doubt at all that the committee and its report will be put under a very fine spotlight. I am sure all kinds of holes will be picked in the report, and justifiably so. But the significant point is that such a general conference of Canadian journalists will be taking place at all. Many of the reforms we advocate will require the leadership of the members of the working press, and, finally, they are coming together.

What about the Canadian content recommendations? As you know, we said to the CBC: "Full speed ahead on Canadian content." To my own intense relief, and notwithstanding yesterday's announcement, the CRTC has held the television line. It is a wise move which demonstrates their good faith, common sense and flexibility. You know, your friendly neighbourhood private television broadcaster has quite another matter of concern which relates to a recent ruling of the FCC, which is of course the American equivalent of the CRTC. Patrick Scott described the problem extremely well in a recent issue of the Toronto Star. He said:

> Specifically, the FCC has decreed that the networks' access to prime time (generally considered to be the viewing period between 7 and 11 p.m.) be reduced to three hours per night from its current and traditional four.

This cutback was ordered by the FCC for much the same reason that the CRTC last year introduced its controversial Canadian content quotas. It was specifically to generate more local programming. Patrick Scott further states:

> For Canadians, such a prospect has a double implication. On the one hand it means that, even had the CRTC not imposed its import quotas, Canadian viewers will be seeing fewer American programs next season for the simple reason that there will be fewer of them available from the American networks.
> On the other hand, it means that Canadian content now stands a better chance than it ever has before of reversing to some extent the traditional cross-border flow, if only because in their desperation the individual U.S. stations are latching on to anything that moves.

Meanwhile, what is the story with respect to the Canadian content on radio? It is a story of remarkable success. There is less American music, and lo and behold, the world is still turning and there is still lots of audience and still lots of commercial advertising, and what is really different, there is more Canadian music and more Canadian talent and Canadian record sales as well as an increasing exposure of Canadian talent all over the world.

Quoting from the current issue of the Financial Post:

> Those Canadian content rules the Canadian Radio-Television Commission laid down for music over AM radio are producing some happy side effects in the U.S. In a recent letter to FP, Phil Anderson, President, Ahed Music Corporation Ltd., Toronto, observes: "It is not only easier to get air play and exposure of a potential hit (in Canada) but now if the public does accept the recording and it sells in Canada, U.S. record distributors...will spend substantial funds in testing the acceptance...in the U.S. market.
> "At present, what happens in Canada is of much interest in the record community of New York and Los Angeles."

Mr. Anderson certainly knows whereof he speaks, because, as a matter of fact, a record entitled "Put Your Hand in the Hand of a Man"—a Canadian record performed by Canadians, written by Canadians, recorded by Canadians and produced by Canadians—reached the number one spot in most Canadian markets during March, and even as we sit in this chamber it is presently number one in most American cities. The United States sales figures for this Canadian record are well over $1 million, and it is believed to be the first record produced exclusively in Canada which has attained this type of sales figure in the United States. As a matter of fact I have made a copy of this record available to all honourable senators who will find it with their morning mail. It is by a group called Ocean. Anne Murray is another perfect example of what I have been speaking about.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is one of the very few records of that type that I know.

Hon. Mr. Davey: With your forbearance, honourable senators, I think I can complete my remarks before we must adjourn. I could go on for some time listing achievements, but I promise you I shall restrain myself. Perhaps one or two miscellaneous examples will suffice.

Our section on the weekly newspapers was entitled "The Community Press". I see in the current issue of Marketing that the annual convention of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Publishers Association in Vancouver later this year will be asked to agree to a change in name for the association. The new name suggested is the Canadian Community Newspapers Association. Then there is an article written by Bill Hutton in the Canadian Broadcaster entitled "The CRTC Should Learn the Davey Methods," from which I should like to read:

> Private broadcasters who appeared as witnesses before the Davey Committee couldn't help but compare the atmosphere of the hearings with those conducted by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The major witnesses sat on the same level as the Chairman with the committee members sitting in front. There was none of the mental put-down of the CRTC hearings where the accused, pardon me, the witness, must stare up at his judge and jury. I believe that in main, the Davey committee created an atmosphere where men could talk as equals.

We said some flattering things about CBC radio, and if time permitted I could document the fact that CBC radio audiences are growing to record proportions. Indeed, CBC radio ratings are now the highest ever for them in the cities of Toronto and Montreal and, as recommended by our committee, the corporation is finally promoting its radio service by means of its television service.

Then, there is the farm press. Here is the way we completed the section of our report on the farm press:

> There is a healthy future, it appears to us, for those which recognize that the farm press is a legitimate branch of the business press.

We said that, and we said also that these people, the farmers, no longer rely on the farm magazine to give them entertainment, national and world news, childrens' features and home-help hints. We went on to say:

> But the specialized farmer has special needs.

The section, if I may complete it, says that the future is bright for those who recognize that the farm press is a legitimate branch of the business press.

Here is an advertisement which came from Marketing which I am sure you know is an advertising trade paper "Farming has become a business. The Free Press Weekly has become a business report. It has become Report on Farming." And so, at least in this particular regard, it would appear that Mr. Richard Malone has taken at least some of our advice.

Honourable senators, I appreciate your patience and I shall now turn to my concluding remarks. Our report makes clear, I think, that any real progress in this whole area is in the hands of other people. Indeed, we say we also believe that there is very little that government can do or even should do to bring these improvements about. That is why I honestly believe that our recommendations really represent only the tertiary value of this report. The report's fundamental significance is that it has provided the people of Canada, including viewers, readers, owners and members of the working press, with one considered assessment of their performance; one set of insights into their activities. A free press presumes responsibility. While urging the preservation of press freedom, we have at the same time tried to remind owners of this very responsibility.

Then in the process comes the study's other great virtue; we have tried to alert the people of Canada to their responsibilities as the consumers of mass media. By and large, they have been a responsive audience. Certainly one measure of public interest in the report has been the flood of speaking engagements which certainly I have been offered. I try to fill as many as I possible can. Whenever I go and speak somewhere I do open-line radio, television, academic interviews, and I try to see anybody who is interested. I have been from Halifax to Vancouver and from Montreal to Winnipeg, and just about everywhere else in between.

I think that publishers, broadcasters and others who really do care about media—and I have said many times that I do not quarrel even for a moment with the sincerity of these people—should accept the new politics of involvement which hopefully will accentuate and renew public interest in the media.

I have spoken already about the role of the working press in achieving some of these reforms, and I think the working press is beginning to move in that direction, and so, I am confident, are the owners. Something must surely come out of the meeting of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters which took place in Montreal last week. There are very encouraging stirrings at the meetings of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association which are taking place this very week in Toronto. If I might quote from an article by Mr. Pat McNenly of the Toronto Star of yesterday, he said:

> Newspaper officials interviewed yesterday generally welcome Davey's report...Canadian Press members will vote immediately tomorrow morning to decide if the annual meeting will be opened.
> Several of the publishers and executives interviewed yesterday opposed the closed door policy.

[Hon. Mr. Davey.]

I am delighted to say that by that vote taken in Canadian Press the doors were in fact opened. For the first time in its 54-year history CP partially opened the doors of its annual meeting to reporters. Canadian Press, as I am sure you know, is a co-operative news agency servicing 104 Canadian newspapers which finance it and determine its policy. And so we had the doors at least partially opened.

I also received two reports which I have been unable to confirm. One is that CP voted at its meeting to do as the Senate committee suggested and send more CP correspondents throughout the world. I also have a report that the publishers have decided that henceforth the meetings of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association should at least be partially open.

To be clear in my position on this, there is no doubt at all that the CAB and the CDNPA obviously will have parts of their meetings which will be closed to the public, but most of the meetings should be open and I am delighted to know that apparently that is the direction in which things are moving. So, honourable senators, perhaps the long sleep is over. Certainly many publishers have expressed to me privately that at least the slumber has been disturbed; and, perhaps, after all that has been worthwhile. Hopefully the same thing will happen inside the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. Time will tell. Perhaps, indeed, the immediate future will give us some idea.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY TRAFFIC ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-3, to amend the Government Property Traffic Act:

> The Committee recommends that the Bill should not be proceeded with further in the Senate in view of the following letter received on March 23, 1971, by the Deputy Chairman from the Honourable Arthur Laing, P.C., Minister of Public Works:
> "It would be appreciated if you could report to the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee that the Department of Public Works does not wish to proceed further with the subject bill because of various technical problems which have recently come to light involving municipal, provincial and federal relations."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: With leave, now.

Report adopted.

CRIMINAL CODE (BAIL REFORM)

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Urquhart moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 29, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

MASS MEDIA

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to refer to what my good friend Senator Davey said, among other things, in his speech yesterday. I agree with him that we are good friends, but we can differ on certain views. I do not intend to make a speech about that now.

As reported in Senate Hansard, at page 926, speaking about the early deliberations of the committee, he made reference to Rule 84, which has since been amended. At that time it read:

> No senator who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, in the inquiry to be entrusted to any Select Committee, shall sit on such Committee, and any question of interest arising in the Committee may be determined by the Committee, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

I looked up Rule 84, but could not find where it applied. However, my colleague Senator Molson referred me to Rule 75, which seems to be the correct rule to cover what was said by Senator Davey.

After having made reference to this rule, Senator Davey said that at the time he was talking about I apparently had at least "a limited amount" of interest remaining in some media holdings by virtue of "four separate media involvements". I wish to state categorically that neither I nor any member of my family, including my wife, have any direct or indirect interest in the media. I must say this in order to correct any possible misunderstanding of my role in the Senate and to remove any reflection which may have been cast by this reference.

Senator Davey referred to the fact that his committee had "access to the Canadian Parliamentary Guide at the time," and that that Guide listed my involvements in the media field. Let me say at once that the Parliamentary Guides of 1971, 1970, 1969, 1968 and 1967 contain exactly the same information about me. But they contain a misrepresentation. Unfortunately, my attempts to have this situation corrected have failed. On two occasions, once a few years ago and again last year before the printing of the current Guide, I submitted to the editor of the Canadian Parliamentary Guide certain corrections concerning what the Guide had to say about me. Those corrections were not made and I regret that very much because it has led to some misunderstanding. Moreover, upon discussing this matter with other senators I have found that they too have complaints to make about this Guide.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I think we should air this question because the Guide is widely used and the public is being misinformed. For instance, when it comes to serving on Senate committees, the Guide informs the public whether or not we have specific interests. I think this matter should be looked at carefully with a view to having the Guide give up-to-date and accurate biographies of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

Furthermore, normally when biographies are printed, permission is first obtained from the subject of the biography and a copy of the proposed material is sent to him. If no answer is forthcoming, the material is printed. If, however, some amendments are made to the material, then the biography is printed as amended. But this is not what is being done here, and the way the Canadian Parliamentary Guide is produced is passé. I should hope that in this instance they will make a correction.

Before I sit down, honourable senators, let me add that I was quite surprised to receive such attention in the remarks made by my good friend Senator Davey. He is quite right in making these comments, but as far as I am concerned I question some of them. He referred to me on three different occasions during his speech when referring to the CBC. On page 927 he said: "Honourable senators, Senator Desruisseaux also had much to say about broadcasting; much about the CBC, which he does not like."

Then on page 928 at paragraph 2, he said: "Senator Desruisseaux does not like the CBC."

In the third paragraph he said, "Honourable senators, Senator Beaubien, like Senator Desruisseaux, does not like the CBC." The implication is to present me as an adversary of the CBC. During the time I have been in the Senate I have made some speeches in favour of the CBC, and I will leave it to the Senate to judge what I have done in the past.

If I say that the CBC has a right to be investigated, the same as private media are investigated, then that is my observation. It does not mean that I want the CBC abolished. I want it to be the best media in the world. I was not present during Senator Davey's speech. I was absent intentionally in order not to cause any embarrassment because I realized that some remarks would be made about my speech on mass media and I wished to leave the ground free for Senator Davey. As to my attendance, I will let honourable senators judge that. I think it is as good as the average or better. That is all that I have to say.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I am glad that the question of the Canadian Parliamentary Guide was raised by my friend Senator Desruisseaux. I myself have been a victim of some misrepresentation, or at least I was not properly identified. In my short curriculum, which is usually written by each individual—mine is very brief—it says:

Summoned to Senate, Jan. 31, 1958.

Then it states:

Appointed Deputy Government Leader in Senate.

There is no year given and no date. So that I am still the Deputy Leader to my good friend Senator Martin. I am very proud to be occupying that position.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are pleased to have you.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: On several occasions I have pointed that out, and I have tried to add a little bit to this because I have been appointed director of some defunct companies.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does not the honourable senator realize what a grievance he would have if they had given him the wrong political allocation?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: This is only one grievance I have, but let us hope that after these remarks of Senator Desruisseaux, together with mine and the complaints that may be made by other honourable senators, this will not be just an automatic renewal from year to year and that if we are asked to add to or subtract from our numerous qualifications such additions or subtractions will be included in the next edition of the Canadian Parliamentary Guide.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I should have stated that the Canadian Parliamentary Guide is "edited with the patronage of the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the various provinces."

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Desruisseaux rose on a question of privilege and clarified certain statements made in the debate on the Mass Media report. He also raised a particular point with respect to the Canadian Parliamentary Guide. I am glad that Senator Choquette also spoke on that point. I have my own grievance to add to those expressed by both honourable senators. I am not sure whether the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration could deal with this matter. However, I would consider having those responsible for the Canadian Parliamentary Guide indicate at what time we should bring forward appropriate changes as the years go by. A good suggestion to them would be to check whether a biography is correct before printing it in the current edition. I hope that the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration will note this for consideration at the earliest date possible.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Osler has been substituted for that of Mr. Kaplan on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of a document issued by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries under date of April 23, 1971, appointing members of a commission of inquiry, pursuant to section 13 of the Penitentiary Act, to investigate certain disturbances at Kingston Penitentiary between April 14 and 18, 1971.

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, April 28, 1971, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952.

CRIMINAL CODE (JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. F. Elsie Inman presented Bill S-20, to amend the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mrs. Inman moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL COOPERATION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and in accordance with a previous arrangement, I should like to comment on an agreement I tabled yesterday between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on scientific and technical co-operation.

It will be recalled that last June I tabled a collection of papers entitled "Foreign Policy for Canadians". These papers comprised a review of our position in the international community. In that review the Government stressed:

> Canada has a large stake in Europe, the only area outside North America where the major themes of Canadian policy converge. Trade and financial relations with Europe are of substantial importance to Canada's own economic growth and to a maintenance of a stable and prosperous international community. Co-operation with likeminded countries in Europe will continue to be an essential factor in the success of international ventures aimed at world order, social justice and environmental improvements. Scientific, technological and cultural relations with the highly-developed countries of Western Europe influence the quality of life in Canada and help to strengthen its independence, unity and identity. The security of Europe is vital to the maintenance of global peace and security.

This agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany is evidence of the concrete steps which Canada is taking to intensify her close co-operation with the countries of Europe, particularly the countries of the European Common Market. Already this year we have concluded similar scientific and technological agreements with Belgium and the Soviet Union. The purpose of these agreements is to facilitate the exchange of information and create conditions under which both parties will profit from research developments in their respective countries. These exchanges of information and personnel are of great value to Canada's long-term trading and industrial development potential.

This agreement was signed by my colleague, Mr. Pepin, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, last week. He headed a delegation of prominent Canadian businessmen and senior federal and provincial officials, who went to Germany about two weeks ago. In addition to signing the agreement, he endeavoured to draw Canada and the Federal Republic into an even closer economic relationship, and to discuss with German ministers and the Governor of the Central Bank of the Federal Republic a variety of bilateral European and multilateral trade problems.

Our relations with the Federal Republic of Germany are very good, and that country continues to be our fourth largest trading partner. It is the policy of the Government to diversify our relations throughout the world, and, as I have already noted, especially to intensify our relations with our allies in Europe. This agreement, which provides an umbrella for the future development of our scientific and technological relations with the Federal Republic, is but one aspect of a broader policy the purpose of which is to intensify our already close relations with such countries as Britain, France, Germany and other members of the European community.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

In addition to this determination, this agreement came about as the result of discussions carried out by a mission of scientists and officials from business and government which visited Germany for this particular purpose. This preliminary mission, which laid the groundwork for this agreement, constitutes in itself an example of the type of exchange which these agreements are designed to encourage. We expect later this year to receive in Canada a similar delegation of German scientists and industrialists.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 4, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

EXPIRATION APRIL 30, 1971—QUESTIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as the Act to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada, i.e., Bill C-181, will cease to be in force tomorrow April 30, is the Government Leader in a position to inform the Senate of the implications in regard to the following:

1. Persons who have been indicted of affiliation to the FLQ;

2. Persons who might be indicted because of events prior to October 16, 1970, or at least April 30, 1971;

3. Persons who, after April 30, 1971, could support the FLQ in the manner described in clause 8 of Bill C-181?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn had given me notice this morning of his intention to put these questions. I was not to reply immediately but I can, at least, give my personal impressions.

The senator asks me whether the act to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order will cease to be in force tomorrow April 30 in regard to several groups of persons, and in the first place persons who have been indicted of affiliation to the FLQ. I would reply yes to question No. 1, that these indictments against these persons remain valid.

Regarding question No. 2, I am under the impression that, as in the case of the previous question, indictments are still valid.

Regarding question No. 3, under provisions of the Criminal Code, any accusation of seditious plot remains in force.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But not according to the act, not according to Bill C-181.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I might have something to add; I shall certainly add something later.

PENSION ACT AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

EFFECT OF DELAY IN GIVING ROYAL ASSENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator White asked me a question yesterday. I am not sure that I am giving the kind of answer that will fully satisfy him, but it is the best I can do in the circumstances.

Bill C-203, to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, as honourable senators will recall, was read the first time in the Senate on February 23, 1971. On February 24, 1971, the second reading was moved by Senator Lang. The bill was not read a second time until March 9, because of delays the responsibility for which does not rest only on this side. I do not want to go further than that.

The bill was considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on March 11 and March 17. It was reported back to the Senate, without amendment, on March 17.

The bill was read the third time and passed on March 18. I think the bill should have been ready for royal assent which took place on March 11. I do not think I can really add anything more.

Hon. George S. White: On what date was royal assent given?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There was royal assent on March 11.

Hon. Mr. White: No, the bill received third reading on March 18 and was given royal assent on March 30.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. White: The honourable leader has given no explanation as to why this bill was not given royal assent on March 18, so that the benefits conferred under it would become immediately effective. This is not a complaint. I simply wish to point out that by the delay, for which no explanation has been given, the widows and veterans who benefit under this bill have lost two weeks' benefit.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I can add anything more. There was certainly no default on the part of any one in the Senate which caused delay in obtaining royal assent. I cannot add to this. With regard to other delays which took place before passage of the bill, I have suggested that the blame does not rest entirely on this side.

Hon. Mr. White: I agree with that, but the honourable Government Leader should realize that he cannot expect to bring forward bills in this house and have first, second, and third readings the same day.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know.

Hon. Mr. White: I suggest to the honourable Government Leader that there was no reason for the delay. I still have not had a satisfactory explanation of why royal assent was delayed for two weeks.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is why I said, when I tried to make my reply as diplomatically as I could, that I knew it would not satisfy the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nor yourself.

Hon. Mr. White: The honourable leader knows that no one but the Government can arrange royal assent.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. White: The Leader of the Government knew that this bill would receive third reading and be passed on March 18. My question is: Why did not the Leader of the Government arrange royal assent on that day, so that the benefits under this act would be available immediately to these veterans of Hong Kong?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot add any more. I hope it will not be suggested the delay was mine.

Hon. Mr. White: No, but after all the Leader of the Government in the Senate is a member of the Government, and he has some responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. White: Then, did the leader recommend to the cabinet that there be royal assent on March 18?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I suggest to the honourable senator that he look at my reply.

Hon. Mr. White: It says nothing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That was the idea.

Hon. Mr. White: I quite realize that; it says nothing. As a result, these veterans of Hong Kong, having waited 25 years, are delayed a further two weeks in obtaining benefit under this bill.

CRIMINAL CODE (BAIL REFORM)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the third reading of Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

REASSESSMENT OF CANADA'S POSITION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Manning, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.—(Honourable Senator O'Leary).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Will Senator O'Leary not be here to go on today?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not that I know of.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps we could simply stand it until later this day, since I understood he intended to go on.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If he intended to come, I have not heard about it.

Order stands.

CANADA-FINLAND SUPPLEMENTARY INCOME TAX CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to implement a Supplementary Income Tax Convention between Canada and Finland.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a simple and straightforward piece of legislation which involves an amendment to the tax treaty between Canada and Finland. The amendment is consequent upon a Finnish amendment to Finland's own internal tax laws.

It might be of interest to know that Canada has 16 tax conventions with other countries in the western world, including this one with Finland which was entered into in 1959.

The amendment embodied in Bill S-18 has come about at the request of Finland, because in 1969 Finland, by changing its internal tax laws, required all Finnish corporations to declare all income including dividends from foreign subsidiaries as part of its taxable income, notwithstanding the source of the income.

Without this amendment, a Finnish corporation operating a subsidiary in Canada would find that the dividends from its Canadian subsidiary were fully taxable in its hands in Finland, notwithstanding the fact that the dividends had been paid out by that Canadian subsidiary after the Canadian subsidiary had paid the full Canadian tax on its income.

This amendment provides that a Finnish corporation carrying on business in Canada through a subsidiary after that subsidiary has paid the full Canadian tax and has remitted moneys to its parent corporation in Finland, will receive those dividends from its Canadian subsidiary tax-free in Finland.

Naturally this is a reciprocal provision so that the same thing would apply to Canadian companies operating subsidiaries in Finland. It does not affect the Canadian tax structure in any way whatsoever.

On first looking at Bill S-18 it occurred to me to wonder how important this legislation was, consequent upon the extent of Finnish economic activity in Canada, and particularly while debate is in progress on Senator Manning's motion concerning Canada-United States relations. It is interesting to note that Finland is in many ways similar to Canada. Finland's climate is much the same as Canada's climate and its natural resources are in much the same range as our own. It is a much smaller state. It is not as large as either Ontario or Quebec, nor is it as richly endowed in natural resources as either of those two provinces.

Like Canada, Finland also neighbours on one of the two great powers of the world. Unlike Canada's neighbour to the south, Finland's neighbour, the Russian presence, is not entirely friendly. Russia will freely and without consideration for Finnish sensitivities intervene in Finland's internal political and economic situation when Russia deems it advisable to do so in its own interests.

Notwithstanding Finland's small size and the omnipresent threat from her Russion neighbour, Finland has since World War II become one of the most highly industrialized and advanced countries in the western world in a technological sense. Since World War II half of the world icebreakers have been produced by Finnish shipyards. Finnish manufactured products such as tractors and road-building equipment are being manufactured in Brazil and Spain either under licence or in assembly plants directly. Finland produces paper-making machines which are exported to all parts of the world, including Russia. It manufactures a whole range of paper products and competes successfully in world markets with Canada, the United States and Russia. A country of such relatively small size and population, with a climate and resources similar to ours, Finland is an example that Canada can benefit from. Despite obstacles and handicaps, Finland has moved from a non-industrialized, impoverished country of post-World War II to become a nation whose products and technology can match the best that any country can produce.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to commend this bill to your favourable consideration. I am sure it will meet with your approval, and because it is relatively simple and uncomplicated I do not intend to refer it to committee unless it is your wish that this be done.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Lang moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL—SECOND READING

Hon. L. P. Beaubien moved the second reading of Bill S-19, respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-19 proposes to amend the charter of the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal, which charter is dated June 23, 1887. There are many provisions in the act of incorporation of the hospital which have become obsolete over the years as a result of which it is completely unworkable today. One of the main reasons for this is the Quebec Hospitals Act.

The charter of the hospital contains ten clauses, and it is proposed to amend practically each one of them. This is really what I might call a process of streamlining. For example of the 15 governors of the hospital, seven persons were named as governors ex officio. They were, among others, the Mayor of Montreal, the President of the Board of Trade of the City of Montreal, the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the President of the Bank of Montreal, the Chief Officer, resident at Montreal, of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Principal of the University of McGill College, and the Dean of Medicine of the said university. It is considered that this is no longer practicable since the Quebec Hospitals Act now covers these things.

Furthermore, under the charter the hospital was entitled to open cottage hospitals as branches at Banff, Alberta, and at Caledonia Springs, Ontario. The Quebec Hospitals Act provides for one hospital only in the Province of Quebec.

If honourable senators give second reading to this simple bill, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask honourable Senator Beaubien if the Royal Victoria Hospital has any legal relationship with McGill University or does it simply serve as a teaching hospital?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Other than the fact that it was a teaching hospital, there does not seem to be any tie between them according to the charter. But, as I told you, the Board of Governors of the hospital had to include the Principal of the University of McGill College, and the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine, so that there was by virtue of that fact a very strong liaison.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Is the Montreal Neurological Institute part of the hospital?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: No, that is a separate institute built and paid for by Mr. J. W. McConnell.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Beaubien has said it was built and paid for by Mr. J. W. McConnell. I wonder if I might take issue with that statement. There is no doubt whatever that he was a great benefactor of the Neurological Institute, but I would point out that the provincial government had also been giving annual grants to the institute. However, these grants were not sufficient and so Dr. Penfield, the distinguished neuro-surgeon, addressed himself to the federal Government and as a result the federal Government made substantial grants to the institute for both construction and equipment.

So, honourable senators, I think the facts will show that it was built and equipped as a result of the contributions by the two levels of government as well as by individuals, particularly Mr. J. W. McConnell.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Who was Minister of Health and Welfare in those days?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I happened to be the Minister of Health and Welfare.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-17, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act"—(Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Benidickson who intended to speak at this time is engaged on public business elsewhere and cannot be here. In the circumstances I would ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

INFORMATION CANADA

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Hon. Paul Martin: I wonder if I might have leave of the Senate to place on record my reply to something that Senator Davey said about Information Canada.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Information Canada does its utmost to anticipate the demand for special reports of the kind mentioned yesterday by Senator Davey. The minister in charge has asked me to point out that unfortunately in this instance the demand was much higher than anticipated. I present the following schedule of the printing and reprinting of the Mass Media publication:

Printed for Senate	Volumes	Date Received	Printed for Information Canada
750	Vol. I English	1-12-70	3,000
	Vol. I Reprint	17- 3-71	2,800
750	Vol. II English	7-12-70	2,000
	Vol. II Reprint	26- 3-71	2,200
750	Vol. III English	3-12-70	2,000
	Vol. III Reprint	17- 3-71	2,200
300	Vol. I French	1-12-70	1,000
300	Vol. II French	7-12-70	750
300	Vol. III French	3-12-70	750
			16,700 Total

Advance copies of the publications were sent to Miss Barry of the committee on December 7, 1970. Copies were also despatched to Mr. J. W. Dean of the Senate, and Mr. J. E. Levesque, House of Commons Distribution, on December 8, 1970.

The report was tabled in this house on December 9, 1970, and this gave Information Canada two days only in which to make distribution to bookshops across Canada. Token shipments—25 copies—were forwarded by air freight to Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax with a similar number of copies being sent to Toronto and Montreal for December 9, 1970.

On behalf of the Honourable Robert Stanbury, I should like to make it clear that Information Canada received no instructions whatsoever from the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media to sell the books in sets of three. Information Canada officials did, however, ensure that greater quantities of Volume I were printed in anticipation of a larger number of requests for this volume.

I would have to agree that there were delays in connection with reprint action, but these were occasioned by virtue of corrections to be submitted by the committee.

With reference to the advertisement in the Toronto newspapers on the opening of the Inquiry Centre in that city, which also mentioned the report of the Mass Media Committee, there was no particular reason why it did not mention that Volume I could be obtained for $3.50. In addition the book was not available at the bookstore because it has been sold out prior to the opening of the Inquiry Centre. Also reprints were ordered.

With regard to the complaint by Michael J. Divers of London, Ontario, his request reached Information Canada at a time when an unusually heavy volume of requests were being received for all types of publications. In fact, requests were so heavy at that time that a backlog developed, but this has since been cleared up.

Adverting to the question of furnishing private bookstores with copies of this report it is not the policy of Information Canada to communicate directly with bookstores informing them of titles for the simple reason that Information Canada does not have the staff, and consequently cannot handle the volume of business generated by this type of sales promotion.

Hon. Mr. Everett: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question which is relevant to this subject? The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is embarking on a series of what we hope will be very important hearings on the exercise of fiscal and monetary policy in Canada. It has been suggested by one of our colleagues that perhaps Information Canada could play a role in publicizing those hearings. I wonder if the Leader of the Government knows whether Information Canada can play such a role, and, if so, how the chairman of the committee may cause Information Canada to take appropriate action.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps Senator Everett and I can meet briefly following the adjournment in order to discuss how I can meet his request. At the moment I do not think I am in a position to answer his question.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I think the two of us could solve any problem.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I should also like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. I understand that the Queen's Printer used to do quite a lot of promotion of publications. The Government Leader has just said that Information Canada is not doing any promotion. Is this promotional work still being done by the Queen's Printer, or is it not being done at all?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I said it was not doing any promotion, but a certain amount of promotion was not being undertaken because Information Canada did not have the staff. As to the remainder of the question, I think it would be best for me to inform myself, and supply the answer later.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why do the three of you not meet?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not a bad idea.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 4, 1971, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 4, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

HON. JOHN J. MACDONALD

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise at this time because yet another Conservative senator has retired. I refer to the honourable Senator John J. MacDonald. Senator MacDonald, you will recall, has been absent for quite some time and it would appear that the condition of his health is such that his physician could not foresee a day in the proximate future when he might be well enough to again take his place among us. Consequently, it was suggested to him by his family and medical advisor that he should retire.

Senator MacDonald, before he came to us, had enjoyed successful careers as both a farmer and a soldier. He was also president for a time of the East River Dairy Company, the East River Telephone Company and the P.E.I. Dairymen's Association. An Islander more beloved and respected by the people whom he represented in this chamber would be difficult to find. We on this side of the house enjoyed having him with us. He was witty, charming and very human.

I know we will miss him and we all wish him restored health and many years of peaceful happiness with his family.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, we have been informed with regret, as Senator Flynn reminds us, of the resignation of Senator John J. MacDonald. Senator MacDonald was summoned to this house in 1958 by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker.

As Senator Flynn has noted, Senator MacDonald was a soldier and farmer for the better part of 50 years. He was also active during this period in business. He was well known and respected in farming circles in Prince Edward Island. He has served Canada in the Senate with no less dedication.

We are sad to see one of our colleagues departing and on behalf of the Government and my fellow senators on this side, I extend to Senator MacDonald our best wishes for a happy and fruitful retirement. Furthermore, we hope that he will be restored fully to good health. We will miss him for his many qualities, not least of which will be his strong and resonant voice.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: I should also like to say a few words about Senator MacDonald, whom I have known for many years. He is a veteran of two wars. He was elected to the Legislature of Prince Edward Island and contributed a good deal to his province, especially to its agricultural life. His wife, who came from the same district that he did, lived in Ottawa for a number of years before they were married and she made many friends here. I understand that Senator MacDonald will be living with his daughter in Saskatoon. I am sure that he will be greatly missed in this house and by his friends here and in Prince Edward Island.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. McQuaid has been substituted for that of Mr. La Salle on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of the Annual Handbook of present conditions and recent progress entitled "Canada 1971".

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1971-789, dated April 27, 1971, amending Parts I and II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said Act, chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69.

Copies of correspondence, dated April 2, 29 and 30, 1971, exchanged between the Office of the Prime Minister and the Premier of the Province of Quebec with respect to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, 1970. (French text).

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (a), that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Thursday next, May 6, 1971, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—ADDITIONS TO SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (h):

That the names of the honourable Senators Choquette and Sullivan be added to the list of senators serving on the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY MEETING IN STRASBOURG, FRANCE, 1971—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the debate on development co-operation at the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, in Strasbourg, France, on 26th January 1971, and in particular to the participation therein of the delegation from the Parliament of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I believe that you will be aware, following the visit to Ottawa in March of this year of the delegation from the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, that our Parliament was invited by the Assembly to participate in the debate on co-operation in international development aid on January 26 last in Strasbourg. Our delegation, whom I shall mention shortly, consisted of only three members. It was a small delegation rather less impressive than the Australian delegation of nine, but I believe that our visit was worthwhile.

Our delegation received its briefing through the office of Mr. I. G. Imrie of the Interparliamentary Relations Branch, who arranged for the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs to undertake that task. It was well done by Mr. Peter C. Dobell, whose experience and guidance were invaluable, and with the active co-operation of the House of Commons Subcommittee on International Development Assistance, under the chairmanship of Mr. Georges-C. Lachance.

However, I must draw attention to one aspect in which the Canadian effort is unsatisfactory. I refer in this case to transportation arrangements. The armed forces are requested to provide transportation for parliamentarians going to Europe, instead of delegations being provided transportation in the normal way. As the departures do not necessarily coincide with suitable dates, it may mean that a delegation leaves three unnecessary days too early, comes home several days too late or, as happened in our case, almost all our delegation arrived at Strasbourg at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, after a sleepless night, and promptly found themselves in the middle of activities. Also, as the most convenient flight home—a day after our task was finished—was cancelled, the delegation was provided with funds to remain from Thursday to Sunday instead of returning home to some useful activity.

If these delegations are worthwhile, they should go by armed forces transport only if it is available at a suitable time, and I believe the forces should be reimbursed for these fares. Otherwise delegates should be provided economy fares on commercial flights at times enabling the delegates to do a proper job and to return to their essential work. I submit that there is no real economy in this present system, and that, in future, transportation to Europe be arranged on a more realistic and useful basis.

Having registered these views on planning and arrangements, let me return to my subject. The Council of Europe was established in 1949, with a membership limited to European states which:

Accept the principles of the rule of law and of the enjoyment by all persons within their jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I should mention that Sir Winston Churchill was in large measure influential in the council's establishment, and a large bust of him is very much in evidence in the assembly building.

The members of the Council of Europe are: Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Greece, Iceland, the Irish Republic, Italy, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and West Germany, although at the moment the membership of Greece is in abeyance.

The council has two organs: the Consultative Assembly, a deliberative body consisting of 147 persons elected or appointed representatives of their national parliaments, and the Committee of Foreign ministers of the member countries. It is this latter Committee of Foreign Ministers which provides the vehicle to governments for action subsequent to any conclusion of the assembly. These bodies are jointly assisted by a large and competent secretariat.

International development aid activities are conducted, not by the council but by the OECD—the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development—which includes 15 of the members of the Council of Europe, as well as Finland, Portugal, Spain, Canada, the United States, Australia, and Japan, a total of 22 nations. OECD in turn, insofar as development assistance is concerned, acts through its committee specially created for the purpose, called the Development Assistance Committee, known as DAC. DAC does not include, for obvious reasons, the participation in development aid of such less endowed countries as Cyprus, Greece, Iceland, the Irish Republic, Luxembourg, Spain, and Turkey.

Honourable senators, I realize how confusing these overlapping organizations are, particularly when we also have the European Economic Community which, as you know, has six European countries in it, and NATO, which is composed of 12 countries of Europe, with Canada and the United States as well. In order to make the relationship clear, I am submitting a table showing which countries are members of these different organizations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this table be printed as an appendix?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For table see Appendix, p. 963)

Hon. Mr. Molson: Having done this, I will remind you that the debate I am discussing was that of the Council of Europe, and the reason for our invitation to participate was that the subject was aid to developing countries. The programs and progress of the special international agency concerned with development aid, which I have just described, that is, the Development Assistance Committee of OECD, was being examined.

In any event, the one day, January 25, spent in familiarization and planning the program for the debate on the next day, was all too short.

The order of business in the assembly on the 26th occupied a very full day, from 10 o'clock in the morning until about 7 o'clock in the evening, and it is not easy to summarize briefly. It started with a full statement by Edwin M. Martin of the United States, Chairman of the Development Assistance Committee of OECD. He discussed in broad terms the results of the previous year as far as assistance was concerned, and more particularly, the analysis of those activities which was being presented to the assembly that day in the form of four different papers.

The first paper was on "Employment and Development," presented by Mr. Judd, a Labour M.P. of the United Kingdom, and was based on the conclusions of a round-table discussion held in Rome in November.

The second paper, a critique of the 1970 annual report of the chairman of the Development Assistance Committee, was presented by Mr. LaLoggia of Italy. The third paper was a report on "Education and Development" by Mr. Capelle of France. The fourth paper was a report on development assistance in Latin America. These papers were all of an extremely high quality and were debated during the balance of the day.

In this debate the Canadian delegation was composed of Mr. Marcel Prud'homme, Liberal member from St. Denis; G. W. Baldwin, Q.C., Progressive Conservative member from Peace River, and myself.

As I mentioned earlier, the Australians also had a delegation present which, in their case, numbered nine members, under the leadership of the Honourable Sir Kenneth Anderson, Minister of Supply and Leader of the Government in the Senate. They were on an extended trip to Europe and included the visit to the Council of Europe in their itinerary, which explains the large size of their party.

Japan, present for the first time, sent a senior parliamentary representative, Mr. Yoshiteru Kogane, Liberal Democrat Member of their House of Representatives.

The Canadian delegation was received with great courtesy and consideration at all times, and we were led to believe that our contribution was appreciated and considered to be of some value.

The president of the Assembly, Mr. Reverdin of Switzerland, the president of the Committee of Ministers, and the Secretary-General, all invited us for discussions and different functions.

The Canadian delegation had decided that each member would take one aspect of the subject. Accordingly, Mr. Prud'homme spoke on the official Canadian position with regard to development aid; Mr. Baldwin spoke on the problems of educational assistance for developing countries, and I explained Canada's hopes for an original contribution toward the problems of development assistance by the creation in Ottawa of the International Development Research Centre by Act of Parliament in May, 1970. These were in the form of statements.

Certain clear and important points emerged in the debate on the papers and discussions. The first one was that it is imperative, if aid is to be effective, that countries approach the target of .70 per cent of their gross national product as a measure of the amount of government aid granted, and that the target of one per cent of the GNP as a measure of total annual transfers be achieved. The second point was that a new strategy for aid be developed. The third was that greater stress should be laid on the requirements of the developing countries rather than on those of the developed countries. Fourth, educational assistance should be changed in emphasis—away from the university degree of questionable value to more practical and vocational training. Moreover, elementary education should be emphasized as an end in itself and not only as a preparation for further education.

The fifth point was that there should be greater multilateral aid and less bilateral aid, and particularly less tied aid. Finally, there should be considerably greater effort to provide tariff-free or low-tariff markets for products of developing countries.

I am happy to say that, with most of these points, Canada's policy is in agreement, although financially we are still a considerable way from the actual percentage amount set as target.

I am going to say just a few words about each of these subjects because they represent the collective international thinking of how well we have done up to this point, what we have learned by experience, and what, in consequence, we should plan for the future.

First, as unfortunately always seems to be the case, is money. The United Nations General Assembly in October 1970 called upon developed countries to meet a level for their official development assistance of .70 per cent of the gross national product—

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is that percentage, Senator Molson?

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is .70 per cent of the gross national product. Now, that is official governmental assistance.

The assembly also called for a total flow of resources of one per cent of the gross national product. That one per cent would include assistance in the private sector and other than official government contributions.

Canada does not meet these standards but has been getting closer. In 1970, $361 million of official aid showed an increase of $96 million and was .43 per cent of the gross national product.

The second point was strategy. Experience has raised doubts on the direction, emphasis, nature and value of the types of aid provided to the more needy countries. Study indicates that the whole strategy needs revision.

Perhaps I should add a word of explanation in this respect. Quite often in the past—and this would apply over such a broad range that I hate to take any single example—assistance has been given to an undeveloped country to create some massive work. That work is needed. But in providing it, the developed country or countries providing the assistance think in their own terms so that they lend assistance to a project that probably uses numerous bulldozers, earth movers and power shovels. They thereby create the great work. But the problem the country has is that it has 25 per cent unemployment. What they really need is a project that would enable 50,000 people to use shovels and baskets and get out and earn some sort of daily wage. Putting the bulldozers and big machinery into those countries is a wrong approach. I am not saying that the objective is wrong. I am merely saying that in discussing strategy we found many instances where thought had not been given to the best way to cope with these problems. This is what is meant by a whole new approach to the strategy.

The next point I should like to make, which is of special interest to Canadians, is the realization that greater research into the types of assistance is vital. It is of special interest because we believe that Canada has, in this instance, provided some leadership. Mr. Judd, the M.P. from the United Kingdom, said in the course of his summing up, and I quote:

> I should like to reflect what has been said by the rapporteurs, that our Canadian colleagues have put to us not just an idea about an international development centre but a copy of the Act establishing it. I shall take this back to Britain for close study by those interested in development because I think there is something in it from which we can learn.

He was referring to the establishment of the International Development Research Centre which I had described to the assembly that morning in my statement. I will quote from the assembly's official report a short portion of that statement, only to remind honourable senators of this very important and foresighted initiative:

> By an Act of the Canadian Parliament, passed in May 1970, the International Development Research Centre was established, with the following objects:
> The objects of the centre are to initiate, encourage, support and conduct research into the problems of the developing regions of the world and into the means for applying and adapting scientific, technical and other knowledge to the economic and social advancement of those regions, and, in carrying out those objects—
> (a) to enlist the talents of natural and social scientists and technologists of Canada and other countries;
> (b) to assist the developing regions to build up the research capabilities, the innovative skills and the institutions required to solve their problems;
> (c) to encourage generally the coordination of international development research; and
> (d) to foster cooperation in research on development problems between the developed and developing regions for their mutual benefit.
> The Canadian Government is prepared to allocate a minimum of 30 million dollars for the administration of programs of the centre over the first five years. If it is successful, from that time forward, the programs developed will call for rapidly increasing expenditures which our Secretary of State for External Affairs foresaw as requiring the allocation of as much as 5 per cent of our total developing aid fund. This could mean a committed annual budget in excess of 25 million dollars by 1975.

The fourth point discussed, that greater stress be laid on the requirements of the developing countries rather than on those of developed countries, is self-evident. It has taken time and a lot of experience to make us realize that what we like or think we need is probably completely unsuitable for a people living in a lush, warm, equatorial country with few roads and scanty plumbing.

The fifth point of discussion was educational assistance, which has attracted wide support and interest. On second thoughts, educational assistance seems to have been seriously and sadly misdirected. Aid for university education, which has absorbed vast sums and generous effort has been graduating B.A.'s in the thousands who want only clerical work, and other degrees which are scarcely useful at this stage of development. Primary education, and, to some extent, secondary education have been assisted in making substantial strides forward, but they have been badly diverted from their greatest value—higher educational standards—to a purpose of providing only one step in the process of the educational ladder. This means that the value of primary education is questioned unless a high percentage of students go on to secondary levels. The same is true of secondary schooling, and even graduation from university is thought of as progress towards post-graduate degrees.

The whole emphasis needs to be re-examined. Each country may be different but nearly all would probably benefit from a much higher number of students properly trained in vocational skills. In developing countries, much of the very expensive equipment provided as aid just rusts away because maintenance skills simply do not exist. The same might be true of skills for agriculture and other resource industries.

This train of thought is worthy of examination for the Canadian scene. We are now at the stage of graduating students to unemployment. Perhaps our whole program is unsound.

The sixth and seventh points relate to the same broad principle. There is no use giving aid if it is so tied down that the donor country profits more than the developing country. It is also obvious that there is no use providing aid and training to a country if it is not able to export the resultant products because of tariffs or quotas or other restrictions.

Honourable senators, I have endeavoured to tell you briefly about what was discussed during the course of a very long day in a large assembly. As I have already mentioned, rapporteurs provided papers analysing and criticizing what had been done, and very often those papers were based on meetings which had been held earlier, such as the Rome round table conference I mentioned earlier, and had established a consensus. They provide an insight into a serious examination of what has been going on on the part of countries attempting to provide greater assistance to those countries throughout the world who so very badly need it and who find that their efforts, no matter how well intentioned, have not always been effective. In United Nations terms this is the end of the first aid decade, and this year is the beginning of the second decade. The object of those engaged internationally in the effort to provide useful development assistance to developing countries is to make those efforts and those sums expended count and be worthwhile in a way that they have not been in the past.

A great deal of wisdom was expressed at this meeting and there was much to be learned. As I said earlier, it is impossible to report briefly on so much material. I am aware that the report which I have made is somewhat on the lengthy side, perhaps too lengthy, and so I should like to finish it with one or two brief conclusions.

I came away firmly convinced that closer relationship with European organizations and nations is more important for us now than ever before. I also came away with the firm personal conviction that international development aid on an increasing scale is vital for peace and survival. I believe that Canada is in fact moving forward on the right track, but we still have a long way to go.

Finally, honourable senators, may I say that I consider it an honour to have been chosen to represent the Senate at such a distinguished gathering.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM, NATURAL GAS AND ASSORTED PRODUCTS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

Hon. J. Harper Prowse rose pursuant to notice:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the intention of the oil companies to increase the price of gasoline in certain areas of eastern Canada and the desirability of amending the oil policy of Canada to provide by the extension of pipelines for a supply of crude oil to all refineries in eastern Canada from established producing areas in western Canada, such committee to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on the Uses of Petroleum, Natural Gas and Assorted Products;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief explanation and then ask unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw this motion. My first reason for withdrawing it at this time is that there is already in progress an investigation by the Prices and Incomes Commission. Secondly, at the present time a number of task forces are investigating on behalf of the Government matters having to do with pipelines and the entire energy policy of Canada. Therefore, if we were to start an investigation now of the scope that would be involved in my motion and while these other investigations are going on, I think it would be difficult for us to secure the services of the technical people we would require. Consequently, I think it would be a bother to everyone, and in any event we could not do it all that quickly anyway.

Many things would be involved, one of them being a decision as to what our national energy policy should be and whether Canada's energy needs should be served first and primarily from Canadian sources or whether we should economically take them from elsewhere and hold our own in reserve. This would be such a tremendous field that I think it would be in the interests of everyone if we were to make no attempt at this time to go ahead with a study of it. As I said, a number of other official groups are presently investigating this aspect of the field, and when their reports are put together we may be in a position to decide how we might best be of use.

Therefore, honourable senators, with your indulgence, I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that honourable Senator Prowse shall have leave to withdraw this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADA-FINLAND SUPPLEMENTARY INCOME TAX CONVENTION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the third reading of Bill S-18, to implement a Supplementary Income Tax Convention between Canada and Finland.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 28, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I must apologize for my absence last week when this order was called. I will not detain you with an explanation of the extenuating circumstances. It was not that I did not care to speak on this motion, because I wish to say without delay that for truth, lucidity, common sense and competence in delivery the speech that I heard last week from Senator Manning was one of the finest and truest that I have heard in this house since I have been here. In agreeing with him now I want only to add a few footnotes to the things he said.

I shall begin by asking three questions. Is it true that the United States today controls or is about to control our economic life? Is it true that this economic control must inevitably result in political control with loss of our sovereignty? Is it true that inevitably we are to be engulfed by a monolithic American culture with the barbarians pitching their tents among us and leaving us grinding corn in the camp of Philistines?

I submit that the answer to each is: No. These propositions are not true; they are really perilous nightmarish nonsense. What are the facts about American control? I submit that we are being terrified because of the repeated use of certain words and phrases which have no relation to reality.

We hear about takeovers. What are called takeovers are, in 90 per cent of the cases, merely willing sales to willing buyers. If one reads some of the fearsome passages in the Press one would think that the Americans come here and at gun point take over our industries. This, of course, is nonsense.

When Chrysler, for example, came into Canada to manufacture cars they did not come as an advance corps of an American army to take over our country. They came here to manufacture cars behind our tariff barriers. They came here—and we used to boast of this—to take advantage of our preferential tariffs to enable them to sell in the British market and in the markets of the Commonwealth. For years we boasted of how well our preferential tariff was working, that we were bringing industries into the country. That was the beginning of it.

But if one listens to some of our academics, one would think that we are being taken over against our will. To hear them now one would think that we had no more need of American or of any other external investment. Before talking like that those concerned should consult Premier Bourassa of Quebec. More than that, they should consult practical business people who understand what is happening to this country at the present time.

They tell us—and the DBS reinforces this argument all the time—that Americans now own or control 90 per cent of our petroleum industry, 85 per cent of our mining industry, and 75 per cent of some other industry. But, what the DBS omits to tell us is that they have no interest whatsoever in our banks, no interest in our insurance companies, no control whatsoever in our financial institutions, no control of our Crown corporations, no ownership or control of our newspapers, communications media, our radio or television, and no control of agriculture. When one adds up the value of our banks, financial institutions, newspapers, and Crown corporations, one discovers that American control is not at all what the DBS figures show, and that the vital economic life of this country still rests in Canadian hands. There is no doubt about this. The facts are there for all to see. But such people quote three or four areas, and represent them as being the whole of Canada's economic life. This is not true.

In any event, I wonder if Canadians ask themselves without prejudice what would have happened to this country after two world wars had there not been American investment in certain of our industries. It is a bit tiresome to hear these young academics, not one of whom has met a payroll in his life or ever will, telling business people what is happening to the economic life of this country.

Honourable senators, the facts about American control are not disturbing at all. Of course they come here. Why not? They are good business people. Our people have welcomed them. If an American went to a town like Smiths Falls tonight and asked the city council if they would like him to establish there a glass factory, for example, to employ 1,000 people, he would not be allowed to get out of that town before signing a contract.

This is what has happened. We have asked these people to come here, and welcomed them. I am not so naïve as to think that their coming here does not present problems, but every relationship between two nations presents problems. There is the problem of how we control these companies, which is not so easy as people imagine. But the problem exists and all it requires is that the representatives of our two nations sit down together and try to settle our difficulties, as we have done for more than one hundred years.

We have had problems with the United States; that is the way of free men. I have said repeatedly, and I expressed it in my report on American magazines, that every night Canadians should kneel down at their bedsides and thank God for their American neighbours. If you disagree with that, go and ask the governments of the Baltic States what they think about it; go and ask the Warsaw Pact countries what they think about it, and go and ask Mr. Tito of Yugoslavia.

All these things in the world are relative. There is no existence on this earth without problems. We have problems with the United States. Of course, they have problems with us, and we are not perfect in our relations with them. But this business which has developed of late of attributing all our troubles and woes to the United States, honourable senators, is nonsense.

I heard that distinguished Englishwoman, Miss Barbara Ward, speaking on this very question at the Canadian Club. She said that of course we are all jealous of the United States and of their prosperity; we are all envious of their power. All it means is that we are all envious of the rich man with the big house on the hill. I think that we Canadians should take stock of our motivations and faults when we speak of the United States.

The academics say, "Oh, what a terrible thing it is to have these Americans teaching at our universities." Good heavens, I have never had the privilege myself of hanging my hat on an academic peg, but if I did have that privilege I would only care whether my teacher in English, science, philosophy, Latin, or anything else was a good teacher regardless of his nationality. Civilized nations do not go in for that sort of thing.

Let us consider the United States itself. Who were the two greatest names at Harvard University in the last 50 or 75 years? They were Whitehead and Santayana, one an Englishman and the other a Spaniard. Do the Americans themselves adopt this attitude about Canadians teaching in American universities? Senator Inman will recall a very distinguished Prince Edward Islander, Dr. Schuman, who was once the President of Cornell University. Did the Americans cry out about that? Do they cry out about the fact that one of their most distinguished economists today—we quote him all the time—is a Canadian, born in western Ontario? Do Canadians ever reflect on the fact that when Woodrow Wilson went to the Versailles Peace Conference he took with him as one of his principal advisers a man who had made his reputation at Western University? I am sure the Government Leader knows to whom I refer.

This is what happens all over the world. The English have never turned away academics of distinction from their country. The best work on Irish culture and folklore was written by a German, Kuno Meyer. This happens all over the earth, and yet here we have in Canada this little, narrow, petty, chauvinistic, insecure, nationalistic outcry if one of our universities is lucky enough to secure a first class academic to teach. Do we want to build an intellectual Chinese wall around Canada?

My friend Senator Molson a moment ago had something to say respecting the Council of Europe. I am in favour of the Council of Europe, of course. I have heard over and over again how Mr. Winston Churchill was one of its authors and progenitors. But, this hostility to the United States does not merely exist in Canada among Canadians. It exists in Europe among Europeans. There was a meeting here about three weeks ago of members of the Council of Europe. One of the first things I encountered at one session was a paper they had circulated among the Canadian delegates casting reflections on the United States. They asked this question: Do you not think that you Canadians have more in common with Western Europe than with the United States? Honourable senators, the answer to that is no, and I resent the question. I resent it as one of many Canadian fathers with a son sleeping forever in Europe's soil. I felt like speaking to those people, but something went wrong and I was not allowed to speak. I intended to remind them politely but firmly that were it not for the United States the Council of Europe would not exist at all, and they would not be here. After World War II, when Europe was in chaos, when the world seemed to be in chaos, the one gleam of light in a storm-beaten sky was the Marshall Plan, which rescued Europe from chaos and which the immortal Churchill himself described as the most magnificent gesture by a nation in all of human history. I think Europeans should remember that, and not come over here and tell us that we have more in common with them than we have with the United States.

Another statement they made, and I know the Government Leader is aware of this, was: "In the last eight or ten years you have been exporting more to the United States than you have been to Europe. This shows your integration with the American economy." If I can find a nation to which Canada can sell more and more, I am personally willing to integrate economically with that nation.

What do these young academics know of the United States? How many of the movers and shapers of American policy do they know? Do they know Senator Mike Mansfield, one of the most powerful men in the legislative life of the United States? Do they know Senator Sherman Cooper? Do they know Senator Muskie? Do they know Senator George Aiken? I am pointing to my friend, Senator Macnaughton. Senator George Aiken, a ranking Republican in the Senate, is so pro-Canadian that he says he is sometimes fearful of being haled before the committee on un-American activities. These are the men who today largely determine the course of American policy. I know these gentlemen. I have met them. I can call some of them my personal friends. One thing I am sure of is that not one of these men at any time, now or in the future, will ever say or do anything derogatory to the life of Canada.

Instead of trying to make friends with these people, to co-operate with them, we subject the United States again and again to attack. As a newspaper editor for 50 years it was my duty to read American and Canadian newspapers. I never once saw a remark in an American newspaper derogatory of Canada. I could scarcely pick up a Canadian newspaper in those days without finding some attack on, or some snide remark about, the United States. I think, honourable senators, it is time we stopped this sort of nonsense.

Of course we have problems, and we can tell the Americans what our problems are. A year ago I had an opportunity to speak to them, and you, Mr. Speaker, happened to be present at the time. I mentioned our problems, and theirs. I told them that while we were anxious to be friendly with them and to co-operate with them, never under any circumstances would we permit them to interfere with our sovereignty. Those powerful figures in the United States Congress were present at that meeting. They heard and understood what I said. Did they resent it? Did they object to it? They rose in a body and gave me a standing ovation, not because I was pro-American in my speech or because of any great rhetoric; but because in their heart of hearts they believed what I said was true, and because they would tell any member of this house that to talk of the United States having designs on Canadian sovereignty, and prospering and forwarding those designs through investment in Canada, was absolute and utter nonsense. I believe that to be true.

I am not a nationalist of that kind. I am a nationalist. I was brought up a nationalist. I was brought up an Irish nationalist. And I believe in Canadian nationalism. But, honourable senators, I will never believe, and I hope the Senate will never believe, that Canadian nationalism should be petty, chauvinistic, that we would go on after 150 years still fighting the Battle of Lundy's Lane. This is what too many Canadians are doing at the present time; they are fighting the Battles of Chateauguay and Lundy's Lane. This is nonsense, and it is not good for this country.

I know that we have problems, but in Heaven's name let us as free men and true Canadians sit down with our American neighbours and discuss with them what those problems are. One thing the people of Canada should keep forever in their minds is that if, God forbid, bombs ever drop on this country, they will not be dropped by Americans. It is all very well to talk of the Council of Europe, the Commonwealth and so on, but the destiny of this country, the future of this country, all that we are ever going to be, will happen on this North American continent. This is our destiny. Here we can do good on earth. I see no sense in our running all over creation trying to control human behaviour here, there and everywhere. But, I do see sense in trying to walk justly in love and mercy, and in seeking peace for all the world with our good American neighbours.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I do not know what peculiar fate it is on my part that on so many occasions it has been my misfortune to follow the eloquence of my friend Senator O'Leary. However, I want to say to him that he has tonight put in what I think is the proper perspective some of the main problems exercising the emotional climate of Canada today I agree with most of what he said. The only area where I might have some reservations is in connection with the universities, and I will deal with that later.

First of all in participating in this discussion I must compliment Senator Manning on introducing the topic of Canadian-American relations. We are indebted to him for his thoughtful comments based on his long first-hand experience.

He opened his remarks by describing the relationship between Canada and the United States as determined by the facts of geography, population, wealth and industrial power. He also emphasized Canada's position resulting from the military reality that the North American continent is one piece of real estate, and the United States, as the dominant military power, would have to act in what she considered her own military self-interest whether or not we Canadians agreed with the action taken.

Senator Manning rightly emphasized that in the event of hostile action by another major power, Canada would have to depend on United States co-operation for an effective defence, and he went on to deplore the curtailment of Canada's role in NATO and NORAD. Many Canadians share Senator Manning's view on this matter, but many do not. The whole thrust of Senator Manning's approach is that we must be practical and face the economic and military facts of life—a position with which I thoroughly agree. However, for a moment or two I would like to examine what could be another basis for Canada's current position vis-à-vis NATO and NORAD. But prior to stating this, may I review the evolution of Canada's role in international affairs.

Canada was one of the few nations that came out of World War II stronger than she went in. Almost overnight, in historical terms, Canada changed from an agrarian-dominated society to an industrial one, and the process of industrialization and urbanization is continuing at an accelerating pace.

In the immediate post-war period, while the nations of Europe were in ruins, Canada was able to use her resources in contributing to the rehabilitation of Europe, and she did this generously. In the period 1945 to 1955 we had what a distinguished Canadian, Escott Reid, described as the "golden years of Canadian diplomacy". At that time a distinguished team of Canadians, which included O.D. Skelton, Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent, L. B. Pearson, Norman Robertson, Arnold Heeney, Escott Reid, Hume Wrong, and latterly our own Government Leader, Paul Martin, played a role and exercised an influence far beyond Canada's normal position and stature based on her economic, industrial and political and military strength.

In giving birth to the concept of NATO, because this was a concept of Mr. St. Laurent, we did so out of the hope that the idealism which had united the NATO countries during the war could be rekindled and be given enough military support to ensure that those ideals were not submerged by a new authoritarian power.

If I read contemporary history correctly, the original concept of NATO was that it was not to be just a military alliance but should become a force for economic co-operation as well.

In reality, however, NATO became nothing more than a military alliance which in turn had its counterpart on the other side of the Iron Curtain in the Warsaw Pact. Out of these two opposing blocs there developed the "cold war" wherein all the devices of modern propaganda were called upon on both sides. Out of the cold war came the massive re-armament race between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A., a race in which the costs of military deterrence have become prohibitive for the smaller nations of the world. For example, the United Kingdom, one of the pioneers in the nuclear field, has had to drop out of the atomic weapons race—fortunately, I think. She has had to withdraw from her position as the dominant military power east of Suez, and she also lost her position as queen of the seas.

In Canada during the late 1950s and early 1960s, we were spending approximately one-third of our national budget on defence. The amount today is substantially less, being 15 to 17 per cent, but still totals $1.8 billion. In spite of these large expenditures, Canada's contribution in terms of actual numbers of men, equipment and material to NATO was so small as not to have any realistic effect against the overwhelming numbers and resources of the Warsaw Pact nations. Canada's position, then, recognizing our economic limitations, has been to curtail the degree of participation in NATO and to use the resources in strengthening our role in our own continental defence. But in doing this, Canada has not and will not withdraw from NATO or NORAD. She still remains a member of the NATO community and, as a result, the machinery for international co-operation remains intact and could be activated very quickly in an emergency.

In the meantime, the European nations have gradually rebuilt their economies and are in a position to make a much greater contribution to their own defence. Consequently, I for one am not too concerned about the withdrawal of some of our forces from Europe and the utilization of those resources in developing and strengthening our role in defence of the North American continent. The important point to me is that we maintain the machinery of co-operation in the defence of Europe, and secondly that we recognize the imperatives of co-operation with the United States in defence of the American continent. In addition, Canada's role in international peacekeeping is a role that should be continued if as and when necessary and should continue to be a firm plank in Canada's foreign policy.

The tragic involvement of the United States in the Indo-China war for the last 10 years is causing a complete reassessment of the role of the United States in foreign policy because, in spite of her richness in manpower and resources, she has learned that she cannot afford to be the world's policeman alone. The excuse for the initial involvement in Vietnam was that the United States had almost a divine mission to stop communism, or what they chose to call communism. But after the expenditure of 60,000 lives, 300,000 wounded and hundreds of billions in money, the United States is faced with communist powers—Russia and China—being stronger than ever. So the Dulles policy and the Dulles philosophy has failed and it now remains imperative that international co-operation through peaceful means must replace gunboat and bomber diplomacy.

Canada, as a sovereign nation, must do everything she can to develop her own defence position—that is a requirement of national independence—but Canada as one member of the world community of nations has the responsibility of co-operating with other nations in the interests of mutual harmony and development, and the cornerstone of that co-operative effort must be our relationship to the United States. But because we are a small power and the United States is a big one, there devolves upon that country a special responsibility to avoid using her weight and power arbitrarily in those areas which impinge on the sovereignty of Canada. Specifically this has to do with, for example, the use of inland waters, waters of the continental shelf and the Arctic islands, fishing rights, air space, trade agreements, tariff weapons and environmental controls.

For all too long both Canadians and Americans have taken Canadian-American relations for granted and assumed that there was no need to cultivate them. This has been a mistake in the past and could be an even greater mistake in the future. However, there are many hopeful signs that the neglect of the past will give way to an informed and profitable dialogue in the future. One example of this is described in the April 19 issue of Time magazine, and I quote:

> As Geographer Edward Miles once put it, the average American's knowledge of Canada amounts to "a benevolent ignorance." In part, this has long been held to be the fault of academe: American universities—or so the standard version has it—have generally placed Canadian studies about on a level with water-skiing in their order of academic priorities. There are now signs of change. Earlier this month, over a hundred scholars from 28 states concluded a conference at Duke University in Durham, N.C., where they formed an Association for Canadian Studies in the U.S.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the name of that university?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Duke University in Durham, N.C.

> The new group owes much to the diligent proselytizing of Dr. Dale C. Thomson, the biographer of Louis St. Laurent and director of the postgraduate Center of Canadian Studies at Johns Hopkins University in Washington. Its objectives, he says, are not only to stimulate the growth of Canadian studies in the U.S., but to establish lines of communication among teachers already in the field, who until recently tended to feel "neglected and isolated, in fact rather petulant."
> As it turns out, Canadian studies south of the border are perhaps on a sounder footing than most outsiders—and even some of those involved—have imagined them to be. Soon after he arrived at Johns Hopkins, Thomson sent out a circular to 1,256 American universities and colleges. He discovered that no less than 17 per cent of the universities were already offering Canadian course work; others expressed keen interest in prospecting the subject. Among the leaders were such northern universities as Rochester, Michigan State and Maine, as well as Duke and Harvard, which established its Chair of Canadian Studies four years ago.

> The new association will attempt to answer that kind of question by holding general and regional conferences and by distributing a twice-yearly newsletter that is expected to grow eventually into a full dress academic journal. Since it is a rare Canadian university that does not offer a full catalogue of courses on the U.S., Thomson regards the association's program as something of a "counterattack". He attributes the surge of interest in Canada partly to the voyage of the s.s. Manhattan through the Northwest Passage, to draft evaders over the border, to Pierre Trudeau's intellectual image, and to the troubles in Quebec. He believes, too, that strains in U.S.-Canada relations over such issues as Arctic sovereignty and energy policy are making contemporary Canada a far more intriguing object of academic inquiry than the more placid neighbor of the past.

As the article points out, and as Senator Manning intimated, the major areas of concern between Canada and the United States in addition to the defence role which we have discussed are probably, in the order of importance to Canadian survival as an independent nation, cultural relationships, capital investment, energy policy, resource development and trade relations. Some people might put these topics in a different order, but I have deliberately put our cultural relationship with the United States first because I think that, while it is less tangible in many respects than the impact of the other topics, it is nevertheless that area of concern which will determine, in the long run, whether Canada is going to survive as a separate and independent nation. As Canadians, we have a rich heritage to be proud of. Not only are we the residual legatees of the British tradition in language, customs, law and history, but we have the double advantage of being the inheritors of the rich traditions and culture of France as well. However, over and above this, over 45 per cent of our population are of neither English nor French extraction; they have brought with them the cultures of Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, the Ukraine and many other countries. Because we have avoided following the melting-pot theory of the United States, we have a rich diversity in Canada which can make the Canadian mosaic something unique and much richer than any one of its founding parts.

There is a strong wave of Canadian nationalism abroad in the land today and I have no quarrel with this as long as it is a positive rather than a negative nationalism. I often think that the kind of nationalism we should cultivate in this country is the nationalism of the Scot. There is no person in the world who believes in the traditions and customs of his homeland more than the Scot, and yet there is no person who makes a better citizen of the land of his adoption. It is this kind of positive nationalism which I would like to see cultivated and developed in Canada, one in which the traditions and cultures of other people are respected and cultivated for their own worth.

In the hearings of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution, which have been going on across Canada since last September, it has been very interesting to note the increasing demand coming directly from the people that we should develop in Canada not only a bicultural but a multicultural society. Among the most aggressive in this respect are the Ukrainians who have been in the forefront of maintaining their customs and traditions and their language in this country. Not the least significant among the contributions to the hearings have been those from the Indians and Métis. Suddenly, after generations of neglect, the Indian population of Canada is beginning to assert itself and to do so very competently. One of the most encouraging developments on the Canadian scene today is that the Indians are throwing up a group of articulate and able young leaders who are out to correct the injustices and the neglect of the past. But regardless of whether the submissions are coming from French Canadians, Ukrainian Canadians, German Canadians, Italians, Indians or Métis, there is a strong thread of pride and belief in Canada running through them all and it is this thread that we must weave into a rich and strong Canadian identity.

The development of a distinctive Canadian identity is not going to be an easy task. Situated as we are, Canadians are almost overwhelmed by the 220 million Americans who use our language, who have many of the same customs and who have the rich resources that go with a dynamic and aggressive society and make it possible for them literally to overwhelm us with the products of their nationalism and their culture. In other words, American magazines, American radio, American television, American technology and American money are all pouring into Canada like an avalanche, and it would be easy to follow the path of least resistance and simply let these cultural emissions overwhelm us and make us into an image of the citizens of the United States.

As a matter of fact, when I spent some time in Austria last year I was interested to find an exact parallel between the feelings of the Austrians vis-à-vis the Germans and the feeling of Canadians vis-à-vis the Americans. The Austrians, citizens of a small country, are up against a rich, hard-working, dynamic country whose communications, technology and power pour over the borders in a never-ending stream. You find in Austria exactly the same emotional reaction to that as we have in Canada. So we are not alone.

As a matter of fact, to any Canadian who travels widely in Europe it is a known fact that as soon as we speak or move in a crowd we are not thought of as Canadians but are classified as Americans because of our speech, our dress and our mannerisms. Thus, if we are to develop and preserve a distinct Canadian identity, we will need to strengthen all of those elements in our society which are peculiarly Canadian. This means our laws, our system of government, our radio and television programming, and particularly our news media and magazines.

In the publishing field, the disappearance of many Canadian publications over the past few years is a matter of regret and it seems to me that steps need to be taken to provide a climate in which Canadian magazines dealing with Canadian issues and from a Canadian point of view can thrive and prosper. The fact that in the last year two of our leading publishers have either sold out to American firms or are contemplating doing so is another evidence of how easy it would be for Canadians to lose control of those instruments of policy which help to cultivate a distinctly Canadian point of view.

In our radio and television programs, the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is an instrument which is doing a good job in encouraging the development of Canadian content, and the evolution of cablevision is going to be one of the great instruments in developing community programming in the future. All these tools of public information and education are powerful tools to be used in the development of the Canadian identity.

In recent months there has been grave concern about the number of American professors in our universities. Certainly, like Senator O'Leary, I would be the first to decry the exclusion of people from our universities on the basis of nationality. However, because of the failure of our educational authorities to anticipate the demands, particularly in the field of the humanities, we have not trained people in sufficient numbers to cope with the new enrolments in the fields of the social sciences. As a consequence, we have brought into Canada to fill our classrooms an undue number of Americans who have, quite naturally, brought with them into the Canadian classrooms their own mores and culture, their own standards of values and their own ways of looking at things. They have also brought with them American textbooks, which in many cases do not suit the Canadian milieu. So here again is an area where Canadians must be more aggressive in training their own people to do the tasks that are necessary in the sensitive area of the Canadian citizenship. To say that we must strengthen our own cultural media in no way reflects on the many good things that come from the United States.

I think the area of the social sciences, particularly sociology and social psychology, is one area in which we have not been wise in our university planning. In many cases we have brought in from the United States not first-class American sociologists and social psychologists but those who could not "cut the mustard" in the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Cameron: That is one of the reasons we have had so much trouble in some of our universities. Some of the professors have been even worse than the most irresponsible of students. I am not suggesting that this is true of the typical American professor.

We are going through a stage in Canada in which there is a tremendous hue and cry about the American control of the Canadian economy. This is naturally an emotional issue, and a great deal of illogical thinking is given expression over this issue. We should be concerned that Americans own such a high percentage of our petroleum industry, our manufacturing industry and our mining industry. But my reaction to this is that we have no one to blame but ourselves.

If we examine the situation we will find, as Senator Manning mentioned the other day, that when Alberta started to develop the petroleum industry in western Canada there was very little interest on the part of eastern Canadian capital to invest in what was considered a high-risk industry. Similarly, he found a reluctance on the part of British investors to invest in the search for oil. So, it was only natural that the province should turn to the United States and that the United States investors with their natural entrepreneurial approach should welcome the opportunity of coming into Canada. And they have done so with benefit to themselves and to us.

The only reason the Americans own such a great proportion of Canadian resources and manufacturing and mining is because Canadians themselves did not have the faith and did not have the degree of confidence in the future of their own country to invest in it. We could have done much more than we have done over the years; consequently, we have no right to complain if the Americans own such a large proportion of our resources. They do so only because we did not have the vision and the initiative and the faith to do it ourselves. Not that we could have done it all, but we could have done much more than we have done in the past. I hope the picture is changing for the future.

As a young capital-scarce country with a tremendous task of development to do, we need outside capital and I for one welcome this capital. We need more of it. But the only stipulation I would make is that when this capital does come into the country, it should conform very specifically to the laws of the country and conduct itself as a good corporate citizen in every respect. This means giving Canadians an opportunity to share in the equity, and an opportunity to share in the management. This is being done to an increasing extent today but we will have a long way to go. Fortunately there are signs, particularly in western Canada, that Canadians are beginning to play a new role in developing their own financial institutions. In recent years there has developed in western Canada, and I speak of this because I know it, a number of companies that have raised their money in the west and have been able to accomplish some spectacular things. One of the encouraging signs of the times today, particularly as far as western Canada is concerned, is that there is a new confidence in that part of Canada. This confidence is based on the fact that Alberta and British Columbia are among the richest provinces, in terms of resources, in the nation. The population is still small enough that the communities know who the entrepreneurs are and how to rate them, so that there has built up in the last few years a new confidence and a new competence—almost a feeling of cockiness—that the westerners can write a new chapter in the history of Canadian economic development.

Another of the great areas of Canadian-American concern in the seventies will be the evolution of an energy policy geared to suit the needs and the aspirations of both countries. This is particularly true in the fields of electrical power, gas, and oil and it is going to be increasingly true of water. As a matter of fact, one of the biggest issues of the late seventies and the early eighties is going to be the evolution of a policy dealing with water resources which will conserve those resources for Canada and at the same time make it possible for the Americans to have the benefit of them as well.

The report in the last few days about the spectacular Quebec Hydro James Bay Power Project under which it is reported that Consolidated Edison will buy $2 billion worth of electricity over an as yet undefined period of time, represents another major development not only of power but of mining and forest industries in the James Bay area. This imaginative project, which will result in the damming of ten rivers and the diverting of water from five others, will be one of the huge industrial projects of this century in Canada. It represents yet one more aspect of the developing energy resources program.

There is dissatisfaction in western Canada about the present oil policy. We have plenty of oil to supply the eastern market; we have gas in abundance to supply our own market and the American market as well. But there is an arrangement under which Venezuelan crude and Middle East oil is used to supply the eastern Ontario and Quebec market, at the expense of Canadian production, because American policy wants to preserve the Canadian oil resources as a hedge against any possible upheaval in the unstable oil-producing areas of the Middle East and South America. This policy does not sit too well with Canadians whose normal developmental rate is retarded by the policy, and it would appear that in the not too distant future some new approaches will need to be made toward the rationalization of the policy and the defining of market areas for both oil and gas.

Another area relating to the development of the oil and gas industry falls within the particular sphere of Canadian economic policy. This refers to the depletion allowances and the tax structure which, under the present terms, discriminate against Canadian investors and in favour of Americans. Speaking on April 28 to the Manitoba Chambers of Commerce Annual Convention, Mr. A. M. Shoults, President of the Institute of Canadian Advertisers, said:

> American corporations are taxed less than their Canadian counterparts leaving more capital after taxes and a subsequent advantage in the international market-place where most Canadian equities are purchased. U.S. multi-national corporations can also use 'transfer pricing', a technique of selling to the parent company raw resources from the subsidiary company at substantial mark up which eludes taxation.
> U.S. companies also pay corporate taxes which are 14 per cent less than the domestic corporate rate.

Mr. Shoults also said:

> The Canadian petroleum industry already is 90 per cent American-owned because of more favourable tax breaks through depletion allowances, in the United States.

Mr. Shoults went on to say:

> Finance Minister Edgar Benson's Tax Reform proposals would make it even more difficult for Canadians to compete by giving them an even tougher break on depletion.

When we talk about getting Canadians involved in the purchase of a greater share of our resource industries, it would seem reasonable to expect that they at least should start on the basis of equality with foreign competitors. So here again we have an area in Canadian-American relations which is in need of a thorough-going review and resolution.

Continuing on the theme that Canadians can do much more than they have done, a new picture of what is happening in Canada was painted last week at the Canadian Chamber of Commerce Conference in Edmonton by Douglas Peters, Chief Economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, who said:

> With suitable official policies, Canadians can generate sufficient savings to promote their own economic growth but Canada must continue to welcome foreign investment that brings with it technology, markets and development of our slow-growth regions. At the same time, Canada must also develop its own multi-national companies and become an exporter of capital as well.

Mr. Peters continued:

> Such an enlightened rather than an insular view of foreign investment combined with a government rule to protect Canadian interests would produce the greatest opportunities.

Mr. Peters pointed out:

> Less than 2 per cent of total capital investment in Canada last year was accounted for by net capital inflows, a significant development that has gone almost unnoticed by the general public and has certainly been ignored by the economic nationalists. The mounting trade surpluses of the late 1960s have enabled Canada to earn enough through exports to finance its imports, both of goods and services and of capital. In effect, Canada in the past three years has become independent of net inflows of foreign capital. This means that, on a net basis, we have been able to finance from our own savings virtually all of our capital requirements. Last year for instance, capital investment for business, public and housing reached nearly 18 billion. About two-thirds of the savings needed to meet this investment was generated within the corporate sector through retained earnings and capital cost allowances. Personal savings accounted for nearly one-quarter and government supplied most of the balance.

In the whole area of financing investment, Canada might well take a leaf from the Japanese who have probably done a more effective job in the mobilization of savings and putting them to effective use in the national interest than any other country in the world. The Japanese people are the greatest savers in the world and through a combination of government and private enterprise they have been able to mobilize their financial resources to a remarkable degree and to channel them into the areas of national priority agreed upon between the private sector and the public sector with the spectacular results which have made the Japanese economy the miracle one of the 1960s.

One could go on at much greater length and depth, but I am only citing examples of what has been done in the past and what is being done today. The evidence is that Canada could have done much more than she did in her earlier years in mobilizing her own financial resources, but fortunately she is beginning to show some signs of a new approach to financing her resources and this can be done through intelligent legislation in the field of taxation and in the area of international agreements and the giving of corporate equality to Canadian investors.

I would like to comment briefly on one more area that is of vital importance to Canadian-American relations. This is in the whole field of trade relations. Many Canadians have unpleasant memories of the time some years ago when the Ford Motor Company of Canada made a contract to sell a large order of trucks to the Republic of China, only to have this order vetoed on the direct orders of the American Government under their Trading with the Enemy Act. This was a very unpopular move because it represented the unilateral exercise of economic power in a foreign country to the detriment of the employers in that country.

More recently we negotiated the famous Auto Pact under which a reciprocal agreement made possible the free interchange of certain automobiles and parts between Canada and the United States. Prior to the coming into effect of that particular pact, Canada had a $600 million trade deficit with the United States. Since the pact has been in force, this deficit has disappeared. There are strong pressures in the United States to abrogate the agreement because it is felt that Canada is getting by far the best of the deal. This represents one area where it is important that there be the closest possible exchange of ideas and the closest possible co-operation between the two countries in working out solutions to problems which are of vital concern to both.

Mounting concern over the effects of pollution on the environment through air, water, sound and chemical means, has underlined the importance of the closest possible working arrangement between the two countries if pollution control is to be effective. Last year the Parliament of Canada passed Bill C-204, the Inland Water Resources Control Act. Similarly, the Prime Minister announced the extension of the offshore boundaries to 12 miles, and in some cases in the Arctic this would have the effect of making certain international waters Canadian waters.

More recently there has been the proposal of the Alyeski Corporation to pipe oil from the fabulous Prudhoe Bay oil fields 800 miles across the mountains to the seaport of Valdez and then ship it down the west coast of British Columbia to refineries in Washington and Oregon. This proposal, under which huge 200,000 and 300,000 ton tankers would be carrying oil along some of the toughest navigable waters in the world, poses a great threat to the B.C. coastline in the event of an accident to one of those huge tankers.

The company has announced that it will proceed with the development of this proposal. However, the environmentalists in the United States have suddenly become equally concerned about the dangers of pollution, not just on the coastline of British Columbia but through the whole continental United States. It may be that out of this discussion will come some international agreement which will be to the benefit of all concerned.

As a counter-proposal to the tanker route for Prudhoe Bay oil along the west coast, the suggestion has been made that a twin pipeline, one for gas and one for oil be brought down through the Mackenzie Valley to Edmonton and thence on to Chicago. This proposal, an alternative to the tanker route, seems to offer less risk of pollution, but there are those in our society who are concerned that this too may offer great danger to the environment.

As a consequence, there is a whole new chapter of unexplored international relations opening up, precipitated by spectacular industrial developments, but this is only the beginning. Many of the rivers which have their sources in Canada flow into the United States, and the consequences of pollution could be very serious and greatly affect both nations. For this reason it is imperative that within the not distant future we evolve joint policies for the control of these resources to the benefit of all concerned.

One could go on at greater length giving example after example, all of which would underline the need for an effective program of Canadian-American relations. In this respect, honourable senators, I suggest to the Leader of the Government that one of the steps that could be taken by the Senate of Canada would be to set up a special committee on the subject of Canadian-American relations, and that it should seek to work with a counterpart in the United States in discussing all phases of what is a mutually important subject.

If the suggestion meets with the approval of the Senate, I would, at some future time, be prepared to bring in a motion setting up such a committee. It would represent a realistic attempt to further the dialogue which has already been started by a number of Canadian and American universities. The establishment of such a committee, in the Parliament of Canada, in co-operation with a similar committee in the United States, could have incalculable results in expediting the evolution of policies and practices that would greatly benefit both countries. The likelihood that effective legislative action in both countries could then be taken in a shorter period of time would be of great advantage to all.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday afternoons at 4 o'clock for the balance of the present session, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN SENATE GALLERY

DELEGATION FROM THE PARLIAMENT OF FINLAND

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on your behalf it is a great pleasure for me to express a warm welcome to a very distinguished delegation from the Parliament of Finland, led by the Honourable Rafael Paasio, Speaker of the Parliament of Finland.

I believe I am correct in saying that this is the first time we have been honoured by a visit of a delegation from this great progressive and sympathetic country. Important meetings with several of our government officials have been planned for this visit, as have been visits to some of our important cities in Canada.

May I also draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Holger Sumelius, Ambassador of Finland, and his charming wife, who are both very good friends of Canada. We in Canada are fortunate indeed in having a large group of Canadians of Finnish origin who contribute so much to the growth, culture and prosperity of Canada. For this we are very grateful to Finland. Honourable guests, may your stay in Canada be a pleasant and profitable one for both our countries.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this may be the first time that a parliamentary delegation from Finland has visited Canada. But the Speaker of the Parliament of Finland, the head of the delegation, Mr. Paasio, is not altogether a stranger to Canada. I recall meeting him here in his capacity as Prime Minister of Finland when he visited Canada during Canada's Centennial.

We all recognize Finland as being a remarkable country with a strong tradition of parliamentary institutions. This creates a strong bond between Canada and Finland.

The Speaker of the Parliament of Finland, the leader of this delegation, was himself a distinguished parliamentarian, having been Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Parliament of Finland for some 17 years.

Canada and Finland have strong relations. An indication of that was given last night by Senator Lang when he proposed and succeeded in obtaining third reading of a bill to establish a supplementary income tax convention between Canada and Finland. I suppose nothing has made us so close as the common view between our two countries in the role of peacekeeping in the United Nations. We recall with satisfaction that it was as a result of the early accession by Finland to the United Nations peace force in Cyprus that that force was in fact established. So Canada, Finland and other Scandinavian countries do carry out their concept of their obligations under the charter of the United Nations in this important way.

We owe a great deal to Finland for many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that recently she took an initiative that led to the holding in Helsinki of the important strategic arms talks between the Soviet Union and the United States. If anything should come of those discussions, the world will for a long time remember the contribution made by Finland.

So, honourable senators, on behalf of the Government and those on this side I have the pleasure of joining you in welcoming this distinguished parliamentary delegation to our chamber.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to join Mr. Speaker and the Leader of the Government in welcoming the very distinguished members of the parliamentary delegation from Finland, and the Ambassador of Finland to Canada, His Excellency Holger Sumelius.

I would have liked to visit Finland in 1964 when I attended the IPU annual meeting in Copenhagen, but circumstances did not permit me to do so. I remember at that time discussing the history of this friendly country, and it was with feelings of admiration that I read about its history.

The relations between Canada and Finland are excellent, as has been indicated by the Leader of the Government. We also have something in common with that nation in that we have both been able to preserve our own personalities while living beside powerful neighbours —in their case the Soviet Union and in our case the United States of America. In some respects I think we play the same role vis-à-vis these two powerful nations in trying to interpret them to the rest of the world, while at the same time earning their respect for our traditions and our wish to remain separate and distinct entities.

The delegation will travel for a few days in Canada, but I see they will only be visiting Ontario. This, of course, is a wonderful part of Canada and they will get a good idea of what our country is like. However, I suggest that they will have had only a partial view, because they will have missed much by not having visited the rest of Canada, especially the Province of Quebec, the Maritimes, the Prairies and British Columbia.

In any event, I hope that they will have the occasion to come back and see the rest of Canada at some time in the future. As far as the present visit is concerned, I trust it will prove interesting. I know it will be highly beneficial to the good relations which have always existed between our two countries and which will continue to grow as a result of this visit.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would like to add a word as Chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy to say, on behalf of my colleagues, how sorry we are that we could not get to Finland during our European journey. However, I wish to point out that our committee is filled with admiration for the increasing number of technological developments made in Finland which can be found at the present time on various markets throughout the world. This greatly contributes to the amazing economic growth of that country.

I hope that the Canadian government will soon consider establishing closer relations with Finland, in order that we may exchange information of a scientific as well as of a technological nature, since our economies are closely related and have the same growth factors.

JURY DUTY

INELIGIBILITY OF QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND WOMEN —DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 23, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mrs. Casgrain, calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland women are not called for jury duty.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Casgrain is back from her work on the Joint Committee on the Constitution. I would point out to her that this matter came up during her absence, but we did not wish to take it off the Order Paper.

In view of the debate we have had, I wonder whether it is the honourable Senator Casgrain's intention that this matter should remain on the Order Paper. If not, perhaps we would agree that the debate be considered as concluded.

Hon. Thérèse Casgrain: Honourable senators, as regards jury service for women, I believe it has just been announced that in Quebec the legislation will be amended so as to allow women to serve on juries. So I believe that now in Canada there is only one province where this is not yet possible.

I have not had time to get acquainted with what has taken place here, but I believe there is no use extending this debate any further, and I wish to thank all those who have helped us in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In any case I would draw Senator Casgrain's attention to Item No. 4 on the Order Paper. Senator Fergusson has proposed in this regard a bill which has been given first reading. Furthermore Senator Fergusson intends to discuss this legislation tomorrow. We can therefore put an end to the debate on Item No. 3.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak on this item, it will, under our rules, now disappear from the Order Paper.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, April 22, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Aird calling the attention of the Senate to the recent activities of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs with regard to the Pacific area.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I adjourned the motion of Senator Aird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, one week ago as I felt it was important that I should say a few words about the work of the committee, particularly in respect of the leadership that has been given to the committee by Senator Aird.

As honourable senators are aware, our last study was devoted to the Caribbean area, and we have some reason to believe that the report which we issued at that time has had some impact on Government policy. Indeed, we in the committee feel it is of the utmost importance that as we go along we keep in mind the relationship of our studies, our conclusions, our recommendations and our report to Government policy.

Senator Martin, the Leader of the Government, has made it clear on many occasions that he sees a very important role for this chamber in the field of foreign affairs, and I must say that after my experience in this committee I find myself in complete agreement with him.

Some honourable senators have asked what we expect to gain from these long, elaborate discussions about an area such as the Pacific Rim. That is not an easy question to answer, but I for one feel that in undertaking these studies in the Senate we are very much in step with the mood of Canada today.

In my brief years of observing international relations from the point of view of Canada, I have observed that we do seem to be in an era that is completely new and different from that of even recent previous years. I believe that throughout Canada there is a new awareness of our obligations and responsibilities and of the role that we can play in the world at large.

The Pacific Rim study is different in many respects from the study we undertook of the Caribbean. Senator Aird, in his excellent summary of the progress to date, made it clear that this is a vast and complex subject—much more so than the far more limited subject of Canadian-Caribbean relations. The reasons for that are obvious. One reason is geography. The Caribbean is a comparatively small geographic area; the Pacific Rim, on the other hand, is one of the largest areas that loom on any map of the world at the moment, if we take in the entire Pacific Rim area. Another reason is that the Pacific Rim is not an area in which Canada has had close historic ties or the same experience in the mobility of our two populations, or in trade or even cultural exchanges.

As we look at the Pacific Rim area from the Canadian point of view, we find ourselves looking at problems that are in many respects new to Canadians. This is because of the recent history of this area as well as the long-term history. Our contacts started in this area largely through missionaries, and here I am speaking of countries other than Australia and New Zealand which are very much in the area but are in a completely different status in our investigation from the developing nations. Other than in those countries, our historic ties with the area have been largely through missionaries, and I am proud to say that one of those missionaries in the medical field was my mother.

Another difference between the two areas is the comparatively low level of Canadian international aid to that area. Our international aid on a per capita basis in the Caribbean is the highest of any region, and the Pacific by and large is probably the lowest. It is certainly lower than our aid on a per capita basis to Africa, and probably even lower than our aid to Latin America. Some figures we have had before the committee indicate that we may be devoting to the whole of that area not more than 10 per cent of our total international aid, which is a very low figure when you take into consideration the population of that area. Here, of course, I am excluding India, Pakistan, and Ceylon, which receive very high levels of Canadian international aid and which cannot really be considered as being in the Pacific Rim area.

One of the things that has already become apparent, however, is that there are tremendous trade opportunities for Canada opening up in this area. Here I am not referring to Mainland China, because there the situation at the moment poses a very important question mark. We have recognized the People's Republic and there is considerable evidence to indicate that Canada has been a pioneer in bringing about a degree of dialogue between the People's Republic of China and the west that has not existed before, because of a great many failures, particularly on the part of the United States. Nevertheless, it is obvious now, despite some studies very recently published, that the opportunities are there.

I have seen a study not yet made public dealing with Canadian-Mainland China trade relations which suggests that the subject is academic, but then that was written before the famous ping-pong matches. I was very much interested in that since I have lived in China and since we so often hear the old saying that history repeats itself. In that regard I am sure honorable senators are aware that in 1905 in Punch, Sir Bernard Partridge, the great cartoonist published a cartoon showing a Chinese mandarin playing ping-pong with a western diplomat.

So, honourable senators, history does indeed repeat itself. I am sure that in this instance we are all happy that that repetition has taken the form it happens to have taken. However, I think it would be a mistake to be too optimistic. Mainland China has its own economic difficulties. Since the revolution in 1949—and that is what it was because that is when Chairman Mao proclaimed the People's Republic—China has not overtly or substantially engaged in western trade for many reasons. Historically this is again an anomaly because anyone who has studied the history of China is aware that in the fifteenth century, and perhaps into the sixteenth century, most of the trade of the east, including India, Burma and even into Arabia and Suez, was carried on Chinese seagoing junks. In those days China had a tremendous merchant fleet. But then the Chinese withdrew into themselves for various reasons, but here again history may repeat itself because one of their intentions is to develop a shipping fleet to carry exports around the world. I am sure this is what they hope to do.

One of the main countries to be considered in any study of the Pacific Rim is, of course, Japan. I am sure all honorable senators are aware of what can only be called the miracle of Japanese economic and societal development since the war. It is predicted now that it will not be long before Japan may, and I underline the word "may", reach our own Canadian per capita standard of living and income. The facts seem to indicate that as of now the Japanese per capita income and standard of living is as high as or higher than that of the United Kingdom.

Japan has become an increasingly important market for Canadian exports in the last few years. At the same time Canada has become an increasingly important market for imports from Japan. Recently a study has been published showing the import and export balance of our Canadian provinces. Naturally the western provinces show up as those leading in exports to Japan, but it is also interesting to note that central Canada and the Atlantic provinces are already beginning to benefit substantially from that trade. Ontario and Quebec are still the main recipients of Japanese imports into Canada. So here we have an interesting balance to the complaint we sometimes hear from our friends in the west that the economic balance is all in favour of the centre. As I have indicated, it so happens that in this important area of Canada-Japan trade it is the central provinces and to some extent the Atlantic provinces which are earning the money to balance the exports of the western provinces. I am sure that is a trend in our trading relationships with the world, in respect of both resources and manufactured products. Honourable senators will welcome this as a useful balancing of what at times is an unfortunate historic economic development in the Canadian situation.

I need hardly say that Australia is a completely new kind of entry into our relationships with the Pacific Rim. Australia, with Japan, is now looming up as our greatest competitor.

One common denominator existing between our trade relations with the Caribbean and the Pacific Rim is that here again Canadian businessmen and Canadian industry appear to have missed the boat. I am not saying this critically, but over and over again in the evidence that we have heard we have been told that, particularly in areas of manufactured products, countries such as Sweden, West Germany, Japan, the United States, and the United Kingdom are supplying the Japanese and Australian markets with sophisticated technological instruments for which in other markets Canada occupies a very powerful position.

The explanation seems to be that historically Canadian trade has been oriented to the United States and Europe.

One of the reasons some of us on the committee feel that our study of the Pacific Rim is important is that surely the time has come when Canadian businessmen particularly, with the assistance of the Government, will have to reorient their whole thinking of world and global trade towards the east rather than towards the south and west as it has been.

We also had some evidence about the other countries of the Pacific Rim. I would mention New Zealand, which is in a rather different category from Australia. We are already looking at the great problems that will be created for New Zealand in the event of the entry of the United Kingdom and some of the Scandinavian countries into the European Common Market. We have some reason to believe that an enlightened Canadian trade policy may be useful to ameliorate to an extent some of the problems that New Zealand will undoubtedly encounter if the enlargement of the Common Market takes place.

We have also looked at other countries of the Pacific Rim. Here the economic and statistical information has not been all that could be desired, particularly with regard to Malaysia, a Commonwealth country. The next general meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association will be held in Malaysia. It is appropriate to mention this, because some honourable senators and I have recently returned from the annual meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. The situation in Indonesia since the change of government a few years ago again gives rise to considerable hope that that important country will be oriented into the kind of trading bloc in which Canada can participate actively.

I will not mention in detail all the other countries. We have examined them country by country. The Philippines is important, as is South Korea. They are all part of the Pacific Rim.

In conclusion, may I assure honourable senators that there is reason to believe that despite the vastness and complexity of this subject, our Foreign Affairs Committee will be able to make an important, useful and substantial contribution to Canada in the study that it is undertaking.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this amending bill has been before the house for some time. Fortunately the explanatory notes in respect to references to the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act are very full, and honourable senators are no doubt acquainted with their contents.

Most senators have been associated with one form of politics or another for a long period of time. One of the precepts that existed 25 years ago, and which I hope prevails today, is that we should do what we can to protect the consumer, who is perhaps the most important person in this country.

For a long time we have had a statute called the Combines Investigation Act. There is a general feeling that this act does not encompass the sale of services or those items that are not to be described as articles. Yet we read within the last few weeks that because the banks are considered to be a service industry and do not come within the Combines Investigation Act, they by one precedent or another are able to say, Joe to Jim, "As at April 1 of this year we will have new charges to our customers in connection with deposits for redeposit to utility companies. We will have by reason of this an excess in our per item per cheque charge for services of your paper going through our institutions." These are services of great value, but this is something which if done by a businessman selling an article might be subject to the Combines Investigation Act.

My simple amendment is to suggest to you that it is timely that section 32(1) of the Combines Investigation Act be considered by one of our committees to the extent that we will determine whether or not this is inflationary, arbitrary, justified, and so on.

Section 32 of the Combines Investigation Act provides that it is an offence to do certain things, such as agreeing by collusion with competitors to sell commodites at the same price. The section, just prior to the amendment to which I draw your attention and which is in my bill, provides that certain transactions in connection with insurance might be considered a combine if entered into by a telephone call or prearrangement by a majority or, in fact, the entire industry connected with that type of service.

As a result of the proposals that became effective on April 1, Canadian consumers using bank services will from that date, irrespective of the Combines Investigation Act, be subject to increased costs, and according to estimates I have heard these costs will run from $28 million to $32 million. So, this item is not unimportant, and I suggest that it deserves the attention of the Senate.

This matter has been raised in the other house on several occasions. I will not quote from Hansard what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said, but a headline in the Edmonton Journal of March 18 reads "Basford Raps Bank Service Charge Hike". These hikes, I tell you, might amount to $32 million. We are in the position of considering inflation. I wish to be very fair to the banks. I will say that they were among the reputable businessmen of this country in 1970 who gave to the Prices and Incomes Commission an undertaking that they would not increase their charges in 1970. I commend them for that. Their own costs went up, undoubtedly, as costs in many other businesses went up in 1970. No one will read the stockmarket pages without realizing that, by and large, the profits made in 1970 were very considerably less than those earned in earlier years.

Some people will say that there was a failure on the part of the Prices and Incomes Commission to persuade the element of labour to consider what would be the result of an increase in their incomes in 1970. However, I wish to tell you that at the time I was giving this serious consideration I was somewhat startled to read a headline in one of the financial papers of this country, I believe in August of 1970, announcing that one of the oldest and most prestigious banks in Canada had an increase in profits for 1970 of 18 per cent. In a climate of this kind, how do you expect the PIC to be successful with organized labour?

I have statistics here from some of our major banking institutions over a period of five or six years. Did the Bank of Montreal increase the equity of capital put up by the shareholders during that period? The statistics indicate that it remained constant, but their profits went up by millions and millions. I do not want to be discriminatory so I will cite the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. The statistics indicate that in 1966 the capital stock of the company was the same as it was in 1970, but their net income went up from $24 million to $43 million. How can the Government get voluntary restraint when there are figures of that kind with which to demonstrate? I take yet another bank, the Toronto-Dominion Bank. It does not look as if anyone was asked to invest any more money in that company. In 1966 the capital invested was similar to the capital invested in 1970 and the earnings were substantially greater.

Yesterday some of us were privileged to hear an eminent economist who advocates some form of control over incomes and wages. At the end of the meeting there was some doubt in my mind about how long he thought that could be voluntary. That is our difficulty. Is there any reason why a service charge should be different from an article or different from a service in itself, and therefore exempt from the Combines Investigation Act?

The amendment I propose for your consideration makes it illegal for banks to agree in respect of their charges. Is there not some advantage in a bank saying, "I will charge you 11 cents a cheque if you use my bank," as against another bank charging 14 cents? I am not certain of this, but I think my recollection is accurate that the biggest bank in America, with its headquarters in California, built itself up, and did so through ethnic people, by being competitive.

All my life, politically and otherwise, I have believed in the competitive system. I believe that this should be introduced wherever it is possible to do so, and that things which are called protective and exclusive should be avoided.

[Hon. Mr. Benidickson.]

This bill suggests that after referring to "insurance upon persons or property" we add "banking services, or". What is the matter with that? What is wrong with the Royal Bank saying it will charge 11 cents a cheque and the Toronto-Dominion Bank saying it will charge 13 cents?

I want to be fair to the banks. I am not an attacker of the banks. I have relatives who have been directors of some of the biggest banks in this country. But are they special people who have special acts? We have given them a special act that says they are free to an extent from foreign competition. There are certain other privileges. There are also certain basic requirements. A fly-by-night cannot start a bank; some security is required, and I think that is reasonable. There should be reasonable security, particularly for the people who lend money to banks.

By coincidence, at approximately the same date that I introduced Bill S-17, the Prices and Incomes Commission issued a statement, dated April 7, to which they must have given some study. In that statement they questioned whether or not in these times we should increase consumers costs by the type of charges that were proposed and have been in effect since April 1. These are charges which, percentagewise, are in the nature of 27 per cent and 33 1/3 per cent. The banks will defend themselves.

The best evidence that I have seen was naturally given by a person who has great experience in the financial field. I had the good fortune to work with him in the Department of Finance for some years. I refer to Mr. Harvey Perry. His argument impresses me greatly. He says that Senator Inman might write a thousand cheques a month and have a deposit of a thousand dollars. He suggests that during the same period Senator Benidickson might deposit a thousand dollars but write very few cheques. There are expenses to both. Who is going to pay them? Is the borrower going to pay them or is the depositor going to pay them?

These points are worthy of the attention of the Senate. The reason I brought this up—and it is coincidental with the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission, which states they are unjustified—is that my sense of smell, as a politician or a consumer or whatever I am, led me to believe that this was an inappropriate time to introduce these charges. I think the Senate should investigate this.

Honourable senators, I am not suggesting that our high class bankers went down to New York and thought that we in this chamber and in the other chamber were nincompoops and that if the bankers were left to run their own business they could do a much better job of it.

I want to say that the consumer in this country has been greatly protected by the work done in the Senate and House of Commons, and he will continue to be served over the years.

I suggest that my amending bill is worthy of consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking,

Trade and Commerce, and I hope that honourable senators will consent to it being sent there.

Honourable senators, I have no collusion with the Government. The Government has been peppered with questions about the merits of this $28 million to $32 million additional impost on the consumers by the banks, who have not done badly over the years, as I have tried to illustrate. I suggest that we are here to fulfil a function. The biggest bankers in this country may go down to New York and deprecate the work of this chamber and of the House of Commons and come back happy, but as far as I am concerned we are serving the consumers and the electorate.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I am opposed to this amending bill and I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: I would remind honourable senators that we arranged yesterday that our sitting today would be of such a duration as would permit members to attend the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CORRECTION IN MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday when honourable Senator Benidickson moved second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, I inadvertently mentioned the name of honourable Senator Paterson as being the seconder of the motion. It was understood that the honourable Senator Cameron was to be the seconder, and that was the name I had in mind at the time. The error was discovered early this morning when reading the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday. I would therefore ask that the Minutes be corrected accordingly.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of Report of the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board (Mr. Roger Duhamel, Chairman), dated March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 17 of the Official Languages Act, chapter 54, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69, together with copies of press releases relating thereto.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 11, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

PROPOSED STUDY OF PROCEDURES BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—MOTION STANDS

On the motion:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be instructed to consider and from time to time report on procedures for the review by the Senate of instruments made in virtue of any statute of the Parliament of Canada, and to consider in connection therewith any public documents relevant thereto; and
> That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I ask that this item stand until Wednesday next. The reason for my request is that until Bill C-182, the Statutory Instruments Bill, has been sent back to the house we cannot very well proceed with this motion. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is meeting this afternoon at three o'clock, with the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Turner) in attendance, to discuss this bill.

Motion stands.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 27, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) calling the attention of the Senate to the Statement of Conclusions of the Third Working Session of the Constitutional Conference, held at Ottawa, 8th and 9th February, 1971, and tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 11th February, 1971.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Forsey shall speak now instead of the honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I first wish to thank the honourable Senator Langlois for having kindly made way for me this afternoon.

I need scarcely emphasize the importance of the subject before us, or the debt we owe our colleague the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for raising the matter in this house. I rise with a certain diffidence to discuss it, after Senator Connolly and Senator Manning have both taken part in the debate with such distinction, a distinction which is only what we would expect from two of the stars of the long drawn-out performance of constitutional revision. Both these honourable senators have taken a notable part in those proceedings. I cannot even claim to be part of the supporting cast. I think on one occasion I was entitled to appear as a spectator at one of these conferences, but I was prevented from being even that. My sole acquaintance with the proceedings of the conferences comes, like that of most citizens, from reading the reports, official and otherwise, which have issued from those various conferences.

I cannot claim anything like the title to knowledge that is claimed by those two honourable senators who have spoken on the subject, nor can I speak from the long and vast experience of public affairs which Senator Desruisseaux brought to this debate. I shall have something to say about the contributions of those senators shortly, en passant. I shall not make any special reference to the contribution made by my valued friend Senator Quart, but I hope she will forgive me when I say that her intervention was rather in the nature of a footnote or a marginal comment. I am an ardent footnoter myself. In fact, I think sometimes that almost my sole claim to distinction is the number of footnotes in which I appear in learned works and the number of letters to the newspapers in which I indulge. Therefore, it is with no desire to be discourteous to Senator Quart that I say that her brief but pithy contribution to this debate was in the nature of a footnote or marginal comment.

I should like to make clear at the outset—it perhaps scarcely requires emphasis—that though I am a member of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, of course nothing that I say here can possibly be attributed to anyone but myself. I do not wish to have it appear that if I express certain opinions this afternoon, even if I express them rather forcibly, it means that I have a closed mind and that I shall bring to the further deliberations of the Constitution Committee nothing but a closed mind. I am perfectly open to argument; I am perfectly open to correction on matters of fact or on what I believe to be matters of fact. The matters of fact alleged had better be real matters of fact and the argument had better be pretty good argument. I do not propose to be bowled over by any kind of claptrap or flap-doodle coming from someone whose knowledge of the Constitution is perhaps in inverse proportion to his claims to knowledge. I have encountered some people of that sort. I hope that, if I express myself forcibly on certain matters, as I shall, it will not be assumed that I am in any way committing even myself in the further deliberations of the Constitution Committee.

Honourable senators, I want to confine myself to the document which is before us and to which Senator Connolly's motion draws our attention. That means that I shall not follow Senator Desruisseaux into his interesting discussion of certain larger aspects of the Constitution. I am tempted to do so, the more so as I am sorry to say that I find on quite a number of these matters I am not in agreement with Senator Desruisseaux.

I shall refrain from going into those because, in the first place, I think we should confine ourselves in general—I should, at all events—to the subject matter of the motion. In the second place, there is an important committe meeting at 3 o'clock to which I know most honourable senators will wish to go. I should like to go myself, if I were not obliged to go to the Constitution Committee meeting at 3.30. I do not wish to trespass upon honourable senators' time beyond that point. Indeed, I probably should not do so up to that point, if it were not that this is a matter of such importance, and one of the few that I think I really know something about, that I am inclined perhaps to be a little more loquacious than I should be.

First of all, the procedure for patriation of the Constitution. I must say that when I first looked at it, it struck me as being novel and elaborate but after consideration I decided that this was a subject on which the lawyers were better qualified to speak than I. It appeared to me to be a reasonable procedure, even if somewhat startling. Beyond that, I do not think I want to comment on it except for two points, or rather one point which is related to another point in the proposed amending formula.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) regretted that the reference in the patriation part of the document was to the "two Houses of Parliament" rather than to "Parliament". He drew attention, very properly of course, and in a salutary way, to the fact that Parliament consists of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. With great respect, however, I venture to take issue on this slightly technical point of Senator Connolly's, because it seems to me that in the context of the document the two houses rather than Parliament is correct. Parliament unadorned is the proper expression to use. A resolution of the two houses, I think, is the phrase that is used, and you could not very well have a resolution of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. You can have an act, of course. In fact, an act of Parliament is an act of the Queen by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons, as we all know. But it seems to me that in this particular context the phrase "the two Houses of Parliament" is unobjectionable.

If this seems disrespectful to Senator Connolly, I bow before his superior authority as a distinguished lawyer. But he did, after all, invite comment, and he did not say, "Comment, please, only from counsel learned in the law."

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Your comment is probably better.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: On the related point in the amendment formula about the resolution of consent at the federal level, I should like to echo strongly what Senator Connolly said about the desirability of that including action by this house. When I first read the thing I was a little bit disturbed to find that it did not actually mention the two houses. I think this is probably just because they were indulging in a species of shorthand. But I hope it will be maintained by everyone in this house, and by many outside it, that in a matter of this sort we certainly should have something to say, that in any amending process this house should have an opportunity of pronouncing on it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is the important point.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: As long as we are here at all, surely this is one subject on which our sober second thought is highly desirable and necessary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If we are not going to be allowed to take part in the process of amendment, then the sooner they count us out the better. If we are not good enough to take part in a thing like that, we might just as well be abolished. I do not think there is any prospect of that, incidentally. But if we are left out, that is the kind of thing that would lead people to say, "Oh, those old curmudgeons. Nobody thinks it worthwhile to consult them on a trifle like the Constitution. What good are they doing there? Are they just wasting our time and the taxpayers' money?"

It seems to me absolutely essential that so long as we are here we should assert firmly our right to be consulted and to be able to pronounce on any proposed amendments to the Constitution. But if it is said that, "Oh, well, nothing could possibly get by the accumulated wisdom of the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures," let me draw attention to the fact that in 1936, when all governments of the country and the House of Commons had agreed that a certain amendment was desirable, the Senate sat on it like a ton of bricks and the amendment fell to the ground—and properly so. The Senate took a good, hard, second look at that amendment and said it could lead to the economic balkanization of the country. And that was the end of that particular amendment.

It is unlikely that sort of thing could happen again, but it is possible, and one of our functions here is to bring our experience, our knowledge and our distilled wisdom, as I hope it is, to the consideration of public questions, and above all to the consideration of amendments to the Constitution, which is the very framework of our collective life, as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) put it so much better than I could in some of the introductory words of his speech.

Now, as to the amending formula, I have heard it denounced by various people and criticized severely by others. Perhaps it is merely a sign that I am not any longer young and therefore have learned the value of the beatitude: "Blessed is he who expecteth little, for he will not be disappointed." But it seems to me that this is a reasonable formula. It is not ideal, but one of the few compensations of advancing years is that you do not expect to have heaven on yesterday morning's breakfast table. It seems to me that this is about as good a formula as we can get. It is probably somewhat better than the celebrated Fulton-Favreau formula, which I thought was reasonably good. In fact I was one of the few semi-academic defenders of that formula, although I found myself in excellent company even if rather scanty in numbers.

Honourable senators, I do not know if it is permissible to refer to proceedings before the joint committee but perhaps I may mention it briefly. I read Mr. Fulton's comments on and criticisms of the formula. Now, I have great respect and regard for Mr. Fulton, who is an old and valued friend, but I think on this point I am not prepared to go all the way with him. He objected first of all to the fact that particular provinces were specifically and explicitly given a veto. Well, on all the most important amendments to the Constitution under the Fulton-Favreau formula, every province had a veto. Of course, that was criticized as being much too rigid, but the fact is that now on practically any amendment of any importance whatever, every province has a veto. I think as a matter of sheer constitutional convention and political fact, no government whether Liberal, Conservative, NDP, Social Credit, vegetarian, anti-vivisectionist or anything else would venture to present to the House of Commons or to the Senate, or to both, a proposal for an amendment to the Constitution, other than on some trifling matter of correcting a piece of punctuation or something of that sort, without the unanimous consent of the provinces. That is just not going to happen.

We have now, under convention although not under law, one of the most rigid constitutions in the world. So I think the Fulton-Favreau formula did not contain much change from the existing situation. But in this case it seems to me that we are in a somewhat better position than we were under the Fulton-Favreau formula because we no longer require unanimity, and we no longer give to every province the power of veto.

In saying this I hope I am not giving the impression of showing an improper disregard for the claims of some of the smaller provinces. I was born in one of them, Newfoundland, and my roots go deep in another, Nova Scotia. I sometimes describe myself as one who has been throughout most of his life a Maritimer in partibus infidelium; I have lived up here most of my life, but my roots are all east of here, some in Quebec and most of them in the Atlantic provinces. Nevertheless, I think we have to face the sheer brute fact that the Atlantic provinces are small provinces, and we also have to face the sheer brute fact that it is rather absurd to think that if the entire country is pretty well determined on a particular constitutional amendment, the Province of Newfoundland or the Province of Prince Edward Island should be in a position to thwart that general will of the Canadian population.

So, honourable senators, I think it is rather a good thing that we have now got to the point where we are proposing that while Quebec, Ontario and, in effect, British Columbia, shall have a veto, no other individual province shall. I think this is an improvement. Now, if you say, "Why single out Quebec? Why single out Ontario?" Then, once again, it seems to me to be a sheer brute fact of politics that Quebec and Ontario are immensely large and powerful provinces, and Québec est une province pas comme les autres, a province different in many respects from the other provinces. Again, I just cannot imagine that it would be politically possible to put through, even if you had the legal capacity to do it, an amendment which was seriously objected to either by Ontario or Quebec.

British Columbia is rapidly reaching the point where it will become a province of something like equal weight, and there may be others. There is provision for this in the formula itself, for provinces which have or may attain a population of 25 per cent.

Mr. Fulton objected to the idea of putting in these percentages and mentioned various technical difficulties there. Percentage when? When do you say it has got 25 per cent? Do you refer to the last census? Do you look at the estimates of populaton by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics? What do you do to decide that a province has qualified by having 25 per cent? But this is perhaps a matter of drafting. It should be possible to put in something that should be reasonably satisfactory. The principle seems to be a reasonable one.

Mr. Fulton also regretted the dropping of the provisions for reciprocal delegation of legislative powers between the Dominion and the provinces under the Fulton-Favreau formula. I am in two minds about that. I was inclined at first to think that it was a good thing to have this because it mitigated what was otherwise an extraordinary rigidity in the formula. But after talking to some knowledgeable friends of mine in the legal profession I was inclined to be a little worried about the effect that it might have in practice upon the laws of the country, and I am rather inclined to accept the view of my distinguished and learned friend, Professor Lederman of Queen's University, that all the things that you can reasonably expect to do by legislative delegation, delegation of legislative powers, can be done by intergovernmental agreements and administrative delegation, such as we have under the act providing for regulation of international and interprovincial highway traffic, or such as we had before the courts in the famous Prince Edward Island Potato Marketing Board case, the Willis case. So, I am not too worried about this, especially as the proposed new formula is less rigid than the Fulton-Favreau formula was.

I am pleased to see that there is this concentration now upon an amending formula and upon the process of amendment. There is a tendency in some quarters to say, "away with it all," a tendency to say in some quarters, "Let us act as if we were God, making the world afresh"; let us make a tabula rasa, let us get rid of the British North America Act, let us start with a clean sheet, let us have a completely and totally new Constitution. In some quarters that viewpoint is put forward in a menacing tone, and I only hope that no government in this country will be bullied, whether by the young or by the old, into plumping for a completely new Constitution. I believe it is a hazardous enterprise. I doubt whether it can be carried through within any measurable period of time, and attempts even to arrive at a revised Constitution, let alone a new one, will be a long drawn-out process indeed.

Meanwhile we must go on governing the country. I am inclined to think that much the more sensible way of proceeding—and I have an open mind on this, if anyone can convince me to the contrary—would be to deal with the things that seem to need change on the basis of facts, logical argument, experience, and have a formula of amendment which would enable us to deal with the situation with a reasonable degree of celerity, although after due deliberation.

So I think it is salutary that the conference has concentrated on this question of an amending formula which can be used, if we can get sufficient agreement among Canadians, to make such changes in the British North America Act as seem really to be required for the peace, good order and good government of the country.

I am delighted to see that sections 91(1) and 92(1) are to be changed if these proposals go through. I am particularly pleased to see that the institution of the monarchy, which is now in a position where it can be abolished by a simple act of this Parliament, is to come under the general procedure and will be subject to the vetoes which are provided for in the general procedure.

Some people say, "Well, what business is it of the provinces?" I think it is very much the business of the provinces, because the Crown is very much part of their Constitution as it is part of the Constitution of the Dominion, and they have a right to be consulted on proposals for getting rid of it. No doubt they would be, in any case, but I think it is well to have it written into the fundamental document of the written Constitution.

I was pleased that both Senator Desruisseaux and Senator Manning spoke as they did on the preservation of the monarchy and the necessity for keeping it. I am inclined to think that a great deal of talk about republicanism is just a fad. There was a fad of this sort in Great Britain back in the second or third quarter of the nineteenth century. Everybody was full of excitement, everybody who was anybody, all the avant garde people, were full of excitement about the necessity for changing the monarchy to a republic; but it passed off, and I suspect it may pass off here also.

I simply cannot understand those people who want to get rid of our monarchy and substitute for it an alien system, a republican system, something that we have never had in this country, in the belief that it will enhance our Canadian identity. In other words, if I am not altogether satisfied with my identity I will try to change myself into somebody else, get my face lifted, get myself stretched in some way, get my hair dyed, adopt a new fashion in clothes, go around looking like a hippie, and then say "That's splendid." Perhaps it is. Perhaps it might be an improvement. But I cannot see that it will enhance my identity. It will simply change my identity. There may be good reasons for changing the identity of Canada, but let us not, on the plea of enhancing our identity, go in for something that will change our identity. Let us use words with some regard for their meaning. If we want to use the word "change," let us say "change"; if we want to use the word "keep," let us say "keep".

I want to emphasize very much and very strongly something that is often forgotten, namely, that the monarchy, good, bad or indifferent, is not something that was foisted upon us in this country. It was something that we deliberately chose. Among the many fairy tales that are circulated about the origin of the Constitution, this is among the hardiest. We get it from here, there and yonder. We get it from foreigners and from some of our own people. We get it from supposedly learned people, and from ignorant people. This idea that the monarchy was foisted upon us by the British Government or was adopted by the Fathers of Confederation—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: May I be permitted to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: When you speak about republicanism, to what type of republicanism are you referring?—because there are different types. Is it the Indian type or the American type?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I have frequently asked the proponents of the republican theory to answer that question, but I have never got an answer yet, whether they want a de Gaullist republic, a Soviet republic. Some would like a Maoist republic, or some would like an American republic and some an Indian republic. I think that those of us who are dubious about this proposal are entitled to ask for what the French call "des précisions", but I have asked for them in vain.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Do I understand you are opposed to any form of republicanism?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: At present, yes; if anyone can show reason to the contrary I will listen, but I know of none now. I have no admiration for the work of the American Republic and if you wish to list the others, there are a good many of them where I would prefer not to live.

I merely emphasize that the monarchy was not imposed upon us, nor was it adopted by the Fathers of Confederation simply because they were too boneheaded, stupid, ignorant or timid to come out for a republic.

I intend now to quote from the Parliamentary Debates on Confederation, in the Legislature of the Province of Canada, a passage from the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald on this subject. It is a fairly lengthy passage; I may find at three o'clock that I will have to adjourn the debate. Perhaps some honourable members will say, as Mr. Disraeli once said of Gladstone, that I am intoxicated by the exuberance of my own verbosity. At any rate, I do not want to scamp the debate. I have started out to discuss this and I am going to discuss it to the best of my ability. What did Macdonald say in the Confederation Debates on this subject? I will now quote:

> I think it is well that, in framing our Constitution—although my honourable friend the member for Hochelaga (Hon. Mr. Dorion) sneered at it the other day, in the discussion on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne—our first act should have been to recognize the sovereignty of Her Majesty. (Hear, hear.) I believe that, while England has no desire to lose her colonies, but wishes to retain them, while I am satisfied that the public mind of England would deeply regret the loss of these provinces—yet, if the people of British North America after full deliberation had stated that they considered it was for their interest, for the advantage of the future of British North America to sever the tie, such is the generosity of the people of England, that, whatever their desire to keep these colonies, they would not seek to compel us to remain unwilling subjects of the British Crown. If therefore, at the Conference, we had arrived at the conclusion, that it was for the interest of these provinces that a severance should take place, I am sure that Her Majesty and the Imperial Parliament would have sanctioned that severance. We accordingly felt that there was a propriety in giving a distinct declaration of opinion on that point, and that, in framing the Constitution, its first sentence should declare, that "The Executive authority or government shall be vested in the Sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and be administered according to the well understood principles of the British Constitution, by the Sovereign personally, or by the Representative of the Sovereign duly authorised." That resolution met with the unanimous assent of the Conference. The desire to remain connected with Great Britain and to retain our allegiance to Her Majesty was unanimous. Not a single suggestion was made, that it could, by any possibility, be for the interest of the colonies, or of any section or portion of them, that there should be a severance of our connection.

There is more to the same effect, but I need not weary your honours with more of it. The thing is perfectly clear; if you think it was merely that Macdonald was Scots-born and an irreclaimable old Anglo-Saxon Tory,—though Anglo-Saxon is a curious term to apply to a highlander—then let me remind you that all through the Confederation Debates you can find the perfervid declarations of Sir Georges Cartier with regard to the undesirability of democracy, which he equated with mob rule as they had it in the United States, and the absolute necessity of the monarchy.

Let me remind you also that the Fathers wanted to call this country the Kingdom of Canada and the only reason they did not succeed was that the British foreign office was nervous about the Americans; they thought they would not like it very well.

One of the very few things in our Constitution which we have actually got from the British Government is the elimination of the word "kingdom" from our title. The Constitution as we have it now is about 99.9 per cent the creation of the British North American delegates who met at Charlottetown, Quebec, and the Westminster Palace Hotel in London. The British Government did three things altogether: it said the power of pardon should be vested in the Governor General, not in the Lieutenant Governors, and the delegates reluctantly consented. That, of course, is not in the British North America Act; it is a matter of prerogative. It said "No, you cannot call it the Kingdom of Canada", so the Fathers went back and thought it over. Sir Leonard Tilley had been reading his Bible, the 72nd psalm, and he suggested instead the word "dominion". This was accordingly communicated to the Queen by Lord Carnarvon in a letter of, if my memory serves me, February 8, 1867. The letter said that it was a novel title, but one which the British North American delegation desired as an expression of the monarchical principle "which they earnestly desire to uphold". So good, bad or indifferent, the monarchy is ours. If we wish to change it, we are perfectly at liberty to do so; no one is going to stop us. But let us have none of this unadulterated nonsense about our having it imposed upon us, or about the Fathers of Confederation being just a lot of mixed up kids who did not know what they were doing.

Incidentally, the third matter in which the British Government put its oar in had to do with this honourable house. In the original proposals, as honourable senators are doubtless aware, there was no provision for breaking a deadlock between the two houses. The British Government was very much upset about this and proposed a provision, which the Fathers of Confederation turned down. Eventually the Fathers of Confederation, in response to British expostulations, proposed what is now enshrined in sections 26 to 28 of the British North America Act, the provisions for the appointment of extra senators.

There are the three matters with which the British Government had something to do. They are the substitution of "dominion", although they did not suggest it; they just wanted something other than kingdom; the transfer of the pardoning power from the Lieutenant Governors to the Governor General and the provision for breaking a deadlock between the two houses. There they did not get what they wanted; they merely prodded and pushed the Fathers of Confederation into making suggestions of their own.

One thing about the proposal on the subject of the monarchy and the Lieutenant Governors' position that I am a little uneasy about is that it refers to the "functions" of the Queen, Governor General, and the Lieutenant Governors. I am not sure that that covers the whole ground; I suppose it does. Lawyers will be able to pronounce on that, but I suppose it does.

Why include the Lieutenant Governors? Here, perhaps, I am going to say something that will strike honourable senators as somewhat quaint and antiquarian; I am not so sure that it is. The Lieutenant Governors at the present time have the power to reserve a bill for the signification of the Governor General's pleasure. They are required to send all acts of provincial legislatures to the central government, which is then entitled under the act to disallow them, if it sees fit, within a period of one year after they arrive here. There has been a good deal of suggestion that these powers of reservation and disallowance, which are closely connected with the position and function of Lieutenant Governor, are obsolete and should be dropped. but they are still there and I should like to suggest that it might be as well not to be too sure that they are obsolete, but that there may be some point in awakening the sleeping beauty, if it is sleeping. As long as you bought off the powers of reservation and disallowance, which could conceivably be some protection for civil liberties against encroachment by provincial legislations, for a comprehensive bill of human rights entrenched in the Constitution I did not feel particularly excited. However, it now appears that we are to have a rather restricted Bill of Rights, and I think there are good arguments for its being restricted. It seems to me that we may find that a government with sufficient devotion to human rights and fundamental freedoms might find it very useful to have these weapons at its disposal for dealing with such things as the provincial Public Order Act of Prince Edward Island, which I gather is soon to die "unwept, unhonour'd, and unsung," and what I gather is a somewhat dubious piece of legislation in Alberta infringing upon certain human rights there.

I am not by any means sure the Bill of Rights, which it is now proposed to include in the Constitution, would be adequate for defending rights against the encroachments of provincial legislatures. I would like to see them defended against the encroachments of the Parliament of Canada too, but if we cannot have that I think we had better make do with the half loaf which is at present at our disposal.

I am glad to notice that in the proposed Constitution the safeguards for the minimum representation of the provinces in the other place, based upon their representation in this house, are maintained. This is particularly important for the smaller provinces, especially of course for the Atlantic provinces. Two of them are already down to their minimum, and I greatly fear the others are getting close to it and will arrive there before too long.

Some of the proposals I have seen for Senate reform in certain quarters have suggested that the representation of the Atlantic provinces should be seriously reduced. I am delighted to see that in this set of proposals there is a safeguard against that.

I am not altogether sure I am so happy about the special guarantee for the Senate. I think there is something to be said for the existing situation, in which the Parliament of Canada, which includes us of course, could abolish the Senate, or amend its Constitution and powers in any way it saw fit by a simple act of Parliament. On the other hand, I think we are going to stay here; I do not think there is any prospect of our being abolished. There is something to be said for the safeguards which are in here.

I must admit that some of the schemes I have seen for so-called Senate reform have made my hair stand on end, if only because as a rule they would give this house much more power, and I am afraid that would be power to make a nuisance of itself, which I do not think is the proper function of this house. I therefore think there is probably good argument for the provision safeguarding certain aspects of the Senate's constitution. I am a little less sure that there should be this restriction put upon the power of the Parliament of Canada to change the powers of the Senate.

As I was saying a moment ago, the Bill of Rights that we are going to get is a relatively restricted one. I am of a somewhat divided mind on this question of an entrenched Bill of Rights. I listen to the common law lawyers on the subject and I can see point in what they say, especially in view of the rather dubious experience of the United States with its Bill of Rights in regard to new social legislation and that sort of thing. On the other hand, I lived in the Province of Quebec in the palmy days of the Honourable Maurice Duplessis, and I can see certain reasons for trying to put certain fundamental rights beyond the power, either of the Parliament of Canada or of any provincial legislature.

I think you have to be extraordinarily careful how the Bill of Rights is drafted. It must be recognized that it would give the judiciary a power they do not at present enjoy in this country. I am not sure I am prepared to go by any means all the way with some of the common law people who say, "Trust Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Have faith in democracy. Don't place any of these powers in the hands of appointed people." I am not so sure about that. This idea that appointed people are necessarily bad has never appealed to me, even before I became one of the appointed people.

I think there is something to say for having certain rights at least entrenched in the Constitution, and I am glad to see these particular rights are to be entrenched. I think it possible that if this works out well we may at some later date decide to entrench some other rights as well, though I hope we shall not try to entrench some of the economic rights that are sometimes set forth in high-flown documents on this subject—the right to work, which is a very tricky one, the right to an adequate standard of living, and the right to various things which I think a court would find it extremely difficult to pronounce upon.

It is getting very near the witching hour when everyone must get away. On the question of languages, I am in accord with what has been proposed here, except that I am rather unhappy about the attitude of the Province of Quebec on the subject of removing the present guarantees for the English-speaking minority in that province. I am aware of the argument that Quebec has waited a long time to see the other provinces do as much for the French-speaking minorities there, and I agree that not enough has been done, or fast enough. But we are moving in that direction. We have moved at a speed that would have seemed to me a very few years ago completely impossible, notably in Ontario, and also I think in Manitoba.

I think it is a pity—and I strongly endorse what Senator Desruisseaux said on this matter here some weeks ago—at this point in time to see the Province of Quebec apparently moving in the opposite direction, just when apparently a more liberal or enlightened policy is being adopted in the other provinces. However, I can see the logic of it, and I presume the probability is that in Quebec we shall have—at all events I hope so—reasonable governments that will in fact make reasonable provision for the rights of the English-speaking people. However, I am a little uneasy about this, and I am a little sad to think that this attitude of the Province of Quebec has come along just now.

I am glad to see it is proposed to put in the Constitution an explicit provision that either Parliament or the legislatures can add to the use of either or both of the official languages as they see fit; that what is written down, as it were, in section 133, or some amended and improved version of that, should be regarded simply as a minimum. Of course, I think that is what it is now, in spite of the arguments of the former Mr. Justice Thorson to the contrary. Frankly, I do not think Mr. Justice Thorson's arguments stand up. I think the Official Languages Act is well within the powers of Parliament. However, that is merely one of my illegal legal opinions; I have no professional right to make that statement. I simply say that after careful study of it, and in the light of what I know about Canadian constitutional law—and what I do not know is a vastly larger terrain than what I do—it seems to me the act is well within the powers of the Parliament of Canada, and the former Mr. Justice Thorson, for whom I have great respect and affection, is on this subject talking through his hat.

With regard to the Supreme Court of Canada, the two things I want to mention are the participation of the provinces in the process of appointment, and appeals in matters of provincial law from the highest court of the province.

On the first, I should like to say that the only plan that seems to me satisfactory for giving the provinces any part in the appointment of judges in the Supreme Court of Canada is what I believe is generally known in the United States as the Missouri plan. Obviously it would have to get a new name here, and would have to be modified for this particular purpose. If honourable senators are interested they can find this discussed by Professor Lederman in his evidence before the Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. I was going to quote it, but I will not because it would take too long. The evidence was given on Tuesday, October 27, 1970, and appears at pages 21 and 22 of the committee proceedings. The idea is that, while the Government of Canada should continue to make the appointments, there should be a body representing the provinces, representing a variety of aspects of public opinion, features of public opinion, which would draw up, as it were, a list of suitable appointees from which the Government of Canada would make its selection.

The same thing, incidentally, is proposed for appointments to the Senate, and there is a good deal to be said for it there also. It is, in fact, the only scheme of Senate reform that I have ever seen which I should be prepared to support. My own attitude on Senate reform could be almost summed up in the words "abolition, yes; reform, no". I do not believe in abolition, I do not think it is likely to happen, but I would sooner see us abolished than have some of the crack-brained, hair-raising schemes for reform that have been proposed, adopted.

On the matter of appeals on questions of provincial law from the highest court in the provinces, I share the uneasiness of Senator Connolly (Ottawa-West). He said, if I understand him correctly, that it was not a serious problem. I am inclined to think that it might be a rather serious problem and that some of the qualms which he expressed, after making that qualifying remark, are well-founded and of considerable importance.

Honourable senators, that brings me nearly to the end of what I wanted to say and certainly almost to the end of my allotted time. There is not much more that it is seriously necessary to say, except on one thing, this question of social security policy, which has been a sticking point with the present Government of Quebec and may, indeed, imperil the adoption of this amending formula.

I am inclined to be in accord with Senator Connolly, if I understand him correctly, that we do not want to do something which will jeopardize the maintenance of certain minima of social security across this country. Quite frankly, there is a further and rather specifically political—though I hope not in the partisan sense—point to be made here. If the people of the Province of Quebec get all the outward and visible signs of government power, at least in financial form, coming to them from the provincial government, they may tend to consider that the provincial government is the giver of all, even though the money, or a great part of it, comes from the Government of Canada.

Some honourable senators who have lived in Quebec, and some who have not, may recall the story of the school children, in the days of the Honourable Mr. Duplessis, who were being asked by the teacher a series of questions: «Qui nous a donné cette belle école? Qui nous a donné la nouvelle route? Qui nous a donné la nouvelle...» and so on and so forth. It started off with concrete things like the school, and the church, and the presbytère and the highway, and the answer in every case was: "Maurice Duplessis". Then the teacher said: «Et, qui nous a donné ce beau ciel?» And some child called out: «Le bon Dieu!» And then there was a cry: «Sale Communiste!»

That story is a facetious indication of the kind of thing that could happen if all the cheques for all the social services come bearing the imprint of a provincial government. The moment may come when the people who receive these things may say, "Why bother to send people to Ottawa, everything comes out of the provincial government? Let us be satisfied with the provincial government."

There is a serious problem here. One can of course get utter confusion on this subject, even without that. I know that for a long time in the Province of Newfoundland a vast proportion of the electorate thought that all the social benefits came straight from Joey Smallwood. No matter what you might tell them, they thought it was all from Joey, almost as if his personal signature appeared on every cheque. There are dangers there, dangers to the general standard of social security across the country. There are dangers also that we may get this further fragmentation, this further undermining of the practical political authority of the Government and Parliament of Canada.

Honourable senators, there are one or two other points on which I had thought of saying something, but I have now covered those which seemed to me of the most importance. I hope that the contribution I have made to the proceedings may have some value. I trust that I have not sounded too dogmatic. Let me reiterate that I am open to conviction, that I am quite prepared to change my opinions on any of these things, given good and sufficient reason. Some of the points that I have made are at least worth a moment's consideration, I think, by the members of this house and, if they reach so far, even by members of the press and members of the general public.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as I mentioned a moment ago, our business today has been arranged so that we can attend the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, in Room 356. The Minister of Justice will be present to answer questions with regard to the bill setting up an arrangement for the scrutiny of statutory instruments.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 11, 1971, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 11, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of a news release issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare on May 6, 1971, entitled "Document on Family Planning".

Copies of text of the International Wheat Agreement, 1971, as adopted in the final plenary session of the United Nations Wheat Conference held on February 20, 1971, at Geneva.

Copies of text of pages 1 and 2 of the October 1970 issue of "Foreign Trade" respecting a joint communiqué issued in Stockholm on October 13, 1970, by representatives of the Governments of Canada and the People's Republic of China, which recorded the agreement on mutual recognition and the establishment of diplomatic relations.

Report of the Export Development Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1970, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1971-840, dated May 4, 1971, amending Part II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said Act, chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, for Hon. Earl W. Urquhart, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-19, respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I should like to tell this honourable house that anything we can do for the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal will be helpful to the whole country.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand ajourned until Thursday, May 13, 1971, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, this motion is necessary because of the heavy schedule of work for our standing committees tomorrow. The National Finance Committee and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will hold lengthy sessions. Though it has no relation to this particular motion, I would point out also that the Standing Senate Committee on Rules and Orders will be sitting tomorrow evening.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, as far as I can see, we are not pressed for time because we are waiting for work to come to us from the other place. I would prefer that we adjourn now in order to watch the hockey game.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, Senator Everett has asked me to mention that, since the house will not be sitting tomorrow, the meeting of the National Finance Committee has been moved from 4 p.m., as shown on the notice of meetings, to 2.30 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: May I add that the National Finance Committee will meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, and I have just been informed that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee may sit tomorrow afternoon as well as in the morning.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

SPRING MEETING HELD AT CARACAS, VENEZUELA

Hon. Leopold Langlois rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the spring meeting of the Interparliamentary Union held at Caracas, Venezuela, 12th to 18th April, 1971, and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I regret having to go against the suggestion of my colleague Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) and I fear that I shall contribute to his missing a good part of the hockey game.

Tonight I wish to report to the Senate on the Interparliamentary Union Conference held at Caracas, Venezuela, from April 12 to 18, 1971. I do not intend to describe to you the long journey to the Conference or the social functions which took place on that occasion. Let me tell you, first of all, about the extremely warm welcome extended to us in Venezuela. We were given the impression that this country, which is now living through the first few years of a democratic experience, was really happy to be host to the Interparliamentary Union delegates. For those who are especially interested in this country, I feel that a brief outlook on Venezuela's political history will enable them to better appreciate the reasons for this warm welcome extended to all of us. As many of you are aware, from 1830 until the fall of the Perez Jeminez dictatorship in 1958, Venezuela had known just a few brief periods of democratic government. The free elections held in 1958 were followed by the forming of a coalition government of the left centre with, as President, the leader of the Accion Democratica Party, Romulo Bétancourt. At the 1963 elections, Raout Leoni was elected President. At the December 1968 elections, Dr. Rafael Calderra of the COPEI Party was then elected President and he is still in office. However, the previous government's political group is still holding the largest number of seats in the Congress and Dr. Calderra has been in power since March 1969.

The Canadian delegation to the Caracas Conference included Mr. Yves Forest, M.P.; your humble servant; Mr. Louis Comeau, M.P.; Mr. John Reid, M.P.; and Mr. Max Saltsman, M.P. The delegation was accompanied by Mr. Peter Dobell who acted as adviser, and Miss Jean Macpherson as executive secretary. I hastily add that both were very useful and that they did a wonderful work with spirit and great competence. We wish to express our gratitude to both of them. Now, I would like to talk about the contribution of the Canadian delegates. First of all, all members of the delegation attended the inaugural ceremony on April 13 in the Congress building. Dr. Rafael Calderra, President of the Republic of Venezuela, made a speech to welcome the delegates and was preceded at the platform by the President of the Congress, and followed by Mr. Chandernagor, President of the Union and member of the French National Assembly.

Among other topics, the parliamentary and judicial committee had to consider the importance of standing committees for the development of the activities of Parliaments. Mr. Forest had submitted a working paper at the beginning of the year and he took part in the debates of the committee on that subject.

He stressed the importance of the matter for all parliamentarians and generally discussed the function and role of parliamentary committees. He said they should help Parliament without taking from it the responsibilities that are its own. He also mentioned the similarities and differences between the various systems in operation in countries represented at the Conference, on the basis of the working papers submitted by other delegates.

He concluded, suggesting that the topic be discussed further, in its entirety, at the Paris Conference next September, as well as discussed and studied if possible by forums or symposiums organized under the patronage of the Union in the near future.

The committee decided that it was not necessary, to draft a resolution on the subject but that it should, instead, be placed on the agenda and debated at the Paris Conference. Rapporteurs were then elected, namely Mr. Yves Forest, barrister, (Canada), Mr. André Saint-Rémy, (Belgium), and Mr. Boris Spassov, (Bulgaria), and commissioned to prepare written reports to be distributed before the meetings in September, and to introduce the subject for debate at the Paris Conference.

Three topics were then studied by the Economic and Social Committee. Your humble servant was delegated to participate in the debate on the problems concerning the Second Decade of Development. I took that opportunity to give details on the aims of the Canadian International Development Agency by describing the five priorities it has set for itself.

I have based this discussion on the Agency's priorities and on the report, I should say the excellent report, recently submitted by the chairman of the Agency to the House of Commons Defence Subcommittee, as well as on the statement on foreign policy made last year by our Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Here are the five priorities discussed at the Caracas Conference:

1. Give greater consideration to the local and social consequences of our aid;

2. Further emphasize multilateral aid and take part in international activities to liberalize the conditions for aid;

3. Give a greater impetus to the aid to French-speaking Africa and Latin America;

4. Accelerate the implementation of our projects everywhere;

5. Stir up the interest and encourage the participation of the Canadian nation.

In assigning to CIDA these major priorities for the next years, I believe we do not stray from the directive established by the United Nations for the second decade of international development.

First Priority: Give greater consideration to the local and social consequences of the Canadian aid.

That is a matter of the utmost importance.

There is, first of all, the problem of integrating the aid provided. In the 1960s, most of the aid given by Canada and other countries was distributed within the framework of bilateral agreements. Such a framework very rarely allows for the co-ordination and the "complementarization" of projects of various origins in the same recipient country and, furthermore, it sometimes permits, and this is regrettable, some projects to be carried out at the expense of the others. The responsibility for this is divided. Some recipient countries had no detailed development plan. Furthermore, some donor countries had pet projects, prestige projects, and concerned themselves with those only, without taking the trouble of considering closely the whole series of development problems facing the recipient country. The low-income countries have understood, just as we have, the drastic defects that such "sprinkling" gives to the aid. There is much more concern now about making sure that each project has a place within the general development program. The need for integrated plans may be illustrated in many ways. Investment in a new industry, for example, should bring about consideration of investments in housing for its future workers. An agricultural development project will only be complete if it includes agricultural training and rural community development programs. At any rate, nothing is complete as long as the men and women who live in the recipient country have not been trained to succeed foreign advisers and assume full responsibility for the project undertaken with the help of the latter.

As a fine example of integrated planning let us mention the vast DERRO rural development project for which Canada has associated with Morocco in the mountainous province of Tetuan. Following agreements which have just been signed, Canada will maintain for five years, in its assistance area of Er Riff, a team of technical experts in various fields of economic and rural development; it will provide them with the equipment they might need in their mission and will train in our country Moroccan technicians who will be called upon to replace our experts.

No doubt the integration should go beyond the supply by a given country of technical teams made up of many experts. It should entail closer co-ordination among donating countries and local and international organizations.

In addition to integration, it is essential to consider social development. We generally recognize today that if the 1960s have witnessed economic progress in terms of gross national product, they have on the other hand shown very little interest in the social promotion of underprivileged countries. Now, both objectives—economic development and social promotion—must be sought together.

Incidentally, I would like to add that quite recently Japan and Canada have been leaving aside the term "gross national product", as indicating the progress or failure of our economy, using instead the expression "net social benefit"—that is the social benefits brought to the people by the national product or the economy—and I think that the words are more accurate and more up-to-date.

I say that the integration concern must not only be based on the mere provision of technical equipment, services and materials. It is essential, in my opinion, that the Canadian International Development Agency with other co-operative organizations take more fully in consideration the direct social incidence of their aid programs.

We have already begun to emphasize that aspect of foreign aid and to consider how we could further support social promotion of the underprivileged in each country to the development of which we are invited to contribute.

This kind of promotion can be encouraged in several ways. In the co-operative program in education, for instance, the social incidence is, of course, very important, and the same is true in respect of projects about public health, water supply, agricultural development or population planning. The assistance projects which do more than any others to multiply job opportunities will also help solve one of the most serious social problems which can be anticipated for the seventies: unemployment among the young, especially among the educated young. Successful instances of this rightful concern for social promotion may be found in the Canadian technical assistance provided to polyvalent schools in Guyana and to secondary schools in Jamaica. They can also be found in the water supply project in Markenborg, Guyana, the dry land farming project in India and the agricultural land re-allocation project in Commonwealth Africa. Such projects with a net and positive social impact will have to be multiplied. Their planning and financing have been made easier with the great flexibility that has been introduced by the statement on foreign policy into the operations of our International Development agency. My third point has to do with the impact of our aid at the local level. When I analyze our aid from this point of view, it appears to me that this impact and the effectiveness of our programs in developing countries have often been reduced by our obvious desire that our assistance should be tied in to our own economic interest.

Tying in a considerable percentage of our aid to the purchase of Canadian products and services places obvious burdens and obligations upon these countries. In addition, we found, except in some exceptional cases, that we were unable to realize projects for the sole reason that they involved excessive local costs. There is no question that at times this has been a serious impediment to the efficiency of our aid. Naturally, I am pleased with the new and significant flexibility which the foreign policy statement of our Government has provided our operations and which enables particularly CIDA to assume, in addition to a larger portion of the local costs, the responsibility for worthy projects which previously were out of the question.

In the same perspective of liberalization, Canada will take an active part this year in a study conducted on the ways to "untie" aid, which was undertaken by the Development Assistance Committee of the OECD.

The second priority is to further emphasize the multilateral assistance and participate in international initiatives designed to provide assistance on easier terms.

Honourable senators, to date the initiatives taken in favour of "untying" assistance prove that the donor countries are paying more and more attention to co-ordinated and multilateral assistance. In this area, Canada is already in very good standing. We have taken the lead in refunding and even expanding the loan fund of the International Development Association.

Our aid is more widely distributed than that of most donor countries, through international organizations. The statement of Canada's foreign policy has led us further in that direction, by setting as a goal for our multilateral aid a ratio of 25 per cent of our total aid. Canada will almost have achieved that objective next year when the third refunding of the AID will be carried out. Indeed, our contribution must be doubled, in order to remain in line with the doubling of the total amount of the fund.

Also, our participation in regional development banks should be pointed out. We have contributed to the creation of the Caribbean Development Bank. We are now striving to launch a special fund for easy term loans sponsored by the African Bank of Development. Within the framework of the Asian Development Bank and of the administration of the Inter-American Development Bank, our contributions have not been availed of as promptly as could have been wished. One reason for this is the obligation to purchase products and services from Canada tied in with the use of loans granted through these institutions.

A solution to such problems must be found. The discussions taking place on an international basis as to the best way of "untying" aid in a concerned and controlled way are approaching agreement on the so-called "Dutch formula."

I now pass on to the third priority, that of giving more impetus to aid to French-speaking Africa and Latin America.

We are given the opportunity to apply the principles I just mentioned to our most recent co-operation programs, to take more than ever into consideration in these programs the local and social factors, and to take full advantage of the new flexibility of our operations and of the liberalized conditions of our assistance. Our contribution to the development of Asia and of the African and Caribbean countries of the Commonwealth had ample time to become well thought-out programs. Of course, the new principles of international development and the new facilities at our disposal have an ideal testing ground there, but as a continuation of already well-tried methods. Besides, there are two new areas for Canadian intervention where the principles referred to can, almost immediately, confer on our co-operation programs the necessary style and character as the second decade of international development is just dawning upon us. This is one of the compelling reasons for the emphasis to be placed on our co-operation programs in French Africa and Latin America.

I am now coming to the fourth priority which is to accelerate implementation of our projects in all areas.

Of course, building assistance programs for French Africa or Latin America is one thing, but putting them in effect as rapidly as possible is a completely different proposition. This problem of rapid implementation—sometimes referred to, in a less positive way, as delay in effective use of funds—was raised more or less everywhere in the recipient countries and in various sectors of the Canadian public. In that respect, I should like to recall some facts which stand out on account of their contrasting character. First of all, it is quite clear that co-operation is a tremendously complex undertaking and that development projects entailing millions and millions of dollars are not questions to be settled overnight. In most cases, years will be needed to carry out some infrastructure project. As for food assistance, equipment and technical aid, the way is shorter between the provision of credits and their use. As for the credits and the actual expenditures, the CIDA agents who look after planning and operations worked steadily indeed with the means available to them in order to reduce to a minimum the time between the granting of the credits and the recording of the expenditures.

Now a few words on the last and fifth priority, that of stirring up interest and encouraging the participation of the Canadian people. But let us forget about dollars and figures. International development co-operation does not boil down to that, for it is based upon an ideal made up of a sharing society, of a world where people are interdependent. So Canada's input cannot be only financial and technical. It must also have a humanistic character identifying it from the start to the end. To achieve this, it is important that the Canadian people be interested and co-operate as much as possible in international development. Therefore, we must develop a state of mind, a lasting attitude rather than launching a short-range campaign with such or such objective in mind. One must admit that such an undertaking was carried out up to now without much continuity or systematic progression. And the enthusiasm or the brilliant actions of those who worked steadily so that the Canadian people may understand the international development problems will not be lessened through a mere stressing of what is left to be done. One could give excellent examples of that great popular information venture—the Miles for Millions March is a fine example of that and we had another one just a few days ago—but those are but beginnings.

A much more far-reaching and concerted effort will have to be organized if we want to ensure the interest and participation of the Canadian people. Canada has, of course, a great reservoir of know-how and experts to draw from. Moreover, the extension of our assistance programs has made many young Canadians anxious to participate personally in international development. In this connection, I would like to mention particularly the Canadian University Services Overseas (CUSO) which is certainly one of the most energetic voluntary organizations among all those which, in Canada, are working towards the social and economic promotion of the Third World. It has been my pleasure to see CUSO workers in the field, in India, two years ago, and I was very proud of them. In addition to the tasks which they accomplish for their host countries' administrations or institutions, these Canadian volunteers are creating a lasting interest and understanding between their relatives and friends in Canada and the country where they work. In addition to CUSO, about a hundred other voluntary Canadian organizations are providing, for international development in the form of various donations and voluntary services, an annual contribution totalling more than $30 million. This is impressive evidence of the support given to international development by the Canadian public and of the public support enjoyed by the international co-operation policies of the Canadian government.

This public support makes it a duty for us to find more direct and ingenious methods to inform and educate the public in the field of co-operation to international development. In my opinion, a well-informed public is essential if Canada is to succeed in its efforts to meet its responsibilities as a have-member of the international community. Non-government bodies could play a major role in creating such a public; being in contact with all the communities, large and small, of this country, they are in a remarkable position to make all levels of society aware of the problems and obligation of international development.

The second decade for international development, proclaimed by the United Nations, gives us an opportunity for further initiatives in this area.

There is a second form of Canadian participation which we need, and it is that of business and industry. Many developing countries, having in mind their colonial past, distrust foreign enterprises and run the risk of forgetting that free enterprise can bring a unique contribution to their development.

Canada is a country which is familiar with the problems created by foreign investments, a fact which can make it more understanding than others as far as certain fears are concerned. If it is conducted carefully and discriminately, private Canadian investment can help develop a new image of foreign enterprise, that is one of a partner and not of a future exploiter of developing countries. That is setting a goal which is not easy, but I believe that CIDA should seek to assist Canadian businessmen to conceive their investments in developing countries as a true partnership where profits must be fairly shared.

The need to increase the amount of private Canadian capital seems all the more obvious when one considers the objective of 1 per cent of the gross national product to be earmarked for international development. Canadian public aid will soon reach seven-tenths of 1 per cent. But there are three-tenths yet to be found, and the private sector is implicitly relied upon to produce them. Until now, the contributions of the private sector have been amongst the lowest, but it should not be so in the years to come. During its very first months of activity, the Business and Industry Division of the CIDA has experienced, indeed, a most favourable reaction to its offers of assistance in preinvestment studies, initial investigations or net return studies. These reactions make us feel that there might be a source of investments for the Third World which has not yet been tapped.

I shall end here this summary of the remarks I made in Caracas and get back to the work of the conference.

Following a debate on this matter which I just referred to, the Drafting Committee, headed by Mr. Pierre Grégoire from Luxembourg, and consisting of delegates from Australia, France, Iran, Thailand, the United Arab Republic, the United States and Yugoslavia, submitted a draft resolution which was passed by the Committee, following the addition of an amendment proposed by the Dutch group. The Committee appointed Mr. Pierre de Montesquiou (France) as the rapporteur on this matter and a copy of the draft resolution will be submitted for discussion at the Paris conference.

On the following day our Canadian colleague, Mr. Saltsman, NDP member in the House of Commons, participated in a discussion on the various approaches to vocational training in terms of employment. Rising at the end of the debate on the subject, Mr. Saltsman questioned the emphasis which other delegates had placed on the importance of manpower retraining programs. He expressed the view that in a world where capital is in short supply, capital resources could easily be wasted on retraining. He felt that priority should be given to employment and that it would be wiser to allocate limited capital resources to the development of job opportunities and leave it to plants to train their future employees on the job.

That subject was studied by the Union at a previous meeting, and national groups were required to submit relevant information and working papers to the rapporteur, Dr. Erika Wolf, of the Federal Republic of Germany. Considering that the response to the initial request had not been satisfactory, Dr. Wolf was asked to try once more to obtain this material from national groups and prepare a new report on the question for the Committee at the spring meeting of 1972.

Mr. Saltsman also took a very active part in the discussion on the item on the agenda concerning a proposal to create an emergency world inventory of food, medical supplies and so on, to assist victims of natural disasters throughout the world.

The draft resolution submitted by the delegation of the United Kingdom was used as a basis for discussion on this subject. In his remarks, Mr. Saltsman suggested that the word "inventory" be substituted for the word "stockpile", in order to better reflect the intent of the resolution that a unilateral response, in certain circumstances, should not be excluded, and that two sections of the scheme should be amended so as to provide more flexibility for constructive action.

As a drafting committee was not appointed, Mr. Saltsman had to discuss his suggestions with the rapporteur, Mr. L. Pavitt of the United Kingdom, who was not ready to change the draft resolution as presented. After consulting his Canadian colleagues, Mr. Saltsman formally submitted amendments to the original resolution.

The chairman of the Committee asked Mr. Saltsman to explain the proposed amendments, after the rapporteur had begged the Committee to reject them, first of all because the word "stockpile" was apparently a term that was accepted by the United Nations. The Canadian amendments were carried by a clear majority vote and the draft resolution to be put to the vote, without debate, at the Paris conference is now entitled in English...

[English]

> Need for a world disaster inventory of food, medical and other supplies for the emergency relief of disaster victims anywhere in the world.

Then the Educational, Scientific and Cultural Committee considered two very important subjects.

At the Spring meeting of 1970, the Canadian delegate, Mr. John Reid, and Mr. M. Szczepanski of Poland were selected as co-rapporteurs on the subject of political and cultural impact of television through satellites and the effects of mass media on the understanding and comprehension between nations, and they also drafted a report to be considered at the Spring meeting at Caracas. Two draft resolutions were submitted by Poland and the United States.

A drafting committee was selected, chaired by Mr. Reid, made up of delegates from Finland, the Federal Republic of West Germany, India, Poland, the United States and Venezuela. A subcommittee was set up consisting of Mr. Reid, Mr. J. S. Monaghan of the United States and Mr. M. Szczepanski of Poland who presented a draft resolution to the Drafting Committee.

The Drafting Committee amended the draft resolution which was then passed by the Committee and will be discussed at the Paris meeting next fall. Mr. Reid was elected as rapporteur on this matter.

Then Mr. Comeau, Progressive Conservative in the House of Commons, was our Canadian spokesman on the problems of human environment. He submitted a working paper as well as a draft resolution with regard to water pollution. A draft resolution on town-planning problems was introduced by Mr. Robert McClory of the United States. Another draft resolution was introduced by Mr. R. Said, of the United Arab Republic, recommending that a subcommittee be sent to the Stockholm Conference in 1972.

Following a general discussion, a Drafting sub-committee was appointed with Mrs. Hedwig Meerman, of the Federal Republic of West Germany, as chairman. The other members were Mr. Comeau, Mr. McClory and Mr. Said as well as delegates from Belgium, France and India.

It was afterwards decided to subdivide the question into three parts: (1) human establishments and urban environment (2) pollution of oceans by oil and (3) general organization agreements.

The resolution of the Drafting Committee was adopted as a whole and will be put to vote without debate at the Paris conference.

The Committee has chosen three rapporteurs for written reports at the Paris Conference: Mr. Comeau, Mr. Dua of Belgium and Mr. McClory of the United States.

Furthermore, this resolution will serve as the basis of a comprehensive study on the question at the next spring meeting of the Committee when the working papers and the resolutions to be submitted to the Stockholm conference will be known.

The Committee has also appointed a subcommittee which will be charged to represent the union at the Stockholm conference. The members of this committee include Mr. Comeau, Mr. André Dua from Belgium, Mr. Vaclav Skoda from Czechoslovakia, Mrs. Hedwig Meerman from the Federal Republic of West Germany, Mr. Kulgarni from India, Mr. R. Said from the United Arab Republic and Mr. Robert McClory from the United States. This subcommittee will be responsible for submitting a comprehensive resolution on this matter at the Sixtieth Interparliamentary Conference, which will be followed by a general debate in the fall of 1972.

The Committee on Non Independent Territories and Ethnical Matters studied the items on the agenda pertaining to the serious consequences for the peace and the security of certain sectors of Africa of the refusal for many years to grant independence to people under a colonial regime and also the racial discrimination policy, segregation and apartheid.

Tentative resolutions on this item were submitted by Israel, the Philippines, the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia.

During this general discussion, a delegate from Ghana proposed that the Interparliamentary Union send a delegation to South Africa in order to seek their approval for a plan devised by some African States for the calling of a meeting to discuss directly the problem with South Africa.

Mr. Saltsman made brief remarks during the debate to express his support of the Ghanaian plan as being a positive contribution toward the solution of a complex and extremely difficult, not to say explosive, problem.

A drafting committee, headed by Mr. Lorenzo Tanada, from the Philippine Islands, was set up and it included a delegate from Ghana, Israel, the United Arab Republic, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia. The draft resolution will be discussed at the Paris conference.

Honourable senators, I apologize for making this statement which I know to be too lengthy and detailed. However, I did want you to hear it because I had the opportunity, while attending for the second time a conference of the Interparliamentary Union, to see how efficient the delegation of a given country could be. I say that not because I was a member of that delegation, but because I heard it stated by several delegates to the Caracas conference. Among others, the delegate of a very important country, whose name I will not mention, told me that two delegations only had worked without respite, namely, that of Canada and Rumania.

I felt I should make this comprehensive and very lengthy report to the Senate this evening in order to point out to my colleagues and to the Canadian people, I hope, the importance of delegations at the international level and the contribution which the delegates of our country can make to international meetings.

I seize this opportunity to thank my fellow delegates at Caracas for the support, co-operation and assistance they gave me at the conference. I must add that I was very happy to work with them and I can assure this house they were a credit to our country.

CRIMINAL CODE

USE OF BREATHALYZER—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I remind the Leader of the Government that on April 5 I asked a question concerning the attitude of the Department of Justice towards the new section of the Criminal Code dealing with the use of the breathalyzer. I wonder if I may expect an answer one of these days?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as I told Senator Flynn a few days ago, I had hoped to have had word from the Minister of Justice about this matter before now so that I could have given a reply on Thursday last. I spoke to the Minister of Justice today. He told me he was preoccupied, that he is writing to me today. I hope I may be able to give some indication of the position tomorrow or on Thursday. I am sorry I do not have the reply now. I think the minister was depending on some replies from some of the provinces. These have not yet come in.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Orders 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 on the Order Paper stand. Since Order No. 3 stands also, may I say we had planned to proceed tonight on the assumption that it would go on. It may be that those senators who wish to take part desire to get further information on this bill.

With regard to Order No. 6, Senator Fergusson proposed to speak but is engaged this evening, along with other honourable senators, at a meeting of the Joint Committee on the Constitution.

I would remind honourable senators that three committees will be meeting tomorrow.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, May 13, 1971, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 13, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Crossman has been substituted for that of Mr. Prud'homme on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. St. Pierre has been substituted for that of Mr. Gibson on the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Parliamentary Restaurant.

HON. A. HAMILTON MCDONALD

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I want to say how happy I am sure we all are to have Senator McDonald back in his seat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on the operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act and on "Special Area" incentives for the month of April 1971, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, chapter 56, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69.

Copies of letters, dated May 7 and 12, 1971, addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Quebec with respect to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, 1970.

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, May 12, 1971, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952.

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John J. Connolly moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

SUSPENSION OF RULE 28 FOR BALANCE OF SESSION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 3, which provides for the suspension of a rule without notice, I move, with leave of the Senate:

> That Rule 28, whereby a senator shall not speak twice to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter, be suspended for the balance of the present session.

Honourable senators, this suggested change is a result of last night's meeting of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. It might have taken form in a report which will be coming from that committee, but that report will not be with us for another two or three weeks. As this particular motion deals with the suspension of and not an amendment to a rule, it was felt that it should be the subject of a separate substantive motion.

In the discussion last night, at which there were about 16 or 18 senators present, this particular suggestion was made by Senator Grosart. It was considered by all those present to be well taken for the reason that our debates in this chamber tend to be anything but controversial. There is frequently not more than one speaker on a subject at any given time.

As an afterthought it was mentioned by an honourable member that, because one is prevented from speaking more than once on a subject, some of our speeches tend to be a shade on the long side. It was felt that if this rule did not exist, that if a senator speaking to any question felt it was possible for him to come back at a later stage and add more observations, points or arguments to his speech, then possibly this might enliven our debates and at the same time make for fuller explanations. Moreover, it would tend to make speeches a little less lengthy. Let me hasten to add that that last point was not intended to be taken too seriously; it was simply an observation by one member of the committee.

The suggestion was very well received and it was felt that it could do nothing to detract from the quality of our debates. In fact, it was felt that there was a strong possibility it would improve our debates, and that for the remaining weeks of this session it would be a worthwhile experiment. We are not committed to the elimination of this rule. The motion is merely to suspend Rule 28 for the balance of this session. For the record perhaps I should read to honourable senators the rule in question:

> 28. A senator shall not speak twice to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

Honourable senators, I feel that this would be a worthwhile experiment, and I am happy to make the motion at this time.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 18, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

USE OF BREATHALYZER—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn some weeks ago asked through me a question of the Government regarding the use of the breathalyzer. I told him the day before yesterday that I hoped to be in a position to give him a reply. Now on behalf of the Government I can say that the Government is aware of the reported decisions on the various aspects of the "drinking and driving" amendments to the Criminal Code that were made by the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1968-69. The results which the courts have reached in these reported cases do not indicate that any amendment to the legislation is either necessary or desirable. This is also the view of the Minister of Justice with whom I had an opportunity of talking this morning.

The article in the Quebec Bar Review to which Senator Flynn referred gave particular consideration to two decisions by Judge Fortin of the Court of the Sessions of the Peace in Quebec. Neither of these cases involved a charge under section 224 of the Criminal Code which makes it a summary conviction offence for a person to drive or have care or control of a motor vehicle when his blood alcohol level exceeds 80 milligrams of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. It is not an ingredient of that offence that the Crown must prove that the ability of that particular driver to drive his vehicle was at the time impaired by alcohol.

Both cases referred to in the article involve charges under section 222 of the Criminal Code, namely, driving while impaired, and in both cases the judge, adopting the traditional view of the courts in cases of this sort, concluded that proof of the blood alcohol content of the driver, in each case exceeding 80 milligrams per 100 millilitres was not, by itself, sufficient to establish that the driver's ability was impaired by alcohol; and that the Crown must corroborate or support such evidence by adducing other evidence to show that the faculties of the accused are affected to the extent that his ability to drive is impaired.

The reliability of the Borkenstein Breathalyzer is supported by experienced forensic scientists. The police officers who are responsible for the administration of the breath tests on this machine are given the necessary training in the proper operation of the instrument and, in accordance with the legislation, may be required to attend for cross-examination by the accused or his counsel. In the course of such cross-examination, the accused or his counsel has the opportunity of eliciting evidence as to the occurrence of either human or mechanical errors.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson for second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of Bill S-17 explained, the notes in the bill are very clear and full, and Senator Benidickson's remarks were also very clear and to the point. Therefore I would like to proceed to the three subjects in the bill on which I wish to speak.

Senator Benidickson mentioned the great progress that had been made by the Bank of America, which he attributed to competition. When the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce studied the review of the Bank Act a few years ago, consideration was given to the American system of banking. I for one was quite amazed to discover that in many states branches are not allowed, with the result that often a small town will have one bank only. A man with a growing business wishing to raise a little capital to expand has only one place to go. If his chief competitor happens to be a director of that bank he can be in difficulty.

In that regard I consider our banking system to be second to none. This is pretty easy to prove. All I have to do is ask honourable senators, no matter where they come from, how many banks are within striking distance of where they live? In the Province of Quebec there are often seven chartered banks to which one may turn.

Even in a small town you often find four banks facing each other on a corner. Surely there is no place in the world where, if you have a good story to tell, you can speak to so many bank managers by walking so few steps. This great competition tends to make everything more uniform. It is almost inconceivable to imagine one bank charging a certain rate per cheque if another bank were to charge a smaller rate.

This situation does not seem to hold good in the United States. For instance, the Chase Manhattan Bank charges 10 cents per cheque plus a flat charge of 75 cents per month. To cash 10 cheques it cost $1 plus a flat charge of 75 cents, totalling $1.75. The First National City Bank charges 15 cents per cheque, but its flat rate is 25 cents. To cash 10 cheques there it cost $1.50 plus 25 cents flat charge, totalling $1.75. Since the first of April, as Senator Benidickson pointed out, the charge in all our banks has been $1.40.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): A flat rate.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: No, it is 14 cents per cheque here, which is $1.40 for 10 cheques.

Honourable senators, let us return to the uniform rate charged by our banks. How could we really in our system have one bank charge 11 cents and another 14 cents? Could you imagine how the manager of a branch of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce would feel if he had to explain to a good, sensible businessman such as Senator Isnor that his bank would charge him 14 cents per cheque if at the same time both the senator and the bank manager knew that the Bank of Nova Scotia was charging only 11 cents? We have to admit that in our system only one rate can be charged. That being the case, we should consider whether the amount charged here is excessive. In this respect I will quote a few figures in connection with the earnings of the banks.

Before doing so, however, I wish to refer to page 968 of Hansard for May 5, when Senator Benidickson spoke to this bill. He said he looked over the records for the last six years and stated that the Bank of Montreal had not increased its capital. That statement is false. On February 14, 1969, the Bank of Montreal gave its shareholders the privilege of subscribing to one new share at $12 a share for every eight shares held. The offer, of course, was successful, and in sound figures the bank sold 3,700,000 new shares and therefore increased its capital by $44 million. This year the Banque Canadienne Nationale issued $10 million worth of stock, the Royal Bank issued $75 million in notes, and the Bank of Nova Scotia issued $25 million.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is since the period I referred to.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: In the same paragraph Senator Benidickson brought to our attention the fact that the earnings of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce were $24 million in 1966 and $43 million in 1970. In a way, comparing the earnings in 1966 with the earnings in 1970 is a little like comparing apples and oranges. You will remember that in the revision of the Bank Act the big change between the old and the new acts was simply that the new act allowed the banks to write off a very much smaller amount to be held as a reserve against future losses, which therefore had the effect of making bank profits seem excessive.

Let me say this to give you an idea of what I mean. Last year the International Nickel Company earned an after tax profit of $208 million. That is exactly $35 million more than the combined after tax profits of the seven chartered banks. Last year Imperial Oil earned $105 million, which is exactly $5 million more than the combined earnings of the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Let us look at it another way. Take the $43 million earnings of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, about which Senator Benidickson referred to, and divide that profit by the bank's 1,496 branches. I was amazed when I saw that the bank earned only $29,000 on average per branch. With the going wages two good plumbers and one plumber's assistant can, if they want to work, earn $29,000 a year. I think that figure for the bank is extremely low. If the combined profits of all chartered banks is divided by the total number of their branches, the answer works out to about the same figure, $29,000 a branch. When we think of how important our banking system is, and how bad it would be for the economy if our banks began to think they did not have enough flesh on their bones and were not ready to take any risk in making loans, the result would be very bad for the economy of our country.

Senator Benidickson referred to the fact that in 1970 the Prices and Incomes Commission appealed to the banks not to increase their charges. What Senator Benidickson did not tell us was that in November 1970, for the first time in a hundred years the banks abolished what I call the exchange charge on cheques. If a senator paid a bill in Ottawa with a cheque drawn on a Toronto bank, the bank made a charge because it had to transfer the funds to Ottawa from Toronto. These exchange charges were paid by individuals and small businesses. Big businesses, big firms and corporations have always had their cheques marked "Payable at any branch of this bank in Canada", and therefore did not pay this charge.

Every now and again I do business with a general store in Frelighsburg.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Where?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Frelighsburg. The storekeeper does business with people in Cowansville, Dunham, Pigeon Hill, Bedford, and other places. He received cheques from these different people and had to pay exchange when he deposited them. Again, when he bought supplies in Montreal there was another exchange charge. The abolition of this exchange charge is very important. Not only does it save many people money, but it simplifies bookkeeping.

Last Thursday I telephoned the president of the Royal Bank and asked him how much the abolition of that exchange charge would cost the banks. He told me that in a year it would cost the banks $35 million in lost revenue. I then asked how much he calculated the increase of a couple of cents in the per cheque charge in chequing accounts would cost the customers of all the chartered banks, and he said $23 million a year. It will be appreciated from this that we are looking at a picture very different from the one Senator Benidickson painted. Compared to a year ago, the consumer is paying $12 million less a year, or $1 million a month. The $12 million a year will reduce the combined earnings of the banks, which were a mere $173 million, and I think it is a pretty handsome effort on the part of the banks to combat inflation.

I remind honourable senators that by far the biggest shareholders of our banks are the pension funds, life insurance companies and mutual funds. Invested in these institutions are the savings of all our hard working Canadians, and in great measure it is from the dividends from these shares that a lot of the funds are available to pay the pensions to which the workers will be entitled when they retire. Once it is realized that the Senate does not have to defend the consumer, because the consumer is a lot better off than he was last year, then the reason for passing this bill disappears. I ask honourable senators to join with me and vote against this amendment to the Combines Investigation Act.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY MEETINGS IN STRASBOURG, FRANCE, 1971—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 4, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Molson, calling the attention of the Senate to the debate on development co-operation at the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, in Strasbourg, France, on 26th January, 1971, and in particular to the participation therein of the delegation from the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, we are grateful to Senator Molson who, on Tuesday of last week, reported on the recent meeting of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, which was held on January 26, 1971, in Strasbourg.

Senator Molson was a member of the Canadian delegation. His report was informative. I am sure he represented Canada at that meeting with great distinction, together with two colleagues from the other place.

Senator Molson told us that the subject of the debate in which he participated had to do with the problem of aid to developing countries. On behalf of the Government, I should like to make some comments on Senator Molson's able speech and on his comments concerning a number of points which emerged at the meeting in Strasbourg, and which vitally involve the policy of the Government of Canada. Senator Molson, speaking on the problems of development assistance in relation to six points, mentioned as the first point that it was imperative that countries approach the target of 0.7 per cent of GNP as a measure of government aid, and that the target of one per cent of GNP as a measure of total annual transfers be achieved.

As Senator Molson indicated, the 1970 percentage figure of Canada's official development assistance was 0.43 per cent of GNP. It is worth nothing that this represented a considerable advance over the 1969 figure of 0.34 per cent.

In its Foreign Policy Review the Government stated, a few months ago, that it was its intention to increase the amount of funds allocated to development assistance as well as to try to increase each year, from now on, the proportion of the national income allocated to official development assistance. As part of the strategy for the second development decade, Canada accepted both the volume targets, that is, 0.7 per cent of GNP for official development assistance and one per cent of GNP for total assistance, without specifying a particular date for their achievement.

I do not believe that this was in principle inconsistent with my statement of objectives when I was Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Canada has given and is continuing to give particular priority to increases in official development assistance, which is provided on concessional terms and is directly related to developmental purposes. The review of Canadian development assistance policy undertaken in 1969-70 by my colleague Mr. Sharp, indicated, as did the report of the Commission on International Development, headed by the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson, that on the whole developing countries can utilize as much assistance as donor countries can make available if it is provided under terms and conditions which are not unduly restrictive or burdensome. Canada's development assistance program has historically been provided on very soft financial terms, both in the form of grants and long-term development loans. The Government feels that these terms will help reduce the debt burden of recipient countries and increase the real value of our assistance to them.

The flow of Canadian private capital abroad has traditionally been small, even though the private sector has played an important part in the development process. With this in mind, the Government has announced its intention to place greater emphasis on support of the activities of the private sector which contribute to international development. As one aspect of its policy in this sphere, the Government announced last year that support for non-governmental organizations engaged in international development would be increased over the next five years. This has been reflected in the significant rise in the allocations planned for the non-governmental organizations program in 1971-72. A program of investment incentives has also been launched to stimulate larger private flows by offering assistance for starter studies and feasibility surveys. The early response to this initiative from Canadian firms, who are now exploring possibilities in developing countries, has been encouraging.

The second point which Senator Molson mentioned, and on which he commented, was that a new strategy for aid should be developed, in order to deal more effectively with the problem that confronts countries like Canada which give a percentage of their treasure to assist underdeveloped lands.

The Government regards the economic and social development of the less developed countries as a primary objective of our development assistance program. Our negotiations and consultations with recipient countries for the financial support of specific projects are based on this fundamental objective.

In the last two years we have undertaken an intensive re-examination of the effectiveness of present aid policies, and a search for new ways of improving the quality and increasing the quantity of aid has taken place both within the United Nations family of organizations and among individual donor countries like our own. It may be that the strategy of the second development decade of the United Nations and the work of the Pearson Commission are two of the most far-reaching indications of the interest and energy which has been devoted to seeking new ways of achieving development goals. There have also been several studies focused on more specific areas, such as the Jackson Capacity Study on the effectiveness of the United Nations development program. I should say, by way of parenthesis, that I have examined all these reports because of my interest in these matters. I think that the Jackson report is one of the most outstanding. I strongly recommend it for the consideration of those who are interested in this subject.

National studies have included our own foreign policy review and the Peterson Commission Report in the United States. These are good signs of a time of rededication to development objectives toward which we are all striving. This is the objective that Senator Molson placed before us. I admit that much must be done to meet that objective, but at any rate the situation is not one to be characterized as official inactivity.

In the Canadian context we are concerned about the problems of redefining and redirecting our program to fit the expressed development needs of the developing countries in the 1970s. A series of measures outlined in the foreign policy review are designed to provide greater flexibility for the Canadian program to meet new challenges in international development. In a statement before the International Development Assistance Subcommittee of the Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and Defence, the president of CIDA outlined, as the agency's priorities for the 1970s, five major areas in which further advances could be made. They were: first, taking fuller account of the local and social impact of Canadian assistance. Second, placing further emphasis on multilateral assistance and co-operating in international moves to make the terms of aid more liberal. Third, putting greater impetus behind assistance to Francophone Africa and Latin America. Fourth, speeding up the progress of projects in general. This, by the way, was one of the points recommended to the Senate by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs when it made its study of Canada-Caribbean relations last year. Fifth, stimulating the interest and involvement of the Canadian people in international development.

The president emphasized the need for a broad social, as well as economic, orientation of the Canadian program, since it is widely acknowledged that the 1960s witnessed a concentration on economic development and growth rates with too little account having been taken of the social development of the people affected.

In this area the Canadian Government believes that research can make an important contribution to the establishment and achievement of realistic development objectives. Senator Molson has referred to the Government's initiative in establishing the International Development Research Centre. Through this medium Canada hopes to make a contribution to international development by applying and adapting science and technology to the needs of the less developed countries.

Everyone, he said, would no doubt agree that our motivation should be to orient assistance programs to the requirements of developing countries. The real problem, however, as I see it, has always been to translate this motivation into practice. There is an increasing recognition that the success of development efforts depends on a real partnership between developed and developing countries, to borrow Mr. Pearson's phrase, in order to achieve effective development results.

Educational assistance should be changed to emphasize the more practical and vocational training aspects of the program. There has been an increasing recognition that educational assistance in the past has been to some extent seriously and sadly misdirected because of a concentration on academic subjects. The Canadian technical assistance program for many years has included technical and vocational training, as well as academic training. It should be recalled that developing countries have seen a need to build up a structure of high schools, teacher training colleges and universities to which need Canada and other countries have responded. To have argued during the 1950s and 1960s that a newly independent country should not, say, have a university at all but should put its funds into vocational training would have been interpreted as asking them to remain second-class citizens in the world. The brightest, anyway, would probably have found their way overseas, and the result would have been to perpetuate undergraduate studies overseas, which are being reduced in favour of encouraging studies at home or in the region. On top of this, there was no doubt operating a "white collar" syndrome in which the young people of the less developed countries believed the road to personal advancement lay through obtaining academic qualifications, taking this lead from the colonial administrators they had known.

A change of attitude in the less developed countries was therefore necessary to modify this emphasis. It is now taking place, even though spottily. Canada has in turn been helping to fulfil these expressed needs. One example is the assistance Canada has given in this area since the early 1960s, for instance, to the Accra Technical Trades Training Centre in Ghana, worth nearly $2 million in buildings and technical assistance. Another illustration of this trend is seen in the increasing number of students from the less developed countries who are studying in technical and other than academic fields. About 50 per cent of the 2,600 students who studied in Canada under CIDA auspices in 1970 were in this category.

A further illustration is the fact that about 80 per cent of newly recruited Canadian educators whom CIDA will be sending to developing countries in the Caribbean and Commonwealth Africa for the academic session 1971-72 will be instructors of technical and vocational subjects.

He made the point that there should be greater multilateral aid and less bilateral aid and particularly less tied aid. Canada has been a strong supporter of the role of multilateral institutions in international development. In fact, the proportion of our multilateral aid has for some time been approximately twice that of the average for countries that come under the DAC category for examination by the OECD. In figures as a proportion of Canadian appropriations the amount given in multilateral contributions stood at 21.6 per cent in 1969-70. In line with the Foreign Policy Review, the proportion will increase in 1971-72 to approximately 25 per cent of our official development assistance. In the Canadian view, the channelling of aid through multilateral organizations presents a challenging opportunity for developed and developing countries acting co-operatively to increase the effectiveness of the whole framework of international institutions. It is for this reason that Canada participated actively in co-operation with other countries to work out ways in which the capacity of the UN system might be enhanced.

Canada recognizes that untying can make a valuable contribution to improving the quality of aid. The Foreign Policy Review addressed itself to this question, and authority was granted to CIDA to implement measures which would have the effect of untying approximately half of Canada's program of official development assistance. These measures include authority to untie 20 per cent of total bilateral allocations and to pay shipping costs, together with the channelling of up to 25 per cent of the Canadian program through multilateral institutions.

I recognize that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs had something to say about this point and made certain recommendations. As I think I indicated on an earlier occasion, the Government considered the recommendations made by that committee as well as those from other bodies. The point was made that there should be greater effort to provide tariff-free or low-tariff markets for products of developing countries.

After the United Nations Co-operation, Trade and Development Conference in New Delhi in 1968, strong moves were set in train to work out a general preference scheme by which the manufactured and semi-manufactured goods of less developed countries could enjoy a preferential entry into the markets of industrialized countries. There were problems in harmonizing the different offers made, partly because certain industrialized countries like our own had particular preference arrangements already established with a group of less developed countries within the Commonwealth. But in 1970 a first round of this exercise was concluded and Canada's offer was announced last September. It would reduce by at least one-third the tariffs on most manufactured and semi-manufactured goods that had been liable to the most-favoured-nation rate, and offer duty free access to many other such products. In addition, it would remove tariffs from a selected list of agricultural products of special interest to developing countries.

We are indebted to Senator Molson for attending this conference, for accepting an invitation to represent the Senate, together with two members from the other place. In the report he gave, he was able to convey the nature of the discussion and to raise points which were intelligently put forward and to which I have endeavoured to give some official response. Senator Molson also reminded us when he spoke that we had recently received the President of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe along with some of his colleagues. They were here in March, I think. Most of us had an opportunity at that time of meeting them and exchanging views. In fact, views were exchanged about the matters which we have been discussing today.

Canada is investing a little less than $400 million in funds to assist the underdeveloped countries of the world. This represents a considerable program. That being the case and even though it is not an objective that meets the requests or the demands of many, it is an expanding program. Nevertheless, this amount of money does impose on Parliament the obligation to know what is being done, to scrutinize what is being undertaken, to determine whether the administration of such a very important program is being conducted along lines that meet the intention of Parliament. Because he directed his mind to this important task, I should like to say to Senator Molson that we are indeed grateful to him for his report. I am happy on behalf of the Government to be able to make these responses to him.

CRIMINAL CODE (JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson moved the second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Criminal Code.

She said: Honourable senators, had it not been for the fact that during the past month I have been absent from this chamber a great deal in order to attend, in Ottawa and elsewhere, important meetings of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, I would have arranged to move second reading of this bill long before this.

Honourable senators will recall that on March 23 I explained in some detail why I believe that women should be eligible and liable for jury service on the same basis as men. As you will remember, I pointed out then that in view of head 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act, it appeared to me that the Parliament of Canada was competent to pass such legislation insofar as juries in criminal cases are concerned. I asked the Government for a reference under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act to determine if my assumption is correct that section 534(1) of the Criminal Code gives the Parliament of Canada the right to spell out the qualifications of jurors in criminal cases and also if it is correct that the section is intra vires. I further asked that an inquiry be made of the Supreme Court for a ruling as to whether it is within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada to make a provision in the code stating that women throughout Canada are eligible for jury service in criminal cases.

On March 30 Senator Martin, replying for the Government, stated he had discussed the matter with the law officers of the Crown and had learned that in their opinion Parliament could repeal section 534(1) and legislate in relation to the qualifications of jurors in criminal cases without reference to provincial legislation. Senator Martin said that on further research he had been unable to find any contrary views. On the other hand, he quoted additional authorities I had not mentioned which support this view. Under the circumstances, I did not feel that any useful purpose would be served if I insisted on having the matter referred to the Supreme Court for a ruling and I withdrew my request.

Although the competency of the Canadian Parliament to take action to make women eligible for jury service on the same basis as men would seem to be unquestionable, Senator Martin was not able to state what the future policy of the federal Government will be in this matter. He told us that it is to be placed on the agenda of the Conference of Commissioners on Uniformity of Legislation in Canada. On inquiry I find that in regard to criminal law this conference is composed of the Deputy Attorneys General of the provinces and the Deputy Attorney General of Canada, or their representatives. I understand that this conference is only advisory and has no authority whatever. I am sorry to say that on thinking this over I was not too encouraged by this information in view of the fact that sometimes a great deal of time has elapsed before any action has been taken regarding other matters which in the past have been referred to the same conference.

In his reply, Senator Martin said he presumed the purpose of putting this item on the conference agenda was to see whether there could be a joint recommendation on the policy side which might be of value to the Minister of Justice.

Honourable senators, it seems really incomprehensible that Canada's Minister of Justice should need such advice from the Attorneys General of the provinces regarding a matter over which, according to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown and other authorities, the federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction and control, and concerning which it is bound to act if it is to comply with commitments made in 1957 when Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women, and concerning which it is bound to act if it is to comply with our own Bill of Rights passed in 1960.

I am well aware that when Canada acceded to the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women, this reservation was included:

> Inasmuch as under the Canadian constitutional system legislative jurisdiction in respect of political rights is divided between the provinces and the federal Government, the Government of Canada is obliged, in acceding to this convention to make a reservation in respect of rights within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

Honourable senators, I contend that this reservation is in respect of rights which are not within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. The right to pass legislation regarding the eligibility of persons to serve on juries in a criminal case is not a right within the jurisdiction of the provinces but is a right assigned to the federal Parliament under the British North America Act, and the reservation made by Canada when she acceded to the convention does not apply to legislation over which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction. Having signed the convention, I contend that Canada is bound to act in matters over which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction.

This is a very simple bill, the sole purpose of which is to ensure that in respect of jury service in criminal cases throughout Canada women will in all respects be equal with men. I do not propose to repeat the arguments I made in this chamber on March 23, when I attempted to show that when women have acted on juries they have been recognized as being very satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: If honourable senators are interested, those arguments will be found on pages 743 and 744 of the Senate Hansard of March 23. However, when I spoke on that occasion I had intended to refer at greater length to the experience in my own Province of New Brunswick. In 1963 when the matter of jury service for women in the Northwest Territories was under discussion in this chamber, I wrote to a friend in New Brunswick, Miss Marion Stirling, who was the first woman to act as a juror in a murder trial in that province. I asked her if in view of her experience she thought there was any validity in the arguments put forward regarding jury service for women in the Northwest Territories, that women were too emotional, that having women on juries would cause great additional inconvenience and expense. In my letter to Miss Stirling I had said that I considered barring women from jury service was discrimination. She replied as follows:

> I agree with you it is discrimination against women. From my experience I found the men on the jury respected my ideas and thoughts and treated me as one of themselves.
> My emotions had nothing to do with the case and my decision was reached from the evidence presented.

> There was no inconvenience as far as living was concerned. I had my own room and was put on my honour that I would not communicate with the outside in any way. There was no need for a matron as my room was close to the others. I spent most of my waking hours with the men.

This was a case where a young boy was being tried for murder. She went on to say:

> I do know the boy's family were very pleased that I was on the jury and thanked me for serving. They said they felt I would be fair. The defence and prosecuting lawyers were also pleased and told me the juries needed women. I feel there is definitely a place for women on a jury. They are good balance and can take it as well as a man.

I agree with Miss Stirling. Honourable senators, I recommend this bill for your favourable consideration. If it receives second reading in this chamber I will ask that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I should like to ask Senator Fergusson if she has a list of the categories of people who are excluded from jury duty? I think that judges, lawyers and a certain category of people are excluded. Most women are housewives, and they might be excluded because they have other duties to perform.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I do not have the list with me, senator.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, may I, as a practicing lawyer of some 39 years' experience, say a few words?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We are always glad to hear you on any subject.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Thank you.

Unless some degree of discrimination against the fair sex can be seen in the absence of women from juries, I cannot understand why women would be anxious to sit on them. That is my sincere opinion. It has been my experience that when people are called upon to sit on juries they converge on the office of the sheriff and ask to be excused for some reason or other. The usual answer of the sheriff is that if he were to accede to all requests made on him when juries are called he would not have enough people on the panel, and perhaps not enough people to constitute a petit jury.

Allow me to tell you of some sad experiences I have had in my practice. I was fortunate—or unfortunate—some years ago in appearing in a jury trial concerning an automobile accident, where five of the 12 jurors were women. These women were very sympathetic toward my client, who was the father of a large family and who had met with a terrible accident. Surely we should not expect these people to digest within one hour a course in negligence, contributory or otherwise, which takes the usual law student three or four years to digest. The result of this was that those five women sitting on the jury used to go home at night and tell their husbands what a poor man the plaintiff was, and how disabled he would be for the rest of his days. They were going to be very generous with him.

On the third day the case ended at noon, and the newspapers were published some time between two and two-thirty. One of the women went home and told her husband they had been very generous to this poor, unfortunate man and awarded him $11,000. The husband replied, "Well, that is not what the afternoon paper says. It says that the case was dismissed, and that you allotted $11,000 to this man as the damages to which he should be entitled, but that you found no negligence on the part of the defendant." Those ladies were flabbergasted. They ran to the county court judge at Ottawa and said, "We have made a terrible mistake; we intended to give this man $11,000 and he gets nothing." The county court judge advised them that he had nothing to do with it, that the trial judge was from the Supreme Court of Ontario and had returned to Toronto.

I had to obtain affidavits from each of those people, and take them to the Court of Appeal. I was told that the court would never go beyond the deliberations of a jury or into the room where it deliberates. I took the case in forma pauperis to the Supreme Court of Canada, and again was told that that court would not even consider the affidavits.

These women said that although they were very sympathetic to this man's cause, the reason they did not find any negligence on the part of the defendant was that they knew that if he did not carry insurance at least the Government of Ontario would pay from the Unsatisfied Judgment Fund. They also said that two or three of the five women thought that if they said that that poor man, the defendant, was negligent, the police who were testifying concerning the facts of the accident would arrest him and put him in jail.

I am not putting all the blame on the women; I am just saying that most of them in their declarations showed that they had been governed by sentiment. I am against the jury system; it is archaic. Instead of women insisting that they be allowed to sit on juries, the whole system should be abolished, in both criminal and civil cases.

Those jurors made a second mistake. The judge had asked them the amount of damages they would allot, and how they would apportion the negligence. In their own minds they had decided that my client should be entitled to $22,000, but that the driver of the vehicle should be found 50 per cent negligent. Instead of telling the judge that they had assessed the damages at $22,000, which he would have apportioned to $11,000, they told him they assessed them at $11,000, and their finding of 50:50 negligence required him to halve that amount.

That is the type of irreparable damage which can be caused by jurors. I have been involved in several similar cases. I know of a juror who, during the luncheon adjournment of the court, visited the scene of the accident in question, which involved a bus. The judge had told the jury they did not have to concern themselves with the scene of the accident, or the way in which the bus had turned, and had given them directions as to what they should consider and weigh. Yet after the verdict a juror came to me and said "Boy, are you lucky that you had me on that jury. During the lunch hour I went over to see a bus turning at the scene of the accident, and found that it was a terrible place to turn."

These are some of the reasons why I am against the jury system, and why I think it should be abolished. Why women should insist on participating in such archaic institutions as juries is beyond me. It is almost suffragist to say, "This is discrimination; we want to sit on juries". I think women should stay away from them, because their duties as housewives should be given priority.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Honourable senators, I am opposed to my colleague; I am in favour of juries. The most favourable results I have had from juries have been from juries composed of men and women. Sometimes the most intelligent members of a jury panel are women. God bless them. I hope we keep them on juries.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is division in the camp. I hope that Senator Choquette and Senator Fergusson can have tea together today and compose their differences.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

NORTHERN OIL AND GAS

GOVERNMENT TRANSPORTATION STUDY URGED—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald:

That this House opposes the Trans-Alaskan pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas. (Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, we had intended to proceed with this item, but Senator Argue cannot be here because he is engaged on official business. I ask, therefore, that the order stand.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 18, 1971, at 8 p.m.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by Senator Urquhart, seconded by Senator Cook, that this bill be read the third time now. It is your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Explain. What is the hurry?

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Honourable senators, there are a few remarks which I should like to make relating to Bill C-182. That is why I thought it might be convenient if we had leave to move the third reading of the bill tonight. Then, if any honourable senator so wished he could move the adjournment of the debate and have third reading tomorrow.

Under the provisions of Bill C-182, whereby a review of statutory instruments, regulations and delegated powers will be undertaken by a committee of Parliament, we have a venture never undertaken before. Parliament is therefore breaking new ground in this respect.

It should be pointed out that under the present Regulations Act, which would be replaced by the Statutory Instruments bill—

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, may I interrupt the honourable member? He is presenting a report of a committee. We approve of that report. Is that not right?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Urquhart tabled a report of a committee, reporting without amendment the study of the bill after second reading. This is the reason I immediately asked when third reading was to take place. Senator Urquhart asked for leave that third reading take place now. Therefore, I put the question with respect to third reading and we are right now on third reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then, has he moved third reading?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, he has.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Some of us on this side said "Explain", which was to ask the honourable senator to explain why he wishes third reading before we are asked to grant leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret that I did not hear that remark from any honourable senator. Honourable Senator Urquhart now has the floor, and it may be that he would give the explanation asked for.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Mr. Speaker, I do not think Senator Urquhart has the consent of the Senate for third reading now. With respect, I think the matter has to stand until tomorrow.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, may I draw your attention to Rule 78 (4) which reads:

> When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): But that is without leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if I remember correctly, honourable Senator Urquhart asked for leave although he did not cite Rule 45(1)(b) which would apply here. That rule says:

45(1) One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

(b) for the third reading of a bill;

Perhaps this is what has caused the misunderstanding. I am not too sure as to what I should do in these circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I point out that the Senate, as well as the House of Commons, is master of its own procedures. When a senator asks leave to do something and permission is granted, notwithstanding any rule, then the situation is covered. However, if there is an objection which means that there is not unanimous consent, then third reading can take place the next day.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is the situation now.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: But, honourable senators, we did have leave for third reading. There was no objection raised.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Molson has explained that before granting leave he wanted to have an explanation.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Honourable senators, I said that there were a few comments that I should like to make and that when I had done so any honourable senator who chose to do so could adjourn the debate until tomorrow. If any honourable senator objects to third reading at this stage, then he should have made that objection when the motion was put by His Honour the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Which was done.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Which was not done.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean the motion was not put.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: The motion was put by His Honour and no one objected. I know the rules as well as any one of you. I have been in Parliament—in fact, I have been an elected member of Parliament longer than many of you.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not want to get into a fight with the honourable senator, for whom I have the greatest respect, and as far as I am concerned I am willing to give him leave.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: I do not like quibbling about nothing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not quibbling. I am saying that I would give the honourable senator leave to proceed with third reading. I am trying to untangle the situation that has arisen. His Honour said, "With leave" and Senator Molson said, "Explain". No leave was granted, and so the question was not regularly put at that time. Senator Urquhart having given his explanation, if it was not satisfactory to Senator Molson, I think that His Honour should have asked, "Is it agreed that Senator Urquhart has leave to proceed?" The question should have been put again. It was not. I suggest we now are at the stage when His Honour should ask whether you have leave to proceed with third reading. If you have not, it will not be anyone's fault; the rules are there.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In explanation of the position I took on the point of order, honourable senators, when Senator Urquhart asked for leave to proceed with third reading some of us on this side said, "Explain". The reason is that we think we have the right to ask any senator to explain why he wants to suspend the rules. It is that simple.

All I was asking was for Senator Urquhart to say why it was urgent that we suspend our rules so that we can have third reading this evening. Had he given a reason that made sense, there would have been no problem. Our rules formerly required this, and this whole matter was discussed in the Rules Committee. It is an important point, I suggest, when leave is asked, that any senator be in a position to ask why we should suspend our rules in a particular case. That is the whole point. Nobody that I know of was attempting to prevent the honourable senator from proceeding to third reading. We merely asked for an explanation as to why we should suspend our rules.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: I said that it was because I wanted to make some comments on the report of the committee. I could not speak when tabling the report because the report contained no amendments. The only time that I could speak on the report and on the bill was on third reading. That is why I asked for leave for third reading now, so that I could make my comments. Then, if any honourable senator wished, he could adjourn the debate and third reading could be given tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): The honourable Senator Molson is the only person who can give a clean-cut explanation of the situation. I heard him when he said "Explain".

Hon. Mr. Denis: Why is he the only one?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Because he is the one who said "Explain". What was in his mind? Was he asking the honourable senator to explain why he wanted third reading today or to explain the contents of the report? That is what I would like to know from the honourable Senator Molson.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I have no objection whatsoever to a motion being put to expedite the business of this chamber. However, we have rules about the way our procedure is handled, primarily to give everybody an opportunity to understand what has happened. It is perfectly true what Senator Fournier said. When I said "Explain" to Senator Urquhart I also said "What is the hurry?" I may say that I am quoting the words Senator Tom Reid of New Westminster used religiously whenever someone tried to advance a committee report to third reading.

I said "Explain" because I wanted to know from Senator Urquhart why he could not follow the rule and move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. I did not have time to pick up my bundle of bills and follow through the report of the committee he started to speak about, to see just what he was explaining. The rule is there. A report comes in on a certain bill, and before the next sitting when the matter is to be taken into consideration it is our responsibility to look at the bill and read the report and be ready to debate the matter, if we wish. The only alternative is to adjourn the debate, perfectly satisfied with what has happened but simply at the moment unable to express an intelligent opinion. I was only asking Senator Urquhart if there was any urgency why the bill had to have third reading tonight, in which case I would have been agreeable, but if not I would prefer to see it stand over to the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I would like to say that those of us at this end of the chamber did not hear Senator Molson say "Explain". I did not hear it and I was listening attentively.

The Hon. the Speaker: For future reference, it would be easier for the Chair if, when an honourable senator wishes to raise a point, as occurred in this case, or to ask a question or seek an explanation, that he rise in his place. This would assist the Chair. I must confess that in this particular case I did not hear the word "Explain". Perhaps we can now find a way of getting out of this difficulty.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Honourable senators, the easiest way out is to have third reading at the next sitting, if that will satisfy my honourable friend.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

RADIATION EMITTING DEVICES ACT

REGULATIONS—QUESTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government: What is the reason for and significance of section 3 (1) of the Regulations published in Part I of the Canada Gazette, dated May 15, 1971, by which television receivers and extra-oral dental X-ray equipment are prescribed as classes of radiation emitting devices for the purposes of the Radiation Emitting Devices Act?

Were any discussions held with the Canadian Dental Association regarding this regulation?

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I take that as notice?

[Hon. Mr. Molson.]

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by the honourable Senator Cook, seconded by the honourable Senator Urquhart, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I think the Senate is well aware of the fact that I am a director of a bank. I only mention that fact so that there can be no allegation later that I spoke without making every person aware of it. However, I feel that it does not restrict or inhibit me in any way in expressing my views on this bill. I expect to be entirely objective, but if any member of the Senate feels at the conclusion that I have been less than that, he can apply some principle of discount.

First, I wish to congratulate Senator Beaubien on the speech he made last Thursday. His was an entirely objective approach, and a very informative one. He presented in some detail the contributions of banks to our financial system.

Having said that I should like to address myself to the bill. It has two sections, the first of which, as far as I can understand by reading it, appears to be meaningless. If I ascribe some meaning to it—this is what I gather from discussions which have gone on in the press, and things that the sponsor of the bill has said in the course of his sponsorship—that meaning would be that the purpose of clause 1 is to prohibit any agreement among banks as to the amount of service charges or rates.

Having said that, let us look at the clause. I have great difficulty in trying to figure it out, but it reads:

> Paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 32 of the Combines Investigation Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the words "banking services, or".

The Combines Investigation Act is an act designed to deal with combines in restraint of trade or the lessening of competition, but its chief function is in relation to trade and articles. Indeed, in several places in the act, there is specific exclusion of certain kinds of services. The design of the act in no way fits it to deal with a question relating to banking. This is particularly so when we have a Bank Act which is the charter of each chartered bank. All the rights, obligations, authorities, and limitations in relation to the operation of a bank are contained in the Bank Act. Therefore, the logical statute in which to place a provision governing the operation of a bank, particularly in respect of service charges, would be the Bank Act. I shall have more to say on that in a moment or two, in order to show that the Bank Act does deal with certain kinds of services, and does prohibit agreement in relation to certain kinds of services.

Section 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act, which my honourable friend's bill would amend, reads:

> Every one who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with another person...
> (c) to prevent, or lessen, unduly, competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, rental, transportation or supply of an article, or in the price of insurance upon persons or property—

That is the present section. Section 1 of this bill simply proposes to add the words "banking services" and they are left there spinning in the air. Banking services in relation to what? Is it to prohibit banking services? Why, the industry and the financing of the country could not operate without banking services. There must be some additional phraseology that is intended but which is missing.

Without stressing that any further, I am assuming that what it is expected this bill will do is prohibit any agreement among the banks fixing the amount to be charged for banking services. Honourable senators will notice, too, that "banking services" is not defined. Banking services may be banking services to customers or they may be inter-banking services—banking services as between or among banks.

Having said that, I point out that my honourable friend has not shown any need for this amendment. In his remarks, he referred to an increase on April 1 of this year in certain charges for certain services rendered by banks. In that connection, the Prices and Incomes Commission issued a report in which, as might be expected, they said that prices should not be increased at this time. They suggested that what the banks should have done was to absorb the costs of these services, and apply them against the income from their main and substantial operations. But if the banks had done that, those costs would have had to be absorbed somewhere else before the cost could have been arrived at. The result of doing that might well be to make the person who does not get the service pay for it. In the course of his speech my friend asked whether the borrower or the depositor would have to pay for it, but the question that occurs to me is whether the bank should have to pay for it. And the bank gives the service. Is it to pay by charging itself for a service which costs it real money? These are questions that should be determined in approaching the merit of the criticism of the increase in charges.

The PIC, in the course of its reports, referred to what the services were in respect of which the charges were increased. There were four of them. One was personal chequing accounts. The basic service charge of 11 cents per cheque was raised to 14 cents on April 1 of this year. On current accounts the direct charge of 15 cents per debit or credit was raised to 20 cents. The per item charge of 15 cents for accepting payments by customers—those payments being made to oil companies and utilities commissions et cetera—was raised to 20 cents. The fourth service for which the charge was raised was in respect of night deposits, and the charge for the use of night deposit facilities was raised by 25 per cent.

I will just indicate where in the Report of the Prices and Income Commission can be found its determination of the costs of providing those services. The findings with respect to the various services are on page 11, 12, and 13. The report lists the cost and charge for three of these items of service, which were increased on April 1 of this year, on page 9.

As to current accounts in 1969 the cost was 18 cents per entry and the charge was 15 cents per entry. After April 1, 1971 the cost per entry in current accounts was 19 cents, while the charge was made 20 cents. Personal chequing accounts: in 1969 the cost was 20 cents per debit entry and the charge was 10 cents, which subsequently increased by one cent to 11 cents. The cost at April 1, 1971 was 21 cents and the charge was increased in total to 14 cents.

Then there is acceptance of payment. This is a particularly significant item, because it is a convenience or benefit to people who choose to go to the bank to pay telephone bills, light bills, gas bills, and so on. The bank then remits those moneys to the companies. That is a service. If the people who go to the bank for that service do not want to pay the charge they can mail their own cheques or make payments personally to the companies to whom they owe the money. I understand that the substantial part of these payments are made by way of cash payments to the banks.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I ask the honourable senator a question at this point? How did the Prices and Income Commission arrive at the bank costs for these services? Is that explained in their report?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. They compared the United States with Canada, and determined that the cost factor was about equal in the United States for such services as in Canada, and then stated at the top of page 9:

> It seems likely that, on balance, costs for the same service are broadly similar in the two countries.
> The estimated costs and charges of Canadian banks for three major service items in 1969 and 1971 (at the new rates)—

And those are the ones I have mentioned.

> —as compiled by the Canadian Bankers' Association from data provided by individual banks, are shown below. It should be stressed that these are average data subject to the various problems of measurement referred to earlier in this report

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I thought that should be in the record.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. In 1969 the cost of providing the acceptance of payments service, to people who may or may not be customers of the bank, was 33 cents per item while the charge was 15 cents. Then in 1971, when the cost was 35 cents, the charge was increased on April 1 to 20 cents.

It is quite obvious from this recital of costs and charges that even with the increases on April 1, 1971 the banks are not recovering the total cost of these particular services that they are providing. There are innumerable other services to which I shall refer later, but it is suggested that these increases in charges were unjustified, and that it was unfortunate that they should be brought in at this time. It is admitted in the PIC report that obviously bank charges have increased the same as other costs have increased, and the suggestion is that the banks should have absorbed these costs. It is an unusual twist to have the organization which provides the services and benefits, and sometimes to people who may not even be its customers, not make any charge for that service.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The banks can well afford it, can they not?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I was waiting for that. Is that the test?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: No, I think the test is collusion.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The test of economic practice and economic good sense is to consider the cost of providing a service as a factor in the price you realize for that service. The fastest way of going broke that I know of is not to charge for the things you do as a general principle. My friend has said that the banks can afford it. When I ask whose money is being spent, you may say that the banks' money is being spent. But whose money is that? It is part of the shareholders' contributions to the bank. We must also remember that the bank itself provides essential services in a financial way to the entire cross-section of the country.

Honourable senators, this might be a good time to refer you to a book written by a man by the name of Galbraith and entitled Canadian Banking (1970). At page 321 there is this:

> Aside from their activities as financial intermediaries but not unrelated to them, the banks provide and operate the basic mechanism for making payments in the country. The use of currency and deposits as the principal means of payment relies heavily on the services of the banks; so much so that the payment system of the country can be said to be based on the banks.

[Hon. Mr. Hayden.]

> A major part of the payment system depends on the arrangements established for handling the transfer of deposits.

At page 327 there is a statement to the effect that about two-thirds of all cheques handled by Canadian banks are drawn on accounts at banks other than those at the negotiating bank. Many services provided by a bank to its customers, therefore, are not provided in isolation such as those provided by the manufacturer of a product but are dependent upon the inter-relationship between that bank and the other chartered banks. And that brings me back to the question I posed at the beginning regarding the language "banking services" used in section 1 of this bill. Banking services fall broadly into two categories: one is banking services to customers, and the other is inter-bank services.

I shall move on for a moment to section 2 of the bill. Section 2, if it were passed into law, would completely inhibit and frustrate banking operations and might to some considerable extent inhibit action by the minister in ways in which he may now act in relation to the banks, and I will tell you about that in a moment. So far as the banks are concerned, in 1967 there was a revision of the Bank Act and, preceding that, there was a Royal Commission on Banking and Finance. That royal commission made a report in which it was recommended, in the interests of providing more competition among banks in relation to interest on deposits and interest or charges on loans, that agreement among the banks in relation to those items be prohibited. Accordingly, there was written into the Bank Act section 138, which prohibits any agreements among the banks in relation to interest on deposits and interest or charges on loans. Such an agreement has been made an offence, penalties are provided, and you may proceed either by way of summary conviction or indictment. But then section 138(2) of the act provides exceptions, and you will see the significance of my reference to how the functioning of the minister under section 138 would be completely inhibited by clause 2 of this bill. Section 138(2) of the Bank Act provides:

> Subsection (1) does not apply to an agreement
> (a) with respect to a deposit or loan made or payable outside Canada;

Clause 2 of the honourable senator's bill would withdraw that exception, and make any such transaction subject to this section which he proposes to have enlarged in the Combines Investigation Act.

Then section 138(2) continues:

> (b) applicable only to the dealings of two or more banks as regards a customer of such banks;

That would come under clause 2 of the honourable senator's bill. Any such agreement by two banks in relation to a customer of both banks would make the banks subject to the provisions of the amendment proposed in the honourable senator's clause 1.

Section 138(2) continues further:

> (c) with respect to a bid for or purchase, sale or underwriting of securities by banks or a group including banks;

This is one exception my friend's clause 2 preserves.

The last exception is significant:

> (2) subsection (1) does not apply to an agreement...
> (d) requested or approved by the Minister.

For instance, a few years ago, and perhaps within the last year, there was tremendous competition for cash deposits. Bidding was very strong, and the interest being offered was going up and up. The Government wanted to stop that escalating interest rate. If you look at the record I believe you will see that the Governor of the Bank of Canada made an announcement requesting the banks to fix a ceiling on the amount of interest they would pay on any cash deposits, and that was fixed at 7½ per cent. Then the attention of the Governor of the Bank of Canada was called to the provisions of section 138, under which he did not have any such power. He had to go to the Minister of Finance who was the only one who had the power, and the minister had to provide sanction by making a request to the banks that notwithstanding the prohibition against agreement to fix rates of interest, they should fix this rate of interest.

If section 2 of this bill became law the Minister of Finance would have to talk to each bank alone, and make a deal as to an interest rate. I am sure that each bank under those circumstances would say to the minister, "Now, you must put a provision in our agreement that you exact the same condition and the same rate, and make an agreement in that respect, from each of the other banks." So, my honourable friend is attempting to accomplish by long division something which section 138 of the Bank Act accomplishes directly.

May I mention another application? In providing the Wheat Board with loans, the banks get together and go to the Government to negotiate the loans and the terms and conditions, but under this bill that cannot be done. The banks could not go together in concert, or in agreement, to do that if my friend's section 2 becomes law.

May I tell honourable senators what the royal commission said about these prohibitions, and bank service charges? On page 370 of its report where it urges prohibition in respect of interest on loans and deposits—those recommendations are incorporated in the Bank Act, and this is why we have this qualification about whether the minister may request or approve—the royal commission says:

> The prohibition should also cover agreements directly affecting competition for lending business, such as agreements not to take over accounts, which banks have entered into in periods of credit restriction, and other agreements affecting the cost of loans. If these or other agreements were considered to be in the public interest at certain times, they might be undertaken with the express approval of the minister.

That is why we have this provision in section 138(2). It is so that the minister will not be hamstrung; that he "may", notwithstanding the prohibitions which apply normally in the interest of maintaining competition. When he determines in the public interest to waive or forego that, he may go to the banks and say " I request that you do this."

In relation to service charges they said:

> We have no strong views about agreements relating to banking procedures and charges for routine services. They have contributed to uniform standards of service without being used to enforce unduly high service charges, though it is not clear whether the result would be very different in the absence of the agreements.

In other words, the report is saying that whether there is an agreement or no agreement the charges most likely would follow the same pattern and we would have uniform charges for these services. My honourable friend was talking about the banks being free in the interests of competition. One bank might want to charge 14 cents per entry, and another bank might be satisfied with charging 11 cents. But how long would that situation persist? There would be no violation of any law, not even the law that my friend wants to write in. Either the one is going down to 11 cents, or the other is going up to 14 cents, and that would be done very quickly.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What about the singsongs begging you to borrow from the banks? At one time, when people needed money they could not get near the banks. Today the banks offer you a set of dishes, and singsongs over the air urging you to borrow from them. I have no sympathy for those people—none whatever.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Ordinarily when a speaker has the floor he gives way in order to answer a question. However, if my friend wants to make a speech, let him take his time and make it. In answer to his question I say: So what, if they are looking for business? If it is false advertising, proceed against them. I can tell my friend, as he knows very well, that the banking institutions serve a most useful purpose in this country. We could not get along without them. I could add more regarding advertising plans and other practices. I suppose my friend might well make the same complaint with respect to oil companies, and almost every other kind of business. However, oil companies are under restraints so far as the Combines Investigation Act is concerned. These are side issues, and only indicate a lack of recognition of the purposes, functions and responsibilities of banks.

In 1967, when this section 138 was being considered by a committee in the House of Commons, the very same composition that is now being offered was offered then. It was said that these prohibitions should appear in the Combines Investigation Act, that that was the proper place for prohibitions against agreements stifling competition. To support that, it was stated that the powers of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act were so wide and sweeping that they could function better.

Let us consider these things. First of all, the minister refused to accept any amendment transferring these prohibitions from the administration of the Bank Act. He said that the Bank Act is the statute under which they should be administered, the know-how and knowledge being in the Minister of Finance and the Inspector General of Banks. There is no know-how in the administration of the Combines Investigation Act in relation to the operation of banks. In addition, an examination of the powers of the Inspector General of Banks provided in the Bank Act will reveal that they are at least as broad for investigation as are those under the Combines Investigation Act. The Inspector General has all the authority of Part II of the Public Inquiries Act, which is the authority spelled out in the Combines Investigation Act. So here is a question that was dealt with and disposed of in 1967. It was decided that prohibitions in relation to various agreements by banks relating to their business more properly belong in the Bank Act, where the know-how exists and the administration is knowledgeable. I make the same answer to my friend now.

Honourable senators, I have taken a little longer than I intended, or should, but I have one or two other points to make. An infinite variety of services are provided by banks, and are the subject of a report of the Prices and Incomes Commission, and it can be seen how the general prohibition in relation to financial services could cut into this. For instance, at page 13 of the report reference is made to Other Services.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Are you referring to the April report?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This is the only one I know of in relation to bank service charges.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: They made one in 1970.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This is dated April 7, 1971. It states:

> Other Services—Banks provide a wide range of other services for which fees are charged. These include sales commissions on Canada Savings Bonds, service fees on mortgages, commissions on sales of bank drafts, commissions for foreign exchange transactions, fees for letters of credit, loan-standby fees, safety deposit box and other safekeeping fees, and charges to other financial institutions for serving clearing-agent functions.

So, under the heading of banking services, all these services would be gathered into the wording which my friend has used, when what he is attempting to do is to prohibit an agreement—and I will add some words—in relation to charges for banking services. What banking services? All these are earned banking services. A lot of these could not be provided without the cost being paid, because I do not know of anything which requires a bank to be an eleemosynary institution.

Senator Beaubien referred to the fact that a year ago the banks gave up service charges for handling out-of-town cheques. This Prices and Incomes Commission report assumes that these charges would produce around $32 million. Senator Beaubien's figure, which I have no reason to doubt, puts it at $45 million.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It is $35 million.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So, there are the banks in 1970 adhering to the guidelines which the Prices and Incomes Commission asked them to adhere to in 1970. They are abandoning their service charges for handling out-of-town cheques, which produced somewhere in the order of $45 million.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: The figure I said was $35 million.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Very well, we will say $35 million. There is $35 million which they forewent in 1970. It is suggested in this report that they got $32 million of that back by increasing these charges in 1971. However, the point is that they are still out a legitimate fee that they would be entitled to on handling those cheques.

As I understand it, the problem presented in the handling was such that they were prepared to abstain rather than continue to impose it. The charge on out-of-town cheques was made to the person who was presenting the cheque—that was the convenient and the easy way of dealing with it—when the person who should really pay that charge was the person who drew the cheque. So it was a misplaced item of charge, bearing on the wrong party. It did not tend to add to good will in banking operation. That was abandoned.

They have a different system in the United States. You may go into a bank in Philadelphia and present a cheque drawn on a bank in San Francisco. They will not credit the proceeds to your account right away. They have a time factor in which they hold that amount so that the cheque will have time to clear. Of course, with airplane facilities now, the clearing can be accomplished reasonably quickly. You may have to wait a day or two, in the case of a Philadelphia bank, to get clearance and have the proceeds paid to you of a cheque drawn on a bank in San Francisco.

There are different approaches to the question. It certainly is a proper element of charge. And all these other items are proper elements of charge. When my friend suggested in his remarks that the Prices and Incomes Commission said that these charges were unjustified—

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Undesirable.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You said "unjustified". At least, that is what is reported in the second column of page 968 of Hansard:

> These points are worthy of the attention of the Senate. The reason I brought this up—and it is coincidental with the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission, which states they are unjustified—

Either my friend meant that or he did not, but this is what he said and this is what is published. So, I say that the charges, on the basis of business and economics, are reasonable and proper charges. So far as the banks are concerned I am sure they would have no objection at all to a prohibition in the Bank Act against agreements among the banks in relation to service charges to customers. But it should be in the Bank Act where there is knowledge and know-how and understanding in administration.

Another false notion I should dispel at this time—and this has been in the public press and other places including even Parliament—is that it has been conveyed by inference that if an agreement in relation to these service charges is prohibited under the Combines Investigation Act, then the service charges will disappear or at least will be limited. That is 100 per cent wrong. There is nothing to prevent each and every bank, even with my friend's amendment in force, from setting its service charge, and that is the service charge that it will make for a service that it is asked to perform. There is no way under our law as it exists at this time by which any person other than the bank itself can fix what that charge shall be, except that the Minister of Finance, through his Inspector General of Banks, can have regard to the investigatory power in section 65 of the Bank Act, where it says:

> (1) The Inspector, from time to time, but not less frequently than once in each calendar year, shall make or cause to be made, such examination and inquiry into the affairs or business of the bank as he may deem to be necessary or expedient—

Under that heading, which is as broad as it could possibly be, the minister might decide that, in the circumstances at the time when certain increases in rates are established, he could send the inspector in to study the situation. Then under his authority he could say to the banks, "In my opinion this is undesirable and I request you to make a change." And the authority is there. Naturally, there is no compulsion that he can exercise, but you can imagine that when the Minister of Finance, under whose administration the Bank Act is—and all the banks are under that control—makes a request for a certain action, that request will be observed, as it always has been in the operation of banks.

This bill may have served some purpose by focusing attention on this situation, with these increases in bank charges as the focal point. The criticisms of the increases have no substance in themselves on the basis that the increases are unjustified or on the basis that the bank is not entitled to be paid for the services it renders, but they may spark something to the extent that it may now be decided that those charges should be left to the free flow of competition. You do that by putting in another prohibition in section 138 of the Bank Act, prohibiting an agreement among the banks in relation to the amount of service charges. That does not prevent the fixing of one amount as against another, subject only to the right that the minister might exercise to request the banks to change the amount, but it does prevent the banks from getting together and talking about it. There are many people in Canada who are familiar with the operations of banks and understand their operations—and I would say that the finance department and the Inspector General of Canada understand the operations very well—and they would certify publicly that the keenest competition exists among the banks and that there is a tremendous effort to secure, for one bank as against another, new business and developing business.

One other factor I wish to mention concerns the proposal in my friend's bill to apply the law of Canada abroad, to export it, to cover transactions by Canadian banks operating in the international field. This refers to where they are operating, perhaps, in a consortium in connection with international business, and where the benefits of much of that international business in which Canadian banks participate outside of Canada are very beneficial to Canada. But my friend in section 2 of this bill takes away the exception in section 138 of the Bank Act, and makes any agreement in relation to those items fall within the ambit of the appropriate section of the Combines Investigation Act. Here I am not casting any reflections on my friend because I am aware that we are in a very complicated field. But the consequences of doing this thing in the way that this bill proposes are fraught with substantial dangers to the international interests of Canada, particularly considering that the operations of Canadian banks outside Canada are very important, very profitable and very helpful to Canada in its national and international business operations.

So, to say that we are going to export our law and apply these prohibitions in that area to transactions outside Canada is an extraordinary suggestion. For these reasons I would urge upon my friend—and that is all I can do because I do not have the powers of persuasion which the minister has under section 138 of the Bank Act—that having had this discussion and whatever further discussions may follow in connection with this bill, he might feel it has focused sufficient attention on this whole situation and give it further consideration in the light of all the ramifications involved in banking operations. He might then realize the scope of the language he has used in connection with banking services and which I think he can possibly not have intended because banking services cover an infinite variety of transactions other than those which relate to and are charged to the customer. Do you realize that clearing house operations could not carry on if the banks did not get together and having banking service agreements in relation to clearing house operations? Do you realize what the situation would be in this regard if my friend's bill were to become law? I do not think he ever intended that. Perhaps when he considers these matters he will realize it is time to come in out of the weather and wait for another time.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Casgrain, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN)

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise to support the motion for second reading of this bill. I can recall no more enlightening or challenging debate recently undertaken in this chamber than the debate on this subject of jury service for women. I do not think there is much more that needs to be said in the light of what has already been said. The initiative was taken by honourable Senator Casgrain in bringing this matter to our attention, and she was followed by Senator Fergusson who introduced this bill. They both have been warmly applauded, and it is high time, I think, that Parliament should establish the principle of equality as between men and women in respect to their liability and eligibility for jury service in criminal proceedings. This is the sole purpose of the present bill. This will not be an unmixed blessing. Jury service is not only a privilege; it sometimes becomes an onerous duty.

There has been a federal "cop-out" on this matter for some years. It is true though to say on behalf of the Government that equality for women respecting jury service in both criminal and civil matters was established in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon Territory in 1963. With regard to the provinces, they have been left to their own devices by virtue of section 534 of the Criminal Code, and the result has been virtually a dog's breakfast. In some provinces women are eligible for jury service in criminal cases but are not compellable in respect of such service. In other provinces women have equality with men in this matter, and in two, Quebec and Newfoundland, women are neither eligible nor liable for jury service.

This is a strange and perhaps unique result in an area of procedure in criminal matters which, we are told by the law officers, is within the exclusive legislative competence of Parliament under head 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act.

Honourable senators, the length of neglect has not made it any less a "cop-out," nor does it in any way justify its continuance. We have the power to correct the situation, and we should exercise it and exercise it now. We are aware that the present state of affairs is in defiance of Canada's international obligations. Let me indicate what that obligation is. The United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women provides inter alia that:

> Women shall be entitled to hold public office and to exercise all public functions established by national law in equal terms with men, without any discrimination.

Can it be suggested by anyone that this excludes equality in terms of jury duty? Is this not a "public function"?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the honourable senator would permit a question, if by chance it was within provincial jurisdiction, would this treaty, signed for Canada only by the Government of Canada, bind the provinces or provincial legislatures?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not sure that it would, but I am pointing out that it is assumed that the Government speaks for the people of Canada. There are jurisdictional differences.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, over property and civil rights. It is a very difficult question.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, but it is more than that, because we are now talking about criminal as well as civil matters. The Criminal Code is federal in that respect. It may also be in contravention of the Canadian Bill of Rights. I will read that portion which it contravenes. The Canadian Bill of Rights attests without discrimination by reason of sex:

> the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;

I point out that there is no need for this to continue. Unlike Senator Hayden, who began his speech by indicating that he was a member of the board of directors of a bank and he wanted to assure us of his objectivity —and no one would question that—and that he had no special interest in speaking to the subject, I want the house to understand that I am not a card-carrying member of the Women's Lib. I do not know that I would even be eligible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Accepted.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do know, however, that women are not the weaker sex. In fact, they are the stronger sex and there is no question about their being the richer sex. The Victorian view of women as being fragile, flower-like creatures capable of fainting on demand and needing constant protection of man is long gone. Men are in fact the more fragile creatures and are in greater need of constant support than women. Even the Prime Minister has come to appreciate that biological fact.

Finally, in asking honourable senators to support this bill I remind them that justice itself is depicted outside the Supreme Court of Canada building as a woman blindfolded holding before her a set of scales. In passing this bill we can let the blindfold be slightly removed and the scales set right. I ask this house to support the bill.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Inman, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 19, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

19 May 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, May 19, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa.

RULES OF THE SENATE

LEAVE IN PRESENTING MOTIONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I gave some thought last night—after the hockey game, of course—to the discussion which took place in the chamber when an honourable senator asked leave to make a motion. I think that from now on when a motion of this kind is made with leave, I shall ascertain whether in fact leave is being granted. It is my hope that in doing so we will avoid some of the confusion which took place last night. I hope that this will meet with the approval of all honourable senators.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of an Agreement, dated May 18, 1971, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Quebec, relative to the presence of orientation officers of the Department of Immigration of Quebec in federal immigration offices outside Canada.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. Donald Smith presented Bill S-21, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Smith: If honourable senators will permit me, it would be helpful if I say that it was my original intention to seek unanimous consent of the house to have the bill placed on the Order Paper for second reading tomorrow. I had proposed to do so because I am convinced of the urgency of the matter because of the impending summer recess, which closes down our parliamentary system, and the need for getting construction of this most important railway under way during this season.

As it is now my understanding that we will not be sitting tomorrow, may I suggest that perhaps the subject could be discussed early next week when Senator Sparrow, the sponsor of the bill, may consider it appropriate to ask for consent to proceed at a faster rate in order to get the bill to committee after second reading. Thank you for your courtesy in allowing me to say that. I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Cook, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 25, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I may say before this motion is put, if I have leave again—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will put the motion, which after all is debatable, and give the honourable senator the floor immediately afterwards.

With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), it is moved by Senator Smith, seconded by Senator Cook, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 25 at 8 o'clock in the evening. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, in explanation of this motion may I point out that our Order Paper is becoming thin because the House of Commons has entered a phase in its business which does not deal directly with legislation. On the other hand, there is extreme interest in the subjects under consideration in our committees. For example, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is scheduled to meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. This adjournment of the house will present the committee with the opportunity to hear witnesses during the course of the whole day, which is the general basis for the Senate not sitting until Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

CONFEDERATION

RESULTS OF RECENT POLLS ON RIGHT OF QUEBEC TO SEPARATE

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the results of recent polls on the question of Confederation.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, it might be unusual to address you on the subject of my inquiry. However, recent national public opinion polls have indicated something which seems to be in conflict with certain opinions expressed by at least some people of the Province of Quebec. A question put to different sectors of the population of Canada—students, university people, others with only an elementary education, generally among the workers—produced information which I think should be quite interesting to honourable senators. The question asked in the poll was published in the press, but in my view it did not receive sufficient notice. These polls are usually fairly accurate and have been used by business people and by our political parties to sound out the thinking of Canadians.

The question put was this:

Should Quebec have the right to separate from Confederation?

I was so astonished by what I read that I thought I would bring it to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate.

Of those questioned, nationally 40 per cent said they thought Quebec should be allowed to separate; both in the Maritimes and in Ontario, 41 per cent thought Quebec should be allowed to separate, and in the West 40 per cent thought so. In Quebec, the controversial province in the eyes of so many, 30 per cent thought that Quebec should be allowed to separate. That shows a disparity of 10 or 11 per cent between the thinking in Quebec and the thinking in the other provinces. This upset me a little, because those of us from Quebec who are for unity in Canada, and are struggling to keep a united Canada, feel unsupported in view of this thinking. I wanted to bring this matter before the Senate with a view to hearing what opinions there might be on the matter.

The figures show that 70 per cent of Canadian university students favour giving Quebec the right to separate. Of those with elementary education, only 24 per cent are in favour of this right for Quebec. Some people did not have any opinion. In Quebec 20 per cent were without any opinion, but in Ontario the figure was only 13 per cent.

I thought this would be of interest to the house, in view of what is happening and what is reported in the press, the radio and television. I believe my Province of Quebec is still loyal to confederation, and most Quebecers are very concerned about the thinking of the few who want Quebec to separate. I do not want to prolong the discussion on this. I am just bringing it out for what it is worth, to seek enlightened opinion, to find out whether in Quebec we are that much for separatism. That is all I have to say.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I put a question to honourable Senator Desruisseaux? Does he suggest that all those who are in favour of the right of Quebecers to decide to separate, support the idea of separation or the principle of independence? To me these are very different things. I would like him to clarify his position.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I give only the facts from a recent poll, the gallup poll that was taken less than a month ago. If you are seeking my own views on this, I do not mind—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is your purpose in bringing this up?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: To show that in the Province of Quebec we may be less separatist than some people think.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: And that some other provinces may be more lenient in giving us the right to separate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not know if anyone wishes to pursue this debate, but I want to clarify my own position. I am entirely and definitely in favour of Quebec remaining within Canada. But I am in favour of self-determination where conditions exist as outlined in the Charter of the United Nations. To authorize the exercise of the principle of self-determination is something else.

I would suggest to honourable senators, and to Senator Desruisseaux in particular, that if a definite majority of Quebec should decide to secede, the rest of Canada could not oppose it. This does not mean that I support separation. That is entirely different. I am in favour of Quebec remaining in Confederation. I do not see how Quebec could live without Canada, and I do not see how Canada could live without Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: If I may add a word, I entirely agree with the views expressed by the honourable Leader of the Opposition. I believe he has reflected the thinking of the majority of people in Quebec. His views are also mine. But what I see in this is the discouragement that the Quebecer has when he fights for a united Canada but does not feel he has enough backing from other Canadians.

I did not bring this up for the purpose of debate, but to focus attention on the current thinking in Canada as to the right to self-determination, the right to separate. I believe that the great majority of Quebecers would fight against any separation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: And they would like to see their stand strongly supported by the other provinces. I do not think we can let Quebec separate, and in reality I do not think it would do so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The confusion occurs when you say, "We cannot let Quebec separate". It all depends on what you mean when you say that.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Well, let me put one other question, senator. If Quebec were to separate, who would pay the debts that Quebec could inherit?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a problem of procedure only, but we should be clear as to what we mean by the expression, "We cannot let Quebec separate". It may be a wish to convince Quebecers that they should not separate, but if they decide with a huge majority that they should do so, I do not think force could be used to prevent it. That is something else again.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Would the honourable Leader of the Opposition give the same self-determination to all the other provinces in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly not, and I shall tell you why. I do not know if the honourable senator realizes that when I refer to the charter of the United Nations I refer to something which poses some conditions for self-determination. Those conditions are that the group must be one that is characterized by geography, language and culture. In other words, it must be a kind of entity in itself. With the greatest of respect, you could not say, for example, that Prince Edward Island would constitute a distinct entity in Canada. On the other hand, I am quite sure that if there is one province in Canada that has the nature of a distinct entity it is Quebec. Whether you like it or not, that is the case. There is a majority of French-speaking Canadians in Quebec; there are borders which delimit Quebec, even if you could possibly extend these borders into New Brunswick or into the northern part of Ontario. So, from the standpoint of both geography and demography Quebec can form an entity. Those are the principles of the basis of self-determination. You have to comply with these basic principles or basic conditions, and I suggest that you have them in Quebec.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not want to enter into the full discussion that has taken place, but I want Senator Desruisseaux to know that we all recognize his interest in the unity of the country. We recognize, by the several interventions he has made, that he has displayed a commendable and dutiful interest in affirming the unity of this country and in advising us of the situation as he finds it in his native province.

As one who does not come from that province, my impression is that the efforts made by all in Canada, including those in Quebec, to preserve the unity of this country are widely recognized. My own view is that in a free society they may have all the gallup polls they wish—because that is the nature of our free society, but it is up to us to interpret the wisdom of those polls on one side or another, no matter what position we take as to their conclusions.

My own judgment, speaking as a Canadian, is that in the last provincial election in Quebec—and I am not now passing judgment on the merits of political parties in that province—the last judgment of the people of Quebec in that province overwhelmingly indicated that like the rest of the majority of the people of Canada they want to continue in Confederation. Let there be no mistake about that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Martin: And we also interpret that, as the Prime Minister said last Sunday on television, apart altogether from the divisions of political opinion, no other conclusion can be open to the tremendous support given him in his own province because of the position that he took with regard to Confederation.

I want to say that all of these diversions will not, in my judgment, alter what is and what has been and what will continue to be the overwhelming sentiment of the people of Quebec as represented by the Leader of the Opposition here today, by Senator Desruisseaux, and all of us on this side and members in the House of Commons. There is not a truly substantial body of persons in any province that does not want this country to stay united. I say that we should take advantage of discussions like this to confirm this fact, whether it be for some in the United Nations or some in a European country.

We have had our problems. I have lived practically all my life in the context of this kind of problem. It was the problem that faced Laurier when he became Prime Minister in 1896. It was that same problem that faced him in his confrontation with Henri Bourassa in 1911. The dimensions may have been different, but the issue was the same. As far as I am concerned we should not give hostage to any suggestion that there is not a strong body of opinion in Canada determined to see this country stay united from one coast to another.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If honourable senators will allow me, I will point out that I did not make a speech. I only made a few comments. I would not want to be incorrectly on record in any respect. I will not say that I agree with the Leader of the Government when he says that the last federal vote indicated that the people wanted to support Canada as opposing the position taken by my party. I will agree with the Leader of the Government when he says that Quebec, when it voted at the last federal election, indicated clearly that it was against separation. This is quite clear to my way of thinking. There is no doubt about it. Otherwise, for the rest of the comments the Leader of the Government had to make, I reserve my judgment, but again on the essential we are in perfect agreement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I think I have achieved what I wanted by having the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition express their views on this subject. I am not in disagreement, nor will I let it be interpreted in any way that I could be in disagreement with anything said by the Leader of the Government on this point. In fact, what he expressed so eloquently is what I should like to have said myself, had I his eloquence.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

TRANSLATION OF DOCUMENTS—QUESTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In doing so I do not wish to involve myself in any of the discussion that has just taken place.

As a parent of teenagers I have quite naturally been interested in the employment program provided by the federal Government, and in all sincerity I should really like to follow the various projects through. In fact, if I may transgress the rules at this stage, I shall serve notice on the Leader of the Government that at a later time I shall ask him some specific questions as to who is involved in the various employment projects. However, the thing that really disturbs me—and I am not too sure how I can put this viewpoint across because it seems that when you raise a question on bilingualism you are automatically regarded as being anti-French, and I do not accept that criticism as being valid. Nevertheless, I would like to point out—

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You see what I mean. I am automatically being labelled anti-French.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would like to know the question that the honourable gentleman wishes to ask.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think the point raised by Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) is well taken, and Senator Phillips should now, if possible, put his question. It has been our practice to be as lenient as possible in permitting an honourable senator to lay the foundations for his question, but I would appreciate it if honourable Senator Phillips would now put his question.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, in view of the suggestion—and I use the word "suggestion"—on the part of His Honour the Speaker, I am quite willing to put my question. But perhaps you will permit me to remind you that on numerous occasions I have suffered interruptions—and I mean "suffered"—from the same source. My question, honourable senators, deals with the fact that I have received a very vague document. No department is named and—

Hon. Mr. Martin: It must be one of my speeches.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That would naturally be vague.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The best form of defence is to attack.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: If it were otherwise, I would be disappointed. As I say, my question relates to the fact that I received a document which gives no trace of its origin, and I should like to know its origin. It says "Atlantic Provinces" and then underneath in French it says "Provinces d'Atlantique". My French is not too good, but I hope the interpreter has picked it up. Then the document goes on to say, "Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island". I must not forget Prince Edward Island. Then it suddenly switches from English to French, and everything concerning the Province of Quebec is in French. Now, I have no objection to this as long as I can have a translation. Therefore, my question to the Leader of the Government is this: Is there a new policy of the Government whereby as an English-speaking senator I have to go through three, four or five pages of a document which, when it deals with Quebec, is written in French when I, as a senator, am entitled to a translation? I want to emphasize and indeed to re-emphasize that this has nothing to do with being anti-French. Therefore, sir, will you provide me with a translation or an interpretation?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to look into this matter. I do not raise any question as to the manner in which the question was put lest I should be misunderstood, but I must point out that as of this moment I do not know what the document is. However, as I say, I will look into the question and I will certainly see that whatever rights Senator Phillips has are observed. I would point out, however, that under the Official Languages Act, documents are to be published in both languages.

I cannot say anything more than that at the moment, because I do not understand the question and I do not know the nature of the document to which my honourable friend has directed our attention.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I suggest that I ask a page to take the document to Senator Martin and then perhaps we can discuss it and arrange for a solution. I do not wish to be contentious but I wish to stress the fact that both languages should be recognized.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart moved the third reading of Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments.

He said: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Without leave!

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: The sponsor of the bill is the Government Leader in the Senate, but the motion for third reading stands today in my name. Therefore, I suppose the proper motion I should now make is this: Honourable senators, on behalf of the honourable Senator Martin, I move third reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, since the honourable senator said that the bill is in the name of Senator Martin, should it not be adjourned?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as far as I can see the motion was put in the regular form. It is being made on behalf of the honourable Senator Martin, as is frequently done. I should point out that I am following the motion in front of me which has been duly seconded. This motion is open for debate, and if there is no debate then I presume the motion shall carry.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, the only point I would like to make is that I would not want to miss the speech that honourable Senator Urquhart was prepared to give us last night. I am sure that it is up to date today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if there are no speakers, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE (JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN)

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Casgrain for bringing this matter of women on juries in Canada to the attention of the Senate, and also Senator Fergusson for introducing Bill S-20 which would make it legal in all provinces for women to be called to jury duty.

I propose now to give a very short history of the use of juries. The members of this chamber who are lawyers no doubt already know this bit of legal history, but other honourable senators may be interested to hear how and when the system began.

The use of juries in courts of law first came into practice in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The jury is a very old institution in British law. It was originally introduced into England by the Normans as a group of neighbours who convened to answer specific questions on oath. In those days, and for centuries after, their judgment was based on their knowledge of the persons to be tried, their circumstances, and the locality. The fundamental idea remains, and juries are now called to represent the public in courts. They are responsible for carrying out defined public duties.

The first record I can find of women jurors is in the United States of America. In that country women have served on juries for centuries, from as far back as 1656. A jury composed of women was ordered by the General Provincial Court at the session held on September 22, 1656, in a town in Maryland. The jury was composed of seven married women and four single women who tried a Judith Catchpole for the murder of her child. The court, after the indictment, ordered that a jury of able women be empanelled and to find, in their verdict, to the best of their judgment whether she, the said Judith, had ever had a child or not. The jury's verdict was one of not guilty.

The law is not necessarily a man's field. Most people, men as well as women, believe that women are peculiarly suited to deal with legal questions. After all, the subject matter of the law is human relations, which requires a lot of intuition as well as a grasp of the cold facts of a case. I might add that women are supposed to have a great deal of intuition.

There are many quite responsible people who have gone so far as to urge that juries be abolished. It would, perhaps, be better if justice were left to a full bench of judges rather than to a judge and a jury, for obvious reasons. I mentioned some of them when I spoke on the status of women. However, it seems likely that juries will be with us for a long time yet.

In large cities and sparsely populated areas such as we have in Canada, the jurors called for duty have probably never before seen or heard of the parties involved, and so they make their decisions on the basis of the evidence presented in the court. Although women make up only 5 per cent of those charged with crimes in Canada, the number involved is not really small. In 1949 over 2,000 women were involved in court cases. There are now many more, and as our population grows the numbers will continue to increase. When so much property is in the hands of women, more women are bound to be parties in civil actions, as one can see by the daily court reports, as well as being indicted for criminal offences.

In England women have been accepted for jury duty on the same basis as men since 1919, the year the Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act was passed, and they are compelled to serve on the same basis as men. British Columbia was the first Canadian province to make women eligible to sit on juries by qualifying all persons registered as voters to sit on juries. This was before 1900. One by one the other provinces amended the relevant legislation to permit women to do jury duty, the exceptions being Quebec and Newfoundland. Quebec is now in the process of amending its act to make women eligible to serve on juries in that province.

In Canada, up to the present time, women are not compelled to serve on juries. It is pretty well up to the woman herself to decide whether or not she elects to be a juror. For instance, under the present Ontario law a judge may excuse a woman from jury duty on any civil or criminal case by reason of the nature of the evidence to be given, or the issues to be tried. In Alberta, a woman has to sign a document in advance signifying her willingness. The other provinces have similar conditions regarding women called to serve on juries. In my view, this is wrong. If women wish equality they must be prepared to serve on juries on the same basis as men without expecting any special concessions, and they should be excused only for reasons that men are excused. As stated before, the law is not necessarily a man's field.

In Prince Edward Island, an act to amend the Jury Act was passed in April 1966. The amendment deleted the word "male" before the word "inhabitant". The act now reads:

> Any woman who is served with a summons and does not desire to serve as a Juror shall, within three days after the receipt of the summons by her, notify the Sheriff in writing in Form A in the Schedule that she claims exemption from service as a Juror for a period of one year from the date of the notice, and upon such a notice being given to the Sheriff the woman shall be exempt from services as a Juror for the period of one year.

I know that in Prince Edward Island it is considered by the judges and officers of the courts unsatisfactory for women to be allowed to decline to serve on juries. A judge told me that in one case 200 names were "in the hat", so to speak, many of them belonging to women, but few of the women would serve, and it was difficult to empanel a full jury.

However, some Prince Edward Island women do jury duty and one woman, Miss Iphegenzie Arsenault, was foreman of a jury. During a recent session of the supreme court, one of the cases was a particularly difficult criminal case. I asked Miss Arsenault how she felt about being chosen as foreman of the jury. She said that she approached her task with fear and trembling; that it was not easy to take the responsibility at first. There was another woman with her on the jury, but the remaining jurors were men, who were most agreeable and seemed pleased to have her as their foreman. In general, though, the women of Prince Edward Island have been very loath to accept jury duty, and in most cases refuse to sit on juries.

One of the 167 recommendations contained in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada is that women be called to jury duty in every province in Canada and in the Northwest Territories. If Bill S-20 becomes law—and I sincerely hope it will—then women must accept the responsibility of jury duty on the same basis as men, without any special concessions or consideration.

I support Bill S-20, and I hope all honourable senators will give it favourable consideration.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 4, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Martin speak now in place of Senator Langlois?

[Hon. Mrs. Inman.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I had an opportunity to say to Senator Manning earlier today that it was my intention to speak on this important subject to which he has directed the attention of the Senate. I explained to him that I would not be doing so today, because of certain aspects of Government policy which are under study. Until such time as I felt that these formulations had taken place it would be better that whatever I had to say should, in the main, be said at that time. However, I do wish to make some observations with regard to the procedural opportunities that are open to us now.

We recently had a proposal by Senator Molson, speaking on behalf of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, that Rule 28 of the Rules of the Senate be suspended for the duration of this session. Rule 28 precludes a senator from speaking more than once to a question, except in explanation. Senator Molson, in offering this suggestion on behalf of the committee, said that it was an experiment. He thought that it might provoke wider debate, and we were all inclined to agree. I merely remind honourable senators of our decision to suspend Rule 28, in the hope that it will encourage wider debate of important questions such as the one before us. That being the case, my intervention at this moment cannot be regarded as precluding me later on from speaking on this very important subject.

Honourable senators, I suggest that Senator Manning has put before us a very important subject, which should engage the attention of each one of us. There is no opportunity in the other place for a wide discussion in this matter, except in committee, but that opportunity is open to us in the Senate.

We had expected this week to receive in this very chamber representatives of the Senate of the United States and members of the House of Representatives. They were to foregather here for the purpose of discussing with their opposite numbers in the two houses of the Canadian Parliament the very matter that is involved in the inquiry of Senator Manning, namely, our relations with the United States. We greatly regret that the particular business of the Senate proposed by Senator Mansfield—who, I understand, was coming with the United States delegation—has meant that there has to be a postponement of this visit. However, those of us who were to be delegates or who have important views regarding our relationships with that country, can perhaps take advantage of Senator Manning's inquiry.

Our relations with the United States, as Senator Manning said, are vital. We have a greater volume of trade with that country than with any other country in the world. This means that the character of our relationships is complicated as well as beneficial, creating problems that are perhaps greater in number as a result than is the case with any other two countries in the world.

We have an opportunity to assess the nature of the solutions that are being offered to some of these questions. We hear discussion today all over this country. I, as one senator, feel that this must be one forum where this matter is discussed. We hear discussion of relations with the United States in the board rooms of big and small companies, in the universities, in town councils, in chambers of commerce, and in the churches. This applies also to the nature of the problem of Canadian identity, and whether we are being overwhelmed by the extent of the economic presence in this country of the United States.

Some are taking, in my judgment, strong, extreme measures to give expression to their sense of Canadian nationalism. I feel, therefore, that on this subject we have, in the next two or three weeks, an opportunity open to every one of us to express our views, so that we can give some direction to the public debate that is taking place, a debate in which provincial governments are involved. Some of these provincial governments find themselves faced with economic disparity, and have to go into the markets of the United States for financing to enable them to meet some of the problems of economic growth. The heads of those provincial governments say that as far as they are concerned there can and must be no change in the relationship between our two countries, because of the dependence, they allege, of our standard of living on capital markets outside Canada.

I share the strong view expressed by Senator Manning and Senator O'Leary that this kind of question is one on which we have a point of view to express. Speaking for the people who live in the area from which I come, the City of Windsor, which is dependent upon the operation of plants that have their genesis across the line, I am not prepared to let extreme groups argue for the adoption of policies that are not calculated to maintain the level of employment necessary for us to maintain our present standards. This does not mean to say there are not changes that must take place, or that every encouragement must not be given to a greater participation by Canadians in their own economic infrastructure. Of course there must be, and the Government is addressing itself vitally to these very problems. It is because the Government's conclusions are not yet in a form available for public attention that I have given an intimation that I propose to take part in this debate at a later date.

I commend Senator Manning for raising this subject. The Leader of the Opposition suggested this would be a good item on which to encourage the widest possible participation in a debate on this question, and I acceded to his suggestion.

I also want to express on behalf of the membership of the Senate, and on behalf of the Government, our regret that the Canadian-American meeting did not take place as scheduled. I do not know whether this means it is not to take place for another year—I do not know what the arrangements are—but I do want to emphasize that we regret the fact that Senator Mansfield and his colleagues were not able to come and take part with us in these exchanges, which I know participating senators have found so useful.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal.

An Act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof.

An Act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 25, 1971, at 8 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE (JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 19, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Criminal Code.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, during the debate initiated by Senator Casgrain, I indicated my support of the principle of this bill which would allow women to serve as jurors and eliminate long-standing discrimination.

Consequently, I have no objection whatsoever to this bill's being read a second time and referred to one of our standing committees, presumably the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Notwithstanding what I just said, I would like to make a few comments among which there will be a few reservations.

First of all, I would like to say that I have doubts that the Government will allow this bill to be passed, at least during this session. I do not believe that the Government and Parliament would act wisely in letting this bill become law right away. You appreciate that a problem of jurisdiction is involved and the Government Leader has stated the opinion of the Minister of Justice to the effect that legislating in this instance was the responsibility of the federal Parliament. I am not quarrelling with this view. However, I do note that for the past century we have had the British North America Act to guide us, that the matter has been enacted upon by provincial legislatures exclusively and that the federal Government and Parliament have carefully held aloof from it.

Of course, I think the reason is that the administration of justice is in the area of provincial jurisdiction and because of the lack of federal legislation, provincial legislatures found it convenient to stand up and legislate in this field.

There is no doubt that one may argue that the federal Parliament has jurisdiction on the grounds that those are ancillary rights under criminal law but to this day provincial authorities have dealt with jury problems under both criminal and civil law. In any case, I am sure that where civil cases are concerned, the provincial legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction.

For my part, it matters little whether the elimination of discrimination in this field against the weaker sex be the result of an initiative of the federal Parliament or of provincial legislatures. Only two provinces are involved, if I am not mistaken, Quebec and Newfoundland, and as is generally known, the Quebec National Assembly is now dealing with a bill to allow women to perform jury duty. The bill is not quite to everyone's taste and I would say it probably does not suit Senator Fergusson, the sponsor of the bill, because it still stresses certain differences on the basis of sex, allowing women to be exempted from jury duty for various reasons. I also know that the Quebec Bar Association is not happy with the bill introduced by the Quebec Minister of Justice and intends to make representations in this regard. What will happen to the bill? I suppose it will finally solve the problem in Quebec, so that only the Province of Newfoundland still has to solve it and that, I trust, will soon be achieved.

The issue of federal or provincial legislative jurisdiction, the inadequacy of the bill now before the Quebec National Assembly, the possible steps the Newfoundland government might take, are three subjects which could be discussed and examined by the committee to which the bill may be referred.

For my part, whatever the solution, provided that it is acceptable and that it solves the problem once and for all, I would be very happy. I would merely have this to say to Senator Croll, who discussed this bill at our last sitting: if the legislatures have the power to legislate as they have done up till now, it is impossible, with regard to provincial laws in this matter, to invoke the Canadian Bill of Rights adopted by this Parliament, because we know very well that it applies only to federal legislation. Should the provincial law be ultra vires, this ground could only be invoked in the courts to have such law revoked and if the bill were intra vires, then, the Canadian Bill of Rights which we adopted a few years ago, could be invoked.

In any event, I believe that the committee to which this bill will be referred will be able to do some useful work and that finally this matter will be settled. It is high time that it be so.

[English]

Mrs. Thérèse Casgrain: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has said that Newfoundland is the only province in which no steps have been taken. May I say I have here a Newfoundland bill which proposes that women also serve on juries in that province.

In regard to the Quebec bill, I know that the Bar of Quebec is not satisfied with some of its points. Many people have voiced their objections, and it is hoped that that bill will be amended to conform with the bill which Senator Fergusson has introduced here. With the efforts we are all making, I am sure that before long we will have women on juries.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Casgrain: It is so tiresome to hear these reminders that woman's place is in the home, that women are wonderful homemakers. I agree with all that, but if you say that you judge people by their peers, you cannot say, if twelve men are called upon to judge a woman who is charged with an offence, that she is being judged by her peers.

There should be men and women on juries. It is a question of finding qualified persons. This is the opinion of many people in this capital and in this Senate, and it is also the opinion of thousands in my own province.

I hope that this question will be settled soon, as it is a very necessary step to take and one for which everyone has been waiting for so long.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if honourable Senator Fergusson speaks now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I just wish to thank all those who have participated in this debate. I have expressed my opinions on the subject at some length and I do not think it necessary for me to add anything further in rebuttal. I appreciate the interest there has been, and I move second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 19, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Connolly shall speak now in place of the honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I should like to thank honourable Senator Langlois for the courtesy of allowing me to speak.

I think we are most indebted to Senator Manning for raising the issue that is set down under his name. He has pointed up with a realism born of wide experience the importance of Canada's commercial, military and cultural relations with our friend and neighbour, the United States of America. Senator Manning's discussion of the capital investment made by citizens of the United States in this country, and more particularly in his own Province of Alberta, especially in the petrochemical field, in oil and gas, was a discussion that came from a mind fully furnished. He spoke with first-hand knowledge.

As Senator Manning was speaking of the development of the oil and gas industry in this country, I could not help thinking about the situation that prevailed here during World War II when we had gasoline rationing in Canada, with all of its inconveniences to the population, and with our dependency at that time upon the United States for a supply of gasoline and oil for our cars, our tractors and all of the equipment that runs on those fuels. Never again will we have that situation in Canada, because we now have in this country a proven surplus of oil and gas that is not only adequate for our domestic requirements but is, indeed, sufficient to enable us to export considerable quantities to whatever markets those products are competitive in.

I think it fair to deduce from what Senator Manning said that the plain fact of the matter is that if it had not been for foreign capital investment, particularly that of the American major oil companies, the people of western Canada today, particularly of Alberta, might well believe they were still walking on moose pastures rather than on oil and gas fields.

There is value to the Senate in having a man like Senator Manning talk on a subject of this kind. I do regret that the media scarcely notice a speech as remarkable as this. I am surprised that the editorial writers of this country do not feel that there is food for thought for them to comment upon in the kind of view which he expressed. And what I say of Senator Manning applies also to the speeches of Senator O'Leary and Senator Cameron. Both of these gentlemen made good speeches, speeches which made good sense. The ideas they expressed were ideas which could formulate the basis of a sound policy. But there was no flamboyance, no sensationalism, and as a result there was no notice in the press.

Honourable senators, I yield to no one in my desire to see Canada control her own destiny, establish and manage her own institutions, develop her own social and cultural ethos. My hero worship was enthusiastically given to statesmen who led us down this path. As a very young man I was excited by the steps which led to the passing of the Statute of Westminster, and I have been excited, too, about the strides taken by this country since that statute was passed, and indeed largely as a result of the passing of that statute. To give you one example, it enabled the war effort which Canada put forward in the Second World War to be a Canadian achievement, not only in the military sense but in the production sense.

In the First World War the reasons given for Canada's participation were primarily summed up in the expression, "Canada at Britain's side." In the Second World War the reasons which inspired the kind of war effort we had was that Canada was fighting on the side of freedom; it was a Canadian effort, a truly Canadian effort and a full Canadian effort. Let me add that the capacity to run a war effort of that kind was not conferred by any statute of the United Kingdom; it came from a developed, sophisticated organizational technique which had come to this country. It came from the ability to use our growing wealth and our natural resources; it came from a marshalling of our economic resources, with improving skills and with managerial talent. The days of wind and water economy in this country were over. Canada had moved beyond her ancient frontiers into the modern war-torn world. Her people had matured. This was a giant step in the direction of political independance.

Let me give another example. I remember with pride the initiative taken by the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, surely one of the great jurists in our history, to make the Supreme Court of Canada our court of final resort. There were great speeches both in the House of Commons and in the Senate in the debate on the bill which accomplished that fact. I like to think of Senator Hugessen's contribution in this house. Here was a man who was proud of his British background and yet was resolutely Canadian. He was superbly knowledgeable of the high quality of British juridicial traditions. But there was no sabre rattling, no threatening as he spoke about the assertion of Canada's independence in the judicial field. There was about that speech a quiet conviction that Canada and Canadians had come into their own; they could now be masters in their own house in this field. There had been a slow, steady development and the assertion of control was a reasonable step and indeed an inevitable step, and it has turned out to be a beneficial step.

I think it fair to say that the truly significant milestones in our progress as a nation from Confederation on in all our domestic and international achievements—and there have been many—have come from reasoned, realistic preparation. Senator Crerar used to say that Canadians have an innate common sense. I say that in addition to that, Canadians have a becoming modesty, becoming to the size of their population, and they have an aversion to boastful postures. This I believe is not only true of the two dominant cultural and ethnic groups in Canada but it is also true of the many other ethnic elements of our country. In our first century no great national achievement has had its root in hysteria or in a climate of crisis or in ruthlessness or in military or political or social revolution. We have relied on a certain calm that is characteristic of our people, a serenity, a reasonableness, a quiet confidence in our ultimate great destiny and not letting ourselves obscure our larger objectives by worrying unduly about incidentals.

But in recent years our national cool appears to have been deserting us, particularly in our relations with our American neighbours. Organized groups loudly protest almost every aspect of American military strength and posture. But even Americans admit the horrible mistakes in some aspects of their foreign policy and its implementation. Vietnam is a case in point. The Calley trial is perhaps a pinpoint, but that trial showed people agonized by competing standards. What is the standard for a fighter, for a warrior, for a military man? What is the standard of human justice and right? But what about the wider policy that the Americans have been pursuing since the end of the last war? Are Canadians who are so critical of the Americans prepared to ignore the Communist threat to the west, which the American foreign policy recognized and which I submit our own foreign policy also recognized or we would not be in NATO? If there is a Communist threat to the West, either in being or apprehended, can these critical Canadians mount an alternative countervailing force, or do they think the West is worth preserving? If they do not think the West is worth preserving, then by what standards do they want to live?

I submit that they know little or no history. They forget that Americans were condemned for scuttling the League of Nations and ignoring their international responsibility between 1918 and 1938-39. They are now condemned for pouring their men and their treasure into policing a shaky world peace. The critics cannot have it both ways.

Let me give another example. After 1945 Europe was devastated. Its economic recovery was due to the industry of Europeans, but above all it was due to Marshall Aid which supplied the tools. Yet a few weeks ago, as Senator O'Leary pointed out, a delegation of European parliamentarians complained in this city that American influence was somewhat insidious. I must confess with Senator O'Leary that I too disliked this spectacle, and I thought to myself and actually said at one of the meetings, "I wonder what you were doing when Paul Hoffman was at work establishing the basis upon which the Marshall Plan worked in Europe?"

Let me give a further example. Foreign aid is avidly sought by every developing country in the world, and America has responded massively. Mistakes have probably been made, but the will to help underdeveloped countries has been generously demonstrated by the Americans. Yet what we hear from underdeveloped countries in their attitude towards this aid is, more than anything else, "Go home, Yankee!" Some day under the pressure of American public opinion, the elephant will roll over.

Hollywood, in its methods and in its mores, can be magnificent and depraved. America radio and television programs can be beamed to the lowest common denominator. They can be tedious, they can be over-commercialized. Yet at times they can be superb. In an open society, in a mixed and free economy, I ask is this not inevitable? Certainly it is true of our own institutions in the same field, for our society is also open and mixed and free.

I do not intend to repeat the views expressed by Senator Manning on the importance to Canada of foreign investment, and on the dangers inherent in making the investment climate in this country inhospitable to foreigners. We must keep our eye upon the ball. If we do, the elements of the game will fall into place.

I do not propose to repeat any of those parts of my speech of November 3 in which I discussed the commercial value to Canada of our trade and economic relations with the United States. The statistics which I recorded at that time reveal the foundation of our own economic progress. If statistics are required on the enormous amount of United States control in certain parts of our economy, I would refer honourable senators to page 22 of the report of Standing Committee of the House of Commons on External Affairs and National Defence respecting Canada and U.S. relations, which was issued about a year ago, during the second session of this Parliament.

This, however, is not the issue. It is a by-product. Without investment we would be much more underdeveloped than we are, and our standard of living would be lower. How many of our people would be prepared to accept a standard of living as low as that which would develop without the infusion of foreign capital, whether it came from the United States or any other country? We must acknowledge that over the past 50 years we have had enormously rapid economic expansion in this country. It is reasonable to say that the trigger which started it, the main catalyst which made it operate, was our involvement in foreign wars and the infusion of foreign capital into our economy. Much good has come from this expansion, but there have also been disadvantages.

I may disagree with many of the conclusions of the report of the house committee to which I have referred, but I do agree with one. It said that a negative, destructive, vindictive attitude towards the United States or to any other foreign investment in this country is dangerous and could be disastrous. I agree further that our approach to the problem of foreign investment should be a positive one. We should approach the issue with our accustomed calm. Our appraisal of the problem should be as realistic as we can make it.

I am not impressed with charges that U.S. investment abroad is motivated by imperialism on the part of the American Government, the American people or American businessmen. In the kind of economy in which they operate, and in which we want to operate, they are doing their own thing, to use the current idiom. They are doing their own thing in respect of the economies of the West. Their energy, their know-how, their technology is superior to that of any other country. Studies made by OECD have found this to be the case.

I should like to say one other thing on that point. Their operations through multilateral corporations and otherwise in foreign economies is contagious, and if we could we would do the same thing to the maximum extent possible.

Honourable senators, I think this country is fortunate in that our closest neighbour, the most powerful country in the world, also happens to be our best friend. It also happens to be the most developed country in the world. Basically, if we examine the situation carefully, we know down deep in our hearts that we are the same kind of people. The number of personal ties between us through intermarriages alone, through family relationships, is enormous. The Province of Quebec is often described as a self-contained, independent society. Yet in the United States, particularly in New England, there are over one million Americans of French-Canadian origin. In 1763 there were only 60,000 in this country.

Our professional ties are great; we have always had a demand made upon our medical people. Our scientific ties are great. Who will say that the work of our physicists, chemists, engineers, geologists, and mathematicians, does not inter-relate, correlate and supplement the work of their American counterparts? Our institutions of higher learning are mutually co-operative. I need not speak of our commercial relationships; I have already done that.

I simply conclude by saying that surely co-operation should be the watchword in our relations with our American friends, not carping, jealous criticism. Co-operation should govern the approach to Canada's relations with her southern neighbour.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith, for Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY— SECOND READING

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow moved the second reading of Bill S-21, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to grant authority to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to construct a branch line of railway a distance of approximately 62 miles. The extension is to begin at a point near Sergent, Saskatchewan, thence in a generally northerly direction to a point on the west side of the confluence of the Beaver and Dore Rivers in northern Saskatchewan.

The extended line when constructed will serve a new pulpmill which is to be built and operated by Athabaska Forest Industries Ltd. on a site approximately 160 miles north of the City of North Battleford, and approximately 60 miles north of the town of Meadow Lake.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company must come to Parliament for authority to construct this branch line because they do not have the necessary corporate powers, and section 183 of the Railway Act only permits railway companies to construct branch lines not exceeding 20 miles in length.

The estimated cost of the rail line extension is $6,500,000, of which approximately 60 per cent will be expended in the Province of Saskatchewan. The remaining 40 per cent will be made up almost entirely by the cost of materials that must be purchased outside the Province of Saskatchewan. A work force of up to 150 persons will be employed in the construction of the line.

To serve the requirements of the new pulpmill for construction and product movement the extended rail line must be completed by June 1972. Owing to the particular terrain which must be crossed and adverse weather conditions the construction of the line is expected to take one year. It is, therefore, important that parliamentary approval be given at an early date so that construction can begin towards the end of June of this year to meet the June 1972 deadline.

The only feasible and economic method of transporting the anticipated production of the new mill is by railroad. Transport other than by railroad would involve expensive multiple handling. In addition, due to lack of adequate highway access and severe winter conditions in the area, highway service would be inadequate and erratic.

Without the foresight shown by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, its optimism about the economic viability of the new mill, its faith in the future of Saskatchewan and its north, and its co-operation in the planning of the project, this very important industry for the Province of Saskatchewan would not be possible. The new pulp mill will be the largest single economic development ever in the Province of Saskatchewan. It will be the largest pulp mill in Canada and possibly the largest in North America. It will be 50 per cent larger than the Prince Albert pulp mill, which is owned and successfully operated by the same shareholders. The company is owned 70 per cent by Parsons and Whitemore of New York and 30 per cent by the Province of Saskatchewan. The capacity of the mill will be 1,400 tons per day, or 450,000 tons per year.

Construction is to begin during the month of June 1972, and will be completed about 32 months thereafter. The cost of the mill and equipment is estimated to be $117,700,000, and with start-up fees and working capital, the total cost will be $143 million. The equity capital includes $16,800,000 from Parsons and Whitemore, who own 70 per cent of the shares of the company, and $7,200,000 from the Province of Saskatchewan which owns 30 per cent of the shares. A federal Government regional incentive grant of $12 million has been approved for the project. An additional $107 million will be raised on the money markets of Canada and the United States. The estimated overall investment in the total complex is expected to be in the neighbourhood of $177 million when the additional costs of rail services, communications, roads and townsite planning are taken into consideration.

A vigorous reforestation program will be pursued by Athabaska and the Department of National Resources of the Province of Saskatchewan, which will replace as much spruce, pine and aspen as will be cut. The silviculture and harvesting methods to be employed will ensure sufficient timber to supply the mill in perpetuity.

Air and water pollution has been an ever-present problem in the pulp industry due to the extensive use of chemicals and the heavy demand for water in the pulp-making process. These problems have been taken into consideration in this new mill. The budget includes $10 million for pollution control. The newest methods of environmental protection and pollution control will be used, and these will ensure the mill will have no adverse effects on plant, animal or fish life. All federal and provincial regulations pertaining to pollution will be met or exceeded.

In terms of economic impact on Saskatchewan, the results are anticipated to be as follows: The new company will spend $15 million annually for wages in the mill and woods operation, and $1,500,000 annually for stumpage fees, education and hospitalization taxes, and other taxes to the Province of Saskatchewan. During construction an additional $2 million in education and hospitalization taxes will flow to provincial government coffers. A total of $22 million will be paid annually to contractors and others who cut and deliver wood to the mill; $4 million will be spent annually for chemicals manufactured in Saskatchewan, and a further $2 million for chemicals manufactured in Alberta and Manitoba; up to $2 million will be paid annually to the Government of Saskatchewan through its power corporation for gas; an additional $1,400,000 will be spent annually in Saskatchewan for maintenance and repair materials. The annual expenditure on the foregoing items totals $48 million. The project will employ up to 1,200 people during construction, and when in operation it will employ up to 1,250 in the mill and woods operation. Under the agreement for development, approximately 20 per cent of the employees will be citizens of Indian ancestry, many of whom have never had an opportunity for gainful employment in the past. An additional 450 to 500 jobs will be created in complementary services for the mill in the new townsite to be created, which will have an estimated population of up to 5,000 people.

Perhaps I have gone into greater detail pertaining to the mill to be served by the railroad than was necessary, but I wanted to bring to the attention of the house the great value this industry will have to the people of Saskatchewan. This value can be realized only by the extension of the rail line to serve the new mill. I cannot recommend too strongly the passage of this bill at an early date. If it receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sparrow, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

> That Rule 95, whereby a private bill originating in the Senate shall not be considered by a committee until after one week from the date of referral, be suspended with respect to the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this can be done with leave under Rule 3, but to avoid the problems we had last week, before I put the motion I should like to put this question: Is it agreed that the honourable Senator Sparrow has leave to proceed with his motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To prevent the problems we had last week, I would ask Senator Sparrow to explain why he wants leave, and to say whether all interested parties will be given notice in due course of the study of this bill in committee.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, the second reading of this bill was to have been last Thursday, but as the Senate did not sit on that day it had to be delayed until today. It is hoped that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet next Thursday morning at 11 o'clock to consider this bill. All interested parties have been notified of the hearing on that date which, of course, will have to be cancelled if the Senate does not give leave.

There is some urgency in passing the bill. I referred to this urgency in my speech on second reading, and I will elaborate on it a little further. If the pulp mill is to be built on schedule, the railway line must be completed by the end of June, 1972. The CPR estimates that it will take a full twelve months to construct the line. If that is the case, it means they would have to begin construction during the month of June, 1971—this coming month. If Parliament adjourns at the end of June and the bill has not passed through all its stages at that time, it will mean a very harmful delay to the construction of the pulp mill itself.

If any further explanation is required, I should be pleased to give it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted to the honourable Senator Sparrow to proceed with this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the honourable Senator Boucher, that Rule 95, whereby a private bill originating in the Senate shall not be considered by a committee until after one week from the date of referral, be suspended with respect to the Bill S-21, intituled: "An act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company". Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

URBAN AFFAIRS

PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Inquiries:

Hon. Andrew Thompson rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report prepared for the Minister responsible for Housing entitled: "Urban Canada: Problems and Prospects", tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 9th March, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, at the outset I know we all appreciate that academic studies which reflect scholarly analysis are often shrouded in a solemnity of heavy professional jargon. This Lithwick report is no exception. Yet it is exciting reading, hitting out at the ineptitude of government policies, with sharp jabs like those of a Joe Louis, predicting like a biblical Jeremiah about our forthcoming harsh urban plight, and pointing us upwards toward the options for a better life with all the fierce idealism of a Sir Thomas More.

Our cities are more than the magnetism of the market place. They are the fulfillment of a collective, restless, often ruthless, energy. Let us look at some of the concepts being developed in cities. Urban spines, massive concrete buildings for 100,000 people, set on platforms under two-mile long main streets—that is the design for Chicago. Another is a mile long linear city which could stretch up to 20 miles in multi-tiers above and astride the narrow ribbon of a throughway—that is a plan for New Jersey's crowded metropolitan corridor. Buckminster Fuller made a plan for cable-hung buildings suspended from a central mast.

Some of these are now more reality than dreams. I think most of us are aware, for example, of the circular city, divided into sections—for finance, shopping, even for Bohemian districts—which is the concept of the satellite city of Reston or Germantown outside Washington. This satellite town calls for rapid transit and expressways which, like spokes of a wheel from the centre of Washington, will serve a dozen similar satellites.

The search always is to divert the gluttonous appetite for space of bludgeoning cities which sprawl and skyscrape up and out from their centre cores.

One ravisher of this precious space is the automobile, which devours approximately 30 per cent of the total land area of the average city. Again the creative imagination of planners is reaching out to find better approaches by which the automobile will be moved. Some of the approaches planned are, for example, similar to the departmental store tubes that we remember, where the cash was sent from one floor to the next by a tube. These would be enormous pipelines by which people could be sucked, in their vehicles, to their destinations. Another plan calls for aircraft to fly along a controlled circuit at an altitude of less than one inch. These are some of the future transport systems being looked at.

The city is where most of our creative energy is generated. It is the mirror which reflects our diverse and expanding ambitions. It is also the focus of a disgraceful greed and inhumanity. Often one will see a place where are displayed the masterpieces of our civilization, and just a stone's throw away there will be people living in abject squalor.

I congratulate the Honourable Robert Andras, minister responsible for housing and urban affairs, for initiating this study which, he says, comprises "a comprehensive overview of Canada's urban problems and analyzes the separately known aspects of urban life in a total content as they affect each other."

[Hon. Mr. Thompson.]

I compliment Dr. Lithwick, an economist at Carleton University. His task was made formidable by the wasteland of urban research in Canada. Rather than repeat constantly my acknowledgement of his work, let me say that for the most part I intend to quote freely and verbatim from his study.

Honourable senators, at the outset I must also declare my own association, both with a planning company and with a land development company in Toronto. Prior to becoming a member of the Ontario Legislature, I would have appreciated such opportunities to learn at first hand of the problems and the challenges of the construction industry. It is a vital industry to Canada which this year may, directly or indirectly, create between 140,000 to 150,000 man years of employment through the economy.

To follow logically the procedure of declaring personal interest in this subject, I should admit to being a home owner, a car owner, and, indeed, a Canadian citizen, breathing the air and gazing at the landscape.

The implications of the Lithwick study affect every Canadian, whether he resides in the far reaches of the north or in the centre core of a major city. The viability and vitality of our cities sweep out and back in waves to reflect and create our economic, cultural and social climate.

What are Lithwick's predictions for the future growth of our cities? Only 28 years ahead, 73 per cent of all Canadians will be living in 12 major urban centres. Other forecasts suggest that up to 94 per cent of Canadians will have been drawn by the magnetism of the cities. It is suggested that Toronto will have a population of 6½ million, which amounts to an increase of 60,000 a year. Another 6⅓ million will be living in Montreal, with another 3 million residing in the dense urban corridor linking those two cities. Vancouver, which will have about 2½ million people, will be larger than either Toronto or Montreal is today. Five other centres will have grown to well over a million in population: Edmonton, Hamilton, Quebec City, Ottawa, and Winnipeg. Regina, will not grow as fast but will reach about 440,000 by the turn of the century. The same probably will apply to Halifax, an important assembly and shipping centre. To some, these predictions of bludgeoning population growth would suggest that our cities are on a suicidal course and increasingly will become scarcely fit to live in.

Lithwick concedes that we can look forward to the type of intractable situations presently facing major urban centres in the United States, but he pleads that for a number of our centres there is still time to develop urban policies. Indeed, the timing is important, because in the ensuing decades individual cities will grow to the maturity point at which they face serious urban problems. Therefore the timing provides for a staging of policies.

What are the processes which shape the urban system? The two main processes which shape the urban system as a result of expansion are housing and transportation. During the next 28 years four million housing units will be required for Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto. The traditional pastoral dream of the Canadian homeowner is to have at leat a 60-foot wide front lawn. I think this symbolizes the ranch or farm meadow of our pioneer forefathers. Taking the crude minimum estimate of past high densities, which is 6,000 persons per square mile, the housing needs of today suggest for Toronto an additional requirement of 400 to 600 square miles in land area alone. The requirement for Montreal would be approximately the same. Vancouver, on the other hand, would require between 125 and 250 square miles additional land. The heaviest demand for single family units, which are more land intensive, will be made in the next ten year because of the high proportion of young couples in the population.

What are the future needs for transportation in these urban centres? Car mileage, which accounts for 70 per cent of the total road vehicle mileage, will slightly more than double. Fifty per cent of the total vehicle mileage will also be urban.

Lithwick looked at the various proposed innovations in transportation, such as the monorail, the moving belt, and the programmed module and computerized dial-a-bus system. He claims that because of the exorbitant cost of removing the existing transportation systems, drastic changes in transportation will not take place in the major metropolitan areas. Rather the automobile, offering the independence of stopping and turning into side streets, will continue in popularity. Its low cost of operation will be an attraction for travel in the low density areas and the extreme sprawl of the cities.

In this explosive era of technological change, Lithwick's steadfast faith in the automobile could be almost foolhardy. Innovations in city living can spread like a flash fire. Two years after electric trolleys were invented in the United States 51 cities were using them.

Despite whatever are the means of transportation, the costs for main intercity arteries will be about $9 billion and for urban freeways about $15 billion during the next three decades. Land costs will soar. We need only look to New York where a public housing unit costs $30,000, or about twice what it costs in Canada. The high cost of land will ultimately necessitate tight concrete canyons in and near the cores of cities.

What of the urban problems? Those usually cited are poverty, housing costs, transportation congestion, environmental decay including pollution, social unrest, and fiscal squeeze. The emptiness of Canadian research analysis and data and the absence of any urban model caused Lithwick to suggest that our urban crisis is more an article of faith than a well-understood phenomenon. Margaret Mead, just a few years ago, spoke similarly about urban research. She said that there was more research about a South Sea island than about any American city.

Lithwick's study focused in depth on the two most currently-stressed problem areas—housing and poverty. From his findings he boldly blasted government policy for concentrating on myths. Let me start with his attack on housing. Lithwick argues that governments have tended to confuse housing wants with housing needs. He says:

> People often want a home with a garden in the same way that they want a boat or a snowmobile.

His criticism becomes pointed when he asserts that between 1961 and 1966 there was a growing number of elderly people and independent young people whose needs and wants were directed more toward multiple-unit dwellings than toward homes. He argues that during that period the public sector, particularly CMHC, was promoting the purchase and construction of single detached homes. I would be more convinced if he had shown that during that period there was a glut of such homes on the market, or that a proportion of elderly or single independent people had reluctantly bought those homes.

Another refutation of Lithwick's criticism is contained in the Toronto Telegram of Friday, May 21. The Telegram points out that between 1961 and 1969 approximately 360,000 dwelling units were built in the City of Toronto, of which all but about 400 were apartment units. The article in the Telegram goes on to stress that family residences—that is, homes—should have been available rather than apartment units.

In his study Lithwick then questions the depth of an urban housing crisis during those years. To substantiate his arguments, he points out that during that period the increase in volume of sales of new cars was 55 per cent, while the increase in housing volume was only 44 per cent. He suggests then that these statistics indicate a change of taste away from home ownership. But let me suggest that new cars could have been bought by new homeowners as well as by existing homeowners.

However, Lithwick's further arguments against government housing policies are more incisive and worrisome, in my opinion. He shows that when governments were declaring a housing crisis the percentage of crowded households, defined as those in which there are more than one person per room in a dwelling, fell steadily from 15.4 per cent in 1961 to 11.9 per cent in 1968. In his criticism Lithwick suggests that urban renewal, designed to eliminate blight, caused the removal of more homes of low income groups than have been built under public housing programs. The rehabilitation of existing homes was largely ignored. He points out that the housing policy was based on a "trickling-down" approach to providing housing for the poor. It went like this: if enough new houses were built, the better-off would move to them leaving an adequate supply of decent housing for the poor. But the study states that the richer used more space, and nothing trickled down.

The report points out that a broad program of standardized new housing does not necessarily meet the requirements of the various sections of city dwellers. For example, instead of pulling down some of the large old homes in the centres of cities, these in fact have been turned into apartments, and may serve a very useful purpose for the flow of immigrants coming into the cities.

The massive construction of public housing was also criticized for being resisted by some of the poor, because it identified them clearly. It was also criticized by those living in the surrounding wealthier neighbourhoods. Not once, according to the study, in any of the solutions has there been a concerted effort to deal with the demand side; the concern was always about supplying houses. Indeed, Lithwick suggests that if a number of the poor had in some way been given the financial means so that they themselves could choose housing, they would probably not have chosen some of the public housing projects that have been developed at such cost with the participation of the federal Government. He suggests that past governments, the Economic Council and the Hellyer Task Force on Housing all concentrated on the supply of new homes with the assumption that they would be needed and occupied and that, indeed, owning a home was the right of the Canadian citizen. He does not dismiss the importance of the supply side—and nor should we—when he points out the enormous demands for homes to be made by young people in the next decade.

Within five years $5 billion to $6 billion will be required annually to build 240,000 housing units each year. Certainly the Government cannot meet these financial demands. It also seems impossible that the traditional mortgage lenders of the private sector—the banks, the insurance companies and the mortgage companies—can do so either. It will require new financial mechanisms to attract this money. Mr. Andras, has, according to the newspapers, appointed another study group to research such proposals as a government mortgage bank, and the Real Estate Investment Trusts in the States. This latter financial vehicle may be the means by which the small investor in land development could enjoy the corporate advantages of expertise and high-level management. A superficial look at these trust companies would suggest the need in Canada for change in corporation tax and insurance laws. Certainly the present proposals of the White Paper would not provide much incentive to these small investors to invest in these trust companies if they were established.

I think that in banks and trust companies and, indeed, within a wide range of financial institutions, there must be a wealth of expertise which could make proposals about this complex challenge of financing our staggering housing needs. This should also present a challenge to the Senate.

Lithwick did not detail the supply aspect of housing. Certainly the Hellyer study previously had shown the morass of tangled housing regulations, and demonstrated the desperate need for stabilization in all factors—land, labour, material, money and taxes. Rather Lithwick stressed the present patchwork of housing policies across the nation, and then focused on the policies directed towards the nature of poverty in Canadian cities to prove their ineffectiveness. These policies, he stated, had tended to view the poor in the cities as people who could not find or hold jobs, or as people who held jobs which did not pay enough money to meet the cost of living in the city. He showed that the urban poor are, in fact, unemployable, that they are elderly and physically and mentally handicapped individuals, or single parents such as deserted wives. He asserted that these people are unable to work, and pointed out that job retraining and manpower policies may assist some of the urban poor, but do little for the overall urban poverty problem.

Lithwick stressed that the failure of public policy in dealing with urban housing and poverty is in part due to our inadequate perception of the root urban problems, and then emphasized the interdependence of urban problems. To illustrate this, housing is related to transportation and land use. These affect the urban poor, the quality of the environment and the fiscal resources of local governments, and these in turn have severe consequences for housing.

He points out that the interdevelopment between our cities reflects the total economy of our nation. The Toronto-Montreal corridor is already the home of four Canadians out of ten. It is where 64 per cent of all the cheques in Canada are cleared. Seven thousand persons travel daily between the two cities. Lithwick suggests there is more in common between the life styles and outlook of residents of separate large urban centres than between their respective adjoining rural areas. That observation could raise interesting questions about future trends in Confederation.

To worry about our cities has become a fashionable self-torture. Lithwick does not indulge in idle chatter. He zeroes in on the root of the problem, and, like most basic truths, it is simple. It is the relentless search for space.

He explains that the economic function of the city is to concentrate on a wide range of productive activities at the central point. When that space is filled, new industry is pushed further from the centre. More new industry, wanting close accessibility, bids for a central site from the present user. The price of the land goes up and the seller must then find new premises. If he finds land further out on the fringe, he bids up the price of that land.

His reallocation, when there is full employment, causes a demand for new labour. The newcomers require schools, housing and public services, and the price of land on the fringes again goes up. There is then an inflationary aspect built into the whole urban process related to this pressure for land.

Lithwick does more than describe the spiralling sprawl of cities. He analyses the types of industries which gravitate towards the centre, and the types and occupations of those residents who hold back or who are left stranded from the vast tidal wave of workers streaming out from the centre every evening. He analyses the manpower drain to the cities from and between provinces. His study predicts, somewhat glumly, government efforts toward any regional development program in areas other than on the inter-urban mainstream.

Someone once wrote that men may find God in nature, but when they look at cities they are viewing themselves. Must cities become like Burnett's The Asphalt Jungle? Aristotle held the view that people live in cities in order to live the good life. Who is responsible for shaping the image of the flourishing exciting city with its variety of options and its diversity of aesthetic and intangible values? Not those who are stranded in the centre cores.

Lithwick argues that such people do not have the necessary channels by which to articulate their desires.

To make his point he suggests that the centennial subsidies were largely for cultural centres for the urban elite.

What muscle have municipal governments? Perhaps I could read from the brief of Canada's 4,500 municipalities whose spokesman appeared before the Senate-Commons Committee on the Constitution:

> It is not unreasonable to suggest that the municipalities are now at the position in which the provinces found themselves somewhat earlier, that is, without resources for any realistic control of their own affairs in many areas of basic interest and responsibility.

That brief was a litany of 14 pages listing the oppressive 20 per cent obligation in health, welfare, education, housing, pollution and so on. Certainly the horrendous growth predictions of Lithwick will cause an epidemic of acute insomnia among city fathers from coast to coast if their meagre property tax base is not augmented.

However, there has been a shift of responsibility from municipalities upward to provincial and federal levels of government. In a mobile society this shift provides advantages. But there are also the disadvantages of remoteness and slow routine of far-away governments. What is the responsibility of provinces concerning the cities? The provinces, in the urban planning process, have to define goals, develop policies—concerning industrial location, population distribution, transportation, and national resource development, and set up institutional machinery to encourage optimum economic growth and social opportunity. Lithwick's study then examines the existing mechanisms which are set up by each province, and he analyses these from British Columbia to Newfoundland.

His examination shows that there are a variety of regional planning bodies across Canada, and individual departments of provincial governments, which influence directly the affairs of the cities. He suggests, and I quote from his study:

> What we have is a variety of institutions operating in relative isolation of all levels of government. While there is no reason to doubt the sound intention of these bodies, the net effect of such a chaotic approach has been a general failure to come to grips with the urban reality in which the nation now finds itself. As long as there are no agreed-upon goals there can be no meaningful co-ordination. Battles are bound to continue over such matters as constitutional authority and revenue needs because there is no context for these discussions. A meaningful urban policy framework can be developed only in the light of a national consensus about the problem, the objectives and the priorities.

I know that in the minds of some is the question whether the federal Government can constitutionally encroach upon the urban system.

Lithwick pointed out that the federal Government has already a major impact on our urban system. Much of this impact is unintended; rather it is in the spin-offs—I am quoting from a study—from other directed policies. Often these federal interventions in a complex urban system, with already severe problems, are more costly than is generally realized. First of all, directly, through CMHC, the federal Government has a direct urban focus. Certainly it has also in Ottawa, in the National Capital Commission. Lithwick cites other government agencies which have an effect on the cities: the National Harbours Board, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, the CNR, the Department of Transport, and the immigration and migration policy of the manpower and regional expansion programs.

Even the presence of various federal agencies in urban centres is enormous. Let me just give you some idea of the size of that presence: Halifax has a 10,000-employee payroll of $4⅓ million; Montreal has 21,674 employees with a payroll of $9½ million; Toronto has 17,000 employees with $7½ million payroll, and Vancouver has 10,000 employees with a payroll of $2½ million. Do not forget there are 27 federal departments and agencies operating scores of programs. They all have an impact on the urban scene. In addition, another aspect sometimes overlooked with respect to federal presence in cities is the taxes, or the grants in lieu of taxes for the federal landholdings and office space in the very hearts of cities. So there is already a federal presence which has a great influence on the shaping of our urban system.

Having described the challenge, the enormous bludgeon effect which will take place in the next three decades across Canada in our urban centres, and having pointed out some of the problems, Lithwick then asks what are the choices for us? He takes, first of all, one option. He suggests that we could cut off immigration, stop the flow from the rural areas into the cities. However, I am sure that he suggests this with tongue in cheek, because that is not a pattern which any government in Canada would permit. Then should we allow the unrestrained growth to continue across Canada? The Honourable Robert Andras answered this as follows, and I quote from the Globe and Mail editorial of Friday, May 21:

> It would be disastrous ... for a nation that is already sufficiently divided by geography to be further balkanized into a few giant city-states with their own surrounding agribusiness and industrial supporting lands—and with the rest of Canada existing in a kind of welfare-supported rustic poverty. That way lies the collapse of what we know as Canada. That is the way that, if current patterns are left to themselves, Canada is going.

Lithwick makes three suggestions concerning an approach to managing urban growth. First is a limiting of sprawl at the pressure points. The second is assisting growth where viable. Third is developing new communities. He emphasizes that the development of new community does not mean a dormitory city or a completely new city. It would be, rather, developing a community which would be integrated and yet be outside the urban stream.

Lithwick in his study has outlined a proposed framework by which to develop a national urban policy. That framework would be a forum where the interests of the various groups involved in an urban policy would be presented and where feasible plans would be drawn up. Assisting that forum would be an urban research institute. Local interests and the unique role of the provinces would have to be recognized. The minister already had a tri-level meeting in Winnipeg during April to consider the formation of such a body.

Lithwick's study purposely does not prescribe a set of urban goals with a clear blueprint for the good life in the future. Peter the Great suffered no such inhibitions when building St. Petersburg. I presume that neither did George Hausman, backed by Napoleon III, when he redesigned and rebuilt Paris. However, Lithwick states emphatically that there is no way "experts" should be asked to, or indeed entrusted to, program a whole future life style for Canadians. That is up to Canadians themselves. Canadians must themselves have an image of the good city in their own minds before they can build it. Lithwick's study, 260-odd pages—

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I said 200 pages, dispense.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: This study provided a framework within which a discussion of our choices for a better city could be made clearer.

I suggest that we in the Senate, as well as other representatives of the public and also the public itself, owe this man great gratitude for what he has done to start a dialogue on the centres in which we and future generations of Canadians will live.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, the honourable Senator Thompson has initiated a useful debate, and I am fully expecting that, so encouraged, not only Senator Desruisseaux but Senator Choquette will take part in the debate. Perhaps Senator Beaubien, who is conferring with him tonight, ought to do the same.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Press Release issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, dated May 26, 1971, respecting the Drug Quality Assurance Program, together with copies of a statement thereon by the Minister.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

Page 2: Strike out lines 31 and 32 and substitute therefor the following:

"provisions of this Act that are applicable".

Page 6: Strike out lines 27 to 33, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"product, the Minister shall seek the advice of at least one organization in Canada of consumers and one organization of dealers in that prepackaged product or class of prepackaged product and may seek the advice of the Standards Council of Canada or any organization in Canada engaged in standards formulation."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(c), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable Senator Hayden leave to proceed with the adoption of the report now? Is leave given?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, as you know, two amendments were made to this bill in committee. Considerable evidence was heard, many representations were made, and a critical study was given of the bill.

The first amendment reflects the well-known attitude of the Senate, extending over a number of years, that it will not approve of legislation where power is given by regulation to change a particular bill or to change existing provisions in existing law.

Such a situation occurred in clause 3(1). We simply amended it so that we would not give authority to legislate by regulation, reserving to Parliament the right to legislate in relation to amendments or changes or additions to the law.

There were many requests from organizations in connection with clause 11 dealing with undue proliferation of sizes of containers. Power was being given to the minister to study the situation and to make recommendations regarding regulations, and power to the Governor in Council to approve those regulations. The dealer organizations—"dealer" including manufacturers, producers, et cetera—thought that there should be a right, not just a discretion, for consultation with the minister at the stage when these matters are under consideration. We therefore amended clause 11(2) to make it mandatory that the minister must consult with organizations of dealers and of consumers. In this way they have the opportunity to present their viewpoints to the minister. It is not a matter in which in his discretion he may or may not consult them.

The form or language of the amendments as contained in the report is that submitted by the minister when he appeared before the committee.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon Mr. Hayden moved that the bill, as amended, be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NEED FOR A REASSESSMENT OF CANADA'S POSITION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Stanbury shall speak now instead of the honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: Honourable senators, a number of senators have already spoken in the debate initiated by the Honourable E. C. Manning with respect to Canada-United States relations. In spite of the warmth of our friendship with the people of the United States, which has been referred to by so many of the speakers, our relationship with our strong neighbour has been a matter of concern in Canada ever since the American Revolution. Every so often this has burst into a frenzy of public debate, with slogans anywhere from "No truck nor trade with the Yankees" to those of the present-day Committee for an Independent Canada. Our debate is a small, though I believe important, part of the public debate that has been going on intensively since Walter Gordon's first budget in 1963.

Naturally the debate has ranged from one extreme to the other. There are those alarmists who would say we are in danger of being taken over by the United States economically and politically tomorrow. On the other hand, there are alarmists who say that anything we do to establish our identity or our independence from the United States is unfair, immoral and dangerous. As is so frequently the case, it is the course of moderation that has rationality and reason to support it.

The fact is that Canada cannot be independent of the United States, because the United States is so dependent upon us. They must defend themselves, and to do so adequately they must have our co-operation. They must have an adequate supply of natural resources, and Canada is seen by them as the natural and most secure reservoir of material and resources on the North American continent. Here, too, they need our co-operation. They pay for our co-operation in defence by saving us defence costs of our own, and by pumping dollars into our economy through government and personnel expenditures. They pay for the natural resources by providing capital for their development, and by exchanging dollars for the products themselves. Those are about the only needs the Americans have that require our co-operation.

We, on the other hand, have needs from them. They include defence, technology and capital. We pay for those to some extent in dollars, and to some extent in the intangible feeling or recognition that our neighbour is bigger than we are, and because he is bigger we feel a natural sense of domination. My own philosophy is that none of these things means that we will eventually or inevitably become a part of the United States, as some people blithely predict. Of course, we know that "eventually" could be tomorrow, if the Americans decided that for military or resource purposes it was necessary for them to walk into Canada. On the other hand, "eventually" may be never, if we look upon things realistically and deal with them in that vein.

By "realistically" I mean that while Canadians may be prepared to make very substantial changes in attitudes and priorities in expenditures, it is most likely that we will continue to be bound together in terms of defence, and we will continue to be an integrated part of the North American community.

We are presently not prepared to give up either our standard of living or American technology and entertainment to change the situation and our investment priorities are such that we are dependent upon American capital to develop our resources and maintain our standard of living.

None of these things are immutable or unchangeable. I have just come home from Iran, which for much of its history has been dominated by one country or another. Just ten years ago they decided that they were not going to submit to domination by anyone in future. They began to develop friendly relationsips with all of their neighbours and indeed with many of the nations of the world, including Canada. Now they believe that aggression by any one nation would be opposed by all their other friends, and so their security lies in the friendship of many nations rather than in the patronage of one. A similar change of attitude in Canada might sometime mean that we would not feel ourselves so militarily dependent upon the United States.

We might eventually develop a commitment in Canadians to Canada, to a Canadian way of life, to a Canadian identity, to a Canadian culture, so that we will no longer feel that sense of domination which now rankles to some extent and prejudices our relationship with the Americans.

I think this has begun to happen, particularly since our centennial in 1967, and particularly since English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians have become more genuinely aware and concerned with each other's attitudes and more determined to build a country of our own.

While we have been dependent upon American capital to develop our resources, it is now clear that there is sufficient capital formation in Canada to fulfil our capital needs. The deficiency is in our financial institutions and our characteristic attitudes. We can perhaps do without American capital if Canadians are prepared to accept the formula and the regulations necessary to fulfil it—to see that Canadian capital goes into the areas where it is needed for national growth.

So I have used the word "realities" in terms of present conditions and present attitudes. I would not for a moment suggest that we can or should do nothing to change the situation if there is a national consensus to do so. But there are real obstacles in the way of such a consensus. While there is a general resentment of American domination, there is also the unwillingness to accept the consequences of specific programs to reduce that dominance.

We have a guilt complex which we have developed through our acceptance of the best of both worlds, particularly during the past ten years. We have been able to stay out of American wars and remain aloof from most of the American social upheaval. And yet we in Canada get the benefits of living adjacent to the American technology, economy, entertainment, and so on.

But in these dilemmas we are no different from other countries of the world. Any medium or smaller power in the world usually has much worse problems in its relationship with a major neighbour. There is nothing more hypocritical about our acceptance of the best of both worlds than there is about any of the inconsistencies in the positions of other nations, or for that matter, of individuals. We are all hypocrites in the happy sense that we see no particular need to be consistent and we have great ability to rationalize our actions.

The present situation could probably go on forever quite happily as long as we recognize the legitimate needs of the Americans and are prepared to accept the natural consequences both good and bad. And that sounds to me very much like the formula which is being proposed by Senator Manning.

The difficulty is that Canadians in all provinces have apparently decided that they are not prepared to leave matters as they are or as they may become through an extension of the present trend. They have decided that they want to do something. But they differ greatly on the things they want to do. People in provinces like that of Senator Manning's, with their vast capital needs, are shocked at the suggestion that the flow of capital from sources which have become traditional be cut off. They think that is what the argument is all about. A province like Quebec, which has just begun to recognize its needs for capital, is shocked at the thought that the sources which have meant prosperity to other sections of Canada should now be denied to them. They think that that is what the argument is all about. The Waffle Group, who have found economic nationalism a useful emotional issue to pave the road towards the destruction of capitalism, think that that is what the argument is all about.

But all these arguments are divisive, unnecessary, unhelpful and in the total context ridiculous. The only objective upon which anyone has a mandate from the Canadian people is to build a viable Canada, earning the pride and respect of its own people from coast to coast and winning the intercourse of friendship and trade with those abroad.

John Diefenbaker had exactly the right idea with his "Vision of the North." The only trouble was that he was not able to put a skeleton into the plasma of his vision. Our present policy on the Arctic is one of the most constructive things that have been done for Canadian unity, because all Canadians have a piece of the Arctic immediately to their north, and they all see the Arctic as something that belongs to them in common. It is well worth the money we are spending and the relationships we are developing to become Arctic experts if it has a part in developing that sense of Canadian pride.

There are other areas where we could become pre-eminent and develop a sense of accomplishment. Communications is one. We have history to point to in the invention of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell, and a folk custom in the fact that Canadians use the telephone more than any other people in the world. We have the modern fact that cable television has a very much higher percentage of penetration of Canadian homes now than it has anywhere else in the world. In the immediate future we shall have a satellite which will multiply our means of communication. We have maintained control over the electronic means of communication and in general we can be pre-eminent in that field.

If Mr. Diefenbaker had not destroyed the Avro Arrow we could probably have been pre-eminent in air and space travel by now. There are undoubtedly parts of that industry in which we still have a pre-eminence. There are rumours now of efforts by the Government to consolidate those parts and emphasize that pre-eminence.

We have a pre-eminence in the building and development of agricultural machinery. There is no reason why we should lose that pre-eminence to others.

There is probably no nation in the world to whom the management of resources is more important. Through the lead we have taken in ecological control, in oceanography, in new techniques of resource development and management, we may be able to help the world reverse its trend toward self-destruction.

These are fields of general interest to all Canadians in which we could attain a pre-eminence and be so seen by the rest of the world. These are the areas through which a sense of Canadian identity can be developed. But while we are building that Canadian identity and while we are acting positively, let us not close our eyes to the seriousness of some trends which have been developing within the country which, if not reversed, might eventually make it impossible for us to attain our objective.

In this sense the Committee for an Independent Canada—much as we may disagree with the necessity for its formation and some of its ideas—performs a useful function. It points out the areas where we must be on our guard. No other country in the world has non-resident controlled companies owning over 30 per cent of corporate assets, accounting for over 35 per cent of corporate sales and earning 45 per cent of corporate profits. And no other country in the world has over 80 per cent of its non-resident dominated companies controlled by the residents of one country. No other country in the world has its trade unions so heavily controlled by international unions whose interests are so often not only inimical to the interests of Canadian workers but also to those of the Canadian people. No other country in the world has the operating, personnel and trading policies of so many of its major corporations dictated by head offices in other countries and, at times, by governments of other countries.

We cannot ignore these facts. They may not all be important but, if we are not to be counted as country cousins, we must take steps to analyze them and to safeguard ourselves against the possibility of ill effects.

Professor Harry Johnson—who will, I understand, be giving evidence before one of our committees this afternoon—once an eminent figure in Canada and now Professor of Economics at the London School of Economics and at the University of Chicago, says that we are foolish to be worrying about the ownership of capital, but he does not suggest that we should be doing nothing about the other aspects of the matter. He says that one of the most important clarifications to emerge from the debate over foreign ownership of enterprise in Canada is that between privately motivated decisions of such enterprises and the control exercised by the government of the parent country. He says that Canadian science research and development policy should be devoted to improving the ability of Canadians to do what they can already do well, and that if it does it will prove to be socially beneficial.

But all of these questions are those which have been occupying the Government in its study and analysis over the past two years. For instance, we have already decided that it is important for our transportation, communications, banking and other financial institutions to remain in the hands of Canadian-controlled companies. We have made certain ad hoc decisions with respect to extreme cases of alienation of important natural resources.

As the Honourable Herb Gray, the minister responsible for the Government's study and analysis of the problem, said last March:

> It seems to me the problem is largely, though not entirely, how to ensure that Canadians have sufficient control of their national economic environment to ensure that the decision-making of the private sector is responsive to Canadian national interests. Thus our policy must take into account the very large extent of foreign control over Canadian business. But it must also take account of the growing importance and power of the multi-national enterprise, whether it be controlled in Canada or abroad. It must make certain that all such firms be fully responsive to Canadian needs and aspirations.

He indicated that equally important was the extra-territorial application of foreign law in Canada. He pointed out that the aggregate savings generated from within Canada are sufficient to meet most Canadian needs and that the importation of unnecessary foreign capital had an undesirable upward pressure on the Canadian dollar, so that a great deal of the problem is in the role of our own financial markets and in the institutions that operate them. On the other hand, the House of Commons committee pointed out that foreign companies are using Canadian capital through domestic bank borrowings as a means of obtaining the equity in Canadian companies without providing the infusion of desirable debt capital.

Mr. Gray points out that when we import capital, we import much more—various kinds of technology, management skills, export markets or other valuable real resources that we lack. Besides, the new industry supported by foreign capital may be helpful to a particular community or region. All these factors must be evaluated in relation to our own indigenous strengths or weaknesses, both in the various sectors of the economy and the various regions of the country.

He also points out that there is the possibility that in the past we have had too great a willingness to depend upon the foreign entrepreneur and have failed to develop industries and technology ourselves. He suggests that it will be necessary to develop appropriate policies to encourage and strengthen indigenous Canadian development in all those sectors of the economy from which we are not clearly and obviously excluded by such things as sheer economy of scale of production, research administration, or problems of climate. This means the need for a sound industrial and resources development strategy, more effective competition policy, systematic attention to the development of Canadian technology and management, and improved performance of our financial institutions.

So the problem is complex, but it is not one from which we should shrink because of its complexity. The surgery must be delicate because we must remember that we have built one of the highest standards of living in the world on the basis of an open economy. If we are going to restrict it in any way, we must take compensating steps to reform our institutions and change characteristic attitudes of Canadians to fill whatever gap is left by whatever we exclude.

The course of wisdom is neither alarmism nor sanguinity. It is enlightened self-interest, preventing the worst, encouraging the best, and always calling upon ourselves to make the greater contribution.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

URBAN AFFAIRS

PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Thompson calling the attention of the Senate to the Report prepared for the Minister responsible for Housing entitled: "Urban Canada: Problems and Prospects", tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 9th March, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Desruisseaux).

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Until June 2.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this order stand until June 2?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, someone else might wish to speak on this order in the meantime, so for the time being I merely ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 18, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. Thérèse F. Casgrain: Honourable senators, in rising to second the motion of Senator Benidickson for the second reading of Bill S-17, I trust that you will accept my remarks in the way I am saying them, with all humility.

I think that our banking system is one of the finest in the world, but like all human institutions it has also its failures. It is not perfect and it often does things that can be criticized.

I am speaking today not as a financial expert, and surely not as a bank director, but simply to express the ordinary Canadian's point of view on this serious subject of the increase in bank service charges which was put into effect on April 1. This increase is all the more surprising because of the fact that in recent years the banks have been making very substantial gains.

I have here a table prepared by the Prices and Incomes Commission. It shows an increase in bank profits from $203 million in 1965 to $529 million in 1970. I consider that to be a very substantial gain, one that has brought a return of 11.8 per cent to its shareholders. I wish that all stocks and bonds could provide such big returns.

Bank service charges have gone up. On personal cheques the service charge has been increased from 11 cents to 14 cents; for current accounts the service charge per entry has increased from 15 to 20 cents, and for acceptance of payments on behalf of other businesses such as oil companies and utility firms, the charge has increased from 15 to 20 cents.

When visiting a remote community in Quebec recently I spoke to a modest wage earner. He told me that he used to pay his bills by cheque, by mail, because he lived out of town, but he said he could no longer afford to do so. He pointed out that the new service charge of 14 cents per cheque, plus a 6 cents stamp to mail the cheque, brought the total cost of each cheque to 20 cents. He said it cost him less to go from place to place in his car and pay his bills in cash. This is an extremely serious matter. It affects not so much the profits of the big companies but rather the average, thrifty consumer of modest means.

Someone recently told me a story that I should like to repeat. It was that these banks are like umbrellas. You may borrow them from institutions, but you must return them to the banks if it rains. When we were young we were taught that to economize was a quality, that we should be careful how we spent our money, that we should deposit it in the bank and watch our savings grow. Banks pay interest on deposits and they lend money. Lately they have been paying between 3 per cent and 4½ per cent on personal deposits, but if you borrow they will charge you a high interest rate, up to 11 per cent. I telephoned one of the major banks this morning and was informed that the rate was up to 12 per cent. This certainly discourages any idea that I might have to borrow.

In a small town in my native province the office of a big utility, the Bell Telephone Company, has been removed. People who paid their telephone bills there now have to go to the bank or pay by cheque at a cost of 20 cents. It is a most unfortunate development, and people are alarmed by it and have made certain representations. I must say that I am surprised that the Bell Telephone Company has not maintained its office in this particular community, where much use is made of the telephone.

Honourable senators, the increase in bank service charges may be negligible to people who are well off, but to the average "Joe", particularly to the poor, it can add up to a large amount. If a person has 11 or 12 monthly bills for electricity, oil, rent, and so on, and he pays them by cheque, the service charge can amount to a lot.

I am not surprised that people all over Canada are indignant and are making a fuss about the increase in bank service charges. The banks argue that their service-charge income for handling out-of-town cheques has been abolished, and I agree that they have had a significant loss of revenue there, but the revenue from the increased services charges as of April 1 will more than make up for that loss.

There is another aspect that is difficult to understand. Instead of encouraging people to economize, to put their money in banks and avoid debt, the banks are doing the contrary. We see huge bank publicity campaigns inviting people to borrow and to spend more. One such advertisement reads:

> Je viens de rembourser mon emprunt... et je suis plus riche qu'avant!

That appeared in all French-speaking papers in my province, and probably in other newspapers across Canada. Another advertisement reads:

> Five of our managers: What are their views on loans?

The consumer is being encouraged to spend beyond his means. He borrows from the bank and he has to pay an interest rate that is often extremely high.

Another article that appeared in one of our English-language newspapers only yesterday was headed:

> You'll pay at least 11 per cent, no matter what.

A person has to pay 11 per cent interest on what he borrows from the bank but gets only 4.50 per cent on his deposits, which is a very small return. I consider Senator Benidickson's bill to be an excellent one, because it will prevent banks from getting together and forming a combine. It is a combine, because they all raised their service charges on April 1. What can the poor consumer think other than that he has been exploited?

Experience in life has shown me that other countries in the world have been torn to shreds by revolutions and have suffered from other unfortunate events. A person coming from such a part of the world said to me, "If only the people who possess would give a little and not be so greedy for huge profits, then perhaps we could say what you are able to say here in Canada, that we have a wonderful country of happy people."

I was disturbed when I learned that the banks had increased their service charge on cheques. This is not the only factor to consider; there is the increase in service charges in general. I hope, honourable senators, that we will be able to do something to stop this kind of monopoly, because it is becoming extremely dangerous.

I will not do what Senator Beaubien did, which was to compare our banking system with that in the United States. As I said at the beginning, I am not a financial expert. I am speaking as a simple citizen of Canada who is very aware of what is happening around her. I hope that we will be able to prevent banks from increasing service charges in any way they want. I repeat, bank service charges are too high. Some will always argue that increased charges result from wage increases. I do not accept that statement, but that, of course, is another matter.

Generally, banks are wonderful institutions and I have great respect for them. Years ago there was a lot of trouble in the United States when the banks had been closed, and President Roosevelt had made his famous fireside chats. I was told that one of our important banking officials went to the United States a short time later, where a banquet was given in his honour. It was attended by many American bank directors. To honour the Canadian, they proposed drinking the health of the King. They all rose and drank to the toast. The Canadian then proposed a toast to President Roosevelt. No one moved; they did not like him. Then the Canadian said, "In that case we will drink to the post, not to the man." Everyone rose and drank.

I hope that we will not see such unfortunate events here, and that our banking system will remain what it is, a very respectable one. If we could eliminate this type of operation by a clause in the Combines Investigation Act, it would be a service to the nation. I find the Bank Act to be very good, but, as Senator Hayden emphasized, one of its clauses is quite vague. It does not tie the Government down to carrying out an inspection where there is doubt. All this is legal and financial. I do not pretend to know anything about it, but the whole thing has left me with a very hazy concept of what could happen to our banking system.

I beg of you, honourable senators, to consider these humble remarks. I make them because I would like to see our wonderful country stay as it is. But we are acting dangerously if we continue to raise the cost of living and encourage the consumer to spend money he does not have. I have risen today to underline what I consider to be a very serious situation. A service charge of 14 cents a cheque looks like nothing, but it can have far-reaching effects.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 27, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue:

> That this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

[Hon. Mrs. Casgrain.]

AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, in amendment I move, seconded by Senator Smith, that the motion be not now adopted but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Argue, seconded by honourable Senator Macdonald:

> That this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

In amendment to this motion it is moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the honourable Senator Smith:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for consideration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length on this motion, because I feel that it does not require any further explanation.

This is a very important matter dealing with the national interests of the country. I do not think that it would be advisable to put the question, without having received the advice of a committee of this house following a thorough study of its substance.

It could surely be argued that the motion which I have just introduced should conclude with a reference to the referral of Senator's Argue motion to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs rather than to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, due to the international implications resulting from the construction of the proposed pipeline.

In this respect, I must say that our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications also has the necessary power to examine projects concerning transportation not only within the territorial limits of this country but also outside such limits, for instance shipping including coastal and ocean shipping.

Besides, I wish to add that Senator Argue's motion does not ask for support for the construction of a pipeline in Alaska but rather for an expression of this chamber's opinion on the matter, and it is also suggested that this chamber should oppose such a project.

I believe that, in these circumstances, our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has full powers to study the motion in question, which I commend to the kind consideration of this chamber.

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am quite disappointed in the turn that this debate has taken. I was aware that there was going to be a motion referring the question to a committee. It was my assumption, in which I find I was wrong, that the motion, not the subject matter, would be referred to committee. As my friend, who is a long-term parliamentarian, knows, the terms of his amendment are negative. His motion in amendment that the subject matter be referred to the committee is just a polite way of killing the main motion; it is just a polite way of getting rid of what appears to be a delicate subject from the standpoint of Senator Langlois, who has now spoken in presenting his motion to the Senate.

I feel that my motion as it stands should recommend itself to the Senate. Had Senator Langlois' motion been to send my motion to a committee, at least we would have been dealing with the wording of the motion; the committee would, at least, have been deciding on the motion itself, and not the subject matter of the motion.

Canadians across the country are disturbed at the proposed Alaskan pipeline project with its tanker-carrying facilities, and the danger this poses to the environment of the west coast of Canada. From my reading of the Debates of the other place, I personally believe the members there are unanimously opposed to this project. As a matter of fact, the terms of my motion are somewhat similar to a motion discussed in the other place. Senator Macdonald, a member of the Opposition, was kind enough to second my motion, and to speak very eloquently in its support. As recently as May 4 Mr. Sharp, the Minister of External Affairs, said in the other place:

> The Canadian delegation pressed the point that, whatever precautions might be taken, oil accidents are likely to occur as was recently shown in the spill of diesel fuel in Puget Sound and in the collision of two tankers in San Francisco Bay.
> The Canadian delegation stressed the high cost of cleaning beaches, fishing gear, pleasure craft and the loss entailed from oil-fouled timber and pulpwood. They also pointed to the long-term damage to the growth prospects of the tourist industry which would obviously result from a change in the environmental quality of the waters off the west coast.

A committee of the other place is looking into this. Surely it should not be necessary for the Senate, first of all, to reject out of hand the terms in which the motion is made, and, secondly, to engage in what I am afraid will be an interminable study of the question without reaching any forthright conclusion that will make clear to the American authorities where the Senate stands. If I were in the United States and my position happened to be in support of this proposed pipeline, one of the things I could do would be to quote what is happening here today to show the way in which the Senate of Canada is waffling on this question—because that is what it is—in terms of the motion presented by Senator Langlois.

I do not know whether the Government is afraid the Senate might have an opinion. I do not know whether the Government really cares whether the Senate has an opinion on this question. But I would think an opinion of the Senate expressed in opposition to the proposed pipeline and in support of further studies of alternative routes, as my motion suggests, would be an important matter which would be given widespread publicity. It would generate widespread support in the United States for what I, at any rate, believe to be in fact the Government's position.

There are powerful people in the United States who agree with the terms of the motion I have presented. Those who want to preserve the environment are opposed to this pipeline. The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Morton, from what I have read, is himself opposed to it. True enough, there are other important officials in the United States administration who are in support of this proposed pipeline. I understand that a decision is likely to be made in the United States by mid-September, so time is of the essence. It is important that this Senate consider this question. I think it is important that the Senate take a position. I would like to see that position taken in opposition, and taken unanimously.

Those who are in support of my motion and opposed to the pipeline travel in good company. Senator Muskie in the United States, who is said to be the front-running candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, had this to say in a letter addressed to President Nixon which was quoted by the Globe and Mail on April 22:

> I believe you should instruct the Secretary of the Interior to deny their (the oil companies') permit application at once. Such a decision is necessary, indeed essential, if we are to prevent grave environmental damage.

That is an unequivocal position, a strong position, from one of the powerful men in the United States.

As I read the debates in the United States Congress, the American supporters of control of the environment, and of doing everything possible to keep clean air and pure water, are gaining in strength to the point where they may in fact win out on this issue. So strong are the opponents of environmental damage that the United States Senate has on two occasions, and now apparently on a final occasion, killed the proposal of the American administration to build a supersonic transport airplane. Why are we not as active on this issue of protecting the environment—one hundred per cent opposed to an action that our Government says will endanger the environment of the coast of British Columbia, opposed to an action as a result of which the Minister of External Affairs says, no matter how strong the precautions, there will be tankers spilling oil on the west coast within the next few years?

I think the Senate should take a strong position on this question. I would think we would do ourselves some good too in the public mind if we took this position. I think we would get many commendations, and letters, wires and telephone calls in support of our position, and very few criticisms. But if we waffle, if we procrastinate, if we kill the terms of my motion by this fine, well known parliamentary procedure of sending not the substance but the subject matter to a committee, then I think we should, and will, receive some very sharp criticism from many parts of the country.

I remember an occasion some years ago when the other place decided to take a position on a very controversial question affecting Canada's relations with the United States, and I should like to read from the Journals of the other place of Wednesday, May 5, 1953. On, I believe, a supply motion, Mr. Donald Fleming, supported by the Mr. E. Davie Fulton—two prominent front bench Conservative members of Parliament—moved:

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "in view of the impending departure of the Prime Minister to Washington this House desires to record its opinion that further vigorous efforts should be made by the Government to bring about the removal of the restrictions imposed by the United States on the importation of Canadian Agricultural products, in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade."

A far-ranging debate took place, and that motion received the support of members from all sides of the house on that day, even though it was highly critical, and in strong terms, of the American position of restricting the importation of certain Canadian agricultural products in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Here I quote in part the remarks of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, then Prime Minister. He is talking about the terms of the motion and there was a slight amendment later on. He said:

> I take it this was not intended to be a motion of no confidence;

It was on a supply bill.

> —it was intended to be an expression of the feeling of all members of Parliament that further vigorous efforts should be made by the Government to bring about a removal of these restrictions which are causing serious concern and even embarrassment.

He want on to say:

> It would be quite helpful if a unanimous expression of opinion were registered in this house before I have these interviews that I am looking forward to with the President, the Secretary of State and perhaps other members of the Administration and, I hope, some member of the United States Senate and Congress.

I think the House of Commons was wise in the action it took that day, and in the motion it passed.

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

I presented this motion in a responsible way. I think the motion is a good one. Not many senators have spoken on it, but those who did spoke favourably. They represented both parties. I think it would be a constructive move, helpful to the Prime Minister in dealing with the United States Government, to pass the motion in the terms in which it was presented to the Senate, and not allow it to be shunted off and killed by this well-known parliamentary device of moving that the subject matter, rather than the motion itself, be referred to a committee. If the administration in the Senate should persist in carrying out its stated intention to send it to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications I hope I may be placed on that committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I know it will be tough, but I will do everything I can to have that committee come to a conclusion—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is the way we want you to be.

Hon. Mr. Argue: —in a relatively short time, and report its conclusion back to the Senate, and thus let the Senate take a position on this question. Let us hope that we can come together with the people who are protecting the environment around this continent, and make a constructive contribution to what I believe is the Government's general policy in this connection.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, in view of the proposal we have heard this afternoon, and particularly the comments of Senator Argue, I would like to suggest that the manner in which we dispose of this question should be decided by the objectives that we want to accomplish. If our intention is to do nothing more than make a meaningless gesture that may be politically popular, but which will not accomplish anything beyond that, the motion as it is before us could be proceeded with and passed.

Personally, I could not support the motion as it appears on the Order Paper, not because I have any less concern for the ecology of the west coast of Canada than anybody else, but simply because in my view this is not the way we are going to resolve that problem.

First of all, we must keep in mind that what is proposed by the Americans is the building of a pipeline entirely within their own country and, therefore, entirely within their own jurisdiction. Its terminal outlet is at an American seaport, where the oil can be loaded into American or other tankers which can move to the high seas and transport the oil to another American port to be unloaded and used for domestic consumption. If in the route they choose they decide they want to use Canadian territorial waters, then that is another question because Canada has complete autonomy to deal with any shipping within its territorial waters. But Canada certainly has no authority to deal with the shipment of any cargo once it is on the high seas. This makes it clear that, if we want to do something constructive to alter the proposed method of moving North Slope oil from Alaska to a

United States port south of the 49th parallel, the only way we can do so is by carrying out the judgment of the American authorities that some alternative method would be preferable to the one they are proposing.

We are not going to accomplish that by taking a negative attitude and saying simply that we are opposed to it. That is what the first part of the motion says. The second portion deals with the study of alternate routes or methods of transport. That is a separate subject altogether and has nothing to do with the first.

Perhaps we can appreciate what would be the normal reaction to this motion on the part of the American authorities if we reverse the process. Suppose in western Canada we wanted to build a pipeline from Edmonton to the west coast at Prince Rupert, from which we would be loading tankers, say, to go to Japan taking the north route by Alaska and the Aleutian Islands and thereby involving American ownership and interest. I feel quite certain that if any legislative body in the United States passed a resolution saying that they opposed our building a pipeline from Edmonton to the west coast of Canada, the immediate Canadian reaction would be, "Thank you, but that is none of your business. It is in our territory, and we will build it precisely where we like," and they would get nowhere.

On the other hand, if they said, "We are concerned about this, because of its possible effect on our territory, and we would like an opportunity to discuss it on the basis of our concern and suggest an alternative method whereby you could accomplish what you want to achieve without creating a problem for us", I think we would be receptive to such a request, and I believe they would be receptive to that kind of proposition from us. Merely taking a negative attitude when we are dealing with something that is 100 per cent within the jurisdiction of another country is more likely to prejudice our case than to help it in any way.

In this respect I think the first part of the motion is poorly worded, and if passed will be detrimental to Canada's interests rather than helpful.

We should not lose sight of the fact that every day scores of tankers are loaded with products in the seaports of Canada and the United States and move up and down the coasts. The hazards they create are practically the same as the hazards in this case. It may be that the waters are a little rougher off the west coast of British Columbia, but that is not significant.

It seems to me that to single out one particular source of oil and one particular port from the scores of ports where tankers are loaded and from which they move up and down the coasts of North America as a proposal the Senate of Canada ought to oppose is taking this matter out of all proper perspective and would make us look almost ridiculous in the eyes of the world. I do not want to belabour this matter, but if we are really concerned about getting some alternative method of moving North Slope oil from Alaska to states south of the 49th parallel, we will make the best progress by having the Government of Canada ask the American authorities for an opportunity to sit down at a conference table for a mutual discussion of our concern. But no progress will be made by mere negative opposition in a matter in which we have no jurisdiction.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, Senator Manning has made a most interesting suggestion. There is no argument with the logic of his statement that we probably have no jurisdiction over what the Americans do on the high seas. But if what the Americans do on the high seas creates a danger to the territory of Canada, we not only have a right to make a protest but, I submit, we have the duty to make a protest, and that is what this is.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The Americans are not averse to listening to protests. The one thing that the smaller nations of the world have going for them today in respect of the United States is that that country is becoming increasingly sensitive to public opinion throughout the world. That they are sensitive may be their great weakness, but that fact is there and we should not forget it. It may be that the one protection we have for our independence is their concern for their public image in the world.

When the United States decide that for a commercial purpose they are going to disregard any threat that their actions may have to the territory and well-being of Canada, then we have a responsibility to our people to stand up and speak clearly and be counted and say that we will not countenance such action. We should use every means at our disposal to bolster our position, even though that may merely mean we simply fall back on our ability to appeal to world opinion.

Perhaps it would be wise to distinguish between Americans and the international corporations with which we are concerned here, because they are supra-national bodies which owe no loyalty to anybody but themselves and their management groups. They owe hardly any loyalty even to their shareholders. And do you think for one moment that the American Government would be more concerned with those companies than it would with the goodwill of the Canadian people?

I do not think the American government has demonstrated a belief that it has the right to disregard the wishes or the welfare and well-being of the Canadian people, but if they did think they had that right, then we should certainly start now to appeal to the world court of public opinion.

About a month and a half ago, I brought forward a motion suggesting that we should consider whether the raise in oil prices had not changed the situation within Canada so that instead of importing more than 50 per cent of the oil we consume we should consider that the time had come when it would be advisable for us to make available to the western oil producing areas of Canada the markets of eastern Canada and the Maritimes.

I withdrew that motion because for one thing the Prices and Incomes Commission had already instituted its own inquiry and had at its disposal all of the experts and material with respect to the price position. For another thing, the National Energy Board had also embarked upon an inquiry into the whole business of the integration of our energy resources into the markets that may be available to us on this continent. Had I proceeded with my motion and had the house given its authority to proceed and to follow through with the investigation, we would thus have been competing with those other bodies for the experts who would be available as witnesses and for the assistants necessary to such an investigation. This would have meant an unnecessary duplication of work, the results of which would be available to us later in any event.

But the motion moved by the honourable Senator Langlois is nothing but a hollow and obvious attempt to close this subject out. It is now May 26. The committee that has been suggested we set up here could not be in operation by the time the house adjourns for the summer recess. But even if people were to stay here and we were able to set the committee up, we could hardly begin hearings at that time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is a standing committee.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The standing committee is there all right, but the standing committee will hear what? The standing committee of the other place has been concerned with this subject matter for the last five or six months. Are we merely going to duplicate what they are doing now? How could you justify the expense of bringing the witnesses? How would you justify the use of people's time in doing something that has already been done? We could achieve the purpose of the amendment which is put in here simply by reading through the reports of the committee in the other place.

All my honourable friend from Saskatchewan wanted to do was to have us give an expression of opinion which might be helpful to those people. He was not suggesting that we should get into the expensive kind of investigation which would be involved here and which would be not simply a duplication but a quadruplication of the work that is already being done. I say it would be a quadruplication because we have first the Prices and Incomes Commission, then the National Energy Board, then the committee of the other place, and now you are asking for the same thing to be done here to cover the same ground. By what possible justification could we explain that quadruplication of expense to the public or even to ourselves?

Honourable senators, this is a hollow and shallow device for shelving an opportunity for this house to express an opinion on a matter of importance to Canadians. A line to Churchill, as the honourable Senator Manning mentioned, would not pass through American territory; a line to Prince Rupert would not endanger any American territory, but a tanker route from Valdez to Anacortes, coming in through the narrow Juan de Fuca Strait, around the south of Vancouver Island, not only ends up going through Canadian waters but ends up threatening the finest beaches and recreation areas we have in this country.

Do not be deceived by the "man of straw" that is being thrown at you. Do not be deceived or led astray by the unwillingness of people who should be able to face simple facts, and let us remember that an expression from this house would be welcomed and considered carefully by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. Because we are the ones who are threatened most, we would merely be joining with the conservation people down there in attempting to see that we keep this country for ourselves and protect it for our children.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I would like to ask my honourable friend a question. I believe that he failed to make one point, or if he made it I did not understand it. Is he putting the kiss of death on any method of getting the oil out, or just on the one that would move it through Canadian waters?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: We are saying that we oppose the presently proposed route from Valdez straight down the coast. There are two alternatives. First, they could follow the meridian, south to a point 400 miles off Seattle and come straight in, because the line runs through Honolulu. If they stayed well away from Canadian waters and came into an American port so that they did not threaten us, this would not cover the situation. Or, when we find out how to build a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley, they could use that route, because a pipeline using that route is going to be built eventually. The question is as to when and how.

They do not need the oil today in the United States. They are getting by very well, and if they are really stuck they can buy more of ours and they will get it at a cheaper price than they would have to pay for Alaskan oil in the long run.

I am suggesting that right now we have the right to say we are opposed to what they intend to do, moving the oil from Valdez down to Anacortes, because they cannot get into port without presenting a threat to us, one which will increase as these ships become larger and as the traffic becomes heavier. In a speech I made a short time ago I pointed out that one-seventh of the ships on the high seas are involved in collisions every year. As increasing volumes of oil are moved, this threat becomes greater. Why should we expose ourselves to this threat when it is not necessary so to do?

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I would suggest to the honourable senator that he still has not made a good point, in my opinion. Among the most difficult waters of the world to navigate are the English Channel and the North Sea. The largest ships in the world go into Holland; and Bantry Bay is not any picnic from the navigator's viewpoint. Indeed, the Bay of Fundy is a rather hazardous stretch of water, and some of the larger ships in the world navigate that stretch. Even if you go out around Hawaii, you would still have to come inshore some time, and the danger arises when you do that, not when you are off the coastline.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: If they come into Seattle they miss Canadian waters. Anacortes is south of Vancouver, and you get into it by coming down around Vancouver Island and going up Juan de Fuca Strait. Any pollution there is going to ruin the Vancouver beaches and the southern part of Vancouver Island, which is Canada's California.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Are you concerned about the protection of the ecology on a world basic or only of our own?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: If the Americans cannot look after their ecology, we cannot help them but we can certainly look after our own.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I do not propose to discuss this subject at the present time, since it may be referred to committee, but I cannot help reflecting upon what has happened in eastern Canada, with Venezuelan oil coming into the St. Lawrence Seaway. I wonder if this should not be looked at in the same light. There are as many risks present in the St. Lawrence as on the west coast, and it becomes a question as to what can be done. I believe that the situation in eastern Canada should not be overlooked in any study involving the transportation of oil and gas. The beaches on our east coast were mentioned by Senator Rattenbury, and they are also important. Since a committee of this house will be studying this question, I believe it would be an appropriate time to bring this point up, and I shall do so.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I do not propose to occupy much time of the house on this matter. I want to say at once that I am entirely opposed to the amendment moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, for the reasons just stated with such eloquence by the honourable Senator Argue and by the honourable Senator Prowse.

I listened with great interest and respect to the weighty arguments of Senator Manning—or, I should say, what I at first considered to be weighty arguments—until he came to the words, "We have no jurisdiction to discuss this matter"—if I caught his words correctly—and I listened with astonishment to such a proposition being submitted to this house.

We have no jurisdiction to discuss this matter? No jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. Manning: If I left the impression that we had no jurisdiction to discuss the matter, it was the furthest thing from my mind. I was saying that we had no jurisdiction over their pipeline or ships engaged in the movement of their oil.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: That does not change my opinion in the slightest degree. Of course, we do not have any legislative jurisdiction. Everyone is aware of that: it is a truism; it is axiomatic. But no one is proposing in this resolution, as I read it, any kind of legislative action. Of course, if we proposed legislative action to control something within the territory or the territorial waters of the United States, we should be talking through our hats. The thing would be null and void and of no effect. This is not what is proposed. What is proposed is an expression of opinion of this house on a matter which beyond question affects very greatly the interests of Canada, and especially a particularly important part of Canada. Surely we have the right to express an opinion on that?

There is nothing abusive in this resolution about the United States. It does not call them bandits or brigands. It merely says that a certain proposed action which might be taken by the United States is, in the judgment of the house, according to the resolution, one which ought not be taken because it threatens the interests of this country. Surely we have jurisdiction to express our opinion on this? Surely we have even a duty to express our opinion on this?

If the situation were reversed, it seems to me that it would be perfectly proper for the United States Senate or the House of Representatives to express a similar opinion in opposition to something proposed here that would affect their interests. If it were a matter of a pipeline from, was it, Edmonton to Churchill, that would be something which would not affect their interests. But if it were a pipeline which passed close to the shores of the United States and which threatened the ecology of a section of that country, then it seems to me that the United States would be perfectly entitled to say, "This is something which we oppose."

This would not be an interference with our autonomy. It would merely be a representation. A cat can look at a king; the Canadian cat can look at the American king, or these multi-national companies that have their headquarters in the United States.

It is our duty to express our opinion if we feel that the interests of Canada are being threatened. If we feel that this is perfectly harmless, that no Canadian interest is threatened and that it will amount to no more than the carrying of a few barrels of water down the coast of British Columbia, then it is not worth our while to express an opinion on it.

But from the little that I have read, and from what I have heard about it in the course of the debate in this house, this is something that does touch Canadian interests of some importance, and I can see no reason why we should not express our opinion either for or against. I can see no conceivable reason why, in view of the numerous investigations that are being carried on, to which Senator Prowse referred, we should consign this to a fresh investigation by a committee of this house.

No one has more respect than I for committees of this house. No one could have a higher opinion of the extraordinarily valuable and thorough work that they do. Let us not impose on them a task which is a work of mere supererogation, as the Anglican prayer book says, things that do not need to be done, things that are being done elsewhere.

Of course, if we think that investigations which are now being carried on are being carried on by people who are incompetent; if we think that the National Energy Board investigations are being carried on by people who are incompetent and that there will ensue nothing that is worthwhile; if we think that the investigations carried on by the committee of the other place are being carried on by people who are incompetent and who will produce nothing of any value, this again is another question. But I hesitate to arrive at any such conclusion unless there is powerful evidence that such is the case.

In the circumstances I cannot see that there is anything to be gained by referring this matter to a committee, as Senator Langlois suggested, and I cannot see that any harm can be done by passing Senator Argue's motion. It seems to me that a great deal of good can be achieved by passing his motion, unless of course we are of the opinion that motions passed by this house are of no consequence and have no effect on public opinion here or elsewhere. That is a conclusion which I hesitate to draw.

I repeat that I am strongly opposed to the amendment and strongly in favour of the motion proposed by Senator Argue. I am unimpressed by the arguments that have been made against the motion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I move the adjournment of the debate on behalf of Hon. John M. Macdonald.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I would like to say that we are very much interested in having this motion sent to the committee as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In any event, I take it that it could be done next Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: It would have the same effect.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like to consider the effect of the motion made by Senator Langlois. As Senator Macdonald has seconded the motion, I would like to consult with him.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I take objection to the remark of Senator Prowse when he said that we were trying to delay this motion from going to committee. On the contrary, the motion to adjourn the debate came from the Leader of the Opposition and not from this side of the house. As I said, we are very anxious to have this motion referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, for Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATE ACCOUNTS

STATEMENT TABLED PURSUANT TO RULE 112

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that, in accordance with Rule 112, the Clerk of the Senate had laid on the Table a detailed statement of his receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year 1970-71.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I move:

That the Clerk's accounts be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker: informed the Senate that, a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Donald Smith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-21, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move third reading of the bill now.

23351—66

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator Sparrow leave to proceed with the third reading of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Might I ask the honourable Senator Sparrow if there is any need for haste?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Honourable senators, on Tuesday evening I gave the house an indication of the need for the urgency to pass this bill at an early stage. Perhaps Senator Molson was not here at the time, so I will repeat at least some of those reasons. There is some urgency over the passage of the bill by the Senate so that it can be considered in the other place. If this project is to proceed, the bill must be passed by both houses before the summer adjournment of Parliament. If the pulp mill is to be built on schedule, the railway line must be completed by June, 1972. As the railway is expected to take a year to build, it means that its construction must begin in June of this year. If there is any further explanation needed, I will be happy to give it.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 1, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

SUSPENSION OF RULE 28—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order in relation to a problem which as yet has not arisen. I do so in order to give His Honour the Speaker and honourable senators time to consider the point. I listened to Senator Langlois yesterday when he moved his amendment to the motion of Senator Argue. As you know, we have decided that for the remainder of this session we would suspend Rule 28, which reads:

> A senator shall not speak twice to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

In effect, this means that for the balance of the session we will experiment in allowing any senator to speak as often as he wishes on any bill or substantive motion.

However, we have not suspended Rules 29 and 30, which read as follows:

> 29. A senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion shall have a right of final reply, but not otherwise.
> 30. The final reply provided for in rule 29 closes the debate. It is the duty of the Speaker to ensure that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

Honourable senators, by suspending Rule 28 we have created a rather awkward situation. The sponsor of a bill, or the mover of a substantive motion, is put in an inferior position to any other senator. Any senator has the right to speak four, five, six or ten times, if he wishes, but the mover of a motion or the sponsor of a bill may not. On rising a second time, such a senator, under Rule 29 would be, in effect, closing the debate. It creates a rather difficult situation, and it puts the mover of a bill or of a substantive motion in rather an inferior position vis-à-vis the other members of the Senate, who may speak ten times if they wish. I therefore suggest to His Honour and to honourable members that consideration should be given to this question and to the desirability of having the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders meet to examine the problem.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall take the point under advisement. It may be that when the sitting resumes on Tuesday next I shall be in a position to give a detailed opinion on the point that has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition. At the moment, without prejudicing any decision I might come to after examining the matter more thoroughly, may I point out now that Rule 28, which has been suspended for the remainder of this session, mentions that a senator shall not speak twice. Thus, when we decided to suspend this rule I took for granted that its suspension would then allow an honourable senator to speak twice. I did not have the understanding that it meant an honourable senator could speak as often as he wished.

As I have implied, I merely throw that out as my first impression for your consideration. I will take the point under advisement until Tuesday next, but in the meantime I will hear the views of any honourable senator who wishes to speak on the point of order raised by the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did the Leader of the Government not intend to speak on this point of order?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I enjoy receiving an invitation to speak from Senator Choquette. I would go further and say that there should be no restrictions imposed upon any honourable senator who finds himself in the situation in which Senator Argue now is. I think that he should have complete freedom to join in the thrust of debate, and I have no doubt that he can handle the situation with great credit to himself.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not see that there can be any possibility of restriction, if we suspend that rule. Then we shall have to substitute another rule saying that only twice will he be able to speak, and not three or four times. So I do not see the slightest possibility of saying to an honourable senator, "Let it be understood, from now on, that this rule is suspended and senators are entitled to speak twice."

Hon. Mr. Martin: In saying that, I feel sure that Senator Choquette fails to take into account the fact that His Honour is, indeed, an able and ingenious Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I appreciate the solicitude and magnanimity the Leader of the Government has evidenced in his being concerned that I should have the opportunity to speak many times. I do not want that opportunity, but merely to speak twice and close the debate.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN THE SENATE GALLERY

PREMIER AND CABINET MINISTERS OF ANTIGUA

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before we proceed I should like to take advantage of this moment to direct attention to the fact that the Premier of Antigua, the Honourable George Walter, and two of his ministers, the Honourable Donald Halstead and the Honourable Seldon Walter, are in our gallery.

Premier Walter took over the direction of the affairs of the Government of Antigua in the month of February. I reminded him a few moments ago of the very close interest and association that Canada has with his island country as with other Commonwealth countries in the Caribbean. I also pointed out to him that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs had shown special interest in the Commonwealth Caribbean, as indicated by the thorough study it made last year of Canada-Caribbean relations.

We are very honoured to have Premier George Walter of Antigua and his colleagues within the precincts of Parliament today, and, more particularly, in the Senate. The Government of Canada is pleased to have them in Canada at this time.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

CANADIAN FILM INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 7, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, calling the attention of the Senate to the Canadian film industry.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, it is not because I have as much knowledge of the film industry as has Senator Desruisseaux, nor of the National Film Board as has Senator Cameron, that I am participating in the debate, but because Senator Desruisseaux, in his well-documented and thought-provoking speech on February 20 asked for the views of his colleagues on whether a committee of the Senate, either a special or standing committee, should inquire into the Canadian feature film industry and whether such a committee should study ways and means of helping to promote the rapid growth of this industry in Canada. In response to his request, and because I have for years been keenly interested in Canadian films, whether produced by the private sector or by the National Film Board, I wish to speak briefly on this subject.

I support Senator Desruisseaux's suggestion that such a Senate committee be appointed. With the resources of Canada, which were described by the late Lord Tweedsmuir, our former Governor General, as being unparalleled anywhere in the world, we should be able to find a way of promoting rapid growth of the Canadian feature film industry to enable it to compete successfully with such an industry anywhere in the world. I am hopeful that a Senate committee, with the expertise, business and finance experience of some of its members, may be able to suggest how this can be done.

Undoubtedly there are in Canada sufficient Canadians with the creative and technical skills necessary to produce the large number of Canadian films which a Canadian film industry, capable of existence and of extensive development, must require. The large number of Canadian actors, writers, producers and technicians who have made good in Hollywood gives credence to such a belief. Some of the delightful Canadian films which have been produced indicate that we have people other than actors who are talented in this field.

This was pointedly brought to my attention by an article in the Toronto Star of March 3, 1971, concerning a project of Henry Beckman, an actor, who appears regularly in American TV series such as Peyton Place, in which he did 50 episodes as George Anderson. He also appears in Hogan's Heroes, and earlier played the part of Big Mouth Mulligan in I'm Dickes, He's Fenster, Colonel Harrigan in McHale's Navy and Captain Clancy in Here 'Come the Brides. These series are familiar to anyone who follows TV programs. Despite appearing in these American TV series, Mr. Beckman has retained his Canadian citizenship. He considers himself a Canadian actor although he has lived and worked in the United States very successfully for the past 25 years.

Henry Beckman's project is the promotion of a Canadian Film Stars' Hall of Fame to be established in Canada, preferably in his own home territory, the Maritimes. To justify such an undertaking, he mentions a few of the outstanding actors who might be included, such as Glen Ford, Gisèle Mackenzie, Melinda Montgomery, Arthur Hall and Raymond Burr—and if he had not been so modest he might have mentioned his own name.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: And Raymond Massey.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I was about to mention him. I can think of many others, such as Walter Pidgeon and Raymond Massey. There are many more whom I will not name.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): What about the ladies?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Gisele Mackenzie and Melinda Montgomery are ladies.

A Senate committee, studying how the Canadian feature film industry might be expanded as rapidly as possible, might not support the idea of setting up a Canadian Film Stars' Hall of Fame, but the fact that there are enough outstanding Canadian film stars to justify such a suggestion is proof that persons with great talent as actors have been available in Canada but because of the absence of a strong film industry here they have been forced to go elsewhere to develop their talents and to receive the recognition which is their due. We have an almost unlimited supply of talented people in Canada.

The film industry requires the talents of many other people. Many writers, technicians and others who have contributed to the success of Hollywood films have come from Canada. The flight abroad of such artists and technicians continues despite our efforts to halt this trend. Such a flight takes with it profits and employment that might accrue to many Canadians if attractive opportunities were open for such artists and technicians to employ their talents profitably in our own country.

In addition to our human resources, we have in Canada landscape that could provide film scenery unexcelled anywhere in the world.

Canadian feature films should not only offer an opportunity for talented Canadians to develop their talents in Canada, and so provide work for many thousands of their countrymen and women, but should portray Canadian life, aspirations and culture both to our own people and to those beyond our borders.

Of the 623 films distributed to movie theatres in Canada in 1967, why is it that only eight or 1.3 per cent were from Canada? Of 643 films shown in 1968, only eight were from Canada, and of 623 films shown in 1969, again only eight were from Canada.

In 1970, with the help of the Canadian Film Development Board, the number of films was increased to 14. However, in order to make a real impact in Canada and abroad we need to produce many more. Jacques Godbout, head of the National Film Board's French productions, said in 1969 that we required a lot of film to create a basis of culture. He said, "We need 30 films a year as a minimum to say that something is happening in Canada."

The Canadian Film Development Corporation, which was mentioned earlier in the debate, was established by legislation in 1967. When in 1964 the idea of establishing a fund to help Canadian feature film writers was first suggested by the then Secretary of State, some of the reasons given for such legislation were as follows:

> In cultural matters, a country cannot continually live by borrowing its material from others. It must set up itself the institutions it needs. A country must express itself by works of art and feel that its participation adds something to the common legacy of world culture...
> Of all the means of expressing himself and his ideas which are available to an artist today, the feature film is not only the most effective but also the most easily understood by the largest number of people around the world. It is in the world of the cinema that all the great questions of the day are asked; all the travails, the problems and the successes of mankind are portrayed...
> A country without a feature film industry lacks one of the basic forms of self-expression.
> A film industry, such as exists in France, in Italy, in the United Kingdom and in Japan, not only allows a nation to say what it has to say in the most easily understood medium of our era but to see itself, to see on the screen a reflection of its own country—and that, it seems to me, is a matter of great importance.

That is why it is all-important that we do all we can to promote the Canadian feature film industry and also the work of the National Film Board which, despite its many crises, has already brought such great credit to Canada. I would like to see the work of the Film Board greatly expanded. The recommendations of a Senate committee, following a study of this industry, might be the basis of such promotion and expansion.

The terms of reference of such a committee should be wide enough to include the study of many suggestions that have been put forward by people interested in the development of Canadian feature films, such as the introduction of quotas that would set the permissible number of foreign films that can be shown, or it might instead of that stipulate the percentage of Canadian films that must be exhibited.

In England and all other countries except the United States, such quotas exist to protect their national film industry. Why do we not have such control to protect our fragile film industry?

Study might also be given to the complaint often heard from film makers concerning the mass of feature films that are dumped in Canada. A film is dumped here when it has already recovered its costs elsewhere and is brought into Canada just to make additional profits. Distributors can secure these at such low rates that Canadian-produced films are not able to compete with them. A committee could look into this practice and might possibly recommend the passing of anti-dumping legislation in this area, as has been done in relation to other imports.

The committee might study ways and means of securing larger markets for the Canadian film industry. To do this we must seek markets outside Canada, whose population is only about 22 million. This is very small compared to that of 200 million in the United States.

If we are to develop a truly great Canadian film industry we must seek, through the use of competent salesmen, markets outside Canada. The committee could discover whether attention is being given to the development of this foreign market by Canadian representatives of trade and commerce in the foreign field, and could encourage such promotion.

The high cost of distribution works great hardship on the producer in the film industry. Costs of promotion and advertising are so high that the producers' share of the revenue from rentals seems discouragingly low. If the costs of distribution and exhibition could be reduced substantially, films would be able to show larger profits and more people might be willing to invest in this industry.

The Canadian Film Development Corporation, I understand, subsidizes only producers. In France and Eastern Europe, government subsidies are available for distributors and theatre operators as well as producers. Perhaps the committee could investigate the advisability of providing assistance to distributors and theatre operators in Canada.

In my work on the Senate Committee on Poverty and the Joint Committee on the Constitution, where we have met the public constantly, I have become increasingly aware of the value of the exchange of ideas between those in authority and those affected by their decisions. I have come to believe that if we are to have the kind of country we would like to have there must be much of this interchange of ideas and greater participation.

A subject for inquiry might well be the standards now used by the Canadian Film Development Corporation before a decision is reached to support a production and what, if any, dialogue takes place between the Canadian Film Development Corporation and eminent and experienced film makers in the private sector and in the public sector. In view of the criticisms made by the public about some of the productions which have received support from the Canadian Film Development Corporation, it might be worth while to know what standard the corporation uses in coming to a decision.

Is the criterion applied by the Canadian Film Development Corporation mostly whether or not a production will be a money-maker? Do they feel they must produce a profit as does any ordinary business? Or is weight and consideration given to whether the film will have charm, integrity and humour that will creditably reflect Canada, not only throughout Canada but abroad? Will it also reflect morals, political ideas and mental attitudes which do not offend general public taste?

There is at present much public concern about taxpayers' money going into sexploitation films. This concern was eloquently expressed by Senator Forsey in this chamber on April 7. Sex and pornographic films are simple to make and can return a huge profit, but integrity must suffer if the only consideration is financial gain.

The quality of the films Flick and Explosion, the first two English-language films backed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation, brought the criticism that the corporation is more interested in money than quality. The chairman of the corporation denies this vehemently, but I presume it was such criticism that prompted Senator Edgar Fournier to make inquiries in the Senate about the cost to the Canadian Film Development Corporation of producing certain films, including the two I have mentioned. The reply he received on December 3, 1970, was not very enlightening. Possibly a Senate committee might learn more.

Another area that I would like to see studied by the committee is the tax payable on film equipment imported into Canada. An article in the Edmonton Journal of September 4, 1970, states that only about 10 per cent of the film equipment needed to produce films is manufactured in Canada, and that there is a 15 per cent duty on imports. The article goes on to say that a customs classification known as "Professional Motion Pictures Producers", which covers all equipment at all stages when it is to be used by professionals in a studio in Canada, allows duty-free import of equipment. However, according to the article the customs officials determine at their own discretion who qualifies. Of the nine local film companies in that area, only two have managed to do so.

In any case, should not this exemption from duty be wide enough to permit the import of such equipment duty free, or at less than 15 per cent, for those who are carrying on training of people who are not yet professionals? Possibly the exception should also apply to the growing number of people who, in this country, are making films for their own interest and enjoyment. This is a field where there are wide opportunities for youth to develop an interest in the Canadian feature film profession, many of whom having done so might help greatly to develop the Canadian film industry. The list of subjects that might be studied to advantage by such a committee is almost limitless. I have referred to only a few, although I could suggest many more in which I am interested. The publicity that usually attaches to the evidence given in hearings of Senate committees would do much to interest the Canadian public in this problem, and might itself bring forth increased investment of Canadian capital.

I sincerely trust that Senator Desruisseaux's suggestion will be adopted by the Senate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debated adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Prowse shall speak now instead of the honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, by way of explanation let me make it perfectly clear that I am a reluctantly conscripted volunteer at this stage. I would like to thank the honourable Senator Manning for introducing this subject to the house, and for the impressive things he said in bringing the matter to our attention.

There is perhaps nothing in the life of Canadians today that is more important for our future than our relations with the United States. I agree with those who have already spoken in this debate that it is unfortunate that too often we let immediate problems become magnified out of all importance, because we feel our toes are being trodden upon.

We should remember that the United States of America is a huge country, a conglomerate of many varied interests. Americans are jealous of their regional origins. For example, Texans are just as jealously insistent that they be called Texans and not Americans as you and I are that we should be referred to as Canadians and not British, American or something else. I doubt very much, therefore, if Americans are concerned when from time to time Canadians appear overly conscious of the fact that, not only do we occupy a different part of the continent and have responsibility for it but we have in some ways developed a way of life we like, which is a little different from theirs.

Two years ago it was my privilege to attend the United Nations for two weeks. My wife and I stayed in a hotel in the centre of Manhattan, only four blocks from the United Nations building. This, if anywhere, is the centre of civilization. And yet when we registered in our hotel we received a communication from the manager warning us to keep our room locked at all times. We were even cautioned to keep the chain on the door when we were in the room, and not to admit anyone representing himself as a repairman without checking with the desk by phone to see if he had been sent. The letter also warned my wife not to carry a handbag on the street unless she was accompanied, and that under no circumstances should she go out on the street alone at night. And this is in the very centre of civilization!

It seems to me that if there is a monument to man's inhumanity to man, it is New York City. It would be a great tragedy to allow our Canadian metropolitan areas to grow to such a size that eventually we too lived under similar aboriginal conditions, where the sabre-tooth tiger, the terror of the cave dweller, has been replaced by the mugger, the purse snatcher, and the room robber. While there is much to admire in the American way of life, we should make sure we do not end up with those things that they wish they never had.

I do not think Americans mind us talking about them when contemplating our own affairs. We are not criticizing them or running them down, but perhaps we insult them by feeling sorry for them because of the problems they have permitted to arise. If we stopped at pity for them we would be smug, but if we are intelligent enough to take action to prevent ourselves from drifting into the same kind of situation, then their travail will be to our advantage and eventually to theirs.

I do not believe the United States is about to launch a war on Canada. As a matter of fact, they have done better without one. They have all the control here that a war could have brought them. If there had been a war between Russia and the United States, and the Russians had offered us $10 a barrel for our oil in Alberta, we might have agreed to take it. The Americans would undoubtedly have had to move in militarily to stop us. I do not think I am being cynical in saying that all they would have needed was half an armoured brigade, and as soon as they had taken over they would have been able to impose their own peace terms. They would have said, "We do not wish to harm you nice people; you have just been badly led."

This was not going to happen, because Premier Manning was not going to make a deal with the Russians. But let us suppose it did happen. Then we would have had them come along and say, "These are the peace terms. We need oil and we are going to take it. We know you need some, so you can keep one-eighth for yourselves. We know that some of your people want to work and we can use the big strong boys you boast about, but you realize we will have to have our own technical people, our executive people and our specialists to run things because they know how things are done. We could use some of your beautiful girls as file-clerks and secretaries, and we will buy our groceries from you. But you understand that our equipment has to be manufactured by people who know just how we want it, so we will bring it in." These would be the peace terms. Would we have thought that these were particularly generous terms?

Yet, that is what we have got—not from the American Government but from the multi-national oil companies. This is where we have to make a distinction. Much of the criticism which is being directed at the United States today ought to be directed at the multi-national corporations, not that they are essentially or necessarily bad, not that they may even be bad at all. Possibly we are going to have to learn to live with them. When we talk about Canada-United States relations in the context of business affairs between our two countries, we have got off on the wrong track. This is where we leave ourselves open to misunderstanding.

Honourable senators, I imagine that most Canadians have American relatives. Certainly this is true in western Canada. I have a sister who is married to an American lawyer in Spokane. They met when he came up here, not as a draft dodger but to join the Royal Canadian Air Force, before the Americans got into World War II, because he could not wait. My wife's two sisters are married to discharged American veterans of the United States Air Force. They served in World War II and in Korea.

When I visit the United States I am as comfortable there as I am anywhere in Canada. Sometimes I am even more comfortable there than I am in my own home, because no one is finding things for me to do. They just tell me to sit down and take it easy. This is our experience. We do not have any fight with the American people. But if we did not have sense enough to look out for ourselves and to protect our own interests, they would not have the respect for us they have now.

True, we share this continent. Any attack on Canada is in effect an attack on the United States. If we wanted to play a really cold-blooded part, we could do as the Swiss and the Swedes have done, we could hold ourselves aloof. I do not think it is the part of the Canadian makeup to allow ourselves to be protected by "Big Brother" without at least making a decent attempt to solve our own problems.

It was from Canada and not from the United States that the idea of NATO evolved. The situation has changed, but I am proud of the part we have had in securing the peace in Europe since World War II. It was in Canada that the idea of the intervention force, the United Nations force to keep the peace between Palestine and Egypt, came into being in—

Hon. Mr. Martin: 1949.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Yes, 1949. The idea came from Canada. We have made a contribution by way of ideas, and ideas can be as important as weapons. Since then we have maintained our international responsibility in a way we can be proud of, and I hope we will continue doing so. This is acceptable to the United States. I have no objection, if they come to us and explain to our Government and our Department of Defence that they need military bases here. I would have no hesitation letting them have these bases, with proper safeguards for Canadian sovereignty.

I do not think it serves any useful purpose to say that we have only paper sovereignty in the north. We have something better than that. It may be that just inviting the royal family and waving the flag does not amount to much, but the fact that the world knows we are there helps to place world opinion on our side, which is something important that is sometimes overlooked.

Russia has recently shown that she is pretty susceptible to the pressures of world opinion. The United States has long been susceptible to world opinion, and so, although we are small, we never stand alone. Let us not forget that.

I think all honourable senators have got a copy of this book; it is Servan-Schreiber's The American Challenge. It tells how the American multi-national corporations have moved into Europe, not bringing their own capital but coming in with their credit and then using British or European capital and gradually squeezing the Europeans out of their own businesses. If that is the lesson for people in France and elsewhere in Europe, it is a lesson for us.

Some years ago we concluded the Columbia River Treaty with the United States. As the power potential developed, British Columbia would have been entitled to a large amount of that power. They were given the alternative of waiting and taking the power when it became available, or accepting a cash payment and letting the power go downstream. They took the $265 million in cash and then used part of it to pay for building the dam on the Peace River in northern British Columbia. By the time that power comes from northern British Columbia down into the industrial area near Vancouver it is going to be more expensive power than would have been the case had they kept their own power in the first place.

What are the Americans doing with the power they bought? American business is going to use it to turn wheels which were not there before the power became available—wheels which would have come to where the power was available had it been only available in Canada.

I am going to give some free advice to Mr. Bourassa, the Premier of Quebec, which he may not want. I do not think as a Canadian that he is solving our problem or his problem of getting jobs by building a $2 billion power development in northern Quebec if he is going to sell all the power to the United States—unless he wants his people to beat a path to the end of that high line to work in the factories where the wheels are going to be turning.

What we need is government direction and policy to control the use of our raw materials, in particular our power, so that we will get the growth we ought to get.

I have much respect for the United States. Canada came into being as a nation by courtesy of the British Royal Navy. We remain an independent nation today by courtesy of the Strategic Air Command of the United States. I am most conscious of that fact. Nevertheless, that does not mean that I have to go on my knees and say, "Hear, hear!" every time an American comes along with an idea, whoever he may be. I have never seen an American yet who had any respect for a person who would be servile in his presence. On the other hand, the Americans will have more respect for us and value us more, just as we will be more valuable to ourselves, if we show them that we will be their friends—as equals, but not at any price.

Why should we just ship all of our raw resources down to the United States? Certainly, California alone has a higher population than Canada at the present time and they could use up the whole water output of the Mackenzie River. No doubt they would be quite happy if we wanted to divert the whole of the Mackenzie River into the great Rocky Mountain trench and pump it down to them. By such a diversion all the water that now drains into the Arctic Ocean could be sent to California and Nevada. What that would do to our ecology in the north I have no idea, but there is no doubt that they could make use of that resource. From more than 50 miles north of Los Angeles right down to the Mexican border there is almost one solid city—just another monument to man's inhumanity to man.

But the challenge to us as Canadians is not to sell our resources to the Americans for their use but quietly to go on building up our own business, running our own affairs and developing our sense of responsibility to our community.

A businessman might well say, by way of justification, that he had to sell out because he had to look out for himself. There is an old saying to this effect: "If I don't look out for myself, who will look out for me?" Unfortunately, many people have only heard that part of the saying. The rest of it says, "If I look out for only myself, what good am I?"

So I say to the businessmen in Canada: "Look out for yourselves. The better you look out for yourselves the better you can look out for your neighbour, too. But don't forget that when you have looked out for yourself, unless you can look out for your neighbour too you have wasted your life. And to what avail are the riches you have built up, if you do not use them to a proper end? Even if they are put in your coffin with you, you will have no further use for them. Your immortality may rest solely in the good that your riches do after you have departed."

Well, honourable senators, the Americans are not about to attack us. I think I can assure them from this house that they need not fear that we are about to attack them. But we will be masters in our own house! We will be masters in our own house and we hope we will be good hosts! We will share with our guests whatever God makes available to us. All we ask of our guests is that they be ordinarily polite and have good manners whenever they come to live with us.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I fully anticipate that Senator Choquette will propose to speak on this subject, although perhaps not today. I look forward to what he will have to say on the subject.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 1, 1971, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 1, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

FELICITATIONS

HON. PAUL MARTIN, P.C.—RECIPIENT OF HUMANITARIAN AWARD

HON. RHÉAL BELISLE—RECIPIENT OF HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise to extend my most heartfelt congratulations to two of our colleagues who were recently honoured in recognition of meritorious services.

The Leader of the Government had bestowed upon him last week a singular honour. He was appointed a "Grand Officier de l'Ordre Académique de l'Union internationale du bien public" which, in translation, is even more impressive—"Grand Officer of the Academic Order of the International Union of Public Welfare". Few of us knew of his being so honoured because with characteristic humility he did not direct his office to apprise us of the fact.

This award is granted for excellence and devotion in the service of humanity, and I can think of no one more deserving than the Leader of the Government.

The other senator is our colleague on this side, Senator Rhéal Belisle, who had conferred upon him last Saturday by the Laurentian University of Sudbury an honorary Doctor of Laws degree. I deem this to be an appropriate way of honouring a man who has for so long given unstintingly of himself in the service of his province and of his beloved Sudbury. Senator Belisle's noteworthy efforts in the preservation of the French language and culture in Northern Ontario, plus his significant contributions in the field of education, make him fully deserving of all the grand awards his fellow Franco-Ontarians may wish to give him. We offer him our most sincere congratulations, and we firmly hope he will not cease to labour to spread the French culture throughout Canada.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to join in congratulating both the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and my good friend the honourable Senator Belisle. I know this is not an unusual event for the Leader of the Government. He has received many degrees and many honours throughout his lifetime, and I am sure he will pardon me if I spend a few moments more on my colleague Senator Belisle than I do on him, because I believe this is the first time Senator Belisle has gone through this.

I have consulted the "red book" and I know the list of degrees after Senator Martin's name. It is probably the longest list of honorary degrees of those presently in Parliament. However, there is one thing that pleased me about Senator Belisle's degree and that is that it was a local boy receiving honour at home. There is an old adage which says that prophet is without honour in his own country. I do not suggest that Senator Belisle is a prophet; he has the proportion for one, he has the wisdom for one, but he does not have the long, flowing beard one normally associates with the prophet. It is pleasing to see someone who has laboured so much for so long, through many different ways for his own area, honoured within his own area.

Senator Belisle received this degree on the 25th anniversary of his entry into municipal, provincial, and federal politics. Recently I saw a reprint of an article which showed Senator Belisle opening his 100th school, counting both public and separate schools. By an odd coincidence, this was the same place where as a small boy he had attended a much smaller school. Today it is a beautiful multi-million dollar building. I am sure he received much satisfaction from opening that school.

Then he went on to obtain in his own quiet way a teachers' college for French-speaking people in northern Ontario. That was school 101. He then took an active part in the development of Laurentian University, and after his summons to the Senate he became a member of the Board of Governors and then Chairman of the Board of Governors of Laurentian University. He opened that as his 102nd educational facility.

I like to think of it in this way, honourable senators, with Senator Belisle beginning with small public and separate schools, going through to the high schools and then to the universities. Certainly, we can be proud of Senator Belisle and in a way envy him the fact that he has contributed so much to education. One hundred and two ribbon-cutting ceremonies for the inauguration of facilities must inevitably make Senator Belisle the champion ribbon-cutter of the Senate.

Incidentally, in all fairness I must advise honourable senators that Senator Belisle is very active in the finance committee of Laurentian University, and it is quite possible that you will hear from him in that regard. He has received many honours in Sudbury and is highly thought of in that area. On the occasion of Sudbury's 75th anniversary this spring, the Sudbury Chamber of Commerce patented and developed a special honour for those members of the Chamber of Commerce who had particularly contributed to the development of the north. The honour takes the form of a most interesting desk set which is composed of ten minerals from ten different mines which are moulded together in the form of a smelter, including the four highest chimneys in the world. This honour was awarded to only a very few people selected by the Chamber of Commerce. I mention this fact to illustrate just how highly regarded Senator Belisle is, not only by the Sudbury Chamber of Commerce but by his own area.

In him they have an even better friend than we have here, because they have a good advocate and a very distinguished son.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Flynn for the generous impulse which drove him to make kind references to myself. I greatly appreciate this. Also I thank honourable senators for their recognition of what Senator Flynn had to say. I should like to take this opportunity to offer to Senator Belisle my warmest congratulations on the deserving honour given to him by Laurentian University.

[Translation]

The Honorary Doctor of Laws degree bestowed on Senator Belisle by the university of his city is a testimonial of his devotion to the university and to the city of Sudbury.

I heartily congratulate him in all our names.

[English]

Hon. Rhéal Belisle: Honourable senators, if I may I should like to associate myself with what has been said about the honourable the Leader of the Government. It is indeed heartwarming to hear my colleagues express approval of the honour which was conferred upon me by Laurentian University of Sudbury. Having had the privilege and the honour, as it was said by my colleague, to be its godfather, one of its governors and to be the Chairman of the Board of Governors for many years, it gives me a deep feeling of satisfaction to have been recognized and honoured by my own people. To paraphrase what Senator Phillips has said, since I am fully aware of what Christ said to the effect that nobody is a prophet in his own community, I am all the more pleased with and proud of this particular award and those that have been so kindly given to me in the past by the people of Sudbury. The friendships I have made in serving the people of Sudbury shall long be treasured, because these friendships are the type which can weather the inevitable changes wrought by time. The warm glow of these friendships has enriched and will continue to enrich my life. The faith in my humble person to which such an award bears testimony touches me deeply and arouses in me a deep desire to continue to serve my community and my country to the best of my ability and as long as God sees fit to preserve me.

The thoughtful comments of honourable senators, together with the events of this past weekend, will be etched in my memory. I shall long remember and hold dear what has been said about me.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the honour you confer upon me by adding your congratulations to those I have received from the people of Sudbury makes me very happy and also very grateful to you all.

Unparallelled satisfaction is derived from service rendered to one's city, province and country and even though service to the community can result in disappointments, there are nevertheless many compensating blessings.

Happiness is loving one's work and ever seeking to give better service. That is what I have tried to do.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to provide an addendum to what I said a moment ago, which is to thank Senator Phillips warmly for his very kind remarks.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate my good friend Senator Rhéal Belisle on the honour that was conferred upon him by Laurentian University at Sudbury. It is a very deserving honour for a man who has contributed so much to Sudbury and surrounding districts, to the people of Sudbury and particularly to a new university which is bilingual in character. I should like to wish him everything that goes with the title of "doctor".

Senator Belisle has often teased me since I took my seat in the Senate. When he wants to get even with me he always calls me "doctor" instead of "senator". I shall now be able to get back at him, and say that I am happy that he has joined the ranks of doctors.

Senator Belisle has worked hard. I am sure he will continue to make a great contribution to the Senate, to the people of Sudbury and to Laurentian University.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-241, to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved, with leave, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, since this bill requires two days' notice, has the honourable senator leave to proceed with this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

PARKING FACILITIES FOR SENATORS—QUESTION

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, in former days there was a very honourable senator here who every now and again raised points which he thought would be useful to the Senate. I am referring to Senator Jean-François Pouliot. I do not intend to take his place in raising issues in this house, but tonight I want to refer to a memorandum which is on my desk. It is addressed to all senators, and reads as follows:

> I have been asked by the Committee of Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to inform honourable senators that no parking will be available for their guests, on the Senate sitting days, due to lack of space.

This brings up a question I have had in mind for a long time. I never could understand why so much money is spent on the grounds here without taking into consideration one of the necessities of these days, parking. I ask the honourable Leader of the Government whether he could inform himself as to the future use of these grounds. Will we have parking of any sort at any time? This is not a small privilege that is being taken away from us.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not believe that it is my responsibility but, on the assumption that it is, I will take this question as notice and see if I can provide a satisfactory answer to Senator Desruisseaux as soon as possible. I also am concerned sometimes with respect to parking.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I would ask the honourable leader what procedure I should follow here? Who should I ask?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think you asked the right person.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I suppose I will be putting my neck in a noose if I rise at this point, but I do so in order to inform my honourable friend across the way as to what led to the decision which he and all other honourable senators received in the mail today.

We have had complaints about the need for parking space for members of the Senate. One such complaint was expressed in the chamber not long ago by one of our colleagues. He said he never could find a place to park when he came here on Tuesday evening to attend the Senate. One reason for the scarcity was that up to that time some senators had been able to obtain special parking privileges for their guests who were attending a reception or coming to dinner.

This subject was discussed at some length at the meeting of the Internal Economy Committee last week. The official in charge of our parking explained the situation. As I recall, it was agreed without any dissenting voice that on those days when the Senate sits, due to lack of parking space, senators would be requested not to ask for special parking privileges for their guests. This is only for the convenience of senators and certainly not to promote their inconvenience. There are three other days in the week when senators may have the privilege of getting parking space for their guests, but when the house is sitting there is just not that much space available.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: There is a lot of space on the hill.

Hon. Mr. Smith: There are many cars on the hill also.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Why are so few spaces allotted to senators out of all the parking space on the hill? When walking by the East Block in the winter we have to walk in the middle of the road. Cars are parked all over the sidewalk. Why have we been allotted such a small area for parking? That is the question.

Hon. Mr. Smith: I have a very simple answer to that. I agree with my honourable friend that the space is small, but we have about twice as much as we had a few years ago. Within the last few weeks we have been allotted six more spaces for the use of senators. This is the time of year when many of our members, perhaps many more than was the case some years ago, bring their cars to the Senate from their homes, particularly from Montreal, Toronto, and other nearer places. This problem only arises because we cannot get sufficient space allocated to us by the Department of Public Works. I think any further discussion on this subject should take place at the next meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: My point in raising this question is to have the whole situation reconsidered. I am not complaining; I do not use the parking, nor do my guests, but it is about time the whole question of these grounds was re-appraised.

Hon. Mr. Smith: We do not own the grounds, nor do we control them. That is the problem. The Department of Public Works is responsible for the administration of the grounds.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If the honourable gentlemen were interested in the grounds it would not be a bad idea if now and then they attended caucus. The grounds, parking facilities, and many other questions that affect them are fully discussed in caucus. Since they are absent from caucus, naturally they wonder about these things. However, plans to provide improved facilities for members and senators have been under discussion for the last two months.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I would like something done about this. It is a very strange thing to say that I should attend caucus. I do not go to caucus because I am a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which holds its meetings at about the same time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. AND JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, now that our parking privileges and rights have been resolved, I should like to inquire with respect to another privilege. Does the Leader of the Government not agree with me that the protocol signed in Moscow on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister, and the communiqué issued after his visit should be explained in this house with appropriate comments of the Government Leader?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before we came into the chamber Senator O'Leary indicated his intention to put this question to me. I did not have an opportunity to discuss the matter with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) beforehand. On this account I thought I would not tonight ask leave of the Senate to explain the communiqué, which was tabled tonight, and the protocol, which I tabled last week. However, I think the question is a proper one. The Senate should be informed about the nature of the protocol and the communiqué.

With this in view, with leave of the Senate, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, June 2, 1971, I will call the attention of the Senate to the protocol done at Moscow, May 19, 1971 between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics respecting consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations, tabled in the Senate on May 25, 1971, and to the joint communiqué on the visit to the Soviet Union of the Prime Minister of Canada, May 17 to 28, 1971, tabled in the Senate, Tuesday, June 1, 1971.

REGULATIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, on May 18 Senator Phillips asked me this question:

> What is the reason for and significance of section 3(1) of the Regulations published in Part I of the Canada Gazette, dated May 15, 1971, by which television receivers and extra-oral dental X-ray equipment are prescribed as classes of radiation emitting devices for the purposes of the Radiation Emitting Devices Act?
> Were any discussions held with the Canadian Dental Association regarding this regulation?

The Government's answer to this question is as follows:

> The Radiation Emitting Devices Act (1970) is designed to prohibit the sale or import of any device capable of producing radiation when the device does not meet specified standards with respect to its design, construction or function. Notice of certain proposed regulations for two classes of device was printed in the Canada Gazette of May 15, 1971. This was done to give interested parties an opportunity to comment and make representation before the regulations are promulgated in final form. This procedure provides an opportunity for discussions with the Canadian Dental Association and any other organization or person.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I thank the Leader of the Government for his detailed explanation. As one of those concerned with the regulation, I find it very strange that when speaking of radioactivity we set the minimum time, which is one-tenth of a second, and there is no mention of a maximum time. On what basis are these regulations drawn up?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I can give any fuller answer than the one I have just given. The regulations which have appeared in the Canada Gazette are notice to those interested to make representations before the regulations take final form. That kind of question, of course, can under the Statutory Instruments Act be responded to in more detail.

HON. ALLISTER GROSART

FELICITATIONS ON ELECTION AS PRESIDENT, CANADIAN BRANCH, COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure I express the views of all honourable senators when I note with satisfaction the election of Senator Grosart as President of the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He joins a distinguished company of former presidents, of whom Senator Roebuck and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) have indeed been distinguished personalities in this organization.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I should like to join the Leader of the Government in congratulating Senator Grosart. Not only does he follow Senator Roebuck and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), but he is the first senator from the Opposition to occupy this very important position.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 3:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-207 is described as an omnibus bill. It is not the type of legislation we have often in this Parliament, but it is a form of statute that is used frequently in provincial legislatures as a statute law amendment act. The bill has n ne parts and 34 clauses. Seven statutes are amended in the body of the bill, some nine statutes are amended by Schedule B, and there are two new statutes enacted, namely, the Department of the Environment Act and the Ministries and Ministers of State Act.

The bill, once enacted, will come into force on proclamation. Clearly, because of the complexity of the measure, it is a committee bill and if the Senate gives it second reading I shall move that it be referred to an appropriate standing committee of the Senate, which I think would be the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Honourable senators, may I first of all deal with Parts I and II of this bill in a general way? Part I deals with the Department of the Environment, a new department. Part II deals with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Heretofore, national policies on resource development and national policies for the protection of the environment have been the responsibility of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Each one of these aspects of its work has been complementary to the other.

Development, of course, was the original priority for this department but soon the by-products of development began to raise somewhat ugly heads. There was pollution of land, air and water; there was the desolation of forests, the destruction of fisheries, and the ravaging of wasting assets. There was waste, disfiguration, and erosion of the earth. All of these have become problems, particularly in the last few years, requiring urgent crusading correcting steps to be taken.

Perhaps it is not inappropriate to say that, in a sense, the debate which has been going on in the country has been highly charged emotionally. I am not being critical when I say that. I state it simply to be a fact. In addition to the pollution created by the exploitation of our natural resources, another aspect of pollution has developed within our urban centres. Noise, sanitation requirements, the obsolescence of housing facilities, the need for infrastructure, and problems of traffic and parking have plagued our growing cities. All of these affect the living conditions of the people of the country.

Honourable senators, development, particularly in the field of our resource industries, remains a primary national goal. In the provinces, territories, and inland and offshore waters Canada is richly endowed with resources. The conservation and orderly development of resources are of great economic importance, and also of great social importance to our communities. The protection of the environment, which is threatened by the speed of industrial, scientific and technological change, is an important national problem.

The policy of development cannot proceed at the expense of the correction of pollution. They present separate problems. The policies are separate; the objectives and approaches are different. In the field of pollution control particularly we now know that we require highly trained experts with definite responsibilities. We also require the setting of priorities. In addition, we will be required to supply vast funds.

Certainly there is an overlap from development to pollution control. One can think of mining communities, in which, say, one of the great mineral resources of the country is being developed. In the development of that resource mountains of waste products are produced, and noxious fumes and smoke are emitted from the refineries and other processing plants. Sometimes, however, these great man-made mountains are not simply blots on the landscape because frequently, through technological advance, it is possible—and it has happened in our mining industry—for some of these great heaps of slag and waste to be remined for products that were not known to have any value at the time they were created. The sum and substance of the matter is that there must be co-ordination between these two ministries—the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which has an interest primarily in development, and the Department of the Environment which is primarily interested in protecting the ecology.

There is another conflicting aspect to the general problem, and that is the jurisdictional situation in our federal state. The provinces, by and large, own the resources within their boundaries and control their development. The federal authority owns the resources in the territories in our north, and the offshore resources, and it is mainly responsible for resource problems touching the international aspect of development. The federal authority should not and cannot infringe upon the provincial position. What is required is federal leadership and initiative in the national interest, and co-operation with the provincial authorities in the field of protection of the environment, and a reasoned realistic approach to the financial problems. Above all, we must have careful planning and recognized priorities, and we should proceed project by project.

Honourable senators, I should like to deal briefly now with the Department of the Environment, as the bill proposes to establish it. There is a provision in clause 3 for a new department, a new minister, and a new deputy minister. The duties of the minister, where there is federal jurisdiction, touch seacoast and inland fisheries; the renewable resources of the country, such as the forests the birds, the flora and fauna; water; meteorology; the quality of water, air and soil; technical surveys with respect to all these resources, and boundary water problems. As you are aware, matters concerning boundary waters historically have been handled by the International Joint Commission, and by the Department of External Affairs in certain instances. That commission, of course, will continue to have those problems as its main responsibility.

The duties of the minister also involve the setting of standards for the quality of the total environment in Canada, for pollution control within the federal jurisdiction, for the protection and enhancement of living conditions, and for co-operating with the provinces and other agencies which have a special interest in this field. The minister is to report annually to Parliament.

I should tell the house that schedule A on page 16 of the bill lists 19 different statutes which are hereafter to be administered by the Department of the Environment.

Part II of the bill is headed "Energy, Mines, Resources and Technical Surveys". This part is designed to clarify and separate the responsibilities of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources from those of the Department of the Environment. It beams the department's functions to the development side of resources. The department will have assigned to it such matters as the regulation of oil, gas and mineral development in the lands and waters owned by the Crown in the right of Canada. It is to deal with technical surveys in respect of resource development, energy development policies, mining and metallurgical research, geological surveys and geological research, field and air survey, and mapping and charting with all the new technology now available in that field. It will be concerned with continental shelf programs and marine surveys. The ministry is to be responsible also for co-operation with the provincial authorities in these various areas.

Certain personnel have, in fact, been transferred under the Transfer of Duties Act and will now be available to the Department of the Environment when that department is authorized by Parliament. Honourable senators might be interested to know that there will be some 5,300 employees, formerly with the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, who will be available to the new department, and some 250 employees from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, mainly concerned with wildlife. From the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources 2,500 employees dealing with water resources and marine surveys will also be available to the new department. From the Department of National Health and Welfare 139 officials, whose main responsibility is air pollution control, will also be available, and from the Department of Transport, particularly from the meteorological services, there will be some 2,400 persons. In all, a total of some 10,500 people will be transferred from other departments and made available to the new department.

Part III of the bill is very short. It deals with the National Research Council. In looking at the bill you will have noticed that clause 10 in Part II repeals section 6(e) of the Resources and Technical Surveys Act, which gives the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources control of astronomical observatories. By virtue of clause 12 in Part III, astronomical observatories become the responsibility of the National Research Council. I think it quite appropriate that that should be so.

Clauses 13 to 24 in Part IV of the bill deal with ministries and ministers of state. It is proposed in this part that a certain number of ministries of state be established by Order in Council to preside over a specific portion of the public service in matters of federal responsibility. By proclamation the name of the ministry, the area of administration to be surveyed, and the duties of the minister shall be made known. It is in contemplation that under these clauses of the bill there will be a small area of policy responsibility which will devolve upon ministries so set up by Order in Council. The matters will, of course, all be within the federal jurisdiction, but it is not intended that the minister or his department should be responsible for the day-to-day operations of some of the agencies for which it is proposed the minister should set policy.

For example, if there is a ministry to be set up in charge of housing, and it is to have within its jurisdiction policy matters in respect of the operations of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, it is not intended that that minister should be responsible for the day-to-day operations of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The administration of that agency of the Government, and the administration of any other Crown corporation, will remain where it is, but the policy is to be settled by the minister in charge of the particular ministry of state.

There is power in the bill to change the name of a given ministry of state, to change its functions as required, and to terminate the ministry once it is felt that the need for it no longer exists. There was an amendment made in the House of Commons which provides that before a ministry of state is set up the text of the proposed Order in Council should be tabled. That Order in Council must be approved by a resolution of the House of Commons before there is a proclamation setting up the ministry. The debate in the house on such occasion is to be limited to seven hours.

From clause 19 on, the bill deals with ministers of state for ministries of state. These ministers will be of the Privy Council; they will be in the Cabinet. Each minister will have as his chief executive officer not a deputy minister but an official to be designated as the secretary to the ministry of state for whatever the appropriate designation of the ministry of state might be. The minister's powers and duties are to be assigned either by Order in Council or by legislation. Indeed, they may be assigned by existing legislation if a minister is to be put in charge of a certain area in respect of which there is existing legislation and for which certain policy decisions and programs are to be undertaken. The minister of state is required, as is any other minister, to make an annual report to Parliament of the work which he performs in his conduct of the ministry.

In addition to the ministers of state in charge of ministries of state, the bill also proposes there shall be other ministers of state who will be of the Privy Council and members of the Cabinet. These ministers will not preside over ministries of state. The intention is to designate such ministers to assist ministers who hold portfolios. Such ministers, who are in a sense assistant ministers or associate ministers, will have access to departmental services and facilities. They will be required to perform such duties as Parliament may prescribe or as worked out with the minister holding the portfolio with whom they will serve. They can, for example, be authorized to deputize for the minister with portfolio in certain cases. I should tell honourable senators that there is no limit set in the bill to the number of such ministers of state who can be appointed. These ministers will have a status somewhat analogous to that of ministers without portfolio, but they have their individual specific duties to perform under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, duties designated pursuant to a statute, or duties prescribed by arrangement with the minister who holds a portfolio.

At this point it might be appropriate for me to make some general comment about the ministries of state. As honourable senators know, in the organization of government at given times departments are set up, ministers are appointed, and their duties are prescribed by statute. I can remember many years ago the existence of a department known as the Department of the Interior. But the problems of government grow and become more complex. For example, the Minister of the Interior was responsible at one stage for Indians and Eskimos, for the north, for energy, mines and technical services, for industry, and for communications. When the problems became too much for one department to deal with, the remedy taken by Parliament was to establish by a bill a new department with all the apparatus of a department. But we live now in an area of fast change, an era of technological advance, research, invention and innovation.

In the United States the cumbersome business of going before Congress to establish new departments has been circumscribed by establishing new agencies of government under executive or presidential decree. Honourable senators will remember the proliferation of such agencies in the days of the New Deal, the so-called alphabetical agencies—the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the like. In this country the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act was available to shift the load from one portfolio to another. It is now proposed that a minister of state and a ministry of state with limited jurisdiction, with terminable and adjustable functions, with special regard to and attention for urgent work in areas of national importance, should be set up in the manner I have described and as set out in this bill. It seems to me to be the kind of proposal which when used reasonably and responsibly should commend itself to people who like to see the work of government done efficiently. I have confidence that any government in office in this country would have that sense of responsibility.

Honourable senators, I hesitate to embark upon Part VII because it deals with the Public Service Superannuation Act. Without doubt this is the most complicated piece of legislation, next to the Income Tax Act, we have on our statute books. Therefore, rather than attempt to describe what the bill proposes clause by clause—although I have the references here if any one requires them—I propose to set out seven different cases which are dealt with by the bill, and discuss them in a practical way. Generally speaking, what is proposed in these clauses, which begin with clause 27, is that it should be possible to have earlier retirement for members of the Public Service of Canada—that is earlier retirement upon a reasonable pension basis. At the present time the earliest age for retirement under the Public Service Superannuation Act is 60 years, with a certain minimum number of years of service, and without which a pension cannot be granted. It is now sought to provide a facility whereby public servants can retire at an earlier age and still receive pension benefits in certain cases and under certain circumstances.

Case No. 1 covers the situation where a public servant at age 55 and with 30 years of service can retire and receive an immediate annuity based on the length of his service. The best six years of his salary history are taken into account when he retires in these circumstances.

In case No. 2 the present law is restated. It is repeated here simply to make the draftsmanship a little easier. The law now allows a public servant to retire and to take a deferred annuity at age 60 if he has had five years of service in the Public Service of Canada. As I say, that situation prevails at the present time.

Case No. 3 covers the situation of a public servant who has reached the age of 50 and has had at least 25 years in the Public Service of Canada. That person can retire and receive an immediate annuity. The amount of the immediate annuity is the amount of the deferred annuity to which he would have been entitled, less an amount determined by the formula which is in the bill.

I know that sounds like so much gobbledygook. However, I will give honourable senators an example. Let us assume a deferred annuity to which such person would be entitled is $8,000 and he retires at the age of 50 with 25 years of service. The immediate annuity granted would be $6,000.

Case No. 4 is a situation envisaging a public servant who has reached the age of 55 years, who has had actual service of more than 10 years, and is then dismissed. Upon dismissal he or she would be entitled to an immediate annuity, the amount of which would be the amount of the deferred annuity to which he or she would be entitled, less a certain amount determined by the formula prescribed in the bill.

Let us assume the deferred annuity in this case is $4,000 and the public servant is dismissed at age 55 after 11 years of service. The immediate annuity to which he or she would be entitled would be $3,000. However, there is provision in the bill whereby on dismissal the Treasury Board may permit the immediate annuity to be the same amount as the deferred annuity. In this case, instead of receiving $3,000 such person would receive $4,000 annually as a pension.

Case No. 5 is a situation where a public servant has attained the age of 50 years or more and has served less than 20 years. Retirement is with ministerial consent. The annuity payable at 50 years is the amount of the deferred annuity to which he or she would be entitled less the formula set out in the bill. Let me take a practical example, and assume that the public servant has served 15 years, has reached the age of 50, and is entitled to a deferred annuity of $4,000. The immediate annuity in this case would be $2,000.

Case No. 6 enables a public servant to retire at any time and to receive a return of the contributions he has made under the Public Service Superannuation Act. If that person seeks a return of contributions, is 45 years of age or more, and has at least 10 years of public service, he may do so. However, there is no return of contributions made by the public servant after September 30, 1967 because of a complicated set of circumstances which arose under the Pension Benefits Standards Act and locked in benefits, all of which were the result of legislation passed in Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and Saskatchewan affecting pension rights of public servants. This is obviously a problem for the committee. The situation prevailing under the Pension Benefits Standards Act is an equitable situation which public servants, both federal and provincial, have accepted.

Case No. 7 covers a situation envisaged in the event of a retirement of a deputy minister who has served at least 10 years as a deputy minister. Should he retire after 10 years or more of service he may continue to pay into the Public Service Superannuation Fund until he is 60 years of age, but he must pay at double the rate of contribution he would have paid when in the service. While in the service, like all other public servants, he pays 7 per cent. After retirement he will pay 14 per cent.

Part VIII deals with salaries of ministers. It is proposed that ministers of state presiding over a ministry of state shall be paid, in accordance with the Salaries Act, the same as a minister with portfolio, namely $15,000. Other ministers of state who act as assistants to ministers with portfolios or in conjunction with ministers with portfolios will be paid at the same rate as a minister without portfolio, namely $7,500 a year.

Schedule B of the bill provides, because it is not provided elsewhere in the bill, that the Postmaster General of Canada, when separately appointed under the Great Seal of Canada, shall receive the salary of a minister with portfolio, namely $15,000.

I have here a note about the salary of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I do not think that I need refer to it. Whatever he receives, he is worth it, and perhaps a good deal more. I wish they had thought about raising it when I was leader, but they did not.

I need not detain the Senate very long on the transitional provisions.

Clause 29 in Part IX of the bill provides that at the beginning of its operation the Department of Environment will embrace only elements of the existing sections of the Public Service which are transferred to it. The appropriations for those sections of the Public Service transferred to the new department for the current fiscal year shall be applicable to those sections of the new department to which those people are assigned. For example, the appropriation for the Fisheries Research Board for the present fiscal year shall apply after the board is transferred from the Department of Fisheries and Forestry to the Department of the Environment. The same applies to other statutes set out in Schedule A of the bill.

Clause 30 is a complicated legal type of clause that need not bother the Senate very much. It simply provides that the name of the Department of the Environment or the Minister or Deputy Minister of the Environment, used in acts, orders, contracts, leases or licences or other legal documents shall be substituted for the department, minister or deputy, under any other act, contract, lease or licence, as shown in Schedule A of the bill. For example, in certain clauses of the statutes which are set out in the schedules of the bill, for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, you will now read the Minister of the Environment; for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Minister of the Environment, or Deputy Minister of the Environment.

It is also provided in clause 31 that provision be made for co-ordinating this bill, which is obviously complicated, with the revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. Those statutes, as honourable senators know, have been distributed, and although not yet proclaimed will be very shortly.

For some reason or other, two sections of my notes became misplaced. They deal with two other parts of the bill. Part V of the bill deals with parliamentary secretaries. At the present time there are no more than 16, and it is proposed that there shall be no more in the future than the number of ministers with portfolio in the cabinet. There are now 27 such ministers, so the increase in the number of parliamentary secretaries will be 11. I should say that no minister without portfolio and no minister of state of either class shall be entitled to a parliamentary secretary.

Part VI of the bill is a very simple provision. It provides that when the Postmaster General is appointed under the Great Seal he is the Postmaster General of Canada. However, if no Postmaster General of Canada is appointed under the Great Seal, the Minister of Communications is the Postmaster General.

Honourable senators, I apologize abjectly for the length of time I have taken to explain this measure. It is complicated legislation, designed to assist the process of Government housekeeping. I know there are probably controversial clauses in the bill, and they will certainly receive all the attention that this house deems it fit to give them. The bill should go to committee, but I would ask honourable senators to consider it appropriate to have it in committee at an early date. If in fact Parliament is to adjourn for the summer recess by the end of this month, it is inevitable that we shall soon receive much more legislation. With that in mind I make a plea that the debate on this bill proceed as expeditiously as possible so that we can refer the measure to committee, and thereby not press ourselves too much in the consideration of other legislation to come.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I may be a little too late, but when the honourable senator said that the bill should be referred to committee at an early date, I wonder what he meant by that?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I suggest no time limit on it, obviously. I simply draw attention to the fact that we usually have a great rush of legislation before the long summer recess and we are not very busy now. Therefore, I think if we proceed on this bill with an eye on the clock, on the legislative timetable, we will serve ourselves better because we will have a lot of other legislation at the very end.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When the honourable senator dealt with that part of the bill providing for early retirement, he mentioned Case No. 6. He said that in certain circumstances a person who contributed to a retirement fund would not be entitled to a refund of contributions. I did not quite follow him. I believe he mentioned there were four provinces with legislation which would come into effect. I wonder if Senator Connolly would elaborate a little on that?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable Senator Macdonald, unfortunately this is the part of the bill about which I know the least and which I had great difficulty understanding. Senator Isnor asked the same question during my so-called explanation. I really do not consider I gave an adequate explanation of this clause.

[Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa-West).]

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps we could wait until the bill is referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That would be a good deal better. I could waste the time of the Senate in attempting to give the explanation from the notes I have. Frankly, they are not adequate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 27, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, calling the attention of the Senate to the Canadian film industry.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators—

Hon. Leopold Langlois: I will yield to the honourable Senator Quart.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the honourable Senator Quart speak now instead of the honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mrs. Quart: I was not in Ottawa when the honourable Senator Desruisseaux called the attention of this chamber to the Canadian film industry. Since reading Hansard of that day I heartily endorse his suggestion to explore the possibilities of improving the Canadian film industry to provide a solid foundation for the progressive development of the film industry in Canada.

If our Canadian film industry has not been up to the present a profitable business venture, perhaps it is because of the inferior quality of Canadian feature films, travelogues and documentaries. Granted that the competition from the United States, England, France, Italy and other countries has restricted to some degree the successful marketing of Canadian films, but what about Canada's market? Television, of course, has to a great extent hurt the film industry, but to further develop our film industry is a real challenge for Canadians, even though many feature films for Canadian television will still have to be imported.

In a previous presentation to this chamber, Senator Desruisseaux drew to our attention the CBC-TV presentation on January 25 of an historical film entitled, The Megantic Outlaw. There was a great furore in the Sherbrooke area after the presentation of that film. It would be interesting to know what answer the CBC gave to the Société d'Histoire des Cantons de l'Est when that society objected to the distortion of the historical facts in the film. Why was it filmed in Ontario and not in the Sherbrooke area, where the incident took place, and where some of the buildings in connection with the episode still stand? Distortions such as occurred in the film of The Megantic Outlaw shake one's confidence in the integrity of the CBC. I shall not repeat the enlightening statistics nor the persuasive arguments used by Senator Desruisseaux to press for a Senate inquiry.

I was in Rouyn-Noranda with the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada when honourable Senator Cameron spoke in the Senate on the Canadian film industry, but yesterday I read with interest the Senate Debates of March 16. Senator Cameron is a well-known authority on subjects dealing with the theatre and the performing arts. The School of Fine Arts in Banff is a monument to his administrative and artistic ability. I agree entirely with Senator Cameron when he suggests that, in proposing a program of encouragement for the Canada Film Development Corporation, perhaps doubling the $10 million made available to the corporation in 1967 would be one of the most productive investments Canada could make. In my humble opinion, additional revenue is absolutely necessary for the national film industry. But, as Senator Cameron mentioned, some standards of quality and decency must be met before films qualify for grants or loans. However, in justice to the National Film Board and the CBC, one must admit there are many excellent productions.

Senator Fergusson's contribution to the debate was most interesting. If I may inject a personal note, when she referred to Glen Ford it brought back one of many memories of World War II when the City of Quebec was chosen for the world première of a movie starring Glen Ford. Of course, you may know that Glen Ford was born in Portneuf, a municipality a few miles west of Quebec City. I believe his mother is still living there. You can imagine that was wonderful news for Quebec City, and our Women's Auxiliary of Military District No. 5 decided to use this occasion as a fund-raising project. We wrote and invited him to attend a reception in his honour and to be a guest at our debutantes' ball. Not risking a refusal, we used the feminine technique of asking his mother to plead our cause. We were thrilled when we received a gracious reply from Glen Ford's manager accepting our invitation. The ball was under the distinguished patronage of our lieutenant-governor of the time, Sir Eugène Fiset, and the officer commanding Military District No. 5, General Georges Vanier, our late Governor General. The debutantes and their friends were our ticket vendors, and the debutante who sold the most tickets won the coveted prize and honour of opening the ball with Glen Ford. It was an outstanding social and financial success.

Senator Fergusson also brought to our attention the project of Mr. Henry Beckman regarding the promotion of a Canadian Film Stars' Hall of Fame to be established in Canada, preferably in his own home territory, the Maritimes. But my concern is, why only a hall of fame for film stars? What about TV and radio stars, and stars of the legitimate theatre, and singers, musicians, theatrical producers, and so on? Nevertheless, I think it is an excellent idea.

When Senator Fergusson was speaking about outstanding Canadian actors, Senator John Connolly interjected, "What about the ladies?" This gave me food for thought, and my mind wandered back to many articles I had read about famous Canadian women. One particular story which I shall never forget was the opening of the Victoria Bridge in Montreal in August, 1860, when a great musical festival was staged to honour the presence of the Prince of Wales. Among the performers that evening was a 13-year old French Canadian girl with a marvellous soprano voice: her name was Emma Lajeunesse. She received great acclaim, but a public subscription to finance her further training was not sufficient, and so Emma moved to Albany, New York, whose citizens realized her remarkable talent and in 1868 sent her to study in Paris. A few years later she returned to New York, calling herself Madame Albani. Had the citizens of Montreal been more receptive she might have been called Madame Montreal. Ironically, on her triumphal tours of Canada a private railway car was placed at her disposal and she was acclaimed as "Canada's own".

Another Montrealer who gained international fame was Madame Donalda, but after her international success she returned to Montreal in 1937, where a few years later she founded the Montreal Opera Guild, which to this day stages operatic performances.

Other famous women from Montreal are Pierrette Alarie who, with her husband and frequent vocal partner, the tenor Léopold Simoneau, has been acclaimed in most opera houses in Europe and North America.

The famous Maureen Forrester was also a Montrealer, renowned primarily as one of the greatest artistes of this generation. She is the wife of the conductor Eugène Kash and the mother of five children. Like Pierrette Alarie, she has been able to combine marriage with a very successful career.

Montreal-born Madame Yvette Brindamour, after studying in Paris, founded a permanent theatre in 1949, Le Rideau Vert. Today it has the proud distinction of being the oldest established professional theatre in Canada. Madame Brindamour has included in her repertoire new Canadian plays, and several of the most successful of these have been the work of women playrights.

Madame Françoise Loranger won a Governor General's award with her play, Encore Cinq Minutes. And L'Exécution, written by Marie-Claire Blais, was produced with great success by Le Rideau Vert. Incidentally, Françoise Loranger has since 1964 produced a new play every year. Some senators may remember the news coverage she received for the very amusing comedy she wrote, Le Chemin du Roi, which translated means "The King's Road". This comedy was based on General de Gaulle's visit to Quebec in 1967. Madame Brindamour directs many of Le Rideau Vert's productions and frequently appears as the leading lady in her plays.

Women from La Belle Province have founded Le Théâtre Club, Le Théâtre de l'Égregore, and Monique Lepage and Francoise Berd were largely responsible for introducing contemporary and avant garde drama to Montreal.

Louise Latraverse, as co-director with Paul Buissoneau, established the live Théâtre de Quat' Sous, and Francoise Gratton is one of three directors of the Nouvelle Compagnie Théâtrale, which sponsors performances for high school students.

Summer theatres in the Province of Quebec are almost entirely directed by women. Le Théâtre de Marjolaine was founded and directed by Marjolaine Hébert, producing original musical comedies each year. Also, Mariette Duval is co-director of Théâtre des Marguerites near Trois-Rivières, while Monique Lepage has recently taken over the direction of the Piggry Theatre in the Eastern Townships. Then, of course we have the Playhouse "La Poudrière," an unusual 154-seat auditorium formerly used as an old military powder magazine, on Montreal's Île Ste-Hélène.It was a great attraction during Expo '67. It was founded in 1958 by Janine Beaubien, but it is not an all-year round theatre.

The French-language theatre in the Province of Quebec has produced a great number of actresses, some of whom are Monique Miller, Francine Racette, Louise Marleau, Denise Pelletier, and, of course, the famous Geneviève Bujold, who is a graduate of the Quebec Conservatory. She is one of the last Canadian actresses to become an international success with Richard Burton.

A striking development of the late 1960s has been the emergence of younger actresses who have received all their formal training in Canada. Of course, we must not forget Monique Leyrac, who won an international award singing Gilles Vigneault's Mon Pays. Just last Sunday afternoon the CBC radio presented Danielle Darice, who has recently returned to Canada from a successful tour of Europe. She was entertaining the servicemen at the air force base in Cold Lake, Alberta.

In mentioning so many women celebrities, I must admit that in the Province of Quebec men share well-merited fame with women. It is with pardonable pride that, as a citizen of La Belle Province, I have drawn the attention of this chamber to the women celebrities from my native province.

I read in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, May 29, that the National Film Board is filming its latest production in Montreal, Cold Journey, featuring Buckley Petawabano, Guy L'Ecuyer and Johnny Yesno. Other locations for this film are Le Pas, Manitoba, and Pelican Narrows, Saskatchewan. The story is about a young Indian torn between two worlds. Let us keep our fingers crossed that care will be taken with the production of this film to avoid any controversy.

I am sure many honourable senators here attended or read reports of the Drama Festival '71, which was held at the Ottawa National Arts Centres from May 15 to May 29. This was sponsored by the Dominion Drama Festival, but the format was changed this year. There was no competition, no adjudicator, only a co-ordinator, and no awards. The only award was the approval of the audience and the theatre critics. Invitations were sent many months ago to producers, amateur and professional theatre companies, schools and colleges across Canada, inviting them to participate. It was the largest theatre festival ever held in Canada. Twenty-four productions were staged in the National Arts Centre, but in all over one hundred concerts were given in public parks, and in smaller theatres in Ottawa.

On Saturday night, May 29, the CBC-TV carried a short review of eight or nine plays from cities in Canada presented during Festival '71. Bill Walker was the master of ceremonies of the one-hour program. It was most interesting and gave the viewer an idea of the wealth of talent we have in Canada. Most of the participants showed professional poise, plus beauty and brains, and could be used in the production of numerous Canadian films.

My interest over the years in the theatre has never waned and it compels me to offer a few suggestions which may or may not be of value. Perhaps it would be feasible to make arrangements to film theatrical productions such as those presented during the Drama Festival '71. I feel sure that a theatrical production, either dramatic or musical, produced by an amateur group in Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, or British Columbia, would be of great interest to Canadians from every part of the country and would help tremendously to encourage Canadian talent. Take, for instance, what is currently being staged at Le Rideau Vert in Montreal, the revival of Michel Tremblay's comedy, Les Belles Sœurs. It has been receiving rave notices from the critics, and one critic claimed that "it is so funny that one laughs until it hurts". Surely a comedy such as that would be well received and may be very much better than some imports we have to look at.

In drawing the attention of this honourable chamber to the women celebrities in the performing arts of my native province, I do so with pardonable pride, realizing full well and appreciating the great contribution made by women and men in every province of Canada.

Also, in mentioning only the women of La Belle Province, I had not the slightest intention of ignoring the men—that has never been my role in life. We all know that over the years numerous Canadian men and women have won national and international fame for their respective provinces as well as for Canada. As confession is good for the soul, I confess it was Senator Connolly's question to Senator Fergusson, "What about the ladies?" that started me on this feminine track.

In my opinion, the terms of reference of such a Senate committee as proposed by Senator Desruisseaux should be broad enough to include the study of Canadian theatrical productions, both professional and amateur, which could subsequently be filmed for TV programs. If arrangements could be made to film such productions, the cost of the National Film Board would, I am sure, be reduced to a minimum.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, it was most refreshing to hear the speech by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Quart). I wonder if she mentioned the name of Martha Allan? In the development of the fine arts in La Belle Province, there is another name, from tonight, that we should add to those great names: it is the name of the honourable Senator Quart.

Hon. Mrs. Quart: I may say to Senator Fournier that I did not mention that name, because the list would have been too long. The original list was so long that I had to choose some of those we read about in these days. I mentioned Madame Albani; Montreal missed out in her case. If she had been from Quebec City, I am sure we would not have done so.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

RULES OF THE SENATE

SUSPENSION OF RULE 28

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday last the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) raised a point of order on the suspension of Rule 28, which prohibits an honourable senator from speaking twice on any question before the Senate, except in explanation of a material part of his speech. I think Senator Flynn was wondering what impact this suspension had on Rules 29 and 30, which are still effective.

I have given some thought to this matter. I think my role is more to see that the rules of the house are enforced than to give a personal interpretation. It is my impression that at the last meeting of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders the feeling was that for the remainder of the session we should as an experiment suspend Rule 28. However, I do not think much thought was given to the impact of such suspension on other rules. Having said that, I wonder if the chairman of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Hon. Mr. Molson) would give us an explanation as to the intention of the committee in suspending Rule 28 for the remainder of the session. This would be of help not only to honourable senators but to me.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I think the suggestion to suspend Rule 28 for the balance of the session was made by Senator Grosart. The committee members were enthusiastic about the suggestion, mainly for the reason that they felt in this way we might have a more balanced and perhaps a little more lively debate in this chamber.

In recommending that Rule 28 be suspended, there was, perhaps, some oversight in that we did not consider the possibility of a conflict with Rules 29 or 30. There is no doubt in my mind that the intention was to permit a senator to speak more than once during a debate, and the inference was that if the mover spoke a second time it would not close the debate.

I suggest that for the balance of the session, and in conformity with the resolution adopted by the chamber, if the mover of a motion or, indeed, any senator, should speak twice in any debate, no notice be taken of it, unless when he finishes his speech there are no other senators wishing to speak on the motion. In other words, I think that it will be unnecessary for the time being for His Honour the Speaker to call attention to the fact that if the mover speaks the second time it will automatically have the effect of closing the debate. The intention is that he should be permitted to speak a second time without the debate being closed. However, the mover is ultimately going to close a debate if he speaks more than once and there are no further speakers. In that case the debate would automatically close.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, as I understand Senator Molson's interpretation, it would mean that if a senator, having moved a motion, rises with the intention of closing the debate, he really would not be closing it. He might never close it as long as any other senator wishes to speak.

If an honourable senator has moved a motion and does in fact wish to close the debate, it might be a preferable practice for His Honour the Speaker to say, "If the mover speaks at this time, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate."

I should think that, having moved a motion, if I wished to speak a second time, then, as mover, I might say, "I wish to speak a second time, but I do not thereby intend to close the debate." Then, if at some point I did wish to close the debate, it would be a proper procedure for His Honour to ask at that point, "Is it the intention of the mover to close the debate?" And if the assembly agreed that the debate should be closed, then it would close. Otherwise the mover would be in the ridiculous position that he could make a speech fully intending to close the debate only to find that, after he had concluded, the debate was continuing. And so it could go on and on.

It seems to me that at some point the person who moves the motion should be able to close the debate, after His Honour has drawn attention to the fact that at that time his speech would close the debate.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I suggest it is not even that complicated. Rule 29 simply says that the mover of second reading or of a substantive motion shall have the right to close the debate. It does not say that it shall necessarily be closed by the mover speaking twice. It merely says that if he does exercise that right and wishes at some point to close the debate, he can ask the house if he may at this point exercise the right of closing the debate under Rule 29.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the suggestion made by Senator Argue or to the interpretation given by Senator Grosart. But I think that in either case our rules would have to be clarified. From my understanding of the comments of Senator Molson, I think we should suspend Rules 28, 29, 30 and 31 for the remainder of the session. If we follow the suggestion of Senator Argue, I think we will have to amend our rules to make it clear that when the mover of any motion wants to close a debate, he should warn the Senate when he rises that it is his intention to do so.

The consequence of suspending Rule 28 is that many senators will speak two or three times to a motion. In fact, I do not think I am divulging any secret in saying that the idea behind Senator Grosart's recommendation, which the committee accepted, was to adopt the procedure followed in Committee of the Whole, where a senator may speak as often as he wants. If that is so, then, of course, you cannot accept the idea of Senator Argue without in fact amending the rules of the Senate. As a result, I think the whole matter should be referred back to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Mr. Molson: If it is the feeling of the chamber that all ambiguity would be removed if Rules 29 and 30 were suspended for the balance of this session—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And Rule 31.

Hon. Mr. Molson: No; I do not see that Rule 31 is affected.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What does it mean, then?

Hon. Mr. Molson: The conflicting ones are probably Rules 29 and 30.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But Rule 31 does not apply any more.

Hon. Paul Martin: Would Senator Molson permit a question? We now have an agreement with regard to Rule 28, and that agreement stands. Would not the wisest thing be for the Rules Committee to consider the whole matter de novo, in light of observations made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the implications of Rules 29, 30 and 31? I find some difficulty here. I have not had an opportunity to really consider his suggestion, which has come to us rather suddenly.

Hon. Mr. Molson: The Rules Committee will do exactly what the house wishes it to do, and, I hope, nothing more and nothing less. I am perfectly agreeable to the suggestion made by the honourable Leader of the Government. I can only point out that the effect will be that nothing different will happen for the balance of the session. By the time it is dealt with and reported back and put into effect, hopefully we will be a week away from the summer recess. Therefore, there could not be any experiment regarding Rule 28 for the balance of the session.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My idea was not that the original decision to suspend Rule 28 should be abrogated. That will continue to be the rule of the house until the end of the session. However, to meet the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition we should consider, in order to make it fully effective, whether we should also deal with other rules. I do not wish to impose an additional burden on the already hard-worked chairman of the committee, but I do not know of any alternative.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I thank my honourable friend for his generous remarks. I can only say that I am doing the best I can to adjust to the burdens imposed upon me. I would respectfully suggest that if it is the desire of the house to continue the suspension of Rule 28, it might be wise at this moment to agree to the suspension of Rule 29. If that were done, we could consider the matter of Rules 28, 29, 30 and 31. In the meantime the problems presented to His Honour the Speaker would be eliminated.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I take it for granted that when an honourable senator has moved second reading of a bill, or a substantive motion, he will indicate when he wishes to close the debate, or I might invite him to so indicate? Before giving him the floor I would make sure that no other honourable senator wished to speak. If any difficulty should arise we will deal with it. Is that agreeable?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree. However, I think the matter could be dealt with by the Rules Committee before the session terminates.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. AND JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Protocol done at Moscow, May 19, 1971, between Canada and the USSR respecting consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 25th May, 1971, and to the Joint Communiqué on the visit to the USSR of the Prime Minister of Canada, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 1st June, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to explain the protocol and the communiqué in connection with the recent visit of the Prime Minister to the Soviet Union. I acceded at once to the suggestion of Senator O'Leary last night that this was a matter that should be explained. As I indicated, I had fully intended to do so before the passage of too many days.

I tabled yesterday a copy of the text of the Canada-Soviet Communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Prime Minister's visit to the Soviet Union. This Communiqué was released simultaneously in Moscow and Ottawa on May 28, 1971. Last Tuesday, May 25, I tabled a copy of the protocol which was signed at Moscow on May 19 regarding consultation on important international problems of mutual interest and questions of bilateral interest. The text of that protocol was printed in an appendix to the Debates of the other house on May 20.

Although the communiqué of May 28 was tabled in the other place, I find that it was not reprinted for the benefit of members of Parliament and the general public. At this point it might be useful if it were agreed that the protocol and the communiqué should be made part of today's record, for examination by those who read our proceedings and who may wish to refer to the two documents.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For texts of Protocol and Communiqué see Appendix, pp. 1071-3).

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would remind honourable senators that the protocol makes reference to the 1956 trade agreement between Canada and the Soviet Union. That agreement was signed in Ottawa on February 29, 1956. It continues to be the basis of our trading relationships with that country. It will be recalled that when the agreement was signed following negotiations undertaken by the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson as Secretary of State for External Affairs in that year, there was wide acclaim in both Houses of Parliament.

The communiqué agreed to by the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. and the Prime Minister of Canada on May 19 specifies that the negotiations for the renewal of the current trade agreement will begin late this year, probably in November. It should be pointed out, however, that that agreement when renewed will simply be a continuation of the agreement initialled in 1956.

It is well also to recall that in 1959, during the Prime Ministership of the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, the National Research Council was authorized to enter an agreement with the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences. That agreement provided an opportunity for exchange visits between Canadian and Russian scientists. In the more than ten years that have elapsed, more than 100 Canadian scientists have undertaken research projects in the Soviet Union. A comparable number of Soviet scientists have carried out research in Canada. The 1959 agreement, which has since been renewed, has provided for the exchange of scientists in genetics, electrical engineering, mining engineering, plant pathology, geological sciences, insect pathology, oceanography, metallurgical chemistry and earth science.

The protocol which we are now discussing notes with satisfaction the conclusion of the agreement between the two countries on Co-operation in the Industrial Appl cation of Science and Technology. That Agreement was tabled in this chamber on February 9 this year, and was briefly discussed by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) and me. At that time I mentioned the hope that this instrument would aid in the exchange of information, visits of experts and businessmen, and licensing agreements in particular technological areas. I suggested that both countries had a common concern in studying such matters as permafrost conditions and severe climates, and that working groups had been assigned to investigate construction, power, the oil industry and the gas industry in the common conditions we share. The Leader of the Opposition, thinking no doubt of the National Research Council's agreement of 1959, among other matters, quite properly indicated that there had been considerable co-operation for some ten years between the Soviet Union and Canada in the scientific and technological field, and I readily acknowledge now that that was the case.

Precedents for the Soviet-Canadian Agreement on Co-operation in the Industrial Application of Science and Technology are to be found in the agreement between the Soviet Union on the one hand, and the United Kingdom, France and Italy, among other countries, on the other hand.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

In addition, there have been visits of political personalities to the Soviet Union. These have been on the increase, I think happily so, in recent years. I myself, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, visited the Soviet Union in 1967. Mr. Pearson was in 1956 the first foreign minister from the western world to go to the Soviet Union, other than Mr. Eden who had gone there during the period of war. A number of distinguished senators, among them our respected Speaker, Senators Connolly and Aird, and the Leader of the Opposition, visited the Soviet Union somewhat over a year ago. I am sure there are other senators, whose names do not come to mind readily, who have paid visits to our northern neighbour. In recent months the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, and the former Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, have been welcomed to the Soviet Union.

It is the intention, as is quite clear from the protocol of May 19, that future bilateral contacts and exchanges should be seen, not only as a function of relations between governments but also in the greater movement back and forth of non-governmental personalities in all fields, such as commercial, developmental, scientific, technological, cultural and touristic, all primarily in the name of particular purposes, but basically as part of the kind of intercourse that must prevail if we are to maintain a world more stable and more peaceful.

If I have spent a few moments elaborationg on the earlier stages of the development of our relationship with the Soviet Union in these matters, it is because I wish to put these recent events in perspective. Last Friday I heard it suggested that the Government was embarking on a completely new course in a new direction, and was engaged in charting a voyage in new waters. Certainly the protocol and communiqué that have been tabled are important documents. The Government has said so; I reaffirm it now. They do not indicate, however, a completely new course in a completely new direction, as a reading of both the communiqué and the protocol will indicate. The communiqué admittedly is a lenthy one, longer than most communiqués. However, that is in full compliance with the tradition of the Soviet Union, in both bilateral discussions and multilateral exchanges.

As the communiqué has not been as widely published as it might have been, I mention again that it is longer that our own communiqués, but that was because as the Soviet Union was host country we took no objection to the length provided we were satisfied with the substance of the document. Matters of particular bilateral interest, such as northern development, Arctic conditions and environmental problems, were dealt with in the communiqué, because they were matters that were discussed and negotiated. Beyond that, however, as well the communiqué mentioned aspirations with regard to a settlement in Vietnam, the common desire that Ambassador Jarring should persevere with his work in the Middle East for the United Nations, and the interests of our two countries in matters of underground nuclear testing, the prohibition of biological weapons, and the prohibition of the emplacement of nuclear weapons on the ocean floor.

The matter of future and regular consultations, which was dealt with in the protocol, has attracted a certain amount of attention, and I suppose on that account must be commented on. Regular joint consultation between the United States and Canada was initiated as long ago as 1953 by an exchange of notes between the two governments. It has been said in the other place, and it has been said outside the precincts of Parliament, that because the Government of Canada and the Government of the Soviet Union has agreed to a form of regular consultation, this opens up a course of relationship that should have been discussed in Parliament before being consented to by the Canadian Government. The arrangement made in 1953 between the United States and Canada was not the subject of—nor did it require to be under our constitutional arrangement—any obligation for discussion in Parliament.

The Canada-Japan Ministerial Committee, which is now an annual function of the Canadian-Japanese ministries, and one which incidentally has proved so beneficial to our two countries, was the result of a joint communiqué issued on June 26, 1961, in Ottawa by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Diefenbaker, and Mr. Ikeda, the Prime Minister of Japan. We have a commission mixte with France, and consultative arrangements with Britain and with Tunisia. Agreements for regular consultation with both New Zealand and Australia were reached by the Prime Minister during his visit to those countries in May last year. When a ministerial committee travelled to Latin America in 1968 there was an exchange of notes to establish a Mexico-Canada Joint Committee, on November 22 of that year. In fact, that committee has not yet met, but arrangements have been made for it to meet this year. The fact that it has not met in no way is to be regarded as indicating that our relations with Mexico are not satisfactory. They are.

Honourable senators, we have all of these precedents, these protocols, these arrangements, which are not treaty obligations. They are precisely what they say they are, arrangements between two countries to establish a regular process of discussion and consultation. I believe that in the disturbed world in which we live no form of consultation is more desirable or more needed.

The new protocol with the Soviet Union envisages that, as the need arises, and in principle at least once a year, there should be consultation at the level of the Minister of Foreign Affairs or at the level of an appropriate representative. This will permit us to have regular consultations, but it will not oblige us to have a top-heavy negotiating team or to a taxing and excessive regularity of meetings—no more than the arrangements which we have with the United States, Japan, Mexico, France, Britain, New Zealand or Australia impose such impedimenta.

On Friday last the Prime Minister made it clear that it was the Government's intention to strengthen our relationship with such economic associations as the OECD and GATT. He re-stated our intention to continue Canadian membership in NATO and NORAD.

It is significant that the Prime Minister stated publicly in Moscow that Mr. Kosygin, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R., signed the Protocol on the complete understanding that Canada intended to continue its full membership in the North Atlantic Alliance and is a close ally of the United States in the defence of North America.

This was the same affirmation that was made in 1956 in principle by Mr. Pearson and by me as Secretary of State for External Affairs in 1965. A year ago this very month, the papers entitled "Foreign Policy for Canadians" were released. The booklet entitled "Europe" states on page 23:

> Canada's political conversations with Eastern European governments, for example, can be more productive because participation in the NATO consultations makes the Government intimately aware of the views of its western partners. In turn, Canada can bring the results of its findings in Eastern Europe to bear on the formulation of agreed alliance positions.

I can say that it has been, at least for four and a half years, the policy of the NATO council that foreign ministers, at any rate, should not hesitate to establish the closest possible consultative arrangements with countries in eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union. I do not suppose there is any country in NATO whose foreign minister has not at one time or another carried on exchanges in Moscow, just as Mr. Pearson and I did, and just as the Prime Minister did last week.

One of our NATO allies, France, signed a protocol providing for consultations on a very wide range of issues. This was completed last October by President Pompidou of France and President Podgorny of the Soviet Union.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Would the honourable Leader call France a NATO ally, at this time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would call France a NATO ally. France does not support the integrated force concept, but the integrated force concept is not a part of the NATO treaty. France does support the alliance and does support the treaty.

If anyone recalls France's somewhat hesitant attitude towards NATO in the mid-1960s, they should remember—and perhaps this is very appropriate in view of the question put by Senator O'Leary—that after the unfortunate events in Czechoslovakia in mid-1968, France's views on the behaviour of the Soviet Union in that episode, and the NATO reaction to it, were quite similar to that of other NATO members.

We must recall, too, that the United States of America has been engaged in highly significant negotiations with the Soviet Union in recent months, in the field of strategic arms limitation talks. Only last night the President of the United States expressed strong optimism for the outcome of those talks.

It might be well also to indicate a few qualifications that, however, remain in the minds of the Canadian Government and that were in the mind of the Prime Minister as the chief representative of Canada in these discussions with the Soviet Union, which included not only Premier Kosygin but Secretary-General Breshnev as well.

The Prime Minister in his speech in the Kremlin stated that differences remained of a rather fundamental nature between Canada and the Soviet Union involving historic, geographic, ideologic, economic, social and military factors. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on Friday last said that it should not be assumed that consultative arrangements like the protocol are useful only with nations with whom we are basically in agreement. Indeed, they can be more useful, I believe, where there are fundamental disagreements. Perhaps I should quote verbatim from the communiqué of last Friday in this connection. It reads:

> The Soviet side proposed that consideration should be given to the conclusion of a treaty covering economic development, technological and industrial cooperation. The Canadian side agreed to study the proposal.

I feel sure that senators, and particularly Senator O'Leary, are familiar with the way that communiqués are drafted and they will not be expecting to pick up a newspaper in the next week and learn about the conclusion of that particular proposed treaty.

The Soviet Union is also interested in the development of its exports to Canada. I need not add that the Prime Minister, as head of the Government of Canada, was interested in that arrangement likewise. Since the signing of the trade agreement of 1956 we have enjoyed a favourable and often a substantial trade balance in our favour in every year, with the exception of 1969. Clearly, the Soviet Union desires to expand its exports to Canada. It is also anxious that we should expand our imports from her. It has undertaken to turn to Canada in the first instance when it requires to import wheat—and that is a most important undertaking. Wheat has been a crucial element in our export surplus to the U.S.S.R., and we all hope that it will continue to remain a major export.

Are we not all agreed in this house that we must encourage the development of our relationships north, south, east and west? I wonder how valuable is the suggestion made by those critics of this protocol or of the communiqué that because we are engaging in these direct talks we give comfort to a country whose ideology is not acceptable to us. Surely, after all the time that has passed since 1945, recognizing as we do the character of our modern interdependent world, we will agree that if we are going to maintain peace in the world we have to have satisfactory relations with most countries in the world. That was the basis of our recent decision to recognize the Republic of China. It was the basis of our decision five years ago to urge the admission of that country into the United Nations. It is behind the Government's efforts to improve relations with the Soviet Union, just as it was one of the reasons for the visits to the Soviet Union by members of this Senate, by former prime ministers as well as by representatives of government who visited that country.

The other day one gentleman in another place asked why the Prime Minister was so ready to go to far away places with strange-sounding names. It occurred to me that not only was that sentiment wrong but the phraseology was singularly inappropriate. It recalled to me a remark made by the former British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, just prior to World War II, to the effect that the Czechs were a far-off people about whom the British knew little. The Russians are an immensely hard-working and dynamic people inhabiting one of the largest countries in the world—I would say the largest country in the world. And in the world of communications of the 1970s Russia is not a far-off country. Its cities are not strange and irrelevant aberrations, and anyone who thinks so will make a serious mistake.

We currently have good relations with our neighbour to the south. We have good relations with our neighbours across the Atlantic to the east. We are in the process now of developing closer and more comprehensive relations with our Pacific neighbours in the west. We must not underestimate the potential development of our relationship with our northern neighbour. We are not as close geographically to the Soviet Union as we are to the United States, but, equally, we are not as far as we used to think we were.

The Prime Minister has invited the Chairman of the Soviet Union to visit our country. This will not be the first time Mr. Kosygin will have come to Canada. He did come once unofficially, when I had the responsibility of dealing with him, to visit Newfoundland. I am sure that when he does come here he will be welcomed as the head of the Government of Soviet Union. I am sure we will value the opportunity for further discussions.

Since the protocol was tabled and the communiqué signed there have been a number of public comments about what the protocol means. This being the first opportunity for the Government to comment on these observations, I thought this would be an appropriate time to do so. It has been suggested that everything is not in the communiqué that should be there. It has been suggested that Canada has views that are not included in the communiqué. That is true. I am sure the Soviet Union would agree that it has positions that are not included in the communiqué. Clearly, a communiqué which is issued in the name of two countries with different points of view on a variety of issues cannot fully reflect the positions of either country on any one issue. Our aim was to reflect the areas where we agree. If anyone will carefully examine the protocol as well as the communiqué and compare it with corresponding agreements, it will be seen that a very constructive effort was made by the Canadian delegation headed by the Prime Minister on this recent visit.

Let me say at once, because of the comments that have been made by so many who have been commenting on this protocol, that it is not a treaty. It imposes no obligation except to observe the intentions included in the protocol or in the communiqué. There is nothing in either document which is inconsistent with Canadian positions stated elsewhere. Nor is the communiqué prejudicial to NATO's position on specific questions such as Berlin and the principles governing relations between states.

I have seen suggestions that we had by implication given support to the so-called Brezhnev Declaration and that thereby we had given some support to an action, or to a proposal or to an affirmation of intention, that was different from positions taken by NATO. There is no basis for that whatsoever. The fact is that both in the official talks and in the negotiations on the communiqué the Prime Minister and the Canadian officials made the Canadian position very clear on a number of subjects of international interest, including the importance of Berlin and the considerations in favour of mutual, balanced force reductions.

Some people have argued that we have urged a program of mutual disengagement in Europe contrary to the spirit and the intention of our obligations as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. That is an invalid argument. The Canadian Government for at least five and a half years has been urging a program of mutual disengagement—in principle the same kind of disengagement that is envisaged in the mutual, balanced force reductions urged in Moscow by the Prime Minister.

Surely there is not anything more positive or valuable than that kind of proposal. There is no unilateral action in this. This is something that has been discussed in NATO. This is something that represents NATO objectives and NATO policy and is part of its broad sweep towards a détente in Europe.

So far as concerns any alleged inadequacy in the communiqué in respect of principles governing relations between states, it must be emphasized that it was at Canada's initiative that these principles were mentioned in the communiqué. While the wording in the Soviet-Canadian communiqué is not identical to the wording of the NATO principles, and this is alleged in the other place and outside, let me state quite emphatically that all the main elements contained in the NATO principles are covered directly or indirectly, including the principle of non-interference in the affairs of other states.

In this regard, the statement of principles in the Soviet Union communiqué is very close to the formula used in the communiqué agreed to by the Soviet Union with other visitors from NATO members such as Belgium, France, the Scandinavian countries, as well as ourselves. Having in mind the different approaches of the Warsaw Pact countries and NATO toward force reductions in central Europe, I think it is significant that the Soviet Union agreed to a document mentioning mutual and balanced force reductions, and I think it is not inappropriate for me to observe that this was included at the initiative of Canada.

In the first full paragraph on page 6 of the communiqué there appears a matter on which I think some comment should be made in view of the reactions in some places in our own country. It reads as follows:

> Canada and the U.S.S.R. believe that détente and stability in Europe would be promoted by the convening of a properly prepared conference on European security and co-operation with the participation of all European states, Canada and the United States. They consider it useful to continue consultations with each other on this question.

Now, the words I wish to emphasize there are "properly prepared" because that phrase is interpreted by Canada to include all those aspects, including Berlin, which must be brought to a certain state of preparation to enable us to get into such a conference with reasonable prospects of success.

Canada is not opposed to a European security conference. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear after the last NATO meeting that we support this, but we want to make sure it is a properly prepared conference, and that this is included in the communiqué I think represents a clarification of the greatest importance. I might add that this is the first communiqué with a western country which explicitly recognizes the right of Canada and the United States to participate on an equal footing with European countries in such a conference. Both the United States and Canada have taken the position whenever there has been discussion in NATO or outside NATO of a European conference on security that because of the contributions of the United States and Canada toward stabilization in Europe, because of our contributions in World War II and because of our contributions to NATO, both countries should be part of any European security arrangement. This is acknowledged by the Soviet Union.

Finally, honourable senators, I think we should recognize that an important step has been taken. One would not want to exaggerate its importance nor should one underestimate its significance. The protocol should not be seen as a change of direction in Canadian policy because it is not a change of direction; it is rather a logical development of Canadian policy. It does not involve any new commitment but may well, I think, yield useful results both for ourselves and for our allies since it offers a forum for the exchange of views on topical subjects.

As for our improved relations with the Soviet Union generally, the protocol is not intended to upset or replace our existing associations or alliances. Its importance will be determined by the effort put into the consultation by both sides rather than by the fact of its existence.

I think our Prime Minister is serving our country well. I think that of all the visits he has undertaken, this is one in which he established the Canadian identity, and it is one in which he has clearly examined our treaty obligations and our alliance relationships. At the same time he has done what I think the people of our country and the people of the world ask of the heads of governments today; that is, without betraying their own convictions, their own principles and policies, to do everything they can to further relations with other countries regardless of ideological bent, and regardless of the frustrations of the past two decades, because only in that way will it be possible for any government, for any nation or for any man to make a contribution to the building of peace in our time.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to ask three pertinent interlocking questions on this protocol and the communiqué. My first question is: Are the people of Canada bound in any way by the protocol done in Moscow, May 19, 1971, between Canada and the U.S.S.R.? I believe the honourable Leader of the Government answered that partly a little while ago, but in my opinion it could be elaborated on a little.

My second question is: If not, does the signing of this protocol by the Prime Minister of Canada call for a formal treaty between Canada and the U.S.S.R.?

My third question is: If the people of Canada are bound by this protocol, how admissible is this principle and how can the protocol be binding on the people of Canada without the approval of both houses of the Canadian Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think the third question will be answered by replies I give to questions one and two. In fact, as I think Senator Desruisseaux has himself implied, I really have answered question number three in my speech. The communiqué could not in any way be regarded as anything other than an explanation of the protocol. The protocol is not a treaty. It imposes no obligations on the part of either country. It is a declaration of what the parties intend to do. Essentially what it does is to set up a means of providing for regular consultation between the two countries.

With regard to the second question, obviously it does not call for a formal treaty. There has been no indication of any intention, with regard to either the implications of the communiqué or the protocol, that it would be followed by a formal treaty.

Since approximately 1923 the practice in Canada has been that whenever the Government undertakes an international obligation in a treaty, that treaty is brought to Parliament either before the Government makes a commitment or before ratification is undertaken by Canada.

That procedure was not followed here because this is not a treaty. It therefore does not impose obligations other than those of civilized countries in their relations with one another. I think that covers the three questions.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: By way of explanation I looked at the definition of the word "protocol" in Webster's Dictionary. The word is defined therein as:

> an original draft or record of a document, negotiation, etc.

A second definition is:

> a signed document containing record of the points on which agreement has been reached by negotiating parties preliminary to a final treaty or compact.

A further definition is:

> the ceremonial forms and courtesies that are established as proper and correct in official intercourse between heads of states and their ministers.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Desruisseaux has referred to a dictionary definition of the word "protocol". The word in international practice means essentially an explanation of a position taken by one country in its relations with another.

There have been some treaties which did impose a continuing obligation, and this was done by way of a protocol. It was done, for instance, in the case of Canada accepting additional obligations under the Columbia River Treaty in 1963 and 1964 when Canada negotiated the sale of the downstream benefits in British Columbia. However the word "protocol" has been used in many instances in the way that it was used in this particular situation.

Hon. Mr. Grattan O'Leary: Honorable senators, it was said of Mr. Gladstone that he could make a budget speech sound like a sonnet. Listening to my honourable friend this afternoon, with a great deal of admiration for his skill, I might say he first made this document, this protocol, sound as if it were almost a breakthrough in history, a monumental milestone in our relations with the Soviet Republic and then, when it suited his purpose or his argument, he made it sound like nothing at all. He said it was the sort of thing we had been doing right along, not only in specific matters with the Soviet Union but with other countries as well.

I have read the document carefully and I have heard the explanations of a number of people, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, the other day, said that the trip to Russia and its consequences were a breakthrough in history.

Well, I must say that there are some clauses in the protocol, in the document, which make one wonder. But actually most of it is little more than a triumph of generalizations and abstractions, of vast and utter inconsequences—the sort of thing that the Soviet Government now hands out, apparently to any foreign statesman visiting Moscow. They gave one to the Austrians, one to the French, and one to someone else. As a matter of fact, we know that this document, as has been said again and again, was specifically prepared on Soviet initiative and written probably before Mr. Trudeau reached Moscow. It was ready for publication and made public the second day after he arrived in Moscow. However, if the Government regards it as more than what I have described it to be, if it is a breakthrough in history, if it is a new trend in our foreign relations, then why was this protocol not submitted to Parliament, or to this house? I know what my friend's answer is, but I am not going to accept it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have not even made it!

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: In support of my claim I shall read a statement made by my friend's once revered leader, the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, in the House of Commons on June 21.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: What year?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: In 1926. In moving a resolution he said:

> ...before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise notification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada or signing acceptance of any treaty or convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the Parliament of Canada should be secured.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: This has been the belief of foreign experts all along.

A. E. Gotlieb, that well-known authority on Canadian international affairs, in his book Canada Treaty-Making, says on pages 16-17:

> A study of Canadian precedents over the years tends to confirm that governments of the day have, as a general rule, considered that the important categories of treaties for which parliamentary approval should be sought prior to ratification fall roughly into four general groups involving:
> (1) military or economic sanctions;
> (2) large expenditures of public funds or important financial or economic implications

There were economic implications in this agreement:

> (3) political considerations of a far-reaching character.

Well, if this is a breakthrough in history, if it is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs says it is, and it is what the Leader of the Government today said it was, although he contradicted himself several times, then section 3 certainly applies to Canada. It is a document in which there are political considerations of a far-reaching character. However, I will not stress that part.

I am more concerned with what the Prime Minister said in Moscow than what was stated in the ambiguous language of this communiqué and the protocol itself. Nor am I concerned with the exact legal interpretation of whether a protocol is or is not an agreement. I am sure that it is an agreement of some sort. The Prime Minister did not go to Russia to sign something that he did not regard as an agreement, that was not binding on the Government of Canada as well as that of the U.S.S.R.

Let us take, for example, the following passage in the protocol:

> 2. In the event of a situation arising which, in the opinion of the two Governments, endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace, the two governments will make contact without delay in order to exchange views on what might be done to improve the situation.

The two governments? Well, what if the opinion of the two governments does not coincide? Who will determine what endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace? What would the Soviet have said two years ago with respect to Czechoslovakia? Would they have considered that to involve a breach of the peace, or would we have agreed with them under this agreement, section 2, that their action in Czechoslovakia did not involve a possible breach of the peace?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We thought so and we still think so.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What would be the effect of this agreement? What is the sense of the agreement then, if we are not going to agree? If they again took steps with respect to West Germany or the Corridor which we regarded as a breach of the peace, what would be the effect of this section? What would be its value? What criteria are laid down between the two governments to determine what endangers peace?

This is what makes nonsense of a paragraph such as this. If it has any meaning, it is an evil one. If it has no meaning, what is the use of it? It says if in the opinion of the two governments—the Russians are pretty good at writing these things—something endangers peace. Well and good. But what if in the opinion of one government a certain situation does not endanger peace? This communiqué is full of that sort of thing, but that is not the point with which I am concerned today.

I was sceptical and could not believe what I read in the press dispatches, that the Prime Minister in Moscow indicated that the whole trend of this protocol, agreement or undertaking, as you wish, tended to assert Canada's independence of the United States.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator O'Leary, does he not believe that it should be the objective of Canada to be as independent as it possibly can of any country?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, indeed I do and I said so last year. However, I said it to the Americans to their face, and I did not go to Moscow to say it. That is what is wrong with all this. The place to assert Canada's independence of the United States is in Canada or in Washington.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: And abroad.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: And abroad; not in Russia, of all places.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Why not?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I will come to that in a moment, and I do not think my friend will like it very much.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I will love it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: He goes to Russia to assert our independence of the United States. Having a great respect, a very long time respect for the intellectual capacity and the integrity of the Prime Minister, I did not believe those dispatches. I could not believe that the Prime Minister would speak such arrant nonsense and speak it where he did. However, on Monday night I saw the televised broadcast from Moscow and heard the Prime Minister say that Canadians were concerned with the cultural, economic and military consequences of our nearness to the United States. What do you think he had in mind when he used that word "military"? Was he thinking of NORAD? Did he have in mind the fact that today and tonight in Colorado a Canadian is there with our American allies to protect Canada from the threat of nuclear bombs, but not nuclear bombs from the United States? Is it possible to believe that the Prime Minister of Canada could go to Moscow, of all places, and express concern for Canada, military concern, because of her nearness to the United States?

My friends, there is an old canal in this city. It runs through our town with weeping willows and other trees growing over it. Very few people know or remember why that canal was built. It was built 150 years ago to protect this country from the United States. The fact that today it remains only a relic, little known and little remembered, is witness to the blessed trust that has existed between our two countries, the United States and Canada, for a century and a half. And to think that now, in the context of our world, in the light of the history of the past 25 years, the Prime Minister of Canada should go to Moscow, of all places, and there cast doubt upon our trust in the United States!

After all, for a generation the United States has possessed a nuclear power that could have blown Canada off the map of the world any night at all, and we Canadians went to bed every night and never thought of the possibility of such a thing. We Canadians today are paying and sacrificing with our allies to protect Canada from a nuclear holocaust from another country, and that country is not the United States. It is the country in the capital of which Mr. Trudeau took occasion to express his fears of our good friend and ally.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure Senator O'Leary does not wish on a matter of such importance to convey, outside this house at any rate, wrong impressions. Could he produce anything that the Prime Minister said that would justify the wide and exaggerated interpretation he just made?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I refer to what he said the other night to the Russians. It was to court their favour, apparently, and to aid and comfort them in their clear efforts to create division between Canada and the United States. That is one of their policies; they have pursued it for years and they pursued it more successfully on the occasion of this visit of the Prime Minister of Canada. I say that the statement which I heard from the lips of the Prime Minister of Canada was one of the most mischievous and irresponsible statements made by a Canadian statesman since I have been observing public life, which is over 60 years.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: On what station and program was this broadcast to which you refer?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I refer to a televised statement from Moscow, broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on Monday evening. I am sure you can obtain the transcript of the statements. He said that we were concerned in Canada over the cultural, economic and military consequences of our nearness to the United States. Surely that is plain enough? I repeat, that was the most irresponsible and mischievous statement made by a Canadian statesman in the foreign field since Confederation. I could say a lot more about this communiqué and about his visit, but I would be sorry to have said less than I have said.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I should like to ask a question of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin). Does he consider this protocol will cause a weakening of the Canadian official stand towards the status of the occupied Baltic nations and other such nations within the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It must be obvious that any arrangement Canada would make with the Soviet Union for a greater exchange of views is bound to give Canada more opportunity to discuss matters that it believes to be of great importance.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments, having listened very carefully to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) speak about this. I yield to no other senator in my love and affection for the United States. As an international unionist I participate with my American brothers. While having that feeling of affection for the United States, I do not think that in any way diminishes the right of this country and its leadership to make such visits. I do not quarrel with the principle to which Senator O'Leary referred, as enunciated by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King. That may be just as valid today as it was then.

As to the concern of many Canadians as I know them, and their reaction to the visit, it seems to me from what I have heard, what I have detected, and my own feeling, that anything that can be done by the leaders of this Government which promotes better understanding, goodwill and a better feeling between our two countries, while in no way diminishing our relations with our friends and neighbours to the south, is something that many thousands of Canadians support.

I listened carefully to Senator O'Leary's remarks, and I thought, as I heard it, the Prime Minister said something to the effect that it was a concern of the Canadian people. I think it is a concern of the Canadian people, as to American military power and so on. Whether it is a valid concern, whether it is a justified concern, whether it ignores or takes for granted the comfort we have had from the military protection of the United States, all these things notwithstanding, I think the Prime Minister had a right to make this statement and express it as a concern of the Canadian people. It matters not to me where he made that statement. The only criticism I would offer, which is not too justified, is that the trip should have taken place sooner because of the good it will accomplish.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I am pleased Senator Flynn has moved the adjournment of this debate until tomorrow, because after the valuable statement of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) I think it is important that more of us have an opportunity to say something about it. I hope I may be able to express my views as well.

Motion agreed to.

AIR CANADA

MOTION TO REFER ANNUAL REPORT TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Cameron moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, I will give some evidence which I think will justify this motion, but first I should like to compliment Air Canada on their most attractive annual report. It is in the best form of many kinds of annual reports that I see, and is a pretty smooth job, but in going through it I found a number of things in respect of which I think the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance would be warranted in asking for an explanation.

In raising the question of the efficiency, or otherwise, of Air Canada's current operation, let me begin by saying I am in no sense an expert on air operations or airline management, but I am an experienced air traveller, having made my first flight in 1933 from London to Le Bourget. I have had a long 38 years as a consumer of airline services. In that period of time I have flown three times around the world, and several times to Southeast Asia, to Russia, and to China.

In the early days of flying, it was my privilege to know and to fly with that distinguished "seat-of-the-pants" flying school which included men whose names are household words in Canadian flying circles—"Punch" Dickens, "Wop" May, Cy Becker, Stan MacMillan, Frank Tweed and many others. I knew these men so well that I was often invited to go for a ride with them when they, or the companies they worked for, were trying out a new plane. These men made a distinguished contribution to Canadian aviation, and out of their pioneer work came our present airlines—Air Canada, CP Air, Pacific Western, Transair, Nordair, Quebecair, Eastern Provincial Airlines, and a lot of others.

I started using Air Canada as soon as it was established, and I have been using it ever since. I have always been proud of Air Canada. It rightfully claimed to be one of the world's great airlines. Its flying personnel have established a safety record without peer among the airlines of the world, and I still think they are performing to a high standard. Under the pioneer leadership of the wartime pilot Mr. Gordon MacGregor, and his associates Mr. Symington and Mr. Wood, Air Canada became a household name and justly earned the affections of millions of Canadians who had enjoyed the service of a fine team of men who were dedicated to their work, and who set a high standard of performance and maintained a fine esprit de corps in the company and a good rapport with their customers. But time takes its inevitable toll. Mr. Gordon MacGregor, Mr. Symington and Mr. Wood have all retired and a new team has taken over.

There was great fanfare when the new team of Messrs. Pratte and Baldwin moved into the driver's seat. They were going to improve on the fine reputation of Air Canada, they were going to improve the service to their customers, and they were going to reorganize and restructure this great organization and make it even better.

There were some people at the time who questioned the wisdom of appointing two new people to the top positions, neither of whom had had practical experience in running an airline. Being Deputy Minister of Transport, as Mr. Baldwin was, certainly gave him some knowledge of air operations, but as a civil servant and not as the man who had to make the day to day business decisions. Mr. Pratte was, by his own admission, a lawyer with no airline experience whatever. In saying this, I am not reflecting on these gentlemen in any way.

Mr. Pratte has stated in his evidence before the Transport and Communications Committee of the House of Commons that he made an early decision to call in a management consulting firm to advise him on the reorganization or restructuring of the Air Canada operation. That is a perfectly reasonable management decision, regardless of whether the consultants selected were the best available or not. Certainly the firm chosen, MacKenzie Management Consultants, have had much experience. Whether that experience qualified them to advise on the special problems of operating a Canadian airline over great distances and under extreme variations of climate can only be assessed on the basis of the results obtained from the implementation of their recommendations—if their recommendations have been implemented in whole or in part.

I said at the beginning of this address that I had no expertise in running an airline, but I have a lot of expertise as a consumer of the airline's product—transportation and service. I indicated that I had been flying with Air Canada since the company was formed in 1937—that is, for 34 years. Thirty-two years of that time were flown under what we may call the MacGregor regime, and only two years under the Pratte-Baldwin regime. To make my qualifications to comment more specific, let me say that I have made 590 trips across Canada, if I may describe a flight from Calgary to Ottawa as a trip across Canada. I hasten to add that most of these trips were made either at my own expense, or at the cost of the universities which I serve or my companies. These flights were not paid for as alleged by a man who sent me a clipping from the Calgary Herald which commented on a speech I made in the Senate on March 2. This gentlemen, who did not give his name, asked why should a freeloader like me complain. I hasten to explain that I am no freeloader; I never have been and never will be.

As I have said, I have flown three times around the world and made many other intercontinental flights, for a total of approximately 1,300,000 miles.

In the years 1969-70 and 1970-71, which correspond with the Pratte-Baldwin regime, I made 65 trips across Canada, one to Greece, Turkey, Israel and the Middle East, 12 to Austria and Germany, and return, several to the United Kingdom and the United States. In the calendar year 1970 I flew a total of 115,000 miles, and from January 1 to May 31, 1971 I have flown 69,390 miles, a total of 184,390 miles in 18 months. Most of this flying was with Air Canada, and it represented over 200 separate flights. So I think I am in some position to comment on the kind of service we are getting from Air Canada.

Because I was finding myself inconvenienced by what I considered to be a high percentage of late flights, I started keeping a record of the flights I made by flight number, and the length of time by which each flight was late on either take-off or landing. In fairness, let me say that I know that bad weather, fog, and many other factors can contribute to delays in departure and landing.

Because I was experiencing so many late flights, plus other inconveniences which I shall deal with, I wrote a letter to Air Canada. I received in reply from Mr. Baldwin a very courteous letter, in which he indicated that 82 per cent of the Air Canada flights were on time. I am not questioning that. It may be that they are. But it seems to me rather strange that I should pick only the late flights.

Here is the record of Air Canada from January 1, 1971 to last night when I returned from Calgary. I do not intend to read this list in full but, with your permission, I will put the full statement on the record. I shall quote just a few instances. On January 3 Flight 573 from Calgary to Montreal was 30 minutes late in arriving. On January 4 Flight 835 from Montreal to Toronto was 50 minutes late in departing, and 30 minutes late in arriving. On January 5 Flight 851 from Toronto to Vancouver was 30 minutes late on departure, and 40 minutes late on arriving in Vancouver. On January 14 the Lethbridge to Calgary charter flight was 40 minutes late, and the airplane was unheated. This was not Air Canada's fault. The temperature was 37 degrees below zero.

This list shows that a total of 22 out of 36 flights were late, and that is roughly 61 per cent. Of course, the Air Canada officials would not record all of these as being late because, according to Mr. Baldwin, they do not count a flight late if it takes off or lands within 15 minutes of the scheduled time. Well, how late is late? Why 15 minutes? Why not 20, 35, or 45 minutes?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Are these all recent dates?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: These are dates up to last night. I can go back to something like a year ago.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the detailed statement be printed in Hansard?

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, in extenuation of Air Canada, I expect they know what they are getting at. They may try to excuse themselves by saying that a plane is not late if it leaves the loading dock, say, 10 minutes after the schedule but sits out on the runway waiting for take-off clearance for 20 minutes. I suppose that is someone else's fault—the Department of Transport's—but as far as the customer, the passenger, is concerned that plane is 30 minutes late and that could mean a missed connection at the other end, or it could mean missed or delayed appointments or a lot of inconvenience.

Of all the aggravating delays in connection with flying, waiting for baggage at the end of a flight is one of the most irritating. We are still back in the horse and buggy days as far as the handling of baggage is concerned. I have waited as long as 45 minutes—and I can give the actual date—to get a bag off a flight from Toronto at the Calgary airport, and it is rarely less than ten or fifteen minutes, and more often twenty minutes. Nevertheless, I have had officials of Air Canada tell me that from the time the plane lands until baggage can be picked up the average elapsed time is seven minutes. How many of you have had that experience? Who do they think they are kidding? Or do I just have bad luck in flying by Air Canada?

In order to avoid this delay I measured the space under the plane's seats and bought a bag that would fit in it, thus saving me time, and Air Canada work in handling my bag. But again Air Canada seems to try to make this as nearly impossible as they can by installing an awkward series of pipes that in design, appearance and awkwardness would at least be worthy of a prize for bad design and inconvenience. I can understand their putting some sort of protection under the seats, since people are sometimes careless. In fact, I have on occasion seen bags protruding into the aisle and it could be that if someone tripped and fell the air line might have a law suit on its hands. I can understand the reason for some protection, but surely any mechanic could have made a better job of designing it than Air Canada has done.

In any event, an under-the-seat size of bag has a disadvantage for any passenger who is going to be away for several days, but such a bag could be used if the passenger were able to put an extra suit in a plastic bag and have that hung up, or put on the rack above his seat. In flying from Winnipeg to Ottawa last September I tried to put my extra suit, which I had in a plastic bag, up on the rack above me, and the stewardess very rudely told me I could not do that. I said, "On some air lines the stewardesses are courteous. They will take the plastic bag and hang it up," and she said, "There is no room." I asked, "Where am I supposed to put it?" and she replied, "It is not safe to have it up there." I told her there was nothing in it but a suit which would not hurt anybody even if it did fall, and she answered, "Put it under the seat." I said, "My bag is under the seat already," and she said, "Well, hold it on your lap." Can you see me sitting there all the way from Ottawa to Calgary—or to Vancouver, or to wherever I happen to be going—with a suit on my lap?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Did the suit have two pairs of pants?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: No, just one pair, and they were not even hot pants. I have won one battle at any rate, because I complained to Mr. Baldwin and they have changed the rule. The rule now is that you can take the plastic bag along and offer it to the stewardess. If she cannot hang it up for you, you can put it on the rack above your head. If there is no room there, you can put it under your seat. If there is no room there, then you will have to carry it on your lap.

I come now to the subject of how Air Canada pushes liquor. I do not know what kind of deal Air Canada has with the liquor vendors, but judging from the way stewardesses are required to peddle liquor on many flights, they must have some deal. It is just a disgrace. I am not a teetotaler. I will take a drink on occasion, and enjoy it. Nevertheless I do resent, as I know many other passengers resent, getting on Flight 809 from Toronto to Calgary, or its summer replacement, Flight 819, at either 6.00 p.m. or 6.55 p.m., only to have the stewardesses peddle liquor from half an hour after take-off for a solid hour and a half to two hours before they serve dinner. In other words, you are almost over Thunder Bay, and even Winnipeg sometimes, before you eat. You are lucky if you get your dinner before 8.30 or nine o'clock at night. Many people using that flight have lunch at 12.30 or 1.00 p.m. and work right through until flight time, hoping to get something to eat when they get on the plane. They find such a delay very annoying and tiring.

The airline also seems to have a penchant for pushing "doubles", which means that Air Canada collects $3 from the fellow who wants to indulge in a double. Here again perhaps the airline is trying to recoup its deficit position by peddling liquor at a price increased by 50 per cent. There was a time when Air Canada used to supply delicious Planter's peanuts with a drink, but this practice has been discontinued.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am certainly glad that they have discontinued issuing those Planter's peanuts, because I thought they were awful.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I happen to like them. It may be a small matter, but it is just one more of those courtesies which have disappeared with the new regime.

On balance I consider the meals on Air Canada flights reasonably satisfactory. They certainly improved after the strike in 1969. The so-called "gourmet dinner" is not bad, although it is far from first-class. What the caterer's chefs do with a filet leaves much to be desired, and the caterer must have got a bargain discount on old hens! He must also have got a carload-rate price on New Brunswick fiddleheads! Not everyone loves fiddleheads as native New Brunswickers do. Recently on the short flights the cold plate has given way to a hunk of bun and a hunk of meat—and I mean "hunk". It is neither appetizing nor esthetic. But, what is worse, all of these improvements come at inflated prices.

Talk about inflation! Air Canada seems to have invented the most refined of the gouging processes. Ten months ago the economy air fare from Ottawa to Calgary and return was $192, and under that ticket a western businessman had the option of going or coming by way of Edmonton. In fact, he could stop in Winnipeg, Regina or wherever he liked at no extra charge. That was a great convenience. But then along comes the new regime with its penchant for efficiency and improvement of the service. The new regime says, "Oh, no, you can't do that any more unless you pay an extra amount." The fare went up to $212, and when they dreamed up the $5 stop-over charge it went to $227 if you stopped in Toronto, Winnipeg, and Edmonton or Regina. On a flight that I took last February I had stop-overs for business reasons at Toronto, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria, and at Vancouver and Calgary on return, and it cost me an extra $30 on the fare.

Not satisfied with gouging the traveller in this fashion, Air Canada has now invoked that gem of painful extraction, the sector fare. And I must say they are not alone in doing so. What that can do to your pocketbook is painful in the extreme. It now costs $25 each way if you go to Toronto in the morning and come back in the evening. Sector fares! Two years ago that same fare was $34 return.

If you want to go on a round trip from Ottawa to Calgary with two stop-overs, such as I completed last night, then the ticket will cost you $268. My colleague in the House of Commons, Grant Deachman, indicated that one year ago the base rate for a return trip from Ottawa to Vancouver was $240, no matter how many stop-overs were involved. That same trip today, with a total of five stop-overs, is $343 which is an increase of $103 in one year. And Mr. Trudeau said last Christmas that Canada had stopped inflation! I am afraid our esteemed Prime Minister has not been watching the shenanigans going on in the "People's Airline".

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Are these rates charged by other Canadian airlines such as Canadian Pacific for the same runs?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I do not know. I do not use Canadian Pacific very often. I think I will use it more often if I can.

Mr. Pratte and Mr. Baldwin did some rather complicated mental gymnastics in their appearance before the Transport Committee of the House of Commons on May 13. In the first place Mr. Baldwin is quoted as having said:

> An encouraging trend (in 1970) was the strong growth in the company's Atlantic scheduled passenger traffic, up 42 per cent over 1969, as the market responded to lower fares—and so on. While the company was reducing fares on the Atlantic service with a resulting increase of 42 per cent in business, they were at the same time increasing the fares by as much as 43 per cent on the western Canadian end of the business.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: By how much did they decrease the fares on the Atlantic service?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Five percent. At least, that is the explanation Mr. Baldwin gives.

This is the improved service of the new regime. I want to say with all the conviction I can that there is rank discrimination against the western businessman, and we are fed to the teeth with it. Let us take the situation of a western businessman coming from Vancouver to Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, or to eastern Canada generally. If he has branches across the country or in these various cities, naturally he wants to stop over in these cities. The result is that this practice penalizes a person who wants to carry out his business in these cities. Not only are we paying outrageously higher fares from western Canada while Air Canada gives a reduction to the overseas flights, but the frequency of flights has been reduced. For example, Flight 900 from Vancouver to Winnipeg to Ottawa has been discontinued and Flight 905 from Ottawa to Winnipeg to Vancouver has been discontinued. Again, if you examine the latest timetable, you will find that there is no flight from Toronto to Calgary between Flight 803 leaving at 9.20 in the morning and Flight 819 leaving at 6.55 in the evening, with the exception of Flight 911-935 via Winnipeg at 11.55. In the same period of time, while there has been a reduction in the number of flights, some of the oldest jet planes in the service have been placed on the western run. Of course the new 747s are operating between Toronto and Vancouver. I cannot vouch for this personally, but a friend of mine who was on two recent flights told me that there were 17 passengers on one and 26 on the other. This is the situation in connection with a airplane capable of carrying 350 passengers.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Perhaps I can add to what the honourable senator is saying there. I was going to mention this point later but this would seem to be an appropriate time to do so. While we did have jet service on this run last year, we now have the 747s which I must say provide an excellent service. But whereas last year we were normally served breakfast on the flight leaving at 8.00 a.m., now we receive simply coffee and a roll. But we also have a movie. As I say, it is an excellent service. The aircraft are comfortable and provide plenty of space. However, I wish to object to Air Canada's decision to change the nation's capital from Ottawa to Toronto. Apparently the jet age terminates there. I remember arriving at Toronto recently too late to get the connecting flight to Ottawa, and consequently had to take a later flight which resulted in my arriving in Ottawa on a propeller-driven aircraft.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I am sure many other honourable senators have experienced the same thing.

All of this seems to suggest that the increased fares are certainly having the effect of cutting down business, and I know this to be a fact from other people I have talked to. They are looking for other means of transportation. This is particularly true with respect to youth fares. As you know, a year and a half ago the airline introduced half-fares for young people with the result that the planes filled up and the airline in turn got the benefit of that half fare rather than having empty seats. However, they have now increased the half-fares to 65 per cent or 75 per cent fares.

In this connection I was rather interested in Mr. Baldwin's explanation before the committee of the House of Commons on May 13 where he indicated that over 50 per cent of the youths travelling on the stand-by fares would have travelled at the full fare if the stand-by fare had not been available. He said that this information was the result of a survey that he had made. I should like to know who made the survey and how authoritative it is, because this is not the information I get from young people to whom I talk, but then perhaps I talk to the wrong people. The young people I talk to are not travelling stand-by now; they are travelling by bus and rail coach or are hitchhiking.

My feeling is that Air Canada officialdom is completely out of touch with the Canadian travelling public, and I shall elaborate on this.

According to the printed proceedings of the committee of the other place, Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Pratte say that the average load factor in 1969 and 1970 was 57 per cent. Now this may be one of the reasons why I do not understand the running of an airline, because Mr. Pratte specified that the maximum load factor was 65 per cent. This may be right, but if any other business were to operate at 65 per cent of efficiency, you know as well as I do what would happen to it. I questioned this and the explanation I was given was that they could not get a higher load factor than 65 per cent because of the peaking factor; the peaks went up at the weekends and down during the middle of the week. But why could they not put on an extra plane at the weekends to take care of this situation? Again, as I say, I do not know very much about the running of an airline.

Honourable senators, in a circular letter to the staff issued some time ago, Mr. Baldwin seemed to be concerned about the morale in the airline. I might say here that after I made my brief comments about Air Canada on March 2, my telephone started to ring and I began to receive letters from the airline employees. What they say certainly does not agree with what Mr. Pratte says about the morale of the staff being higher. As a matter of fact, Mr. Pratte said that as a result of the reorganization, the relations among the administrative personnel were never so good. Well, I can readily believe this. He has a nice cozy club going there. But if you talk to the people at the front desk, the baggage handlers, and the stewardesses, you will soon realize that they do not feel so happy about it.

In this connection I should like to quote Mr. Baldwin's letter to the employees which seems to be at variance with the evidence given to the committee of the other place. This letter was issued some time in February or March, and is from the president to all airline employees:

> I am concerned about an apparent increase, just in the last few weeks, of public complaint about some areas of our ground service, covering reservations, counter sales and check-in. New programmes in this connection will emerge from the Customer Service Sales Management Programme and Aircraft Services Programme, but some analysis of the nature of and reason for this is needed and the matter will be discussed at the next meeting of Regional Vice Presidents. Hopefully, as a result, we can develop comments and suggestions, since our competitors will benefit unless we can find the source of the difficulties and achieve improvement.

That is hopeful, but the staff are still complaining. If you are booked on a plane that is late you can hear the boys shunting baggage underneath and you realize that one of the reasons why the plane is late is that there are insufficient baggage handlers. At Toronto airport they have not enough staff on the front desk.

In the meantime, vice presidents have been blossoming like flowers in spring. I will mention only a few of the new ones. They may, of course, be estimable men. One is Mr. D'Amour, Vice President of the Eastern Region. Another is Mr. Jasmin who is a first-class public relations man. There is also Mr. Ménard; Mr. Mercier, Director of Labour Relations; and Mr. Jérome, Director of Promotion. Are there no people in western Canada who are capable of becoming vice presidents? All the men I have mentioned are from the east. And so it goes on.

I have been receiving a number of letters from airline employees. I will not give the name of this one because he is a manager and might probably be fired if his name were used. He writes:

> Our people at airport counters have tried to give out an official company complaint form to the many dissatisfied passengers. But an order came through that the forms were not to be given out. It appears that no one wants to know how things really are from the customer's standpoint. A friend of mine asked where were these complaint forms and he said "There are none."

Perhaps I am a suspicious character, but my hunch is that there are so many complaints that the company does not want to hear any more.

When reading the annual report one will find an increase in head office administrative services. In 1969 the cost of general administrative services was $18,135,000 and in 1970 it was $23,781,000, an increase of $5.65 million in one year. It could be that salaries have gone up a little, but when you have a proliferation of vice presidents, no matter what company it is, they all have to be housed and their offices must be furnished in the style to which they have become accustomed, and this means a proliferation of expenses. This increase in administrative overhead is being made at the expense of those who are serving customers in the front line at the counters, in baggage handling, and so on. That is another reason why we should take a look at this matter.

There is also the question of supersonics. Air Canada has paid out $865,000 towards an order for an SST. The president has said the company will get this money back. I should hope so, because I see no justification for having a supersonic airline in Canada for a long time to come. It is a question of where we are going in the airline business. All airlines are in trouble because they are buying bigger and faster planes, and are pricing themselves out of the market. We need to ask ourselves some questions about that.

I noticed that the auditing of Air Canada is carried out by a reputable firm of private auditors. That may be necessary, but I wonder why the Auditor General does not enter the picture. Probably he has too much to do. It could be that he should use a private auditing firm who would work in co-operation with him.

I am told—I cannot vouch for the truth of this, but it comes from a very reliable source—that the company changes its auditors every two years. This is a multi-million dollar business and I would think that any auditing firm, no matter how smart, would spend the first year getting acquainted with the business and in the following year would be reasonably efficient regarding its auditing duties. If this is true, then to change auditors every second year does not make sense. Mr. Sharp, when he was Minister of Finance and this matter was raised, said "Well, the airline business is a very competitive business." I agree. However, if the books of the company could be audited by the Auditor General they would be open to all, and Air Canada would have no secrets from anyone, including CP Air, that other airline of interest to Senator Manning. All Crown corporations spend taxpayers' money. Although companies such as Polymer do a good job, the public have a right to know a little more about what is going on in connection with Crown corporations. The question of whether there should be some relation between the Auditor General and Crown corporations is one that should be looked into.

Perhaps there are areas where for competitive reasons it might not be advisable to disclose all the information, but the information should be available for anyone who is interested. This is part of the Auditor General's work. It would have a salutary effect on the CBC, on Air Canada and on some of the other organizations.

The foregoing are some of the reasons why it is desirable for us to look into the matter of the financial report of Air Canada. There are many more questions involved. For example, prepayments on new aircraft. Last year $126 million was paid out for new aircraft, and no interest was collected. Most business firms do not operate in that way, but perhaps there is a perfectly good explanation.

I also draw honourable senators' attention to the transcontinental service, which made some money last year, but in connection with which fares were down 5 per cent. A new plan went into effect with respect to this service. If a person who leaves from Vancouver for Zurich decides to stay overnight in Montreal and travel on to Zurich the next day, he has to pay a stopover charge of $30, and a similar charge coming back. This does not seem to be a good system of merchandising because it adds $60 to the cost of the return flight from Vancouver to Zurich. I could go on and on in the same vein. There may be perfectly good answers to these questions, but we should have them.

I shall not trespass further on the time of honourable senators. There is ample justification for the motion that we should require officials of Air Canada to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to give us some answers. It is true they have appeared before the Transport Committee of the House of Commons and very interesting information has been elicited. However, much more is necessary.

Hon. David Walker: Would you not be putting your finger on it if you considered who the heads of Air Canada are at the present time? McGregor was a lifelong airman. He nominated as his successor, Herbert Seagram, a person of great distinction, who himself had spent all his life in this field. Who have we now as chairman? Yves Pratte, a law partner of St. Laurent, which is in his favour as a lawyer but does not help him to run an airline. As President, we have John Baldwin, who was Deputy Minister of Transport, a charming person, but both of them are as ignorant as Paddy's pig in running any airline.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I take exception to that on behalf of Ireland.

Hon. Mr. Walker: With the exception of my friend over there.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am innocent.

Hon. Mr. Walker: As my friend knows, in any organization there must be a good executive, and the top executive must be supreme. Here we have the blind leading the blind, neither one of them knows anything about airplanes, nor airline organization. They have no training in it. They are pleasant ignoramuses in this field and it is a crying shame, because it is costing the public of Canada tens of millions of dollars every year. As long as the lack of administrative and executive ability at the top remains, Air Canada, of which we were once so proud, will continue to crumble. It is an outrage and I am very glad that my friend the honourable senator raised this point.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I put it slightly less forcefully.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Do you not agree with what I said?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Yes.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF FEMALE PAGES—QUESTION

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I have a question which I proposed to ask the leader. However, as he is absent and I will not be able to be in the chamber tomorrow or next week and I would like to have an answer, I will ask the question of Senator McDonald.

> Could the Senate give leadership in eliminating discrimination on the grounds of sex by adopting the principle of equality in relation to appointments to its staff and, in particular, in light of the fact that the United States Senate has cracked tradition and appointed girl pages and the Ontario Legislature now has four girl pages, could consideration be given to the hiring of girl pages in the Senate?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: What will be the costume, hot pants?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am pleased that Senator Fergusson had given notice that she intended to ask this question. I am pleased to be in a position to give her at least a partial answer. Active consideration is being given to employing young ladies as pages in the Senate. However, I understand there are discussions also taking place with educational authorities in the Province of Ontario with respect to the possibility of this service being in the nature of an extension program of the political science course in Ontario.

I think that this problem can be worked out. I can inform you that several legislatures throughout Canada now employ young ladies as pages. I can assure you that every consideration is being given to the program and it is my personal hope that it can be implemented at an early date.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Might I ask Senator McDonald whether any of the present pages would lose their employment if young ladies are employed as pages?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: No, they would not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope that Senator McDonald does not interpret Senator Fergusson's question as limiting the hiring of females for the job of page. I think there are other jobs that would better suit them.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That is true. In the event we have both male and female pages we will be faced with a problem of space. The suggestion was made that perhaps some of the messengers should be female, which again presents the problem of space. It was further suggested that an appropriate solution would be to have only female pages and only male messengers. One of our committee clerks is a lady, and I know there is active consideration to giving the ladies a more equitable share of the jobs available in the Senate.

Hon. Mrs. Quart: I would like to ask Senator Fergusson if she has any age limit in mind?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: There is an age limit now for pages.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A minimum age.

Hon. Mrs. Quart: I am thinking of the maximum?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: There is an age limit for male pages, and I presume it would be the same for female pages. I do not know what it is.

Hon. Mrs. Casgrain: Would it mean equal pay for equal work?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes, definitely.

NORTHERN OIL AND GAS

GOVERNMENT TRANSPORTATION STUDY URGED— MOTION IN AMENDMENT CARRIED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 26, the adjourned debate on the motion, in amendment, of Hon. Mr. Langlois to the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue:

> That this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas; that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for consideration.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to speak for a few minutes this afternoon to indicate my support of the position taken by Senator Argue in opposition to the amendment proposed by Senator Langlois.

It is not my intention to repeat the arguments which have been placed before you in support of the motion, or those advanced against accepting the amendment. So far as I am concerned I believe Senator Argue gave a powerful speech against the amendment and he was most convincing. I agree with him that the proposed amendment is simply a polite way of defeating the motion. I do not understand why this should be done. If for some reason or another, even if it is not a good reason, the motion is not acceptable to the Government Leader, then I think it would be a better policy and a better procedure for him just to have the motion defeated.

After all, Senator Argue is a man of intellectual maturity, one who would I think prefer to have a clear-cut and definite rejection of his motion rather than this disguised, indirect method of killing it with kindness.

I do not understand why the Government Leader is so opposed to the motion. Indeed, I would have expected the Government to welcome it and encourage its supporters to vote for it. After all, adoption of the motion might very well strengthen the position that has been taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs over a period of time. Only the other day he said that officials of the Government had met with officials of the United States Government to express the concern of the Government of Canada about the ecological dangers of the proposed Trans-Alaska pipeline and the tanker route. He added that he expected to have another—and I stress the word "another"—opportunity on June 10 of making the same point to his opposite number in the United States. I should think the passing of Senator Argue's motion by the Senate would reinforce and give added weight to the representations the Secretary of State for External Affairs is going to make in the United States on June 10. He could then tell his opposite number that the Senate of Canada, representing all regions of Canada, has shown in no uncertain terms that it is against the proposed pipeline-tanker system, and has registered its views without any promptings from or inducment by the Canadian Government.

I do not know whether the Government Leader has discussed this motion with his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If he has not, perhaps he would do so before having his supporters kill this motion by passing the amendment. The amendment would refer the subject-matter of the motion to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for consideration. If this were done I believe it would only be an exercise in futility.

Honourable senators, you have heard the arguments put forward in support of the motion. To me they are very convincing, and I can see no need to amend it or any beneficial purpose in doing so. Indeed, I believe it is too late, even if it were desirable. In my opinion, only high level discussions between governments, our Government and that of the United States, can prevent the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker system being put into operation. I believe that such discussions would have to be held in the very near future, otherwise it would be too late.

I noticed an interesting article in the Ottawa Citizen of last Monday, which I should like to quote in part. The headline says:

> First sales of oil, gas from Alaska.

It is a CP dispatch from Calgary. It goes on:

> The first sales contracts for the purchase of Prudhoe Bay crude oil and natural gas have been completed by Standard Oil Company (Ohio) and the Columbia Gas Systems Incorporated, Standard has announced. Under the agreement, Columbia is to purchase $200 million worth of crude oil. Deliveries are to begin with the start of production from the north Alaska reserves and the crude is to be valued at the market price of the day.
> The first payment by Columbia, about $60 million, is to be made around the end of June with additional payments after a permit is issued for the construction of the Trans-Alaska pipeline. Production would follow construction.

I take it from that news item that time is of the essence. That is why I believe it would be of benefit if we passed Senator Argue's motion now. It is my conviction that if the amendment is carried the committee should also include in their study ways and means of trying to clear up huge oil spills, if it is possible to do so. If one of these huge oil spills occurs, there would be tremendous damage done to our marine life and all the industries that depend upon it. I would go further and say that, in my opinion, by the time the committee completed its study, if this amendment is passed, the members of the committee might well be able to arrange to have a passage on one of these huge tankers carrying that crude oil, when they would be able to learn at first hand just what dangers would be encountered.

Feeling as I do about this matter, I must vote against the amendment and in favour of the motion.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, in view of the debate which took place at the beginning of this sitting, I want to inform honourable senators that I wish to close the debate now.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that the honourable Senator Langlois is indicating he is going to speak now, and that it is his intention to close the debate. Is there any other honourable senator who would like to speak at this time? Honourable senators understand that if the honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, I must admit I was much surprised by the position adopted by my colleagues in regard to the motion I submitted the other day in amendment to the main motion submitted by Senator Argue.

However, I feel there has been misinterpretation of my motion as being intended to delay voting or decision by the Senate on the main motion, thus applying here a practice which to my knowledge has never become established in the Senate, although it has been used and is still being resorted to in the other place, that is to say, in the House of Commons. Furthermore, had honourable senators taken the trouble to study my remarks when submitting the motion and my further comments, they would promptly have seen that my purpose was not to delay or kill the motion, as has been suggested, since I went out of my way to state repeatedly that such was not my objective, but that those on this side of the Senate wanted to submit the motion, within the shortest possible delay, to our Committee on Transport and Communications.

The other day, Senator Argue himself quoted an extract from the House of Commons Hansard for 1953 recording the argument used on that occasion by the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, former Prime Minister of Canada, who was speaking on a motion in amendment to a budget resolution. On that occasion, the former Prime Minister clearly stated that, although a fairly substantial motion in amendment to a budget resolution was in question, it was the intention of the motion and of its movers that was important, and as soon as I explained in this house the intention of this motion, it was impossible to doubt that my objective was not to kill the main motion.

First of all, I believe that here in Canada our attitude on pollution is the result of a certain feeling of guilt, because, for many years, we have completely ignored the pollution problem that is caused by the modern inventions of which we now make use. We have forgotten, for instance, that not only do tankers pollute the oceans, but, every day, industry pollutes the air we breathe in our homes and outside.

Would anyone in this house be ready to shut down industrial plants because they pollute the atmosphere?

Has anyone ever suggested that planes should be grounded because they pollute the air?

Has anyone ever suggested that our highways should be closed to motor vehicles because they cause pollution and fatal accidents every day?

Those questions show the absurdity of such an attitude and of what amounts to an obsession about pollution resulting from a feeling of guilt which we have acquired because we have, for too long, ignored the problems of pollution.

I was listening earlier to Senator J. M. Macdonald (Cape Breton) who was speaking of the possible pollution by tankers which might sail along the west coast of Canada. Is Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) ready to suggest that Port Hawkesbury should be abandoned and closed because supertankers are likely to navigate in the vicinity and might constitute a pollution hazard in the Atlantic ocean? If we set up a rule for the Pacific coast, why not set up the same one for the eastern seaboard?

In this connection I must point out that the Atlantic coast—all eastern Canada—is entirely dependent, and will continue to be for a very long time to come, on crude oil from Venezuela to supply its industries and its whole petroleum market.

Because of the pollution hazard are we willing to close the Atlantic seaboard and the St. Lawrence seaway to all vessels carrying crude oil?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does he realize that in his remarks he opposes the substance of the main motion and that consequently he contrad cts to some extent the motion that he has proposed as amendment, and that we will finally question the val dity of this amending motion if he believes that the main motion should not be amended?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My colleague and friend, Senator Flynn, has just prefaced his remarks by saying that he would like to ask a question and, as the house may realize, he has really attempted to refute what I said by ant cipating what he thought I was going to say. I am only trying to refute the arguments put forward by my colleagues who objected to my motion and I am not disavowing what I said when I introduced the motion. I only mentioned that the motion would have to be thoroughly discussed and, moreover, I think that it is the Leader who added the other day that it was impossible to consider the motion without examining all the proposed alternative routes for the shipment of crude oil on the Pacific coast. I am only commenting on the statements made in the present debate.

To get back to what I was saying, is it because we fear pollution that we will paralyze the economy of the country? In my opinion, it is not the right solution. I add that when we protest about the eventual policy of our neighbours, we are setting up a line of conduct for ourselves—and we can expect that our neighbours, the United States, will from now on object to tankers bringing us the oil we need from Venezuela going through their territorial waters to reach the Canadian ports on the Atlantic coast or the Great Lakes.

That is why we cannot vote on that motion without thoroughly considering all possible aspects and alternatives.

In addition, if we are afraid of pollution from tankers, I think that the solution would not be to forbid them from going through our territorial waters, but rather to take preventive steps, in order to avoid accidents such as those in which tankers have been involved. When I refer to preventive steps, I mean legislation such as Bill C-2 against maritime pollution which was passed last fall. Within the next few days, we will have the opportunity to study another bill on similar preventive measures, namely, Bill C-246, an act respecting pilotage, through which we will be asked what we think of a proposed completed revision of our Pilotage legislation, which would provide for a new pilotage system in Canadian territorial waters. We will then have a chance to suggest measures to prevent, in the future, those tankers from being a pollution hazard, and to recommend navigational security measures for the conservation of our territorial waters. It is as simple as that. I am not of those who believe, although I respect the source of the precept, that "if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out". I do not believe in the efficiency of such drastic remedies.

Still, I would not have the whole economy of our nation destroyed in that fashion. Moreover, for those who might still have doubts and fears concerning the purpose of this motion, and suggest that the purpose of the present debate was that the Government hoped the bill would be killed by someone in this house, I refer to page 6161 of the House of Commons Hansard for May 28, where our Secretary of State for External Affairs, who at the time was also Acting Prime Minister, gave an answer to the member for Fundy-Royal, Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather, who had asked whether the Minister of Fisheries had stated government policy when he spoke of the possibility of preventing some oil companies from using the Strait of Georgia for the transportation of crude oil. Here is what the Honourable Mr. Sharp said, and I quote:

[English]

> I join with the Minister of Fisheries, who will be responsible for the environment, in saying that our particular concern about the movement of oil down the Pacific coast relates to those narrow waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Strait of Georgia. This is the area about which we have the most concern and on which we will be making the strongest representations to the United States government.

[Translation]

Reading this, I have the impression, not to say the certainty, that Mr. Sharp was formulating government policy, since he was speaking, as I said a short while ago, not only as Secretary of State for External Affairs, but also as Acting Prime Minister, in the absence of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, on an official trip to Russia.

I would add, and I have already said it, I am merely repeating this, that it is the intention of the Government Leader in this House, as it is my personal intention, in as much as I have the authority to do so, and I have it, to get the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to consider that motion without delay.

The other day, my colleague Senator Prowse raised objections which I have noted by the way, but which did not appear that important. First, he raised the objection that the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications would not be prepared to operate forthwith. He had certainly forgotten that this committee is a standing committee of this house, which can be appraised of this motion as of tomorrow, if it is passed today. He also raised another objection to the effect that, since the same matter had already been considered by a committee of the other place, there would be duplication should our committee consider it anew. Is there any objection to this house discussing the same question as was discussed in the other place? Is this house to be a mere reflection of the other one? Are we willing to accept everything that is decided upon in the other place? If this is what my honourable friend wants, then it would be better to put an end to the bicameral system in Canada because we would then have relinquished all objectiveness if we were to adopt his suggestion. There was still another rather fallacious objection to the effect that we would summon costly witnesses. I objected. I do not think that there is any question of calling witnesses from outside because I am sure we have all the experts we need right here in Ottawa; they are available and can be summoned to give evidence and answer any important question that could be asked in this regard.

Now that I have said all that, and since I do not want to take any more of your time for fear that I be accused of filibustering, or trying to kill the bill, I shall resume my seat after having reiterated my recommendation to my colleagues that the motion be referred without delay to our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which would certainly report to this house after careful consideration.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to repeat what I said to Senator Argue in private, that if he were not a member of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, I would do everything in my power to have him appointed on it.

I hope, and I repeat what I already said the other day, that he will give the committee a hard time, that he will fight as we are used to see him fight here in the Senate. I am sure that he will convince his colleagues of the significance of his motion.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the honourable Senator Macdonald:

> That this house opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urges the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

In amendment it is moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the honourable Senator Smith:

> That the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for consideration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the honourable Senator Langlois' amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as there is in my mind uncertainty as to agreement, I am going to ask those who are in favour of the motion in amendment to please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are against the motion in amendment will please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

(And more than two honourable senators having risen.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion in amendment of Hon. Mr. Langlois carried on the following division:

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R.

Inspired by a desire to develop and strengthen relations of friendship, good neighbourliness and mutual confidence between the two countries,

Expressing a desire for co-operation in the interests of maintaining international peace and security in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and

Conscious of the responsibilities of the Soviet Union and Canada as Members of the United Nations to promote the preservation of peace,

Believing that the Soviet Union and Canada can contribute toward the above goals by acting in a spirit of co-operation, mutual respect and reciprocal benefit,

Endeavouring to improve and further develop relations between the two countries by means of high-level contacts, expanding ties and exchanges in the fields of economy, trade, science, technology, culture and northern development,

Noting with satisfaction the conclusion of the Soviet-Canadian agreement on Co-operation in the Industrial Application of Science and Technology, and the development of trade on the basis of the 1956 Trade Agreement,

Conscious of the responsibility of the two sides to preserve and protect the environment of the Arctic and the sub-Arctic areas,

Fully determined to go on developing political and economic co-operation,

The Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers and the Prime Minister of Canada have agreed on the following:

1. The Soviet Union and Canada shall enlarge and deepen consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations by means of periodic meetings. Such consultations will embrace:

—question of a political, economic and cultural nature, environmental questions and other subjects concerning relations between the two countries;

—international questions, including situations causing tension in various parts of the world, with a view to promoting détente, furthering co-operation and strengthening security;

—problems which are the subjects of multilateral talks, including those considered at the United Nations;

—any other subjects in respect of which the parties may find it useful to have an exchange of views.

2. In the event of a situation arising which, in the opinion of the two Governments, endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace, the two Governments will make contact without delay in order to exchange views on what might be done to improve the situation.

3. The provisions set forth in paragraphs 1 and 2 above do not affect obligations previously assumed by the parties in respect of third states and are not directed against any of them.

4. The conduct of such consultations between the Soviet Union and Canada is designed not only to promote the welfare of their peoples and develop relations between them but also to contribute towards better relations among all countries.

5. These consultations, at levels to be determined by mutual agreement, will have a regular character. The Ministers of Foreign Affairs or their representatives will meet whenever the need arises and, in principle, at least once a year. Either party is free to recommend the holding of such consultations, including the time and level at which they should be held.

Moscow, May 19, 1971

Chairman of the Council of Prime Minister of Canada.
Ministers of the USSR.

JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

At the invitation of the Soviet Government, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and Mrs. Trudeau paid an official visit to the Soviet Union from May 17 - 28, 1971.

During their stay in the Soviet Union, Mr. Trudeau and his party held official discussions in Moscow and visited Kiev, Tashkent, Samarkand, Norilsk, Murmansk and Leningrad. They were thus able to acquaint themselves with the life and work of the Soviet people and many of the achievements of the USSR in the economic, scientific and cultural fields.

The Prime Minister of Canada laid wreaths on the tombs of the Unknown Soldier in Moscow and Kiev and at the Peskaryovskoye Memorial Cemetery in Leningrad.

The distinguished guest from Canada and his party were everywhere accorded a hearty welcome testifying to the friendly feelings of the Soviet people towards the Canadian people.

Prime Minister Trudeau had a talk with the Secretary General of the Central Committee of the CPSU, L. I. Brezhnev. He also had a talk with the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, N. V. Podgorny. Conversations were held between Mr. Trudeau and the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, A. N. Kosygin.

Taking part in the discussions were:

On the Canadian side: Ambassador of Canada to the USSR R.A.D. Ford, Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister B. J. Danson, Dr. Stanley Haidasz, M.P., Walter Deakon, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs A. E. Ritchie, Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister Marc Lalonde, Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce J. H. Warren, Deputy Secretary to the Cabinet M. A. Crowe, Special Assistant to the Prime Minister Ivan Head, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs J. G. H. Halstead, Press Secretary to the Prime Minister P. M. Roberts and other officials.

On the Soviet side: Deputy Chairmen of the Council of Ministers of the USSR N. K. Baibakov, V. A. Kirillin, V. N. Novikov; USSR Minister of Foreign Affairs A. A. Gromyko, USSR Minister of Foreign Trade N. S. Patolichev, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of the USSR S. P. Kosyrev, USSR Ambassador to Canada B. P. Miroshnichenko and also Heads of Departments of the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs E. N. Makeev, O. N. Khlestov, Y. N. Cherniakov and other officials.

The discussions were held in an atmosphere of frankness and cordiality and provided the opportunity for a useful exchange of views on the present state and future prospects of Canadian-Soviet relations as well as on major international problems of common interest. The Canadian side outlined the basic aims of Canadian foreign policy, while the Soviet side outlined the decisions of the 24th Congress of the CPSU on questions of foreign policy. They agreed that all countries, regardless of their social systems, should seek to develop relations based on reciprocity and mutual confidence and should resolve any problems by negotiations.

The two sides expressed satisfaction with the general trend towards improvement of Canadian-Soviet relations. They are convinced that the further development of good-neighbourly relations corresponds to the national interests of the peoples of Canada and the Soviet Union and promotes the relaxation of international tension and the safeguarding of universal peace. With this in mind the Prime Minister of Canada and the Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers signed a protocol designed to enlarge and deepen consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations by means of periodic meetings.

The two sides emphasized the importance of contacts at all levels and expressed their mutual desire to develop exchanges of visits of government and political leaders, representatives of commerce, science and technology, culture, non-governmental organizations and tourists.

The two sides reviewed the present state and future prospects of economic, scientific and technological cooperation between the two countries. The two governments agreed that there are favourable opportunities for increasing and diversifying trade in both directions to mutual advantage. They noted that Canadian-Soviet trade over the years has been fruitful and that the deliveries of Canadian wheat play an important part in this trade. They instructed the appropriate agencies to work out proposals on ways of further developing trade relations between the two countries. It was agreed that negotiations for the renewal of the current trade agreement should begin in November or December this year in Moscow.

They also agreed to instruct the appropriate agencies to study the possibilities of further expanding cooperation in the field of air transport.

It was noted that the expansion of mutually advantageous economic, scientific and technological relations has been promoted by the Agreement between the Governments of Canada and the USSR on Cooperation in the Industrial Application of Science and Technology, signed on January 27, 1971. The two sides agreed to render all possible assistance in the active implementation of the programs undertaken within the framework of the Mixed Canadian-Soviet Commission on Cooperation set up pursuant to that agreement.

The Soviet side proposed that consideration should be given to the conclusion of a treaty covering economic development, technological and industrial cooperation. The Canadian side agreed to study the proposal.

Taking into account the fact that the Arctic regions, distinguished by their particularly severe climatic and ice conditions, are of great importance to both Canada and the Soviet Union, the two sides discussed the possibilities of promoting cooperation in developing the northern territories and agreed to expand the exchange of experience in this field between Canada and the USSR. Both sides shared the view that they have special responsibilities and corresponding rights with respect to ensuring the safety of navigation and preserving the natural balance in the Arctic regions.

The Governments of Canada and the Soviet Union noted the importance of developing as far as possible international cooperation for the solution of the problem of the human environment. The United Nations Conference on Human Environment Problems planned for 1972 should be a significant step in this direction.

The Governments of Canada and the Soviet Union expressed their desire to expand exchanges between the two countries in as many areas as possible, on the basis of reciprocity and mutual advantage. For this purpose they confirmed their intention to negotiate a general agreement on exchanges to develop further contacts in the fields of culture, education, and science.

During the exchange of views on major international problems, the Governments of Canada and the Soviet Union confirmed their desire to continue efforts to strengthen universal peace and reduce international tension. They expressed their firm conviction that all questions at issue between states should be solved by peaceful means in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter. The discussions revealed that Canada and the USSR hold similar views on a number of international problems.

The two governments attach great importance to strengthening security and promoting multilateral cooperation in Europe. They emphasized the need for effective measures to further reduce tension, and for the normalization and improvement of relations among all European states on the basis of the principles of independence and sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability of frontiers, renunciation of the use of force or the threat of force, non-interference in internal affairs and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means.

Canada and the USSR believe that détente and stability in Europe would be promoted by the convening of a properly prepared conference on European security and cooperation with the participation of all European states, Canada and the United States. They consider it useful to continue consultations with each other on this question.

The two sides expressed their conviction that the strengthening of international security and the safeguarding of universal peace are important objectives to be pursued, in particular through appropriate measures of disarmament.

Both sides support the reduction of armed forces and armaments in areas where the military confrontation is particularly dangerous, and especially in Central Europe. They discussed the recent proposals made by the Secretary General of the Central Committee of the CPSU, L.I. Brezhnev before the 24th CPSU Congress and in Tbilisi for various measures of disarmament as well as the Canadian suggestion placed before the Conference of the Committee on Disarmament regarding underground nuclear testing. The Prime Minister of Canada outlined also the considerations in favour of a mutual and balanced reduction of forces. He welcomed the recent initiative of the USSR and other socialist countries for a convention prohibiting biological weapons and both parties expressed the hope that a convention could be concluded this year. The two sides expressed their satisfaction of the conclusion of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Treaty on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons and Other Weapons of Mass Destruction on the Sea-Bed and the Ocean Floor and in the Subsoil Thereof.

The two sides expressed serious concern over the tense situation in the Middle East. They emphasized the need for efforts by all the states concerned with a view to achieving a just and lasting peace settlement in the area on the basis of the full implementation of the Security Council Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967. For this purpose the Governments of Canada and the Soviet Union expressed themselves in favour of the continuation of the mission of Ambassador Jarring, the Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary General in the Middle East.

Views were exchanged on developments in Indochina which are causing anxiety. Hopes were expressed on both sides that a viable peace would be re-established in Indochina.

Canada and the Soviet Union attach great importance to the United Nations. The two sides confirmed their determination to seek to strengthen the organization and to enhance its effectiveness in maintaining universal peace and security in accordance with the United Nations Charter.

Both sides expressed their satisfaction with the exchange of views that took place and emphasized the usefulness of maintaining regular personal contacts between the leading statesmen of the two countries.

Prime Minister Trudeau expressed gratitude and satisfaction for the warm hospitality he enjoyed in the USSR and extended an invitation to Chairman Kosygin to visit Canada at a mutually convenient time. The invitation was gratefully accepted.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 3, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) has been substituted for that of Mr. Alexander on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and An Act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report of the committee:

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, pursuant to Rule 67(1)(d), having examined the Rules of the Senate, recommends the following amendments:

1. Page 10, Rule 19: Strike out paragraphs (f) to (i) inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:
   "(f) question period;
   (g) orders of the day;
   (h) inquiries;
   (i) motions."

2. Page 10, Rule 21: Strike out lines 1 and 2 thereof and substitute therefor the following:
   "21. Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, orders of the day take precedence according to priority as follows, precedence always being given to orders of the day relating to legislation under paragraphs (b), (c) and (d):"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I move that it be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 8, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, there are some among us who felt that perhaps we should sit on Monday evening of next week rather than Tuesday, because as you know we are drawing to that period when we hope to have a summer recess. However, in reviewing the work that is before us and what we anticipate will come before us in the immediate future, we felt it would be better to sit at the usual time on Tuesday next. If need be, we could sit on Friday or we could sit on Monday, June 14. It did not seem appropriate to sit on Monday, June 7.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTORY ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

AMENDMENTS TO HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT AND PUBLIC OFFICERS ACT—QUESTIONS

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have two questions to direct to the Leader of the Government. When he began to answer them the other day I thought for a moment that he had been reading my mail, until I recalled that I had given him notice. This is an unusual case of haste and speed on the part of the Leader of the Government in replying to questions, and I certainly commend him for it.

The two questions arise from amendments published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, dated Wednesday, May 26, 1971. The first question refers to SOR/71-199 under the heading, "Hazardous Products Act, Schedule to the Act, amended".

In effect, I asked Senator Martin what was the reason for and the effect of the amendment to Part II of the schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, which was amended to include ceramics used for food storage. The reason I asked was that the schedule to that act was debated at some length when the bill was before this chamber.

The second question refers to SOR/71-201, headed "Public Officers Act and Seals Act, Formal Documents Regulations, amended." There is an amendment to the regulation which brings into the scope of the act grants of pardons by the Governor General and pardons under the Criminal Records Act.

I now ask what is the reason for and the effect of these amendments?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, there are two questions being asked and as Senator Grosart now indicates, he had given me notice of intention. With regard to SOR/71-199, the answer is that the purpose of this order was to provide minimum safety levels for the lead content of glazed ceramic tableware used for food or liquids.

In future, glazed ceramic tableware or kitchenware must not release more than seven parts per million of lead in an 18-hour period when allowed to stand at room temperature filled with a 4 per cent acetic acid solution. While most china and stoneware will comply with the new standard, some products of the earthenware type would not meet the standard.

With regard to SOR/71-201—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Before the honourable Leader of the Government proceeds to the second question, may I ask him if it has been found that there is food contamination from glazed ceramics? Has he any information on that, because my question asked for the reason as well as the effect of these amendments.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot answer that, but I shall give a supplementary reply as soon as possible.

The purpose of SOR/71-201 (Public Officers Act, Seals Act) is to distinguish between pardons granted by the Governor General under the authority of the Letters Patent constituting the office of Governor General of Canada, and pardons granted by the Governor in Council under the provisions of the Criminal Records Act, assented to June 11, 1970.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If I might make a supplementary comment, I thank the leader for his answers but I would have to say they are in about the same kind of bureaucratic semantics as the notices I find in the Canada Gazette. The reason I asked the question was that so often we read these amendments to regulations in the Canada Gazette but since they are not before Parliament we do not know what exactly is behind them. Therefore, I would respectfully suggest to the Leader of the Government that if any subsequent questions of this kind are addressed to him, the answers might be a little more detailed than those he has given and not merely a bureaucratic recital of the kind he has given us.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot agree with that premise at all. The mere fact that the honourable senator takes the position that there is a tone of authoritarianism in the reply does not mean that that is the case. The purpose of the SOR in this case is to give notice to those concerned so that they will have an ample opportunity to examine the substance.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My point is that Parliament is not given the same opportunities.

Hon. Mr. Martin: On that point the senator is not right.

HON. MAURICE LAMONTAGNE, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask leave to bring to the attention of the Senate the act that a significant honour is to be conferred on one of our senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that honourable Senator Lang shall have leave to speak on this matter now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I regret that the subject of my remarks is not present in the chamber this afternoon. Nevertheless, I did not wish to miss this opportunity to bring this matter to your attention.

On June 7 next, the University of Toronto in convocation is conferring an honorary Doctor of Laws degree on Senator Maurice Lamontagne. This honour is being conferred upon Senator Lamontagne in recognition generally of his long and outstanding public service to Canada, and in particular in recognition of the signal contribution he has made as Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy. I know we will all be gratified by this honour to be conferred on one of our colleagues, and I personally am particularly gratified because this honour comes from the University of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Thank you. If I may say so, this is a university which is considered to be at least first among equals among the universities of Canada and indeed of North America. I do not need to remind honourable senators that it is the largest university in terms of enrolment in Canada, having a full-time student body both graduate and undergraduate of 32,000 people. I may also say without immodesty that it has the highest record of academic excellence, which is borne out by the fact that this year 27 University of Toronto students received the coveted Woodrow Wilson awards. This number was exceeded by only one other university in North America, namely, Harvard University, which attained just six more.

I know that it is as gratifying to other honourable members as it is to myself that this foremost English-speaking academic institution is the first such institution in Canada to so honour our distinguished French Canadian colleague. I am very proud of this fact. I know that honourable senators will agree with me that it is an honour richly deserved.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was wondering whether, in view of the very extensive praise of the University of Toronto given by Senator Lang, it was his intention to declare a special interest?

Hon. Mr. Lang: I intended to keep that out of sight for the moment.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I might say that the interest to which I referred is the fact that Senator Lang is a member of the Board of Governors of that university.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. AND JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Martin:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Protocol done at Moscow, May 19, 1971, between Canada and the U.S.S.R. respecting consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 25th May, 1971, and to the Joint Communiqué on the visit to the U.S.S.R. of the Prime Minister of Canada, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 1st June, 1971.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this protocol between Canada and the U.S.S.R., which was signed May 19, appears to be part of a peace plan—a peace plan which seems to have been drawn up by the Russians and agreed to by Canada.

At first glance the document gives every impression of being a rather harmless one, a document of which peace-seeking nations in search of developing friendlier ties with similarly disposed countries could hardly disapprove.

But close scrutiny of the document does give rise to certain thorny questions. For example, section 2 of the protocol reads:

> In the event of a situation arising which, in the opinion of the two governments, endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace, the two governments will make contact without delay in order to exchange views on what might be done to improve the situation.

The significant words are "in the opinion of the two governments"—Senator O'Leary commented on that yesterday—and "endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace".

For example, since the U.S.S.R. is convinced that the presence of the United States in Vietnam endangers the peace of the world, and since Canada is at least uneasy about the U.S. position, can we conclude that Canada is obliged to join with the U.S.S.R. in condemning without reservation U.S. intervention in Vietnam?

What happens if only one government is of the opinion that peace is being endangered? What are the criteria to be used in determining that which endangers the maintenance of peace?

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

The other sections are of secondary importance and express noble intentions to the effect that there will be regular consultations on questions pertaining to relations between the two countries on international problems, on subjects raised in the United Nations, and on various other questions of mutual interest. The protocol is an agglomeration of seemingly well-intentioned vagaries except for two items, peace and the environment of the Arctic. However, these subjects could probably have been more effectively treated by means of an exchange of notes.

The significance of this protocol pales when one compares it with the Canada-U.S.S.R. Agreement to create a mixed Commission on Co-operation in the Industrial Application of Science and Technology, to which the Leader of the Government referred yesterday. There was an instance when our two countries agreed to work together in a specific manner, in a well-defined area, and after having experimented in a practical way for many years in such co-operation.

If there is one thing we should strive for in our dealings with other nations it is clarity and precision. These qualities are unfortunately absent from the protocol which is the subject of the present debate.

Inasmuch as it was inspired by Canada, this protocol and, in fact, the entire Russian visit, was quite obviously designed to project the image of Mr. Trudeau as the man who would bridge the gap between the West and the communist bloc. We are the first country in the Americas to sign such a peace protocol with the Russians. We are the second NATO nation to do so. France has already signed a similar type of protocol but, as everyone knows, France no longer participates in the NATO military program.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not accurate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, it is outside the combined—

Hon. Mr. Martin: The integrated force.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The integrated force, that is what I meant. Perhaps I should have used other words, but I think my meaning was quite clear.

Though government officials vociferously deny it, there is nevertheless more than a little ambiguity with regard to Canada's attitude toward some of the more important issues affecting Atlantic collective security and East-West relations.

Is this protocol a way of circumventing NATO—a further attempt at trying to minimize the importance to the defence of the free world of this organization? Was this protocol our way of giving implicit notice that we plan to further reduce our participation in NATO and NORAD? Are we and NATO to go separate ways? Whose brand of peaceful co-existence are we going to buy? That of NATO or that of the Warsaw Pact? Or a new hybrid variety?

The NATO nations are in favour of troop cuts, but on an Alliance-negotiated basis, not on a unilateral basis as Canada did last year. They insist upon certain prerequisites for an East-West conference on European security.

Are we going to settle for less? Many of the pronouncements of the Prime Minister in Russia I would in charity attribute to a lack of expertise in diplomacy, if I were not so sure that he is too clever to have made what appear at first glance to be blunders of gigantic proportions. I rather think that the right honourable gentleman, faithful to an old practice, may be leading us off on a unilateral course which would appear to have neutralism as its final destination. I hope I am in error, but what else are we to conclude, honourable senators, when following upon our unilateral withdrawal of forces from Europe we now endorse Mr. Brezhnev's call for a reduction of armed forces in central Europe, without insisting that these be "mutual" and "balanced"?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, we do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That has not been the case up to now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, but in the communiqué and the protocol that is stated to be the objective of both countries, mutually balanced forces in Europe.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That may be so, but Canada has acted otherwise up to now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: So have other countries—Britain, France, the United States.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, not the United States. The question has been discussed, but only Canada up to now has decided to reduce its contribution to the NATO forces.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Six years ago the United States made reductions.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Six years ago, after having discussed the matter with the other countries, but not on a unilateral basis as was done by Canada.

We are in a very poor position to be lecturing our allies on how they should be more open to the Russians, how they should temper their mistrust. As a result of the way we welshed on our commitments to NATO last year, we have lost a great deal of our credibility on the international scene. Why did we agree with the Soviet Union on "inviolability of frontiers" as one of the principles on which European stability should be based? Bonn wanted to extract from the Soviets an agreement as to security safeguards for West Berlin before signing a similar agreement, and NATO heartily supported them in this. Why did we cut the grass from under their feet?

The principles outlined in the communiqué tabled yesterday have a distinctly different flavour from those laid down by the NATO ministerial council in Brussels last December. Those adopted by the council were:

> Sovereign equality, political independence, and territorial integrity of each European state, non-interference and non-intervention in the internal affairs of any state, regardless of its political or social system, and the right of each European state to shape their own destinies free of external constraint.

It would appear we settled for a lot less in our recent dealings with the Russians. Why? And I would ask the Leader of the Government why? What is our position vis-à-vis NATO? I should hope the Government's position will be made clear before this debate is ended. It has certainly not been explained satisfactorily yet. There is indeed more to this protocol than catches the eye. The Prime Minister, it appears, looks upon it as one of the ways we have of asserting Canada's independence with regard to the United States.

One would have thought that if that were his preoccupation, establishing our independence from the U.S., he might more sensibly have sought to sign a protocol with the U.S. in which each would assert the fact that they are independent from the other. But, of course, this is entirely unnecessary. Diplomatic relations between the U.S. and Canada have not been too good since the present Canadian administration took over. They will be worse now. Most of us do not feel that our independence is seriously jeopardized by our having to share a continent with the most powerful nation, economically and politically, of history.

I should hope, honourable senators, that further elucidation on the part of the Government will not be long in coming. Much of what was said by the Prime Minister while on his visit to Russia has left our friends and allies confused. They are beginning to wonder if we can be counted upon.

If this Government does not assert—I do not say reassert, but assert—our unqualified adherence to the principles of NATO, if this Government does not repair the damage it has done to our friendly relationship with our traditional friends and allies, then this Government is even more unrepresentative of the Canadian people than anyone has ever suggested.

I listened with interest to what the Government Leader had to say yesterday, and I should tell you that I was relieved to see that his heart was not really in it. His defence of the Government's position somehow sounded hollow. Absent was the usual fervour, the characteristic bristling defence of his master, right or wrong. Could it be that Charles Lynch, according to the article in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, is right? Could it be that Senator Martin feels the Government has gone too far this time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I fully support what the Government has done, and I think Charles Lynch was in error.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sure he stands corrected.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I told him that this morning, good-naturedly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That Senator Martin, who went from being a hard-line anti-communist during the Conservative administration of Mr. Diefenbaker, to something of a devotee of peaceful co-existence from 1963 on, should now be less enthusiastic about these new attempts at rapprochement than is the Prime Minister and leader of his party, would be difficult to understand.

It has been suggested by the Government that this protocol is exactly the same as earlier protocols and agreements. This constitutes an extremely poor exercise in obfuscation. The agreements entered into during the administration of Messrs. St. Laurent and Diefenbaker were in keeping with the policies of the times. We were already allied with the United States when we entered into consultative agreements with them. We were already endeavouring to expand trade and other relations with Japan when agreement was reached on the Canada-Japan Ministerial Committee. There was nothing controversial about the Mexican agreement brought about by the exchange of notes in 1968. Such is not the case with this protocol. It must be considered in the light of the illuminating commentaries of the Prime Minister.

It is quite obvious that insinuations with regard to our independence and how it is menaced, to the overpowering United States presence on this continent, and to the economic, cultural and military threat which the United States represents, were calculated to indicate a new course to be followed in our international relations. What we have now is a double alignment, which in some quarters, with plenty of justification, may be looked upon as a doublecross.

This protocol, the events which surrounded its signing, and the comments upon it which issued forth from the mouth of our Prime Minister, will gain us no real friends and risk alienating devoted allies.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) a question. I am, as he probably recognizes, from Ireland. I was born in Ireland, and I look at the sad plight of that country and think of the long memories of its people in connection with Dragheda and Wexford, with Cromwell, always reaching back into history. Senator Flynn referred to Senator Martin and the anti-communist posture. Is there a period when we start to work with people? Is there a time when we should be trying to work with people, despite the sins, the terrible sins, that were done in the past?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not opposed to promoting good relations with the U.S.S.R., and I think that when I came back from my trip there last year I was quite clear on that point. I am not against it. What I have been criticizing with regard to this protocol is the manner in which it was drafted and the misunderstanding which may result therefrom. I was not at all critical of the idea of improving relations with the U.S.S.R., and I do not think there is anything in what I said to suggest that.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I should like to adjourn this debate until after the next item on the Order Paper has been dealt with. I have discussed the matter with the two Whips, and in order to allow Senator O'Leary to make his speech I should like to defer my speech until immediately after that item.

Hon. Mr. Martin: So that we can go on with legislation.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that Order No. 1 should be reverted to immediately after we have disposed of the next order?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 4:

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 1, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Hon. Mr. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, this bill is called an omnibus bill. It is a sort of package deal, which I think most of us in this house and in the other place should dislike and, if we could, reject. I have read the bill fairly carefully. There are some things in it that I believe are good and that I would like to support, but there are other things in it that I dislike and that I would not like to support. Why should I be asked to vote for the whole thing in one package? Why should I be compelled to accept things to which I object just because I have to vote for some things in which I believe?

I listened the other day to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) introducing the bill. I am always interested in Senator Connolly's speeches, because they are delivered with scholarship and understanding, and usually with great lucidity. But I seemed to detect a bit of boredom in the speech he delivered the other day. In fact, in his concluding remarks he clearly indicated that he had not been supplied with facts that would justify his giving his benediction to the bill. However, I am perfectly satisfied to proceed with a bill that does not get full benediction from the other side.

In dealing with the particular matter I shall try to discuss, namely, ministers of state, I suppose it could be argued that the other place has a perfect right to determine its procedures and its characters as it pleases, since the special character of the changes being made affecting the other place do not in fact affect this part of Parliament. What I object to in this bill is contained in clauses 13 to 15. What I find a bit disturbing, and what I think we should all find disturbing, is the tendency towards big government. We live in an age when an obsession with bigness seems to determine many of the actions taken by government. We have big government, big labour, big business, big highways, big this and big that—what somebody has called "giantism".

The clauses permitting the creation of ministers of state curiously enough provide that these ministers can be created without debate in the House of Commons. The Government says that under this clause which begins, "Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies . . .", a new minister is to be appointed, and the House of Commons, the other branch of the Parliament, is not even permitted to debate the necessity for the creation of that new ministry or branch of government.

What is going to be the result of this? Most of us in this house can remember back to World War II. In World War II we had armed forces on land and sea, and in the air; we maintained a great army in Europe; and we built up a navy which, at the close of the war, was the third or fourth largest in the world. We had a minister for naval affairs, a minister for defence, and a minister for air. Despite what we were doing then, fighting the most terrible war in history, we got along with 23 ministers and 9 parliamentary secretaries, and without executive assistants. Today we have 28 ministers, and I doubt if you could cast a pebble on Sparks Street without hitting a parliamentary secretary or an executive assistant. This is what is happening to this country.

If and when this bill goes through—and I am sure it will go through—it is going to make the other place, the other branch of Parliament, almost an extension of an already monolithic bureaucracy. You are going to have—at least, there is provision for this—138 members of one party who could have jobs of some kind. We hear often now about the silent majority. We know that there is a silent majority in the other place. It is going to become more silent, more muted, because of lovely expectations of things hopefully to come. Practically everybody will be working for the Government. There is no getting away from this. We are moving into a position where Canada must be one of the most governed nations in the world.

Under this bill, when it becomes law, we will have a cabinet of 28 ministers, with 16 parliamentary secretaries, one assistant speaker, one assistant whip, one vice president of house committees, and one chairman of Liberal committees. This makes 61 Liberal members with a job. There will be 61 members of one party, the party supporting the Executive, with jobs. I submit that this is undermining the independence and the whole character of a democratic house.

What has Parliament become today? What has become of its ancient prerogatives of independence? Parliament is based on that. Without independence of Parliament, we have no Parliament at all. When more than one-third of its members are in the employ of the executive, I see —and I am sure other members do also—an understanding of the real purpose of Parliament.

I have heard charges made—and I have not agreed with all of them—that the Prime Minister has been designing and planning to undermine Parliament. I agree entirely with some of the things he has said. I agreed entirely when he set up a separate bureaucracy of his own to check the other bureaucracy. I agree with that. Some of my colleagues do not agree with me. I do not complain too much about the 40 or 42 men the Prime Minister has in his office, because I think these men are checking ministers, checking the bureaucrats who used to fool, misrepresent, and mislead their ministers, especially new ministers. On the other hand, it is impossible to agree with this trend or tendency towards bigger and bigger government.

Honourable senators, let us go to some other country and see what they have got. In England they have 50 ministers against our 32. England has 20 members of her inner cabinet, and 30 others in the cabinet who are ministers of state and who cannot speak on policy but can only answer for the activities of their departments.

That is a total cabinet of 50 out of 634 members of Parliament. We have 264 members and we are going to have about one-third of them either in the Cabinet or as parliamentary secretaries, or holding some other position in the pay of the Executive, and, because of this one cannot expect, having regard to human nature, that they will be independent, as they should be as members of Parliament. Actually what we are getting in the House of Commons, because of this bill, is an extension of the bureaucracy. The House of Commons has become a part of the bureaucracy; an extension or an annex of a party monolithic bureaucracy.

Honourable senators, as an example I turn to Australia, a country almost comparable to our own. Australia has 12 ministers in the Government, and 14 who are not, for a total of 26 ministers. Of those 21 are from the House of Commons, and 5 are from the Senate. Australia, like Canada, also has its provincial legislatures.

Let us look at India. Here is a country with tremendous problems, with 300 million people, but with a cabinet composed of 15 members. There are also 15 ministers of state. The lower house consists of 500 members, and there are 15 members of the cabinet.

We are going to have some 35 or more ministers, because this act permits the Government to create as many as it wants. There is nothing to stop it, not even a debate in the other place. The Government will simply announce it is creating a new minister—not a minister without portfolio, but a minister of state. It is interesting to observe that the minister of state is going to get a bigger salary than a minister without portfolio.

Why do they want these people? What are they going to do? When you create a minister of state and give him a parliamentary secretary and an executive assistant, what do you do? You create another department of government, and under Parkinson's law that department will grow and grow and grow.

That is what has been happening in Canada for the last six, eight or ten years. It is hard to realize that it is now costing close to $2 billion just to service the national debt. That is $2 billion a year in interest alone, and a lot of that is due solely to the increase in Government. The overhead cost of government offices, parliamentary secretaries and more and more staff, has grown by 76 per cent in the last six years. It has grown in fact from $1 billion in 1963 to $1.76 billion in 1969. The cost of the prime minister's office alone has increased by 500 per cent in that period of about five years.

I am not criticizing all that, and I am not taking back what I said a moment ago. I disagree with many of my colleagues on this, but I do support what the Prime Minister has been doing in his office, because I feel that the bureaucrats should be checked. I have lived a long time in Ottawa with the bureaucracy, and I know of cases where ministers have been misled, misdirected, fooled, and laughed at by bureaucrats. I am sure the Leader of the Government knows even better than I just what happens. For these reasons I believe Mr. Trudeau is right in bringing in experts to check the propositions brought before the cabinet. From time to time propositions were put before the cabinet by ministers who did not understand what those propositions were all about because they had been misdirected and misled by their staffs.

But bureaucracy aside, let us compare Canada with some of the other countries in the world. France has a population of 45 million people, but its cabinet consists of 19 members, while Canada has a cabinet consisting of 38 members. France has a National Assembly of 779 members. It has no provincial nor state governments. West Germany has a cabinet of 16 members, and a federal Diet composed of 496 members. Japan has a population of 83 million, and a House of Representatives made up of 467 members. Japan has no provincial governments, and its cabinet consists of only 21 members.

And why all this floor space in Canada? I have been trying for some time to find out from the British information department just how much floor space the Government of the United Kingdom occupies in London I have not been able to get the exact figures, but I will take a wager with any member of this house that the Government of Canada today occupies more floor space in Ottawa than the Government of the United Kingdom occupies in London.

Honourable senators, go to London and see what kind of offices they have there. Those of you who have been there must know. Go to the Admiralty, the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, and the War Office. You will find ministers and officials in old, musty offices. But here you cannot pick up a morning paper without reading that the Government has taken up another thousand or more square feet of floor space in yet another new building—sometimes a new building built by their friends. You might read in the same paper that the Government is putting up its own new building. Look at that new building, for example, for External Affairs on Sussex Drive.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Please do not criticize that because that was my idea.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am terribly sorry, but it is a monstrosity. It is an ugly building.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are going to hurt me more than you have ever done, if you keep on like that.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I remember very well what the External Affairs Department was like under Sir Wilfrid Laurier. My honourable friend was not here then, but I was, and I remember that that department consisted of one man, William Mackenzie. After him came Joseph Pope, who ran it practically by himself. Then came Loring Christie, one of the most brilliant minds we have ever had in the Department of External Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

[Hon. Mr. O'Leary.]

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: And following him was another very great Canadian, Oscar Skelton. That department has grown so much over the years that I have known it that last year it spent over $55 million.

If any of you are travelling abroad I suggest that you visit our embassy in Rome. I think it is outrageous. Go to London, and study what goes on in our High Commissioner's office there. I recall going to Havana a few years ago. What did I find there? An ambassador living in a magnificent embassy. It was almost as good as the British embassy or the American embassy. He was a full-fledged ambassador with a Cadillac and chauffeur, but when I inquired what our trade with Cuba was I found you could almost put the whole thing in your eye.

What the people of the External Affairs Department are doing could, for the most part, be done by trade commissioners and consul generals. What we want is trade. We do not want young men giving cocktail parties and learning how to pass a teacup. That is not what Canada needs. In Australia, New Zealand, and New York and a number of other cities in the United States, I have seen consul generals and trade commissioners doing real work. But I have seen in other parts of the world, such as western Europe, young so-called diplomats with their striped pants and coat-tails who were not doing a good job for Canada. Yet it is costing us over $50 million a year, and this has all happened in the last eight or ten years.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend permit a question? It will enable me to put myself on record. Would he not agree that perhaps on reflection he does the Department of External Affairs a great disservice, because in my judgment there are no more dedicated people in the Public Service than those young men and women?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I can well understand what my friend is saying, because I know the very good reputation that he personally had in the Department of External Affairs. Moreover, it is true that there have been some very good men in that department. They were my personal friends. Norman Robertson, one of the deep philosophical minds in Canada, was a dear, long-time personal friend of mine. I knew all of those people, but they would tell me privately what was going on in the Department of External Affairs, and what was going on was a lot of expensive nonsense.

A few years ago the Government's policy was to rent buildings because it was cheaper to rent than build. That policy has apparently been abandoned. Look at the monstrosity of ugliness they are building for the National Defence Department. They are building it between two bridges, and only a few years ago we expropriated a huge tract of land on the flats for the sole purpose of building a pentagon. But for some extraordinary reason that idea was thrown overboard. Now, every day, I drive by this monstrosity of a building, and it almost makes me ill to contemplate what it will cost. Its cost will surely be in the tens of millions of dollars. It is building after building, and rental after rental, all adding up to an enormous cost which is mounting beyond any reasonable estimate.

I do not have the figures with me but if you check the growth of our civil service you will see that it has increased quite beyond reason. If you compared the percentage growth of our civil service over the last 20 years with that of the civil service in the United Kingdom, you would find that ours is vastly bigger.

This all stems from the nonsensical attitude we adopted a few years ago of calling ourselves a "middle power". I saw that term "middle power" just the other day. Considering Canada a middle power, we are going all over the world, trying to tell people how to conduct their lives. We are meddling in Cyprus, Rhodesia, and here, there and everywhere.

Honourable senators, we will make little contribution towards setting the world's house in order unless and until we first show a capacity to set our own house in order. Our business is in Canada. This is the very thing that made Britain great. Why did Britain become great? Because Britain thought of Britain first, last, and all the time. But we have not learned that yet. We are always, with some sort of curious nostalgia, worrying about the demise of the British Empire and what is going to succeed it. We are worrying about the Commonwealth, but the Commonwealth today is nothing; it is dying. The old Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada is no more. Who would want to go to a so-called Commonwealth conference today and discuss matters of confidential concern? Would you have gone there with Mr. Nkrumah? Would you have gone there with a man who has taken the Queen's image off his coins?

Then we have what they call the Inter-Parliamentary Union. We are active in that. If ever there was an example of industrious futility, that is it. I have gone to those meetings. I have gone to NATO meetings, and I have seen for myself what has happened to resolutions passed there. They have passed resolutions, they have talked, and they have choked themselves with paper, and in the end when asked if the NATO Council had accepted these resolutions or if anything had happened anywhere because of these meetings, the answer would have to be no.

We are running away with the nonsense that we are a great country. I remember a few years ago when I was discussing the rise in costs, a distinguished member of this house, Senator Croll, said, "Oh, but you are not counting the fact of the growth in the gross national product." Did we expect that the gross national product was to keep on growing? The trouble is that we keep on building overhead but the gross national product declines—in fact it may disappear, but the overhead still remains. That is what has happened in Canada. That is why today the interest on our public debt is nearly $2 billion. Just think of that. The interest on our public debt today is more than the deficit of four years combined—and that is just the interest. This has happened because we have run away with the idea that we are a great and powerful nation, a middle power, and so we have incurred these expenses. Yet people come to us and say, "Why don't you do more about foreign aid?" Do you know why we cannot do more about foreign aid? It is because we have already sliced the pie, and there is nothing left.

I remember when my friend the Government Leader was one of the great protagonists of social security. I remember when he used to speak at length in the other place about social security, the poor, and this, that and the other thing. The fact is that we have not been able to afford these things, and we cannot afford them now. And year after year we are plunging deeper and deeper into debt.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Those were the days.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, those were the days when my friend used to rise in the House of Commons and with trembling voice ask the Government what it was going to do about unemployment and the poor. That soprano voice would question the Government about the awful predicament of the unemployed. But at that time, honourable senators, the rate of unemployment was 4 per cent and today it is 6½ per cent, and it is growing and it is going to continue to grow. Today that trembling voice is mute.

There is much more I could say about this awful bill. There are some good things in it, but not many. May I say to the Government Leader that I should like some day—and I do not think it will take too long—to be back with the Government party and to hear my honourable friend once again with his voice trembling plead for the unemployed and the poor. Today, as I say, his voice is muted.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I just quietly observe to Senator O'Leary that there is no one sitting on that side of the house whom I would more like to see here on the Government side than Senator O'Leary. But although I know he is going to live a long time, I also know that I shall not live long enough to see that glorious day.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Wait until next year.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. Walker, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. AND JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA—DEBATE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 1:

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, as I listened intently on June 2 to the speech of Senator Paul Martin, the Government Leader in the Senate and the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, extolling the possible benefits that might accrue to Canada from the U.S.S.R.-Canada protocol and communiqué signed by Prime Minister Trudeau in Moscow on May 19 this year, I tried to imagine what these "blessings" would be. We know from this protocol that "the Soviet Union and Canada shall enlarge and deepen consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations by means of periodic meetings." These relations are to be improved by means of "high-level contacts, expanding ties and exchanges in the fields of economy, trade, science, technology, culture and northern development."

To my knowledge, since the Canadian formal diplomatic recognition of the Soviet Union, the only evident benefits have come from trade, particularly the sale of wheat, which to a degree aided our economy but which of course helped to save the constantly faltering Soviet economy in agriculture. The cultural exchanges have been preponderantly one-sided; Canada has been receiving many Soviet ensembles, choirs, circuses, et cetera, together with propaganda and spies, but rarely do Canadian groups tour the U.S.S.R. I have never heard of the communist regime in Moscow sharing advanced scientific and technological knowledge, experience and developments with the capitalist countries. Furthermore, in this field we are getting more and will get more from the United States, Britain, Germany and Japan, who in most respects are ahead of the Soviet Union. We therefore stand to benefit very little from the U.S.S.R., but the U.S.S.R. can benefit much more from us. Quo vadis, Canada?

Let us pay attention to the political motives of the Soviet Union. The communiqué states that the two governments > —emphasized the need for effective measures to further reduce tension, and for the normalization and improvement of relations among all European states on the basis of the independence and sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability of frontiers, renunciation of the use of force or the threat of force, non-interference in internal affairs and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means.

Canada has always adhered to these principles, for she has never had imperialist designs. But what is the record of the Soviet Union? Can the Russian communist leaders be trusted? Having taught Russian and Soviet history at two Canadian universities for 20 years, I would like to present some facts which should help us to assess the foreign policy of the U.S.S.R.

In my speech to the Senate on November 18, 1969, I gave a documentary account of the Soviet subversion of the United Nations. In the pursuit of world communism and Russian imperialism the Soviet government has consistently employed the tactics of deceit, intrigue and subversion.

Lenin, the founder of the U.S.S.R., adhered to dictatorial control of his Bolshevik party, but he did not hesitate to issue promises of "land, bread and peace" as well as freedom, which, as subsequent events proved, were not intended to be kept but were merely a means of obtaining power.

Take, for example, one of the first decrees of the Soviet of People's Commissars dated November 15, 1917, eight days after they came to power, concerning the subjugated people of the Tsarist Russian empire:

> 1. All peoples of Russia are equal and sovereign;
> 2. The peoples of Russia have the right of self-determination including the right of secession from Russia and of the establishment of independent national states of their own;
>
> 3. All national and religious-national privileges and restrictions shall be abolished;
> 4. The national minorities and ethnic groups in Russian territory shall be given every opportunity to develop freely.

When the Bolsheviks were in power under the leadership of Lenin, the various subjugated peoples asserted their "right of self-determination, including the right of secession from Russia and the establishment of independent national states of their own." One after the other, the non-Russian peoples proclaimed their independent states, sixteen in number. Soon after, however, the Russian communist regime subverted and conquered by force all those independent states, and these nations are again part of the Russian empire under totalitarian rule, not much different from the autocratic Tsarist regime.

Not only did the Russian communist government make a general declaration of self-determination, but we also have its formal acknowledgement of this right with respect to the Ukraine, dated December 17, 1917:

> We, the Soviet of People's Commissars, recognize the Ukrainian National Republic and its right to separate from Russia or to make an agreement with the Russian Republic for federative or other similar mutual relations between them. Everything that touches national rights and the national independence of the Ukrainian people, we the Soviet of People's Commissars, accept clearly without limitations and unreservedly.

That was certainly a strong declaration, but it proved to be deceitful and perfidious, for at the time of its announcement the Russian communist government immediately had a Ukrainian Soviet Republic established in Kharkov, another city in the Ukraine, in direct opposition to the democratic Ukrainian National Republic. This Ukrainian Soviet Republic claimed to possess the sovereignty of an independent state, but when it became a member of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1922, it lost its sovereignty, including the right of amending its own constitution, maintaining its own armed forces, conducting its own foreign policy, directing its own financial affairs, et cetera. Ukraine, as a consequence, became a mere province under the rigid control of the centralized Russian communist government in Moscow.

It was exactly the same with Lithuania. The Peace Treaty in 1920 included the Soviet Union's declaration that she > ...recognized without reserve the sovereignty and independence of the Lithuanian state with all of the juridicial consequences resulting from such recognition, voluntarily and forever renouncing all sovereign rights possessed by Russia over the Lithuanian people and territory.

Similar treaties were drawn up with Estonia and Latvia. This did not deter the same regime 20 years later from invading and occupying these small Baltic countries and establishing Soviet Socialist Republics under the domination of the Kremlin.

Deceit, as has already been noted, is a basic tactic of Soviet policy in the subversion of the free world. During the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the communist Soviet revolution, and the "glorious" achievements of the Soviet regime, Alexei Kosygin, the Prime Minister, boastfully proclaimed, as reported in Pravda, June 20, 1967, that:

> In the fifty years of her existence the Soviet Union has respected all other nations, great as well as small. Every nation is entitled to establish an independent national state of its own.

I repeat:

> Every nation is entitled to establish an independent national state of its own. This is one of the basic principles of Soviet policy. Supporting the right of self-determination of nations, the Soviet Union condemns and resolutely opposes the attempts of any power to conduct an aggressive policy and to work for the annexation of foreign countries... No country in the world could claim to have solved the nationality problem as successfully as the Soviet Union... No nationality in our country is discriminated against.

Consider the sincerity of the resolution introduced in the United Nations in December 1965 by Andrei Gromyko, the Soviet Foreign Minister, who took part in all the protocol discussions.

> No state has the right to intervene directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal and external affairs of any other state. Consequently armed intervention and all forms of interference of the state or against its political, economic and cultural elements are condemned.

These declarations of Gromyko and Kosygin were obviously false, for it did not deter the Soviet government from sending the Red Army, together with the forces of its satellite states, to invade and occupy its socialist satellite, Czechoslovakia, in August 1968, just as it had done during the uprisings in Hungary in 1956. The Soviet Russian Empire was established by force and it will evidently be maintained by force under a totalitarian system which cannot allow "liberalization", democracy and freedom to make headway within its jurisdiction.

The grim record of the Soviet Union proves that it has constantly broken its treaties, agreements and protocols, all of which are purely means to achieve its imperialistic ends. How can any free nation have any confidence in the declarations of the Soviet leaders? Knowing the needs and designs of the Soviet Union, how can Prime Minister Trudeau have faith in the U.S.S.R.-Canadian protocol and communiqué? I cannot see that Senator Martin can say with pride that the Canadian Government is charting a new voyage in new waters. If Canada, in the pursuit of peace, abandons the principles of freedom and justice to peoples and individuals, this new voyage will have disastrous conseqences for the Canadian people.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That, of course, the Canadian people and the Canadian Government are not doing.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: That remains to be seen, whether we are going to sacrifice the principles of the cornerstone of our foreign policy, peace, freedom, prosperity and justice.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I agree, but I do not think that we are abandoning them.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Well, I hope we will not abandon them. Certainly, knowing the honourable senator, I know that while you are there they will not be abandoned, but what can happen in the future?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not know what other government will follow us.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: By the signing of this protocol does Mr. Trudeau believe that Canada will become a partner with the U.S.S.R.? May this not be a partnership in the Soviet Russian crimes against nations and humanity? Will this step not weaken our alliances with our neighbour, the United States, and other free states of the world? Why was this document drawn up in secrecy and not referred to the Canadian Parliament? Trudeau's boldness could turn out to be rashness.

Immediately upon his return to Canada, Prime Minister Trudeau showed evidence that he had been brainwashed by Brezhnev, Kosygin and Gromyko and began toeing the Soviet line.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would Senator Yuzyk permit me to interject by way of a question?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that we all understand his concern about matters of this sort, but in view of the importance of the problem, does Senator Yuzyk—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this is a question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is a question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, ask your question and do not raise points.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am surprised at Senator Macdonald becoming cross with me. This is the first time he has had a cross word for me.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In that case you had better watch your step.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am hurt beyond words. I am sure Senator Yuzyk, in a matter of this importance, would not wish to have conveyed to the Soviet Union or any other part of the world that the head of the Government of his country is deserving of such characterization. Any Canadian who is head of the Government of Canada would work in the interests of peace in a responsible way, and that is what the Prime Minister is doing day in and day out.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, on a point of order, may I suggest that the Leader of the Government make his speech later.

The Hon. the Speaker: On this point of order, may I invite honourable senators who may wish to ask a question of the honourable senator who has the floor to put their questions and refrain from making speeches. I would remind all honourable senators that under the amendment to the Rules and Orders they have the opportunity now to speak more than once. I now return the floor to Senator Yuzyk.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Thank you, Your Honour. I think, Senator Martin, that I will answer your question in the course of this presentation. I do not make statements unless I can back them up, and I am very much concerned about the image of Canada that the present Prime Minister of Canada has left, which is not the best.

On the question of the violation of human rights in the Ukraine, in the CBC radio interview on Sunday, May 30, he stated:

> My position in the Soviet Union or in Canada is that anyone who breaks the law to assert his nationalism does not get too much sympathy with me.
>
> I did not particularly feel like bringing up any cases which would have caused Mr. Brezhnev or Mr. Kosygin to say—

He is already conscious of what they are going to say.

> "Well, you know, why did you put in jail certain FLQ leaders? After all, they think they are only fighting for the independence of Quebec. Our people say they are fighting for the independence of the Ukraine. Why should you put your revolutionaries in jail and we should not put ours?"

As if Mr. Kosygin and Mr. Brezhnev state this.

> The Prime Minister told the house that just as he opposed separatism in Canada, he was "not supporting the independence of any part of any other country which is recognized under international law."

Here he outrightly admits that he does not want to offend Brezhnev and Kosygin, but does not hesitate to offend the freedom-loving Ukrainians. The Canadian Prime Minister proved his utter ignorance, or else wanted to disregard the truth, when he compared the imprisoned Ukrainian intellectuals with the FLQ leaders. These Ukrainian intellectuals such as Valentyn Moroz, Chornovil, Karvansky and others are not revolutionaries or nationalists; they did not throw bombs, kidnap or murder anyone; they did not wish to overthrow the state and change the constitution.

Unlike the leaders of the FLQ, these intellectuals were using all legal means to have the law applied as set forth in the constitution of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. Article 103, Section VIII of this constitution guarantees: "Equality of the right of citizens of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic irrespective of their nationality or race in all branches of economic, state, cultural, social and political life."

Article 105 guarantees the freedom of speech. Article 14 of Section II goes so far as to state: "The Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic reserves the right of free withdrawal from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics". These Ukrainian intellectuals in opposing the Russifications policy of Moscow in the Ukraine and in defending the cultural rights in their country demanded their rights guaranteed in their constitution and in the charter of the United Nations. They were tried and sentenced in secret, closed trials and condemned for opposing the dictatorship of the Russian communist party. All democratic and freedom-conscious Canadians who oppose arbitrary law, sympathize with these brave Ukrainian intellectuals. The Canadian Government should come to their defence if it believes in the principles of freedom, truth, justice and the rule of law.

There is no excuse for Prime Minister Trudeau to be ignorant of the facts, particularly when he is dealing with the largest imperialist, totalitarian police state in the world. He had received some time ago a booklet of documents entitled "Violation of Human Rights in Ukraine," published by the World Congress of Free Ukrainians, composed of all the free and democratic Ukrainian organizations in the world. Such books as The Chornovil Papers, published by McGraw-Hill, and John Kolasky's Two Years in Soviet Ukraine, written by a Canadian communist leader who learned the bitter truth when he recently visited Ukraine, are in the Library of Parliament and were recommended to Mr. Trudeau before his trip to the Soviet Union.

Letters and telegrams have been and are pouring into the Prime Minister's office protesting against the insult. I wonder if Prime Minister Trudeau has the moral fortitude to apologize to the Canadians of Ukrainian origin, who treasure above all the freedom and democracy that is guaranteed to all Canadians by our Constitution?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I followed with close interest the remarks of Senator Yuzyk. I think that in a matter involving the relations of Canada with one of the super powers, in this instance the Soviet Union, we are dealing with a subject of very considerable importance, one that not only affects our bilateral relations with that country but one that is related to our efforts, along with other countries, to bring about stability.

We do not serve the common cause of international collaboration when we exaggerate or misinterpret statements made, in this instance by the head of the Government of Canada. I do not want to traverse the ground I covered yesterday. The fact is, however, that what the Prime Minister of Canada did in the discussions he had with the Soviet Union was exactly what every other government in NATO has done over the period of about four and a half years in its relations with the Soviet Union. Every foreign minister of the NATO countries has been to the Soviet Union; in some instances heads of government have gone; in at least one instance, that of France, the head of state went, and only the other day again General de Gaulle's successor, Monsieur Pompidou, went to the Soviet Union. It was agreed in NATO that this was a desirable thing to do. We join with other countries in seeking to establish closer relations with eastern European countries, including the Soviet Union. I think it was Monsieur Spaak, the former Director General of NATO, who was the first foreign minister to establish a series of visits as the foreign minister of Belgium.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Do I understand Senator Martin is speaking a second time in this debate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Or is Senator Martin replying to my speech?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I am speaking a second time. I am provoked to do so as a comment on the speech that has been made by Senator Yuzyk.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Thank you very much. I should like to reserve my right to speak a second time a little later.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Yuzyk does not have to reserve his right to speak, because under the rules he is entitled to speak a second time if he wishes to do so.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not want Senator Yuzyk to misunderstand me when I say I am replying to him. His speech provoked me to my feet. We have had a suspension of Rule 28 for this very purpose, until the end of the session. I do feel that in a matter of this importance some of the things Senator Yuzyk said today should not be allowed to go unchallenged. I am a member of the Government; I participate in the formulation of some of these policies, I have a responsibility, and I would now like to deal with these matters as quickly as I can.

What the Prime Minister of Canada did in his exchanges with representatives of the Soviet Union was in compliance with an established tradition of the Western powers who compose the NATO organization. What we did in the protocol was to establish a procedure for consultation on a regular basis, just as we did in the case of the United States and Great Britain, just as Prime Minister Diefenbaker did with Japan, just as we have arranged to do with Mexico, Australia and New Zealand.

Senator Yuzyk said that before the Prime Minister discussed this protocol with the Soviet Union he should have come to Parliament and got the approval of Parliament. If that is the case, one should argue that Prime Minister Diefenbaker, before making an arrangement with Prime Minister Ikeda of Japan, should have submitted the decision of the Canadian Government to engage in annual consultations with Japan to the Canadian Parliament before agreeing to do so.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Was that a formal protocol, as in this case?

Hon. Mr. Martin: You might call it a protocol. It was an arrangement made between two countries. It does not matter whether it was formal or informal. It was precisely the kind of arrangement that was made between Prime Minister Kosygin and Prime Minister Trudeau the other day. It should be clear that what was agreed to was not anything that imposes an international obligation or a legal obligation on either side. It was an agreement to set up a regular schedule for consultation. Surely in this day and age, when we are trying to minimize the occasion of war, when we are trying to promote international collaboration, when we are trying to establish the rule of law, anything that will bring countries together through their heads of government is a desirable thing.

We are a member of the United Nations along with the Soviet Union. We are trying to get China, a country with whom we have diplomatic relations, into the United Nations. We do not agree with communism as established in China, or with communism as practiced in the Soviet Union. But these are states in the inter-dependent world we live in. All the head of the Government of Canada was doing in these discussions with Mr. Kosygin, Mr. Podgorny, Mr. Gromyko, and Mr. Brezhnev, was taking part in exchanges that might lead to the maintenance of peace between the two countries and peace in the world. Surely no one will object to that. Anyone who carefully examines . . .

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Not peace at any price.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. So that this debate may proceed in an orderly way, I would ask honourable senators when they rise—and they have, of course, the right to rise—to ask if they may put a question. Then it will be up to the honourable senator who has the floor to accept or reject the question. I hope honourable senators will co-operate with the chair in this respect.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your ruling. I learned the tactic, actually, from Senator Martin.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has Senator Yuzyk a question?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have no objection to questions. I was simply saying, surely we are not going to argue that because the Prime Minister of Canada accepted an invitation to go to the Soviet Union, as has every other representative of all governments of the NATO organization, that that should open the door to the charges made today by Senator Yuzyk, and by others yesterday. What the Prime Minister did was a service to the cause of international collaboration. The protocol reflects an agreement between our two countries that these consultations shall continue. I think it would have been regrettable if, instead of having made this arrangement with the Soviet Union, he had not been able to bring back something solid.

Canadians of all shades of political opinion in Canada, regardless of the party to which they belong, recognize the nature of the Canadian community. We recognize that Canada is not made up of any one national group. True, we have the two founding races, but we recognize that our country is composed of many groups of different national origins—the Ukranians, the Poles, the Italians, the Czechs, the Russians, the Roumanians, the Scandinavians of the various countries, the Croats, the Slovenes, the Serbs, and others. These, together with the two founding races, make up the Canadian family.

I do not believe we serve the cause of Canadian unity, or our national interest, when we seek to convey that a particular political leader, or a political group, has inimical reactions to another cultural group in this country. That is not in keeping with the nature of the Canadian family. But we are all interested in the Ukranian people with their rich cultural traditions. Of course, no one could expect all Canadians to have the same intensity of feeling of Senator Yuzyk and others of his national origin.

I believe it is not in the interests of Canadian unity, or in the interests of any particular group concerned, to suggest that, as a result of anything that the Prime Minister said, there was not on his part, and on the part of the Government, a deep concern for all that is represented in the richness of the Ukranian culture and society.

I know Ukranian people, I have represented them in the House of Commons for many years. They are among my closest friends, as Senator Yuzyk knows. I find it difficult to sit in my seat and have the Prime Minister of this country characterized as one who has not given the recognition to this group of Canadians which it certainly deserves.

I have listened to what various commentators have said. This morning I got a copy of some of the remarks that the Prime Minister made since he returned and on his return. I have before me an excerpt of a transcript of the Prime Minister's interview with press and radio reporters en route to Ottawa from his Soviet visit, May 28, 1971. A question was put to the Prime Minister and he replied to it:

> Q: Mr. Prime Minister, did you during your talks with Soviet officials discuss the subject of reunification of families which are separated between Canada and the U.S.S.R.?
> A. Yes, I discussed it with Prime Minister Kosygin and then it was discussed again in Kiev with the Prime Minister of the Ukraine and it was brought up particularly by Walter Deakon, our member of Parliament from Toronto.

At this point, I want to put in a parenthesis. Mr. Walter Deakon is a member of Parliament on the Government side of the House of Commons. He is a Canadian of Ukrainian descent, who speaks Ukrainian. He travelled to the Soviet Union with the Prime Minister. That is the end of my parenthesis, and I continue now with the answer given by the Prime Minister:

> I think the more significant reply I got was from Kosygin who said that he would—well, for one thing that he would look at the humanitarian aspects, that he would try to ensure—he would give it personal attention—that reunification of families would be proceeded with. There had been some substantial progress, you will remember, after Mr. Pearson made representations in 1963, and he (Mr. Kosygin) indicated to me that he was determined to follow it up and when I said that we would present a list through our embassy of cases that deserved of study, he said he would look at them and make sure that they got his personal attention. What follows from this, I cannot predict of course, but I would say it is one of the by-products of establishing trust and confidence between our countries, as we tried to do in this trip, that we are in a position to deal with cases like this, that we not only talk about trade and economic matters but we can, because this confidence exists, appeal to them for dealing on a humanitarian basis with certain cases, you know, over and beyond what their legal duties are.

This was carefully thought-out language, which the Prime Minister used. It certainly shows his regard for Canadians of Ukrainian descent, his desire to see that families which have been separated for many years might be brought together. I think it is only fair to put these remarks on the record, when one is talking about drawing conclusions, unwarranted conclusions, from what the Prime Minister said, conclusions that are intended to suggest that he has no regard for Canadians of Ukrainian origin in Canada.

Again, on June 1, 1971, there were remarks by the Prime Minister to the press following the question period:

> Q. Mr. Prime Minister, you have been criticized quite a bit in the last couple of days by Ukrainians in Canada regarding some statements you made over the weekend. Could you clarify that apparent comparison between FLQ terrorists and Ukrainian nationals?

We all know Mr. Trudeau. Everyone in Canada knows that he is a man of utmost frankness, who sometimes, to those of us who have been in politics a long time, is overly frank. That is his method, that is his technique; I think that is one of the reasons why people have such confidence in him. They know that he looks at all aspects of a problem, fearlessly. Mr. Trudeau replied:

> Well, I talked about it here in this room I believe, or at least at some interview I gave in front of microphones. I made it clear that I was not putting them on an equal footing and I also added that the countries were not the same, that we had a democracy here with forms of freedom of speech which I believe are unusual in the U.S.S.R. Therefore, there was no indication that they were on a parallel basis. The point I was making and which I made publicly, > and again in the House of Commons, was that I found it a bit difficult to intervene in another country's internal affairs and discuss the seeking of independence by any part of that country if I did not want that country in return to discuss those who in Canada are trying to break up the country. And this is the reason why I did not discuss it on this visit. But what I did say, both in the House of Commons and here, is that by establishing a good rapport—

And this is what I emphasize.

> —a good rapport, a good climate of confidence and exchange with the Soviet authorities, we would perhaps be in a better position to make representation on, not a legal or constitutional basis, but on a humanitarian basis about some individual cases which might be brought to our attention in the future.

I am sure that that language of the Prime Minister, expressed with great care, really sets out the true situation. It is easy to misinterpret remarks. I do not believe that if we want to meet a particular objective we should go out of our way, for one reason or another, to misinterpret.

Canada, I will repeat again, is a land made up of many peoples. Our unity depends upon the good relationship that prevails among these peoples. No prime minister of Canada would be worthy of his high office if he sought to set off one class against another. There is nothing in government policy or in the nature of the present Prime Minister that would cause him to lend himself to that.

I can assure honourable Senator Yuzyk, and he can pass this on, that we will make more progress about these separated families as a result of the Prime Minister's visit than by anything else that has happened thus far.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I should like to adjourn the debate, but I will be away next week with the Joint Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is nothing to prevent you from adjourning the debate. If other senators wish to participate in this debate in the meantime, I am sure some way can be found to enable them to do so.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin moved the second reading of Bill C-241, to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-241 is not a complicated piece of legislation. The intention of the bill is to propose the maintenance by the Crown of three residences, one for the Prime Minister, one for the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and one for the Speaker of the other house, all on a rent-free basis.

If this bill becomes law, it will be effective as of January 1, 1970, with the exception of the provision which deals with rent payable on the Prime Minister's residence. That provision will take effect only after the next general election. The figure of $5,000 per year currently being paid by the Prime Minister was inserted at the stipulation of the then Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent. No doubt many of you recall that. It was characteristic of that right honourable gentleman that he should have wished to pay for his family's board and lodging, and despite the fact that his cabinet colleagues, as well as the Leader of the Opposition, as we know from the record, felt otherwise, Mr. St. Laurent insisted upon that figure being inserted. That was the reason for the provision in the bill. However, the general view now is that the Prime Minister's residence ought to be rent-free.

The bill is an attempt to put into legislative form the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Salaries and Expenses. That report, commonly known as the Beaupré Report, states in paragraph 79, and I quote:

> The committee further recommends that neither the Prime Minister nor the Leader of the Opposition should be required to pay rent for publicly owned residences provided for their official use.

Existing legislations already provides for the maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence at 24 Sussex Drive, and the summer residence at Harrington Lake. As for the Leader of the Opposition, he currently occupies a property called Stornoway, located in Rockcliffe Park Village. The title of the property has been held in trust since 1950 by the Royal Trust Company. The trust was intended to provide, and I quote from the trust itself:

> A suitable residence for the use and occupation of the Leader of the Conservative party or the Liberal party, whichever shall be in Opposition.

Some people might regard that wording as a little inflexible. No rent is provided for Stornoway, and the trustees have in addition paid for the maintenance of the property, including property taxes, and have provided about 60 per cent of the furnishings.

I wish Senator O'Leary were in his place. I would acknowledge at once the great initiative he took in the establishment of Stornoway House. He was Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Stornoway. In 1969 he suggested to the Government that the property be transferred to the state at no cost and that it be maintained in the future by the Government as an official residence for the Leader of the Opposition. Senator O'Leary's reasoning, and I think it was compelling, was that the purchase of Stornoway was made possible by citizens representing all parties and residents in all the provinces who considered that the Leader of the Opposition, who is a key figure in our parliamentary structure, should be provided with a residence consistent with the dignity and importance of his office.

Stornoway was originally provided as a residence for the Honourable George Drew, when he was Leader of the Opposition. It was offered to the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent during his brief period as Leader of the Opposition. It has been occupied successively by the Right Honourable Lester Pearson and the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker and, at the present time, of course, by the Honourable Robert Stanfield.

Having borne the maintenance of Stornoway for some 20 years, the trustees concluded that the ownership and administration of the property ought properly to pass into the hands of the Crown and become a part of our parliamentary structure. The negotiations were completed for the transfer of Stornoway to Her Majesty in right of Canada. The negotiations were, of course, subject to the enactment by Parliament of legislation enabling the Government to maintain the property as a residence for the Leader of the Opposition.

The third residence in question is that known as "The Farm". That residence is occupied by the Speaker of the other house and is located in Kingsmere Park. It was the former residence of the late Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King. It is part of the property in the Gatineau Park area bequeathed to Canada by Mr. King as a public park in trust with the citizens of Canada. Parliament enacted the Kingsmere Park Act in May, 1951, to provide for the administration of this property in accordance with Mr. King's last testament. The 1951 act permitted the Governor in Council to set aside by order any part of Kingsmere Park for use as a country home for the Prime Minister.

For a number of years, it has been the custom to permit the Speaker of the other house to occupy the building and the associated grounds known as The Farm. This has been on a rent-free basis. The intent of Bill C-241 is to give statutory recognition to the custom of recent years.

In conclusion, I might say that in addition to providing for rent-free occupency of the three residences, the bill also stipulates that the benefits thereby received by the occupants shall be deemed as a living expense allowance. As such they will be exempt from income tax.

I commend this bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: May I be permitted to ask a question of the Government Leader before adjourning the debate? I believe I heard him say that this legislation would be retroactive to 1970, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Martin: With the exception of rent.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Belisle, debate adjourned.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

THIRD WORKING SESSION HELD AT OTTAWA—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Statement of Conclusions of the Third Working Session of the Constitutional Conference, held at Ottawa, 8th and 9th February, 1971, and tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 11th February, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, it is my understanding from Senator Martin and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) that there are no remaining senators who wish to speak in this debate, so perhaps the item could be removed from the order paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as there are no more speakers on this order is it agreed that the order shall be regarded as having been debated?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate this afternoon, may I ask for general agreement to have Order No. 4, dealing with Bill C-207, and Order No. 5, dealing with Bill C-241, placed at the top of our Order Paper for Tuesday next?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 8, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 8, 1971

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Harries, Watson, Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo), Crossman, Foster and Beaudoin have been substituted for those of Messrs. Osler, Roy (Timmins), Hogarth, Breau, Gibson and Laprise and also that the names of Messrs. Chappell, Downey and Cadieu have been substituted for those of Messrs. Crossman, McQuaid and Dinsdale on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of final communiqué issued following the meeting of the Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, held in Brussels, Belgium, May 2, 1971, together with copies of final communiqué issued following the conference of the NATO Nuclear Planning Group, held in Mittenwald, Germany, May 25 and 26, 1971.

Report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952.

Copies of Agenda for the Constitutional Conference, June 14-16, 1971.

NATO

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ OF MEETING OF DEFENCE PLANNING COMMITTEE AND FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ OF NUCLEAR PLANNING GROUP PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, would the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) deem it appropriate to have the final communiqués, which he has just tabled, printed in today's Hansard. Are they long?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, they are not long.

23351—69

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the documents referred to by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) be printed in Hansard of this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of communiqués see Appendix, pp. 1102-03.)

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (h), moved:

That the names of the honourable Senators Argue and Prowse be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable Senator McDonald leave to proceed with this motion now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the sponsor whether Senator Prowse and Senator Argue have agreed to sit on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes, they have. I am sure the honourable Leader of the Opposition realizes that the subject-matter of the motion proposed by Senator Argue and supported by Senator Prowse will be going to that committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, they opposed the motion in amendment.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I understand they would like to sit on this committee.

Motion agreed to.

HON. JOSEPH A. SULLIVAN

FELICITATIONS ON HONOURS CONFERRED BY LEARNED SOCIETIES

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like with leave to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that our colleague, Senator Sullivan, is in his seat today after an absence of a couple of weeks. May I be permitted to give the reason for his absence. Perhaps I should say "reasons", because he has been extremely busy in various places, passing on his great knowledge and experience to his colleagues in the medical profession, as he sometimes does to his colleagues in this chamber.

He has also been busy receiving honours from various medical associations and learned societies, and, of course, at the same time bringing honour to this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Specifically—I am not sure whether I will be able to pronounce all the names, because I have not consulted him—he was the honoured guest at the International Symposium on Otophysiology at the University of Michigan, the moderator of one of its sessions, and special dinner speaker; he was guest speaker in San Francisco at a meeting of the American Otolaryngological, Rhinological and Otological Society where he delivered a learned paper; he delivered another scientific paper at the annual meeting of the American Otalogical Society, of which he is a distinguished former president, and he took part in a medical seminar at the University of Southern California.

He appears to have come through this demanding schedule with his usual bounce and ebullience, a tribute to that unique physical constitution which enabled him to win similar honours in the field of international and Olympic athletics in his younger days.

We welcome him back and congratulate him on the great honours that have been bestowed upon him.

Hon. Paul Martin: I should like to joint in offering Senator Sullivan, on behalf of those on this side of the chamber, our warmest congratulations for this further confirmation of the contribution that he makes to medical science. The honours extended him by a number of universities and medical societies is an acknowledgement of his great capacity as a distinguished doctor.

It is a long way since the days when Senator Sullivan, with his grey cap, looked after the goal-tending duties of the Varsity Grads, Olympic hockey champions of 1928. Those of us who remember him in those days are not surprised at his achievements since his student days.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, as on previous occasions I am deeply appreciative of the very kind remarks of my colleagues, Senator Grosart, and of my school-day chum, now the Leader of the Government, Senator Martin. If I have brought any honour to this Senate or to medicine in Canada, I accept it humbly. I have been a great believer in the old principle that you only get out of anything what you put into it.

Science has no boundary; it is international. I came home from these meetings, as I have on previous occasions, extremely proud of my beloved Canada and what we do in this country in the particular field in which I am vitally interested. Again I thank all of you for the extreme kindness you have always shown me. I accept it not so much for myself as for Canada and this Senate.

Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to make a few brief comments following those my colleague and member of the Board of Governors of the University of Toronto, Senator Lang, made recently with regard to Senator Lamontagne. Having been a member of that board for 22 years, I had hoped that I might have had the privilege of making the remarks which Senator Lang so ably did and in which I concur completely. I believe wholeheartedly in his remarks pertaining to the University of Toronto.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I will be very brief in this because we are outgunned four to one. Whatever I say will be of no import. However, last night I was inspired to speak on Bill C-207 by reason of sitting next to Mr. N. R. Crump, the able Chairman of Canadian Pacific, who spoke at the annual meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He is a wonderful man and I tried to find out if he is a Tory. I do not think he can be, but he certainly does not appear to be a Liberal either; he is independent.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He is probably NDP.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is one thing I know he is not, even though Madame Senator Casgrain would be a very charming companion for anyone who would like to espouse the cause.

Mr. Crump in his wisdom said that Canada is the most over-governed country in the whole world. That is really so in view of the fact that we have 10 provincial and two territorial governments and one federal Government. There is not another country in the world with that amount of government. In addition, we have county councils, townships councils, boards of education, and so on. Canada is also one of the most expensively governed countries in the world. My suggestion is that there is no need whatever to appoint ministers of state. Nobody has indicated that there is a need, not even my learned friend the former Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). If anyone can make a cause smell like roses he can, but even he, with all his wisdom, did not attempt to show any necessity for the ministers of state.

In the Canadian Parliament there are 155 Liberal party members. Incredibly enough, there is a cabinet of 28, including the Prime Minister and minister without portfolio. There are 16 parliamentary secretaries; a Speaker and an Assistant Speaker; a Whip and an Assistant Whip; there are chairmen of 13 different committees. Of the 155 Liberal members, 61 have jobs, and only the committee chairmen and Assistant Whip are not paid extra. Senator Croll will appreciate that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is helping to solve the unemployment problem!

Hon. Mr. Walker: Unemployment at its worst, or at its best, whichever way you look at it.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I was wondering whether Senator Walker has comparable figures for the Ontario government.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I would be glad to get them for you. I think by comparison it would be an informative lesson in how to govern well with few members.

This bill will permit of a cabinet of 28, with a further 10 ministers of state if they want them. There can be any number of ministers of state; there is no limit to their number. I could not understand from the bill how many there might be, so I asked my friend the former Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly, who admits that there is no limit. The bill will permit of 56 parliamentary secretaries, 28 for each two-year period; two Assistant Speakers, one for each two-year period. With the chairmen of committees, and so on, there are 136 members of the Government party who under this bill could have a job in the four-year period. In other words, nearly everyone would have an extra job, 138 out of 155. You and I should be back there as backbenchers, Senator Croll. This is really something.

Let us compare Canada with England in this respect. I ask honourable senators to keep in mind that Canada has a federal Government, with ten provincial governments doing all the rest of the work, plus two territorial governments. In England, which has only one Parliament, with below that the county councils, but no provincial governments, what do we find? There are 20 members of the cabinet, including the Prime Minister, with 30 ministers not in the cabinet, for a population of 50 million. The ministers not in the cabinet are ministers of state, who cannot speak on policy and can answer questions only on the activities of their own departments. In addition, there are law officers and so on. England, with no provincial or other governments, but one overall government, has only 20 members of the cabinet and 30 ministers who are not in the cabinet.

Australia, which is not quite as large as Canada but is a very important country, has a commonsense government, of which they are justly proud. They have 12 ministers in the cabinet; 14 ministers not in the cabinet; that is, 26 ministers in all. Twenty-one ministers are from the house of 125 members, and 5 ministers are from the Senate of 60 members. One could go on.

The United States has a cabinet of 12 members, not chosen from the house or the Senate, but appointed by the President; and, of course, 50 state governments.

France has a cabinet of 19 members, out of the national assembly of 779 members, and no provincial and no state governments.

Germany has a cabinet of 16 members. They have a federal diet which is composed of 496 members, but there are also provincial governments.

Japan, which is forging ahead so quickly in our new post-war world, has a cabinet of 21 members, with a House of Representatives of 467 members, with no provincial governments.

Honourable senators, why does Canada need this great proliferation of ministers of state? We have been given no reasons. If there had been any reasons, Senator Connolly would have been able to expound on them, as he never misses any opportunity to say something in favour of the Government.

I am suggesting to you, and suggesting in the greatest sincerity, that this is just an effort to give every Liberal M.P. an extra job. It is an opportunity to build around the Prime Minister of our country a coterie of faithful people, who are bound to him, not only by the increased salary which they get as members of Parliament but also because they have become members of the Privy Council and ministers of state. Each minister of state is to be expected, of course, to go by Professor Parkinson's theory and must, in order to assert his importance, build around himself some deputies and secretaries, and so on. I would not mind, if there were any reason for that. Perhaps some speakers on the Government side are going to show the necessity for it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope that some on the Government side will speak.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Finally, I would make this one small reference. I was Minister of Public Works at a time when we were trying to overcome the recession which we had inherited in 1957. We used to work day and night. I was working 18 hours. I was given an extra job as Minister of Housing, then a third job as minister in charge of the National Capital Commission.

I went down to Arizona at Christmas for the usual two weeks of riding and I found I could not recover. I thought I would drop dead down there, I was so exhausted. At the ranch were two executives, one a vice president of General Electric and the other a vice president of General Motors. After the ride, they used to take me in for a drink. They showed me how to delegate, how to do the job and they gave me the rules for it.

The overall result was this, as the former Mayor of Montreal (Hon. Sarto Fournier) knows, for he was a great friend of mine, as we had a big job and used to work together—

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): It was most pleasant for me.

Hon. Mr. Walker: How I would like to renew those old days. They were very pleasant.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Home, sweet home.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Let me say that the secret of good administration is this—as Senator Martin found over the years, because he discharged his job with great acumen and skill as Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you suggesting he is not doing a great job now?

Hon. Mr. Walker: I wish he were back there again, for he was a help to Canada. This is the way that you do it. The deputy minister used to come in and say, "Mr. Minister, would you read this and this and this? It will take a couple of days. Then you can make up your mind whether we do this." The solution always was: do not read anything, if you can help it. Tell them to take away all the volumes of material and boil it down to a few major points. Then get in the deputy and those responsible for this particular matter and question them on it for half an hour. Then you can make up your mind, and save yourself a couple of days' work. That is just one of the ways to delegate your duties and get things done. There are many others.

One other way is to interview every delegation and, if you are going to refuse the delegation, never tell them at the time but shake hands with them and see them out the door. Tell them you will give it your careful attention. When the time for refusal comes, have the deputy write a letter pointing out that unfortunately what the deputation requested must be refused. You do not write the letter yourself. There are a hundred ways of delegating authority.

Honourable senators, I ask again, when we are under such criticism at the present time, why do we need the proliferation in government and proliferation of ministers? What are these people going to do at the present time? I had three portfolios and when the Americans got through with me, and after practising for many months, I was able to handle all three portfolios in two-thirds of the time I took for that original portfolio. This can be done.

We do not need more ministers; we need a school for ministers, to teach them how to be executives and how to be administrators. How can you expect a lawyer, bound down with detail all his life, to become a minister all of a sudden and have the wisdom of Solomon and show himself to be an able, adroit administrator—without any training? It cannot be done.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You did it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I did not do it initially, and I used to ask you how to do it, in some circumstances, and I used to ask many other people also. It can be done, but the minister must be trained. Perhaps the Leader of the Government himself can show us what it is a new minister needs to have.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He has the most experience.

Hon. Mr. Walker: There are other former ministers here—honourable Senator Hays, and my friend the former Postmaster General, Senator Denis, and Senator David Croll himself, and also the former Speaker, Senator Macnaughton. All these people might tell us why we need these new ministers of state.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Would it not have been better for you to have obtained the services of two other ministers, rather than to have ruined your health and put you out of the way?

Hon. Mr. Walker: That was the best thing about it, by having those three jobs my health got better every day, by the fact that I was able to handle those three ministries. Do you follow me?

We do not need these new ministers. There is no necessity for it, and, unless we can hear more in favour of it, we are going to oppose this. Everything slips by in this place, without any real contest. I tell you I am getting alarmed at what is going on at the present time. This bill is going to cost Canada a lot of extra money, with every one of these new ministers of state surrounding himself with his own department.

Honourable senators, I would ask you to give this your best thought, at least think about it, even if you eventually vote for it.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I have a question I should like to ask honourable Senator Walker.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not a question; a speech, I hope.

Hon. Mr. McElman: It is a question only. Senator Walker said that Canada is over-governed. Then he referred to other nations where there are no provincial governments, such as Japan and the United Kingdom. Does he support or suggest the proposition that there should be no provincial governments in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Not with a son-in-law as provincial treasurer of Ontario, I don't. At the moment, no.

Hon. Mr. McElman: May I ask a second question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean a supplementary question.

Hon. Mr. McElman: No, a second question. It is not supplementary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are just forgetting about the first question, is that it?

Hon. Mr. McElman: Well, I was not at all surprised by the answer to the first question, Senator Flynn.

If I may ask you a second question, Senator Walker: Are you aware of the progressive leadership that has been shown in the Province of New Brunswick in eliminating over-government through the taking on by the province of the full administration and cost of education, health, welfare, and justice and the elimination of the rural and municipal level of government?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, I am aware of that, and I must give you and your government credit. That is a good thing and a step in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Thank you, Senator Walker.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, if Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) wants to make a second speech, that is fine under our new rules, and I will be very pleased to listen to him. However, if no one else on the Government side wants to support the bill by speaking now, I should like to move the adjournment. I think Senator McElman has just indicated that he would have some interesting and pertinent remarks to make and I would hope that he would make a speech on this bill. If not, I will move the adjournment of the debate at this time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debated adjourned.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-241, to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the honourable Senator O'Leary speak now instead of the honourable Senator Belisle?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking on this bill, but having read the kindly remarks made about myself by the Leader of the Government when he introduced it I thought it only fair to say for the record that, while I did take a certain initiative in securing the happy result which is this bill, many others, including distinguished members of the party of the Government Leader, had a great deal to do with it.

I first had the idea of a residence for the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition when I spent an evening many years ago with Mr. St. Laurent, who was then the Minister of Justice and our representative at the United Nations. He was living in the old Roxborough Apartments, which have since been demolished. It occurred to me that this was hardly a fitting place for a man of his distinction who was contributing so much to Canada at that time. Later on, when Mr. George Drew became the Leader of the Opposition, he too was living in the Roxborough Apartments. I thought at the time that that was not a fitting place for the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition; that he could not there conduct the business or even the social activities imposed upon him by his office. So I determined that I would see what I could do to obtain a home for the Opposition Leader which would be consonant with the dignity of his position. This involved securing a fairly large sum of money in order to buy a home suitable for the purpose.

Of course, belonging to the poor man's party, I realized at once that I had to go to my Liberal friends to secure the funds necessary to purchase a home. Therefore, I repaired to Montreal to see an old friend—in fact, he had financed my campaign in Gaspé in 1925—Mr. J. W. McConnell, who has since died, God rest his soul. Mr. McConnell had gone over to the heresy of the Liberal Party. However, I appeared before him and told him what I was trying to do. He said to me immediately, "O'Leary, you are right. I believe in what you are doing. I will begin by contributing $10,000 to the fund, but I will do more than that. I will give you the names of ten other people and you will go to them and tell them what I have done. If they don't come across, you come back and tell me."

The first name of the list was another distinguished Liberal, Mr. Stanley McLean, who also has since passed away. He was an old party opponent of mine. We used to have fierce arguments on what I considered was the heresy of his party and he considered was the heresy of mine. But more than that he was a staunch north of Ireland Protestant. My friend Senator Walker, whose ancestors were at the gates of Derry, will understand that.

I went to Mr. McLean and told him what McConnell had said to me, and he replied, "O'Leary, I will tell you what I will do for you. I agree with you entirely. I will give you a luncheon at the York Club, and I will invite eight or ten tycoons." I use his word—he was one himself. Then he added, "After we have had a good lunch and brandy and cigars, I will call upon you to give them the same pitch you gave to me." That is what he did, and I remember that the late Senator Wally McCutcheon was one of those present. After I finished my talk I received immediately $35,000 which, in addition to the $10,000 I had received from Mr. McConnell, enabled me to purchase a residence for $40,000.

Incidentally, that residence was sold to us by a daughter of Sir George Perley. That was her contribution. That magnificent place in Rockcliffe, which I am sure would sell today for $150,000 or $170,000, she gave to us for $40,000.

In the intervening years I became chairman of the committee, on which there were Liberals. One of them was Mr. Duncan MacTavish, who was later a member of this house. Incidentally, I am looking at a member of the Senate who contributed very generously to this project. Perhaps he cursed himself afterwards for doing so, but that is what he did.

I must in all fairness say that 75 per cent of the money I collected personally over the years, amounting to $175,000, came from my Liberal friends. All of them agreed to this residence. It was a good thing for Canada. It is a magnificent home.

When Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister he used to go over to George Drew's for lunch after Mass on Sunday. I recall his telling me, "I would prefer this home to 24 Sussex Drive."

Honourable senators, when I hear young people today condemning the party system and decrying the work of Parliament, I remember that one of the men who gave me money was Mr. McConnell, and that when Mr. Pearson occupied the position he gave me $10,000. All of those men knew they were going to get nothing from me, for there was nothing I could give them.

To maintain a house the taxes on which were $2,000, and to buy a new this and that costing $7,000, $8,000 or $9,000, forced us to go on collecting money. I, as chairman of the committee for over 20 years, when I had contractors coming in to build this or that or to paint the house, never even considered whether they should be Liberals or Conservatives. In fact, on looking back now I have an idea that most of the contracts were given to Liberals, but that did not matter. This was a home for the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition; this was the glory of our parliamentary structure, and a testimony to the fact that not only do we permit criticism, but we pay people to criticize.

This is something I wanted to entrench and perpetuate, and that is what I did. A year ago, I realized that the law of diminishing returns applied in this situation. The McConnells and the others had died, and I was now appealing to younger people. But they did not see the thing in the same way. I told a Liberal friend of mine about this situation—I might add that despite my Toryism, or whatever you might want to call it, I have always maintained a civilized friendship with Liberals—and he said, "Well, O'Leary, this is nonsense; write me a statement of what has happened in respect of this building, and I think I can get it before the Prime Minister."

I wrote a 500-word statement, and I think the Prime Minister—although I said some rather severe things about him the other day—at once saw the wisdom and sense of this thing, and committed it with his benediction to the cabinet. I have no doubt my friend Senator Martin knows about this. Within three weeks after writing the statement I had word from the Department of Public Works and the National Capital Commission that they were taking over this building. I had offered it free of charge although it had cost us over $150,000.

As I say, the Government took it over on the initiative of the Prime Minister. It passed the cabinet, and I am sure my honourable friend, Senator Martin, gave it his full support, judging by what he said. And now we have before us statutory confirmation of the taking over of this building.

This is a great thing for Canada, and a wonderful testimony to the value of our parliamentary system. In describing this residence I said that it should be the home of the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition as designated by Parliament; I made no distinctions. Mr. Pearson occupied it. I remember offering it to Mr. St. Laurent. Whatever our disagreements may be, there is a Canadian affection, and a Canadian support for the system which we have. Every member of this house, whether Liberal or Conservative, will agree with me that the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition is a part of the parliamentary structure of this country. He is paid to criticize. I thank God that we have a system of that kind. That is why I spent 20 years of my life giving much of my attention to the maintenance of this property for this purpose. The Government is now to be highly commended for placing this measure before Parliament.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I had no idea that Senator O'Leary was going to speak tonight in the way he did. I think it would be most inappropriate if something were not said at this stage about him and about the contribution he has made to this project. I agree heartily with the proposal to take this property, which is generally known as Stornoway, and make it a Crown property available to the Leader of the Opposition. I think we are all truly inspired by what Senator O'Leary has said about the office of leadership of the Opposition in the House of Commons. That is the office of leadership of the first or second largest party in Parliament, depending on what the election results throw up. It is a permanent fixture in our parliamentary system and long may it remain so.

It was heartwarming to hear what Senator O'Leary said about the wisdom of the Government in taking the step proposed in this measure. However, that is not what I want to talk about primarily. I should like to acknowledge the devotion given this work over many, many years by Senator O'Leary. I remember hearing of it first of all from his very good friend, and mine, Senator Lambert. I heard it too from Duncan MacTavish long before he came to this house. I think one of the people interested in the original project was a former member of Parliament for this city, Frank Ahearn. I am not quite sure of that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are quite right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator O'Leary is probably the last of the original group of people who were responsible for this project. We cannot thank all of them, although we should have done so. However, it was done so quietly that there never was an opportunity for anyone to utter words of appreciation.

Now the story has been put on our record and I think, speaking for our side of the house, and, indeed, for both sides of both houses, we should go on record as expressing our gratitude for the work of Senator O'Leary, for the initiative he took and for the years he has devoted to the management of this project of which he has truly been the body and soul.

Honourable senators, not only is Parliament indebted but this country is greatly indebted to him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length, but I do want at this stage to thank Senator O'Leary for having put on the record the history of Stornoway. I should also remind the house that this bill concerns the official residences and it amends the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

It is about time that something was also done about the Prime Minister's residence. I know that Mr. St. Laurent, who was the first to occupy 24 Sussex Drive, decided that he would have to pay something for occupying that house. That was in accordance with his temperament and also with the circumstances of the time. However, it is now time that we did something about the Prime Minister's residence, and offer him every possible opportunity of being able to discharge his duties without imposing any burden upon him.

I object to the criticism from certain quarters that the Prime Minister may presently have some private means. That has nothing to do with the problem with which we are dealing. I am very happy that we are now doing something not only about the residence of the Leader of the Official Opposition but also that of the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If it were the wish of honourable senators that the bill be sent to a committee, I would have no objection. However, it seems to me that, with the explanations that have been given, this is not necessary. I therefore move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin moved the second reading of Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and An Act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to make some comments in proposing the adoption of Bill C-242. This matter has been the subject of discussion in and about Parliament for well over a year. It will be recalled that the Government appointed a Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses to look into the matter. The report of that non-parliamentary committee was completed on November 16, 1970.

The bill, therefore, has been put forward only after much consultation and careful investigation by this outside committee. The matter has also been considered by a committee in the other place.

The bill provides for an increase in the sessional allowances for members of the Senate and the House of Commons. It provides for an increase in the allowances of members of the Senate and the House of Commons for expenses incidental to the discharge of their duties as members. It widens the authority of the Senate and the House of Commons regarding actual moving, transportation, travelling and telecommunication expenses to be allowed during the course of a session.

It amends the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act and an act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate to provide for adjustments in the contributions and benefits under these acts.

By this bill the indemnity is increased to $18,000 for members of both houses. The expense allowance for members of the House of Commons is increased from $6,000 to $8,000 and that of senators from $3,000 to $4,000.

The bill amends the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act. These amendments, I would point out, do not provide for an increase in either the contributions of the pensions payable as a result of the proposed amendments to section 33 and 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

As the leader of the house in the other place pointed out, the amount of contribution which a member pays is a percentage of his sessional indemnity, as defined in paragraph (2) (1) (d) of the act. This being the case, there is no change in the level of contribution or the pension as a result of the increase provided in the bill; that is, the increase in the indemnity and in the allowances. Consequently, it is necessary to amend the sessional indemnity so that contributions will be made only on the net $18,000 for members of the other place and $15,000 for senators.

Another way of putting this particular necessary provision in the bill is to describe the amendment as one that maintains the present situation, the status quo, both as regards the amount of contribution and the maximum pension provided, so that a senator will continue to contribute on $15,000 only.

In order to meet that objective, it will be necessary to amend the definition of the sessional indemnity. This is done by an amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. As I have indicated, for the purpose of this particular amendment the basic amount in the case of members of the House of Commons is with regard to the figure of $18,000. It should be noted that a senator who comes under the 1965 act, which makes provision for the retirement of members of the Senate, has been contributing on $12,000 sessional indemnity alone.

The bill provides that a senator who comes under that act will continue to contribute and have his pension calculated on the basis of $12,000 instead of the new allowance of $18,000. There is no change in the rate of contribution proposed and, as I said a moment ago, there is no change in the amount of pension received by a member of either house.

Now, there has been much discussion with respect to this question, one which the Government has approached with care, having in mind the concept of the role of Parliament and the obligations of members who serve in both houses. In doing so it has taken into consideration the observations made in the non-parliamentary committee and those made from time to time by members of both houses. It has also taken into account statistics that have attended the remuneration of Canadians generally over the past eight years.

It must be noted that there have not been any increases in the sessional indemnity for almost eight years. On an annual basis, the increase is a little more than 6 per cent. Between 1963 and 1970 the average weekly salaries and wages for all wage earners and salaried employees in the industrial complex rose 52.2 per cent, as compared with 44 per cent for members of Parliament.

The salaries of economists rose between 45 and 50 per cent. The salaries of engineers 50 per cent. The salaries of university professors increased between 63 and 68 per cent. If the increases that are proposed in this bill had been taken on an annual basis, they would not be out of line with other comparable occupations. For instance, the average annual increase for managerial personnel between 1967 and 1969 has been between 7 and 9 per cent. Engineers and statisticians have experienced pay increases averaging 8.6 per cent and 7.1 per cent in 1969 and 1970. Many public servants in the upper brackets receive higher salaries as, of course, do many executives in industry. Members of the Canadian Parliament are paid much less than senators and members of the House of Representatives in the United States. I think it is noteworthy that the salaries of senators and members of the House of Representatives in the United States are considerably higher than those provided in this bill.

Honourable senators, the Government considers, in the light of all circumstances, that the provisions of this bill deserve the support of this chamber. I commend this bill to honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that the honourable Senator Lawson has indicated that he wishes to speak.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few brief comments on the proposed legislation. I recognize the delicacy involved in such a matter but, having spent a goodly number of years negotiating contracts and wage increases for many walks of life in many parts of the country, having been on record long before I was appointed to this chamber in support of adjustments for elected and appointed officials of our Government, I think I am entitled to make a few comments.

I am somewhat concerned with the criticism flowing so easily from the press. Some of it concerns the inflationary aspect, but I wonder whether when the press directs comment regarding inflationary aspects the rule of clean hands should not apply?

I took the precaution of checking what the newspapers have done in the same period, from 1963. I think it is fair to say that newspaper owners are not generally regarded as being overly generous with their money in paying their employees. In 1963 they gave an increase of 3.7 per cent; in 1964, 3.6 per cent; in 1965, 3.4 per cent; in 1966, 3.3 per cent; in 1967, 9 per cent; in 1968, 7 per cent; in 1969, 9.1 per cent, and so on. Therefore, in the same period in which they describe this as being inflationary, the total increase given to newspaper employees was approximately 58 per cent. I do not consider it to have been too high an increase to their employees during the course of that time. It was a fair one. However, surely if they are to describe the increase that is proposed for elected and appointed legislators as being inflationary, the rule of clean hands should apply.

In 1963 when the newspapers gave their employees an increase of 3.7 per cent, or in 1969 when they gave them an increase of 9.1 per cent, had they also editorialized that similar increases be paid to members and senators, I would have had a better regard for their credibility and right to criticize at this time. Members of Parliament are certainly not overpaid. They earn every nickel they are paid. And coming from British Columbia and being aware of the vastness of Canada and the miles to be travelled, I say it is sheer nonsense to suggest that members make money on their expense accounts. Then, of course, those who come here from British Columbia, have the additional expense of buying winter clothes.

It always troubles me that when increases are proposed, emotions become involved and the issues are lost sight of. I was pleased that the Beaupré Committee took particular note that it was a constitutional responsibility for members of Parliament to serve their constituents at a cost which, they being elected representatives, should be reimbursed.

The question of retroactivity was raised. I know of no contract in my experience negotiated for truck drivers and other classifications that did not contain a condition that the terms of the contract were retroactive to its first day. There is ample precedent for the same situation to apply to increases for elected and appointed legislators. I see no validity in the suggestion that the increase is retroactive to 1963 and that former members of both houses will be paid. That criticism has no validity unless it were suggested that the retroactivity would apply to those persons who have left both chambers. The application of retroactive pay to the beginning of the session is proper, and this principle is practised throughout labour-management negotiations in all parts of the country.

The judiciary are not affected by this bill, but I was on record some years ago regarding this question. The Canadian people, who have the benefit of an excellent judicial system, take this for granted. We demand the highest standard, and yet we seem to ignore our responsibility to see that in return the members of the judiciary are properly reimbursed. Despite a heavy workload and poor working conditions as far as court houses are concerned, our judges give a high standard of service.

There appears to be some sensitivity about this legislation as it affects senators. I must confess I do not share in this. I have not been here long enough, I think, to be described by those who criticize us as a fixed part of the establishment, but I have been here long enough to be objective. What I was told I was going to see and what I have observed myself are two entirely different things. I see a Government Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Martin) carrying a tremendous workload, and I have known places where wildcat strikes have been called because of far less tough conditions. We have a Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) who takes his duties very seriously and discharges them very well.

I look around me and see many honourable senators displaying the kind of competence that in private life would earn for them many many times in excess of what they are paid. They give of their time, and make this contribution freely. There is no need for any delicacy or apology for the contribution being made by this chamber. I have observed the committees, which may not be as flamboyant or so covered by television as those of other governments, but the type of work done by these committees, the calibre of questioning and the quality of reports need not be apologized for by any member of this chamber to anyone anywhere.

I am concerned that there is not more provision for an annual review for elected and appointed officials, whether it is tied to senior civil servants or some level of top management. Surely, other than the people themselves, is there a higher level of management than in either chamber? It seems to me that for members of the other place, for senators and the other appointed officials, such as judges, there should be some system of annual review and automatic adjustments.

In my capacity as a negotiator, in the same period that we are talking about here, I have seen negotiated in various industries increases from a low of about 65 per cent to a high of about 95 per cent. I think the action being taken under this bill is long overdue. The Canadian people rely on the Government to look after elected and appointed officials. I think it took courage on the part of the Government to make such a recommendation at this time, and they are to be congratulated for doing what is right. I support the legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, difficult though it may be, when supporting the bill, to add to what has been said by the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Martin) and the honourable Senator Lawson, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

IRAN

SECOND CONGRESS OF IRAN NOVIN PARTY HELD AT TEHRAN AND TWENTY-FIVE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF PERSIAN EMPIRE

Leave having been given to revert to Inquiries:

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to his recent visit to Iran as an observer from the Parliament of Canada at the Second Congress of the Iran Novin Party, held at Tehran, Iran, 5th to 10th May, 1971, and also to the establishment of a Canadian Committee under the chairmanship of the Speaker of the Senate to assist in the celebration of the Twenty-five hundredth Anniversary of the Persian Empire.

He said: Honourable senators, some time in March I received a warm invitation from the Secretary-General of the Iran Novin Party to attend as a Canadian observer the Second Congress of the Iran Novin Party, to be held in Tehran between May 5 and 10. The invitation was accompanied by a letter from the Chargé d'Affaires of the Imperial Embassy of Iran in Ottawa, and one from the Middle East Section of our Department of External Affairs urging me to accept the invitation. It was with very little knowledge of the country or the people whom I was to visit that I accepted the invitation, and arranged to be accompanied by my wife.

As I prepared for the journey, I wanted to know more about the exact location of Iran in relation to its neighbours, and what its geographic assets and liabilities were. I wanted to know who were its people, how they had been governed, where the Iran Novin Party came from, and whether it was a legitimate instrument of democracy with which we should associate ourselves. I found out that Iran is a big country, about one and a half times larger than Ontario. I also learned that its friendly relationships with Afghanistan and Pakistan on its east boundary and with Turkey in the northwest were clouded by territorial disputes with Iraq on its west, and by somewhat delicate relationships with Russia, with whom Iran shares the shoreline of the Caspian Sea, to the north.

The people of Iran, 28 million in number, are of the Aryan race who migrated south and west from the steppes of Russia about 3,000 years ago. They are classified as Indo-Europeans and still speak the ancient Farsi tongue. There are a number of minority groups, including some Arabs in the south, some Jewish and Turkish people in the north, and some Armenians and others, but the vast majority of the people have been known throughout the western world as Persians.

We found the people and their history most interesting. From everything we read before we left Canada we had gathered the impression that, although for the past few years things had been changing, the people were terribly poor and illiterate, and the country was wracked by wars and skirmishes between the nomad tribes and anyone who might try to establish a central authority. We knew that, while there had been a long period of greatness 2,500 years ago in the days of Cyrus, Darius and Xerxes, and during some periods since, the Persian people had lived under a succession of conquerors from Alexander the Great to the Romans, the Arabs, the Mongols, the Turks, and finally the Russians, the French and the English. We thought that after this kind of history we would find the people dejected, discouraged, decimated by disease and malnutrition, and incapable of profiting from what now appeared to be a favourable turn of events. We found our impressions to be all wrong.

After a period of turmoil between the end of the Second World War and 1953, His Imperial Majesty the Shahanshah Aryamehr returned from exile. In 1961 he developed a plan for what he called the "White Revolution"—"White" rather than "Red"—for bringing Iranians together instead of fragmenting them through class warfare. The 12 points of the White Revolution cover a broad range of social, economic and political advances, including an aggressive drive toward democracy. The people were invited to form political parties, the only requirement being that they adopt the philosophy and principles of the White Revolution. The Tudeh or Communist Party of the left was outlawed, as was the Landowners' Party of the right. The Shah began to pursue his most persistently-held theme—that by the end of his reign his successors would be the people of Iran.

Of the two existing political parties, the Iran Novin Party—meaning the New Iran Party—is the largest, and so far the most successful. It has taken seriously the obligation placed upon all parties by the Shah to educate the people in the way of democracy, and to act as a vehicle for the involvement of the people in the decision-making processes of government. While this was the Second Congress of the party, it was the first one of such massive proportions, comprising 4,000 delegates from every part of Iran, and more fully representative than the conventions of Canadian parties. It included delegates from smaller community cells of the party and from major social groupings such as farmers and labourers.

The congress continued for five days, discussing the major issues affecting the people of the country and the structures and development of the party. It received a message from His Imperial Majesty and heard an excellent policy speech by the Prime Minister, Mr. Amir Abbas Hoveyda.

The address by Dr. Kalali, Secretary-General of the party, was particularly interesting to me, because it called upon the membership of the party to act as a vehicle for the development of political understanding among the people and their participation in the decision-making processes of government. I commented to Dr. Kalali that his speech was very much like the speech I made to the Liberal party of Canada in November, 1970. It was interesting to note that we were both calling upon our people for the same kind of interest and participation in political affairs. He was doing so because the citizens of his country had had no experience with democracy, and must learn about their responsibilities in such a system. On the other hand, my concern is that the citizens of Canada have had such a long experience with democracy that they have become apathetic and have come to believe that democracy will be with them always, regardless of their acceptance of the responsibilities of democratic citizenship.

The foreign observers, who included representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, Italy, the United Arab Republic, Turkey, Yugoslavia, India, and many others, each had the opportunity of addressing the Congress to make their comments and convey their countries' greetings. I had the pleasure of doing so on behalf of Canada, and I must say that both my wife and I were surprised and gratified at the warmth with which the greetings from Canada were received. No other country received a more resounding welcome, and I began to realize the tremendous extent to which the relationship and the common interests of Canada and Iran have developed over the past few years.

The Government in Iran is based upon a constitution adopted in 1906; it provides for a "Majlis" or House of Commons approximately the same size as our own. It also provides for a Senate. There are 60 senators, 30 of whom are appointed by the Shah and 30 of whom are elected. The qualifications for being appointed to the Senate or being a candidate for the Senate are very high. One must be over 40 years of age and must have been a prime minister, minister or deputy minister, or must have held a full professorship in a university for at least fifteen years. The Government Leader in the Senate is Mohammad-Ali Safari, an outstanding representative of the Iranian people.

The executive power lies with the Shah, who appoints the prime minister on the consent of both houses. The members of the cabinet may not be members of either house but are responsible to both houses.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Stanbury a question? He says that the members of the cabinet are not members of either house, but they are responsible to the two houses. What does he mean exactly by that? When we say that the Government here is responsible to the House of Commons, we mean by that that the House of Commons can determine the tenure of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: As I understand it, the situation there is that they are so described in the constitution as being responsible to the two houses, and they may be called before the houses for an explanation of their policies.

We had the opportunity to meet and talk extensively with all of the senior members of the government. My wife was presented to Her Imperial Majesty Farah Pahlavi, Empress of Iran, and I was given the great honour of being presented to His Imperial Majesty Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, the Shahanshah of Iran. I was able to present to His Imperial Majesty the personal greetings of our Prime Minister, who has received the unusual courtesy of a warm reply from His Imperial Majesty.

The Shah spoke to us for nearly three-quarters of an hour about his hopes and aspirations for the people of Iran. He invited questions and comments, and received them from many of the foreign observers. One could not help but be impressed with his beautiful command of both English and French, his gentility, his ability, and his sincerity. He appreciates that what he is trying to do is to develop a revolution from the top, and he is most concerned as to whether he and his colleagues in government and in the political parties can persuade the people of the desirability and, indeed, the necessity for democratic reforms. He is unrelenting in his pressure upon the leaders of the government and the political parties to work with the people and educate them in the ways of democracy in such a way as to assure the success of his objective of concluding his reign with the advent of a completely democratic political system.

The Prime Minister entertained the foreign observers at his residence for lunch. He talked about the evening when he and the Shah entertained Prime Minister Trudeau of Canada and his party as they were returning from the Commonwealth Conference in Singapore. They were delighted with the personal contact, and were intrigued by the fact that it was in the following week that the Prime Minister was married. The Shah remarked to me that Mr. Trudeau did not tell them about his impending marriage. I replied that he did not tell us either. The Prime Minister of Iran, Mr. Hoveyda, claims to be the first prime minister to be married in office. He feels that he and Mr. Trudeau should form a club of confirmed bachelors who have seen the light.

The Prime Minister was most gracious to us. He drew to my attention the help that Canada is giving Iran in developing the forests in the foothills of the Elburz mountains bordering the Caspian Sea; the credit of $100 million that Canada has given Iran to assist in developing a sophisticated communications network; the common faith Iran and Canada place in the United Nations to solve the problems of conflict in the Middle East; the pleasure which Iran has taken in the strong position Canada has assumed with respect to oil pollution in the Arctic and on its coasts; and the general affinity which has begun to develop between Canada and Iran. Both countries are large in proportion to population. Both countries have substantial natural resources, and lie in close proximity to strong neighbours who have need of those resources. Both countries have the strongest possible interest and desire for the preservation of peace, and the extension of commercial and social intercourse throughout the world.

At a luncheon given by Senator Safari, the Government Leader in the Senate, I had a most interesting discussion with Professor Sadiq, the founder of the University of Tehran and of a number of other colleges and universities in Iran. He is probably the greatest authority on the history of Iran, having written some 26 books on the subject.

He told us that the new Iran began under Shah Reza Pahlavi, the father of the present Shah, of whom Senator Sadiq was a collaborator. He said that Shah Reza Pahlavi was not highly educated, but he was progressive and a good judge of men. He was proud to say that the present Shah has all the qualities of his father, plus the advantage of an excellent education.

I asked him why Iran was known as Persia to the rest of the world. He said that Persia was the name of the province where Persepolis, the ancient capital of the Persian empire, is situated. The outside world got into the habit of referring to the whole country as Persia, but in the Farsi tongue the country has always been Iran—land of the Aryans. He said that the history of the western world is in error in a number of matters. Alexander the Great did not order the destruction of Persepolis. He ordered it to be preserved, but his soldiers sacked it. He said that Persian artifacts indicate nothing of Persians ever going across the Bosporus into Greece, and historians have proved that Herodotus' story about the rape of Athens by Xerxes could not have happened. Our conversation with Professor Sadiq was another of the fascinating experiences of our visit to Iran.

I should not leave the subject of the Senate luncheon without saying that it was held in the beautiful Senate building in Tehran. While I love and revere this place, I must say that I was impressed by the beautiful decor and facilities of the Senate building in Tehran.

On another day the majority leader in the Majlis entertained us at the Parliament Buildings. Beautiful new facilities are being constructed because of the expansion of size of the Majlis, but the old Parliament Building is a joy to behold. The feature of it is the Hall of Mirrors, which is almost blinding in its brilliance. The legend is that the ruling Shah at the time of its construction ordered mirrors to match those at Versailles, but when they arrived they were broken. He then caused the pieces to be arranged in intricate patterns which developed an Iranian style which has been carried on through the years, and can now be seen in palaces and other public buildings. At the luncheon I sat with the President of the National Insurance Corporation, and learned a great deal about the way in which the capital assets of the corporation have been used to build hotels and develop other tourist and national development projects in the country.

Of the eight days we were in Iran, three were spent in travelling the country. In Isfahan we stayed at the Shah Abbas Hotel, one of the facilities built by the National Insurance Corporation. I think it must be the most beautiful hotel in the world. In its lobbies, dining rooms and bars are displayed all of the artistic culture of the people of Isfahan—paintings, filigree, tilework, carpets, the designs of the honeycombs of the mosques, and on and on. The gardens are also magnificent.

In Isfahan we saw the Blue Mosque, the Palace of Forty Columns, the bazaar, the Friday Mosque, the ancient bridges—all very exciting for a person who had never before visited the Middle East.

In Shiraz we found ourselves among a deluge of roses. The rose originated in Shiraz, but we were told that until about ten years ago roses had become almost extinct there. Now the road from the airport to the city has a boulevard seven miles long of solid roses. The monuments to the great poets, Saadi and Hafiz, and the famous Garden of Paradise are probably the most beautiful things of their kind anywhere in the world.

At the ruins of Persepolis, some 30 miles from Shiraz, we found ourselves at the birthplace of a civilization. This was the ancient capital of Cyrus the Great, of Darius, of Xerxes, of Artixerxes. Here were their palaces, their tombs, the ruins of their city of over two million people, the carvings, and the lofty columns topped by elaborate capitals. And all these relics of antiquity were surrounded by signs of preparation for the great celebrations of the twenty-five hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Persian Empire by Cyrus the Great—a modern hotel, a tent city, a stadium, vast parking lots and beautiful highways. Persepolis was another tremendous thrill.

Back in Tehran we were advised that arrangements had been made for us to be taken to Abadan and Kargh Island the following day. Abadan is about a three-hour flight from Tehran on the Shatt-al-Arab, the major river flowing into the north end of the Persian Gulf. It is the major oil city of the world. But perhaps the most intriguing part of that trip was the visit to Kargh Island which is about an hour's flight out into the Persian Gulf. It is a piece of sand and coral on which has been built the greatest oil distribution centre of the world. It is fed by four submarine pipelines bringing heavy and light crude from the various oil fields on shore. It has storage for 14 million barrels of oil. That capacity will be increased to 20 million barrels over the next three years by the addition of six more 1,000,000-barrel tanks, the largest oil storage tanks in the world. From the loading jetty ten 250,000-ton tankers can be loaded at once through a computerized loading system. On the other side of the island they are building a sea island jetty which will handle the 500,000-ton tankers which have not yet been built. And with the 100-degree heat came the warmth of hospitality by the managers of the national oil companies, with a marvellous dinner and a swim in the Persian Gulf.

I suspect that everything I have said so far has indicated my enthusiasm for modern Iran and the attention it has paid to the preservation of its traditions and its relics of antiquity. Neither I nor the Iranians themselves would want to suggest that things are anywhere near perfect. It is the progress that is impressive. Only a few years ago there was illiteracy to the extent of 75 or 80 per cent of the population. Now it has been reduced to about 50 per cent through a program of sending high school graduates with some teaching training out into the villages to teach. The per capita income is only $300, but it is only a few years since it was $150. The army is ever present, but it is only a few years since the country was torn by tribal strife and fanatic factions. I noted, too, that the soldiers are neat, polite and appear to be regarded hospitably by the people. External relations are not entirely smooth, but it is only a few years since others had control of all their external relationships.

All of this gives the people of Iran cause for celebration, and in October of this year they will celebrate the twenty-five hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Persian Empire. The preparations in Iran are impressive. Everywhere there are signs of projects, large and small, under way. It reminded me of our own hectic preparations for our centennial in 1967. Excellent roads are being built, tourist facilities are being constructed, museums are being prepared, and some 5,000 schools are being built. The whole country is a sea of activity.

But one of the most interesting aspects of their preparations is the way in which they are involving foreign governments and peoples in their celebrations. Many of you will remember the impressive pavilion built by Iran at Expo '67. That pavilion has continued to grace Man and His World, and has been completely refurnished for this year. Iran has asked Canada to form a committee to help to draw the attention of Canadians to the celebrations in Iran and to involve them in those celebrations. The committee has been formed under the chairmanship of His Honour the Speaker of the Senate, and it has as its members an impressive list of outstanding Canadians. The committee is obtaining the co-operation of museums and educational institutions across Canada, Canadian radio, television, newspapers and magazines, as well as our theatres, to focus our minds on Iran and to give us the opportunity of learning a little about the pride and the progress of the people of Iran.

Honourable senators, Iran is a country worth watching. I believe it is unique in its progress toward democratic government, and in its attitudes toward economic and social reform. Its approach to trade and foreign relations are things from which we could learn a great deal.

His Imperial Majesty the Shah, the Government of Iran, and the people of Iran have shown a great warmth toward Canada, and have identified a great breadth of common interest which is shared by the two countries. I am personally most grateful to them for the kindness and hospitality and openness they showed to my wife and me.

I sincerely hope that Canadians will respond to the work of His Honour the Speaker's committee, and will take an early opportunity to visit Iran so that mutual friendships will have the chance to grow and prosper.

[Hon. Mr. Stanbury.]

AIR CANADA

MOTION TO REFER ANNUAL REPORT TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 2, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, when Senator Cameron made the motion to refer the annual report of Air Canada to our National Finance Committee I thought he made an excellent speech. It was well documented. The arguments were convincingly presented. I am simply amazed at the experience he has had. If Marco Polo could have been with us last Wednesday to hear that Senator Cameron had travelled 184,000 miles in 18 months he would have been green with envy.

I cannot add much from my own experience, but I can say that I flew from Croydon to Le Bourget on the 17th day of June, 1929, so I beat the Senator Cameron there by four years. I mention that because my wife and I just missed crashing in the Channel. About ten days previously I had arranged to fly on the 9 o'clock flight to Le Bourget, but the day before the flight for some reason or other we decided to change to the 11 o'clock flight. We went to Croydon and got on what was a converted Handley-Page biplane bomber, which carried 10 or 12 people. We took off, and just after getting over the Channel the airplane started to bank, and on looking down we could see the wing of another airplane in the water. It was the 9 o'clock flight. One thing we had forgotten to do was notify my mother, thinking that she would not come to the airport to meet us. In fact, she did and, of course, she had a worrying time for a couple of hours until we arrived. She thought that we had landed in the drink. The Paris papers next day said that seven people were drowned.

I want to move now from that time to March 9 of this year. It was one of those awful days with snow and driving wind. I thought I would take the 3 o'clock CNR train to Ottawa from Montreal, but it turned out that in the course of the morning an engine had gone off the tracks and no trains were moving. I was fortunate enough to get a seat on the daily Air Canada service at 3.55 p.m. I got a taxi and somehow managed to reach the airport, arriving there when the flight had already been called. I was amazed that they were going to fly at all that day. There was nobody on the roads; I have never seen anything like it. Here I think we must give a great deal of credit to the Department of Transport and to all our pilots. How one could attempt to fly in that type of weather, I do not know.

However, as I said, when I got to the airport the flight had been called, so I went down to Gate No. 3 and found that the place was pretty well crowded. I found a seat, although there were many people standing, and sat down beside the little desk at the entrance. There were two girls there and another official, and they gave me a boarding card, and since I had a first-class ticket they also gave me my seat number and marked it on my boarding card. After about ten minutes a crowd of people came in, many of them carrying large musical instruments, and with them was a man whom I later learned to be a representative of the CNR. He started talking with the officials, and I could not help overhearing some of what was said. This went on until a little after 4 o'clock, although our flight was supposed to leave at 3.55. Then a supervisor came down and he also got into the act. At 4.30 he went on the loud speaker and said, "Flight 459 is cancelled. If anybody has a reservation or a boarding pass, it does not mean anything because the flight is cancelled." And he ordered the baggage to be taken off the plane.

This is the daily flight which comes to Ottawa, and then goes on to Toronto. I should also mention that there was no way of leaving the airport, in my judgment, other than by this plane. The supervisor then announced that the next flight would leave at 5.35. A man in the background asked, "Won't that be all booked up?" to which the supervisor replied, "Yes, probably." Then another man asked about his connection at Toronto, but the supervisor did not say anything to that.

Honourable senators, here we are with a common carrier that turfs everybody off its ordinary every-day flight, and flies the Montreal Symphony Orchestra to Ottawa. It is one of the most amazing things that I have ever experienced. The Montreal Symphony Orchestra had been promised a special train to take them to Ottawa, but the train could not run because the tracks were blocked. I learned this from the CNR official who was looking after the group. They were then promised a special flight but the equipment was not obtainable, and the orchestra had an engagement to play here in the National Arts Centre that evening. This is the sort of thing I would expect to happen in a banana republic, but I cannot understand how such a thing can be justified here. But, I was there, and that is what happened.

I have been looking at the report of Air Canada, and I must agree with Senator Cameron that it is extremely well prepared and gives a tremendous amount of information. I also have here the annual report of the CPR which covers CP Air. I have always understood that Air Canada was given a monopoly on all the lucrative routes in Canada, together with the trans-Atlantic route. How CP Air can manage to make a couple of million dollars while the national airline loses $1 million is hard to understand. If by any chance the roles were reversed you can just imagine what kind of financial results you would get.

In that report there is something which I think would be very interesting to have explained. They have paid on the purchase of aircraft an amount, which they describe as "progress payments", of $126 million. What they have paid out for those aircraft amounts to 126 years' losses. They have also capitalized the interest on that amount, which was $5,200,000. I am not saying that that should not be done; I am not saying they may not have to buy this equipment and put up the money for it, but these are enormous amounts of money, and it seems to me it would be a very good thing if our National Finance Committee were to go over these figures with officials of Air Canada, and give them a detailed study. Therefore, I support Senator Cameron's motion to refer the annual report of Air Canada to the National Finance Committee, and to suggest that other honourable senators do likewise.

On motion of Honourable Mr. McDonald, debate adjourned.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL

CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the house has concurred in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ OF MEETING OF DEFENCE PLANNING COMMITTEE HELD IN BRUSSELS, BELGIUM, MAY 28, 1971

The Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization met in Ministerial Session on Friday, 28th May, 1971, for its regular Spring meeting.

2. Ministers discussed the implications for Alliance Defence Policy of the current situation and in particular the latest developments in the East-West dialogue. They noted in this context the recent Soviet reaction to the long standing and repeated allied initiative on mutual and balanced force reductions, which will be the subject of consideration by the North Atlantic Council in Lisbon next week.

3. Ministers reaffirmed that NATO's approach to security will continue to be based on the twin concepts of defence and détente as stated in the 1967 report on the future tasks of the Alliance. They re-stated the vital role of a strong capability for the collective defence of the treaty area as a fundamental basis for a confident and successful policy of negotiation for the reinforcement of peace and security. They also confirmed again the principle that the overall military capability of NATO should not be reduced except as part of a pattern of mutual force reductions, balanced in scope and timing.

4. Ministers welcomed the substantial and concrete progress reported in the development and implementation of the European Defence Improvement Program, which a number of European countries announced in December 1970. They noted that, with the help of the infrastructure element of this Program, NATO would now be able to provide an integrated communications system (including space satellite elements) for the mid-1970s, and to execute a greatly-expanded program of measures to protect their aircraft in case of attack on their bases; and that the European countries concerned had taken steps to secure the earliest possible start on this work. Ministers also welcomed the measures taken to implement the extensive national force improvements and intra-alliance aid which constituted further elements of the European Defence Improvement Program. They also took note, with great satisfaction, of the reaffirmation by the United States Secretary of Defense of President Nixon's commitment of last December to the effect that, given a similar approach by the other allies, the United States would maintain and improve its own forces in Europe and would not reduce them except in the context of reciprocal East-West action.

5. In reviewing progress in following up the report on Alliance Defence Problems for the 1970s (AD 70 Study), Ministers noted that a starting point had already been established, in that certain measures to improve the defence posture of NATO countries were already in hand; some of these were specifically mentioned by Ministers during their meeting. Ministers agreed on the need for countries to begin implementation of further improvements in accordance with the report before them. A comprehensive report, which would also address further recommendations for specific measures and the question of relative priorities, was called for by Ministers for their meeting next December.

6. Ministers noted the continuing increase in real terms in the allocation of resources to military and military-related programs by the Soviet Union and other Warsaw Pact countries. In light of this increased capability, Ministers agreed therefore that in order to continue providing modern and sufficient nuclear and conventional forces and to improve the situation in the important areas highlighted in the AD 70 Study, some overall increase in defence outlays was needed. In the light of these considerations, and in keeping with the agreed Conclusions and Recommendations of the AD 70 Report, Ministers provided the NATO Military Authorities with the guidance necessary to enable them to prepare proposals for the size and structure of NATO forces for the planning period 1973-1978.

7. Against the background of the continuing growth of the Soviet military presence in the Mediterranean, Ministers gave special consideration to a report on steps to improve the Alliance's defence posture in that area. They noted that a number of measures to this end had already been taken, particularly for surveillance, while others were in hand or under consideration; and that countries were working both on an individual and on a co-operative basis as well as with the NATO Military Authorities to produce the most effective and co-ordinated results. Ministers asked for a further report on the progress made to be submitted to them at their next meeting. In the same context they noted that the Defence Planning Committee in Permanent Session had approved a political directive for unscheduled activities of the Naval On-Call Force for the Mediterranean as an additional mode of activity to regular planned activities for that force, for which authority has existed for some time.

8. Ministers also noted the continuing build-up of Soviet forces in the North-East Atlantic and the need for further planning for external reinforcements and other measures to improve the situation on the Northern flank.

9. Ministers approved a report recommending ways to streamline and generally improve the NATO procedures for collective defence planning. The main aims were to adapt these procedures to conform still more closely to, and thus to provide effective co-ordination with, national systems and timetables; while at the same time keeping them sufficiently flexible to respond to changing circumstances.

10. Finally, Ministers reviewed the status of various on-going Alliance defence planning studies.

11. The next Ministerial Meeting of the Defence Planning Committee will take place in Brussels in December 1971.

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ OF MEETING OF NUCLEAR PLANNING GROUP HELD IN MITTENWALD, GERMANY, MAY 25 AND 26, 1971

The NATO Nuclear Planning Group composed of Ministers of Defence of eight NATO countries adjourned today after a two-day conference in Mittenwald, Germany. This was the ninth of the regular half-yearly meetings of the Group. Ministers attending the meeting were Mr. Donald S. Macdonald, Canada; Mr. Helmut Schmidt, Germany; Mr. Loukas Patras (Minister of State), Greece; Mr. Mario Tenassi, Italy; Mr. Willem den Toom, the Netherlands; Mr. Alv Jakob Fostervoll, Norway; Lord Carrington, United Kingdom; and Mr. Melvin R. Laird, United States. The meeting was chaired by Mr. Manlio Brosio, Secretary General of NATO.

Ministers reviewed the balance of strategic forces and exchanged views on the implications for NATO of recent trends and developments.

Ministers also confirmed that the NATO military plans were in conformity with the policy guidance which the NATO Defence Planning Committee had approved in December 1970.

Ministers discussed a number of studies dealing with the tactical use of nuclear weapons in defence of the Treaty area in support of the strategy of flexibility in response. These studies form part of an on-going work program designed to extend over several meetings. Consideration of these studies and others to be completed in the future is expected to assist in the development of further policy recommendations and thereby to enhance NATO's deterrent and defensive nuclear posture.

Ministers accepted the invitation extended by the Belgian Government to hold their next meeting in Belgium in the autumn of 1971.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 9, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

BIOGRAPHIES OF SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, some time ago there were questions raised about the time limit for corrections to biographies which appear every year in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide. I have looked into this matter and I want to put on record that any corrections or new biographies should be forwarded before December 15 to the following address:

Canadian Parliamentary Guide,
P.O. Box 3453, Station "C",
Ottawa, Ontario.

I have arranged with the Clerk of the Senate that a reminder will be sent to all honourable senators at the beginning of December each year. By so doing we should be able to avoid the inconveniences that some honourable senators have been put to in the past with respect to changes they should like to have seen made to their biographies.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1970, pursuant to section 85(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

REFERRAL TO SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Government Leader if it is the Government's intention to refer the Report of the Auditor General to a standing committee of the Senate?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not think I have tabled the report. Of course, it is open to my dear friend Senator Flynn, or to any honourable senator, to move that such a report be referred to committee. I, on behalf of the Government, would have no objection.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Paul Martin moved the third reading of Bill C-241, to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Bill C-207 is an agglomeration of completely unrelated topics, the like of which Parliament has not been exposed to since the notorious omnibus bill which a couple of years ago amended a large number of the provisions of the Criminal Code. In my view it is an obvious attempt on the part of the Government to force Parliament to accept legislative enactments which, if they were introduced separately, might be more easily defeated.

We are being asked to approve in one and the same bill the establishment of a Department of the Environment, the creation of ministries of state, an increase in the number of parliamentary secretaries, a new status for the Postmaster General, new retirement regulations for public servants, and special privileges for deputy heads of departments.

I cannot complain with respect to the explanation given by the sponsor of the bill, Senator John J. Connolly, who did an excellent job, regarding which I will have a little more to say later. Perhaps the Government sees some sort of invisible thread magically sewing these disparate subjects together. If so, it has more imagination than it has common sense, or, for that matter, respect for Parliament. This whole legislative mess is an obvious ploy designed to surround one highly unacceptable piece of legislation with a plethora of less important matters in order to draw attention away from a detestable exercise in how to further enhance party solidarity by making all of the Indians chiefs.

Granted, this Government is in dire need of reorganization. This very bill is just one more piece of evidence in support of that contention. However, this is most definitely not the proper way to proceed. History nowhere records that a chaotic approach to restoring order where disorder reigned ever proved successful. The most loathesome facet of such a legislative monstrosity as the one we are presently debating is that by throwing everything into the same hopper and forcing us to vote for or against the package, the Government makes it impossible for a senator to indicate which parts of the bill he approves and which he would repudiate if they stood alone, or separately.

The ill-concealed and singular purpose of this devious piece of legislation is to increase the number of members of the House of Commons holding down government jobs and collecting government salaries. The Government, after a seven hour debate on the validity of each, would be entitled to create as many new ministries of state as it saw fit.

At this point, and parenthetically, I should point out that clause 18(2) of this bill provides that the debate on the subject of whether the establishment of a new ministry of state is justified will be held only in the House of Commons.

Why is the upper house of Parliament not to be consulted on whether new branches of government are necessary? The creation of new ministries does not involve only the expenditure of money or a question of confidence in the Government. It involves a matter far more serious—in effect, the creation of new departments of government and the inherent danger of over-government. I consider it an affront to this chamber that its role as protector of the welfare and privacy of every Canadian should have been so arrogantly cast aside and ignored.

I return to the proposed creation of these new ministries of state for specified purposes. It is interesting to note that they will be responsible for policy formulation and development in their own esoteric sphere. This represents a serious departure from tradition, since policy formulation has always been a crown prerogative. Such an innovation is to be viewed with alarm. Furthermore, clause 23 provides that other ministers of state in any number may be appointed, and

> (a) may be assigned by the Governor in Council to assist any minister or ministers having responsibilities for any department or other portion of the public service of Canada in the carrying out of those responsibilities; and
> (b) shall exercise or perform such of the powers, duties or functions of any minister or ministers having responsibilities for any department or other portion of the public service of Canada as may be assigned or transferred to him pursuant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

The approval of the house is not required in such a case, and I suggest that clause 23 will enable the Government to do what is provided in clause 14, but then dispense itself from the provisions of clause 18 requiring approval of the other place when the Government wants to establish a minister of state for specified purposes. The only difference will be that in the latter case the minister appointed under clause 23 will receive only $7,500 in salary, if the practice is to continue to vote the salary of ministers without portfolio through the Estimates, instead of $15,000 which is the salary provided in this bill for new ministers of state by an amendment to the Salaries Act.

Parkinson's law is quite obviously at work here in the Government. For instance, the minister without portfolio in charge of Information Canada needs more people to run his department than Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Pearson needed to discharge their responsibilities as Prime Minister. I have noted that ministers without portfolio, or what this bill calls "other ministers of state," are paid only an extra $7,500 a year, while ministers of state for specified purposes will be paid $15,000 a year. This is the salary provided for the ministers listed in the Salaries Act.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Or with portfolio.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Or with portfolio, but the ministers of state for specified purposes are practically the equivalent, in a way, of the ministers with portfolio, as we now know them. I can hardly understand that the ministers of state for specified purposes are placed—because their responsibilities will vary infinitely—on the same level as full-fledged ministers named in the Salaries Act. At the same time, it is difficult to swallow that a minister of state, appointed under clause 23 and having the same responsibilities as a minister of state for specified purposes, would receive only 50 per cent of the salary paid to his colleague who has no more responsibilities than he has.

I agree with the idea of junior ministers, but what is proposed in this bill is a mixture of senior and junior ministers, and no rule is provided for identifying who is a junior minister and who is a senior minister, who is a full-fledged minister and who is a minister with only limited functions.

There are already 29 ministers in office. Now we can look forward to many more, and to many more parliamentary secretaries, since there can be appointed, under the provisions of this bill, as many parliamentary secretaries as there are listed ministers in the Salaries Act, that is, 29. Also, we can doubtlessly look forward to an increase in ministerial staffs.

In addition, the Government selects the Deputy Speaker of the House, the Deputy Chairman of the Whole House, and the chairmen of the standing house committees. Although the last chairmen are not paid, they have a title that would justify an extra stipend, and I am convinced that they will eventually be given one.

No limit is placed on the length of time a minister of state for a specified purpose can function. We all know what that means. Nor is this bill clear as to whether these ministers of state will be super-ministers or very junior ministers, as I have said. If they are to be super-ministers, should not some sort of consultative procedure be set up among the ministers? If this is not done, then surely we can look forward to time-consuming, confusion-yielding internecine warfare in the Government.

It is interesting that we should be discussing the idea of increasing the size of government, so soon after the publication of the latest of the Auditor General's reports.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would the honourable senator permit me to point out that I did table the report. I was not sure. I did table it yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, and everybody read about it in the press, and it is not a secret any longer. This report, as I have said, once again points out clearly, with its examples of waste and irregularities in the administration of government, the evils of the giantism with which the Government is presently afflicted. If this Government had any sense at all, it would be striving to shrink its size. It is bloated; any further increase in its size could well blow the whole thing to kingdom come. Now that I think of it, that is not such a bad idea.

Section 20, to which I referred before, provides for the appointment of a secretary to be chief executive officer of a minister of state. His role apparently will be the same as that of a deputy minister. Where once we had only a deputy minister, we now stand to have an under-secretary and a secretary doing the same thing as a deputy minister.

Section 22 states that the minister of state will report annually to the house. How will we be able to judge his performance, not having any act to provide the criteria of judgment?

This Government is growing like Topsy. The whole Government side of the Commons is in line for a promotion of some sort. That should put the lid on any further palace revolt. Or is the Government misjudging its disaffected backbenchers?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: While this bill would provide more jobs for the members of the other place who support the Government in the other place, there are no provisions in it concerning the members of the Senate who sit opposite. Since the Leader of the Government is now a full-fledged minister, as provided for in the Salaries Act, I believe that under section 25 he could normally obtain the services of a parliamentary secretary. He could certainly use one, and the appointee would not be kept idle. Quite obviously not. However, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act provides that the appointment can be made only from the House of Commons, which is rather sad. But it is slightly amusing to imagine the Leader of the Government in the Senate having a parliamentary secretary in the House of Commons.

With regard to Part VI of the bill, all I can say is that we would much prefer to have a crown corporation set up to deal with postal services in Canada. All the present provisions do is to create jobs for another minister and Secretary of State, if not for an associate minister.

To summarize, honourable senators, I should like to point out that the value of Parliament in a majority situation depends almost entirely upon the objectivity and independence of government-party backbenchers. That so many of them are, by means of this bill, made servants of the Government, or potential candidates for a government position, seriously jeopardizes the effect and influence of Parliament in the administration of this country.

The bill, to my mind, is perverse and wrong-headed. I am not at all surprised that only the sponsor has spoken up to this time for the Government side in this house; no one else appears to have the stomach for it.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

As a matter of fact, it seemed to me that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) spoke with praiseworthy lack of enthusiasm. The Government Leader surely did nothing to silence the Government supporters on this bill. He never does, does he?

Unnecessary as it is, I shall close, honourable senators, by saying that we in the Official Opposition do not appreciate this exercise in statism. We are profoundly worried by this proliferation of government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I ask the sponsor of the bill, who is about to speak now for the second time, if it is his intention to close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is my intention, if it is agreed to by the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if honourable Senator Connolly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I will not detain the house for more than a few moments, but I should like to comment on three aspects of this bill that are rather important both to this house and to the Canadian people.

In the first place I submit that the principle of embodying all of this reorganization in one omnibus bill is an unsound principle. It would be much better and more in the public interest when the Government feels it necessary to establish a new ministry or to make any fundamental change in the administrative structure of government, for such changes to be submitted to Parliament and to this house as separate pieces of legislation so that each can be considered on its merits rather than as part of an omnibus bill. In my view this type of legislation is bad legislation, and a policy that dictates this kind of legislation is bad policy.

In the second place I would suggest that, having regard to the excessive growth of all levels of government in recent years, particularly the national Government, there is need for a meaningful restructuring of the whole governmental administrative machinery. When governments grow rapidly and without any close co-ordination between the numerous departments that emerge, we easily lose the proper inter-relationships that should exist between departments of government.

I appreciate that it is too late for any action to be taken on this now, because the Government has decided on this form of reorganization. But I would submit for future consideration that a more meaningful step in the interest of good administration would be a complete restructuring of the whole administrative machinery of government with the idea of building an administrative structure in which the inter-relationships between the different departments and the responsibilities of the different departments would receive much greater consideration than they do today. Within the present governmental administrative structure many branches have little or no idea of what other branches are doing or what their policy or objective is supposed to be. When you get this kind of situation you do not get co-ordinated efforts; you do not get clear understanding within each division of what the overall policy and objective of government is. Therefore, you do not get efficient administration.

My third and final observation is that this legislation is predicated on the concept that most things that need to be done in this country can best be done by the public sector alone. There is no provision for any meaningful procedures for involving the private sector in the attainment of government objectives, whether those objectives be social, economic, fiscal, monetary or any other field you care to name. I submit that this is an area to which the Government would be well advised to give some serious attention. Personally, I completely disagree with the concept that governments are better able to do most things than any other segment of our society.

In this country today the Government does not utilize the vast resources of the private sector. I am not talking about the physical resources but the experience and know-how of the hundreds of knowledgeable men in professional and business positions across Canada, whose contribution to the attainment of government objectives could be invaluable if only we had some techniques within the machinery of government to tap that experience and expertise and use it to the public benefit.

I regret that this legislation which purports to do some considerable restructuring of the Government contains nothing to indicate any intention or even interest on the part of the Government to utilize the experience and knowledge and resources of the private sector to supplement those of government in the attainment of goals and objectives which the Government may determine.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I realize that at this stage one should be brief, and that realization is brought home more forcibly by the admirable speeches that have just been given by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) and honourable Senator Manning. I cannot say that I entirely share all the views which Senator Manning has just expressed, but I do share some of them. I reserve my right to discuss the matter more fully on third reading, having had the opportunity of hearing the explanations we shall receive from the minister in committee. Meanwhile I think it is right to say that I have certain grave doubts about this bill. I recognize that I have no official experience as an administrator, and that is why I simply say that I have grave doubts which are founded on some knowledge of the past political and constitutional history of this country.

The first thing I find dubious about this bill is the one referred to many times here and in the other place, that is that it is an omnibus bill, presenting under one comprehensive canopy a great number of provisions dealing with many different subjects. Of course, it can always be said that they refer to the organization of the Government of Canada, but if you want to draw your net wide enough you will find that practically everything we discuss here is related in one way or another to the organization of the Government of Canada. You can refer to a tremendous variety of subjects in any bill of this kind if you want to define the term "organization of the Government of Canada" in a wide enough fashion. But it seems to me that we have here a great diversity of subjects. Were it not for that fact, the proposals contained in this bill, if they had been separated and put in a number of different bills, might have been before us and some of them might have got through the other place much faster than has been the case with this bill. I think it is another instance where the longest way round is the shortest way home. It seems to me that that was a tactical mistake, to say the least. I think it makes it exceedingly difficult for members of either house to give a verdict on particular proposals when they have such a mass of diverse matters before them.

There are certain things in this bill which I think nearly everybody will support, notably the establishment of the Department of the Environment. I was talking the other day to somebody who, I think, is pretty knowledgeable in this field, and he told me that he had reason to believe that on certain matters connected with the environment there were 17 branches of various departments of government dealing with substantially the same investigations into this subject, and all of them conducting their proceedings in blissful ignorance of each other's activities. My memory may be at fault in saying 17, but I know it was a large number, and this gentleman was in a position to know. I think if we can get those all under one tent and at least have each one informed about what the others are doing, we shall have made some considerable progress. In general, I think that part of this bill which deals with the Department of the Environment is admirable and, indeed, perhaps, overdue.

But when I come to consider some of the other things contained in this bill, I am much more doubtful. As I read Senator O'Leary's speech, it seemed to me that it contained a variety of calculations of the numbers involved in this bill, but no matter how you calculate the numbers it is obvious that this bill will result in a much larger cabinet than we have now.

There are several honourable gentlemen here on both sides of the house who have sat in cabinet, and they are far better placed than I am to judge whether an increase in the size of the cabinet is likely to increase its efficiency. But from such study as I have made of the political and constitutional history of this country, I doubt very much whether a cabinet of possibly 34 or 35 ministers is likely to be more efficient than the present cabinet which, if all the portfolios were filled would certainly be the largest we have had in our history.

I am a supporter of this Government, and I make no apology for it, but I must confess that I am not persuaded that the large size of the present cabinet enhances the efficiency of government. And I am far less persuaded—and here I speak subject to correction by those who know better—that adding half a dozen ministers, which could easily happen here even after you have allowed for the subtraction of two ministers without portfolio, or rather their translation to a higher sphere, is going to enhance the efficiency of the Government of Canada. It seems to me that with a cabinet of that size, the process of decision-making is more likely to resemble the processes of a deliberative assembly than those of a decision-making body.

Those are the chief comments I should like to make, but I have one minor observation which concerns a peculiarity of certain terms used in the bill. Hitherto, if I am not mistaken, the English word "department" has been translated "ministère", but now I find that we are setting up here something which after the English fashion we call "ministries of state" and lo and behold they appear in French as "départements". I should be extremely interested to know why it is that we are playing ducks and drakes and jiggery-pikery with the two official languages. It makes my head swim. If a "département" is a ministry, and a department is a "ministère", can we not tidy this thing up in some way? The difficulties of translation are already formidable and I cannot help wondering why on earth we have shifted to the English of England habit of calling a ministry what we call a department, and then of course being forced to produce another French translation for it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is merely to add confusion to an already confusing situation.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: It seems to me to be so, Senator Flynn. I speak subject to correction by my olders and betters or even by my youngers and betters. Nevertheless, I do have certain doubts about certain aspects of this bill which I sincerely hope will be dissipated by the explanations given in committee. I am not a member of that committee but I think I have the right to attend and listen attentively to what goes on. As I say, I earnestly hope that my doubts will be dissipated but I am not absolutely certain I shall find myself completely converted to everything contained in this bill.

I am a little puzzled, I might add by way of postscript, by some of the provisions for pensions and so forth for retiring deputy heads of departments or superfluous deputy heads of departments. I can see that there may be something to be said for tempering the wind to the shorn lamb, but I am not altogether clear about what is involved. I noticed as I read Senator Connolly's (Ottawa West) speech on moving second reading that he was not clear as to the effect of those parts of this bill, if I understood him correctly, and that he felt that the information he had to present to the house at that time on this part of the bill was less than complete.

I am sorry to have detained the house for this length of time, but I really felt that I must put myself on record as expressing certain qualms, certain uneasiness and certain doubts which I entertain about the contents of this bill in the respects I mentioned.

[Hon. Mr. Forsey.]

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I think we are down to the stage, as my predecessor has stated, of short speeches. I want to go on record as saying that I also have very grave reservations about this bill. I do so on counts that have all been mentioned by previous speakers, but I still think they are valid counts. My first one is the omnibus nature of the bill. In the matter of government reorganization one can quite well expect to have a wide variety, but I submit that the variety in this case is a little wider than would seem to be desirable and, in fact, even understandable.

When looking at Part IV of the bill, which deals with Ministries and Ministers of State, my eyes slid up one paragraph and I read, "to operate and administer any astronomical observatories..." It seemed to me that this shows we are mixing a very wide variety of subjects.

The second ground on which I have some reservation is this: My colleague Senator Flynn pointed out that the bill provides that the debate on the subject of whether the establishment of a new ministry of state is justified will be held only in the House of Commons and will not be a matter for Parliament as a whole. This leaves me somewhat puzzled. I do not know whether this is right or wrong, but it strikes me as being odd.

My third reason for not being completely in accord with the bill is the proliferation of jobs that is once more evident in Government. Enough has been said on this subject in this chamber and in this debate. We all know why we are concerned. Government in Canada is enormous. I am quite sure that the situation is more widespread and deeper than in almost any other country. We have an enormous cabinet compared to that of many larger countries, and we are now adding to that level of government. Sometimes when businesses are in difficulty, particularly those that are not well run, they engage another man and allot certain duties to him.

All this legislation does is to bring in Parkinson's law immediately. It makes communication more difficult. It imposes another layer between the operator and the administrator. In most cases it does not aid in rapid and effective administration, but slows it down and confuses it.

Honourable senators, for these three reasons I am not in full support of the bill.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: We have had this afternoon a very good and rewarding discussion on the bill, even though from the point of view of the sponsor of the bill there has been a rather negative approach to the legislation.

I do not propose to make a lengthy reply. But I wish to say that from now on I should probably adopt the attitude of omniscience when explaining a bill. It was twice called to my attention that I did not appear to be in favour of certain aspects of the proposed superannuation provisions. The fact of the matter is that I did not understand them. That is my fault, and not the fault of the able official who supplied me the information. Both Senator Isnor and Senator John M. Macdonald raised a question about that. It is a very technical point on which I think it would be more desirable to have an explanation from the official in committee than for me to take the time of the chamber.

It has been suggested that perhaps I was less than enthusiastic in my explanation of the bill. Rightly or wrongly I have come to the conclusion that the prime objective of the sponsor of a bill is to inform his colleagues to the best of his ability of the contents of the bill. I do not think that the question of advocacy enters into or should enter into his consideration or treatment of the bill to any great extent. The first problem is to try to clarify the provisions of a measure regardless of how complicated the bill may be. In any event, I view that as my duty as sponsor of the bill and I have tried to discharge it in the best way I can.

Quite frankly, there are parts of the bill which, if I were a member of the Government, I would prefer to discuss further before I gave my approval, such as the omnibus character of the bill, and the question of using a device used so often in a legislature, that of a state law amendment act which is, in fact. an omnibus bill. This is a practice which has been used in provincial legislatures for many years. When I was a member of the cabinet and chairman of the legislative committee, I suggested using this device for certain legislation. However, it was thought at the time that it was not a useful device to be used in Parliament, particularly in a federal Parliament.

Well, it has been used here. Primarily it was intended not to mislead or distract, but to save parliamentary time. Considering the history of the bill in the other place, it is obvious that it did anything but save parliamentary time. In fact, it extended discussion which might have been a good deal shorter had the measures been introduced piecemeal. Perhaps it can be regarded as an experience for the Government to have seen what happens to omnibus bills, and it may be a course of action that will be corrected in future.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is that not the third or fourth type of omnibus bill we have been faced with? They have had the same experience in the other place, have they not?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think we have had one in this Parliament. I think that omnibus bills in this house and in the Parliament of Canada generally have been few and far between. We may have had a few, but I think that governments have learned, as a result of experience, the form in which they should present legislation to both houses.

One of the major points of criticism both here and in the other place has been the suggestion that there is in this measure too great an opportunity for proliferation of ministers. Senator O'Leary said, in addition, that it was an incursion upon the independence of private members of the House of Commons by attaching more and more private members, who might conceivably be more independent of the Government, to the cabinet or to members of the cabinet. Finally, there was a suggestion that cabinets in this country are now becoming too large. I would be less than frank if I did not say there is sound argument in favour of two-tier ministers—those of the Privy Council and those who are of the ministry but not of the Privy Council. If I had been in the Government—and this view is shared by many of my colleagues in the Senate—I would have argued that perhaps two tiers of ministers is something that might be considered. However. I say that it would be a new concept for this country. Perhaps it will come.

In the meantime, all these ministers, whether they be ministers attached to ministries of state or attached to ministers with portfolio, which are the only two categories proposed, will be of the privy council, of the cabinet. Then as ministers they are thoroughly familiar with government policies, government thinking and with the direction in which the Government is endeavouring to proceed. This is an asset for a person with the responsibility to discharge policy for a government.

I think we all agree that it is highly desirable, for example, that the Leader of the Government in this house or, as we describe him, the Leader in the Senate, should be a member of the Government. He gives better direction to this house because he is a member of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would suggest clearer direction rather than better direction.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps if it is clearer it is better.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the Leader of the Government, as have all previous Leaders of the Government of this house, has given very clear direction. I used to be very concerned, for example, in Senator Aseltine's day and when he was leader here, about the fact that he was not a member of the Government. I think there were times when he felt that it would have been more helpful to him and his work, and more helpful to the Senate, had he been a member of the Cabinet. There were reasons why that was not possible, but generally speaking I think the case illustrates the point that I make.

I have said that there is a case to be made for two tiers of ministers. That structure exists in the United Kingdom, where they have only 17 members in the cabinet. However, they have ministers to the number of 27 who are not of the cabinet. In addition to the 17 in the cabinet and the 27 who are not, there are some 32 junior ministers. In that category there are three classes: Under Secretaries of State, to the number of 22; Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, to the number of 5; Assistant Whips to the number of 3, and Parliamentary Secretaries to the number of two.

These are all considered to be posts equivalent to that of minister. However, they are not all of the Privy Council, nor of the cabinet. We do not have that system in this country. Perhaps some day we shall have to come to it. Perhaps we shall have to do so because physically there will not be enough room in the cabinet chamber to accommodate all members of the Privy Council who are of the cabinet. We may be able to discuss this more appropriately in committee.

Senator Flynn raised the question with respect to the resolution for the appointment of ministers of state to be attached to ministries of state being approved by the House of Commons only. I really do not consider this to be a major point and I rather doubt that he does. Houses of Parliament do take certain unilateral action rather than action by Parliament as a whole. We did it in this chamber as a result of legislation in connection with divorce. We were given by Parliament power to grant divorces, without resort to the House of Commons, by resolution of this house. Quite properly, also, in the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act a few years ago, legislation which is peculiarly an act of interest to the House of Commons, the changes in the boundaries were to be approved or disapproved, as the case may be, by resolution of that house alone.

There exists a very close connection between the appointment of a minister and of a ministry of state to the problems of supply. Therefore, particularly in the light of the new rules of the House of Commons for the granting of supply, it would be quite appropriate that the House of Commons should alone have the right to approve an order in council and ultimately a proclamation for the establishment of the ministry of state and the appointment of a minister of state to preside over it. However, as to the proliferation of ministries, I think much depends upon the sense of responsibility of the Government. Some of these ministers of state, those who are attached to a minister with portfolio, as Senator Flynn describes them, can be appointed without number as can ministers without portfolio. They will be paid at the same rate, $7,500 per year. They are really the equivalent of ministers without portfolio. There is no limit to the number that any government can appoint at any time.

The question of patronage is bound to arise in connection with a bill to add new ministries. Nevertheless, in view of the complex character of problems in this country, its very geographical size and the pressure of work, the importance of policy cannot be over-emphasized. Whether it is necessary always to have a minister to deal with a certain area of the public administration in this country, rather than have it done, as in Senator Walker's day, by loading a minister with several areas of responsibility, is a question of judgment. Had it contributed to the impairment of Senator Walker's health, I think it would have been a very bad thing to have overloaded the minister. He would have been and was, indeed, a very effective minister in the Government of this country. It probably would have been welcomed by him when he was Minister of Public Works to find that he had a colleague from the House of Commons who would be responsible, for instance, for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, over which Senator Walker had to preside. As he said himself, it wore him down and made him tired. Of course, I suppose, he felt that he was not operating with the greatest of efficiency when he was so tired. This happens in government; I think fatigue is one of the serious problems faced by any minister in government today.

Senator Flynn, in referring to ministers of state who are to deal with certain areas of policy, said that the matter of policy is a crown prerogative. Of course, that is a very sound statement. I would make the point that these ministers of state, whether they are attached to a minister with portfolio or to a ministry of state, will all be of the Privy Council. They are all to be bound, therefore, by the rule of cabinet solidarity. The crown prerogative in matters of policy is now and will continue to be the responsibility of the Government. The Government itself will stand or fall upon whether or not the policy is approved.

Senator Manning made a point that all of us who are accustomed to the historical treatment of the problem of setting up departments will support. It is that heretofore the establishment of a new department has been done by special act of Parliament. Traditionally that has been the case. Now it can be done by order in council, in certain cases approved by resolution of the other place. We should remind ourselves, however, that under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act it is possible to do almost everything that is proposed in this bill. In other words, there is authority on the statute books of Canada today for a government, by rearranging certain areas of the public service, virtually to set up another ministry. What is being done here makes that section of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act an honest type of provision, because it is now in the open, though it can be done under that other act.

I submit that the problem Senator Manning raises about the co-ordination of the administration of various departments will always be with us. I would imagine it was a problem for him when he was Premier of Alberta. It is an increasingly more difficult one in a federal Government, where the ramification of problems is so great, and where the numbers of people involved are so much greater than in a province. I think governments will at all times have to be concerned with greater co-ordination in their administration. One does not have to look at the most recent report of the Auditor General to know that there is, and always will be, considerable overlapping and waste of time, money, energy and talent in a structure as big as the public service of this country. I have heard it said by people who have had long experience in government that the main responsibility of government, after policy, is co-ordinating the administration so that waste, extravagance and wrong-doing will be eliminated as far as possible.

Senator Manning also said that there is no plan in this legislation for involvement of the private sector. I agree with the reasons he gives for saying how important the private sector is in this country. A country such as this, which in certain areas, perhaps most areas, is only two or three generations from the frontier, certainly has to rely, in my view at least, on the efforts of the private sector to have a buoyant, dynamic and progressive economy. The GNP does not grow because of governments. In my view, the GNP of this or any other free country grows because there are enterprising businessmen in the private sector who will put their hide on the fence and take investment risks in order to see greater productive capacity develop within the economy.

I think we in this house should take every opportunity we can to stress the importance to the economy and to the social fabric of the country of the value of the work done in the private sector. This country is too young, too vast, and has too few people to be ready for the socialistic, paternalistic state that is to be found in so many over-crowded countries, particularly in the developed parts of the world, and especially in Europe. Governments there perhaps have not any other direction to go. It seems to me that the horizons of this country are clearly defined, and we should encourage the private initiative, private enterprise and ingenuity of our people to take advantage of the opportunities that lie here. This is not embodied in this bill, nor expressed in it, but surely it is an underlying proposition for the existence of all governments that they should proceed upon this principle. We must constantly draw it to their attention, and it was useful to have Senator Manning do so.

There are many other things I might have said. I was pleased to hear the speeches of Senators Molson and Forsey, and I may have touched, at least in a general way, upon the points they raised.

Perhaps honourable senators will allow me one other observation. In introducing the bill I suggested that it might go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. After discussing the matter with my colleagues who are affected, on both sides of the house, I think on reflection that at this stage of the session I would prefer the bill to go to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. If that meets with the approval of the Senate, if the bill receives second reading, I would propose so to move.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honorable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I might inform honourable senators that the intention is for the committee to meet tomorrow morning. In the absence of the chairman, I personally will see to it that the minister in charge, the President of the Treasury Board, and the appropriate officials will be in attendance. I cannot say at what time the meeting will be held. That will depend upon progress on the Order Paper this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps I could say this for the benefit of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), who perhaps has not had a chance to acquaint himself with more recent developments, having been fully engaged for the last hour or so. An effort has been made for the committee to meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow in the expectancy that it might be possible to consider a bill we are about to discuss.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I thank the Leader of the Government for telling me that. This bill can be considered and the minister will be available at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. The committee may meet at 10 o'clock, depending upon what develops out of the Order Paper this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Martin for the second reading of Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and An Act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Bill C-242 will serve to raise our senatorial emolument from $12,000 in indemnity and $3,000 in expenses to $18,000 and $4,000 respectively. We in the official Opposition approve of this adjustment, and intend to support the bill.

I am especially pleased with the fact that an equivalence in stipend between the Senate and the House of Commons has been maintained, and that the same proportion has been kept with regard to the amount granted for a senator's expenses—that is to say, they are half of what is allowed a member of the other place for the same purpose. I believe that this was obtained as a result of the representations of the Government Leader in the Senate, and he deserves our congratulations for his wisdom and fortitude.

The contribution which the Senate makes to the proper government of this country is as important and praiseworthy as it is maligned and misunderstood. For senators to have been offered less for their services than what is to be given members of the House of Commons would have constituted a serious affront to the dignity of this chamber. I repeat that I am very pleased that the Government has seen that it was essential to the prestige and usefulness of the Senate not to downgrade it, and again I thank the Government Leader for seeing to it that this did not happen.

The increase in indemnities is not at all excessive. It represents, when one considers that we have not had an increase since 1963, something in the order of 6 per cent per annum, which compares with the increases that have since that time been granted people in various other walks of life.

By no means is the size of the raise envisioned in this piece of legislation reprehensible. When one considers that 7,689 employees of federal departments, agencies and corporations earn more than parliamentarians, then quite obviously there exists a situation which needs rectifying.

The work of a member of the House of Commons or the Senate is of sufficient import to the welfare of the people of Canada, and the burden of responsibility which he carries is of sufficient magnitude that he should not be remunerated on the scale of every junior executive in the public service or private enterprise. This Government and those which preceded it can be faulted for not increasing the compensations paid to members of Parliament on a more regular basis. Had increases been forthcoming in a more regular way, they would not have been so large, and the chances are that they would not have attracted quite so much attention. They would not have provided our objective, perspicacious and consummately fair political pundits with quite the ammunition this increase has provided.

The criticisms I have read in the press have been entirely unconvincing. It was obvious that these critics had very little knowledge of the way Parliament operates. As to the objections raised in the other place by some small groups, they were clearly dictated by political opportunism. On the other hand, it is indeed unfortunate that some agreement could not have been reached, or some method found, whereby the need for Parliament to approve salary increases to its members would be eliminated, and I hasten to add that this is in no way the fault of the administration.

I know some people in the Government favoured such a scheme, and I am sorry to see that it did not get anywhere in the other place. I suppose it is futile for us to go through this exercise once more. The problems attendant upon our finding the perfectly acceptable formula for pleasing everyone involved, including the editorialist and the taxpayer, are countless.

The Government appears not to have given much consideration to that part of the report of the Beaupré Committee suggesting a raise in parliamentary pay, while throwing out tax-free grants in favour of accountable expense allowances. I have never been in favour of entirely accountable expense allowances, because it seems to me impossible to impose on everyone the same norms as to what will or will not be considered a valid expense. Each politician has his own particular way of running his affairs and should not be forced into a mould. Furthermore, the policing of these expenses would be very difficult and costly and they would give rise to more problems than they would solve.

I have some sympathy with the assertion, as it now stands, that the member representing a geographically small riding, or one close to Ottawa, is in a favoured position, and that perhaps what others use up in expenses he can pocket as extra salary.

As has been mentioned by the Leader of the Government, this bill does nothing with regard to pensions. For senators appointed before 1965 pensions consequently remain at two-thirds of the present stipend, and their widows stand to receive one-third which means only $2,667. This figure hardly compares with the amount which the widows of public servants stand to collect. I would like the committee to which this bill will be referred to look into this matter.

Mr. Clyne's advisory group on executive compensation in the public service, in its second report, holds that "matters affecting executive compensation are not static but are part of a dynamic process that requires constant attention." The same can certainly be said of matters pertaining to the compensation paid to parliamentarians.

I would go so far as to say that the parliamentarian is the least well treated of all senior public servants, and this is an unfortunate situation. We cannot expect properly qualified talent to seek to become parliamentarians, any more than we can expect them to accept positions in the public service, unless the offers are made as enticing as those such men are likely to receive from private enterprise.

Honourable senators, this bill is not perfect, but we consider it a step in the right direction and give it our full support.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I apologize for speaking again, but I wish to make one comment on this bill as I have some distinct feelings on the matter.

The last time we discussed parliamentary indemnities was August 1, 1963. I looked back to see what happened on that day, and found it was made clear then that from 1945 there had been no increase for parliamentarians until 1954, when the indemnity was increased from $4,000 to $8,000, although a $2,000 expense allowance was created in the interim. From 1954 there was no increase for nine years until 1963, when the indemnity was increased from $8,000 to $12,000, and the expense allowance was raised to $3,000 for the Senate and $6,000 for the House of Commons.

Speaking on that day in support of the measure, I said that it seemed a reasonable bet that it would be another nine or ten years before the subject came up again. I was wrong, but only by one year, because that was eight years ago. At that time it was pointed out that wages and salaries in the interim had gone up by roughly 70 per cent, while the increase for Parliament was one of roughly 50 per cent. The present figures have been mentioned by previous speakers in this debate. Once again it is true to say that wages and salaries in general have stepped ahead of the parliamentary indemnity, and for that reason among others this increase is justified.

Quite apart from that, it would be impossible to get the talents that are represented in the House of Commons and the Senate today for anything less than the indemnity of $18,000 which is now being suggested. I think it is thoroughly justified. It is justified by comparison with the business world, the professional world and the public service. It is justified on any count that I can think of.

There is just one point with which I disagree. I am not satisfied that the expense allowance, which is always referred to as a tax-free expense allowance, is in its best form at the present time. In this I am in disagreement with my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, who preceded me in this debate. To some extent it goes against the grain that, with respect to expenses, the normal business practice is not followed. The principle is well established in the business world that where one has expenses one submits an account, and I really fail to see why that principle should not obtain here. Apart from the fact that the rates applied to the House of Commons are different from those applied to the Senate, I see no justification in having a person like myself, who comes from Montreal, receive the same allowance as his colleagues who come from Vancouver, St. John's, or the Northwest Territories. Of course, there is some slight differential with respect to allowances for members of Parliament who come from the Northwest Territories, but that is applicable only to the House of Commons. In my opinion it would have been far better if that aspect of the Beaupré Committee's report had been implemented, and we had been required to submit expense accounts for legitimate expenses within the prescribed limits.

With that one reservation, honourable senators, I am happy to support the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented Thursday, June 3.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I will do my best to be even more brief this time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This is a Molson day. It is a good day.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is just one of those days, I am afraid, Senator Connolly.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Molson, seconded by honourable Senator McGrand, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I shall say very few words in explanation. The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders met on May 12. It has taken some time to present this report because the feeling of the committee was that we should not amend the rules either lightly or frequently. We did discuss all the proposals for rule amendments made between the beginning of this session and the present time. We discussed Rules 15, 3, 45, 78 and 7 and, of course, Rules 21 and 19 which are the subject of this report.

With regard to Rule 3, which allows for a rule to be suspended with leave, there was a suggestion that the reason for asking for leave to suspend it should be stated. Rather than amend the rule, it was suggested that the reason should be put into the wording of the motion which the senator makes when he stands to ask for leave, notwithstanding a rule, to make a motion. That would be incorporated presumably in the typewritten motion that the senator is given when he intends to ask for the suspension of the rule.

The amendment to Rule 21 that is before you is the result of the suggestion that legislation should come ahead of other matters. At the same time, to give effect to that proposal, it was suggested that in Rule 19 "inquiries" and "motions" should be placed at the end after "orders of the day," so that any matter pertaining to legislation would immediately follow the Routine Proceedings and precede such matters as "inquiries" and "motions".

That is the only explanation there is, honourable senators, for these proposed amendments to Rules 21 and 19.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, first I wish to apologize to Senator Molson for not informing him that I was going to object to the amendment of Rule 19. I just did not have the opportunity to do so. Unless I misunderstand what is being attempted by amending Rule 19, I must take some objection to it. I have to admit to honourable senators that I attended the committee meeting, and agreed with the decisions taken at that time and incorporated in Senator Molson's report.

I wish to say at the outset that I have no objection to the proposed change in Rule 21. With respect to Rule 19, which deals with Routine Proceedings, if we are going to end the Routine Proceedings at (e), as they presently exist, and follow with "(f) question period; (g) orders of the day", then how can we proceed to "inquiries" or "motions", which are Routine Proceedings, after "orders of the day"?

Perhaps I do not understand the procedure, but I question how we can proceed to an inquiry or a motion after Orders of the Day are called. I do not know whether this is possible or not. If someone can clear up my thinking on this I shall be very pleased. If not, then I suggest we send Rule 19 back to the committee so that this matter may be cleared up.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, this point was not raised before, and God forbid that I should set myself up as an expert in matters that are at least quasi-legal. I would have thought that any inquiry or motion that followed the proceedings of the day, when it had been dealt with as an inquiry or a motion, would subsequently appear on the Orders of the Day for the following day. I do not see why there is any difficulty with that. Perhaps I am a little obtuse.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Then after you have dealt with the Orders of the Day, do you return to Routine Proceedings in order to deal with the inquiry or motion? I do not know if that is proper procedure.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wonder if honourable senators would permit me a word at this point. I do not wish to be involved in the interesting discussion now taking place, but it seems to me, dealing with Rule 19(f) and (g), that if the rule remains as it is now it would mean, for example, that if today an honourable senator had given notice that on Tuesday next he would call the attention of the Senate to a certain matter, there would be no problem. His inquiry would be called on Tuesday next before the Senate proceeded to deal with legislation. If there is a change—and I think this is what Senator McDonald has in mind—and if an honourable senator were to give notice of an inquiry today that he would draw the attention of the Senate to a certain topic on Tuesday next, and if the order of proceeding in Rule 19 were changed so that it comes after the legislation, then there is no assurance that on Tuesday next such an honourable senator would be able to speak on the inquiry of which he had given notice. I wonder if that is the point that Senator McDonald is making.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, that is really not the point I am concerned with. I am not concerned with the opportunity to speak. I am just wondering if you can call inquiries under Orders of the Day without returning to Routine Proceedings in order to make an inquiry an item on the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I do not know if Routine Proceedings as such are defined, and so I am immediately in a difficulty there. I would have thought that there was no difficulty in the rules, since Rule 19 just reads:

> 19. At each daily sitting of the Senate, the Speaker shall call for, in the following order:

And then the items are set out. As I say, there is no difficulty in Routine Proceedings. It was my assumption that we would go through the proceedings in the order suggested in Rule 19. After the Orders of the Day were completed, then inquiries would be called, and motions would be called, and if as a result of debate it was desired that they should appear on the Orders of the Day for the next sitting or a subsequent date, the inquiry or motion would then appear on the Orders of the Day for the next sitting or whatever subsequent date was appropriate.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I did not intend to participate in this debate. I had a very short conversation a few minutes ago with Senator McDonald, as a result of which I understood for the first time that, although he was a member of the Rules Committee, he had reconsidered the matter and was of the view it presented an important problem which deserved further consideration. Therefore, he recommends that the matter be referred back to the committee for further study. I have been thinking this over, and while I have not consulted anybody it strikes me, if I understand the motives behind the proposed change correctly, that they are to give precedence to government orders, and to place further along on our Order Paper such things as inquiries and motions which individual senators may wish to discuss.

This reminded me of something which is quite noticeable to those of us who have spent some time in the other place, and that is that the Senate is entirely different in a great many ways from the House of Commons. I do not think this is a very serious departure from the Senate's attitudes, but I raise the point, for the consideration of honourable senators, that when we are given equality of power to introduce subjects for debate, then we risk losing that power when we allow them to be relegated every sitting day to the end of the Order Paper, and I think we are offending against that principle of equality among peers.

There is another fundamental difference. When we rise to speak we do not address His Honour the Speaker; we address ourselves. I suppose there is an historical reason for that, and I have always felt that the Lord must smile on governments because they have recommended the most capable people to occupy the chair, certainly during the 16 years I have been here. Therefore, I wonder whether on these philosophical grounds, this report should be given more thought.

Every senator who introduces a motion or presents an inquiry in the Senate—and I notice there are four on the Order Paper today—considers it to be of great importance that such motion or inquiry be on the Order Paper. Some senators may consider them frivolous while others may speak to them, but those who present them have equal rights with the Leader of the Government to put on the Order Paper for discussion matters which affect the people with whom they are in daily or weekly contact. They consider those matters of sufficient importance that the debate they engender should form part of the record of this house.

I notice that the last four items on the Order Paper today by some chain of circumstances happen to be inquiries. They are all automatically relegated to the end of the Order Paper, but the senator to whom a particular inquiry is the most important thing he is concerned with may not get an opportunity for a very long time to discuss it, or it may be reached at a very inconvenient time to him. I hesitate to think that Senator Manning should have to come all the way from Edmonton, where he was engaged on private business, to find that he could not discuss what is to him a very important subject. If I do not talk myself out of it, I intend to make a short speech on the subject of his inquiry this afternoon. There are others who share the same view.

Perhaps this is not the time for us to make a definite decision. If I am joined by other honourable senators who have reservations about changing our rules in a way that would make us a little more like the House of Commons in everything we do, and if there are others who are worried about the long-term effect of this amendment, I will move the adjournment of the debate to give us more time to consider the matter. If there is a motion to refer the matter back to the committee for one of the reasons that have been expressed, then I shall be satisfied. I am a great believer in the democratic process. I will not lead a filibuster on this matter, but I have expressed my views.

Hon. Alan Macnaughton: I find myself in considerable sympathy with the remarks of Senator Smith. It seems to me that under the headings of "Inquiries" and "Motions" there is a sense of urgency of which we have not taken full account. This is particularly true when one considers the rights of the Opposition. There may be a very important inquiry or motion that requires urgent consideration.

This does not happen very often in the Senate, but it happens almost every day in the other place. Therefore, before we make any changes to our rules—I am certainly not conservative in that respect, having presided over the Committee on Rules and Regulations in the other place—we should remind ourselves that there is usually an historical reason for the placing of these items in a certain order. Before we change that order, particularly in view of the rights of the Opposition, we should refer this matter back to the committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: It may sound a little ironic that I should disagree with the views of the previous speaker, who was protecting the rights of the Opposition. However, I must explain that this change is proposed on my suggestion.

There are two problems involved. One is the interpretation of what will happen as a result of the change. I am in agreement with the way Senator Molson indicated we should proceed from now on. The idea is that the first time an inquiry or a motion appears under Routine Proceedings it will be called after the Orders of the Day, but once it is taken up it will be included in the Orders of the Day. The main purpose of the change is to give precedence to legislation in the Orders of the Day. That is the objective.

Senator Smith has said that the effect will be to give priority to government orders. In a way he may be right but not entirely, because there is legislation which is due to private initiative, such as private bills or public bills initiated by individual members of the Senate. This is legislation in which the government has no direct interest. Therefore, it would not be correct to say we would be giving priority to government orders. Legislation is the main thing.

It is true that an inquiry or motion from any corner of the house may on occasion be very important, but I doubt if any inquiry or motion is of greater importance to members of the Senate than legislation. Usually a motion concerns something of special interest to the mover, and occasionally to a large group of senators or to the Senate as a whole. We know that legislation is a matter of interest to all senators at all times. That was the reason why I suggested that priority be given to legislative items in the Orders of the Day.

If the work load of the Senate—I am not thinking of committees, but the house—is so great that this rule would prevent a senator having an opportunity of putting his motion or of discussing any matter covered by a notice of inquiry, I would willingly agree with Senator Smith. However, I do not think that this would be the case. I have no fear that the rights of the Opposition or of any individual member of the house will be affected by this change.

In any event, since there is some doubt, I am willing to let the matter stand for the time being. It can be considered and if next week we feel that the matter should be referred back to the committee, I will not object. I just wished to make clear why I had suggested this change, and why I do not entertain the fears expressed by Senator McDonald and Senator Smith.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I do not wish to compete with Senator Molson in speaking often in one day. I have listened to this debate with great interest, and there certainly appears to be unanimity on the proposition that legislation should take priority over other matters on the Orders of the Day. The problem seems to be one of whether inquiries and motions in the proceedings of the chamber should follow the Orders of the Day. The question period will remain where it is.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That comes under the first item of the report.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I shall restrict my comments to the problem of inquiries and motions. We are concerned with the fact that it would be the first appearance for discussion of the inquiry or motion that would be put ahead of legislation, because after that, if the first proposition as submitted by Senator Molson is adopted, these inquiries or motions then become items on the Orders of the Day, and they would fall below the rank of legislation in the order of priority.

We may perhaps reach a compromise proposal and retain the order of Routine Proceedings as we now have them, bearing in mind that we are concerned only with the first speech. We might then devise a rule whereby there cannot be a second speech on the occasion upon which the inquiry or motion is first presented. We might even consider, although I do not think this to be in harmony with our own practice, a time limit on the speech of the mover of the motion, or the speech which presents the inquiry. That would support the main proposition, because it would work against the undue delay of legislation. But frankly, I do not think the imposition of a time limit on a speech in the Senate is consonant with our practice, or the way in which we would like to see this matter developed. It would not be out of the way to require the first speech in respect of a motion or inquiry to take place where it now takes place. Thereafter any speeches made under the same heading could be relegated to a position lower on the Order Paper than that occupied by legislation.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this is an interesting discussion which raises other points, of course, one of which is how inquiries and motions ever get on the Order Paper. Rule 19 requires that inquiries and motions be dealt with before the Orders of the Day. By a historical process they have somehow got on the Orders of the Day, probably because we have a "rule" that matters under debate appear on the Orders of the Day in a certain order. It is this rule that puts legislation up, as Senator Smith indicated.

However, the real change suggested by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders seems to me to make sense. Rule 19 merely refers to the order in which the Speaker shall call the business of the day. He may call it in any order that the rules require. Therefore, the question raised by Senator McDonald would not represent a serious problem. We can take any of (a) to (i) out of Rule 19 and put them anywhere because, as I think Senator Molson said, there is no definition of the Routine Proceedings, but Orders of the Day are described.

I do not know how often senators read the material at the back of the book of rules, which refers to practices that have been developed. I have never been able to satisfy myself as to the validity of these comments. I sometimes doubt that they have the same status as the rules. However, at page 126 again we find the statement:

> The Speaker calls inquiries in the order in which they appear on the order paper.

And under "Motions":

> The Speaker calls the motions in the order in which they appear on the order paper.

Of course, Rule 19 says that they are called before Orders of the Day and there is obviously confusion here between the two terms, "order paper" and "orders of the day."

I am particularly interested in one matter which was discussed in the committee—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does your last observation mean that Rule 19 is not consequential on Rule 21?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Rule 21 refers only to Orders of the Day, which is item (i) of Rule 19. Rule 21 only refers to the order in which matters which are Orders of the Day shall be called. However, according to Rule 19, notices of inquiries and notices of motions are dealt with prior to Orders of the Day, inquiries, and motions. That is why I raised the question initially as to how inquiries and motions ever get on the Order Paper. I do not know how.

For this reason it might well be that the committee should reconsider the whole question. There may be reasons for this. Senator Molson suggests they get on the Order Paper after notices are given. However, Rule 19 deals with motions and inquiries. Items (d) and (e) refer to notices of inquiries and notices of motions; (f) and (g) to inquiries and motions. Therefore, if Rule 19 were adhered to presumably we would deal with motions at that time.

I believe that to be the reason for the committee's suggestion. I do not think anyone would be offended. I have indulged in this myself. One of the problems arises from speeches known as travelogues. There have been times when some of us reporting back here have spent an hour on what we term travelogues, when Government business was held up.

One other matter discussed very thoroughly in the committee was the suggestion that when a senator asks leave to suspend a rule he should not only state the rule, as is now required by the rules, but should state the reason. Senator Molson referred in passing to this, and I hope that he would have said a little more about it. I think it was a very important part of our discussion in committee.

The reason it seems to me to be important is that it is a serious thing, and should be regarded as such, for anyone to suspend a rule. The Senate is entitled to be told why. I do not mean there should be a long speech. There is usually a good reason. Why should it not be stated? Although this was not the decision of the committee, I would like to see our rules require, as they did prior to the last revision, that not only should a senator seeking to suspend a rule state the rule he seeks to suspend, but also that he should state the reason for the suspension.

In view of the points that have been raised here, many of which are of considerable interest, respecting the doubt as to the specific intention of the rule change suggested by the committee, it might be wise for the committee to reconsider it.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: I rise to say that while listening to this very interesting debate this afternoon I was particularly impressed by the explanation given by Senator Flynn. I think the committee's report is excellent, and we ought to try their suggestion.

Senator Grosart refers to what I had in mind, the fact that occasionally we listen to a very delightful and charming travelogue of a senator's visit to distant countries while Government business waits for quite a long time. I am not saying anything derogatory about these excellent speeches or travelogues, if I might describe them as such, but I do think that first things should be put first.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As a matter of clarification, honourable senators, no one objects to the amendment to Rule 21. The problem arises with regard to Rule 19. I wish to illustrate the inefficiency or fault of Rule 19 as it stands.

When the Speaker asks when a bill shall be read the second time, the Government Leader might say "Tuesday next". On the same day a senator might give notice that on Tuesday next he will call the attention of the Senate to a certain matter. Those two notices are given at the same time, but because of the way Rule 19 is now drafted the notice of inquiry will be called before the motion for second reading of a bill, yet those notices will have been given at the same sitting. I think that is why we want this corrected. Once a debate has started on a so-called inquiry, I think there should be provision for the precedence of legislation.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong this debate, but I think that because of my role as spokesman for the Government I should add an observation. I do not regard myself, even at this stage, as anything of an authority on our rules, and I bow to greater experience, particularly that of Senator Molson. As I see the position, Rule 19 is not really consequential on Rule 21. Routine Proceedings are different from Orders of the Day. Routine Proceedings at present come before Orders of the Day. Senator Smith was quite right in saying that this gives a senator, whether he be backbencher or frontbencher in this chamber, his day in court, and we all appreciate how important and desirable that is.

On the other hand, as Senator Flynn said, one of our primary functions, although not our only function, is the legislative function. For instance, if the bill we were discussing earlier today had not been proceeded with today, the Government could have been faced with some serious consequences. I know that the Senate generally recognizes this situation, and when the Leader of the Government asks that a government measure take precedence, as we did the day before yesterday, that request is granted. The situation could arise, however, where, in the face of a recalcitrant Senate, government business could be seriously impeded.

I am wondering whether it would not be wise, although not because we show lack of confidence in it, to ask the committee to reconsider this matter. There are some aspects of the report that are good, and perhaps acceptable, but there are others that cause us some concern. If we could so arrange the rule so as to provide that government legislation, and perhaps other legislation, shall always, if asked for in certain circumstances, be given precedence, I think we might meet the point so ably enunciated by Senator Smith.

Further, it seems to me that calling the Orders of the Day before inquiries and motions could create technical difficulties, because the rule would call for Orders of the Day to be included in Routine Proceedings, and after the Orders of the Day are dealt with the Senate would return to Routine Proceedings by calling inquiries and motions. I am wondering, after the suggestion of the now disclosed author, whether it might not be useful to ask the committee to look further into the question. In supporting the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition, I want to thank the chairman of the committee for the work that has been done.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, in listening to some of the debate I wondered in what chamber I was this afternoon. It would seem to me that if this important change in the rules is necessary, it must be because government legislation has been held up, because there has been at least some substantial difficulty in getting government legislation before the Senate for debate. I have seen no difficulty of that kind. As a matter of fact, if government legislation from the other place is not already on the Orders of the Day, and if the Government Leader in the Senate and those who are in an administrative capacity here wish it to come forward, then an honourable senator may ask for unanimous consent that leave be given to proceed with it. I may be wrong, but I know of no instance during my time here when such a request for unanimous consent has been refused. It is my impression that senators are and always have been willing to co-operate with the government in bringing forward legislation as quickly as it is available. If I have heard complaints, they have not been that we cannot proceed to deal with government legislation, but rather asking where the government legislation is and why it is not here.

Objection has been taken to the travelogues. I have not travelled, so I have not been asked to give a travelogue, but my impression has been that any senator giving a travelogue here has been as embarrassed by the length and detail of it as some of us who were listening to it. My impression is that a speech called a travelogue is given by a senator only after he has had a very strong request by the leadership in the Senate to make a speech, to give us a filler because there is nothing else that can be put before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot deny that.

Hon. Mr. Argue: You cannot deny it. Very well, we will leave it at that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What other reason could there be?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Then what is the objection to travelogues? I have not noticed senators lining up with travelogues and standing in the way of government business. If there is a problem, let us deal with it, but I suggest there is no problem within the Senate itself in dealing with legislation. There is an important principle involved, namely, the right of an individual senator to give a notice of motion or inquiry, and have it called when the time comes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not only a motion, but a bill.

Hon. Mr. Argue: An individual senator does have this important right, and I believe the rights of individual senators to be important. The Leader of the Senate said there might be a time when a recalcitrant Senate would prevent government legislation being dealt with in an adequate manner. I think the power of the Senate to prevent legislation being passed or amended is something that we have, and that we should sustain. However, I do not see how we are doing ourselves any good by removing the right of an individual senator to have his item called in the way now provided by the rules. There has been no evidence that I know of that the rules have been abused, yet they do protect a certain right that senators have enjoyed for a long time.

I would certainly go along with those who suggest that the committee might have a look at this whole question, in the light of the discussion we have had this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I would like to point out that what Senator Argue says goes in the reverse, because the fact of the matter is that under our present procedure, as far as the Order Paper is concerned, an honourable senator has the right of precedence for notice of inquiries and notices of motion. But when it gets on the Order Paper it is automatically downgraded.

Hon. Mr. Smith: No.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I crystallize this discussion and move that the matter be referred back to the Standing Committee on Rules and Orders and that Senator Macnaughton be added to the committee?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Walker and seconded by the honourable Senator Sullivan—

Hon. Mr. Molson: Mr. Speaker—

The Hon. the Speaker: I have a motion to put.

Some Hon. Senators: It is an amendment.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, we now have a motion before us, the motion by Senator Molson. Whether Senator Walker is amending that motion or just what, I am not sure. I think we are out of order at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Walker: If there is a motion, the motion should be put, but I think it would be important to have Senator Macnaughton on the committee, as he knows more about the rules than anyone else in this house, with the exception of the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And His Honour the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, may I say a word at this stage before the question is put on the amendment or on the motion itself? First of all, since I have been a member of this chamber this is by far the best debate we have ever had on the rules of the Senate. Secondly, I would suggest that the purpose of the Rules Committee is to discuss these things. I wish that honourable senators would take occasion to accept my invitation to attend the meetings of the committee. If they had done so previously, they would have heard all this discussion. We sat discussing this for over two hours. There were 19 senators present—not all were members—and the Clerk of the Senate, the Law Clerk and the Assistant Clerk.

We have had a very useful discussion today, but much of it covered old ground, if I may say so. The committee is operating under a disadvantage, in that all we can do is what we have done here today, that is, discuss these various matters and bring in a report. At that stage, just as we have seen, it becomes like a discussion on the weather. We all have views on these matters, and quite rightly so.

On the last occasion I asked honourable senators to attend the committee meetings I pointed out that this is the one committee whose actions affect all senators because the rules apply to all of us. I hope that, when the committee meets next, every senator who can possibly do so will attend so as to participate in its decisions.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

As to this debate, the Leader of the Government has made the point that Rule 19 is not a consequential amendment. That is quite clear, and I think the advice from the Clerk of the Senate was to that effect. But in the committee it was decided to amend Rule 21, and other rules. As a matter of fact, the Clerk of the Senate and the Law Clerk participated in this discussion. It was felt that it would be more understandable if at the same time as Rule 21, which applies only to the Orders of the Day, was being amended, Rule 19, which sets out the order in which the Speaker calls those items, should also be amended to put inquiries and motions at the bottom of the list.

As Senator Grosart has pointed out, an inquiry appears in our Routine Proceedings after notice has been given. The same is true for a motion. Then it appears in the Routine Proceedings for a certain date that a certain senator gives notice that he will inquire, or that he will move. That is how it arrives there.

On page 126, also called to your attention by Senator Grosart, it is pointed out on inquiries and motions that if the debate is not adjourned, the matter is considered debated and removed. If the debate is adjourned, the inquiry becomes an Order of the Day.

That brings me to the second point. It sounds as though I am lecturing, but I do wish that this book of rules would get a little more attention from all members of the Senate. Many of these problems are actually spelled out. The whole back section of this book is the work of the Clerk of the Senate, with the assistance of the Law Clerk. It is fairly extensive and covers many of the situations.

Honourable senators, with regard to what we do now, as I said, the Rules Committee is a servant of this chamber and will do exactly what the Senate wants. If you want to refer this back, we will have another meeting—and we hope to have 19 people again. We will discuss it again and we will bring back a further report. If that is what you want, we will be agreeable to do that. However, you can see that unless we get a larger attendance, which we would love to see, it is quite difficult to bring in an acceptable report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the honourable Senator McGrand:

> That the Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommending certain amendments to the Rules of the Senate, be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the honourable Senator Walker, seconded by the honourable Senator Sullivan:

> That the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for further consideration.

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is some uncertainty, I will again ask those who are in favour of the honourable Senator Walker's motion in amendment to please say "Yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: And those who are opposed to it, will they please say "Nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment carried.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 27, 1971, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, this item has been standing on the Order Paper for some time now. When I adjourned the debate in the first instance, it was during the absence of Senator McDonald. At that time I had in mind, as the only purpose in adjourning it, that some other senator would wish to speak on the subject which was brought to our attention by Senator Manning. In the meantime certain events have occurred that have reminded me of particular aspects of this matter that I should like to refer to briefly before the inquiry is removed from the Order Paper.

First, I wish to congratulate Senator Manning for bringing this most worthwhile subject to our attention. The debate that has taken place on this subject so far has been most salutary. I should like to remind honourable senators that Senator Manning drew to our attention the need for reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations, which has been a subject of widespread interest in the public domain for many months—perhaps even for years. Some of the many aspects of this topic have already been well covered by the excellent speeches that have been made during the course of this debate. The general subject is one of interest to the particular part of the country from which I come, my home province being Nova Scotia.

It occurs to me that there has been quite a degree of exaggeration on both sides of the public debate on whether American investment in this country is an asset or liability. The close relationship with not only the economy of the United States but the people living in the United States is a traditional and continuing close relationship so far as most people from the Maritime provinces are concerned.

As I have mentioned on more than one occasion in this chamber, the fact that the Province of Nova Scotia did not become the fourteenth state of the union is only an accident of history. At the time of the American revolution Nova Scotia was much larger geographically than it is today. At that time it included a large part of what is now the Province of New Brunswick and a substantial part of what is now the State of Maine. It was, therefore, a very important colony from the British po.nt of view. At the beginning of the American revolution there was abroad in Nova Scotia a natural sympathy toward the cause of the American colonists. However, whenever General George Washington refused to support the uprising in Nova Scotia, which the leaders of that uprising had good reason to believe would eventually have the effect of neutralizing the effectiveness of the defence of Nova Scotia through the Halifax Citadel, that sympathy began to wane, because that was regarded as a losing game at the time.

The part of Nova Scotia from which Senator Blois comes was involved in that particular phase of our history more than my own part of the province. But the people frcm my part, which was the Port of Liverpool in those days, considered Liverpool one of the most important ports in Nova Scotia. It was regarded as almost as important as the port of Halifax appears to be regarded today. I think that is partly owing to Senator Isnor's propaganda, to tell you the truth. But at that time, as I was saying, their sympathies were reversed because the American privateers commenced to raid the ports of Nova Scotia, including Liverpool. The damage which those privateers caused consequently initiated a great upsurge of national feeling—a feeling for the Union Jack and for Britain. Perhaps, fundamentally, that is one of the reasons why that part of the country resisted so vociferously the inception of a new flag and the removal of the Union Jack, which had for years been regarded as Canada's national flag. I think it was because of that attitude that they were a little slow to change. I am glad to point out as an aside that that attitude has completely disappeared now.

I should also bring to your attention the fact that this interesting part of history has been written in a very appealing form by a friend of mine, Thomas H. Raddall, one of Canada's best-known authors of historical novels. As an historian he has been recognized by being awarded the Medal of Service of the Order of Canada. I am sure senators who live in other parts of the country would find his work useful as a source of information and a source of pleasurable entertainment.

Most early settlers of Nova Scotia were New Englanders. It is only natural that family ties continued to be strong even after the conflict was over. There were many reasons for that. There were trading reasons, because a great deal of trade resumed between the American colonies and Nova Scotia.

Another aspect of family ties is apparent even in my own time, although it dates back to long before that. Many young people of the day found employment and found wives in the American states and today their descendants form a large family of American cousins of those of us who chose to remain in Nova Scotia. I can even cite my own family as an illustration of this emigration, for in my father's time, many years ago, some of his brothers and sisters moved south to New England while the others went out to Alberta, actually at the same time that the Governor General's father went to Red Deer. They were the first settlers out there. They had decided to go further afield than the others. I think some of that bloodstream perhaps strengthened the fibre of the New England states, and I am sure it had a great effect on the future development of the western part of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Smith: It is, therefore, natural that a close affinity should exist today between these two North American neighbours.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media had some rather important things to say about the influence of American mass media on the culture of our country and the dangers that might develop from too much of an American influence. It was feared that we might be absorbed culturally and that one thing would lead to another.

I believe that those who have spoken in the debate would be more concerned with matters relating to the trade and commercial aspects of our relations, and these also, it is alleged, are having and will have in the future quite an effect on the politics of our own country and even on our independence.

I should like to refer to some of these commercial aspects which both in the past and in the present are of interest to my own province. The few illustrations I give will indicate that our people in general do nothing but welcome American capital; they do nothing but welcome capital from any place. They are not particularly pro-Canadian; they are not particularly anti-American, because it is a mixed bag with respect to the capitalization of the industrial development of my province. But we have a deep interest in the United States. I can remember that as a young fellow growing up in my home town I knew a great many Americans who were pure Americans; they were not infused with the blood of Nova Scotians who had gone to the colonies. They had no relationship to them. They were fishermen from Gloucester and other ports who came into my own port. The youngsters in our area were very fond of them. Their incomes were much larger than the income of our own town's people. Their economy was different. Investment was more readily available to them, and so they had bigger boats. Anyway, we always enjoyed seeing them. They used to make friends with the youngsters on the wharf, giving them nickels or large-sized pennies. I have forgotten which.

The United States has developed over the years into a most important market for some exports from Nova Scotia. The growing demand in their market for our fish has been most dramatic over the last two years. As honourable senators will recall, not more than two years ago our market for fish in the United States was so bad that our federal Government had to set up special measures to support our fishermen. Their incomes had dropped to an unacceptable degree. This has now changed. The population explosion down there, and the fish companies' modern approach to marketing and advertising, and the good product that is available, have greatly opened up that market for Canadian fish products. Because of the great demand, the resistance of the American-based fishing industry is becoming less and less, so that now we can look forward to the removal of quotas against our highly processed fish and the removal of all duties from our products entering the United States, so that eventually we will have even easier access to that market than we have today.

I believe we have had an example of the change in the American attitude recently with regard to the movement of raw products from Canada into the United States. President Nixon is anxious to have the pipelines opened up, so that there will be free access for our oil to the tremendous United States fuel market, which is growing perhaps even more rapidly than is the food market. Of course, many of us have high expectations, based on some pretty good evidence, that eventually we will benefit from the development of oil resources off the Atlantic continential shelf. Then we will have a very important export product which will find easy access to that market.

I suppose the risk capital with respect to Atlantic oil resources, which is now mainly American, will continue to be American capital for some time. It is a high-risk enterprise to go boring holes around Sabre Island, and there does not seem to be the kind of capital required to do that available in our country at this stage of our development. I expect that capital will continue to be American.

Although American-owned and operated fish processing plants still exist in my part of the country, I think it is fair to say—and Senator Robichaud is so familiar with this that I have some trepidation in stepping into this area in his presence—that the main development of our fish industry is made possible through the use of Canadian capital. I believe it is also fair to say that with the present market conditions the industry will be able to continue to generate most of its capital requirements for future expansion. For the present we may not need American capital in this industry, but we need the greatest degree of co-operation in the conservation of our resources of fish. Americans have realized the importance of co-operation in this field and have been willing and concerned participants in international discussions and decisions arrived at by an international committee for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. Senator Robichaud, when he was Minister of Fisheries, had a lot to do with exploring possibilities in this area.

I want to say something now about investment in the development of forest resources with particular reference to my own province. In the first place, the most important market for our forest products is the United States. As has been pointed out from time to time by Senator Burchill, the British market has gone down considerably for various complicated reasons. With respect to the rather large industry which employs about 1,000 men in my own home town, the Bowaters Mersey Paper Company Limited, United States investment there is a minority interest, mainly because it is based on the mutual goals of the continuity of an available market to the holder of that minority interest, which is held by the Washington Post, a rather large newspaper published in Washington, D.C. On the other side of the bargain is an accepted evaluation of the security of supply at fair prices, and the opening up of a substantial market for the Bowaters Mersey Paper Company. The rest of the ownership is not Canadian any longer. It started out to be, but it was bought out and for some years it was owned 100 per cent by the Bowaters Corporation of the United Kingdom.

Another example of the financing of the forestry resource industry is the substantial Scott paper and pulp mill in Pictou County, which is a subsidiary of the parent company whose head office is in Pennsylvania. This company had a good record during the many years it operated at other locations in Nova Scotia, particularly in my own county.

Another example of this type of investment in my province is the large pulp and paper plant now completed on the Strait of Canso. It is owned by Swedish interests, and its president is John Dickey, a friend of Senator Isnor, and a former colleague of his in the other place. We are pleased to see this degree of Canadian management in this Swedish-financed enterprise.

It is interesting to see the progress being made by the Volvo assembly plant in Halifax, which is also a Swedish subsidiary.

There is also a large Michelin Tire Company plant nearing the end of construction. In fact, two plants are being built in Nova Scotia, one in Bridgewater and the other in Pictou County. Together they will employ upwards of 1,500 people to start with. These plants are financed with French capital.

Japanese capital is involved in the automobile assembly plant established in Cape Breton.

These are good examples of such a heavily capitalized industry which, under equally favourable circumstances, do not depend on United States investment. However, United States investment still exists to a rather large degree, and so we can say that we have attracted capital from both sides of the Atlantic. It is interesting to note that in the past when Nova Scotians have experienced an unhappy situation with foreign capital, it has not been related to companies financed from south of the border, but with investment from abroad.

Two classic examples of this is the steel industry of Cape Breton and Fairey Aviation in Dartmouth. In each case the owners, after years of successful operation, called it quits and left those who were thrown out of work to shift for themselves. In each case, supported by governments at all levels, these plants have reopened and today continue to be operated by Canadians.

The most dramatic failure in Nova Scotia, as well as in the history of development in the country as a whole, is that of the heavy water plant of Deuterium of Canada in Cape Breton, where there is a possibility, which we hope does not develop, of a loss of over $100 million. However, foreign investment cannot be blamed for this catastrophe. If anything, it was the inability of the owner of the patented process to obtain capital in the United States, as he had undertaken to do in the early days of the development of that company, as well as assistance from the Government of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Lang: It was a poor process.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Whatever the cause, it was not a success. The fact is that we cannot blame the lack of U.S. capital for creating that problem for Nova Scotians. It was lack of local knowledge on the part of the people concerned which caused that failure.

The effects of investment in my own province comprise a mixed bag, at which I sometimes look with some amusement. In the 1920s, when I first began to think about buying life insurance, a Maritime-based life insurance company was organized and financed by Maritimers. It was called the Maritime Life Insurance Company, and proved to be a great success. Several years ago a large American insurance company, the John Hancock Company, made an attractive offer which the shareholders could not refuse. The total amount of United States capital involved must have been substantial. I do not recall the figure, but I ask myself the question: What direct or indirect benefit comes to Nova Scotia or to Canadians from this kind of investment.

When the Government of Nova Scotia was asked to pass legislation to make such a takeover legally possible, statements were made about the greatly increased source of capital for investment which would flow into Nova Scotia from the parent company, the John Hancock Insurance Company. Such evidence has not yet come to the attention of the public.

Having mentioned the warm welcome given to United States capital in the case of the takeover of the Maritime Life Insurance Company, I would point out in contrast that at about the same time the Government of Nova Scotia was busy passing legislation which prevented the Bell Telephone Company from voting their majority ownership of shares of the Maritime Telephone and Telegraph Company. Thus, "Upper Canadians" were denied the right of effective control and management of that telephone company, the shares of which had already been purchased on the market. One is justified in asking whether Bostonians were regarded more favourably than "Upper Canadians".

It is fair to say that in general Nova Scotians approved the action taken in both these instances. There was strong editorial support in the local newspaper, and no one seemed to be too concerned about it at the time this business was being transacted.

Here we have the people of the province trying their best to do United States interest a favour in connection with something which one doubts will be of real benefit to us, while on the other hand denying someone who is a Canadian from coming into the province and extending his technical skills and financing ability to improve and operate a modern telephone system. I know nothing about the merits of whether a telephone company could be better operated with Maritimers as engineers or as part of management, or whether Bell Telephone would provide better skills. In any event I was glad to sell my few shares of Maritime Telephone and Telegraph to the Bell Telephone.

Summarizing the situation, it seems to be the experience of Nova Scotia that capital requirements are supplied from both national and international sources, and we have not been dependent on and are therefore not unduly influenced by United States capital at this point in time.

Honourable senators, I wish to refer to the recent mission of Premier Regan and members of his government to the United Kingdom and continental Europe, which was immediately followed by a visit to New York and Boston. The visit seemed to indicate that what I have been saying could be regarded as valid. In other words, the present administration, possibly like its predecessor, feels that the House of Rothschild is on a par with the House of Morgan as a source of capital, whether it is for the development of Fundy tidal power or any other industrial development. Therefore, I must conclude that Nova Scotians are neither anti-American nor pro-American when it comes to accepting capital to finance projects which will create jobs for their growing labour force. It is understandable, however, that other regions of Canada, according to how they judge the effects of past experience, may have different views concerning future investment of U.S. capital in Canada. They have asserted that they see the effects of the United States media on the development of a distinctly Canadian culture and Canadian attitudes and, some say, adverse political effects.

Living in the heartland of Canada, as do most Canadians, it is understandable that prominent people such as Eddy Goodman, Walter Gordon, Jack McClelland, as well as our colleague, Senator Davey, are aware of these dangers. I suppose they and thousands of others are now raising what to them are important questions. One of them is: Shall United States equity investment remain as open as it is or, in time, shall it be more selective and thereby more responsive to Canadian needs? In the resource development field they are asking the question: Shall United States investment only have concern for filling United States needs at the lowest price consistent with a tax system that permits large capital accumulation, or should we have a different approach to this type of development investment? Should Canadians in the future insist on a more paced development of resources judged to be surplus to anticipated Canadian needs, coupled with more emphasis on investment in labour-intensive processing and manufacturing industries?

Canadians in the future may well consider that there are better ways to attain their own social goals through creation of jobs for the growing Canadian labour force than to continue to rush pell-mell, like lemmings, wherever the United States dollar sign is hanging out.

Honourable senators, I ask these questions and then say that I have not yet joined the committee for an independent Canada. However, it should be evident that the subject-matter interests me, as I hope the general subject interests many Canadians everywhere.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lang, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if we might have consent of the house to move Bill C-219 to the top of the Order Paper for Tuesday next?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that Bill C-219 be the first item on the Order Paper for Tuesday next?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on the administration of Allowances for Blind Persons in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, pursuant to section 12 of the Blind Persons Act, chapter 17, R.S.C., 1952.

Report on the administration of Allowances for Disabled Persons in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, pursuant to section 12 of the Disabled Persons Act, chapter 55, Statutes of Canada, 1953-54.

Report on the administration of Old Age Assistance in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, pursuant to section 12 of the Old Age Assistance Act, chapter 199, R.S.C., 1952.

Report of The Seaway International Bridge Corporation, Ltd., including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1970, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED BANK OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. Hédard Robichaud presented Bill S-22, to incorporate United Bank of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Robichaud moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and an act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, with leave, and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would suggest that, with unanimous consent, we consider third reading now, because there is a prospect of Royal Assent.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, next sitting. I am sorry, I thought it was the organization bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Perhaps the honourable senator would not mind waiting until Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has completed his motion, because I usually ask if leave is granted before putting the question. Has the honourable Senator Connolly something to add?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator Connolly leave to proceed with his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
Ottawa

10 June 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, June 10 at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Douglas Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972.

(The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:)

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, 9th March, 1971, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

1. Your committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of 9th March, 1971, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972 in advance of the bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate."

2. In obedience to the foregoing, your committee held one meeting on the Estimates and heard evidence from Mr. G. Osbaldeston, Deputy Secretary, Programs Branch, Treasury Board, and Mr. B.A. MacDonald, Director General, Budget Co-ordination, Treasury Board.

3. The Main Estimates for 1971-72 amount to $14,352 million as compared with 1970-71 when the amount was $13,438 million. Of the total of the Main Estimates for 1971-72, $7,091 million are statutory in nature while $7,261 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide authority. In addition to these amounts, there are $988 million of non-budgetary items.

4. Those departments which account for the largest percentage of the increase in the Estimates are National Health and Welfare, $256 million; Regional Economic Expansion, $62 million; Secretary of State, $109 million and Department of Transport, $46 million.

5. Your committee examined the operation and increasing efficiency of the program, planning and budgeting method and was especially interested in the possible use of this method as a means of assessing the effect of federal programs on the general stabilization policy of the Government. Your committee was also interest in the attention that was focused by the Treasury Board on the efficiency of existing programs as compared to new programs. Your committee was assured by the officials of the Treasury Board that as new expenditures are required for old programs the program is reassessed. However, your committee is of the opinion that the assessment of existing programs under the program, planning and budgeting method should be enhanced.

6. Your committee undertook specific examination of the bilingualism development program and requested further materials on this program from the Treasury Board, and these materials, when received, will be tabled with the committee. Your committee also examined the Regional Economic Expansion program and made a note to further examine this program at a later date in order to determine the method by which grant programs are budgeted by both the Department and the Treasury Board. It is felt by the committee that a comparison of the budgeting method used in grants programs with the actual expenditures in the case of this department would be useful.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Everett moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday, June 16, 1971, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 15, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

OIL INDUSTRY

PRICE INCREASES—QUESTION

Hon. Thérèse Casgrain: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate:

> Does the Government intend to apply any kind of sanction to those oil companies who raised their prices during the year 1970?

In the last week or so it was learned throughout Canada that there were increases. The mass media carried that information.

The Prices and Incomes Commission issued a document, dated June 4, 1971, on "Prices of Oil Refinery Products." The foreword to that statement says that at the National Conference on Price Stability held in Ottawa on February 9-10, 1970, there was broad agreement that business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would reduce the number and size of price increases. The foreword also says that a federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa about the same time accepted this kind of agreement.

It was a surprise to the Canadian public to learn about ten days ago that some of the oil companies had raised their prices during 1970, despite the agreement they had accepted. I should like to know, therefore, if the Canadian Government intends to take any action on this important question of the raising of prices in the oil industry.

Hon. Paul Martin: Senator Casgrain was kind enough to give me notice of her intention to ask this question dealing with an alleged violation of an agreement to restrain prices as stated by Mr. Young of the Prices and Incomes Commission in 1970. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has already answered this question by pointing out the difficulty of deciding on policy when only a limited number of violations are involved. He said at the time that there was nothing more he could add, and obviously if that is the case, that is the position I, too, find myself in at the moment.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that the agreement the oil companies entered into was that they would not raise their prices any more than their costs. They raised their prices in anticipation of a certain volume of business, which, of course, would affect their costs. Owing to the terribly severe winter there was a much larger volume of business for the oil companies than they had anticipated and, therefore, it looked as if their prices had been set deliberately too high.

I think the oil companies did set their prices in a perfectly reasonable manner, expecting a certain volume of business, but when they got a larger volume the result was that their profits were comparatively higher.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that Senator Beaubien is asking a supplementary question to Senator Casgrain's question?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It is just a comment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would you put your question to the Leader of the Government, please.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With leave.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I have finished, with leave. I have nothing more to say.

Hon. Mrs. Casgrain: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government a further question? If Senator Beaubien's remarks are made in the sense that it was the fault of the severe winter, does that mean that Providence is on the side of the oil companies?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Perhaps they will reduce their prices next winter.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure Senator Beaubien will take good notice of your question.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Le bon Dieu is on the side of the oil companies.

AIR CANADA

MOTION TO REFER ANNUAL REPORT TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I had intended to stand this order, which is in my name. However, I understand that Senator Argue is prepared to speak on the subject this afternoon, and I am quite happy to give him that opportunity.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Argue speak now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, this is one of those occasions when I am speaking against my better judgment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And the end result is likely to be that you will make your best speech.

Hon. Mr. Argue: But I am doing it as a service, I hope, because I have one or two points I would like to make.

Senator Cameron made a very learned speech on the subject of Air Canada. He obviously has done a great deal of research in this field. He raised a number of questions, and some of the points he raised I agree with while there are others with which I disagree. According to the press, Senator Cameron is reported as having objected strenuously to the type of meals served on Air Canada flights. Well, I have made a great number of flights over the years, mainly at somebody else's expense, and I do not have any serious criticism to make of the meals served by Air Canada. Like Senator Cameron, I was wondering whether or not chicken was appearing a little too often on the menu, but then I realized that the chicken-and-egg war was going on, as a result of which there was a large surplus of chickens in Quebec, and Air Canada was doing something worthwhile in the interests of Canada by promoting chicken. I do not know whether Senator Cameron's objection had some effect on the menu prepared by Air Canada, but last Sunday and Monday, filet mignon appeared on the menu. Apparently if there was not a run on chicken, then there was a run on beef. In any event, my main concern with Air Canada's meals is that I eat too much, and if I happen to have taken off two or three pounds and then I find I have a number of flights to make, I am afraid I may put it back on.

Senator Cameron expressed serious dissatisfaction about Air Canada's flying late. From his speech I would take it that in his experience their flights are almost always late, in fact, almost always later than their own definition of late which is anything in excess of 15 minutes. However, my own experience is that Air Canada is nearly always on time; its service takes off nearly always on time—perhaps five or ten minutes late—but then frequently it has to sit out on a runway while other aircraft are taking off or landing. In this situation an aircraft has to take its turn. So surely, honourable senators, if our airports are congested we need better airport facilities. If an Air Canada flight is held up because of the traffic flow, surely the criticism should not be directed at the airline itself but rather at the facilities provided by our airports. My experience has been that when Air Canada has had a serious flight delay it has been for a very good reason. The weather has probably played a part, and often mechanical difficulties have played a part.

I was in Winnipeg this winter when a flight to Regina was delayed by one hour. On that occasion the pilot took the passengers into his confidence and explained in rather technical terms—they were rather technical for me at any rate—that there was trouble with the generators and they had to do some welding and make some repairs. I thought I was back on the farm with some broken-down piece of equipment that needed some welding to put it in working order again. Anyway, he entertained us well while we were waiting, and all the while a blizzard was blowing outside. Eventually they repaired the plane and we took off and landed safely in Regina. So, far be it from me to say that Air Canada is being run in an inefficient manner, that its flights are always late or that this great airline does not understand its business.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I gather it was nothing that hay wire could not repair.

Hon Mr. Argue: That's all right with me, but it has an excellent safety record, and I should think that that safety record indicates that Air Canada must take a reasonable amount of care under such circumstances.

Last Monday night I arrived at Uplands Airport at 9.50 on a flight from Winnipeg. We had come through a violent electrical storm. It lasted for about half an hour, and it was the roughest flight I have ever been on. Passengers were sick, baggage was falling all over the place, and in my opinion the crew themselves were terrified. Nevertheless, the plane landed quite safely. The only criticism I have is that I would have preferred had the plane landed at Fort William or Thunder Bay so that we could have got out and walked. I can assure you I would have been much happier on the ground than I was in the air on that occasion. What amazed me was that on arriving at Uplands Airport we found that planes were still taking off and landing despite this very severe electrical storm. I do not criticize the airlines for this, because I realize they must know what they are doing. But I was certainly wondering at that time whether they were taking the kind of precautions that should be taken in such circumstances.

Honourable senators, I have one suggestion to make in connection with the subject to which I am addressing myself. I think that Air Canada and CP Air and the other airline companies in Canada should give serious consideration to reducing domestic fares under certain circumstances, and in particular to providing charter flights at reduced rates for travel within Canada. Air Canada is making a big issue about international air rates which it would like to see lowered so that it could compete with international air charters. It is rather strange, I think, that when Canadians are considering a holiday, it is cheaper for them to fly overseas than to fly between certain points in Canada. For example, a ticket from Toronto to Vancouver costs $266 while a ticket on a charter flight to Britain or the continent frequently costs $200 or less. It seems to me that the attitude of our airlines in promoting lower charter fares on international flights really has the effect of sabotaging an increase in the tourist traffic within our own country. I would think it would be not only a patriotic gesture but also good economics for Air Canada and CP Air and other Canadian airlines to give serious consideration to introducing lower fares for flights within Canada and to providing domestic charter flights to promote increased travel by Canadians within Canada. However, the reverse seems to be the case. There is now an increased charge for stopovers. The cost of an air ticket from here to Saskatoon is $98, but if one stops over in Winnipeg it is $110.

The huge cities in Canada which have air flights between them receive, in my judgment, a bonus, while flights between smaller cities, between the capitals of our provinces, have been penalized by this new increase in rates which places a penalty on stopover flights.

The Government, when considering action to encourage unity in this country, should consider action to increase travel within Canada. A way of achieving this would be to provide lower-priced charter flights, remove the penalty applying to stopover flights, and to do everything it can to make it as attractive as possible for Canadians to see their own country.

In March I made a speech in the Senate in which I criticized the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities for having taken the stand that there should be one language in Canada, that it should be English, and that use of the English language should be promoted even in the Province of Quebec. I believe that they made a mistake, and I said so in this chamber. I have since received some words of commendation and others of criticism.

I would like to see rates for chartered flights that would encourage officials of organizations such as the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities to travel across Canada and visit the various provinces. I can think of nothing that would assist national unity more than to enable Canadians who live outside Quebec to visit that province, and for Quebecers to visit the other provinces.

Yet Air Canada, a crown corporation, an instrument of the federal Government, is a prime offender in doing everything possible, for economic reasons, to promote cheap fares for those leaving the country and to set fares which are prohibitive to the many Canadians who wish to take their holidays in this country.

The railroads are equal offenders. They do nothing that I know of to promote group tourist traffic across this country. They, too, should get into the business of encouraging Canadians to see their own country. Both the railroads and the airlines could promote tours to provincial capitals as well as to the federal capital. They would find an overwhelming and surprising response to this promotion.

I refer now to our young people who travel on the highways. Some federal money is being used to provide minimum sleeping accommodation for these young people who, I believe, are doing the right thing. They are out to see their own country. Whether or not we agree with their way of life or with what they are doing, they love this country and have set out to see it and are proud of what they see. They may have some criticism, but they also have increased pride in their country. On the other hand, the first thing that older people think of when planning a holiday is to go abroad, and they are encouraged to do so by reduced fares on international charter flights.

This is something that might be considered when we are looking at the votes and expenditures of Air Canada, and the sort of suggestion that I have made could be followed with considerable advantage.

Rules governing chartered flights in Canada should be relaxed to encourage chartered flights at a reduced rate. Such rules should be separate from those that apply on international flights. There should be incentive air fares competitive as far as possible with those of overseas chartered flights.

I would also like to see more Canadian package tours, flights which would include not only the cost of the air ticket but also on occasion hotel accommodation and meals, a tourist package that would be attractive to Canadians.

Stimulation should be given to the building of motels and hotels wherever they are required, a stimulation which might flow from successful tourist promotion. I have no doubt in my own mind that if such tourist promotion took place, the provision of adequate accommodation would follow within a reasonable length of time.

It seems to me that provinces should get together to standardize their liquor and dining laws so that Canadians who travel from one province to another will not be confused, will not find on a given day one place "dry" and another "wet".

Honourable senators, it is the responsibility not only of Air Canada, the transportation services, and the federal Government, but also the provinces, cities, chambers of commerce, and all Canadians who want to see their country more closely knit, to encourage their fellow-Canadians to see their own country. This would not only be a good thing for Canada, but the results would show favourably on the balance sheet of Air Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robichaud, for Hon. Mr. Hastings, debate adjourned.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I move that we now adjourn during pleasure until 5.40 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products.

An Act respecting the consolidation of the Income Tax Act in the printed Roll of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

HON. PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

DELEGATE TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE IN VICTORIA, B.C.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that our leader is in Victoria as a delegate to the Federal-Provincial Conference. This explains his absence from the chamber tonight. I am sure we are all proud that the leader is participating in such an important conference, and we wish him well.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill incorporates and is the charter of a corporation to be known as the Canada Development Corporation. It is not a new name to any person in this Senate, and I would say there are few members of the public who in some way or another have not heard, either in fair terms or in bad, of discussion on the purpose of this Canada Development Corporation, because in various ways it has been a subject matter over the last eight years. Indeed, it moved so far ahead that I believe some years ago it was included in some form of reference in the Speech from the Throne.

During that period of time, of course, many organizations, having different objectives, have considered this proposed Canada Development Corporation, and have adopted it, or almost adopted it, and then suddenly turned away from it. I know those who so strongly promote the doctrine of economic nationalism at first welcomed this vehicle as affording an opportunity for repatriation of much of what they called "Canada's heritage" that had got into foreign hands. I think later it was recognized that this was not a suitable vehicle for this purpose, and would not lend itself to it at all, having regard to how the formulation of the plans was proceeding.

May I tell you just briefly and in a general way the purpose of this corporation, before I underline some of its provisions. As I said at the beginning, this bill is the charter of the Canada Development Corporation in the same fashion as the Bank Act is the charter of each and every one of the chartered banks. Therefore, whithin this statute one must find the authority and jurisdiction for whatever it is proposed that this corporation shall do. It will either be spelled out specifically, or you will find it by reference, adopting various provisions of other existing statutes. I am thinking particularly of various provisions of the Canada Corporations Act.

In this sense it will be found that it is a statutary corporation, that there is spelled out in some detail the objectives, the method of operation and all the other details that go with the creation of a viable corporation supposed to carry on the business specified in its objectives.

May I summarize the purpose in my own words? The purpose of the bill is to provide a pool of money for development in Canada of Canadian resources, without limitation in any specific direction, but including in some way the resource industry. The scheme of organization is that the pool of money ultimately would be very substantial. It may be one of the outstanding pools in size, if, as and when the objectives are achieved.

The Crown, the Government of Canada, in the first instance will be the contributor. The capital is to consist of 200 million common shares without nominal or par value, and preferred shares of $1 billion divided into an appropriate number of preferred shares having a range of par value from $5 to any multiple of $5 and up to $1,000 a share. There will be provision for issuing those preferred shares in series with various designations, some of these series carrying voting power in certain circumstances, others being non-voting.

The proposal is that the Government of Canada would subscribe in all for not more than $250 million in shares, which would be roughly 50 million of no par value common shares. In addition, there would be authority for the Government of Canada to advance up to but not in excess of $100 million by way of loans, so that not more than $100 million would be outstanding at any particular time. These advances could occur only after the completion of the share subscriptions by the Government.

One of the main purposes sought to be accomplished in this bill is that at no time will there be any opportunity for any group to obtain control. Obviously, in the beginning the share control will be entirely in the hands of the Government of Canada. When the corporation gets its house in order in connection with the ventures on which it is going to embark and is able to present a viable structure, such as might be attractive to the general public and as a result of which the general public might be invited to participate, ultimately, by means of the machinery in the bill, the holdings of the Government of Canada will be able to be reduced. Those holdings must never go below 10 per cent of the issued and outstanding voting shares of the corporation.

Another limiting provision is that no shareholder may purchase and own and hold an amount of voting shares greater than 3 per cent of the issued and outstanding voting shares of the corporation.

Later I will explain the machinery by way of redemption in which it is expected that, as the plans mature and this corporation does develop into the kind of corporation that is envisaged at this time, the Government holdings will abate, although they will never go down below the 10 per cent.

Having given that as the broad outline, I should add that initially the directors will be 18 in number. The company becomes incorporated on an application by 18 persons, who are designated by the Governor in Council, and any others who may thereafter become identified with the corporation as the Canada Development Corporation. Ultimately, it is expected that the number of directors will be 21.

When the permanent board is elected and the Government's shareholding in the corporation is of the order that I have described—and in fact at that time the Government of Canada will be its only shareholder—the Minister of Finance will have the choice either of designating four directors, who will then become directors of this corporation, or of taking his chances and voting his shares to select a board that is suitable to him.

So long as the Government holds in excess of 50 per cent of the voting shares, the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will become ex officio members of the board, but they will have no vote and they will be entitled to no remuneration. When the percentage holding of the Government in the voting shares of this corporation drops below 50 per cent, of course, their qualification disappears.

Honourable senators, this is a complex subject. I want to be sure that I give all the proper background, and I am sure you will bear with me if I take a moment or two to do so. I think I can say that this bill incorporates for the first time the principle of providing financing for the development of Canadian industry and for resource development in the terms of the objects set out in the bill other than through simple provision of money and guarantees by the Government of Canada.

Some here will remember a few years ago we dealt with legislation setting up a corporation called the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Under this legislation the Minister of Finance had considerable discretion in the way of direction and the provision of moneys and the giving of guarantees in connection with the financing of projects in the Maritime area, and particularly Cape Breton—I think I am right in that, Senator Macdonald—that would be in the best interests of regional development in that area. This resulted solely from the action of the Government. It is one case I know of where the Government gave certain guarantees as a result of which moneys were raised and used for the development or the expansion of such a project. Actually the Government was not called upon to provide any money itself. The guarantee was good enough to produce the credit, and the operation was feasible and viable enough to be able to take care of the servicing obligations and operate at a substantial profit.

This is a method of financing where the general public was not offered any opportunity for participation. There are a number of these projects across Canada that you can examine, and one that comes readily to mind is the Panarctic Oils operation which is mentioned in clause 39 of this bill as being one of the companies that may be sold by the Government of Canada; that is to say, the Government interest may be sold to the Canada Development Corporation. Panarctic Oils is a consortium of about 20 groupings, including major oil companies, but the Government of Canada holds a 45 per cent interest. This is a risk venture. I think it has now moved far enough that they are satisfied there is oil. I would expect that considerable work has yet to be done in extending and establishing such capacities that will justify development and movement of this oil to the market on a practicable basis.

This introduces another matter. This method would not involve any participation by the public. I could enumerate other situations in relation to some particular operation, perhaps the development of a utility where the Government has moved in and provided money for that purpose.

I do not know whether I am being a little theoretical in my thinking, but I have the feeling that when the Government of Canada embarks on enterprises of this kind, which are intended to promote and develop the economy and Canada's national interest, which are the motives expressed in the bill, it should participate in the equity of the operation.

We know that it is common procedure nowadays in financing that where money is provided by way of loan to develop a viable enterprise, the lender usually requires that there be some equity granted as a premium in addition to the service charge which the lender receives for the use of his money. I see no reason why, if that is the prevailing way of doing business in the market place, that should not be done by the Government when it is embarking on such enterprises which are in the national interest. They develop the economy of the country, and some portion of the rewards in the form of equity interest should be available whether the money is provided by the Government, individuals or banks.

Having laid the background, the next thing in our consideration of the bill is to provide for public participation. This is a worthwhile objective. The big problem, of course, is when will the development by the Canada Development Corporation be advanced to such a stage that it can attract public investment?

May I say that I favour the bill, not because I can say it will inevitably be successful but because it is a step in a direction that could very well be successful, dependent on proper management, direction, ability and know-how. The effect, if it is successful, would be to improve the economic growth of Canada, which is certainly something we need. There is opportunity here to accomplish that.

When, as a practical matter, can we look forward and say, "Now is the time when public participation should be attracted?" All we have to do is look at the set-up, which is that we will have $250 million of which the minister says $100 million will be contributed the first year and $75 million each of the following two years. In addition, we have the lending power which authorizes, following that period, loans up to $100 million.

As long as we have a major shareholder such as the Government of Canada participating financially almost to the exclusion of any other interest, we will not, in my view, develop something that will immediately be attractive to the investing public. The minister himself recognized that point in one of his recent statements—I believe during second reading—when he said:

> But, I would expect that the corporation would, for a variety of reasons, make investments with a wide range of risks. I would also expect that the price of CDC shares would fluctuate in the market reflecting the success of the investment policies of the corporation and the prevailing general economic environment. It will be important for share purchasers in the CDC as in other Canadian corporations to understand this risk.

Then comes this pertinent phrase:

> I do not anticipate that CDC shares will be offered to the public until the corporation has an operating record on which the public can judge it.

That is a fair, factual statement, because in the picture which I have outlined of this tremendous financial participation by the Government, there is nothing left until the corporation develops and creates its own attractiveness to invite public participation. Therefore, the portion of the bill which features public participation is one that will not, in my view, have any immediate effect. If I were asked, as an amateur, to estimate what the period might be, I would say that, barring some tremendous discovery so accessible that the time lag between discovery and production and earning is very short—and such discoveries have great glamour—it might well be in the range of from five to ten years before a viable structure could be produced which would be attractive to the general public. Some may say that is a long time to wait, but many people have waited much longer for things which turned out to be worth while. Let us remember that this corporation will have money to work with during that period. It will have the opportunity to become educated in the field in which it is operating, and if it adheres to the objectives and purposes which are stated, and which therefore are statutory and must be adhered to, the development must be in the national interest and must have the objective of profitability.

Between being aimed at the national interest and being aimed at profitability—and I realize that there is quite a gap, and nobody can underwrite that—with intelligent application I would expect that the point at which investments might be entered upon might be where progress related to production and earnings would be faster. Corporations going into the hinterlands of Canada where the major strikes and developments have been taking place in the resource industry have to carve out an area, supply power, build roads, schools and residences, and there is a long period before the stage of production is reached. However, there are developments which move along at that rate until they reach a point where they are about ready, with all their feasibility studies, et cetera, to go into the construction of mill capacity or other machine capacity, and at that time they need money. Certainly at that time the feasibility is more apparent. The studies then are likely to be more accurate, and I speak with some knowledge and experience on that subject, having gone through the whole uranium development in Ontario. I saw how this moved along from the stage of discovery, the stage of proving up, establishing the extent of area and probable quantities of the mineral. Then the question of chemistry arose, and what must be done to extract the uranium ore and what amount of money would be required. It was an entirely new ball game at that time and it was just as though no money had been spent up to that point. Here you were presented with the fruits of the discoveries and the quantities, within pretty accurate estimates, and the chemical content with which you had to deal. Then you had the figures of costs, which were fantastic, in order to bring this particular project into successful operation. As happened there, financing groups came in at that time and took over from those who had gone as far as they could but were unable to find the necessary financing for the next stage.

This is one way in which a corporation of this kind, with unlimited funds, might face up to a situation in the national interest and move in with a degree of profitability. Certainly the time lag between that stage and the stage of production and earnings would not be so great, and in that development, in building up that base for earnings, you would be building up against the day when the public might with some assurance be approached to subscribe for shares of this operation.

This is the theory behind this corporation. Certainly as long as the Government provides the major part of the financing it will in many of its aspects compare with what the Government has been doing to date in various fields of operation. But, in the course of doing it, it may well produce more in the way of earnings and attractiveness or enhanced value.

So, I say that even though this is, as I see it, a two-stage operation, we are sure of the first stage. We know that we will have so much money over a period of years. It is a difficult thing to spend in the national interest and with a degree of profitability, say, $250 million, and if you have reputable, responsible and knowledgeable people in charge of the operation, they are going to proceed very carefully. But they must have some sense of daring, or this program will not ultimately generate the interest required to attract the public to it. There is a speculative glamour that is essential to bringing the public into an operation of this kind.

I hope you do not regard this as a lecture in the field of economic development in Canada. I am simply discussing the subject in the light of my own experience and what appears to be the objective of the bill. The minister has said that this corporation will look to the future and not to the past. I am very happy about that, because I would not wish to support an operation of this type if its efforts, energy and money were to be devoted exclusively to the repatriation of Canadian operations presently owned by non-residents. I think Canada does benefit from those operations.

This corporation will provide a facility for creating other operations, similar in nature, in other areas. There is where that money should go, instead of bailing out people who have spent their money, who have improved the value of their operation. We should make our own developments, reap our own gain, make our own profits and keep them.

However, there is another practical side to it. It may be very interesting for representatives of the Canada Development Corporation to go around saying they have $250 million to buy this or that but if the non-resident who controls an operation in Canada is not interested in selling, there is no way you can make a deal, because there is no compulsion in this operation, and wisely so.

There, in a nutshell, is the concept. I could refer you to many of the statements made by the minister. As you would expect, this project has developed quite a head of steam and has produced a considerable amount of news releases and even, I would say, flowery language. But, if the enthusiasm does get into words and phrases of that kind, let us hope that it will be brought to bear on the most important aspect, which is the establishment and equipping of the corporation with the ability, genius and experience needed to handle such a project.

I am one who believes that there are Canadians who have the capacity and ability to do this job. Perhaps we do not recognize many of them. This may create such an opportunity, but if we do not have good men, men who are at the top of their professions in technology and know-how, whether it is industrial or otherwise, this thing is not going to succeed.

I should also tell you that there is power for this corporation to engage any part of its money in investments in going concerns. This requires very careful judgment. It is not intended, so the minister has said in his news releases, that the corporation would directly go in and assert a control position in cases where it acquires substantial financial interest in operating companies. That is wise, because the very reason the corporation would wish to buy a substantial interest in such an operation would be because it is successful or has greater opportunities for the future with more money and expansion. I expect they would have enough sense and judgment to know that if it is doing so well they should just let it continue in that direction. To the extent that here is information, knowledge or ability, they could assist, to be sure, but would not interrupt where there is a steady flow of genius in operation.

Having said that, which is more than I intended to say on this aspect when I started, I should tell you something about some of the provisions of the bill. I can tell you that mainly the design of the bill is to prevent the acquisition of control by any interests, and the shareholders are limited to Canadian citizens and residents of Canada, and Canadian citizens are eligible to be shareholders whether they reside in Canada or not. The directors must be Canadian citizens. This is an attempt to make it an all-Canadian enterprise. I had always felt that money had no nationality, that it spoke just its own language which was universal. Here there is no objection to non-residents subscribing for shares, but their subscription will have to be for non-voting preferred shares; that is the only type of security in which they can invest.

This may be far in the future, and my crystal ball may not see that far. Senator Beaubien's might see further, which causes him to think that it will be much further in the future before the corporation will achieve what it is intended to achieve. At least, it is a step in the right direction, and I am all for trying it. I believe the methods we have used so far to encourage economic growth have been all right in their own way and in their particular location, but they have been mainly regional in character, and I think it is now time to have a large base of operations, particularly when this seems to be the trend internationally. It is a trend we should follow, and this is a vehicle for that purpose. How successful it will be only time will tell.

I now turn to some of the provisions of the bill. There is a provision under which any person and an associate, or an incorporation, who acquires more than 3 per cent of the issued and outstanding voting shares of the corporation, can be required by the corporation to dispose of the excess. If he agrees to do so, that is fine, and the shares find their own market. If he does not agree to do so, then he is in contravention of the charter, and while he is in that position he cannot vote his shares and the corporation is in a position in which it can redeem them. However, there is no absolute obligation to redeem unless that situation has existed for 10 years, or there is some earlier period stipulated in the bylaws of the company to deal with that situation.

I should tell you, too, that there is provision for the redemption of common shares. In the Ontario Business Corporations Act there is now that provision. Certain protection is provided against the possibility of income tax being levied, because such redemption of common shares would be out of surplus, and certain sections of the Income Tax Act might provide for the application of income tax in relation to some part, and perhaps some significant part, of the price that was paid for the common shares at that time. An exception is made so that those provisions of the Income Tax Act do not apply. There is, of course, no provision concerning a capital gains tax, because we do not have a capital gains tax—although we may know very soon that there is one. As the bill now stands, while a person whose common shares are redeemed out of surplus may escape the application of provisions of the Income Tax Act, there is no assurance that he will not fall into the basket of capital gains tax if one comes along.

I also told you that there is provision for redemption or purchase for cancellation of shares of Her Majesty in the right of Canada in respect of the excess of those shares above 10 per cent.

I am just hitting the high spots here, because it is intended that this bill shall go to committee, and honourable senators will get all the detail they want there.

When preferred shares and common shares are redeemed or purchased for cancellation the paid up capital is, of course, reduced, but the authorized capital is not reduced. The bill provides that those shares can be reissued within that same capital structure.

I should also tell you that notwithstanding any alteration in the capital or the objectives of the company, which is approved by the required vote of shareholders and directors, an application must be made for letters patent to provide for that, and before letters patent can be issued a resolution of approval must be passed by each House of Parliament. It can be seen that this is another measure of control to prevent the character of this corporation from being altered at any time in the future by some person who might, by some method or other, get into a position where he could secure the necessary approval of the board of directors to do this. In other words, Parliament will have the last chance to say, "No, you must follow your original base". This is a step in the right direction, once you accept the principle that this is a statutory body and it must stay within the limits defined in the statute.

Moving on, I should tell you that two schedules are made part of this bill. They will, therefore, be part of the corporation's charter. They describe the method of arriving at the net asset value of the voting shares, and matters of that kind. These are complicated provisions, and I would not dare attempt to analyze them here tonight, otherwise the attendance might quickly get down to a bare quorum. When the bill is before the committee we shall have available a chartered accountant who has been working on it, and who will give a succinct explanation of these schedules.

I have deliberately passed over a number of provisions, such as those concerning borrowing, the powers of directors, transfer offices and that sort of thing, because this is what is usually expected in the formation of a corporation. While there are a few features of this corporation that are a little different, in the main they run the same course. For instance, if shares are presented for transfer, the company has the right to demand a declaration from the person presenting them that he is the beneficial owner, and that he is not associated with anybody else, before the transfer is made. This is necessary because if he is not the beneficial owner and he presents them, he is then in contravention of the act. While he sits with his shares, which the company may redeem, he cannot vote in respect of them, or he may have a combined holding that is in excess of 3 per cent of the issued and outstanding voting shares, which again is in contravention of the act.

Honourable senators, having said all that, I should like to add that I have prepared a memorandum which analyzes all the provisions in relation to the redemption of shares. I do not propose to read it, but I wonder if the Senate would agree to having it included in my remarks at this point. It would be a very handy source of reference because I have gathered from various parts of the bill all the pertinent provisions in relation to the redemption of shares and purchase for cancellation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this memorandum be added to the remarks of the honourable Senator Hayden?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The memorandum is as follows:)

Various Provisions for Redemption of Preferred and Common Shares in Bill C-219:

1. By section 21, page 15, voting shares held in contravention of the charter may be redeemed for cancellation at the option of the company after 60 days' notice if no correcting action has been taken. What is included in the expression "shares held in contravention of the charter" will be found in section 34, pages 23 and 24.

If the contravention consists of the holding of voting shares by a shareholder and an associate of a number of shares in excess of 3 per cent of the issued and outstanding voting shares, then notice may be given by the company requiring the voting shares in excess of the 3 per cent mentioned above, to be disposed of within a period being not less than 60 days as may be set out in the notice. If no disposition has been made in accordance with the notice, the company may redeem the shares for cancellation at its sole option. However, on page 16, by subsection (4) of section 21, the shareholder and associates are required to dispose of the excess number of shares out of those last acquired. However, the shareholder and associates may, by agreement, notify the company that they are disposing of the number of shares constituting the excess, and this shall be sufficient compliance if done with the notice. Procedures are also provided generally in respect of the action by the company in the event that the shareholder does not act on the notice requiring disposition of excess holdings.

The price to be paid on the redemption of voting shares is as follows: in respect of the preferred shares, the par value thereof, in respect of common shares, the lesser of the issue price on the initial issue of shares of the company (see section 9 subsection (4), page 7, as to initial issue) and the closing sale price on a principal stock exchange on the business day preceding the notice of redemption. If no sale on that day, then the average of the closing asked and closing bid price on that business day; and if no bid price and no asked price quoted for that day, the last closing sale price on the exchange before that business day. This is really a case of compulsory redemption.

2. Preferred shares may be issued subject to redemption or purchase for cancellation out of capital or surplus—the price to be not more than the par value plus accrued and unpaid dividends, if any, and a premium of not more than 20 per cent of such par value. (See section 22, page 18.)

Common shares: The company may purchase for cancellation any such shares or fraction of its common shares out of surplus. A special resolution of the Board is required in order to carry out such redemption. (See page 23, re Income Tax Act)

3. Redemption Purchase and Re-Issue. See Section 25, pages 18 and 19. Shares of any class redeemed or purchased for cancellation or surrendered, upon being converted into or exchanged for other shares of the company, shall cease to be issued and outstanding, and the number of such issued and outstanding shares of that class and the paid up capital of the company shall be reduced accordingly. However, such shares remain part of the authorized capital and are restored to the status of unissued shares and may be re-issued by the company.

Re-issue of shares: Common shares re-issued as above shall rank pari passu with the common shares then issued and outstanding, and the amount of the paid-up capital shall be increased accordingly.

Preferred shares re-issued shall rank pari passu with preferred shares then issued and outstanding, subject to their issuance in one or more series, and at such designation, etc., as may be prescribed by bylaw under section 9, subsection (1)(b). Again, the amount of paid-up capital will be increased by such re-issue.

4. Federal Government participation and extent and condition of the holding of shares by Her Majesty in the Right of Canada: Her Majesty in the Right of Canada may purchase and hold shares of the company, but purchases in excess of 10 per cent of the total number of issued and outstanding voting shares are subject to conditions more particularly set out in section 36, at page 24, and more particularly subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c). Where the holding of issued and outstanding voting shares exceeds 10 per cent, the company may, at its sole option, redeem for cancellation the excess over 10 per cent, or an amount less than the total excess, at the net asset value of the shares redeemed. The net asset value is to be determined by the provisions contained in Schedule II to Bill C-219, starting at page 36, in sections 1 and 4 thereof.

Unless there is agreement between the company and the Minister of Finance, no shares of the company shall be purchased, owned or held by Her Majesty in the Right of Canada other than shares acquired by or on behalf of Her Majesty directly from the company by purchase, dividend or otherwise.

The price to be paid on the redemption of common shares acquired from the Government of Canada, by redemption as outlined above, shall not be less than the average price paid by the Government of Canada for those shares. This requirement, however, may be waived where the net asset value of the common shares is less than the average price paid by the Government and has been less than that value for a period of at least twelve months.

5. Disposal of shares acquired by the Government of Canada under section 35, subsection (1)(b), representing the unsubscribed shares not disposed of in any underwriting, may be disposed of by the Government of Canada in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of purchase of the unsubscribed shares.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, there are a few closing remarks I wish to make. I should like to sound a word of caution.

Profit motive and the national interest are the keynotes in the bill and the guidelines to be observed. These are worthy objects, but are they not the motives that spur and inspire commercial operations in Canada even now? Failure to be guided by such motives is the sure and fast way to bankruptcy. This is the only sensible basis on which the operations of the Canada Development Corporation or, in fact, any other commercial enterprise can be maintained on the national scale.

Even within such guidelines mistakes can be made. Feasibility can be improperly assessed. Market trends can change. Management can be inefficient, and costs can escalate. Lack of resourcefulness in such event will defeat the best plans and the firmest resolve, and down comes the structure conceived in high hope and put into operation with paeans of praise.

The Canada Development Corporation must face this resolutely. It will not spring into full and successful operation when the signal "to get going" is given.

Experience and understanding must be at hand. The availability of Government funds is no guarantee of success. Risks will have to be taken as part of the job, but a balance will have to be achieved in the different areas of operations to maintain a viable structure.

The news releases and the flowery language used to describe this new creature, the CDC, are no guarantees of success. All the bill does is provide a vehicle with initial assured substantial finances and high hopes of success, including the expectation that the general public will be attracted by some speculative glamour that the early operations may generate and will come in with their money. The shares will be subject to market play.

The shares can go down as well as up. The profitability may not stand out so clearly at times. Other glamour stocks and situations may take the public fancy at times. It is a plodding road to assured income and investment yield to make such shares attractive on that basis.

The bill aims at developing economic growth. That is a worthwhile objective, and on that note perhaps we should spur it on its way. The Lord knows we do have need for large doses of that commodity.

Let us make a frank impersonal assessment of areas of operation. Harnessing the national interest and profitability is no mean accomplishment. The stakes are so great, in moneys to be available even before the public is invited in, that undue pressures of every kind to get ahead will exist and must be resisted, within reason. Resolve, ample finances and good business judgment, hand in hand with the best ability in scientific and technological fields—that is what is needed. Money itself can be used unwisely. Whether the objective is resource development or manufacturing enterprises, or investment in existing large successful Canadian corporate operations or, indeed, investment outside Canada, there must be the strongest, most resourceful and intelligent guidance.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary, debate adjourned.

AIR CANADA

MOTION TO REFER ANNUAL REPORT TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cameron, seconded by the Honourable Senator Boucher:

That the Standing Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Hédard Robichaud: Honourable senators, may I bring to the attention of the house what appears to be a printing error in this item on the Order Paper? I recall moving on Thursday last the adjournment of the debate on this motion on behalf of Senator Hays. Therefore, I ask that this order stand in the name of Senator Hays, unless some honourable senator wishes to speak now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this motion now stands adjourned in the name of honourable Senator Hays?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED BANK OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Hédard Robichaud moved the second reading of Bill S-22, to incorporate United Bank of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, from time to time the Senate and the House of Commons are asked to enact legislation to incorporate banks which are thereafter authorized to carry on business under the terms and conditions specified within the Bank Act. By the acceptance and passing of such a bill the new bank that is incorporated is added to Schedule A of the Bank Act, and it becomes a body politic and corporate, subject to the provisions of the Bank Act which was assented to on March 23, 1967.

There are now ten chartered banks in Canada, most of which are owned by a large number of individual Canadian shareholders. While the majority of these banks have held banking charters for many years, two new banks, the Mercantile Bank of Canada and the Bank of British Columbia, have been established in recent years. Each Canadian chartered bank has a network of branches, and some networks extend from coast to coast. By the end of 1969 the banks operated a total of 6 012 branches in Canada. This may seem to be a large number of branches, but one should remember that these banks must service an area of close to four million square miles, the second largest country in the world, and a total of close to 20 million deposit accounts.

In addition to providing deposit accounts, the chartered banks offer their customers a wide variety of other services, including facilities for investing in stocks and bonds, safekeeping of valuables and, what many of us may have reason to be more familiar with, the granting of loans for a variety of purposes and various periods of time. There is no need for me to elaborate further on the kinds of service provided by Canadian banks both in Canada and abroad. One should note, however, that Canadian banks account for 60 per cent or more of the total assets of all Canadian financial intermediaries and remain the most important financial institutions in Canada.

Bill S-22 constitutes an act to incorporate a new chartered bank to be known as United Bank of Canada and, in French, Banque Unie du Canada. It is a short bill, comprising only three clauses in all. It was drafted exactly as required and specified by section 8 of the Bank Act, which covers the incorporation and organization of banks. Its wording complies with Schedule B of the said Act. The bill was introduced for first reading following a petition which I presented to the Senate on Wednesday, June 9, 1971.

A pertinent question which might occur at this time is what has prompted the promoters of this bill to proceed with the incorporation of a new bank. First, it might be logical to admit and to recognize that there is nothing in the Canadian Constitution which would prevent a group such as the promoters and provisional directors of this proposed corporation from applying for the passing of an act permitting them to incorporate a new chartered bank in Canada.

It is felt in many quarters that the main promoter of this vast undertaking, B.V. Levinter, a lawyer and farmer by profession and a long-time resident of the Toronto area, may have been influenced in his decision by a speech delivered some eight or ten months ago by an ex-Minister of Finance for Canada, the Hon. Walter Gordon, in which he asked his audience why Canadian ethnic communities had made so little impact on the financial world. Without wanting to blame anyone, Mr. Levinter recognized this fact and began to think about what could be done. He decided he could be the one to do something about it. With a warning from his experienced father that the task of establishing a new bank was not easy, a determined "Bunny" Levinter made up his mind that what may have been considered a mere dream in the past could today become a reality.

When some few months ago I was asked to sponsor this bill in this chamber I was somewhat taken by surprise. My first reaction was to present Mr. Levinter with a copy of the Bank Act and to ask him to read it carefully before meeting again to discuss the proposal. Very few days had passed before I received a further call from Toronto confirming the decision to proceed with the incorporation of a bank giving representation to all groups of ethnic communities. Mr. Levinter, the promoter, made it clear that he was not blaming existing banks for the lack of interest on the part of such groups. He also added that he opposed segregation of any group in any field of activity, and he firmly rejected suggestions that this bank should be recognized as strictly an ethnic bank. This bank, says Mr. Levinter, should be an all-Canadian bank. In other words, it must be a bank where all communities will be welcomed and invited to participate.

As a result, we have before us a bill naming as provisional directors, in addition to Mr. Benjamin Levinter, Q.C., and his father, Isadore Levinter, Q.C., the following persons: Mr. Zenon Gutkowski, a Toronto chartered accountant of Polish origin, Mr. Adiuto John Pianosi, a prominent resident of Copper Cliff who has succeeded in the building trade, has served on the Board of Regents of the University of Sudbury and is a life member of the Royal Canadian Legion, and, finally, Dr. Gerald LaSalle, B.A., M.D., D.H.A.

[Translation]

Dr. LaSalle is a well known figure in the Province of Quebec, especially among the medical profession of that province and of Canada as a whole. It is interesting to note that Dr. LaSalle will chair the next International Congress-on-the-Sea to be held in St. Malo, France, in 1972. The provisional directors of this proposed corporation which I have listed bear unequivocal testimony to the sincerity and determination of these distinguished people in their approach of the difficult and complex task of setting up a new chartered bank in Canada.

As I mentioned earlier, these provisional directors are clearly determined to set up a new bank with a $20 million capitalization; the majority of directors would come from the widest possible variety of ethnic groups. In other words, the promoter of this project and his associates wish to attract the greatest possible number of Canadians from all walks of life, whether of English, French or some other ethnic origin, to take part in the industrial, economic and financial development of Canada, their country.

As mentioned in clause 3 of the bill now before us, the authorized capital stock of the bank would be $20 million divided into shares having a par value of $5 each.

[English]

Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier, in order to incorporate a new bank a special act of incorporation is required by section 8 of the Bank Act in the form of Schedule B of that act. In respect of the information to be provided in the act of incorporation, the Bank Act stipulates: (a) the authorized capital of the bank shall be not less than $1 million (Section 9); (b) shares shall have a par value of one dollar or any multiple thereof, not exceeding ten dollars (Section 9); (c) the number of provisional directors shall be not less than five (Section 10); (d) minimum share subscription by provisional directors shall be as set out in section 10(2); (e) at least three-quarters of the provisional directors shall be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada.

I can assure honourable senators that all the provisions or requirements I have just outlined have been met in full in Bill S-22.

The organization of the new bank, when incorporated, will be proceeded with as set out in sections 11 to 13 of the Bank Act. The founding members of the proposed United Bank of Canada are familiar with these requirements. It is their intention to proceed accordingly in order to meet the requirements in support of their application for Governor in Council approval to commence business. This will be done when their bill has received parliamentary approval.

Honourable senators, I have placed before you the concept of Bill S-22, and I repeat that I am fully convinced that this bill meets all the requirements of the Bank Act as they apply to the incorporation of a new bank. It has been stated that Canada must be the only country in the world where such a move seems audacious. I hope that it is not so, simply because of the ethnic origin of the promoters. Such a thought alone would be contrary to the earnest desire of all worthy Canadians, that is to promote a united nation, a nation where people from all kinds of backgrounds, of all races and religions can work together for Canada.

Canada may have the soundest, safest and strongest banking system in the world, but should it be a system of such entrenched solidity that any change in its structure, any proposal for entry of a new member into the club should seem revolutionary? I do not believe so; otherwise the provisions of the Bank Act would not be such as to allow the introduction of a bill as we now have before this house for deliberation.

Honourable senators, there should be no question, not even among the chartered banks themselves, that the Canadian financial system can benefit from new people, perhaps by new approaches and particularly from new competition. Bill S-22 commends itself for your support, and when it receives second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robichaud, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1972, which was presented on Thursday, June 10.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved that the report be adopted.

Report adopted.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the second reading of the Bill S-17, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act".—(Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.).

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, honourable Senator Benidickson has asked leave to adjourn this debate until June 22; that is, of course, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak on it in the meantime.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there any other honourable senator who would like to speak on this Order? Is it agreed that this Order shall stand until June 22?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 16, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM 1971

PROJECTS SUBMITTED BY BOY SCOUTS OF CANADA—QUESTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Government Leader for some information in connection with the Opportunities For Youth Program 1971. Putting them as briefly as possible, my questions are as follows:

(1) Is it correct to say that approximately $23.4 million has been allocated already out of a total grant of $24.7 million?

(2) Have any of the 2,300 projects apparently approved included any of those submitted by the Boy Scouts of Canada?

(3) Does the Government consider that this, the oldest and largest responsible boys' organization, is not as worthy of support as some of the hippy and activist groups already supported?

(4) Could the Deputy Government Leader explain to this chamber why the submissions of March 1971 of the Boy Scouts of Canada to the Department of the Secretary of State suggesting 116 projects covering 10 provinces, for the total value of $185,000 and involving 180 boys for the benefit of 12,000 other boys, did not even receive the courtesy of an acknowledgement?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, since this very important question requires meticulous research, and in view of the fact that I have had no notice of it, may I take this as notice?

PUBLIC BILLS

MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that from now until and including June 30, 1971, Rules 44(1)(f) and 45(1)(b) and 45(1)(c) be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Some Hon. Senators: Explain.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I have a chance to put the question, because it is a debatable motion. Has the honourable Senator Langlois leave to proceed with his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, this motion is made under Rule 3 of the Rules of the Senate. It is made in consideration of the fact that we are nearing that point in the session when we will adjourn for the summer recess. I understand that an agreement has been reached in the other place that this adjournment will take place not later than noon on June 30. In the past this motion for suspension of certain rules has been considered a routine motion at this stage of the session, in order not to delay important Government bills which must receive royal assent before the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Would you explain the effect of the motion?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The motion has the effect of cancelling the two day's notice required for second reading of public bills—

Some Hon. Senators: Any bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —under Rule 44(1)(f), and restricting that rule, by this motion, to private bills; and also to do away with the one day's notice required under Rule 45 for third reading and any substantial amendment to a bill reported by a committee.

This is the only purpose of the motion. It is limited to public bills; and it is limited in duration from now to the adjournment of this present session.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the motion made by the Leader of the Government, but I would like to know the effect of the suspension of Rule 44 in connection with the second reading of a bill. Does it mean that second reading could be moved instantly without one day's notice? It seems to me that this may be going a little too far; we should have at least one day's notice. I am not sure I heard the motion correctly, but it seems to me that its effect would be to dispense even with one day's notice in the case of a motion for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I think the interpretation put on my motion by the honourable Leader of the Opposition is correct. Perhaps I should have mentioned that I had the occasion to discuss my motion with him earlier this morning, but I could not agree to his suggestion that instead of seeking the approval of the present motion, which has the effect of suspending paragraph (f) of Rule 44(1) and paragraphs (b) and (c) of Rule 45(1), there should have been an amendment to do away with two day's notice for the second reading of bills. I was advised that this could not be done under Rule 3, which reads as follows:

3. Any rule, or part thereof, may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended being distinctly stated.

I was advised that this rule could not be used to amend an existing rule, and I was very reluctant to propose to the Senate the amendment, even on a temporary basis, of a rule of the Senate without first seeking the advice of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. Our Rules Committee has been active and has done a tremendous job in up-dating our rules, and I was reluctant to propose an amendment to any of the rules, even on a temporary basis, without consulting that committee. I do not think Rule 3 gave me this opportunity in any event. Moreover, in the past this has been a routine motion at this stage of the session, and so we are not breaking any new ground now. I am just seeking the co-operation of this house for the early dispatch of public business before the adjournment which is proposed for Wednesday, June 30.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have followed the argument of the Leader of the Government, but when he refers to Rule 3, which says that "Any rule, or part thereof, may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate,..." that is exactly what he is asking. He is asking leave. In the first place we have given the leader leave to present his motion to suspend a rule. In the second place, if we adopt the motion, we are suspending the rule for the remainder of the session, or until June 30 to be precise.

I do not see why, in asking the Senate to order the suspension of Rules 44(1)(f) and 45(1)(b) and 45(1)(c) until and including June 30, we could not add the words, "except that for second reading of a bill one day's notice shall be given".

I would suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government that he amend his motion to add the words: "except that for second reading of a bill one day's notice shall be given". This is an order of the house. We can certainly do it without any difficulty at all, and I do not see any problem of procedure in amending the resolution in the way I have suggested.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has touched the point that I had made earlier, to the effect that Rule 3 did not permit the amendment of a rule without notice. Rule 3 deals only with the suspension of the application of a rule.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It means the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, it does not. Amendment and suspension are different things, to my mind. As I said earlier, I discussed this matter this morning with the honourable Leader of the Opposition. I sought advice on his suggestion and I was advised to the contrary. That is why I have proceeded with my original proposal, to seek the suspension of Rules 44(1)(f) and 45(1)(b) and (c) to and including June 30. As I told the honourable Leader of the Opposition this morning, if I did not get leave to proceed this afternoon, it could be taken as notice and consideration could be proceeded with at tomorrow's sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We should not mix the problems up. The honourable leader has had leave to present his motion. What I was suggesting is a very simple matter. I just want to ensure that we be given one day's notice of second reading of a bill from now until the end of the session. If leave is asked at any time to dispense with this one day's notice, I have no doubt it will be given in due course. However, I do not want the Senate to be taken by surprise. It is not a question of procedure or of the rules; it is a question of accommodation. The honourable the Leader knows that I am quite willing to accommodate the Government and the Senate at any time, especially the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the Leader of the Government for clarification? We are not discussing what is to happen between now and the end of the session; we are talking about a motion made in the other place to deal with the period up to the adjournment of this session on June 30. As I understand it, we are not asking for a suspension of these rules until the end of this session.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My motion is clear. It covers the period from now until and including June 30. It is quite clear that it is not concerned with the balance of this session.

Hon. Donald Smith: I wonder if I might add a word to what the honourable leader has just said? I am sympathetic with the views expressed by Senator Flynn, and I think if I were sitting on the other side I should be inclined to make the suggestion he is making now. I do not wish to lecture the house, because I am aware that many honourable senators are more knowledgeable about the rules than I am. However, I would point out that, even with a suspended rule, there could be at least 24 hours' notice, so that the Senate could not be taken by surprise by the presentation of a bill. In other words, with the suspension of this rule it would be possible for the sponsor of a bill to move second reading and give his explanation of the bill without 24 hours' notice. Then it would be up to the honourable the Leader of the Opposition or to any other honourable senator to adjourn the debate in order to have adequate time before speaking. In this sense he would not be taken by surprise.

I think it might be useful to point out that during this present pre-recess period we shall have, for the first time in many years, more time to consider and to discuss fully the legislation which will be coming before us, because of the way in which the work in the other place is being scheduled. There they will be discussing the budget speech for quite a number of days while all the legislation we will have to deal with will be here. My own view is that we do not really need suspension of the rule, but one never knows what will happen and in case we should have to deal with something on an emergency basis, it is suggested that we should now dispense with this two days' notice. Honourable senators, I hope that what I have said has been helpful.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall be quite satisfied if the honourable the Leader of the Government tells us that he will proceed in the manner indicated by Senator Smith, and I would withdraw any objection under those circumstances. However, if it is not necessary for the motion to be passed today, why could we not adopt it tomorrow when the leader will be in a position to tell us what pieces of legislation will come before us prior to adjournment, and which of these items the Government considers essential to be passed by the house before June 30?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I thought I had already opened the door to the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Opposition. I did so when I gave him an undertaking this morning to provide him with a list of those bills for which royal assent will be required before adjournment. This undertaking still stands. I have already received a list and, subject to the possibility of discussing it between now and tomorrow with the house leader in the other place, it is my intention to put before Senator Flynn tomorrow morning the said list of bills for which royal assent will be required before adjournment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that the Leader of the Opposition wishes to adjourn the debate on the motion until tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I wonder if the Leader of the Government has satisfied himself that he has accomplished his purpose if he does not include also leave to suspend Rule 78(4)?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I should have liked the honourable senator to have explained more fully what he meant by his question. Rule 78(4) reads:

> When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion

I have limited my motion to public bills and not to reports from any committee on any other matter. My motion is limited to the introduction, second and third reading of public bills and substantial amendments thereto. I think this should answer my honourable friend's query.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My understanding is that the Leader of the Government is asking for suspension of Rule 45(1)(c) which is:

> for any substantial amendment to a bill reported by a committee;

If this is so, I would think that he would also wish to consider the situation where a bill is reported without amendment and the honourable senator reporting the bill is then required to move that it be taken into consideration on a future day.

[Hon. Mr. Smith.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, my motion is very simple in its language. It reads:

> That from now until and including June 30, 1971, Rules 44(1)(f) and 45(1)(b) and 45(1)(c) be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is that "Rule 45 (b) and (c)"?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, (b) and (c).

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Leader of the Government may be simplifying the procedure where there is a substantial amendment to a bill, but where a committee reports a bill without amendment he may find that there is a delay of at least a day. I am only trying to be helpful. To reduce the problem to its simplest terms, it means that if a bill comes before us with a substantial amendment, under Rule 45(1)(c) it can be dealt with right away, but if it comes before us without a substantial amendment it cannot, under the rules, be dealt with the same day. I would imagine that the Leader of the Government would require that a report without amendment from a committee should be dealt with without delay.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I think that my honourable friend is confused in the application of Rule 78(4) which, to my mind, deals for the major part with the report of a bill without amendment. Rule 45(1)(c), the application of which I am asking this house to do away with, provides that one day's notice shall be given for the introduction of any substantial amendment to a bill reported by a committee.

We are discussing two different matters. I agree with the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition that consideration of this motion should be deferred until tomorrow, when further explanation, if needed, can be given.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps the Government Leader would give consideration to my suggestion, that the same expedition should be given a bill reported without amendment as will be given to one reported with amendment if this motion is adopted.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, last evening Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) very courteously asked me if I would have any objection to his putting two questions to Senator Hayden before I resumed the debate. I agree to that, and I hope he will put the questions.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I thank Senator O'Leary. However, I have put my questions to Senator Hayden, and I will do so again in committee.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, last evening I listened with great care, as any sensible person would, to Senator Hayden while he explained the provisions and purposes of this bill. I say that I listened with great care, as any sensible person would, because Senator Hayden is an acknowledged power in simplifying the complex and in casting light upon cloudy legislation. I must say though, I hope without offence, that I did not think that last evening he was at his best. This may be due to the fact that some bills come to this house which defy simplification or adequate explanation, and this is one of them.

Senator Hayden told us a great deal regarding the technical details and structure of this bill. However, what he did not even attempt to tell us is what this corporation can do at this particular time. He did not even tell us why this bill is brought before us at this particular time. The proposal to create a Canada Development Corporation was contained in the Speech from the Throne in 1963, eight years ago. Arthur Meighen, once a glory of this house, said that the worst fate he could fear for a project dear to his heart would be that some day it might get into a Liberal platform. I am sure that were he here at this time he would say that had he a project dear to his heart the worst he could fear for it would be that one day it might get into a Liberal Speech from the Throne.

This project has had eight years of gestation. What this Government needs, among many other things, is a legislative fertility drug. Why this delivery now? Is this bill presented only as a discretionary tactic, something to appease our pathological economic nationalists, or something to bamboozle our word-intoxicated academics in the groves of Academe, and the remnant of those who appeared a few years ago wanting to "buy back Canada"?

This nation, honourable senators, is distressed and oppressed by urgent, desperate things. It is oppressed by unemployment, a degrading thing and, in fact, a sin against humanity. It is oppressed by mounting inflation, hardship, and misery for millions. On top of these we have the urgent problems of pollution, ecology, and environment. Will this bill cope successfully with any of these problems? Will it create a single job? Will it ease this terrible growth in prices which, as we have seen only this week, is continuing. Will it deal with the great and pressing world problems of ecology? Is it even going to try to deal with regional disparities? Not a word, not a line, not a paragraph in this bill tells or indicates that this Canada Development Corporation is going to deal with what happens in the Atlantic provinces, or even in my native Gaspé. Not even that incredible Pollyanna, the Minister of Finance, claims that it will. Not even Senator Hayden, in his measured language, pretends that it is going to deal with any of those problems. The best he can do is to repeat a favourite phrase of the late Mr. Asquith. He says: "Wait and see, wait and see; there is nothing I can tell you now about what this bill is going to do. I can say what it hopes to do, but I cannot tell you that it is going to do these things."

So we are to wait four years, five years, or perhaps ten years. I have to say to my distinguished and honourable friend that the wind has taken on for me a pensive note at this time. I cannot afford to wait five on ten years, and I cannot get excited over sunshine for my grandchildren.

Another question with which Senator Hayden did not deal and about which the country is wondering—I hope it is wondering, as I hope every member of this house is wondering, about this—is: Who is going to control the operations of this corporation? He says that the Government will not control them, which is about the best news regarding this bill that I have heard. After all there is in this country such an institution as Parliament. It may be, although I am not sure of it, that the Government, starting off this corporation with 18 of its own directors, with its own president, chairman of the board, and an investment of some $250 million, will not seek to control the corporation. However, I doubt it. But what about Parliament? Is Parliament to put up $250 million, and later on perhaps $1 billion, and say that it has lost control, or does not care about control, of the public purse?

Last night my honourable friend said that he was presenting this bill as a charter for this corporation, and he likened it to the charters of the chartered banks. I was surprised to hear him say that. He is a director of a great bank in this country. Surely he knows that our chartered banks are under government supervision and control to a certain extent. He knows all about the Bank Act, and he knows that there are inspectors of banks. Are there to be inspectors for this corporation? How are we to know what they are doing?

So far as I can see, there is no provision in this bill for even an annual report. There is no provision for any of the superintendence that we exercise over our crown corporations. The Canadian National Railway comes to Parliament each year to give an account of its stewardship, as does the CBC. It is true that you cannot always understand what they are driving at, and that there are things they conceal, but at least the principle of parliamentary control is asserted. These crown corporations, these emanations of the Crown which take up vast sums of public money, must come to Parliament and tell Parliament what is being done with this money. This is a cardinal principle of our whole parliamentary set-up. It is incredible that in the bill to establish such a corporation as this, which will control hundreds of millions of dollars of public money, there is not a single provision to compel the directors to come and tell us what is happening to the money. Surely, this is unacceptable in a parliamentary country.

To liken these people to our chartered banks does violence to reality. Our chartered banks, like our insurance companies, are all under state supervision, and in some measure under state control, as are most of our crown corporations. At least, they all make annual reports to Parliament, and Parliament is in some position to examine and, if necessary, criticize their operations. But in this case not a thing is provided whereby the public of Canada and the Parliament of Canada will know what is happening to the hundreds of millions of dollars that these people are given to spend.

What is this corporation going to do? Is it going to provide a single job in Canada? Does anybody suppose that this corporation will do anything to alleviate unemployment? Does anyone suppose that within a reasonably foreseeable time this corporation is going to deal with inflation? Then, what is the use of it? I ask again: Is this merely an appeasement of our economic nationalists? Is this an appeasement of those, or the remnants of those, who in the old days supported Mr. Walter Gordon? If my friend says yes, then this is not the bill he explained to us last evening. If he says no, then why do we have the bill at all?

Again, why at this time? This country, as I said a moment ago, is in the throes of desperate trouble, which may be caused by world conditions, or by conditions in our great neighbour to the south. While this Government apparently, so far as we can find out, has nothing in view to deal with these terrible problems they bring along this bill, and there is a wide area of public wonderment about what the bill is and why it is being brought in at this time.

The bill speaks of profitability and at the same time "benefit for Canada." How does this corporation propose to reconcile profitability and benefit for Canada? Are the two things compatible? Will the people directing this organization feel they are compatible? A certain gentleman in the United States said a few years ago that what was good for General Motors was good for the United States. Are these people going to tell us that what they decide to do with our money will be good for Canada; that profitability, if they get any, will be good for Canada? This is a question that I am sure the people of this country are asking. If they are not asking it, they should be.

There is a score of questions that could be asked about this bill, but it is going to committee, and I suppose that is the place to ask questions. I hope those questions will be asked.

At the close of his statement last evening my honourable friend, in a very eloquent passage, said that, after all, the test of this corporation was going to be in men, in people. He said the success or failure of this venture is going to depend on the men who administer it. I agree with that. But surely that casts upon the government of the day a heavy responsibility in selecting the men who will administer it. They are going to appoint, to begin with, 18 directors. They appoint the chairman, and they appoint the president. Let me just interject that inspired voices tell me that the president is going to be Mr. Marshall Crowe.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Who?

[Hon. Mr. O'Leary.]

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Mr. Marshall Crowe. If that is true, it is the only good thing I have heard about this bill. This is a man of experience, capacity, and distinction. But will one man of capacity prevail over 18 others who may have no capacity?

I am not a suspicious person, but I have no faith in this Government's appointing men, on the basis of capacity, to run this corporation. I wonder if the appointments to this board will be of the type that was made a few weeks ago, when a defeated Liberal candidate in the Province of New Brunswick, a man without business or even legal experience, was appointed to the very heavy responsibility of chairman of the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission. When you witness that sort of thing, then you have to ask yourself: Can this Government be trusted with the appointment to this corporation of the 18 men who will begin its operations?

Now I must say that no one who feels for Canada can want this corporation to fail, but I am afraid that the beginning practically invites failure.

I end by trusting that the hopes of my friend expressed last night are better grounded than my fears.

Hon. Nelson Rattenbury: Honourable senators, I should like to reply to my honourable friend, Senator O'Leary. I have always held him in the very highest esteem since I became a member of this chamber, but when he chooses to bring out by name a dedicated Canadian in the manner in which he did, I think he is lowering himself. Great Canadians have been defeated by the public, but not necessarily personally. Mr. Robichaud was not defeated. His government was defeated, but he himself was re-elected, and chose to retire later.

I will not go too deeply into the honourable senator's other remarks about the bill, but he made reference to banks and supervision by the Government. Surely he does not infer that they should report to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I did not say that, or infer it.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: You inferred they were under the supervision of the Government.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is right, and they are.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Perhaps you would object to newspapers also being put under the same kind of supervision?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You do not want to read anything, and you do not want to see anything.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I do read a lot.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You show no signs of it.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I think you choose to forget that the purpose is to hand the corporation over to the public. This is the purpose implied by Senator Hayden last evening. I think he mentioned a term of five years. It is not a crown corporation in this respect. I think the purposes of the bill would be defeated if the corporation had to come like a child every year before Parliament to report on its doings—and perhaps on its shortcomings. Many businesses have been promoted and started which have not necessarily succeeded. This is one method, and I think it is a good one. I speak as a businessman. The unemployed, which the honourable senator also mentioned, can be helped by the passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I have said what I have said and it will stand, unrevised and unrepentant.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That was your speech, Senator Rattenbury?

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, my remarks will be brief on this bill. Like all my colleagues, last evening I listened to a very able presentation by probably the most capable corporation lawyer not only in this house but in Canada. The honourable senator Hayden indicated his support for this bill, but listening to him carefully, and reading his speech again today, one could not help but think that his support was somewhat half-hearted.

Honourable senators, this legislation has been talked about for a long time. It was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in 1963. Now, eight or nine years later, it is before this chamber. When the bill was discussed in the other place, apparently no reasons were given for the long delay in presenting it. Apparently the Government now feels that this legislation is necessary for the economic development of this country. Many Canadians wonder why the bill was presented at this particular time. Perhaps it is just a tactic, to take the attention of the public away from unemployment and inflation.

Only a few days ago the report for May indicated that inflation is still with us. Senator O'Leary asked whether this corporation will create any new jobs or curb inflation in any way. The remarks made by supporters of the Government in the other place left the impression that the Government is very concerned about the economic development of this country at the present time, but there is very little in the bill itself to indicate what industrial development the corporation will undertake.

It is true that clause 39 provides that the Governor in Council may sell the four crown corporations listed therein to the new corporation. Over the years the profits from Polymer have gone into general Government revenue, and this profit has been for the benefit of all Canadians because the crown corporation was set up and developed by money from Canadian taxpayers. If Polymer is taken over by this new company, its profits will not be for the public but for the shareholders only.

Senator O'Leary pointed out the lack of any provision in the bill for an annual report, as is submitted by certain crown corporations. For instance, item 3 on our own Order Paper concerns one such report. It reads, in part:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.

That is perfectly proper. Honourable senators will recall that, within the last week or ten days, there came to their desks the annual report of Polymer Corporation. If this new corporation is going to be handed over hundreds of millions of dollars belonging to the taxpayers of Canada, why will there be no annual report or, in lieu of that, why is there no provision for reporting to Parliament? If it is intended that in due course the corporation is to raise capital by selling its shares to the public, then of course the public must be willing to buy those shares. First, the public must be convinced that the shares of the new corporation are more valuable and provide a better method of investment than their present method.

The majority of savings in this country are divided into two areas: the first is the stock and bond market, and the second is the broad field of life insurance, savings accounts, and Canada Savings Bonds. Anyone today investing in the stock market or bond market, either in individual shares or through mutual funds, certainly would have a wide variety of issues from which to choose. They are able, from the annual reports, to assess the possibilities of future growth and future dividends.

These Canadians are satisfied with the method of investment they now have for their savings. No doubt the majority feel they are playing some part in helping Canada finance its development. It is most unlikely that many of these people will be interested in switching their savings from this type of investment to CDC shares. To convince Canadians who have their savings in life insurance, in savings accounts and in Canada Savings Bonds to switch to CDC shares, it would be necessary to guarantee them the same kind of security and return on investment that they are now receiving, which is very real and attractive to them. They will not change or switch until they are assured of receiving at least the same security and the same return on investment they have at present. However, apparently no such guarantee, either of security or of return on investment, will be made by the Government. The Government simply says that the corporation will provide an increased opportunity for Canadians to participate in the economic development of their country. The Government gives the impression of being concerned about the economic development of the country, but the CDC's role in industrial development is vague. It may acquire at the start four corporations, two of which are profit-making, one of which is losing money and the other which is not yet making a profit.

So much for development. Then the corporation will invest in shares or ventures and will assist in the development of businesses and will expand, widen and develop opportunities for Canadians to participate in the economic development of Canada. This is a rather vague statement of objectives. It does not provide for development and it gives no certainty that development will follow.

I would remind the house that there are in Canada today many institutions which provide excellent opportunities for the small investor to participate in the economic growth of Canada. I refer to the mutual funds, which amount to a huge total exceeding even the $2 billion proposed for the new Canada Development Corporation. The belief that the new corporation will be a company which will enable the small Canadian investor to participate in the financial benefits of ownership in important and profitable companies is at best a pious hope. No evidence has been presented to show that there is a significant body of small investors in Canada who cannot find satisfactory or attractive opportunities under present conditions.

The honourable senator who introduced the bill was frank in saying that it might be up to ten years before shares are offered to the public. The bill does provide for the Government's reducing its interest to 10 per cent, but any such reduction will not remove nor even reduce government control, because, as the sponsor pointed out, the bill provides against that loss of effective government control by limiting ownership of any other investors to 3 per cent of the share capital of the company, which, at the maximum capitalization of $2 billion, represents an upper limit of $60 million of participation by any single company or individual.

Why would any large, sophisticated investor of the type the corporation will need to attract, if it is to operate as planned by the Government, ever agree to place its interests in such a corporation when there are so many other excellent and truly democratic companies in which it could place its assets? That is the obvious question. The position of the Government merely serves to confirm the difficulties it must face in setting up a huge corporation that will be responsible at one and the same time to political interests represented by government participation in it and to private interests seeking the maximum return on investment regardless of whether that return comes from ventures with a high content of national interest.

Canadians do have some knowledge of various socialistic economies. A very large majority of Canadians still believe in the free enterprise system. When any government enters a major area of economic activity, it seems always to do so on a far more costly basis than when the matter is left to private enterprise. This corporation represents the continuance of the pattern of the present Government of expanding its powers further and further into the private economic sector of our society. The present bill is its boldest approach yet in this direction, and many important members of the private sector are understandably alarmed by its implications.

It is the duty of the Government to provide a fiscal and monetary climate which will enable and encourage orderly and vigorous growth in our society. I do not believe that this Government, including its agents, has any role to perform in the day-to-day management or operation of the private sector of the economy. Such a path is a path to state ownership of the means of production and distribution, and that concept of government is not acceptable to the Canadian people. The bill gives the impression that by selling shares to the public and having the shareholders elect some of the directors, the corporation will stand on its own feet, free of government control. At least, the Government appears to recognize the inherent dangers that are implicit in the relationship between the Government and the corporation, but the suggestion that the corporation will be independent of government is, in my view, a fantastic illusion.

If the treasury of Canada is to be called upon to purchase large blocks of stock of the corporation, and if it is required to purchase debentures of the corporation or to make loans to it up to the amount of $100 million, how can the Government and Parliament divorce themselves from their responsibility to the Canadian public or its operations? If Polymer and other crown corporations are to be sold to the new corporation, how can the Government and Parliament ignore their responsibility with respect to the operation of these crown corporations? In my opinion, neither the Government nor Parliament can properly abdicate their responsibility for such a corporation, and the alleged independence of this corporation is only a myth.

Clause 32 of the bill reads:

> 32. The shares of the company are an authorized investment for the funds of a corporation to which the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act or the Trust Companies Act applies.

In view of the estimate made by Senator Hayden, who introduced the bill, that it might be ten years before the stock is offered to the public, it might have been wise to have left clause 32 out. Perhaps the inclusion of that clause is just another prop for the bill.

Honourable senators, I intend to vote against this bill on second reading.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I had no intention of making any remarks on this bill. Last night I listened to Senator Hayden's speech rather attentively, and I enjoyed it. It did raise certain questions in my mind that I wished to put to him, but, like Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), I felt those questions could perhaps best be answered in committee. Thus, I had decided not to say anything in this house.

On reflection, however, it struck me that according to his explanation of what the bill was designed to do it had more reference to the development of resources in parts of Canada in which resources such as oil and minerals had not been developed and where financial assistance was required for their development. It struck me that there was little in his explanation that would give us in the east very much encouragement. I am thinking particularly of the Atlantic provinces. There may be some aspects that I did not quite detect, but I did get the impression that this bill would be more effective in those regions, places and areas where development should be undertaken but where it is held back because of lack of financial support.

One of my particular reasons for rising at this stage was to say to my good friend Senator O'Leary, whom I admire very much indeed and whose speeches I always enjoy in this chamber, that this afternoon I violently disagree with what he had to say about Premier Robichaud of New Brunswick. I think Premier Robichaud is one of our great Canadians who has done a wonderful job for New Brunswick.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Even his detractors in New Brunswick will admit that that province has made wonderful progress during the years while he was Premier. His name will stand high in the estimation of the people of New Brunswick for many, many years to come, no matter in what capacity he may be called upon to serve his country. His selection by the Government for the post which he now holds was an excellent one, and I think Canada's interests are in safe hands. As I say, I think he is one of our great Canadians and I disagree violently with what my friend Senator O'Leary had to say about him.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL, 1971

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-229 is a complete reworking of the Unemployment Insurance Act and contains 160 clauses and four schedules. Three of the schedules, namely A, B and C, deal with qualifications for benefits and quantum of contributions until the act becomes fully effective at the end of this year. Schedule D deals with consequential amendments to three other acts of the Parliament of Canada.

Before embarking on a discussion of the bill itself, I think it would be wise to look at the historical aspects of unemployment insurance in this country. I think the original effort made by the Parliament of Canada to have an unemployment insurance program was made by the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett when he was Prime Minister. He introduced such legislation in 1935. It was the subject of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada and ultimately to the Privy Council. It was as a result of that reference and of the decisions of the courts that an amendment was sought to section 91 of the British North America Act, and that amendment was added as section 2A of section 91. It gave to the federal Parliament authority to enact legislation in respect of unemployment insurance. Heretofore that jurisdiction was lacking here.

In due course in the year 1940 the first federal act was passed. Honourable senators will remember that it provided for contributions by employers and employees equally. It also provided that the federal Government would supply 20 per cent of the amounts paid in by the contributors and would also assume the cost of administering the act. The beneficiaries under the initial act were all wage earners and some salaried employees. I am informed that since 1940 some 25 million Canadians have drawn benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act to an amount of $6 billion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What were the original maximum earnings to qualify under the act?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Under the original act?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It seems to me it was something like $4,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think $58 per week was the maximum benefit. I am afraid I will have to get that figure for my honourable friend later. I may have it in my notes but I cannot find it just at the moment.

I think that the amount of money that has been paid out under the act, and the number of people who have benefited under the Unemployment Insurance program in this country as envisioned by prime ministers of an early day, have been so great as to warrant the statement that they indeed had a great concept for the improvement of the lot of people who were temporarily deprived of their earning power.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think it will be agreed that it was easier to inaugurate such a system when everybody was working.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The figures which I shall produce later will bear that point out with particular emphasis on the period for which I have figures.

In due time some self-employed people were admitted to the numbers who were covered, particularly fishermen. It is proposed under the present bill that fishermen will continue to be covered until such time as some appropriate formula can be devised for dealing with them otherwise than under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Honourable senators will also remember that there is a provision in the present law whereby what we normally describe as seasonally unemployed people can benefit. Actually, this is a misnomer because the present law provides that in the period from December 1 until May 15 to qualify for unemployment insurance benefit, only a period of 15 weeks rather than 30 weeks of attachment to the labour force is required. The cost of these so-called seasonal unemployment benefits in 1970 was rather enormous. It amounted to $225,000.

Another anomaly is that the drain on the fund has been out of proportion to contributions by seasonal workers. From the figures I have, contributions amounted to about 7 per cent of these earnings, and drawings amounted to approximately 17 per cent. Therefore, there was a hidden subsidy granted to so-called seasonal workers as well as to self-employed workers.

Hon. Mr. Smith: I wonder if the honourable senator might give us that figure again. He said the figure was $225,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It should be $225 million.

Honourable senators will recall the royal commission known as the Gill Commission which studied the problem of unemployment insurance in Canada. The commission presented its report in 1962, and the report was followed by the work of internal committees and study groups.

The first results of this study was a series of administrative changes whereby benefits were controlled, pay centres computerized, and the use of stamps eliminated. There were also fewer employer audits, and bulk payments which employers were required to make could be made to the banks. I am informed that these administrative changes saved approximately $25 million over a period of three years. This was a saving primarily for the benefit of the Government which was responsible under the act for the administrative costs.

In 1968 a project team was set up consisting of economists, sociologists, management representatives, lawyers and others with a view—no doubt inspired by the findings of the Gill Commission—to developing a new approach to the problem of temporary income support which appeared to be necessary.

The project team was set up to consider the causes of the interruption of earnings, including sickness and maternity. It was also to consider the possibility of establishing unemployment insurance and setting it apart from welfare, the problem of the overlapping of the unemployment insurance program with other programs, and to study the prevention of abuse. In addition, it was asked to examine the funding under the act, to investigate the problem of automatic adjustments for contributions as well as benefits in the light of changes in the cost of living and unemployment rates.

It was required to relate the proposed new law to new and emerging economic and social conditions developing in the country, and to study and co-ordinate the new social service agencies and programs in both the public and private sectors—programs that were federally, provincially and municipally established in the public sector.

Perhaps a good example of this is the problem of placement. So, too, is the question of sickness and accident insurance and its relation to the problems of the unemployed. So, too, would be the correlation with Workmen's Compensation laws and benefits flowing from provincial acts and correlation with the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan.

Honourable senators, it is useful at this stage to point out that the insurance which is provided under an Unemployment Insurance Act is insurance against temporary loss of income. It is insurance of a character different from the ordinary type of insurance acquired in the private sector. Private insurance is arranged by contract. It is intended to provide for contingencies and it is voluntary.

Unemployment insurance, however, is a form of social insurance. It is imposed by statute. It is compulsory, and it has the effect of redistributing income on the basis, as proposed in this measure, of economic conditions. As I have said, it is proposed to provide insurance against temporary interruption of a worker's earnings. Sickness has been considered and is reflected in the terms of the bill.

Maternity and pregnancy has also been considered. Canada is not, of course, the first country to establish maternity or pregnancy as cases involving the use of unemployment insurance. It was proposed, studied and recommended by an International Labour Convention. Legislation will soon be before us requiring employers to keep open for 17 weeks the job of a woman who loses her earnings because of pregnancy. Her employer must grant her leave of absence and must give her back her job at the end of her confinement period. This will complement the provisions of this bill.

I should like to speak for a moment about the White Paper published in 1970 and presented to Parliament. It was an unusual White Paper in that it was easy to read. White Papers are usually rather stuffy. This one happened to be particularly easy to understand. From looking at it, honourable senators will obtain an adequate bird's eye view of the rather formidable bill now before us.

It was proposed in the White Paper, and it is now proposed in the bill, to extend the categories of workers covered. The bill prescribes universality of coverage. It is proposed to cover all members of the labour force and to insure them against temporary interruption of their earnings from employment.

It is proposed in the bill that the number of workers covered will increase by 1,250,000, or from 5,250,000 to 6,500,000, approximately 96 per cent of the workers.

The second proposal of the White Paper was that the bill should reduce the qualifying period for benefits from 30 weeks to as low as eight weeks in certain circumstances. I am informed that under the present requirement of 30 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance, hundreds of thousands of workers are deprived of the opportunity to participate in the program.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean a person has to be 30 weeks out of work?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The result is that instead of drawing unemployment insurance, to which contributions have been made, these people, because they have not had a 30-week attachment to the work force, go on welfare. A continuation of that is undesirable.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was not sure of your meaning when you said "30 weeks." You later qualified that by saying "30 weeks of work."

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is under the present law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not unemployment.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thirty weeks of employment is required before a person can qualify for unemployment insurance under the law as it exists today.

It was proposed by the White Paper to increase the benefits from 43 per cent of the weekly earnings, with a maximum of $58 a week, to 66-2/3 per cent of the weekly earnings, with a maximum of $100 per week. In the case of a man with dependants it would be 75 per cent of his weekly earnings.

The White Paper also proposed that absence from the work force because of sickness and pregnancy should be recognized as a basis for qualification. People who are qualified to receive benefits under the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan—that is to say those who are retired between 65 and 70 years of age, as well as those over 70 years of age—should not be allowed to qualify for unemployment insurance. The White Paper also removed the self-employed, except fishermen. I have already referred to the fact that they will be temporarily included until a better plan can be devised. The White Paper also suggested removing all seasonally unemployed. This proposal is in view of the short qualification period that is now proposed.

The White Paper also suggested that additional benefits be provided, at public expense, in cases where the national unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent. In this case the Government, out of the Exchequer, will pay the full costs. It is also proposed that additional regional benefits should be paid if the regional rate of unemployment exceeds the national rate of 4 per cent by one per cent or more.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask a question? If one qualifies by working 16 weeks and receives two-thirds of the wage received before becoming unemployed, how long does this benefit continue?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator Walker, allow me to telescope my remarks by simply saying that a man who has had an attachment of 16 weeks in the labour force, and then becomes unemployed and draws unemployment insurance, will be entitled to eight weeks plus one, which is nine weeks. If he is not employed at the end of that period he could qualify for 10 additional weeks of benefit. He could further qualify for additional benefits depending upon how much the national unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent of the labour force. If he is in a region where there is particularly high unemployment, and the regional rate is one per cent greater than the national rate which is over 4 per cent, then he can qualify for additional benefits.

It will be much simpler, however, having answered the question, if I say that as I proceed with my analysis of the bill I will deal a little more precisely with Senator Walker's point. I hope that is satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am afraid that what I have said is confusing.

I should tell honourable senators that the White Paper proposed that the employer's contribution should not necessarily be on a parity with workers' contributions. They would be related to the employer's lay-off record. His contributions would be higher if his lay-offs in a given period were more frequent; lower if his work period was stable. This proposal would remove a burden carried by the efficient employers. In other words, the cost will lie where the risk is.

The bill proposes, incidentally, that in 1972-73 the employer rate of contribution to the unemployment insurance account will be 1.4 per cent of the contribution made by the worker.

I should point out that the White Paper proposed that benefits paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act be taxable, and that the contributions be tax-deductible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That was also in Mr. Benson's White Paper.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, I think so. However, I am only discussing one White Paper now. I do not think I should attempt to take on the other one. I think the Leader of the Opposition will probably agree that one at a time is enough; perhaps one is enough, period.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This one is enough.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The claimant assistance program was also suggested in the White Paper and I will have a little more to say regarding that when I deal with the bill. Generally speaking, however, its purpose is to assist people who are on unemployment insurance to become re-employed by obtaining new jobs and even better jobs.

It is thought that as a result of the use of the claimant assistance program, a pilot program having been conducted in Hamilton quite recently, the savings in welfare costs by restoring those on unemployment insurance to the labour stream could amount to as much as $80 million a year in welfare costs. One-half of this amount would be a saving to the provinces, and the other half to the federal authorities.

The claimant assistance program will be particularly useful to young people, so many of whom are now joining the work force. Young people are adaptable and perhaps they can be convinced or cajoled into working in other than the particular area of work in which they were engaged when they became unemployed.

The White Paper also recommended that the salary ceiling, which is now at $7,800, be abolished. It is proposed that all salaried persons shall be covered by unemployment insurance.

While I have said that I was attempting to give a general review of the historical side of unemployment insurance, by referring to the White Paper I have also indicated a good many of the provisions in the bill now before the Senate. Consequently, I might be able to reduce the comments I have to make upon the bill.

The earlier parts of the bill deal with the interpretative clauses. The definition clause includes the definition of insurable employment, and has the effect of providing in every case for an identifiable employer. Certain "excepted" employments are defined. People in receipt of Canada Pension Plan benefits are excluded from the operation of the bill. Casual workers are also excluded. Work done by dependants of the employer is not to be counted as work that can be insured. Work done for international organizations and work done by barter are also excepted.

Provincial governments will be allowed to cover their workers. They have an option. If they decide to enter the scheme they must enter for all of their employees and not, as they may under the existing act, pick and choose. Where they chose to contribute for the risky cases and not for those permanently established, very often the risky jobs became vacant so that the unemployment insurance fund was taking up the slack for the provincial government. That is out the window now. They will have to cover all their employees, or none. I understand that so far no province has said "No" to the proposal that they enter the scheme. All of these exceptional cases, of course, can be dealt with by regulation as required.

Part I of the bill deals with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This is in the present law. Under this part of the bill there is to be a chairman, and now there is a very able chairman in the person of Mr. DesRoches. There are to be two commissioners. The bill provides for the tenure of office, for the removal of any member of the commission, for a quorum, that the headquarters be in the National Capital Commission region, and also for administration. I think there is no special need for me to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this part of the bill.

The heart of the bill is in Part II, which deals with benefits in clauses 16 to 58. Eligibility for benefit is a factor of the length of the work period of the worker in the previous 52 weeks before he lost his source of earnings. There are two categories of claimants provided in the bill. One is called the "major attachment claimant." He has worked 20 or more weeks in the previous 52 weeks. The other is the "minor attachment claimant." He has worked from 8 to 19 weeks in the previous 52 weeks.

What are the benefits these people are to get? First of all, in both categories, where earnings are interrupted, they must wait for two weeks to draw benefits. It takes that time for the claims to be submitted and the processing of the papers to be carried out. The regular benefits are to be paid in what the bill describes as two periods. First of all there is the "initial benefit period." This is the period in which a man whose earnings cease qualifies under the bill. A major attachment claimant, a man who has had 20 weeks attachment to the labour force in the previous 52 weeks, will be covered for a period of 15 weeks.

A minor attachment claimant, a man who has had 8 to 19 weeks in the labour force in the previous 52 weeks, will be covered for eight weeks plus one week for each week between the 15th and 19th weeks, another five weeks, so he could get 13 weeks of coverage, having been in the labour force for nineteen weeks.

If after this initial benefit period a worker is still unemployed, he enters what is called the re-established benefit period. Whether he is a major attachment claimant or a minor attachment claimant, he can qualify on the basis of his previous service in the labour force for an additional 10 weeks of benefits. But he does not have to submit a new application. There is control, and he does not have to wait for two weeks a second time. His benefits flow through into the re-established benefit period. During the initial and the re-established period he can take temporary employment, and he can take it during a total of 39 weeks under the bill from the time he first became unemployed. Thus he can be in and out of the labour force in this period of 39 weeks without having to re-submit his application, and wait for an additional two weeks. In other words, the clock runs for 39 weeks for him. This is an incentive for him to stay in the labour force as long as he can, and disqualify himself perhaps for a week or so because he has work. Then if he loses work temporarily, or his job folds up, and he wants to go to another job which has not opened up, he can come back into pay under the bill and then go to another job. He can earn up to 25 per cent of his benefit level every week, and this will not affect the amount of his benefit drawing. He can, of course, earn his full salary or wage for a certain number of weeks, in which case he will not draw unemployment insurance. After that short period is over he can come back and get his benefits.

Let me now say a word about sickness, maternity and retirement. The provision for sickness benefits extends over a period of 15 weeks, and for maternity also to a period of 15 weeks. These benefits are only available to people who have had a major attachment to the labour force; in other words, people who have worked 20 weeks in the previous 52.

The retirement benefits are very minor. They are payable to people who begin to receive the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. They get three weeks of benefits from Unemployment Insurance, without any waiting period. In other words, it is paid to them as soon as the papers can be processed.

The maternity benefit is paid on the basis of nine weeks before confinement and six weeks after confinement. I understand that this is a formula which is pretty universally accepted in the application of maternity cases to unemployment insurance.

Honourable senators, I come to the point on which Senator Walker asked a question earlier in the debate. It deals with extended benefits. These benefits are predicated on the national unemployment rate. These benefits are to be wholly paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and none of them will be paid from the account that is built up by employer and employee contributions. If the national unemployment rate is over 4 per cent, people on unemployment insurance will get an additional four weeks of coverage. If it is over 5 per cent, they will be entitled to an additional eight weeks of coverage. If the regional unemployment rate is over 4 per cent and exceeds the national unemployment rate by one per cent, then these people will be entitled to six additional weeks of coverage. If it exceeds it by 2 per cent, it will mean twelve weeks' coverage, and if it exceeds by 3 per cent, eighteen weeks' coverage. I do not ask honourable senators to do all the arithmetic, because there is a ceiling established in the bill. By that, the maximum benefit that can be received cannot exceed 51 weeks, regardless of what combination of benefits could be devised under the act. This is the absolute maximum. In other words, 51 out of the 52 weeks of the year could conceivably be covered, but no more. I understand that the average duration of a claim is about 14 weeks.

I have already mentioned the rate of benefit. For a single person it will be 66⅔ of his earnings, with a maximum of $100 a week. For a person with dependents, it will be 75 per cent of his earnings, after a 15 plus 10-week period, that is, after the 25 weeks has elapsed. This is principally because in the earlier period it was not thought desirable to cover him for deferrable expenses. By the time a man has been out of work for 25 weeks, almost any debt becomes non-deferrable. But the limit remains at $100 per week.

I already said that there is a two-week waiting period before the first benefit is paid. I may have said that the earnings which can be made while on benefit, if they are in excess of 25 per cent of the benefit, are deducted. If there are benefits paid under provincial law or under any public law in respect of sickness, workmen's compensation, and so on, these will either reduce or eliminate the sum of the payments for benefits made as a result of the passage of the bill.

There are no benefits to be paid if the unemployment is caused by a labour dispute. In other words, these moneys are not to be used to finance either strikes or lockouts. No benefits can be made to an inmate of a prison or a penitientiary while he is such an inmate.

The benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act are not assignable except in one case. It will be arranged by regulation that when, for example, under a welfare scheme operated by a provincial government, welfare is paid to a person who is unemployed, it will be possible for the Commission under the Unemployment Insurance Act to assign to the provincial authority in this case the amount that he would receive in the given period.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? With benefits of two-thirds for a single person and 75 per cent for a married man, and benefits extending sometimes up to 51 weeks in the calendar year, there is not much incentive to work, is there?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think there is. Today, $100 a week for a single man, especially a man who has been earning $150 or more, is probably not much more than is necessary to get him by. I do not think the quantum of the benefits is out of line. The fact that a man can go in and out of the stream of benefits—work a bit when he can find work and still not disqualify himself for benefits—will provide an incentive to people who are under the act, to try to make themselves more self-sufficient than they would otherwise be. In other words, I do not think this works as a welfare scheme. The whole thrust of the bill is to take it out of the realm of welfare.

When we come to consider the question of assistance to claimants, we find the program of providing information and guidance and assistance to claimants under the bill, to enable them to become re-employed. In my humble opinion, this has a very real meaning for the proper operation of this kind of legislation. It will have the effect of avoiding the situation which Senator Walker is concerned about, and which would concern me very much, too.

There is a real thrust to be made on claimant assistance programs, which will try to re-introduce these people into the labour force on a permanent basis. It will also have a good deal to do with getting people into employment of a better character than the employment they had been in before they became unemployed.

Part III deals with contributory premiums. In 1972 the maximum weekly insurable earnings will be $150 a week. In later years the $150 will be modified by a formula in the act and will probably be a little higher. The formula which determines the maximum weekly insurable earnings is based on the earnings index as described in clauses 59 and 60 of the bill. It is a factor in the rise of the average earnings of the individual.

The employee rates are to be struck annually by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The rules that they will follow are set out in clause 62 of the bill. It is expected that the employee rate will be approximately .9 per cent of the insured earnings. Translated into examples, if the maximum pay of the man is $150 per week, the premium should be $1.35 per week.

The employer rate is fixed in the bill at 1.4 times the employee rate. That will be the rate at which employers will pay until 1974. By 1974 some experience will have been developed on what the employer's record of employability in his business has been. For larger employers, in other words firms whose earnings are over $78,000, the amount of the employer's contribution will be based upon the experience rating formula. As I have said already, this is to be based upon the lay-off record.

There will be excluded from consideration employees such as students, people who quit voluntarily, people who retire, and sickness and maternity cases. All of these types will be excluded from the computation to determine the lay-off record of a given employer. His record will be related to his average yearly lay-off history. It is going to be governed by regulation, but the more lay-offs he has had in a given period the higher will be his rate. It will never be more than twice the rate of contribution made by the employee.

As I said, there will be two years of consultation among the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the advisory council and employers to work out a satisfactory procedure for determining the employer contribution.

Part IV deals with the collection of premiums. The onus is on the employer to deduct the premiums and to remit these to the Receiver General. The Minister of National Revenue will administer the collection of the premiums. He has the same powers under this act as he has under the Canada Pension Plan Act. The minister may assess the employer for the amount he should be paying on his own account and the amount he has deducted from his employees to be paid into the account. The employer is required to keep records and to submit to audits.

As a result of this act and its provisions, and the Canada Pension Plan Act and the provisions of the Income Tax Act, there will now be one minister or one department making the collection and audit for the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan contributions, and the Unemployment Insurance Act. This will result in fewer audits and there will be one place, one department, one ministry, with which the employer can deal. I am sure that will be considered desirable as far as management generally is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Which minister will that be?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Minister of National Revenue in every case.

There are provisions in this bill with respect to overpayments by employers and by employees. There are provisions with respect to the acceptance of contributions by banks. There are provisions, too, for the laying of informations or complaints. There are clauses dealing with the proof required for non-compliance with the act, and there are clauses with which honourable senators are familiar in the present law respecting appeals. There is an appeal to the umpire, who is a judge of the federal court. These appeals to the umpire are from a minister's decision. The decision of the umpire is final on matters of fact, but on questions of law there is a further appeal from the umpire's decision to the Pension Appeal Board.

At the present time the fund contains $356 million. It is proposed that since this money is not the money of the Treasury of Canada but is the money that has been contributed by employers and employees equally, it should be used to finance a special preferred rate for the million and a quarter or more new entrants.

There will be no more unemployment insurance fund as we know, which is perhaps salutary. It has always been rather a political football. Moreover, it is obvious that at the present time with $356 million in the fund there is no need to have this fund built up. That is particularly true when the benefits can be paid out of an account and financed in the manner I have just described.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Does the Government make any contribution?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Government makes its contribution only after the unemployment rate goes over 4 per cent. Everything over 4 per cent is paid for by the Government out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Hon. Mr. Walker: How did they get such a large amount in the fund at this time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I guess the answer is: it is there.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is the answer of Solomon.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Ninety-four per cent of the labour force is employed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In January of 1958 the fund was $838 million, and that is the high for the period for which I have figures. The low was a debit position in May of 1963 of $37 million. There was a debit position of over $30 million in May of 1964. Unemployment was heavy. Then the fund began to rise, reaching $545 million in 1969. In January of 1970 it was $525 million, and in May of that year, because of the great drain of the winter, it was down to $394 million. At the present time it amounts to approximately $356 million. Why is it that low? Because of the unemployment.

The administrative provisions beginning at page 69 of the bill need not concern us greatly. They are generally in the same terms as those of the present act. I have already spoken about appeals. The original decisions under the law will be taken by an insurance officer. These will be decisions covering benefits, coverage, and that sort of thing. These decisions can be appealed to a board of referees which consists of a chairman, locally selected, and two other local people, who will be representative of management and employees. From these boards of referees appeals can go to an umpire or, if there is a point of law involved, to the Pensions Appeal Board.

Honourable senators, I think it is unnecessary for me to discuss further the Claimant Assistance Program as I think I have done as much as is necessary in response to Senator Walker's question. However, if any further information is required on this program, we can certainly get it in committee.

The financial provisions are set out in Part VI of the bill. The Unemployment Insurance account will be a segment of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. From this account will be paid benefits required to be paid when the unemployment rate is up to 4 per cent of the national average. It is a cash flow arrangement. It is actuarially sound on a one-for-one basis. The state of the account will be shown in the national accounts each year and so will be open to public scrutiny.

Part VII of the bill deals with the employment service administered by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. This is the same as in the present act.

Part VIII of the bill deals with transitional and repeal provisions and covers the interim period and the transitional period after the bill becomes law.

Honourable senators, I commend the bill to the Senate. I apologize for having taken so long in explaining it, but it is a complicated piece of legislation and it had to be done. I think this is a bill which will work for the benefit of many Canadians. At the appropriate time I shall move that it be referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

AIR CANADA

MOTION TO REFER ANNUAL REPORT TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cameron, seconded by the Honourable Senator Boucher: That the Standing Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1970, tabled in the Senate on Monday, 5th April, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Hays, P.C.).

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, on behalf of honourable Senator Hays, may I ask that this order stand until Monday next, June 21?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this motion shall stand adjourned in the name of honourable Senator Hays until Monday next, June 21?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order Stands.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Annual Report to the Governments of the United States and Canada by the Columbia River Treaty Permanent Engineering Board for the period October 1, 1969 to September 30, 1970. (English text).

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place tomorrow, Friday, June 18, 1971 at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate gallery of the other place on that occasion. This is for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many honourable senators as possible. However, in view of the fact that the Senate is not sitting tomorrow, it might well be that some seats in our gallery will be unoccupied. If that is so, some guests could be admitted with a pass signed by an honourable senator. Even so, there is no assurance that there will be sufficient room in the gallery to accommodate all guests. It will depend on the attendance of honourable senators. The principle is that tomorrow, for the budget speech, priority will be given to honourable senators.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Breau, Gibson, Osler, Hogarth and Roy (Timmins) have been substituted for those of Messrs. Chappell, Foster, Harries, Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo) and Watson on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald tabled:

Budget Papers presented by the Minister of Finance for the information of Parliament in connection with the Budget for 1971-72, as follows:

Part I—Economic White Paper for 1971

Part II—Review of Government Accounts 1970-71.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-14, respecting the construction of an international highway bridge between Fort Frances, Ontario, and International Falls, Minnesota, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McDonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

RETURN OF GOVERNMENT LEADER—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was going to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) if he intended to report today on his trip to Victoria, but I see that he is not here. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. McDonald) could inform us when we might expect to see the honourable leader back in the house.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: I understand Senator Martin will be returning to Ottawa this evening at approximately six o'clock. I presume he will be available for such questions at the next sitting, at which time he will very likely give his report on the meeting in Victoria.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith: That from now until and including 30th June, 1971, Rules 44(1)(f), 45(1)(b) and 45(1)(c) be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills. —(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I will yield to the Deputy Leader of the Government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Langlois should speak now instead of Senator Flynn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, after the debate which took place yesterday on my motion, I have had an opportunity to consider the remarks made by Senator Grosart. Although I am inclined to believe that his suggestion to suspend Rule 78 in addition to Rules 44 and 45, as originally suggested, is superfluous, nevertheless, in order to eliminate all possible doubt I will accede to his proposal. Therefore, with leave of the Senate I will withdraw my original motion and replace it by the following:

That from now until and including Wednesday, June 30th, 1971, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Since I made a commitment yesterday to inform the house today of the legislation for which royal assent will be required before the adjournment, here is the list:

C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation;

C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada;

C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code;

C-238, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act;

C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act;

C-240, to amend the Post Office Act;

C-243, to amend the Judges Act and the Financial Administration Act;

C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes;

C-246, respecting pilotage;

C-224, relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution.

As I informed the Leader of the Opposition this morning, there is some doubt that the last bill, C-224, will reach us before the adjournment. The list represents all the legislation on which royal assent will be required before we adjourn Wednesday, June 30.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To this list we should add Bill C-249, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money. Is that interim supply, and for how many months?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is the main supply.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Has this been referred to the National Finance Committee?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes. It was considered last week by the National Finance Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Senator Langlois has asked leave to withdraw his motion standing as item No. 3 on the Order Paper. Has the honourable senator permission to withdraw his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator Langlois leave of the Senate to put his second motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

23351—73

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate, it is moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by Senator McDonald:

That from now until and including June 30, 1971, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL, 1971

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), for second reading of Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that we are all indebted to Senator Connolly for the able and lucid explanation of Bill C-229 which he gave yesterday. The bill is a long and somewhat complicated one, and parts of it are difficult to follow without having an explanation such as that given by Senator Connolly.

It is not my intention at this time to discuss the bill in any detail, but I should like to mention some of the proposed changes which are of vital interest to those who must of necessity, and through no fault of their own, depend upon unemployment insurance to provide them with the necessities of life when their earning power ceases because of lack of employment.

As honourable senators are aware, unemployment insurance is simply a means whereby a person is provided with some financial protection when his or her employment is temporarily disrupted and the income from such employment ceases. The principle of such insurance is simple and praiseworthy, and has been in effect for some time.

Senator Connolly explained the history of unemployment insurance in Canada and its beneficial effects. We were comparatively late in entering this field. I do not know when or where unemployment insurance was first introduced, but I do know that it was introduced in a few selective industries in England back in 1911. The need for this type of insurance in Canada had been made abundantly clear during the years of the great economic depression. However, it could not have been put into effect until the economy was on the upswing, as it was in 1941 due to war production.

Now, as I understand it, the bill before us is the first major overhaul of this act. It is only to be expected that after 30 years a major overhaul is desirable. While many changes have been made, I think the two most important are the increase in benefits and the extended coverage. Indeed, these two provisions are so interrelated that they could almost be treated as one.

The bill proposes to increase substantially the benefits a person covered by the act can receive. There will be a more direct relationship between the benefits received and the level of a person's income. As has been explained, under the new system a person receives 66⅔ per cent of his average earnings in certain cases, and 75 per cent under certain circumstances. This is, of course, a vast improvement over the present system. However, I do think that too much has been made outside Parliament of the fact that it will be possible for a person to receive $100 per week from unemployment insurance. Unfortunately, I believe the impression has been created that this would be the common benefit. Actually, a person's income would have to be $150 per week or more before he could receive that benefit.

As has been stated, the new act provides for increased benefits and at the same time for fewer contributions and lower premiums. Obviously this cannot be done without a great deal of new money coming into the system from somewhere. This new money is being obtained by bringing under the act groups of workers who have but a slight risk of widespread unemployment, or indeed any unemployment. These new groups include government employees, teachers, hospital workers, armed forces personnel, nurses, police forces and professional athletes.

I think it is obvious that unemployment is not a high risk for these groups, but I have heard the argument advanced that it is to their benefit that they be brought under the act. Well, I can hardly bring myself to believe there is much danger of anything less than a major economic depression which would adversely affect their employment. I prefer the statement which I think was made by the Minister of Labour himself, that the universality of coverage, which adds 1,160,000 members to the plan, in some respects calls upon the good will and responsibility of more fortunate, better placed Canadians towards those who, through lack of education and opportunity, are in less secure occupations and on such grounds the extended coverage is justified.

I believe a good feature of the new act is the lowering of the qualifying period. I must say that I was surprised to read in the evidence given by Mr. D. J. Steele before the Labour, Manpower and Immigration Committee of the House of Commons that by reducing the qualifying period to eight weeks another 200,000 people will qualify who are now disqualified. I expect that these people are at the lowest salary level. It might well be that they will only qualify for the minimum benefit of $20 per week. If this be so, then I do believe they should be given some kind of preferential treatment, even though we would have to bend the insurance principle once more to do so. And if I am right in thinking that these people are the working poor, then they must be getting welfare now and very probably the amount of any unemployment benefits paid to them would be deducted from such welfare payments so that their financial situation could remain the same.

Yesterday Senator Connolly mentioned that perhaps as much as $80 million a year will be saved in welfare costs when the new act is in operation. While this is important to those who are paying the welfare costs, it will be of no benefit to those receiving welfare if the payments they receive remain the same.

[Hon. Mr. Macdonald.]

Senator Connolly also touched on the waiting period of two weeks that must elapse before benefits are paid. The impression I got from his explanation was that such time was necessary to process the account. But that is not the reason given before the Labour, Manpower and Immigration Committee of the other place by the same Mr. Steele, who I should mention is Director General of the Planning, Finance and Administration Branch of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. He mentioned that people laid off could usually get along for this period because they would perhaps have some pay coming to them as vacation pay, separation pay, wages in arrears and things of that kind, which I think is a very poor reason. However, he went on to say,

> The reason for going to a two-week waiting period is that it in fact saves $160 million, and will therefore reduce the contribution costs.

He was then asked, "How can you save $160 million?" His reply was:

> That is the extra cost of paying benefits for the second week of the waiting period. If we did not have a two-week waiting period, if we had a one-week waiting period, the costs of paying benefits would rise by $160 million in 1972.

Honourable senators, I am not concerned about those who receive $100 a week from unemployment insurance; perhaps they can be expected to provide for themselves for a couple of weeks. I am concerned about those who may be receiving between $20 and, say, $50 a week. They should not have any waiting period. Probably many of them will have to apply for welfare for those two weeks. It would appear to me that we are being informed that $80 million will be saved by the welfare fund, yet we do not know how many more dollars will have to be paid out from welfare on account of this waiting period.

One could discuss many other features of this bill, but I do not propose to do so at this time. I do wish to make one comment on the so-called merit system regarding employers' contributions. My own attitude is that I am not satisfied that its advantages outweigh its disadvantages, at least at the present time.

Unemployment insurance is of vital interest to many people. The bill itself will not have wide distribution, and even if it did it would be very difficult to understand. I hope that the Department of Labour will prepare a pamphlet or booklet explaining the bill, which can be given wide distribution. The booklet we received today, presented by the Minister of Labour, entitled "Unemployment Insurance in the Seventies", is a very good and interesting publication. It contains much useful information, and is helpful to a good understanding of the whole matter. However, a smaller one will be needed for general distribution, and I hope one will be prepared as soon as possible.

As Senator Connolly mentioned, details concerning the various clauses of the bill can be discussed in committee, but since we are approaching the time of adjournment I expect a long study will not be possible. Fortunately, I do not think one is necessary, as the committee of the other place had both the time and the inclination to go over the bill in detail. We have the reports of their deliberations, which make very interesting and instructive reading.

I close on this note, honourable senators. Unemployment insurance is helpful, yes, but our aim should be to make unemployment insurance unnecessary. I hope that when the Minister of Finance brings down his budget tomorrow night he will introduce some new incentives so that employment will be stimulated and unemployment insurance will not be as necessary as it is at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask the honourable senator a question? Did he say that in view of the long study given this bill by the committee of the other place it might not be desirable to have the bill go to a Senate committee? Is that the general consensus?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sorry if I gave that impression. I did not say that. I think it will have to go to a committee of this house, but I do not think it will be possible for our committee to give it the detailed study it received in the other place. Indeed, I do not think it is necessary, because if I remember correctly, as indicated in the printed proceedings, this question was examined by the committee of the other house on eleven different occasions.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, for Hon. Mr. Welch, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 21, 1971, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator McDonald leave to proceed with this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, Senator Langlois advised the house a few moments ago of those pieces of legislation we would like to be able to deal with before the summer recess commencing on June 30. I would further advise the house that there are four pieces of legislation which we would like to be in a position to deal with by Tuesday next. They are Bills C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code; C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act; C-240, to amend the Post Office Act, and C-246, an act respecting pilotage.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1971

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-249, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. McDonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 21, at 8 p.m.

POVERTY COMMITTEE

ARTICLE BY FORMER STAFF MEMBERS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege affecting members of the Senate.

You will recall that on April 20 last, at the first sitting after the Easter adjournment, I reported to the Senate on the resignations of four staff members whom the Special Senate Committee on Poverty had hired to assist in writing the committee report, and the effect which those resignations would have on the report itself and its publication.

In my statement at that time, I described the events leading up to the resignations and I placed on record the agreement and contract that those four staff members had signed as a condition of their employment by the committee. For the purpose of refreshing your memory I will quote from Hansard of April 20:

> These are the terms of employment, the conditions under which they were engaged. This is the document to which each subscribed, and I quote:
> > It is understood and agreed that this agreement is a contract for the performance of a service and that the contractor is engaged as an independent contractor providing services to the Senate of Canada and is not engaged as an employee of the Senate of Canada.
> > The Contractor shall treat as confidential, during as well as after the rendering of the services contracted for, any information of a character confidential to the affairs of the Senate of Canada to which he becomes privy as a result of his acting as a Contractor.

At the time I made this statement I was not aware that the contract was signed by only three, Adams, Hill and Cameron. Peter Penz, the fourth member, was then, and is now, a public servant. He was seconded to the committee and was paid by the Department of Manpower and Immigration with an additional honorarium from the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. He did not subscribe to the agreement for employment, but he took the oath of allegiance and the oath of office and secrecy, which is usual for the public service. This, indeed, he did on October 27, 1965, when he entered the employment of the Government.

The oath of allegiance reads as follows:

> I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, Her Heirs and Successors according to law. So help me God.

The oath of office and secrecy reads:

> I solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties that devolve upon me by reason of my employment in the Public Service and that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter that comes to my knowledge by reason of such employment. So help me God.
> Sworn and subscribed before me at Ottawa, Ontario, 27th day October—

I cannot make out the name of the man who took the affidavit, but Penz' signature is quite clear.

At that time I also quoted from page 652 of the 17th edition of May:

> It is a breach of privilege for any person to publish any portion of the evidence given before, or any document presented to, a Select Committee before such evidence or document had been reported to the House.

At the same time, I pointed out that all resource and research material gathered by the committee staff was the property of the committee. The taxpayers had paid for it, the rights to it were vested in the committee, and any use of this material directly or indirectly would be a grave misuse of confidential and privileged documents.

To make sure that my statement would be brought to their attention, copies of Senate Hansard of April 20 were mailed to each of the four who had resigned, and registered letters were also sent to each of them requesting them to return any material belonging to the committee they might have in their possession. No acknowledgements or replies were received in respect of either the copies of Senate Hansard or the registered letters.

This morning, honourable senators, a publication appeared containing an article dealing with poverty, authored by these same four individuals, and printed by one of the underground presses at Montreal. The authors take the position that the information was gathered at the expense of the Canadian public, belongs to the Canadian public and no Senate committee has the right to prevent its publication. Moreover, they said, and I quote:

> We believe that in going ahead with our work we are participating fully in the process of democracy in rejecting one of the diseases of our time: the belief that the technicians are blind technocrats who must follow political direction as if they had no mind, spirit or ethics of their own.

These men have the gall, the audacity to speak about ethics when what they are doing is a most flagrant breach of trust, if not worse.

It is a grave reflection on their concept of ethical conduct and it is a serious breach of faith, to put it in the mildest terms. They had no right to do what they did and they knew that what they were doing was wrong. Nevertheless, they did it because they thought they could get away with it.

It is a very disquieting situation. This misdeed has now been done. The principle is not one that will be ignored or lightly considered. Indeed, it is a breach of privilege that in my view goes to the very heart of our parliamentary system. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the report published by these people is based on the work that they and others did when they were employed by the Senate Committee on Poverty. The quotes are so obvious that I recognized them without any difficulty. They were paid for their work and they solemnly undertook not to release any information they received before the Senate report was issued.

I am sympathetic towards the impatience of young people for action, but it is hard for me to condone behaviour that involves breaking contracts and ignoring oaths of secrecy. I do not believe that ethics have gone out of style, and both my colleagues and myself believe that unethical conduct does very little to aid the cause of the poor in this country.

Despite their outrageous conduct and their shocking behaviour, we are not going to get involved in a slanging match with them. We have a report to prepare, for which the poor are waiting. Once the committee's report is properly presented to the Senate, the authors will have the same right as any other citizen of disagreeing with its recommendations. No one is denying them or anyone else that privilege.

With respect to the report itself, as I said before, it is a matter of great regret to the committee, and to myself particularly, that it cannot be tabled before the summer adjournment, which was our original target date. When we hired these four staff members last January, it was our hope that it would be tabled before the Easter recess. The delay has been prolonged still further because they led us to believe that they had completed certain assignments for which they were paid in good faith, but which we discovered had not been done at all. They had a game plan of their own.

In no way is the committee at fault. The departure of these employees involves a more extensive job of rewriting, and also greater delay in the finalization of the report, than perhaps I realized when I last referred to this matter in the Senate.

Any honourable senator who has been involved in the production of committee reports will understand what I am talking about. Nevertheless, a great deal of the ground which was lost has been recovered and the committee is persisting in its efforts to finalize its report. The gaps in research work are being filled in, and various parts of the report are in the process of being organized and fitted together, and it should take shape around mid-July.

Senator Carter and I have gone over most of the research and draft material several times. We shall continue working at it during the summer. A meeting of the full committee has already been called for July 15 and 16 to revise and approve whatever has been completed by that date. Subsequent meetings will be called during the summer as the need arises. We hope to be able to table the report when the Senate reconvenes in September.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was not aware that Senator Croll would raise this question and I did not read what was published by these former employees of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. This is a most serious matter and I would like to read carefully what Senator Croll has said before just letting this matter go. If it is as important and serious as I gathered while listening to Senator Croll tonight, some action should be taken by the Senate. Because of that I wish to adjourn this matter until tomorrow, in order that I may have the opportunity to think it over.

A formal motion to refer this matter to a special committee may be advisable because normally the Committee of Privileges of the Senate consists of the whole Senate, and it could not sit during the summer. However, if this matter is as serious as Senator Croll has indicated, we should deal with it rather than simply forget it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: If these people are as guilty as they appear to be, what penalty can be imposed? In other words, we are doing a lot of talking; what can be done to penalize them if they are guilty? Can they be put in jail?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I do not think that the Leader of the Opposition, in his proposal for an adjournment, meant to adjourn the question of privilege. I do not believe that could be done.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That question stands by itself. I take it that his observations are to be construed as indicating that he would like an opportunity to look into the matter further, particularly in the light of the statement made by Senator Croll tonight.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I concur in his suggestion that there should be an opportunity to consider this matter, which on the surface does appear to be very serious. After we have had a chance to reflect on it, perhaps we can give the matter further consideration.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE—STATEMENT OF CONCLUSIONS AND CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL CHARTER PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I wonder whether the leader could tell us whether it would be appropriate to have the two documents emanating from the Constitutional Conference appended to today's Hansard?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is a good idea. It would be a convenience for all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are referring to the Charter and the Conclusions, upon which all eleven governments should take a stand before next Monday?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Are these similar to the documents that were tabled in this house and published after the February conference?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not mean in conclusions, but they are the same type of document?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As far as the Conclusions are concerned that is true, but the Charter, of course, is a different and new document.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that these documents appear as an appendix to Hansard of today?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of documents see Appendix, pp. 1172-78)

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

REPORT OF VICTORIA MEETING—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Government Leader if he feels he should at this time give us a report on the conference at Victoria, or if he is in a position to tell us whether the federal Government has taken a decision upon the Charter which has been proposed.

My understanding is that this Charter is not in itself a proposal of the federal Government. It is rather an agreement that is drawn from the discussions which took place, but no decision, I understand, has yet been taken by the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right. The Government's decision will be announced within the course of the next few days. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, it was agreed that the replies of the eleven governments with regard to the Charter would be made known by the 28th day of this month. The federal Government's position with regard to the Charter will be announced in plenty of time for that date.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Has the leader any idea whether the attitude will be negative?

Hon. Mr. Croll: You would not like to make a bet on it?

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet in Room 256-S. On the agenda of the committee will be the subject matter of a motion respecting the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project. I would request all senators who can attend to do so.

HON. JOHN J. KINLEY

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: I regret to inform honourable senators that Senator Kinley has resigned his seat in the Senate. I say at once that this senior senator, one of our best loved, has been compelled to submit his resignation because of ill health.

John Kinley has had a distinguished and varied career. During the first world war he served with Canadian Military Intelligence. He worked hard for the allied cause during the second world war as well, and was awarded the King Haakon VI Cross of Liberation for distinguished service to Norway.

He was an active and successful businessman, being president of the Lunenburg Foundry and Engineering Company. As we know from speeches that he has made in this house from time to time, he contributed greatly to the building and repair of naval and merchant ships during wartime as well as peacetime. His interests as an industrialist included a busy role in the Lunenburg Foundry Garage Company Ltd. and the Lunenburg Marine Railway.

Senator Kinley was a trained pharmaceutical chemist. He became president of the Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, and was honorary president of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Society. He was president of the Lunenburg branch of the British Navy League of Canada, and of the Neptune Sea Cadet Corps. This led to his appointment as honorary president of the Navy League of Canada.

Senator Kinley embarked upon a political career sixty years ago with his election as mayor of Lunenburg, a position he held for two years. He became a member of the Nova Scotia legislature in 1916, and he was re-elected several times thereafter. This included a spell as a member of the government of his province. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1935 and re-elected in 1940. He was summoned to this chamber in 1945.

His interest in the work of the Senate was attested to by his active interest in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, the Transport and Communications Committee, and the National Finance Committee. The members of those committees will recall that he was loyal in attendance there as he was in this chamber, frequently putting strong and vigorous questions to witnesses.

As befits a native of Lunenburg, John Kinley was the son of a master mariner. He never lost his interest in the sea. Many of us have admired the skill with which he succeeded in interjecting a reference to the sea into many of his speeches in this chamber. We all recall him with affection, and we will miss him.

I am sure that those who have been on Parliament Hill for the full length of time that he was a member of Parliament cannot help but recall also his wife, who was continuously at his side. When we come to appraise the work of John Kinley as a member of both Houses of Parliament, we will recall his contribution with pride and gratitude, and we will also recall the collaboration of his wife.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Kinley has been active in public life for 64 years, a record which few of us will ever match. He has been city councillor and mayor of his beloved Lunenburg, member of the Nova Scotia Legislature, member of the House of Commons since 1935, and a member of the Senate since 1945. Thus he was a senator for over a quarter of a century. In all of these capacities, his service to the people who elected him or whom he represented has been exemplary.

He was active at the front in both world wars, and many times decorated. His career in defence of nations oppressed was as outstanding as everything else he ever undertook.

Senator Kinley is an entrepreneur of exceptional talent, who has fathered many a successful business enterprise. Canada has always needed and will continue to require men like him, who believe deeply in private initiative, and the value and necessity of private initiative in a society like ours.

We are sorry to see him retire from the Senate. To him and his charming wife we extend our warmest, most affectionate and heartfelt wishes for a happy and peaceful retirement. They have laboured both long and well for their country, and such work has been greatly appreciated, especially in the Senate.

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, Senator Kinley was my seat-mate for some years. It was quite a shock to me to hear the Leader of the Government say tonight that he has resigned. He has been absent for about a month, so far as I know, and I wondered what was the matter. I had not heard that he had been ill, but now I hear he has resigned. I cannot add much to what the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition have said except to say that we will all miss him. He is 89 years of age, one year older than I, and I think possibly the oldest member of the chamber. I know we will all miss him—particularly myself.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, as a Nova Scotian and a colleague of Senator Kinley's, I feel that I should say at least a word or two with respect to his resignation, although I realize that what I say will not be as eloquent as the speeches of the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition.

As one Nova Scotian I want to say that Senator Kinley was a loyal Nova Scotian and a loyal Canadian, who was always in his place here when he was able to be present. It is only because of ill health in the last month that Senator Kinley has been absent.

Senator Kinley took a very active part in Senate committee work, as all of you know. He was particularly interested in the fishermen of Nova Scotia, and was a champion of their rights. He never let pass an opportunity of standing up and saying a word on behalf of the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

I was in touch with Senator Kinley's family just today. I telephoned Senator Kinley's son to ask how the senator was, and I was not sure from that conversation that his resignation would be presented this evening. However, I am sure I express the thoughts of all here this evening when I say that we were deeply disappointed to hear the Leader of the Government announce Senator Kinley's resignation.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I believe all our colleagues from Nova Scotia join Senator Isnor and me in thanking the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Paterson for their very kind references to Senator Kinley whose resignation has been announced here tonight. I regret very much that other members of our little group from Nova Scotia are not present tonight. However, I know I can also express on their behalf our appreciation for those kind remarks.

As one who has known the Kinley family for a very long period indeed I think I can presume to express the gratitude of Senator Kinley himself and of his family.

Having listened to the summary by the Leader of the Government of the many accomplishments of Senator Kinley in his business and public life, most of us must now realize what a modest man he truly is. But, having had an intimate knowledge of him for a great many years, it is not difficult for me to say that he was one of the great Nova Scotians when he was active in both the business and political life of this country. Senator Kinley is a modest man, and is not inclined to dwell on the depth or length of his career in either private or public life.

All of us who have had contact with Senator Kinley for any length of time have come to realize the deep devotion he has always had in discharging his responsibilities as a member of this chamber. He set a fine example for all of us here, and for those who might follow in his footsteps. If one were to emulate his example, one would know what it means to be a senator. It must have been at a great deal of personal sacrifice that Senator Kinley was always in his place in the Senate.

His own people know Senator Kinley and his good works very well indeed, but, as Senator Isnor and one or two others mentioned, the Lunenburgers know equally well his wife who has stood by his side these many years. The people he represented in public life recognize full well the role that she has played in all that they have accomplished together.

I am sure it must give the Kinleys a large measure of satisfaction to observe in their only son the same managerial skills and willingness to serve the public that Senator Kinley himself has exhibited. For those who do not know anything about Senator Kinley's son, I must explain that he presently fills the important office of President of the Lunenburg Fisheries Exhibition. When he took over that office it was his expressed intention to make it as big and important a Canadian event as the Calgary Stampede. He is that kind of man. He inherits the optimism and high aims of his father. He also finds time to serve as a valuable member of the Atlantic Development Council, while successfully managing the rather large and important family businesses in Lunenburg and the area which give employment to hundreds of people.

As I have said, it must give the Kinleys satisfaction to recognize that their son is carrying on that great tradition of competence and devotion to public service, and it must also ease their minds to be able to fall back on the advice of their daughter, Mary Russell, who now lives in Ottawa and who is a most distinguished graduate of Dalhousie law school.

Honourable senators, I have known Senator Kinley for more than 50 years. That is a long time. For 40 of those 50 years I have associated with him in political activities in a very intimate way indeed. I was, in the first place, a member of a committee which waited on Senator Kinley in 1930 to ensure that he would allow his name to stand for election at a certain convention. We got our wish, but unfortunately Senator Kinley was unable to win that particular election. But, honourable senators, he won the next one and as a result he has stayed in Ottawa throughout the years since 1935. It was indeed a great honour for me that a man like that, so prominent in the public life of my own province, accepted the task of supporting me when I walked up the carpet of the Red Chamber back in 1955. From that day on I have had the benefit of his experience and wisdom. I want to thank him now for his great generosity to me in a great many ways.

Let me conclude, honourable senators, by saying that Senator Kinley has truly earned his retirement from active service in the Parliament of Canada. It is yet another example of his good judgment that he has decided, in the words of Emerson, that "it is time to be old, to take in sail." I know that all honourable senators join with me in wishing Senator and Mrs. Kinley a smooth voyage for the rest of their days in the Province of Nova Scotia, the place of their birth, in that picturesque, prosperous and internationally famous town of Lunenburg—the province and the place they both love and have served so well for so many years.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as a fellow Nova Scotian, although not of the same political party, I join with those who have already spoken in paying tribute to Senator Kinley. Much has been made of his successful business career and his long and distinguished career in the public life of our country. His public life began, as has already been mentioned, back in 1907 when he was first elected to the council of his native town. After serving as town councillor and later as mayor, he went into the service of his fellow men in provincial and federal politics.

While I knew of Senator Kinley as a great Nova Scotian, I did not know him personally until I came here almost 11 years ago. We became friends, and I have spent a many pleasant hour in his company. Indeed, at one time when Senator Arthur Beaubien and Senator Baird were here, it was practically a regulation that the four of us should spend some time together every evening in the lobby of the Chateau Laurier. Senator Kinley has a great knowledge of the political history of Nova Scotia and his conversation is always interesting.

Honourable senators, I know the kind of person that Senator Kinley is, and I can assure you all, although I know that such assurance is wholly unnecessary, that he is a man of high character and great ability, a man of honour and of dedication. I would also point out that he is a man of extreme courtesy and the utmost kindness. In all the years I have known him I have never heard him make an unkind or harsh remark about anyone. He is a friendly man, and one who over the years has earned for himself the respect and, indeed, the affection of all who know him.

He has served well the people of his town, his province, and his country. He has had a long, useful and happy life and I sincerely hope that he will be spared for some years yet to enjoy a pleasant retirement.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I did not know in advance that there was going to be an announcement tonight of the retirement of Senator Kinley, and I for one am very sad to hear it. I feel a deep sense of personal loss in knowing that he will not be present at our meetings in the future.

One thing which interested Senator Kinley greatly, and to which he devoted a great deal of time, was the weekly prayer breakfast which is held in the restaurant of Parliament. For many years Senator Kinley has attended these meetings each Wednesday morning. While it is an occasion of very little formality, there is a Senate chairman and a House of Commons chairman, and Senator Kinley has been the Senate chairman of that group for quite a number of years, and he always made a valuable and interesting contribution to the meetings. He has also regularly attended, accompanied by Mrs. Kinley, the President's Prayer Breakfast held annually in Washington. He has done this at his own expense. He has made great contributions to them, and has been recognized by others attending those breakfasts as an outstanding Canadian.

Senator Kinley has always been my idea of a Christian gentleman, and this has been recognized by his colleagues in both this chamber and the other place, and by anyone who has ever met him.

Honourable senators, I am deeply sorry to know that Senator and Mrs. Kinley will not be here with us in the future.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I join in the well-merited tributes that have been paid to Senator Kinley and his wife. It is not my intention to add to what has been said, because that would be trying to gild the lily. I have known Senator Kinley for over 20 years, having met him soon after I came to Ottawa in 1949. We shared a number of interests, particularly an interest in the sea and ships, and the men who go down to the sea in ships. Senator Kinley was particularly interested in the fishermen of his province whose problems are very similar to those of the fishermen I have the honour to represent.

Senator Kinley was a faithful servant of this house and particularly of its committees. He could always be depended upon to attend committee meetings when his health permitted.

It is a personal loss to all of us that Senator Kinley has been forced to resign because of his health, and I know I speak for all honourable senators in saying that I hope he will recover, and be spared to enjoy a well-earned retirement.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the third reading of Bill S-14, respecting the construction of an international highway bridge between Fort Frances, Ontario, and International Falls, Minnesota.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL, 1971

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 17, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), for second reading of Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, may I speak on behalf of the honourable Senator Welch?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Haig should speak now instead of the honourable Senator Welch?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Bill C-229 has many serious defects. For one thing, it is definitely altering the course of the Government from that of providing unemployment insurance to that of ensuring ever-increasing welfare handouts.

The potential for abuse is frightful. The family unit is rejected as the basis for calculating unemployment compensation. Instead, the individual worker is used as the basis, and apparently it matters little if that person is a working wife, unemployed husband or a bachelor.

The bill provides for increased assistance to claimants with dependants earning less than $50 a week. By no stretch of the imagination is this the equivalent of using the family unit and its income for measuring needs.

Another area of potential abuse is that of pregnant working women. Let us take, for example, a married woman who holds a teaching certificate. She could receive 17 weeks' maternity leave and be paid unemployment compensation for 15 of them. All she would need to do to qualify would be to work for 20 weeks before taking her leave. Her unemployment contributions would be $1.18 a week, a total of $23.60 for 20 weeks. Her salary of $150 or more a week would entitle her to receive the maximum unemployment benefit of $100 a week. Not bad! An investment of $23.60, yielding a return of $1,500 and a vacation of four and a half months.

No matter how much her husband earns, anyone who can put together 20 consecutive weeks of remunerative labour stands to collect unemployment benefits. This will engender sheer waste. Women whose hushands earn fabulous salaries, women who work for their own entertainment only, will be in a position to claim compensation when the work runs out. I suggest that this is outrageous.

A person could qualify for benefits with only eight weeks' work in a year, because from eight to 19 weeks of work he is eligible, depending upon national and regional unemployment rates, for from eight to 51 weeks of benefits. It could thus be possible for someone to contribute as little as $15.80 and claim as much as $5,100. I repeat, this is outrageous.

An employee who had worked 20 or more weeks in the year and had lost his job would automatically collect three weeks of benefits even if he immediately went to work at another job. Even the employed will cash in on this insurance for the unemployed.

A person could be out of work, make no effort to find any, and collect $100 a week of someone else's hard-earned cash. Is this the "Just Society"?

The general effect of the legislation is that the Government's increased participation in unemployment insurance will be extremely costly. The Government has virtually ensured its constant participation in the business of handouts, and has made sure that it will always have the wherewithal to accommodate the unemployed by including nearly everyone as a contributor. Only the self-employed are omitted. However, while unemployment is becoming more common among those in higher income brackets, the 1,200,000 who will pay insurance for the first time are, in effect, paying a new tax rather than an insurance premium. Their chances of receiving benefits will always be quite remote.

Certainly people would rather work than receive unemployment insurance, because chances are that by working they can make more money. However, the day that ceases to be the case, the day it becomes more profitable for a goodly number to collect unemployment insurance benefits than it is to work, we are then in trouble. We may well have reached that point.

If we add up all the welfare benefits that the federal Government provides, we have what amounts to a pretty handsome guaranteed annual income, which comes mighty close to obviating for many the need of employment. That is the serious question I raise. To finance this largesse, the federal Government must continue to borrow gigantic sums, thus incurring debts which our descendants will be paying off for God knows how long. More and more money is being spent by this Government on social assistance. There is, however, a limit, and I think that limit was reached some time ago.

We have not yet received Senator Croll's report on poverty, but we have received a non-official brochure from certain of his former staff. We await with anxious anticipation the committee's report in September.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the working Canadian, who in my opinion represents the largest group in our economy, can no longer afford to support the non-working Canadian. The productive segments of society can no longer support the non-productive without jeopardizing their own wellbeing.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are confining that to those who cannot work?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I agree with what Senator Walker has just said by way of interjection. I direct my next comment to the honourable Senator Croll. Our welfare system will bankrupt us unless we speed up our rate of economic growth. The only way to reduce the number on welfare is to create more jobs. That is self-evident. The only way to do that meaningfully is to permit industry to expand. That, too, is self-evident. The only way that will be achieved successfully is by reducing the rate of taxation—these remarks were prepared before last Friday when the Honourable Edgar Benson introduced his budget proposals and tax reform legislation, which no one as yet understands—and by putting an end to the planned discouragement of foreign investment. I will leave that point now and probably discuss it in September, after we analyse Mr. Benson's budget proposals, because no one, including the Government, understands what they mean.

Unlike the federal Government, we do not consider that unemployment and its attendant poverty is a permanent feature of our economy. At meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance we have heard from experts in government, private industry, and so on, and no one completely understands what is going on. I do not think the Government does either. Unlike the federal Government, we do not consider that the solution to our economic problems is to be found in more and more spending of tax dollars by the central Government.

Honourable senators, Mr. Benson has produced a budget; he has not introduced the White Paper proposals. We will face the problem of tax reform legislation very shortly, and this Government must face the fact that if it spends $100 it must earn $100; if it spends $110, a deficit will occur. Where will that deficit be?

This Government never spends on business endeavours that are productive of either tangible goods or permanent jobs. I suggest that is the private enterprise sector. To argue that Government uses tax dollars to subsidize industries which in turn create jobs, is to introduce a red herring, since enterprises in need of help from the Government will never be of much use to the economy as a whole anyway.

The economy of Canada has stagnated. Excessive taxation has sapped all our productive energy. Yet, another czar of welfare has taken it upon himself to dole out more and more of the wealth we do not have in order to curry favour with part of the electorate. Honourable senators, this bill was introduced before the Honourable Edgar Benson's budget, but this is an indication of what this bill, plus his new budget, is trying to do. Sooner or later that part of the electorate which is being bled incessantly to pay for all this will wake up, rebel and turn these professional do-gooders out. I am not referring to Senator Croll's committee, a group of which disagreed with him. I am not disagreeing with the views of Senator Croll and Senator Carter with respect to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. However, I suggest that for the sake of fiscal sanity we should vote down this piece of legislation.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it the intention of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) in speaking now to close the debate?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to remind honourable senators that if there is no other honourable senator who wishes to speak, the speech by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I do not propose to detain the Senate this evening, because I was unduly protracted in the explanation of this rather long bill last week.

I would like to deal with one or two points raised by the honourable Senator J. M. Macdonald in connection with his discussion of the introduction of new participants into the insured group. His estimate and mine was that a further 1¼ million contributors would be added. Senator Macdonald referred to them as people who are in stable employment, such as teachers, government employees, professional athletes, and others. He said that as far as they are concerned it is an expression of good will that they should agree to be covered, because they have little hope of benefit. Senator Macdonald has been for many years very familiar with the unemployment insurance legislation in this country. However, I think something must and should be said regarding the changing circumstances of life in our labour force, due mainly to the advance of technology.

If one reads, for example, Le défi américain, the book published by J. J. Servan-Schreiber in France and translated into English many times about the real threat from the American economy, which come from technological development, one can think that almost any vocation or avocation might become obsolete or affected by the disease of obsolescence. If one reads Peter Ferdinand Druckers' book, The Age of Discontinuity, one will have the same idea reinforced.

It is true, of course, that a computer, thank heaven for this, cannot play hockey, golf, football or baseball games. However, the computer can reduce the number of personnel in the Taxation Branch of the Department of Finance. It is true also, I suppose, from our point of view that teachers will always be needed. But the plain fact is that educational television can bring the greatest scholars from any part of the world instantly—classicists, mathematicians, scientists and philosophers—not only into the student's room but as well into the college and high school auditoriums. Teaching done in this way will, of course, lead ultimately to a reduction in the cost of education. Who can say what the risk will be for people in the teaching profession, which has always been thought of as a very stable profession?

Senator Haig said that the premiums to be paid by these new entrants is just a new tax and not an insurance premium. I think it may very well be an insurance premium. If the act, which has not really been substantially amended since it was first enacted in 1940, stays with us for another 31 years, there could be vast changes in almost every endeavour.

In my opening remarks I said that welfare savings could be as much as $80 million in a year because of the operation of the claimant assistance program. What I should have said was that in 1968 there would have been an estimated saving of about $80 million in that year in welfare costs if the present proposals of the bill had then been enacted. The reason for that would be the more general, almost universal, coverage of people in the labour force, and the more flexible duration of the benefits. As honourable senators will remember, it is possible for a person on benefit to be in and out of the labour force and not always drawing unemployment insurance for a certain period. I forget the figure I used, but I think for the major attachment claimant the clock runs for some 29 weeks. In that period the claimant can be on benefit and then off benefit, earning money in a casual job, and if that job folds, he can again get onto benefit.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Did I understand the honourable senator to say 1968 was the last year for which figures are available?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I was using 1968 as a year for which tests and estimates were made about the effect of this bill, had it been in force at that time, on the welfare payments which in fact were paid in 1968. The estimate is that if this bill had been in force in 1968, welfare costs would have gone down by $80 million.

The other feature of this legislation that would reduce welfare costs would be the claimant assistance program proposed to be carried out under the provisions of this bill. Every person who begins to draw benefit is required to have at least two interviews with a claims officer, with the people in the unemployment insurance organization. There will be not only an examination of the claimant's working record but also advice given as to where employment might be found, both in his own locality and in other parts of Canada. This might well result not only in persons who are unemployed being re-employed more quickly, but, because of the training facilities that are available through the department of Manpower and Immigration, placing them in better jobs. This, I think, is a highly desirable feature of the bill.

Senator Macdonald spoke a good deal about the two-week waiting period before benefits are paid. Under the present act the waiting period is one week. The justification for using the two-week waiting period, as proposed in the bill, is a little more than the reason I gave. I said that it was the period in which papers leading to the processing of the claim could be handled properly. That is not the important point. Had I known Senator Macdonald was particularly interested in it I might have tried to elaborate on the point, or perhaps not made it in the way I did. It will take two weeks, I think, before the papers are properly processed. But the important thing is to specify a date from which benefits can begin to be paid. That date need not be as long as two weeks; it could be perhaps three, four or even five days less than two weeks. However, I believe this is a matter that Senator Macdonald would prefer to have cleared up by experts in committee rather than have me make a speech about it.

I do say this, though, about the two-week waiting period. It is just one of the facets of the problem of the unemployed. There are other factors which arise out of this bill that are very important to the unemployed man. First of all, there will be a longer term within which he will receive benefits. There will be a better opportunity provided for re-employment of a worker who has a temporary loss of income. There will be a more open attitude towards the use of casual work, which will not necessarily be added to his benefits but might be substituted for a period, and then he will be able to go back on benefit if the casual work is in fact casual and temporary. Another important feature to the man who has a temporary suspension of income is that the benefits under this bill will be higher than under the legislation as we now have it. All these factors are important to a man earning between $20 and $50 a week. As I say, I think it would be a great deal more satisfactory to Senator Macdonald and other honourable senators to get this information in committee.

Senator Haig suggested that the family unit is rejected. I have never really understood that unemployment insurance took into account the matter of insuring families. I think the concept of unemployment insurance is to insure the worker against a temporary loss of income. In so far as we can assure, or insure, that a worker gets a certain amount of revenue during the period his income is temporarily suspended, I suppose we are not only helping him but, presumably, helping his dependants. Under this bill the benefits are 66⅔ per cent of the average weekly earnings, with a maximum of $150 of earnings, and $100 of benefits. If the person has dependants that 66⅔ per cent goes up to 75 per cent. Therefore, the point that Senator Haig raises, that the family unit is rejected, is in fact not the situation under this new measure.

Senator Haig also talks about pregnant women in the working force getting money—they are entitled to 15 weeks of benefit, 9 before and 6 after delivery—and he somehow thinks that there will be a month of holidays in that period. I shall leave him to the mercy of the lady senators in this house to straighten him out on that. I doubt very much if any part of that time may be considered as a holiday.

Senator Haig talks about the welfare aspect. I would point out to him that there is a maximum of 51 weeks of entitlement. I am informed that the average unemployment insurance claim, over a great many years, works out at a maximum of about 14 weeks of temporary suspension of work. Any person who gets in excess of that is receiving benefits beyond the average.

Senator Haig also complains that the cost to the Government will be very high. I should make it abundantly clear that if the unemployment rate as determined by Statistics Canada is 4 per cent or lower, all the benefits proposed under this bill will be paid from the account, to which only the employers and the employees contribute. It is an insurance proposition as far as those people are concerned. To that extent, there is no drain on the Treasury.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What happens if the account becomes exhausted?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understand it will not become exhausted. I am told that this is an actuarily sound plan, and premium rates are reviewed annually. I believe that this is true. It is not a matter of having a fund such as we had before, which had $800 million or $900 million and in about 15 years ran down to a deficit of $37 million and is now about $350 or $365 million. We will not have a fund like that again. We will have an account, and the contributions of employers and employees, it is expected, will meet the payments that are to be made from it.

If the rate goes over 4 per cent, then that burden has to be borne by the Government. In the present circumstances, when the rate is 6 per cent or so, the cost of anything over 4 per cent has to be borne by the Government. There are provisions for escalation of benefits in the event of regional rates exceeding the national rate.

Towards the end of his speech, Senator Haig talked at length about social assistance. My reply is that this is not a program of social assistance. This is a program of social insurance. The assistance program, the welfare program, is quite apart from the program here. This is to be financed for the most part by employers and employees, by their contributions to the unemployment insurance account, which is not the unemployment insurance fund.

I should add that the rate of 4 per cent, which is the breaking point after which the Government financing will begin, has not been taken arbitrarily. I am informed that over the past 30 years the average rate of unemployment in this country has been 4 per cent. We are in unusual times now, we have a higher rate of unemployment now; but I think it can be said that that rate will gradually fall.

I do not propose to talk about the budget which was presented to the other place on Friday last. Senator Haig says that nobody understands it. If that is the case, I have wasted much time over the weekend, as I heard many people on radio and television and they all seemed to understand it. Whether they did or not, I do not know.

I was asked by Senator Macdonald whether there would be any explanatory literature. I have seen the draft of several booklets which will be used for the information of employers, employees and claimants. They seem to be the type of thing which he thought was desirable. They have not been published yet. They cannot be published until the bill has been passed. It seems to me they cover the point he raised.

Honourable senators if this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am wondering whether, by asking the Senate to refer this bill to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee rather than to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, the honourable senator is not defeating his argument, that this is insurance rather than assistance.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is probably not banking, but it may be close to banking. I do not think it is trade, and I do not think it is commerce.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Insurance is usually in commerce.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, but this is social insurance, as I pointed out in my opening speech.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Before the question is put, may I make a comment? The remark made by the Leader of the Opposition may have been made jocularly, but I do recall—I have not got it in front of me—that our rule specifically says that labour legislation shall be put before the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is on page 34, Rule 67(k)(vi) "labour legislation".

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would point out that "insurance" is mentioned in Rule 67(g)(i) in relation to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 3, 1971

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-249, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the second reading of this supply bill, I wish to remind the house, first of all, that on March 30 last approval was given for the first interim supply bill for the fiscal year 1971-72. That measure, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1971, was based on the 1971-72 Estimates, which were tabled in the Senate on February 23, 1971, and provided for the expenditures for the months of April, May and June in the amount of $2,183,638,929.41.

The Estimates on which the interim supply bill was based were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 9, 1971. Those Estimates were discussed in committee with Treasury Board officials on June 9, and were reported on by the committee on June 10, 1971.

The Estimates total $15,340,919,136, consisting of budgetary expenditures of $14,352,223,261 and Loans, Investments and Advances of $988,695,875.

The bill presently before us provides for full supply for the balance of the 1971-72 Estimates. I wish to add that the previous Appropriation Act passed in respect of the Estimates for 1971-72 was, as I have already mentioned, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1971, which granted interim supply for April, May and June for all items except Item 1, Urban Affairs and Housing. That particular vote was omitted from the original interim supply bill, since passage of Bill C-207, the Government Organization Bill, was needed to authorize the establishment ministries of state. The present bill, as I have said, grants full supply for the balance of the main Estimates for 1971-72, including the whole of Item 1, Urban Affairs and Housing, and it amounts to $6,066,052,171.59. The form of the bill is the same as that passed in previous years. No additional borrowing authority is required in the present bill.

As an additional comment for further clarity, I should like to add that the bill known as Appropriation Act No. 1 covered the Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1970-71. That is the reason why the present bill, once passed, will be called Appropriation Act No. 3, 1971.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, this is an appropriation bill covering very large sums of money and I think it can be used as a means of discussing, in a broad sense, the activities of the Government. Very closely related to the passage of the bill providing for expenditures of many hundreds of millions of dollars are the methods by which the Government raises those moneys. There was an indication given on Friday of the various proposals that the Government has placed before Parliament for raising moneys to be spent by Parliament—in other words, the budget. I just wish to say that the budget, in general, was a welcome document which, in my opinion, will gain general support from the public of Canada, from low-income groups, and from the business community.

We sometimes attempt to judge the calibre of the Prime Minister, naturally, by the various actions that his Government takes. It was felt not many months ago that the Government had decided on a course outlined in the White Paper which was repugnant to the business community, to farmers, and to large segments of the Canadian nation. The Government, on the other hand, said that it was prepared to listen to representations from various groups in the country, from Canadian citizens generally, and was prepared to take those recommendations into consideration. I am exceedingly pleased not only with much of the content of the budget, but with the fact that the Government has shown that it is responsive to the many submissions that have been made to it by the people of this country.

What really prompted me to speak in this vein at this point tonight was a statement made over the weekend by the Honourable George Hees. That statement has been given great prominence in the press. Mr. Hees, the Chairman of the Conservative caucus, made the statement that in his opinion this is an election budget. and that there is going to be a general election in the country this fall. I just want to say that I think Mr. Hees is entirely wrong, and that his forecast will be proven wrong.

I noticed with some amusement that in their caucus over the weekend the Conservatives spent three hours discussing the budget, and the next day and a half discussing campaign strategy. I suggest that one thing the budget has done is cause the Conservative Party to waste a large part of its time during its weekend conference, because if I sense anything in my contacts on Parliament Hill it is that there will not be an election this year.

Mr. Hees said that if you do not get the feel of the game after 20 years, you are awfully stupid. Well, I have been around 25 years. I do not know if that makes me smarter than someone who has been around 20 years, but I cannot agree with Mr. Hees. According to the press, Mr. Hees, who chaired the two-day caucus meeting, said he knew there would be an election because public servants had told him the economy would sour next winter. So the bureaucrats have told Mr. Hees that the economy is going to sour this winter, and thus he says there is going to be an election this fall. But perhaps the next time he will be saying the bureaucrats are all wrong, and that you should never listen to the bureaucrats; that if you want a successful government you should forget about the bureaucrats. But this time Mr. Hees predicts there will be an election.

I think by its general principles and its general direction the budget presented to Parliament will do much to inspire the confidence of the Canadian public in the Canadian economy. We can look forward to better economic times in the months ahead, and these better economic conditions will not be interrupted by an election.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Having heard from a convert, a non-convert asks permission to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, for the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have some difficulty in commenting on Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation, because on the one hand I find myself in considerable agreement with some parts of the expressed intention of the Government in introducing the bill, while on the other hand, like so many other objective analysts, including, I think, by inference the sponsor of the bill, I have an instinctive feeling that there is something very wrong about it. The express purposes of the bill as clearly stated by the minister are two-fold. They are, first, to help develop and maintain strong Canadian controlled and managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and, secondly, to give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.

I think it may well be that the Government has found itself in an essential contradiction in attempting in one bill to reach these two objectives. The first objective is to build up Canadian corporations in the economy, and the second is to provide an opportunity for greater participation by Canadians to invest in the economy. Yet, we are told by the sponsor of the bill, and it has also been indicated by the minister that the earliest possible date at which the public is likely to be in any way induced to participate in this corporation is five years away. Others say it will be 10 years before the public is able to participate, while an informed guess would be that it never will. I see no reason to believe that the Canadian public will ever be induced to invest in this corporation because there are so many essential contradictions within the bill itself, so many constraints on the corporation, and so many apparent fallacies of economic reasoning that one has to wonder what has been going on during the last eight years since a former minister of finance, the Honourable Walter Gordon, announced the intention of introducing such a bill—for a rather different purpose, I might add, from that which is now stated. It will be remembered that at that time the emphasis was on repatriation of Canadian control of Canadian corporations or, as it was generally expressed, the "buy-back" concept.

The minister, the sponsor of the bill here, and others speaking on behalf of the Government have stated that that is not one of the objectives of this bill. But it seems to me that the right kind of bill could have made a great contribution at this time to this important aspect of the development of our economy. In a world in which the trend is to multi-national corporations, we should above all else seek to develop in this country some Canadian-based multi-national corporation which will be able to compete on equal terms in the kind of world trading milieu which we are going to face in the future. This bill seems to ignore completely one of the essential facts about the development of multi-national corporations over the last decade or so, and that is the fact that this kind of development has come very often from small corporations dealing in highly sophisticated technological innovations, and which have as a result grown into big corporations.

Surprisingly enough, this bill limits investments in the corporation to corporations which have shareholders' equities of at least $1 million, or the potential of reaching that figure. I say it is ignoring completely the lesson learned by those of us who have taken part in the activities of the Science Policy Committee, that it is the small corporation in Canada which over a period of time—and you can take any period you like, since innovation has become so important—has become the innovative factor in our industry. Over and over again we had evidence in that committee that the vast corporations were often not interested in Canadian developed innovation, and over and over again we had evidence that it was the small corporation both here and in the United States that normally took up the innovation and developed from it a large corporation. Yet this bill, in one of its many contradictions, says that no corporation that at any given moment does not have a shareholders' equity of $1 million can be considered for investment.

I have had some experience over the last few years of examining the approach to economic development of some other countries, particularly the very successful ones such as Japan, West Germany, The Netherlands and Switzerland. I would say that the experience of those countries, and the way in which they have gone about developing their own economies, appears to have been completely ignored during the eight years that the structure of this bill has been discussed. It is a complete non-sequitur to the experience of economic development in the successful countries of the world. For that reason I say it is not going to be an attractive vehicle for the public, and ultimately is doomed to failure.

Honourable senators, this is a $2 billion corporation in its concept, and anything less than a $2 billion corporation would have little or no effect in stimulating the kind of corporate development we need in Canada. But what do we start with? There is $250 million of Government money spread over three years, with $100 million in the first year. Then the Government says that the public will, hopefully, come in with the other $1,750 million. But there is nothing anywhere in this bill to indicate that there is the least likelihood that the public will come in. Why is that? Because of constraints in the bill itself. Why the emphasis here on national interest? No one, as a rule, quarrels with the concept of national interest in the investment of public money but, in the corporate field, who is going to decide what is in the national interest?

This corporation is not a Crown corporation. It will be a private corporation. The Government will eventually have an equity, we are told, of only 10 per cent. Shares of the corporation will be listed on the stock market and it will be subject to the Canada Corporations Act. To all intents and purposes it will be a private company.

What can it invest in? Can it invest in snowmobiles? Is that in the national interest? Is it in the public interest to have more snowmobiles? Can it invest in a distilling corporation? Is that in the national interest? Can it invest in the Canadian wine-growing industry? Is that in the national interest? Can it invest even in the exploitation of our resources, to be taken out of the ground and shipped abroad unprocessed? Is that in the national interest?

Who is to decide? Yet, according to the bill, the investments of this company are limited strictly to investments which, it has been said quite clearly, are to be in the national interest. Who decides? Does Parliament? No, Parliament has no say whatsoever.

When the Government has invested its $250 million, that money has gone so far as Parliament is concerned. The bill expressly mentions—and the minister, in commenting on the bill, made it very clear—that the corporation will, if I might quote the minister's words, "operate free of pressure by departments of the federal Government." It is hard to think of a sillier statement for a minister of the Crown to make. This corporation will be one hundred per cent controlled by the Government the day it comes into operation. The Government will be the single shareholder on that day. It will always be the largest shareholder under the terms of the act, and it is almost certain that it will be the major shareholder for many years to come.

In those circumstances, deputy ministers will sit on the board, although admittedly without a vote. Public money will be involved. Yet, we are told, it will be free from departmental control. Are we really expected to be that naïve, and believe that the corporation, of which the Government will be the largest shareholder, will be free from departmental control? Does it mean that the Department of Finance will wash its hands of this company, and have nothing whatsoever to do with it? According to the minister, the corporation will be free from all departmental control, which means free from control by the Department of Finance. Does this make sense? This is one of the many contradictions that I find in the bill, which led me to believe that it has not a hope of success.

We are also told of another contradiction, which is that one of the purposes of the bill is to take some significant steps to rationalize and improve various sectors of Canadian industry:

> Some of these steps will involve mergers, amalgamat ons and other corporate arrangements designed—

I hope honourable senators will listen to this:

> —to strengthen the competitiveness of Canadian industry.

Did anyone ever read such nonsense? In a country which has the Combines Investigation Act we will have a corporation owned by the Government, initially and for many years, which will seek to bring about mergers and amalgamations to strengthen the competitiveness of Canadian industry. Can anyone tell me how mergers and amalgamations strengthen competitiveness in industry? Yet that is the clear statement of the intent of the bill. Competitiveness against whom I do not know.

I should hasten to say that I am not opposed to mergers and amalgamations in business when they strengthen that business within the corporate economy, but I will never be guilty of saying that a merger strengthens competitiveness in industry.

Yet this is the kind of nonsense that is mentioned in the bill. We are told, regarding public investment, that one of the purposes of the bill is to bring in "those areas of particular promise and interest to the Canadian economy where there is not otherwise likely to be a sufficient degree of Canadian participation." I do not think there is any doubt that Canadians today have more opportunities than people of almost any other country to participate in the corporate development of their economy. I have never at any time heard of a shortage of investment possibilities. I have never heard of anyone who said "I have money to invest in the Canadian economy, but I cannot find a corporation in which to invest." Yet this corporation is somehow going to bring in money from Canadians who otherwise are not likely to be sufficiently interested. That is just nonsense!

Senator Hayden and others have pointed out that the strict rules applying to this corporation means that it must make a profit. It is to be well managed and have a good board made up of the best available private entrepreneurs. The minister said that the corporation will make a profit, that it will succeed on its own and that it will be so set up that it will make money.

It is clear that no one but the Government believes that. We will pull into this corporation Polymer, which last year made a profit of $13 million, Northern Transportation, Panarctic, and Eldorado, the only Crown corporations that are making money or which are likely to make money. Their profits, instead of going into consolidated revenue, as they do now, will go into this company, which was to make a profit on its own. However, to induce these Canadians who would not otherwise be interested, we are throwing them into this strange bundle of economic confusion called the Canada Development Corporation. Surely, if the Government had any confidence whatsoever that the concept of this new corporation was in any way viable it would not have to include these corporations, particularly those which are profit-making, or potentially so.

Obviously the Government does not believe in this act at all. It is simply taking money out of the consolidated revenue and saying that if this corporation does not start to lose too much money all at once it is something that may make it possible for them to declare dividends. As we all know, one of the two major inducements to the public to invest in corporations is the possibilities of growth. There was reference earlier to Mr. Benson's budget. He has done his best by promoting the capital gains principle to make the growth principle in investment less interesting, at least than it was. The other, of course, is dividends. I presume it is in the hope that these dividends may be bootlegged in from these existing corporations so that there might be some possibility that this corporation will be in a position to pay dividends.

Having made those remarks with respect to the bill, I might be expected to describe what type of bill might have done the job. I believe it is essential to Canada that the job be done. We hear a great deal with respect to the problem over the years in Canada of foreign investment, which is serious. I would not describe myself as an economic nationalist. I do not believe we would have the standard of living we enjoy today if it had not been for foreign investment. I see no alternative in the past or in the present to a continuous flow of foreign investment into Canada.

I would hope that the time would come before very long when this Government would face up to the problem and produce some guidelines, as has been done in other countries, and say seriously to our friends who are investing in Canada that in this country there are some ground rules. Instead, we are perhaps the only country left in the world which has no effective ground rules for foreign investment. An outstanding example of this is the Japanese experience. They have produced a higher growth rate in GNP and standard of living than any country in history. They did it, amongst other things, by having strict guidelines regarding foreign investment. They did not turn it away, but welcomed foreign investment. However, they channelled it into those segments of their economy where it would do the most good and have the least harmful effects.

We have no indication at the moment that the present Government is even thinking along these lines. Nothing whatsoever is being done, yet we have, perhaps as a kind of palliative or sop to the public, this bill which pretends on the surface to do something about the problem. It speaks of channelling Canadian savings more and more into investment in Canadian corporations. It should be clear from my remarks that there is not the least hope in the world that this bill will do it within the next 10 years, if ever.

My suggestion is that we study the Swedish example in addition to those of the Japanese, Swiss, Dutch, and even the French.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There is also Mexico.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I have no knowledge, Senator Benidickson, of the Mexican economy; I have not studied it, but I know something of the others. They have set up in various ways corporations that make capital available. They do not put a limit of $1 million on shareholders' interest. They consider every single proposition and examine it in terms of its export potential and the potential for the domestic market. They have boards of experts, and arrangements with their banks. A liaison between government, business and labour has developed in these countries.

Honourable senators, if instead of this bill we had a genuine attempt on the part of the Government to remedy what is certainly the greatest recurrent economic disease of Canada, this continual confrontation between government, business and labour, it would be a better prospect. Other countries are solving it, but I see no indication that this Government is facing up to it. Certain departments of government are baiting business; business is certainly misunderstanding and still calling the Government names. Labour is calling both business and the Government names. How are we to achieve any of the purposes of this bill unless we get down to cases? If this bill was a step in that direction I would be in favour of it. There is nothing in it to indicate that it is even a partnership between Government and business. The Government intends to establish a corporation and has the power to take over existing firms and some power to invest in new ventures.

There is mention of technological innovations, but with the limitation that I have indicated, which makes it meaningless.

I say, honourable senators, that I am disappointed in this bill. For eight years I have looked forward to it. I was a supporter and have been since the start of a concept in government conceiving a viable method of funding corporate progress in this country, one which by its own terms would bring together such matters as profit sharing and others. They are all well-known techniques, which are being used in other countries. The concept is to somehow produce a bill which, using the financial power of the Government, would bring together these elements and really contribute to the kind of corporate development that we must have in Canada unless we are to go further down in the international trade race than we are at the moment.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-240, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Honourable senators, never does a government gladly ask the population to pay more taxes or higher rates. However, when necessity demands it and the increases are necessary and justified, it is, in my opinion, the government's duty to take such a step. We must therefore honour the courage and pluck of the Government which, aware of its responsibility, proposes enaction of Bill C-240, which I have the honour to submit here, concerning increases in rates of postage on first class mail. I consider this increase to be amply justified by a succession of substantial deficits, and necessary in order to bring about an improvement of postal services.

Honourable senators, the Post Office Department anticipates a deficit of $113 million for the year 1971-72 which is to reach $120 million for 1972-73, to speak only of those two years. I consider it to be desirable that the Post Office Department should cover its expenses or, at least, that the gap between costs and revenues should not be too great.

The one-cent increase in the letter rate from July 1971 to January 1972 will bring in approximately $37 million in additional revenue, and the two-cent increase for the year 1972-1973 will yield about $80 million more. Obviously this additional revenue will not make up the deficits, but the gap will not be very great and it should be substantially reduced in the next five years according to the department's forecasts.

Any deficit must be compensated for in one way or another. Should the bill be paid by the general public or rather by those who use the postal services the most?

The Government has decided to have mail users pay for this deficit, to a large extent those who make the greatest use of postal services and to a lesser extent those who only use them occasionally. It is a well known fact that 80 per cent of postal receipts come from business firms and industries which send out a large volume of mail, such as, for instance, department stores, power and telephone companies, etc. For the individuals who only avail themselves of postal services once in a while, this increase will represent an average of fifty cents a year.

These large business firms and companies surely can bear this increase for a service they use regularly; and I do not believe that such a raise will mean bankruptcy for them. This increase for individuals as well as for companies and business firms is very small, in comparison with price increases for consumer goods or with salary increases and I also have in mind the present cost of clothing, food, housing and services.

[English]

May I add that it is significant that letter rates in Canada, on a truly comparable basis, are much lower than in most other highly developed countries. To reach this conclusion, we related postal rates in each country to the average hourly earnings of manufacturing workers in that country. This provided us with a percentage showing postage rates related to a purchasing power common denominator.

Of seven countries examined on this basis, Canada has the lowest real cost of stamp. Specifically, the average worker in this country can mail a first-class letter with what he earns from two per cent on his hourly wage. In Great Britain, by comparison, it takes over twice as much labour application; namely, five per cent of the average hourly wage of the worker is required to pay for a first-class mail stamp. In Australia the real cost of a first-class mail stamp in buying power equivalent is almost two and a half times that in Canada, while in France it is five times as much. On these grounds, the new rates bear a most favourable comparison with these countries.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, this increase will serve not only to make up deficits and to pay part of the cost of transportation and salaries, which, incidentally, have increased this year by $5 million and $45 million respectively, but this increase will also help to improve postal services. A few examples should be enough to prove that the department wishes to give Canada one of the best postal services in the world.

Some $300 million will be used to modernize or erect buildings for postal services up to 1975. An $80 million mechanization program will be carried out to speed up mail delivery. You know that what has been called the postal code has been inaugurated in Ottawa and that, in 1974, it will cover the major cities of the country.

We have just received a notice explaining the assured mail service, which was begun last week here in Ottawa through the installation of special mail boxes bearing blue and white stripes and which guarantees delivery within 24 hours to the localities mentioned on the said boxes, without additional cost, provided, however, that the mail be deposited on time, an easy enough condition to fulfil for this improvement in speeding up and guaranteeing mail delivery.

[English]

In order to meet widely expressed public views, we have moved to resume the extension of letter carrier service where conditions justify it. During the calendar year 1971, the Post Office will establish 23 new such services. Again to meet public demand we have restored wicket services on Saturdays in many offices. This wicket service is estimated to cost $900,000 in the current year.

A six-day delivery service was not restored, because most customers have found a five-day service to be adequate. The background to this is the increasing trend of Canadian business towards Saturday closing, and the corresponding social trend in all communities towards relaxed weekends. Moreover, this discontinuance allows for a saving of about $13 million in the first year, and proportionately higher savings in future years.

Similarly, discontinuance of the twice daily mail delivery to residential areas has found general public acceptance. For businesses the twice daily delivery is, of course, continued. There is an annual saving of $25 million.

If I may refer to the five per cent commission for the sale of stamps, this change is being proposed to enable the Post Office to respond to customer needs for more stamp sales outlets at locations where regular post office installations are not warranted. The change will tend to make the handling of postage items more attractive to a greater number of business establishments, and permit the Post Office to be more selective in determining the location of outlets for postage items.

The Post Office is asking for authority to introduce a zone rate structure for letter packets over one pound. A zone rate structure would bring greater equity in the rate levels for these heavier items and would put that service in a more competitive situation with the private sector.

The Post Office is also seeking authority to provide rate incentives to large customers who are willing to prepare their mail at a production saving to the department. I would like to make it clear, however, that the benefit to the mailer would not exceed the net reduction in costs to the Post Office.

[Translation]

This bill delegates a host of powers from the Postmaster General to the regional general managers and directors of postal districts in order to decentralize the work and allow most of the decisions to be taken in the field instead of being constantly referred to the minister's office. Needless to say, this new policy will considerably accelerate the work and increase the efficiency of the Post Office Department; it will also doubtless please those who are scared "blue" or "red" of patronage.

Additional privileges will be granted mail for the blind.

As the Post Office Department must pay for the use of premises, it will ask the other departments to pay for the postal services it gives them.

To make communications even easier between the legislators and the citizens, postage-free mail will include not only the correspondence addressed from Ottawa to the homes of citizens and vice versa, but also to the correspondence between the home of the legislator and that of the Canadian citizen. The same will apply to four annual mailings of printed matter by the legislator, thus sparing the inconvenience and the trouble formerly caused by those who used to do it in a roundabout way by first addressing such mailings to the House of Commons and from there to their ultimate destination.

Honourable senators, if the department's forecasts prove to be right, it is estimated that before 1975, the difference between costs and revenues will be substantially reduced and even eliminated although the Post Office plans numerous improvements.

Those were the main things I wanted to say about the bill. I briefly outlined the main changes that will be made in order to improve the postal service of which we should be proud.

Honourable senators, if the bill is given second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications. Officials of the department will answer the questions of honourable senators who would like more information. Having had the privilege of knowing several of them, I can assure you of their great competence and I take this opportunity to pay them a tribute.

[English]

On motion of Hon. Mr. White, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, may I mention that the house will not be sitting on Thursday next, which is St-Jean-Baptiste Day. However, four committee meetings have been arranged for that day. The house itself will sit on Friday.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT OF CONCLUSIONS

1. The 7th meeting of the Constitutional Conference was held in Victoria on June 14-16, on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the entry of British Columbia into Confederation.

2. The Conference discussions dealt with constitutional provisions as set forth in a Charter which is based on the consensus arrived at in the Working Session of the Constitutional Conference in February 1971. While that consensus was the starting point, the negotiations at the Victoria Conference have been extensive and far-reaching. The first Ministers have agreed that the texts as drafted are of such importance that they should be reported to all governments for consideration. If the Charter, which is to be treated as a whole, is accepted, and this acceptance is communicated to the Secretary of the Constitutional Conference by Monday, June 28th, 1971, governments will recommend the Charter to their Legislative Assemblies and, in the case of the Federal Government, to both Houses of Parliament.

3. The acceptance of the Charter by both Houses of Parliament and by the Legislative Assemblies would enable the necessary action to be taken to patriate the Canadian Constitution, so that the power to amend and to enact constitutional provisions will rest exclusively with the Canadian people.

4. The proposed Charter also contains the terms of a formula for amending the Constitution entirely within Canada, and a number of other provisions to be incorporated into the Constitution at the time of patriation. These provisions are concerned with certain basic political and language rights, regional disparities, the Supreme Court of Canada, federal-provincial consultation, and the repeal of reservation and disallowance. In addition, a number of steps would be taken to bring the language of the Constitution up to date, including the renaming of certain enactments, and the deletion of spent and irrelevant provisions.

5. The Constitutional Conference also discussed the subject of social policy. It agreed to include in the proposed Charter an amendment to Section 94A of the B.N.A. Act by adding to its provisions family, youth and occupational training allowances. In addition, a new subsection is to be added requiring consultation by the Government of Canada with provinces on any proposed legislation in relation to a matter covered by the revised section.

6. An early meeting of First Ministers will be held to discuss all aspects of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, including tax reform, shared-cost programs, equalization and tax sharing.

7. First Ministers expressed their appreciation to the Prime Minister of British Columbia for his hospitality in receiving the Conference in Victoria in his province's centennial year.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL CHARTER

1971

PART I

POLITICAL RIGHTS

Art. 1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada every person has the following fundamental freedoms:

freedom of thought, conscience and religion, freedom of opinion and expression, and freedom of peaceful assembly and of association; and all laws shall be construed and applied so as not to abrogate or abridge any such freedom.

Art. 2. No law of the Parliament of Canada or the Legislatures of the Provinces shall abrogate or abridge any of the fundamental freedoms herein recognized and declared.

Art. 3. Nothing in this Part shall be construed as preventing such limitations on the exercise of the fundamental freedoms as are reasonably justifiable in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, order, health or morals, of national security, or of the rights and freedoms of others, whether imposed by the Parliament of Canada or the Legislature of a Province, within the limits of their respective legislative powers, or by the construction or application of any law.

Art. 4. The principles of universal suffrage and free democratic elections to the House of Commons and to the Legislative Assembly of each Province are hereby proclaimed to be fundamental principles of the Constitution.

Art. 5. No citizen shall, by reason of race, ethnic or national origin, colour, religion or sex, be denied the right to vote in an election of members to the House of Commons or the Legislative Assembly of a Province, or be disqualified from membership therein.

Art. 6. Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House and no longer, subject to being sooner dissolved by the Governor General, except that in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, a House of Commons may be continued by the Parliament of Canada if the continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of the House.

Art. 7. Every Provincial Legislative Assembly shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for the choosing of the Legislative Assembly, and no longer, subject to being sooner dissolved by the Lieutenant-Governor, except that when the Government of Canada declares that a state of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection exists, a Provincial Legislative Assembly may be continued if the continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of the Legislative Assembly.

Art. 8. There shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of each Province at least once in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament or Legislature in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

Art. 9. Nothing in this Part shall be deemed to confer any legislative power on the Parliament of Canada or the Legislature of any Province.

PART II

LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Art. 10. English and French are the official languages of Canada having the status and protection set forth in this Part.

Art. 11. A person has the right to use English and French in the debates of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislatures of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

Art. 12. The statutes and the records and journals of the Parliament of Canada shall be printed and published in English and French: and both versions of such statutes shall be authoritative.

Art. 13. The statutes of each Province shall be printed and published in English and French, and where the Government of a Province, prints and publishes its statutes in one only of the official languages, the Government of Canada shall print and publish them in the other official language; the English and French versions of the statutes of the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland shall be authoritative.

Art. 14. A person has the right to use English and French in giving evidence before, or in any pleading or process in the Supreme Court of Canada, any courts established by the Parliament of Canada or any court of the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, and to require that all documents and judgments issuing from such courts be in English or French, and when necessary a person is entitled to the services of an interpreter before the courts of the other Provinces.

Art. 15. An individual has the right to the use of the official language of his choice in communications between him and the head or central office of every department and agency of the Government of Canada and of the Governments of the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

Art. 16. A Provincial Legislative Assembly may, by resolution, declare that any part of Articles 13, 14, and 15 that do not expressly apply to that Province shall apply to the Legislative Assembly, and to any of the provincial courts and offices of the provincial departments and agencies according to the terms of the resolution, and thereafter such parts shall apply to the Legislative Assembly, courts and offices specified according to the terms of the resolution; and any right conferred under this Article may be abrogated or diminished only in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 50.

Art. 17. A person has the right to the use of the official language of his choice in communications between him and every principal office of the departments and agencies of the Government of Canada that are located in an area where a substantial proportion of the population has the official language of his choice as its mother tongue, but the Parliament of Canada may define the limits of such areas and what constitutes a substantial proportion of the population for the purposes of this Article.

Art. 18. In addition to the rights provided by this Part, the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the Provinces may, within their respective legislative jurisdictions, provide for more extensive use of English and French.

Art. 19. Nothing in this Part shall be construed as derogating from or diminishing any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into Force of this Part with respect to any language that is not English or French.

PART III

PROVINCES AND TERRITORIES

Art. 20. Until modified under the authority of the Constitution of Canada, Canada consists of ten Provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Newfoundland, two Territories, named the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, and such other territory as may at any time form part of Canada.

Art. 21. There shall be a Legislature for each Province consisting of a Lieutenant-Governor and a Legislative Assembly.

PART IV

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Art. 22. There shall be a general court of appeal for Canada to be known as the Supreme Court of Canada.

Art. 23. The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada, and eight other judges, who shall, subject to this Part, be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada.

Art. 24. Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the Bar of any Province, has, for a total period of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a barrister or advocate at the Bar of any Province.

Art. 25. At least three of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the Bar of the Province of Quebec, have, for a total period of at least ten years, been judges of any court of that Province or of a court established by the Parliament of Canada or barristers or advocates at that Bar.

Art. 26. Where a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court of Canada and the Attorney General of Canada is considering a person for appointment to fill the vacancy, he shall inform the Attorney General of the appropriate Province.

Art. 27. When an appointment is one falling within Article 25 or the Attorney General of Canada has determined that the appointment shall be made from among persons who have been admitted to the Bar of a specific Province, he shall make all reasonable efforts to reach agreement with the Attorney General of the appropriate Province, before a person is appointed to the Court.

Art. 28. No person shall be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada unless the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of the appropriate Province agree to the appointment, or such person has been recommended for appointment to the Court by a nominating council described in Article 30, or has been selected by the Attorney General of Canada under Article 30.

Art. 29. Where after the lapse of ninety days from the day a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court of Canada, the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of a Province have not reached agreement on a person to be appointed to fill the vacancy, the Attorney General of Canada may inform the Attorney General of the appropriate Province in writing that he proposes to convene a nominating council to recommend an appointment.

Art. 30. Within thirty days of the day when the Attorney General of Canada has written the Attorney General of the Province that he proposes to convene a nominating council, the Attorney General of the Province may inform the Attorney General of Canada in writing that he selects either of the following types of nominating councils:

(1) a nominating council consisting of the following members: the Attorney General of Canada or his nominee and the Attorneys General of the Provinces or their nominees;

(2) a nominating council consisting of the following members: the Attorney General of Canada or his nominee, the Attorney General of the appropriate Province or his nominee and a Chairman to be selected by the two Attorneys General, and if within six months from the expiration of the thirty days they cannot agree on a Chairman, then the Chief Justice of the appropriate Province, of if he is unable to act, the next senior Judge of his court, shall name a Chairman; and if the Attorney General of the Province fails to make a selection within the thirty days above referred to, the Attorney General of Canada may select the person to be appointed.

Art. 31. When a nominating council has been created, the Attorney General of Canada shall submit the names of not less than three qualified persons to it about whom he has sought the agreement of the Attorney General of the appropriate Province to the appointment, and the nominating council shall recommend therefrom a person for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada; a majority of the members of a council constitutes a quorum, and a recommendation of a majority of the members at a meeting constitutes a recommendation of the council.

Art. 32. For the purpose of Articles 26 to 31 "appropriate Province" means, in the case of a person being considered for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada in compliance with Article 26, the Province of Quebec, and in the case of any other person being so considered, the Province to the bar of which such person was admitted, and if a person was admitted to the bar of more than one Province, the Province with the bar of which the person has, in the opinion of the Attorney General of Canada, the closest connection.

Art. 33. Articles 26 to 32 do not apply to the appointment of the Chief Justice of Canada when such appointment is made from among the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Art. 34. The judges of the Supreme Court of Canada hold office during good behaviour until attaining the age of seventy years, but are removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Art. 35. The Supreme Court of Canada has jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals on any constitutional question from any judgment of any court in Canada and from any decision on any constitutional question by any such court in determining any question referred to it, but except as regards appeals from the highest court of final resort in a Province, the Supreme Court of Canada may prescribe such exceptions and conditions to the exercise of such jurisdiction as may be authorized by the Parliament of Canada.

Art. 36. Subject to this Part, the Supreme Court of Canada shall have such further appellate jurisdiction as the Parliament of Canada may prescribe.

Art. 37. The Parliament of Canada may make laws conferring original jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of such matters in relation of the laws of Canada as may be prescribed by the Parliament of Canada, and authorizing the reference of questions of law or fact to the court and requiring the court to hear and determine the questions.

Art. 38. Subject to this Part, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in all cases is final and conclusive.

Art. 39. Where a case before the Supreme Court of Canada involves questions of law relating to the civil law of the Province of Quebec, and involves no other question of law, it shall be heard by a panel of five judges, or with the consent of the parties, four judges, at least three of whom have the qualifications described in Article 25, and if for any reason three judges of the court who have such qualifications are not available, the court may name such ad hoc judges as may be necessary to hear the case from among the judges who have such qualifications serving on a superior court of record established by the law of Canada or of a superior court of appeal of the Province of Quebec.

Art. 40. Nothing in this Part shall be construed as restricting the power existing at the commencement of this Charter of a Provincial Legislature to provide for or limit appeals pursuant to its power to legislate in relation to the administration of justice in the Province.

Art. 41. The salaries, allowances and pensions of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Art. 42. Subject to this Part, the Parliament of Canada may make laws to provide for the organization and maintenance of the Supreme Court of Canada, including the establishment of a quorum for particular purposes.

PART V

COURTS OF CANADA

Art. 43. The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution of Canada, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada, but no court established pursuant to this Article shall derogate from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada as a general court of appeal for Canada.

PART VI

REVISED SECTION 94A

Art. 44. The Parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, and in relation to family, youth, and occupational training allowances, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a Provincial Legislature in relation to any such matter.

Art. 45. The Government of Canada shall not introduce a bill in the House of Commons in relation to a matter described in Article 44 unless it has at least ninety days before such introduction, advised the government of each Province of the substance of the proposed legislation and requested its views thereon.

PART VII

REGIONAL DISPARITIES

Art. 46. The Parliament and Government of Canada and the Legislatures and Governments of the Provinces are committed to:

(1) the promotion of equality of opportunity and well being for all individuals in Canada;

(2) the assurance, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality are available to all individuals in Canada; and

(3) the promotion of economic development to reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities for all individuals in Canada wherever they may live.

Art. 47. The provisions of this Part shall not have the effect of altering the distribution of powers and shall not compel the Parliaments of Canada or Legislature of the Provinces to exercise their legislative powers.

PART VIII

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSULTATION

Art. 48. A Conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the First Ministers of the Provinces shall be called by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once a year unless, in any year, a majority of those composing the Conference decide that it shall not be held.

PART IX

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

Art. 49. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada may from time to time be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Legislative Assemblies of at least a majority of the Provinces that includes

(1) every Province that at any time before the issue of such proclamation had, according to any previous general census, a population of at least twenty-five per cent of the population of Canada;

(2) at least two of the Atlantic Provinces;

(3) at least two of the Western Provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least fifty per cent of the population of all the Western Provinces.

Art. 50. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, of the Provinces may from time to time be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Legislative Assembly of each Province to which an amendment applies.

Art. 51. An amendment may be made by proclamation under Article 49 or 50 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if within ninety days of the passage of a resolution by the House of Commons authorizing its issue the Senate has not passed such a resolution and at any time after the expiration of the ninety days the House of Commons again passes the resolution, but any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the ninety days.

Art 52. The following rules apply to the procedures for amendment described in Articles 49 and 50:

(1) either of these procedures may be initiated by the Senate or the House of Commons or the Legislative Assembly of a Province;

(2) a resolution made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

Art 53. The Parliament of Canada may exclusively make laws from time to time amending the Constitution of Canada, in relation to the executive Government of Canada and the Senate and House of Commons.

Art. 54. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to the amendment from time to time of the Constitution of the Province.

Art. 55. Notwithstanding Articles 53 and 54, the following matters may be amended only in accordance with the procedure in Article 49:

(1) the office of the Queen, of the Governor General and of the Lieutenant-Governor;

(2) the requirements of the Constitution of Canada respecting yearly sessions of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures;

(3) the maximum period fixed by the Constitution of Canada for the duration of the House of Commons and the Legislative Assemblies;

(4) the powers of the Senate;

(5) the number of members by which a Province is entitled to be represented in the Senate, and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(6) the right of a Province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing the Province;

(7) the principles of proportionate representation of the Provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada; and

(8) except as provided in Article 16, the requirements of this Charter respecting the use of the English or French language.

Art. 56. The procedure prescribed in Article 49 may not be used to make an amendment when there is another provision for making such amendment in the Constitution of Canada, but that procedure may nonetheless be used to amend any provision for amending the Constitution, including this Article, or in making a general consolidation and revision of the Constitution.

Art. 57. In this Part, "Atlantic Provinces" means the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, and "Western Provinces" means the Provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

PART X

MODERNIZATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

Art. 58. The provisions of this Charter have the force of law in Canada notwithstanding any law in force on the day of its coming into force.

Art. 59. The enactments set out in the first column of the Schedule, hereby repealed to the extent indicated in the second column thereof, shall continue as law in Canada under the names set forth in the third column thereof and as such shall, together with this Charter, collectively be known as the Constitution of Canada, and amendments thereto shall henceforth be made only according to the authority contained therein.

Art. 60. Every enactment that refers to an enactment set out in the Schedule by the name in the first column thereof is hereby amended by substituting for that name the name in the third column thereof.

Art. 61. The court existing on the day of the coming into force of this Charter under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada shall continue as the Supreme Court of Canada, and the judges thereof shall continue in office as though appointed under Part IV except that they shall hold office during good behaviour until attaining the age of seventy-five years, and until otherwise provided pursuant to the provisions of that Part, all laws pertaining to the court in force on that day shall continue, subject to the provisions of this Charter.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 22, 1971

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Laprise had been substituted for that of Mr. Beaudoin on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

CLEAN AIR BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-224, relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin moved that the bill be read a second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of the text of a proposed Order in Council authorizing the issuance of a proclamation for the establishment of a Ministry of State for Science and Technology, pursuant to sections 14 and 15 of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, Part IV of chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71.

Volumes I and II of a report entitled "Proposals for a New Business Corporations Law for Canada", together with statement thereon by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL, 1971

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Chesley W. Carter, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John J. Connolly moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 23rd June, 1971, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator McDonald leave to proceed with his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Rule 76(4) forbids a Select Committee to sit during a sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable senator explain the necessity for his motion?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am sure that Senator Flynn is aware that last night, on behalf of Senator Hayden, I adjourned the debate on the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation. I expect that Senator Hayden will proceed with that item later today, and that will conclude the debate on second reading. It is desirous to have this bill before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee tomorrow. The committee will also resume its consideration of Bill S-9, to amend the Copyright Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The motion to sit in the afternoon is required in case the committee cannot complete its consideration of these two bills in the morning?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I intended to speak briefly on Bill C-219 today. May I do so and then adjourn the debate on behalf of Senator Hayden for later today?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

VIETNAM

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES IN 1964—QUESTION

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government, who is the former Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if he has read the seventh in a series of articles on a secret study made by the Pentagon of the United States with respect to participation in the Vietnam War? This article from the New York Times, which appeared in the Globe and Mail on June 21, states that while the United States had been lending assistance to South Vietnam surreptitiously for quite a number of months in 1964, it had done so without advice to congressional leaders. They had on the Pentagon shelf two bombing plans with respect to North Vietnam, phase one and phase two.

Again, prior to giving information to Congress, in December 1964 the members of the Security Council pressed the President to go ahead with phase one of this bombing plan. The article states that at a meeting of the U.S. Security Council held on December 1, the President became rather cautious and said that before giving his authorization he wanted "new, dramatic, effective forms of assistance from several allied countries." He specifically mentioned Australia, New Zealand, Canada, the Philippines, and the United Kingdom. These countries were to be briefed with respect to the two bombing plans.

The article goes on to state that special envoys were in fact sent to these countries, that two or three were given full information respecting both plans, and that Canada was given somewhat less information than that given to some of the other countries. Nevertheless, a special envoy from the United States was sent to Ottawa, I think in early December, to speak about the plan to the Canadian Government.

I wonder if the former Secretary of State for External Affairs could inform Canadians as to what advice or reply was given on behalf of Canada to the representations made by the special United States envoy, who thought that Canada might be a possible ally in deepening the involvement of the war by the commencement of bombing in North Vietnam?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, last night Senator Benidickson intimated that he proposed to ask a question with respect to some of the documents that have recently been published by certain American newspapers. I did not specifically understand that the question would be in as detailed a form as it is today. I would prefer to take the question as notice and endeavour to deal with it later.

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

OBSERVANCE OF HOLIDAY BY PARLIAMENT—QUESTION

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I would like to ask some questions of the Leader of the Government. I suppose the leader is aware that Thursday next, June 24, is a statutory holiday. I would like to ask two or three questions:

Is this holiday observed in the other place? Is it observed in this house? Are committees to sit on that day? If so, is the leader aware that both the parliamentary restaurant and the cafeteria will be closed on that day?

Hon. Paul Martin: I am not aware of the closing of the restaurant and cafeteria. However, I certainly will check into this, because it is the intention that committees of the Senate will sit on that day although the Senate itself will not sit. Under the law, the House of Commons itself does not sit on that day.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What is the difference between the Senate and its committees when it comes to observing or not observing June 24? I am afraid that you will not have a quorum in any of the committees you intend to have sit.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That would be regrettable. Last year the committees sat and we had quorums. I am sure all honourable senators regard it desirable to be here.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I was not here when the honourable Senator McDonald moved the adjournment of the Senate last night and indicated that the house would sit on Friday and that committees would sit on Thursday. I suggest that this is a matter the Leader of the Government could discuss with me in an effort to comply with the wishes of the majority of this house.

BUSINESS CORPORATIONS LAW

SUGGESTED STUDY OF PROPOSALS BY SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Hon. John J. Connolly: May I ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) a question? In one of the documents tabled today there is a two-volume report entitled "Proposals for a New Business Corporations Law for Canada". It appears to be a rather formidable document, perhaps with far-reaching consequences for corporate law in Canada. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government has given any consideration to a committee of this house, perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, making a study of these proposals some time in the fall?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is a constructive suggestion, and perhaps Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) would like to make this proposal when we meet in September. If not, I would be glad to do so.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It might be discussed with the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

POVERTY COMMITTEE

ARTICLE BY FORMER STAFF MEMBERS—QUESTION REFERRED TO SENATE PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Croll, on a question of privilege, raised a matter that we all regarded as of great importance. Both Senator Flynn and I made comments on the seriousness of the fact that former employees of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty had published certain material that we regard as being the property of Parliament, and particularly in this instance of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

In the light of the discussions that we had last night, I asked the Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate if he would look into the premature publication of the committee's proceedings and evidence, and any associated matter, and advise as to the course he thought, under the law and under our practices, should be pursued. When this advice is obtained the matter can be considered further by us. I also propose to discuss this matter with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn), since the issue concerns not only all honourable senators but Parliament, I think, as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I merely say that I agree with the remarks made by the Leader of the Government. I think we should look into this matter and decide on the course that should be followed. It is very important that we do not let this—I will not call it an incident but a very serious happening—go by without doing what should properly be done.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, for the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Hayden, may I have leave to speak to the house briefly?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it so agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you very much. My remarks will be brief because this matter has been debated at great length in the other place and, with distinction, in this place. I should like to summarize my remarks by saying that the Canada Development Corporation bill is both immature and immaterial.

In the first place, my respectful suggestion is that this is not the time for this legislation. The timing is really off. The Honourable Mr. Gray, Minister of National Revenue, is in the midst of working out a very careful report as to why there is so much foreign takeover, why the outside interests are in so many cases controlling our resources. How we can go ahead with a bill like this when we have not that report, I do not know. We should have before us the Government's analysis of the reason we are losing control of the economy and the reason Canadians are not participating more fully in the development of that economy. We are bound to get some clues from that report, which I understand is being worked on very seriously. Therefore, my first submission is that this bill is premature. I hope that it will be shelved, at least until the fall when Parliament resumes.

The Canada Development Corporation is immature. We have no knowledge that it will aid our economy, we have no help from the Gray report, we have no yardstick on which to judge it. Were its object and the object of the bill to help Canada, then it could make a lot of sense, even if it had to be amended later on. In other words, when Canada's needs have been analyzed by the Gray report, the Government could bring together the need, on the one hand, and the money and the talent, on the other hand.

The Government could do great work, in that respect. We know that if any job is to be undertaken, if any development is to go ahead successfully, on our experience—perhaps we are going to learn something in the future, but we have not so far—we must leave it to private enterprise. It is the best system yet devised for building up not only any economy but most certainly the Canadian economy.

When we look back on the history of government interference in industry, we find that, with fairly few exceptions, where government goes into business the business is doomed to failure. In the Province of Saskatchewan, where I was last week, there is a clear example of the manner in which the Douglas government tried one business enterprise after another, and almost all of them were doomed to fail.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Who do you say is going to win the next election there?

Hon. Mr. Walker: I have a pretty good idea, and you know. One thing I can tell you, the Tories are not going to support the NDP. You will be glad to know that. Also, that is a surprise for my honourable friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Hon. Mr. Benidickson).

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: No; but twenty years ago that was not the attitude of the Tories.

Hon. Mr. Walker: If you want to make a speech, let us call it "fantasia", and you get up and make it. We will be glad to listen to you. Sometimes your speeches sound like that, without any effort. You do not mind my making that remark, do you?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I did not hear you.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is the way I used to be when I was in the other place and you used to interrupt me. "I didn't hear it." That is a good way to be at times, is it not? Especially when rude remarks are made. But you never make rude remarks.

Honourable senators, we are talking about the failure of the Government in business. Polymer is one of the few exceptions, because it was a remarkable business that supplied a basic need for a world-wide market. It was organized by distinguished businessmen, men of great ability, and it is still run by distinguished businessmen. It is run almost as a private enterprise and it resents and opposes any efforts at government interference. The day the Government interferes with Polymer, which is one of the few companies the Government has not interfered with, the success story of Polymer is bound to begin to wane.

Just think of the Government's failures in business with the consequent costs to Canada's economy—billions of dollars. Think of the Canadian National Railway which has been a 50-year headache as well as a pocket-ache so far as the Canadian taxpayers are concerned. Consider its incredible deficits each year. Now we see Air Canada following in the same path. At the beginning Air Canada was well set up, with very able businessmen in charge. These men had first-class knowledge of the airplane industry, and as a result Air Canada's was a great success story. But the day came when those top men, who had made Air Canada what it was, were superannuated. In their place we now have as top men, and I do not mind repeating myself, men who are incompetent to run an airline. That fact is rapidly showing itself. The decline has already set in. I predict that with Air Canada we will never again have anything but a deficit unless we do something radical by way of a change in top management.

Let me give you a further example: the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That is a government instrument which each year has a larger deficit than before. Its deficit is now approximately $100 million a year, and you can be sure that just as taxes are always with us, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's deficit will always be higher—year after year.

Then we come to the Canada Development Corporation whose aims are vague and uncertain. It could almost be said that CDC is a twin-headed monster, each head working against the other. On the one side the first aim is to develop Canadian industry. It is to take Canadian industry and build it up or it is to keep Canadian industry, which cannot be sold in Canada, from being sold to the Americans. On the other side, it has to make money for its shareholders.

How laudable! It is very laudable! It is very important that shares are going to be sold to the Canadian public! But sometimes such objects as building up a Canadian industry, or nursing or doctoring a Canadian industry and keeping it from being sold to the Americans, sometimes such objects are in so much direct conflict with profits that it is just like bittersweet—the one works against the other.

Take, for example, the case of Ryerson Press. The honourable senator from Regina (Hon. Mr. Argue) made a belated effort on behalf of Ryerson Press. But suppose that Ryerson Press had been able to be taken over by CDC. Could you argue that would aid Canada because it would save one of its few remaining textbook publishers, when in fact from a profit standpoint there would be no way in which the Canada Development Corporation could become involved without a consequent loss to the Canadian shareholder? In other words, the dilemma of this twin-headed monster would have made such a takeover impracticable if not impossible.

[Hon. Mr. Walker.]

So where does the responsibility of the directors lie? And bear in mind that there will be 18 of them if this bill becomes enacted. To me this whole CDC bill appears to be, like the budget, just another election gimmick. I am not so certain that it is not. So where does the responsibility lie? To what extent should the directors take lower profits in order to achieve Canadian participation? There would certainly be pressures from the shareholders to get a relatively fair dividend. But on the other hand there will be great pressure from the public to take on some of these sentimental, you might say, and well-meaning corporations who need help.

It is suggested that the first acquisition of the Canada Development Corporation will be the crown corporations themselves: Polymer, Eldorado, Northern Transportation and the 45 per cent government-owned shares in Panarctic Oils. But these crown corporations have already been capitalized by and are being operated on the taxpayers' money. In effect, every Canadian citizen is at the present time a part-owner of these enterprises. How, then, can the Canada Development Corporation presume to buy these crown corporations? Nevertheless, CDC proposes to repurchase these companies with the Canadian taxpayers' money. Why, I say? It is to enable the conglomerate, which the CDC will certainly become, to be sold back to individual Canadian citizens. In other words, instead of leaving the said crown corporations as they are at present, under the ownership of all Canadian citizens, these crown corporations will be bought back and then sold to a few Canadian citizens. Does that make any sense? How will that stop the onrush of American penetration into our industries and the takeover of Canadian business by American enterprise? Canadians already own these crown corporations so that in any event they cannot be bought by American enterprise.

Honourable senators, I could go through the entire bill in this fashion, pointing out its inherent self-contradictions, but why continue? As you can realize, and as I have said before, this bill is not only premature but is immature. It is not only vague but even in the parts that we can understand it shows itself to be impractical. Worst of all, its main objectives are bound to be in direct conflict, one with the other: to develop Canada's industry on the one hand and, to pay good dividends on the other.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Denis, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Gélinas, for the second reading of Bill C-240, intituled: "An Act to amend the Post Office Act".—(Honourable Senator White, P.C.).

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I had intended to speak on this order today, but before doing so I wished to review what honourable Senator Denis had to say on this bill last night. You will recall that it was quite late last evening when he made his remarks, and that is the reason for my wishing to look at Hansard. Unfortunately, I did not obtain a copy of Hansard until just a few moments ago, so that I would prefer to go on tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In any event, royal assent is not required for this bill before next week, and we can be confident that the Senate will be able to discharge its duties in due course.

Order stands.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the second reading of the Bill S-17, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act."—(Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.).

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate to September 7.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If we come back!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this order shall stand until September 7?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order Stands.

PILOTAGE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-246, respecting pilotage.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise with some trepidation this afternoon to deal with the subject of pilotage, a subject with which I am not overly familiar, particularly when I see such experts among my colleagues as Senator Langlois on the one hand and Senator Paterson on the other. So, I hope you will forgive me if I deal with the subject this afternoon in the rather broad generalities that my layman's status imposes upon me.

I recall reading somewhere, perhaps during my education in law, that the oldest corporate organization known to the English common law was an organization called Trinity House. Trinity House is the organization that regulates and operates the pilotage services in the United Kingdom. From this we can assume that pilotage is one of the most ancient avocations known to man, and is perhaps almost as ancient as that profession to which I belong. I also suspect that pilotage shares with my own profession a certain entrenchment of rights and privileges and a certain assertion of these rights and privileges born of long and honourable precedent, and not perhaps entirely without a tinge of self-interest.

Coming specifically to Bill C-246 which is now before us, perhaps I may quote the minister when he stated in the other place that the objective of this bill was to provide the greatest possible degree of safety for ships which move through Canadian coastal waters. I must, of course, agree with that objective, but I would be less than frank with you if I did not admit that after reading the bill I find that perhaps that objective is somewhat overshadowed by other objectives and, in fact, becomes a secondary consideration.

I say that, honourable senators, because it is my opinion that this bill really deals primarily with two other objectives, those of that group of persons known as pilots, and those of that group of persons known as shipowners. In the former category, of course, I am referring to those people who guide and advise the masters of ships when they are sailing close-in waters and where the danger of collision or grounding may be more severe. In the latter case I am referring to those persons who use these pilots, either by choice or under compulsion, as ofttimes may be the case. I am referring to the mates of ships and the masters of ships and, through them, shipowners themselves.

In order to make the provisions of this bill somewhat more meaningful, perhaps at this stage it would be useful to refer briefly to the history of pilotage legislation in this country. Up to this point, pilots and their relationships with shipowners, and the relationships of both with government regulatory bodies, were covered by the Canada Shipping Act. Over the years, the Government has—and I suspect somewhat against its will—gradually become more and more involved in this relationship between the two other parties, and has gradually moved from the performance of a purely regulatory function to a role in which it finds itself performing as a governor, an employer, a conciliator and in practically every other category one can think of. And so today, honourable senators, to varying degrees, the Government not only licences pilots but provides boats, collects fees from the shipowners, pays the pilots, employs and dispatches them, and so on.

I think all honourable senators will agree that this is not a satisfactory situation from the point of view of the Government or from the point of view of the other parties involved, particularly in this area where such matters should be dealt with and settled by the private sector of the economy within itself. I am not suggesting for one moment that the Government must not fulfill an overall regulatory function. Under this bill, of course, it does fulfill such a function, not only in the public interest as far as shipping and the danger involved to shipping in coastal and close-in waters is concerned, but also in relation to the danger presented by shipping in so far as water pollution is concerned.

Honourable senators will recall that in 1961 there was a strike of pilots in the Gulf area. At that time it became evident that pilots were not satisfied with their lot in life, and that there were many problems that would have to be dealt with by the Government. At that time or shortly thereafter a Royal Commission on Pilotage was set up to examine into the relationship of government and pilots, government and shipowners and pilots and shipowners. Many voluminous reports have been issued from time to time by this commission, which I am informed is still sitting; in fact, if my recollection is correct, this commission has now exceeded the record established by the B and B Commission.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: In cost or in time?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The sittings are over. They are drafting the final report.

Hon. Mr. Lang: There is one final report to come from this commission. Based on the preceding reports, the Government was able to prepare and bring forward Bill C-246.

The bill is based largely upon the recommendations of the commission and contains approximately 36 of the 38 major recommendations it made.

In order to bring the matter into perspective, I have several facts which may be of interest. Although knowing little about pilotage and its problems, I was somewhat surprised to learn that in the whole of Canada we are speaking of about only 514 persons, of whom 72 are pilots in the Atlantic area, 251 in the Laurentian area, 111 in the Montreal and Great Lakes area, and 80 on the west coast.

When we speak of shipowners who may be affected by the provisions of the bill, we are referring to shipping concerns throughout the world who trade with Canada. Specifically we are speaking of about 20 Canadian shipping concerns who operate in the neighbourhood of 300 ships.

In my humble opinion, the Canadian pilots are hardly fit subjects for an inquiry by Senator Croll's committee. I note that in 1970 the average annual wage for pilots in British Columbia was $26,000; in Quebec, $22,000; in the Halifax area, $20,000, and in the Sydney-Newfoundland area, $11,800.

Over the years the Government has gradually assumed greater responsibility until today it costs the Government approximately $2 million a year to carry out its role in these operations.

One way or another this type of expenditure is a subsidy to shipowners or pilots who, between themselves, should be able to look after their respective interests without drawing upon the public purse. Basically, this is one of the major long-term aims of this piece of legislation. Shipowners have their own federation dealing with these matters, and pilots have their own unions and associations. Both shipowners and pilots should be able to look after their interests with the minimum of government interference, particularly in tariff matters.

Turning now to the specifics of the bill: it replaces certain parts of the Canada Shipping Act which heretofore dealt with these problems, and it embodies by and large the recommendations of the Royal Commission. Specifically it establishes four new basic concepts in the regulation of Canadian pilotage.

There are today 29 regional pilotage authorities in Canada, each having different characteristics which to a large extent are historical. They vary, for example, from the authority for the Great Lakes area, which extends from the Welland Canal to the Lakehead, where in effect pilots are employees of the Government, to the Maritime area where pilotage authority is provided by entrepreneurial bodies contracting with local pilots and basically carrying out their own internal operation. In between these extremes we have mixtures of private enterprise and government control.

The bill reduces those 29 authorities to four regional authorities, each of which will take over the duties, responsibilities, liabilities and assets of the old organizations. Of those four regional authorities, one will be for the Atlantic area, one for the Laurentian or Gulf area, one for the Great Lakes area, and one for the Pacific coast.

The second major change in principle, policy and direction contained in the bill vests within those authorities autonomy over all pilotage matters within their geographical jurisdiction, subject basically only to review or confirmation by the federal Government, and, where applicable and necessary, to appeal. Each of those four bodies will be governed by a chairman and up to six members, who will be representative of both the shipping industry and the pilots. Each authority will have basically the powers of a crown corporation. It will have the power to own land and make investments, to own ships and boats, and to borrow money, and so on. It will have vested in it the paramount power of licensing pilots, of examining their qualifications for such licensing, and in the public interests limiting the number of pilots. In essence this provision breaks up the authority heretofore vested in the minister, and which the minister exercised in certain of the 26 areas such as the Great Lakes.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That is the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Yes. His authority and responsibility will now be largely exercised by the regional body.

Thirdly, this bill vests within these respective authorities the right to determine compulsory pilotage areas. It imposes upon those authorities the responsibility to determine what these areas should be, and for changing them. It delineates the requirements to be imposed upon ships operating in them.

Fourthly, and finally, the bill replaces what I am advised has been referred to historically as the flag and trade privilege whereby certain ships or shipowners are permitted to operate without pilots in areas where they have adequate local knowledge of navigational conditions. This right to so operate, notwithstanding the local knowledge, is now taken away from the shipowners. In lieu thereof they are permitted to operate without a pilot if their master and/or mate has received a pilotage certificate from the local pilotage authority.

Honourable senators, I have had to deal with this bill in a broad and sweeping manner. I have not brought to your attention many of the details which are set forth in detail in the various clauses. I hope you will have an opportunity to examine these specific provisions and raise questions with the witnesses who will appear before the committee. I hope that from my rather hasty examination of what is a technical and complicated area I have been able to give you a broad outline of the main provisions and sweep of the bill, together with some of its historical significance and, indeed, sufficiently so to commend it to your favourable consideration for its progressive approach to this problem.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege and pleasure to draw your attention at this time to the amendments that are currently before Parliament to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, which was first passed in 1965. As a preamble I make the point that it is the responsibility of the Government to protect the unorganized workers in this country who, as you know, represent by far the greatest percentage of the work force. I refer to people who are not covered by collective agreements and who depend, therefore, on the federal and provincial governments to stipulate the minimum standards which govern their very existence in the work force.

Basically, minimum labour standards are designed to ensure that all workers enjoy specific conditions of employment which conform to socially acceptable norms. They are designed to establish a legal barrier below which these conditions cannot be driven. This barrier, represented by minimum standards, is being increasingly recognized as an important instrument of social policy. It is so recognized by the Government of Canada, and will be used accordingly.

In this regard it may be well to keep in mind that the newspapers carry stories these days of the very high hourly wages that have been negotiated on behalf of specific labour unions. From time to time publicity is given to the high averages that are achieved by certain professional organizations. There are also reports having to do with the benefits of welfare. Nevertheless, it is seldom that consideration is given to those who do not have the protection of organizations, and who are unable to bargain for themselves. Only too often they are unable to earn sufficient to encourage those on welfare to obtain employment. It seems to me, that while we have responsibilities in the welfare area to ensure that no one goes without, we also have a responsibility to encourage people to leave the welfare rolls and find work, by ensuring there are rewards that will provide them with something more than a mere subsistence. I would say that this is basically the purpose of this bill.

It will be recalled that when the Canada Labour (Standards) Code came into existence in 1965 it provided certain basic standards governing hours of work, overtime pay, vacations with pay, and general holidays. The minimum wage at that time was $1.25. The standard hours of work were eight per day and 40 per week, with a maximum of 48 per week. The minimum rate of overtime beyond standard hours was time and one-half, the minimum paid vacation was two weeks, and the minimum number of paid general holidays was eight per year.

Some amendments in the present bill relate to all the standards which I have just enumerated. They represent the experience gathered during the five or six years that the standards have been in force.

I am sure that many honourable senators are aware of the difficulties encountered in introducing the standards under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code in the field of transportation, namely, the problem of adapting the code to the railway industry, the trucking industry and some segments of the shipping industry. Among other things, these amendments should make it possible to deal more effectively with the type of difficulty that has made it necessary, in so far as the existing hours of work provisions are concerned, to issue special orders covering certain portions of the transportation industry, and to keep railroads under deferment. It is intended that the increased flexibility proposed in the amendments will make the bill more applicable and more functional in these areas, and also allow it to be used with good sense and in consultation with labour and management.

With the exception of the minimum wage there is no basic change in the standards now set forth in the code. The minimum wage was increased last July from $1.25 to $1.65 per hour. Prior to last July it had not been changed for five years. This measure would make it possible for the Governor in Council to increase the minimum wage, preferably every year, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Labour. In other words, there is authority in the new section 8a to change the minimum wage from year to year by order in council, in order to keep up with changing conditions. Honourable senators who are particularly interested in the economics of fiscal policy might like to examine this clause further.

The minister would provide for a continuing process of review, in which representatives of employers and trade unions would be consulted, so that the minimum wage can be revised and maintained at an economically relevant and socially desirable level. Assuming that this minimum is increased as proposed to $1.75 per hour, it is also intended to provide a similar increase to employees under 17, which would bring their minimum wage up to $1.50 per hour from $1.40.

The Government has made is clear that it recognizes the need to examine all aspects of law and policy that affect the rights of women in Canadian society. Consistent with this recognition, there are provisions in the bill relating to equal pay for equal work, and to maternity leave. The existing provisions of the Female Employees Equal Pay Act of 1956 will be replaced by strengthened provisions in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The change of statutory locale is in itself important, because problems of inequity affecting women should, wherever possible, be dealt with not in special legislation for women but in general legislation applicable to all Canadians, both male and female. In this connection it will be noted that the language used in the proposed new equal pay part of the code prohibits pay differentials based on sex, whether directed against men or women. I presume that under this provision any man who becomes pregnant will be entitled to maternity leave as well.

The proposed new standard should be more effective for two reasons. To begin with, the prohibitive practice is very broadly defined, referring not to "identical or substantially identical work", but to "the same or similar work on jobs requiring the same or similar skill, effort and responsibility", and performed under the same or similar working conditions. I think that makes it a little clearer how to decide whether two jobs are the same.

Equally important, application of the law will no longer be dependent upon the receipt of complaints of individuals. The proposed new provisions will be subject to the general inspection and enforcement procedures of the code. This is a very important change, because under existing legislation the onus of responsibility for initiating a complaint or investigation rests with the person who feels aggrieved. Now that it is to be placed within the ambit of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the responsibility will be broadened. Not only will the department act on complaints by women in the work force, but the equal pay provisions will be subject to the same positive inspection program that is carried out in the enforcement of other standards in the code as a matter of public policy. This added responsibility placed on the shoulders of the Department of Labour and its inspectors should do much to eliminate discrimination.

I am sure Senator Manning will confirm my saying that this puts into this legislation something we in Alberta have had for 20 or 25 years. Inspectors of the Alberta Department of Labour have gone out and found where the standards were not being met, and have instituted the necessary procedures to see that the wrong was corrected.

Amendments relating to maternity leave would prohibit dismissal or lay-off solely because of pregnancy, and establish a right to maternity leave. An employee with at least one year of service would be entitled to maximum leave covering a period of 11 weeks before, and six weeks after, delivery, together with any period between the estimated and actual dates of delivery. As a lawyer, it seems to me there may be a fairly wide loophole there, because Mary Jane might decide to say she was expecting her baby in January when she really did not expect it until July, and the period in between might then be covered in the leave as well. However, by the time there are only 11 weeks to go, as Senator Sullivan will probably assure us, it will be a little hard for Mary Jane to pull one as broad as I have suggested.

It should be noted that the period of 11 weeks before and six weeks afterwards is consistent with the provisions in the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, under which an employee whose earnings are interrupted by pregnancy will, after a two-week waiting period, be entitled to benefits for a maximum period of 15 weeks. The provision is for 17 weeks in one and 15 weeks in the other, so they come out pretty well. The combined effect of these provisions will be that in most cases an employee who must take time off for the purpose of child-birth will be entitled to both job security and a reasonable level of income maintenance.

Further proposed amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code concern the increasing problem of people who are leaving the work force, of the senior worker who is forced out of his job through automation. In this technological age this is one of the big problems faced by any worker—the problem of adjusting from one job to another, the shock of losing work, and in some cases the shock of finding that one's skill is redundant. In the bill there is provision, in the case of large scale terminations, for notice to the Government and to any trade union representing the workers affected, the required period of notice varying from 8 to 16 weeks depending on the size of the group terminated.

The required minimum period of notice would vary, according to the number of employees being terminated, as follows: 50-100 employees, 8 weeks; 101-300 employees, 12 weeks; over 300 employees, 16 weeks. Violation of these provisions could result in a fine of up to $100,000.

It is a little satisfying to find that we are finally putting into some of our legislation the kind of penalty that might cause the management team or the board of directors to not look upon it solely as a cost of doing business. It is to be hoped that these fines will not be required.

The second standard in this area would provide the individual whose employment is being terminated with entitlement to a minimum notice of two weeks or an equivalent amount of pay in lieu of notice.

The third standard that is new in the legislation is the feature of the legal right to a minimum amount of severance pay. It is considered that severance pay, grouped with the provision for advance notice of termination, is of substantial significance in this particular field.

Basically, an employee with five years or more of service whose employment is being terminated, except by way of dismissal for just cause or retirement on an immediate pension, would be entitled to two days' pay for each year of service, up to a maximum of 40 days' pay. Assuming a five-day week, this would mean a minimum severance payment ranging from two weeks' pay for an employee with five years of service to eight weeks' pay for an employee with 20 or more years of service.

I might make a personal suggestion here, and say that this will give some assistance to the person whose employment is being terminated. In case it is thought this may be a burden on the employer, I suggest that when he has had the services of an employee for five years and then finds he no longer needs him, having to pay him two weeks' wages will impose no great, and certainly no unfair, burden. This money will carry the ex-employee over the period when he is looking for work. It must be remembered that these people normally have to spend all their income to meet their ordinary needs. At the end of 20 years, the right to two months' pay in lieu of anything else seems to me to put the minimum as low as possible.

A further amendment would prohibit dismissal of an employee solely because he was the subject of garnishment proceedings. When an employee is in financial difficulties he should not be subject to loss of employment and earnings simply because his employer must undertake the paperwork required to comply with a court order for garnishment of wages. Therefore, if approval is given to this bill, this practice would be brought to an end in industries within federal jurisdiction.

All of us who have had experience in dealing with people are aware that people who have got into financial difficulties find it almost impossible to find and keep employment, no matter what arrangements for repayment they make. Many employers feel that it is a matter almost of status to insist that if any one of their employees is subject to garnishment proceedings, he should be fired. This puts an end to such practices in industries under federal jurisdiction. It is hoped that the provinces will follow suit.

There are two other areas concerning the bill which I should also mention. One is that under its provisions the new standards relating to equal pay for equal work, maternity leave, group terminations of employment, and dismissal for granishment would apply to managerial and professional employees as well as to all other employees.

Honourable senators who have read the bill will also have noted that for most of the amendments the proposed effective date is July 1, 1971. Because of the possibility that related regulations will require a somewhat longer period in which to prepare and discuss them with interested parties—management, labour and other people—it is proposed that the provisions relating to notice of termination of employment and severance pay should come into effect on a date to be fixed by proclamation, which will be the earliest possible date after July 1.

I would also remind the house that the Canada Labour (Standards) Code does not apply to the public service as a matter of law. However, as the result of a commitment made to Parliament in 1965 by the then Minister of Labour, the standards established by the code are applied to the public service as a matter of Government policy. That commitment has been reiterated with respect to the standards embodied in the proposed amendments.

If honourable senators agree to give this bill second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, pursuant to Rule 67(k) (vi), for such consideration as may be felt desirable.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue moved the second reading of Bill C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the first of a batch of agricultural bills introduced in the House of Commons some time ago. The fact that this is the first one to come to the Senate would indicate that this bill is accepted. The opposition parties have made certain criticisms, as one would expect, but it passed the House of Commons unanimously and I am sure it will commend itself to the Senate.

Other agricultural bills have bogged down in the House of Commons. Bill C-176, on marketing, has been there for more than a year. Bill C-24, on stabilization, was introduced on April 29. It has not passed. Bill C-238, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, was introduced on April 21 but still has not passed. My information is that those bills are not likely to be passed by the other place before the scheduled adjournment. Therefore, the fact that this bill was able to get through the Commons is an indication that it will have no difficulty getting through the Senate.

The cash advance legislation was placed before Parliament first in 1957. Because of certain marketing conditions that prevail even today, agricultural producers were unable to market their grain in the fall in the quantities they would normally wish. They were thus short of cash, and therefore Parliament decided that it would make provision for interest-free cash advances on the grain held in storage by the farmers and the grain that the Wheat Board would ordinarily be able to accept in a crop year.

Under this legislation there has since 1957 been loaned to agricultural producers on the Prairies some $950 million. The total interest charged to the federal Treasury from 1957 to 1968 amounted to just over $12 million. So, the interest cost to the federal Treasury is a rather nominal amount in relation to the huge benefits that have resulted from this legislation.

In an ordinary congested year, if one might call it that, the loans have been between $35 million and $40 million. In the worst year, in the year this legislation was used to the fullest extent, loans were made to the amount of $273 million. To date in the present year there has been advanced to the producers under this legislation something over $90 million. The collection rate has been phenomenally good, 99.9 per cent of the advances have been paid.

I suggest that this is one of the finest pieces of agricultural legislation on the statute books of Canada today, and the amendments we are considering are necessary to bring the act up to date and to make its provisions operative under rapidly-changing agricultural conditions.

One major amendment this legislation will effect is to change the value of the cash advances in relation to the grain involved and to relate those cash advances to the amount of grain and to the kinds of grain that the Canadian Wheat Board believes it will be able to accept from producers in a given marketing year.

An amendment was made to this act in 1968, and when the act was before the Senate at that time I pointed out that, in my opinion, the new provisions were so generous and so unbusinesslike as to place farmers in an untenable position. It put them in a greater and greater debt situation without giving them the marketing opportunities to repay their obligations.

To be more specific, that legislation provided that a farmer could obtain a cash advance of $1 a bushel for wheat. He could obtain it against a six-bushel quota on all his cultivated acreage; that is, he could obtain a cash advance of $6 per acre.

I pointed out that in my judgment that cash advance was so high that under foreseeable quotas, and according to the methods by which deductions were made, farmers would be unable in the ordinary course of events to discharge their obligation. The $1 cash advance is repaid now at the rate of 50 per cent of the initial price for grain. The initial price for wheat is approximately $1.20 a bushel, depending on the grade. So, the repayment rate is 60 cents a bushel while the advance is $1 a bushel. Therefore, if he has taken the full advance, the farmer finds himself in an impossible position. He is unable to repay the cash advance. If he can get the cash advance the next year to a further maximum of $6 per acre, then he will just be getting that much further into debt.

The purpose of the amendments in this legislation is to place the act on a businesslike basis and to make some very important changes. One of the main changes is to provide that cash advances be made in direct relationship to anticipated deliveries of grain. The Wheat Board is now changing its marketing system from a specified acreage basis, which is just really all of the cultivated acres, to an allotted or assigned basis. Each year the farmer will assign a part of his cultivated acreage to a given kind of grain, and the marketing quota will be on that grain and the allocated acres rather than on the total specified acres.

This really means that if a farmer is given, shall we say, a cash advance on 3,000 bushels of wheat, the Wheat Board will expect to have delivery opportunities for this farmer in the amount of 3,000 bushels of wheat, and he will repay his cash advance at the same rate per bushel that he has received it. Therefore, at the end of the crop year, his cash advance will be fully paid.

A further amendment provides a penalty to those few producers who have clearly used the cash advance legislation as a means of getting interest-free money without intending at the same time to market their grain to the Canadian Wheat Board. The penalty will work in this way: if a farmer settles his advance in cash rather than in the delivery of grain, he will have to pay an interest rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council. In other words, if the farmer is going to use the Wheat Board cash advance system as an alternative to a bank loan, he will have to pay a normal interest rate if he does not deliver the grain. I think that is a reasonable provision under the circumstances.

The cash advance will be in an amount of 66⅔ per cent of the accepted value of the grain against which the cash advance has been taken. So, it will relate to the value of wheat, of barley, of oats, and to the Wheat Board's expected marketing quotas for this grain.

Up until this time a farmer who had wheat in the bin could get a larger cash advance than a farmer who was a barley or oat producer. Under these amendments the producers of other grains will be placed in a position of equality vis-à-vis the wheat producer, in that their cash advances will be related to a percentage of the value of the grain they are selling and to the deliveries that the Canadian Wheat Board expects to be able to accept.

There are other amendments which will come into effect by order in council when the cabinet feels that circumstances warrant these provisions being made operative. I refer to a provision for a cash advance to enable a farmer to dry damp or out-of-condition grain in the amount of some $600. Previous to this when an emergency situation prevailed and there was a great deal of grain which needed to be dried, the Government brought in emergency legislation to make such provision. This amendment will enable the Government to act in a situation where there are large quantities of damp grain without having to come to Parliament for a specific act, since it will be covered by this general act.

Another provision that can be made operative by order in council will provide a cash advance to farmers who have been unable to harvest their grain. In the past, perhaps one year in every 10 or one year in every 15, an emergency situation has prevailed in the fall as a result of which farmers have been unable to harvest their grain, and Parliament has passed legislation to provide cash advances for grain under the snow. Eventually a farmer who was short of money and who had unharvested grain was able to get a cash advance. This legislation will make provision for these cash advances against unharvested grain up to a maximum of 50 per cent of the normal cash advances but not higher. Honourable senators may feel that it is a heavy risk for the Wheat Board to provide cash advances for grain under the snow or grain remaining unharvested, but experience has shown that this is in fact a workable business proposition because in the spring the farmer will get out and harvest that grain the moment the first hour of threshing weather is available to him. Then he will repay the cash advance in the normal course of events.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to have been asked to move second reading of this bill. I must say, however, that I shall miss the valuable contributions that were made in former years by Senator Pearson and Senator Aseltine, who are now no longer with us and who were experts in this field. Senator McDonald is certainly well acquainted with this legislation. He is a practical farmer and he knows the advantages that this legislation has brought to the Canadian grain producer. Senator McNamara, who was head of the Canadian Wheat Board for many years, had the distinction of seeing this legislation placed on the statute books and of providing the operating mechanism. I am sure he would have made a much better presentation than I have been able to make, but I am also confident that he will agree with me that this is the kind of legislation that has been developed through adverse circumstances. It has been developed out of experience. When it was initially talked about, most of the authorities said that it would be impracticable and would not work. But it has now been on the statute books for many years. The Canadian Wheat Board, under the chairmanship of Senator McNamara, and since, has been able to operate and make the provisions of this act effective, thus bringing great benefits to the producers of western Canada. Producers will be pleased when they learn that this act has been changed in a way to make it more effective, to keep it up to date and to make it possible for producers to repay in the crop year in which an advance is made the moneys that they have obtained.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, before Senator Argue concludes his admirable speech, I wonder if he would indicate to us easterners what the general situation is in Saskatchewan with respect to the quantities of wheat which are held in the hands of farmers. I recall that last year the senator made an able speech in which he outlined the general conditions when the Government was inaugurating a new policy restricting the number of acres to be allotted to wheat. If he could tell us briefly the present situation compared to a year ago, I know that many of us would appreciate it very much.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Well, I do not know that the situation has changed all that much for the individual farmer. I certainly think he is happy that there is no lift program this year and that there is no arbitrary legislation to insist that he cut back on production. This year he is a free agent to seed whatever he wishes, having been advised by the minister, the Wheat Board and others, as to what his marketing opportunities are likely to be this fall.

As far as the carry-over of grain on farms is concerned, I do not have the figures at hand but I am sure Senator McNamara has them at his fingertips. I do know that there are still substantial quantities of grain on western farms. I think I said a year ago that the size of the carry-over was greatly exaggerated and that farmers would say that their problem over the years has not been so much an inability to market grain but rather a difficulty in producing it. I am pleased to report that the movement of grain out of local country elevators to the Lakehead and Vancouver, and the export market generally, is running at a very high rate. The grain is really moving. Wheat and barley are moving in large quantities. Of course, prices are not as good as we would like; in fact at the moment they are depressed. But the quantity of grain moving has greatly increased and I hope that we have "bottomed-out" and are now on the way up. I give credit to the Government and to the Canadian Wheat Board and to our trade officials for the very, very large quantities of grain we have been moving. If we keep on doing what we have I think that in the future farmers will be able to market almost all the grain they are able to produce.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Honourable senators, although I am not a farmer, I lived and taught among them for ten years. As we on this side of the house presently lack farmer-senators, and as I was born and raised in Saskatchewan and lived most of my life in Manitoba, where I was in contact with farmers, I move the adjournment of the debate with the hope that I will make a worthwhile contribution.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

CLEAN AIR BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson moved the second reading of Bill C-224, relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-224 is designed to provide us with another weapon in the fight to preserve all forms of life in Canada and to enhance the quality of the life of man himself.

Much has been said on many occasions about our need to understand the interdependence of life forms on our planet, about the thin strip of the scant 10,000 feet above the earth's surface and approximately the same underneath the seas, that supports and contains 95 per cent of living organisms which scientists call the biosphere. Much has been said concerning man's sudden realization that the precarious natural balance of this thin strip must be preserved if we are to survive.

I say "man's sudden realization" because in our history we have until recently ignored the warnings of environmentalists and scientists regarding the consequences of our ecological blunders. In Canada we were perhaps more smug than most. The Rhine and the Potomac were polluted, but the Fraser and the Ottawa ran pure. Smog killed thousands in London, New York and Tokyo, but Winnipeg and Calgary gloried in sparkling air. Oil befouled the coasts of California and England, but the sea coasts of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia retained their marvellous beauty and appeal.

Somehow we felt that we were different, that there were so few of us in so huge a country, and that we were learning from the mistakes of our neighbours. We felt that we had found the blend of progress and nature which meant the good life.

We then discovered that one of our Great Lakes was dying, our sea coasts were assaulted by oil spills, our fish were contaminated, and one by one our beaches across the country began to close. The magnificient City of Montreal was hidden for days last February by a dirty grey shroud, and the city's health authorities warned the elderly and chronically ill to stay indoors. Suddenly we realized that Canada is just as vulnerable to ecological disaster as the rest of the world.

Thus began the long fight to come to terms with our environment. Anti-pollution groups of citizens rose in number and their activities increased; professional organizations, universities and industry began to mobilize their expertise, and governments at all levels began to develop comprehensive and integrated plans for dealing with the problems.

The direction of public demand has tended to establish priorities in dealing with pollution. Water pollution has generally received top priority, followed by air pollution, soil pollution and noise pollution. These general priorities are, of course, substantially altered in detail by local considerations and special interests, but generally the pattern seems to hold true.

The public "sees" water pollution effects. They see the scum, the dead fish, the closed beaches. The public can "see" quite clearly the sources of pollution, the industrial plants, the lack of municipal sewage treatment, and they recognize the requirements for corrective action.

Consequently most provinces have water authorities administering water legislation, and during the past year a number of significant pieces of legislation have been passed at federal level dealing with water and water pollution.

On the other hand, until recently air pollution has tended to be of generally less concern to the Canadian public, and the concern which has been expressed has generally been in regard to aesthetics.

Perhaps the majority of the public could not really "see" air pollution effects in the same dramatic way, nor could they so readily recognize the requirements for corrective action. Perhaps also the layman could not conceive of the entire atmosphere becoming polluted, and, furthermore, could not accept his personal role as a principal polluter through his use of the internal combustion engine.

However, the public now knows that not only is air pollution a major problem, similar in many respects to water and soil pollution in its effects on the environment, but it also has distinctive features which make control difficult and the need for control urgent.

First, air pollution strikes directly at the health of individuals. Man has no choice but to accept the air that he breathes, whether or not it is polluted. In contrast, polluted water can be avoided, diverted to other uses, or chemically purified to make it fit for drinking.

However, with air pollution, man is in the same position as the fish in a polluted lake, in that he cannot escape.

Secondly, the atmosphere provides an effective transportation system for air pollutants, which makes it difficult to segregate specific areas of the atmosphere that are already clean from those which require remedial action.

[Hon. Mrs. Fergusson.]

Thirdly, while it is possible to pinpoint stationary sources and, therefore, areas of potentially high density air pollution, day-to-day and seasonal meteorological variations, and the mobility of other sources, make it difficult to define specific areas of constant high density air pollution. Furthermore, as we know, the economic burden of air pollution is extremely high. The economic cost of air pollution in Canada, including health costs, house and building maintenance, corrosion, laundry and cleaning costs, has been estimated at about $1.5 billion annually.

The increased awareness of the public, whether it has resulted from local incidents or from observations of the struggles to overcome pollution in other advanced nations, has resulted in an overwhelming demand for action to protect the air as a common property of all Canadians. The protection of common property is a job for the Government.

In developing the proposed bill certain principles have been used. A direct responsibility of the provinces in air pollution matters is recognized and major emphasis must be placed on a co-operative program with provinces to control air pollution. It is believed that this is best accomplished by entering into formal agreements with the provinces for the purpose of designating air quality problem areas, for special control measures for these areas and provisions for enforcement procedures. There is also recognition of the need for direct federal action, in the event of the failure of other levels of government to take the necessary corrective measures to control air pollution where such pollution affects or is likely to affect health and life. National air quality objectives are also required to serve both as long-term goals and to prevent further deterioration of existing air quality.

The principles underlying this bill have been discussed with ministers and officials in every province and the response received has been positive. There is a full awareness of the necessity for a true co-operative program if the Government is to deal with this national and international problem.

This legislation comes to grips with the basic problems involved in trying to protect the quality of air.

The extent of the effects of air pollution throughout the country must be known quickly and accurately, and the bill recognizes the need to strengthen the National Air Pollution Surveillance Network, which is a joint federal-provincial venture.

More needs to be known about the causes and effects of air pollution. The bill will allow the Department of the Environment to work closely with the groups within Canada and in other countries that are involved in this vital area. Work valuable to the success of air pollution control is being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare—which laid much of the ground work for federal air pollution control—the Department of Agriculture, the Ministry of Transport, and the officials of the former Department of Fisheries and Forestry.

From these and other parts of the scientific community the gaps have begun to be closed in the scientific knowledge about the effects of pollution on various receptors, such as man, vegetation, wildlife. As our technologically advanced society continues to inject enormous quantities of waste into the air, soil and water environment, we must be ever more alert to potential hazards. Further, the Government must ensure that "before the fact" research is conducted so that it is not continually faced with the need for emergency corrective action, with its resultant harsh effects on the community.

The Government needs to have a means of determining objectives, taking into account scientific, technical and social considerations, and a means of setting priorities while at the same time ensuring it does not create "pollution havens" or degrade the environment in those areas where current pollution levels are low. The bill allows the Government to set national air quality objectives, based upon the degree of contamination, in three ranges: "desirable", "acceptable" and "tolerable", which will enable it to focus its attention on critical areas while at the same time moving to bring air quality within the "desirable" range throughout the country.

The Government must have the means of determining, through close contact with industry and others, the best methods of measurement and control, and it must make such information readily available through publications, training programs, and demonstration projects. The bill will enable it to do these things.

The Government must have methods of ensuring that the health of citizens is protected when emergency situations arise from air pollution episodes or when particularly hazardous substances are found in the air. The bill will provide such emergency powers. It must also have the means for coping with certain trans-boundary problems, whether these be interprovincial or international in scope. The bill provides for this.

Air pollution is largely related to combustion processes and therefore the control over the composition of fuels, and particularly the additives to such fuels, must be of concern. In this respect, the bill provides regulatory power so that the Government may take preventive action.

Finally, although the Government believes that the public's concern, combined with industry's new awareness of its responsibilities, will lead to enthusiastic compliance with the provisions of this bill, the Department of the Environment must have methods of ensuring compliance. Thus there are inspection provisions and substantial fines for failure to comply.

If the bill stopped there I think we could say it was an excellent piece of legislation, but one essential element would be missing. It is not believed this Government, or any other government, has the right to impose pollution controls on industry and the ordinary citizen unless it is prepared to live by the same rules. The bill makes clear this Government's intention to have federal facilities become models in air pollution control.

I mentioned earlier the interdependence of life forms on this planet. In grappling with the problem of air pollution control we must recognize that there is also an interdependence in control activities. There is little sense in shutting off air pollution emissions from a factory stack, only to find that the pollutants are now being dumped into the river or ploughed into the soil. Within the new Department of the Environment a critical management problem will be to ensure that there is a balanced attack on all forms of pollution in keeping with the awareness of the balance of various forms of life.

In summary, it has been stated before that man's greed for material things was the root cause of many of our environmental problems. Psychologists tell us that man has a large number of requirements, ranging upward from those associated with basic survival, through security needs and social needs, culminating in the highest levels of aspiration. It is ironic that interest in air pollution control began at the top of the needs scale, with a concern for the aesthetic values because people could no longer enjoy the view from Mount Royal or Grouse Mountain. But now we are faced with a vital concern. That concern is survival.

The bill will provide the organization and the mechanisms that will enable the Government to wage the fight for survival. It deserves the active support of all parts of our society including their representatives in this chamber.

If this bill receives second reading, I propose to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for study.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, may I make a few introductory remarks and then adjourn the debate until tomorrow, in order that the reference of the Canada Development Corporation Bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where I presume it will go, will not be delayed?

I congratulate the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), but I assure her that I have not her faith in psychologists. Having said that, I shall deal with the main part of this legislation tomorrow. I think it is essential, when we are talking of pollution and the introduction of this legislation, to talk initially on the topic of moral pollution, which I mentioned some time ago.

Honourable senators, the social and political rage at the moment is ecological concern. This laudable preoccupation permeates all aspects of current life. Pollution is everywhere the villain—pollution of the air, pollution of the water, pollution in food; you name it and it is being righteously deplored.

Every revolutionary reformer or subverter of our system is pegging away at his particular crusade all the way from abortion and birth control to opposition to the western world's defence effort, and on to an ecological binge. We are obviously on an environmental "kick".

But far more deleterious and more noxious is moral pollution which, in addition to racking human bodies, is destroying souls. Drug and alcohol addiction, pornography and obscenity, sexual deviations, embryonic murders, crimes of passion and subversion exist in epidemic proportions.

While those concerned with ecology are succeeding in their crusade, with the help of all phases of government, the foes of moral pollution seem to be waging a losing battle. Pornography and obscenity have been officially sanctioned in one country by a presidential commission, abortion is being extensively legalized and laws against drugs and sexual aberrations moderated, while subversion spreads almost unmolested.

What those of us who are concerned with moral pollution must do first of all is identify the real corrosive nature of this blight. Then we must put it into the framework of the physical pollution that the successful crusaders can see and feel with their senses. Thus identified, the blight can be the object of the legislative and attitudinal reforms that are surging through the land. Above all, we have to make clear that moral pollution is wrecking human lives just as devastatingly as breathing impure air. We must also make the point that another content of the human personality, the soul, is being pushed to perdition by these forces.

We must understand the elements of this problem, and then let our parliamentarians, our provincial legislators, the mayors of our cities, our councilmen, and our school administrators, know how earnestly we feel about these insidious elements of our society. The word "environment" now evokes nightmares.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that the honourable Senator Hayden wishes by his speech to conclude the debate?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Hayden speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not propose to be very long in closing the debate, after which, as I think you already know, I propose to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I also propose to follow closely the rule that is supposed to govern a reply, that you do not repeat anything and thereby bolster what you have already said.

First I wish to refer to several things said by two of my many good friends in the Senate, Senator O'Leary and Senator White. Senator O'Leary was so concerned that he commented that I did not appear to be at my best the other night when I was moving second reading.

[Hon. Mr. Sullivan.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: I was told you were never better.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Senator White went a little further in his medical diagnosis and suggested that my effort was half-hearted. I had neither of those feelings. I thought I was rolling along pretty nicely. I thought I covered the ground fairly well, and I certainly never intended to give any indication of being half-hearted, and I never intended to give an indication that I was feeling less than completely in support of this bill.

I therefore went back to have a look at what I said. I appreciate the concern of these two honourable senators for my wellbeing, even though it was interpreted perhaps as a statement indirectly derogatory of the bill, suggesting that I had been whipped into some attitude of supporting it in some quasi fashion. Having looked at what I said, I could not find anything doubtful or half-hearted in it. Perhaps Senator O'Leary had the right interpretation when he said that I was not at my best, but I do not know that. This is a position a speaker cannot put himself in; he has to depend upon the interpretation of other people.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There are better subjective attitudes for giving you a chance of being at your best anyway.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Perhaps your heart was not in it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is what Senator White said. No, he said I was half-hearted, so perhaps only half my heart was in it.

Let us see what I said and what the interpretation is. At page 1131 of Hansard I said this:

> May I say that I favour the bill, not because I can say it will inevitably be successful, but because it is a step in a direction that could very well be successful, dependent on proper management, direction, ability and know-how. The effect, if it is successful, would be to improve the economic growth of Canada which is certainly something we need. There is opportunity here to accomplish that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You certainly hedged that one.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I defy anybody to read those words and say there is anything half-hearted in them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is very clear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Very clear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not a question of being half-hearted; it is very clear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Thank you. I am not asking you to say you will support the bill. That is up to you.

Let us move on to the next thing. In this regard I was a little concerned, because Senator O'Leary at all times impresses people when he speaks, and you accept what he says as being factual. Yet I thought in his remarks the other night he made a statement that was not correct, and Senator White also went along the same line. Let me refer to the statements first. At page 1141 of Hansard Senator O'Leary said:

> So far as I can see, there is no provision in this bill for even an annual report.

Senator White said at page 1143:

> Senator O'Leary pointed out the lack of any provision in the bill for an annual report, as is submitted by certain crown corporations.

Then at the top of the second column on that page, he said:

> If this new corporation is going to be handed over hundreds of millions of dollars belonging to the taxpayers of Canada, why will there be no annual report or, in lieu of that why is there no provision for reporting to Parliament?

Let us see what the bill says. Clause 27 of the bill, on page 20, provides:

> (1) The following provisions of Part I of the Canada Corporations Act do not apply to the company—

And certain sections of the Canada Corporations Act are enumerated. But the sections which are not excluded, in relation to the application of Part I of the Canada Corporations Act to a public company of this kind, include all the sections ranging from section 115 to section 125, which deal with the method in which the bookkeeping and accounting shall be done, the requirement for annual statements, what the annual statements shall contain—there is a very meticulous list of enumerations—the position of the auditors, the furnishing of these financial statements to the shareholders of the company 14 days before the annual meeting, and the filing of a copy of the annual statement with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In addition, this company is subject to all the securities provisions in the Canada Corporations Act. If it is going to offer shares to the public in any provincial jurisdiction, it is subject to the security requirements in those provinces.

Therefore, I say that there is ample requirement in this bill for this corporation—which is subject to the Canada Corporations Act to the extent that you do not have exclusions and incorporations of other and particular proceedings in the act—to furnish an annual statement. There is a necessity for this. The annual statement goes to the shareholders. The shareholders in the first number of years will be the Government of Canada, so they will get the annual statement. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will get the annual statement. Any member of the public can go to the department and examine the annual statement, and secure a copy of it by paying a fee.

When we come to lending by the Government we find in clause 37, on page 26, the following language:

> (1) Subject to subsection (2), the Minister of Finance may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, and upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may prescribe, make loans to the company and may acquire and hold securities of the company as evidence thereof.

Then, subsection (2) puts a limit of $100 million on the amount.

Therefore, at the stage at which a decision is made, as to whether any advances are going to be made to this corporation, the advances have to be on terms that are acceptable to the corporation, of course, but are dictated or prescribed by the Governor in Council. Whatever the information required, it must be made available, and these are the terms and conditions that are laid down. So, I say that from an accounting point of view we have all these procedures for getting all the information, and it is reasonable that we should because in this bill this corporation is not an agent of Her Majesty and is not a crown corporation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, for a while it will be. Senator Hayden has agreed that for at least five to ten years the control will be in the hands of the Government. I think that was implicit in the objections of both Senators O'Leary and White when they said there would be no annual report to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not mind accepting explanations from Senator Flynn on behalf of Senator O'Leary and Senator White, although I would enjoy it more if they felt urged to do that. I have no objection to answering any question that may be asked, but I do object to having explanations interjected when I am dealing with points that were raised by previous speakers. If Senator Flynn feels he should do it then he may do so, and I will listen.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not mean that. My honourable friend was explaining that there was no need for a report to Parliament because the corporation was not an agent of the Crown. I was just remarking that he indicated in his speech when introducing the bill that for at least ten years the control of the corporation would be in the hands of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I understand perfectly what my friend says, but the fact that in the first years the only shareholders of this corporation may be the Government of Canada does not make it a crown company. Clause 31 of the bill specifically provides:

> The company is not an agent of Her Majesty or a Crown corporation within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act.

How do reports of crown corporations get to Parliament? When reports of crown companies are furnished to the Minister of Finance or the Treasury Board, the ministers are under an obligation to table them in Parliament. That is the procedure. What I say is that the Government of Canada, even as the sole shareholder of the corporation, has all the rights of a shareholder, and those rights are spelled out specifically not only in this bill but in Part I of the Canada Corporations Act. The Governor in Council is in a position to require that all that information be furnished.

It may be suggested that there is something more that should be provided in the bill otherwise how can one know about all the requirements of the Canada Corporations Act. All I can say in that regard is that these particular sections in Part I of the Canada Corporations Act were very substantially amended in 1965. As a matter of fact, we even had a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, of which I think my friend was a very valued member, that dealt with and expanded in many ways this requirement as to accounting. In 1969 and 1970 we had further submissions in relation to these amendments in this regard. During all that period, Senator White and Senator O'Leary were members of the Senate, and therefore they knew that this legislation was before us.

I respect the opinions of all honourable senators, but a factually incorrect statement is something else. People who have not read the bill, knowing that Senator O'Leary has made a statement, will place great reliance on what he said. I must emphasize that every bit of necessary accounting information, that the Government at all times may know the financial position of this corporation, is required to be furnished, under the combined provisions of this bill and the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act.

Having said that, I will move on to something else. Senator O'Leary was twitting me in his speech about my reference to the Bank Act. On June 16, at page 1141 of Hansard, Senator O'Leary said:

> Last night my honourable friend said that he was presenting this bill as a charter for this corporation, and he likened it to the charters of the chartered banks.

From that position my friend, with all his forensic ability, jumped into the requirements of accounting that the banks must meet, even though banks are handling depositors' money which is not the money of the banks. Here the Government's money is shareholders' money. This is where it has chosen to invest it. But I said to myself, "Surely I could not have likened it to the charters of the chartered banks." I went back to look at what I had said. In the beginning I had said that this act was a charter for the corporation. At page 1130 of Hansard I am reported as follows:

> As I said at the beginning, this bill is the charter of the Canada Development Corporation in the same fashion as the Bank Act is the charter of each and every one of the chartered banks.

I said nothing about comparing the procedures and requirements under the respective acts. All I said was that it was a charter company incorporated by special act of the Parliament of Canada, that it was not a Letters Patent company. Therefore, if you want to find out what jurisdiction it has, what power it has, you find it in this bill.

I am sorry I missed Senator Walker's remarks this afternoon, but I did read a summary of those of Senator Grosart. I think Senator Grosart came part of the way, although I would not say he approved of this particular bill in the form in which it was. Nevertheless, he said it had its uses and that there was certainly a place in Canada for a development fund with $2 billion available. He did not think that $250 million was quite enough to make it sufficiently attractive for purposes of development, and so on.

As reported to me, Senator Walker did feel—and if I am saying it incorrectly I expect he will bring me to task—

Hon. Mr. Walker: Senator McDonald can given you the correct version.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: As I understand it, Senator Walker said the bill was untimely and that there were other things that should be done before getting down to a measure of this kind. I do not know whether Senator Walker would say that at no time should there be a bill of this kind, but I doubt that he would take that position.

In the course of my remarks I said that if a purpose of this bill as set out was to repatriate Canadian industry and Canadian enterprise, I would not be supporting it. However, I recognize that it is difficult to put such a prohibition in the bill, because there might be Canadian enterprises that for any number of reasons would be available for purchase and would present a very satisfactory base of operations for full Canadian ownership. This bill gives the corporation power to make substantial investments in shares, as well as to develop industry and resources in Canada, and it sets the limits of national interest and profitability as guidelines.

I believe both Senator Grosart and Senator O'Leary wondered just how you could harness those two features. The other night I suggested that harness them we must, because those are the guidelines. It is not an easy task, but somebody is going to have to make the determination as to what is the national interest, and I should think the shareholders of the company will be the ones who will do that, particularly in the first four or five years, when the Government of Canada, as we assume now, will be the shareholder. Therefore, it can impose its will in a regular corporate fashion, within the statutory provisions, on the directions that must be taken in order to vitalize this particular operation.

I did point out the other day a new element in this bill. It is that element which under the terms and conditions of the bill make the opportunity for investment in the corporation available to the general public. Whether the public will invest is a matter on which I cannot speculate. Who can speculate as to what the public will invest in? I know that the public invested, and indeed very sophisticated buyers invested, in the Atlantic Acceptance Corporation, and lost millions and millions of dollars!

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are drawing quite an analogy between the Atlantic Acceptance Corporation and the possible fate of the CDC.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not think I follow the trend of thinking of my honourable friend. All I was saying was that the suggestion is made by Senator White and another senator that there was very little point in setting up this type of operation and making it possible for the public to come in because there are so many other areas of investment available to them that they will not invest in this. I cannot venture to say what it is that actuates or stirs a person to invest money in any particular enterprise, and here I am trying to be as objective as possible.

I can cite a number of instances where investments have been made—and looking back, since hindsight in the case of investment is even better than foresight—which were influenced by the thought of quick profit or the glamour of a particular stock at the time. These are all factors that I would not dismiss simply because some senators and some members of the public take the view that this is the kind of investment that would not be attractive to the public. All I am saying, and I am trying to be as objective as possible, is that I just do not know.

There is this feature of giving an opportunity to the public to invest, but whether it has the glamour to attract that investment, I do not know. All I can say from my limited understanding of what actuates the public to invest in a particular corporation is that I just do not know what they might do. Investments frequently go in directions that one cannot foresee, and, of course, sometimes they work all right.

This bill is a step forward in bringing the public and the Government together in a corporation called the Canada Development Corporation, in the national interest and for profitability. It is an opportunity to develop and increase our economic growth. Heretofore this has been done on a regional basis by the Government going into an area, and Senator Macdonald seemed to be very satisfied—perhaps "satisfied" is the wrong word; perhaps I should say "interested"—when I mentioned the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The Government established a corporation for regional development in that Maritime area. The Government advanced capital, or guaranteed such advances by others. In doing it in this fashion the Government had its whole hand in the development, and no public investment interest was brought into the company.

I know at least one enterprise in the Maritimes where this is working out very well. I am sure that my friend could name it equally well, but if he has any doubts about it I will tell him privately what it is.

This is a step forward. The public and their money will come in. There is no compulsion, but there is a pull from a capitalization of $2 billion. It may well be, if the public is not drawn in, that the Government will see fit in the national interest to put in more of its own money.

These are all speculations for the future. Since they are aimed intentionally and deliberately in the direction of greater economic growth in Canada, may I say forcibly and with all the strength of my voice—

Hon. Mr. Haig: And your whole heart.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: —and my heart.

Hon. Mr. Walker: God save the Queen!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I feel that I am at my best at this moment when I say that this is a worthwhile enterprise.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière), that this bill be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. According to my information, Senator White wished to vote against the bill. I would simply ask that this motion for second reading be agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1971

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-249, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, once again we have to thank the honourable Senator Langlois for giving us a clear statement of the substance of an appropriation bill, in this case Appropriation Bill No. 3, and for relating it in very general terms to the official Estimates of the budgetary and other expenditures for the current year.

I appreciate the fact that Senator Langlois followed the traditional method of presenting this information, and I am in no way critical of him on that score. However, I will suggest to him, and particularly to those in the Department of Finance and the Treasury Board who have responsibility for these matters, that they devise some technique by which they will give us a much clearer indication of the relation between the amounts that we are asked to vote in these appropriation bills and the total figure of government expenditures.

I say that because the bill before us, in round figures, asks for approval for the spending of some $6 billion for the remaining three-quarters of the year. We have already voted $2 billion in Appropriation Bill No. 2. That is a total of $8 billion which we are asked to vote in supply.

Senator Langlois did contrast this with the total budgetary estimates of expenditures, of some $14.3 billion, with an additional $1 billion in loans, investments and advances. That makes a total of what is known officially as budgetary expenditures for the year of some $15.3 billion. I emphasize the fact that the supply bills in total only cover approximately half of that, something in the neighbourhood of $8 billion. In addition to that there are many other items of government expenditures which are not included even in the $15 billion amount mentioned by Senator Langlois. My suggestion is that when Parliament is asked to vote supply, particularly final supply for the whole year as we are on this occasion, we be given a statement of the total government expenditures of which this, of course, is only that part which has to be voted in supply. There is a definite relationship between the two. There has to be a relationship between the supply element in the total budget and the total amount that Canadians are asked to find in one way or another.

Some of the items that are not included even in the $15 billion are loans, for example, to Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation. Some may say well, those are recoverable, they are not really expenditures. However, they are exactly the same kind of expenditures as are included in loans, investments and advances, the $1 billion item in what Senator Langlois quite properly referred to as budgetary expenditures. I see no reason why if there are loans, investments and advances in one area that are included, these others should not be included in the total figures which come before us.

The same applies to much larger expenditures, the total expenditure on old age security and the total expenditure on unemployment insurance. Again it may be said that the revenues to meet these expenditures are raised in a very special way. However, that applies, of course, to hundred of items in the budget. They are not all raised in the same manner and there is no fundamental difference between these expenditures on old age security and unemploymemt insurance and all the other expenditures. They have this in common, that claims are made on the public, on the average citizen, to provide the revenue. The revenue, once obtained by the Government, is redistributed to the public in various ways in goods and services.

I am merely saying that it would be useful if those who have the responsibility were to take the trouble to put all these figures together in one table so that we are not presented again with the suggestion that if we vote this $6 billion and add it to the $2 billion we have already voted, that is the whole responsibility of Parliament to examine the spending of the Government. The spending of the Government is much greater than that. I suggest that the total figure should be before us so that we can relate this discretionary part to what we are sometimes told is the non-discretionary part. Although the officials use that description, I object to it. They are referring generally to statutory items, and of course statutes can be changed, particularly when it is obvious from the evidence we have had even in our own committee that there are on-going items under the statutory authority that should be terminated. In the type of presentation we have had—and the same applies in the other place—there is no real opportunity given to members of Parliament to examine the whole picture.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

As Senator Langlois quite properly pointed out, the main Estimates did go to our Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. They were examined at some length, but cursorily, and an excellent report was made to the Senate by the chairman of that committee, Senator Everett. However, I have the feeling that that committee is moving in the direction of a much more thorough overall examination of these Estimates than we have given them in the past. I have sat in that committee under Senator Leonard and his very able successor, Senator Everett, and I see this trend. It may be said that this is not really the business of the Senate, and applying the traditional relationship of supply to the responsibilities of the other place that is so. But there is a place somewhere in our system for a thorough overall examination, and over-view, of government spending before the money is spent.

It is true, of course, that there is in the other place the Public Accounts Committee, but I think it is fair to say that nowhere in our system today is there a procedure by which the statements of the Government about its planned expenditures for the year are related item by item to public accounts or to the actual spending.

This point was illustrated quite dramatically in our Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when we took one item as an example, the expenditures under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. We asked whether this item could be broken down in this tremendously large budget, and whether we could be told on what projects this money will be spent. I am paraphrasing, but I think I am not being unfair when I say the answer, which was frank and honest, was that the regional expansion program is subject to change, it is an on-going thing, nobody knows at any particular time what demand may be made and what response may be made to it.

I suggest it is an essential principle of auditing that there be a formal procedure for the relating at all times of government spending intentions to actual expenditures. It may well be that that will prove to be a function our own committee may be able to undertake. I am speaking personally, and I have not even discussed this with the chairman of the committee, but I see signs that we are moving in the direction of filling a vacuum that has existed for a long time. The most hopeful sign I have seen in the few years I have had some responsibility in examining this question from time to time has been the publication of a pamphlet by the Treasury Board called "How your tax dollar is spent". I believe it has been distributed to all senators. I want to commend the Treasury Board for this publication. In many ways it contains a good deal of information that should be put before us whenever we have one of these bills. As an example, honourable senators may be interested in the expenditure breakdown of each dollar of the $14.3 billion, the figure mentioned by Senator Langlois as the budgetary expenditures, not including loans, investments and advances.

Very quickly perhaps I can put it on the record. Of every dollar, Health and Welfare takes 25 cents, Economic Development and Support 14 cents, Public Dept. 14 cents, Defence 13 cents, Fiscal Transfer Payments to the Provinces 9 cents, Transport and Communications 7 cents, Internal Overhead Expenses 6 cents, General Government Services 4 cents, Education Assistance 4 cents, Culture and Recreation 2 cents, Foreign Affairs 2 cents.

The kind of examination that can follow from these figures is indicated by something that will interest Senator Beaubien particularly. I take the two cents devoted to culture and recreation, which in terms of total budget amount to $298 million; that is, translating the cent into the $14.3 billion figure.

Of the $298 million, no less than $181 million is the cost of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I mention that because here is a kind of examination that surely can be given to these estimates, when we are asked to approve the spending of them. Does it really make sense that, of our total investment in culture and recreation in Canada taking this whole large field, out of $298 million, $181 million should go into one particular item, the CBC?

Is this really the kind of balance in our concept of the requirements of culture and recreation in Canada, that something like two-thirds of the total should be supplied by the national broadcasting service? I am not saying the system is not a good one, but I doubt very much that this was ever a policy decision. I think that, like Topsy, it "just growed". I suggest this is the kind of thing that we need to examine very carefully.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That growth has been applauded from time to time by Senator Beaubien.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I did not catch what the leader said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I was just facetiously remarking that Senator Beaubien has always applauded that growth.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think he would like to sell it, but I do not know what he would get for it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I think that from time to time he has recorded that growth, but I myself have not heard him applaud it. I doubt if he has. As the Leader of the Government said, his remark was facetious.

Honourable senators, I have used that illustration to suggest there is an area of overall examination of the decisions that go into this macro that we call budgetary expenditures and also of the items that are not included and which we should have before us. I know Senator Langlois is very interested in this aspect of the presentation of the supply bill, and I am quite sure that we may on the next occasion have a reply from him, unless he wishes to reply now. Having said that, may I say that our committee looked at these Estimates and found an increase of about half a billion dollars. We examined the major increases item by item, and whereas the report of the chairman indicates we were not entirely satisfied, I see nothing to be gained at this moment by opposing the passage of this appropriation bill, although on some future date I might be inclined to do so if there is not the kind of improvement in presentation that I suggest.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, before Senator Langlois concludes the debate, there is one point I should like clarified. I realize the figures repeated by Senator Grosart were accurate in themselves, but it was suggested that this supply bill would take us to the end of the year. I wondered if that meant the end of the calendar year or the end of the fiscal year, the one being December 31 and the other being March 31.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, you realize that if Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish briefly to comment on the remarks made by my honourable friend Senator Grosart. I stated last night that this bill had been examined by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and that every opportunity had been given to the members of that committee to question the officials of the Treasury Board who were present. I must add now that most of the questioning was done by my honourable friend at that time. I agree with some of the suggestions he has made, but I would say that most of his suggestions, although worth considering, are not practicable at this stage of the consideration of the supply bill. For example, I do not see how we could on the examination of a supply bill go into the operations of the Old Age Security Fund or the Unemployment Insurance Fund, because there is nothing provided in this bill for those funds. It would be irrelevant were we to discuss those funds on the basis that he has suggested.

On the other hand, and I stand to be corrected here, when the honourable senator referred to the discussion before the National Finance Committee of the sums of money spent on regional economic expansion, I think the discussion at that stage was centered on the budgeting for such a program. I recall it was Senator Manning who closed that discussion by saying that in budgeting for such a program one had to go by Estimates and by past experience, and that it was very difficult to arrive at very precise figures. I thought that my honourable friend Senator Grosart and other members of the committee had agreed with the intent of Senator Manning's remarks at that stage.

There is also to be considered in the expenditures on such programs as economic expansion, the many ingredients which one has to take into account in arriving at a reasonable estimation of what the total expenditure is going to be in the final analysis. One has to bear in mind that these grants are given on the basis of the number of jobs a particular project will provide, and therefore the amount to be allotted to any program cannot be ascertained until such time as the minister in charge of that program knows how many jobs this particular project will provide. The amount of the grant being dependent on the number of jobs to be provided, it is almost impossible to evaluate the total expenditure beforehand.

There are also many other ingredients in such programs which are impossible to forecast with any accuracy months ahead of time. I think the explanation given to the committee by the officials of the Treasury Board were quite sufficient and enlightening. I think the committee was provided with all the information it could hope to obtain from these officials.

I agree with Senator Grosart's suggestion that adequate information should be provided on the presentation of such bills as this one, and I always endeavour to give as much information as possible without becoming repetitious, having in the back of my mind that all the information pertinent to such a bill can be provided during the examination of the officials before the committee. Therefore, unless one becomes repetitious, it is difficult to add to the discussion which takes place in committee.

In regard to the question put by Senator Benidickson, there is no doubt that this is the balance of the Estimates for the present fiscal year and not for the calendar year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On this point may I recall to Senator Langlois that I made the suggestion, to avoid confusion, that the appropriation bill should be designated for the fiscal year rather than the calendar year. This is really Appropriation Bill No. 2 for fiscal year 1971-72.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If my honourable friend would only read the title of the bill: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1972."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it says, "this Act may be cited as the Appropriation Act No. 3, 1971", instead of being cited as Appropriation Bill No. 2 for the fiscal year 1971-72.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I explained that last night. I mentioned that there was a previous bill known as Appropriation Act No. 1, 1971, that it dealt with the 1970-71 Supplementary Estimates (C). I think I said that in my introduction to the measure last night.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This practice leads to confusion.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We could probably change the numbering of these bills in future. I see no objection to that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In case my remarks concerning the hearing of the committee have been misinterpreted, or if I did not make myself clear, I want to say that I intended no criticism of the officials who appeared before the committee. I said that their evidence was frank, and I used also another adjective. I do not want to give the impression that I was in any way dissatisfied with their appearance before us. Quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sorry if I gave the honourable senator that impression, which was far from my mind.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1) (g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Honourable senators, perhaps a word of explanation is needed. Many senators feel that perhaps we should not sit on Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, June 24, either in committee or in the house. It seems that if we are able to accomplish tomorrow the work that we have laid out, it will not be necessary for us to sit in committee or in the house on Thursday or Friday.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet tomorrow morning at 9.30. It will be dealing with Bill S-9 to amend the Copyright Act, and Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation. If the house sits at 11 o'clock, as the motion proposes, we would like to have the third readings of two bills, followed by a speech by Senator Flynn on the Pilotage Bill, and a speech by Senator Sullivan on the Clean Air Bill. We would also like to hear Senator White on the Post Office Act and Senator Macdonald on the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

If we are able to complete this work in the chamber at an early enough hour to enable us to continue with committee meetings during the balance of the day, it will be possible for us to have royal assent tomorrow evening at 6 o'clock. In that event, it may not be necessary for committees to sit on Thursday or for the house to sit on Friday. However, in all probability we would return next Monday afternoon rather than Monday evening. It would appear that we can meet this program provided our committees sit on time tomorrow. I am sure honourable senators are aware that two committees had to wait more than half an hour for a quorum today. With co-operation I am sure that we can complete the work I have outlined.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As I understand it, the only legislation that would require royal assent tomorrow would be the Unemployment Insurance Bill, because June 27 has been mentioned as the date for the commencement of certain benefits. The other bills could be referred to committees; we need only to make progress on that bill tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is my understanding that the Unemployment Insurance Bill is the only one we must give royal assent to tomorrow. However, we would like to make as much progress as possible on the other legislation in view of the fact that we hope to adjourn on Wednesday, June 30.

Motion agreed to.

HON. GORDON B. ISNOR

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY LIFE MEMBERSHIP IN THE HALIFAX BOARD OF TRADE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, when speaking of Senator Kinley last night I wish I had recalled that Senator Isnor, who also paid tribute to Senator Kinley, himself no mean senator, has been selected by the Halifax Board of Trade as the first recipient of honorary life membership in that organization. I do not believe that any better choice could have been made by Haligonians. That choice gives us all much pleasure.

On that happy note I move the adjournment of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 23, 1971

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated January 28, 1971, on an inquiry respecting Cotton and Polyester/Cotton Yarns undertaken at the request of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, together with copies of a news release thereon.

Report on the administration of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 26 of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, chapter 21, Statutes of Canada, 1959.

Statement by the Department of National Defence of Moneys received and disbursed in the Special Account (Replacement of Materiel), for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 11(4) of the National Defence Act, chapter 184, R.S.C., 1952.

Report on the administration of the Regular Forces Death Benefit Account for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 54 of the Statute Law (Superannuation) Amendment Act, 1966, chapter 44, Statutes of Canada, 1966-67.

Report of Defence Construction (1951) Limited, including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

STATUS OF CHARTER 1971—QUESTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government what is the present status of the so-called Charter '71 now that the Province of Quebec has rejected it? Moreover what procedure will be followed in patriating the Constitution in the future?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, perhaps later in the day I will be in a position to say something on this matter. At the moment I would prefer to wait.

HON. WILLIAM C. McNAMARA

MEMBER OF TRADE DELEGATION TO CHINA

Hon. Paul Martin: I am sure most honourable senators are aware that one of our number, Senator McNamara, former Chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board, who has had long and almost continuous contact with the Republic of China, will be leaving tomorrow as a member of a trade delegation to the Republic of China. That delegation is headed by my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I have felt that there were many extra functions the members of this house could perform because of particular experiences. This is a good example of some of the additional work that a senator may perform. In this case it will be a performance based on valuable experience that Senator McNamara has had. We are pleased to see him a member of this delegation and we wish him and the delegation much success in their endeavours.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL, 1971

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the third reading of Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada.

Hon. Frank C. Welch: Honourable senators, I should like to speak for a few moments on Bill C-229 before it is passed. I believe unemployment insurance came into effect about 30 years ago, about 1941. At that time an employee earning over $2,000 a year was not eligible to receive benefits. Under Bill C-229 the ceiling for employees to draw benefits for unemployment is unlimited. This change will cost large firms hiring professional people a great deal of money and will cause them to charge more and more for manufacturing goods, with the result that prices will increase. It is one more crack at the economy.

The press has stated that unemployment insurance is going up to $100 a week. This sounds good to the labouring man, but this is only true of those who are earning $7,800 or more per year. In fact what will happen is that unemployed persons will really draw about two-thirds of their weekly income up to a limit of $100 per week. This insurance benefit will be taxable, so it follows that the employees are being fooled again.

Under Bill C-229 a new class of employee becomes insurable, such as teachers, army personnel, firemen, policemen, federal civil servants. The self-employed still have no protection. About 70 per cent of teachers are women. Bill C-229 contains a clause covering maternity. Women will be able to teach for a time and have their families while on the government payroll. After two weeks the mother will become eligible for benefits for 15 weeks.

It is quite obvious that the Government is beginning to rationalize what has become a serious condition of unemployment, by accepting the reality of unemployment and proposing to deal with the situation as if it were a natural one, by setting up permanent substitute measures, unemployment insurance, welfare, manpower training and pension plans.

On May 16 last the Prime Minister had this to say:

> Who caused unemployment? No government, certainly not my own, and I don't know of any government in the world which would be satisfied with high unemployment, and I know of no government wanting deliberately to create unemployment. I mean, I can't even conceive that serious people across the land are making that accusation: that a government would deliberately go out to create unemployment. You know, people are such villains that it is inconceivable that they would be allowed to exist.

These are rather strong words. The Government's effort is a kind of blind searching after a formula by which a universal guaranteed annual income can be achieved. Perhaps it is true, depending on the attitude of local welfare officers and officials, that a guaranteed annual income is already in effect for those who know how to fight and connive for it, because no one can deny that discrimination is rife under the present system. Bill C-229 is a good example of this. Large segments of the Canadian population are discriminated against—all those who do not work for employers, all self-employed farmers and salesmen, independent loggers, housewives. A father cannot put his son under unemployment insurance benefit, but the father can have an unemployed son. Surely if the Government is prepared to take care of every person from the cradle to the grave, as in fact it is under many policies, contradictory, overlapping, wasteful, expensive to administer, would it not have been better had the Minister of Labour brought in, instead of Bill C-229, a modern, comprehensive proposal to institute a guaranteed annual income policy, a proposal to supersede the various welfare programs, including those surreptitiously administered by Manpower, unemployment programs and many pension programs? These could all be replaced by a guaranteed annual income program, which would decimate the ranks of the public service, and thus generate a good proportion of the income necessary to implement it. This annual income would, of course, be a substitution for, not in addition to, the various on-going programs. Nobody knows what effect such a program would have upon productivity, but productivity already suffers through current programs.

A more pertinent question would be: can this country afford to place ever-increasing emphasis on social programs designed to improve the effect of unemployment rather than coping with the evils of unemployment itself? There is a direct connection here. The present course of government is to syphon off by taxation the funds to finance these social measures instead of permitting such funds to remain in the hands of the enterprisers and risk capital which could generate employment.

The big question is: where will the Government policies lead us? Will not current policies result in more and more unemployment? The 11 per cent sales tax may have to go to 22 per cent. Income tax may have to go up again to satisfy the bottomless pit of government spending.

In a recent debate on this matter in the other place the member for Waterloo had a very definite comment on this point. He said:

> I am very suspicious of governments which hand out welfare and try to cover up welfare with economic policies that are mad.

The economic policies of this Government have gone mad.

There is no substitute for full employment. This is where our emphasis should be. There should be jobs for those who are able to work. Of course, there should! The prime function of government is to provide and maintain a climate in which employment can function, not to promote alternatives and palliatives. The Government should be dealing with the root cause of unemployment rather than spending much of its time and energy, and the time of hordes of public servants, combatting the effects of unemployment rather than its causes.

Surely some of these root causes are not too difficult to identify. Excessive taxation is one. The salaries paid to the commissioners for not producing the report of the B & B Commission, the money and time spent on the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media and on the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, and refitting the Bonaventure—these are examples of some of the expenses that cause high taxation which helps to keep Canada out of the world markets we should have.

Rather than pay men and women to walk the streets and travel the country living in hostels, perhaps what the Prime Minister said could be right:

> We could make sure that the unemployed in Canada is much lower if you were to allow us to send you, or your young children to work where there is work in Canada. And there is indeed a lot of work in Canada which is going without being filled. Several members of Northern Ontario have told me... any number of young people who want to go and find jobs up there in the mines, they can find > them. So there's unemployment in one area, perhaps because some of the young people don't want to leave their homes or their girl friends, or I don't know why...

So, the Prime Minister says there is work in the north. In last night's paper there is a reference to "80 per cent idle," that high unemployment is the north's top problem. I do not think the Prime Minister knows what he is talking about.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Which newspaper is that?

Hon. Mr. Welch: In last night's edition of the Ottawa Journal.

The Prime Minister contradicted himself on February 13, 1971, when he said:

> We are visited annually by one of the most severe winters found anywhere in the world. Our climate imposes seasonal limitations on outdoor activity and, in the result, on the number of jobs which can be performed during winter months. For this reason our winter unemployment figures will always run at a higher rate than those, for example, in the United States, where winters are less severe.

On April 2, 1971, he said: "Go north, young man, go north." This is to the climate he has been talking about, under which there is much unemployment. The newspaper talks about "80 per cent idle." The whole thing is a vicious circle. The Government wastes money and then raises taxes to cover the waste. Taxes go up, so does the price of merchandise. Then Japan and other foreign countries get the business Canada should have. Down goes the economy and up goes unemployment and the cost of living.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I did not have the opportunity of hearing the earlier remarks made by Senator Welch because I was in a committee that had power to sit while the Senate was sitting. However, I did hear what he had to say in the latter part of his address. I think it is quite proper for him to be commenting upon the general employment situation, or unemployment situation if you will, in Canada. He complains about excessive taxation, about excessive costs, certainly in areas of public activity; he refers to the B & B Commission, to the costs of the Special Senate Committees on Poverty and on Mass Media, and the excessive cost of refitting the Bonaventure. Surely this is mixing apples and oranges. I would submit the costs that have been incurred in connection with the study made by a committee of this house concerning the media was a very valid type of expense to incur. I think this Senate study is one that has redounded to the Senate's benefit. Naturally, people expect that this kind of study, carried on as it has been, will be costly, but I do not think we should inhibit our committee work in respect of a study of this kind because it might cost more than some of us would like to see spent. That applies to the Poverty Committee and to the B & B Commission as well, although I am not really called upon to defend the expenditures of a royal commission.

In any event, the issue that is truly before the house at this time is the revision of the unemployment insurance law of this country. It is not the expenditures of committees. That revision is based upon the recommendations of the Gill Commission, a royal commission established by the party my honourable friend supports. It is upon the basis of the recommendations of the Gill Commission that these revisions are being brought in now. My friend should commend the work that Commission did in looking at the unemployment insurance law of this country. That law has not been amended, except in respect of rates and benefits, for a period of 31 years.

What we are concerned with now is the wisdom of spreading the risk of having universal coverage, of widening the coverage available to people who have a temporary suspension of income, of improving the benefits and of controlling the benefits, and, in my view even more important, of tying in manpower and employment offices with the labour force so that when unemployment does strike an individual he will have access to agencies which can help him in various ways. Not only will they be able to help him find employment, but they will be able to help him find better employment and, moreover, will be able to train him to take a better type of work that will provide him with more money and opportunities for self-improvement.

Those are the issues we have before us this morning.

Yesterday in committee we had from the Chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission a most able presentation of a complex piece of legislation. Mr. Des-Roches, the chairman of the commission, answered all questions with ease and convinced the members of the committee in attendance that Bill C-229 is good legislation. It is progressive legislation but it is not revolutionary, because we have had the principle applied and adopted by every government in office since 1940.

This new legislation simply updates the program of unemployment insurance. It is for the benefit of people who have their employment temporarily disrupted. It is for the benefit of the country at large. When unemployment rates are no higher than 4 per cent on a national average, then the moneys that are put into the unemployment insurance account are going to be able to match the payments that are made. I point that out for the benefit of Senator Welch. It is done on an actuarial basis and it is to be reviewed annually.

Senator Isnor asked about this the other night, but there is no question of running the fund into a deficit position, as happened a few years ago when it went from over $800 million on the credit side to $37 million on the deficit side. That will never happen again. When rates go above 4 per cent, the extra cost of the benefits that are to be paid will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The 4 per cent is not an arbitrary figure, but reflects the average rate of unemployment for the past 30 years. Admittedly, we are in excess of that percentage now, and it would thus cost the public Treasury considerably more this year. Perhaps it is better to have it that way, since unemployment, as the honourable gentleman has said, is a national issue. Then the risk is spread over the nation rather than being borne merely by the people who are in fact the contributors to unemployment insurance.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Did you say 4 per cent was the national average rate?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, the national average rate.

Honourable senators, in view of the kind of evidence we had yesterday and in view of the background of this legislation and the meaning it has for all of us, I urge the third reading of Bill C-229 at this time.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Honourable senators, I am very happy to find that what I said was sufficient to cause such an honourable and learned senator as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) to rise to answer me. I appreciate it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am responsible for the bill, of course.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I realize that. What I was trying to explain to this house is that we should have more employment and do away with unemployment.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I should like to put one point to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). He may not have time to consider it now, but it will give him something to think about. I defy anyone truthfully to say in this house that Canada has received any benefit from the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media when related to the tremendous costs of that committee. The Special Senate Committee on Poverty has yet to be heard from, and it has been travelling over this country from coast to coast for a long time now. It is almost time we were hearing something from that committee. The B and B Commission, so far as I can see, had a tendency to cause only trouble. It stirred up trouble between Quebec and the rest of Canada or, shall I say, between the French and English in Canada. Before the B and B Commission came into existence we were getting on fine. The Committee came along and made some Canadians think they were being imposed upon, and immediately people started looking for trouble on both sides. I am not blaming one side or the other but the results of the B and B Commission are such that we do not have the same degree of friendship today that we had a few years ago. That is the point I am trying to bring out here.

As far as the waste of money is concerned, there are other committees I could mention. And I notice that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) said nothing about the Bonaventure deal and the millions of dollars that went down the drain there. It is no wonder we pay such high taxes. That is the reason. I am sure of it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Bonaventure is not my business, but I will think about the other points the honourable senator has raised.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

23 June 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd day of June, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa.

CLEAN AIR BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson for the second reading of Bill C-224, relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate yesterday with the statement, "The word 'environment' now evokes nightmares."

It calls to mind that exhaustion of natural resources, the accumulation of waste products, the various forms of pollution, crowding, noise, and the thousand devils of the ecological crisis. But while it is true that environmental degradation is now almost as widespread and as traumatic in the country as in the city, there is danger of thinking about the environment only in such negative terms. If we limit our interest to the correction of environmental defects, we shall behave like hunted creatures, trying to escape from one danger after another, taking shelter behind an endless series of protective devices—today, afterburners on our cars and complicated sewage treatment systems; tomorrow, gas masks over our faces and filters on our water faucets. Such technological "fixes" will have temporary usefulness, but they will increasingly complicate our life and ruin its quality. The real solution to the ecological crisis will have to come from a change in our ways of life and from the development of positive values relating human nature to external nature.

As a physician I am vitally interested in this legislation, particularly as it applies to the health of the people. Our health, if not our very lives, depends on our finding a way of controlling pollution, more particularly air pollution. There is rather frightening evidence available to support the argument that air pollution is responsible for certain birth defects. It is also thought to aggravate to the extreme many respiratory ailments and to be the very cause of some of these.

Emphysema, chronic bronchitis, asthma, lung cancer, these are some of the diseases that can be brought on or, if they already exist, can be seriously complicated by befouled air.

Dr. Max Fitch, a medical consultant to the Ontario Health Department, warned recently that air pollution is probably the most serious current health problem. He said that historical records show that the victims of severe air pollution tend to be the very old and the very young, "particularly premature infants and those with chronic heart and lung disease." In these cases death is usually the result of pneumonia or heart failure superimposed on an already damaged constitution.

Dr. Robert Stern, professor of chemistry and environmental studies at Oakland University in Rochester, Michigan, says that he now believes that unless drastic changes are made, estimates that man has only 30 years to live are "very close to true." Ten times as many people are afflicted with chronic bronchitis and emphysema as were fifteen years ago. Dr. Stanley L. Kobler, a chest physician at the Montreal Jewish General Hospital, is convinced that air pollution has some bearing on the increase.

These findings have all been corroborated at the leading chest clinics of teaching hospitals in this country. Here I am quoting other authorities rather than my own particular field that I am vitally interested in.

Three factors can lead to or aggravate diseases which cause bronchial constriction and decrease the diameter of air passages resulting in more resistance to breathing. The first is cigarette smoking; the second, air pollution, and the third, heredity. Individuals react in different degrees of intensity to the first two factors because of their heredity. It all depends whether they have a predisposition. My old dad used to smoke 12 cigars a day and inhaled them, but he never had any trouble. He was the exception.

A team of researchers under the direction of Dr. Arian Barkaver, associate professor of veterinary science at Pennsylvania State University, recently concluded experiments which demonstrated that air pollutants can produce effects in mice that might be expected to cause allergies and decreased resistance to infections. As a matter of fact, this problem of pollution now is widespread through cattle and other types of animals in our whole domain.

A study reported in 1966 showed that the English children under the age of two who were studied showed a significant increase in chest illnesses in moderately and highly polluted area. Many parts of Canada today are probably more polluted than some of the industrial regions of England. You would have to be out of your mind not to support legislation of this type. To me it is vital, particularly from a medical point of view.

[Hon. Mr. Sullivan.]

The British study involved some 4,000 children observed for more than eight years. The incidence of diseases of the upper respiratory tract were really no different for high or low pollution areas. But lower respiratory diseases such as bronchitis, bronchialitis, and pneumonia were four times as frequent for children brought up in high pollution areas compared with children in low pollution areas.

A three-year study of children admitted to the Montreal Children's Hospital showed a "significantly higher" incidence of lower respiratory tract diseases than would have been expected. The occurrence of respiratory diseases in such young people linked with the existence of air pollution may well be laying a basis for serious chest diseases in later life.

The increasing amount of small particles in the air from oil-burning furnaces, cars and industry will increase the hazards of gas pollutants like sulphur dioxide. If the particles are small and abundant enough, they can carry gases down into the deep lung—the lower reservoirs of the lungs where cigarette smoke goes—and where much of the particulate matter and gas could be retained for long periods of time with dire detrimental effects on the patient's health.

Air pollution is a potential killer and drastic measures must quickly be taken to halt its destructive cause. This Bill C-224, though it takes actual concrete steps only in matters coming within exclusive federal jurisdiction, is still a major step forward. However, though I may be pleased with the principle behind this bill, I have serious reservations with regard to certain clauses of the bill itself.

To begin with, I should like to point out that though national emission standards and guidelines are discussed throughout the bill, these standards and guidelines have yet to be set and no indication is given as to when we can expect them. But, until they are published this bill cannot be implemented. They attempted to obtain this information from the minister late Monday night on third reading, but they could not get it in the other house. How is an inspector to know whether or not buildings are meeting standards, when he has no criteria against which to judge?

I was pleased to see that an amendment accepted when this bill was in the Fisheries and Forestry Committee of the other place was one that would ensure more consultation between federal and provincial governments before the setting of specific emission standards for any work, undertaking, or business in that province.

This proposed increase in consultation is all to the good. Were the federal and provincial governments to go their separate ways this could well result in industries and other sources of air pollution being required to conform to two different sets of emission standards based, likely, on two different philosophies of controlling air pollution. For example, Ontario has for a number of years carried on a program under the Air Pollution Control Act, 1967, of using published emission standards which relate to a point of impingement. This point of impingement is not the point at which the contaminants are emitted, but rather the point at which they damage the capacity for the air to be re-used. The federal Clean Air Act, the one we have before us, will use standards which relate to the point of emission. This reference is on page 17, lines 30 and 31. Such a double standard must obviously be avoided. The individual responsible for a source of air pollution could be confused to the point of not being able to comprehend either system, or he might find it impossible to comply with both simultaneously. Where a set of emission standards exists, such as in Ontario, I cannot see that it would do any perceptible good for the federal authority to superimpose a second set of standards.

I am strongly in favour of the idea of setting up national ambient air quality objectives, and I consider it properly the role of the federal level of government to try and establish a set of common goals, to work towards a common denominator, to rationalize and co-ordinate the various efforts in this area. However, I would again express the hope that the federal Government would consult the provinces before determining what are referred to in clause 4 of the bill as "ambient air quality objectives" reflecting three ranges of quality of tolerable, acceptable and desirable of the ambient air in relation to that contaminant in combination with any one or more other contaminants. It is to be noted here that "tolerable, acceptable, and desirable" are in no way defined. Admittedly, they cannot be quantified but they could have been explained to some extent. This lacuna leaves the door open to potential conflict, and that is why I am eager that both levels of government should keep open the channels of communication.

Though in toto the bill is worthwhile, some parts of it are puzzling and even deficient. I refer here to clause 2, subclause (1)(b). That definition of "air pollution" includes, in addition to health, such things as welfare, and normal enjoyment of life. This is helpful because it will overcome the present difficulty in providing clinical proof of deleterious effects on human health. What is difficult to understand is why this definition in its entirety was not included in clause 7, subclause (1)(a), where only health is mentioned.

Clause 2, subclause (3) indicates that this act will be binding on the provinces. Yet elsewhere there is provision for entering into agreements with the various provinces. On the one hand, of course, agreements are fine, since they will ensure uniform national standards and prevent some provinces from taking a more casual approach to air pollution than others, in order to attract industry or for some other advantages. However, and I do not suppose I need dwell upon the fact, this could easily lead to friction and constitutional problems. It might have been wiser for the Government to include a provision for joint federal-provincial bodies to establish standards, as was the case with the Canada Water Act.

I fail to see why in clause 5, subclause (1) universities were not specifically mentioned as sources of knowledge which the minister and his officials might consult. I know that in my own university the head of Pollution Probe, Professor Chant, of the Department of Zoology, has carried out a wonderful investigation, in close consultation with the teaching hospitals, on diseases of the chest and heart, which I have been associated with, and in some cases, intimately consulted. Some of the best research in pollution control and abatement is being done by various departments in our leading Canadian universities. To leave this source of information and help untapped is to deliberately shortchange ourselves.

If one judges from clause 7, subclause (1), one is led to conclude that this act is intended to deal only with stationary sources of air pollution. The only reference to air pollution caused by mobile sources such as cars, trucks, et cetera, can be found in clause 10, subclause (2), and that serves to exclude mobile sources from the purview of this bill. The minister, in summing up the other night in the House of Commons, with regard to a proposed amendment, said that this power would be delegated to other departments. Yet, in urban areas these same mobile sources account for up to 50 per cent of the total air pollution, often providing the more hazardous components such as carbon monoxide and nitrous oxides. This is an area where the federal Government could have been of immense help to the provinces. It has chosen not to be.

Another point that could be raised with regard to clause 7, and my legal friends can correct me if I err, is that health is an area of concurrent jurisdiction with paramountcy being given to the provinces. Furthermore, international treaties in no way alter the Constitution of this country. Therefore, I suggest clause 7, subclauses (1) (a) and (b) may well be ultra vires the Government of Canada. Action in these areas could only be undertaken with the consent of the province or provinces concerned.

Clauses 19 and 20 could well be interpreted as something of a contradiction in approach. Clause 19 seems to indicate a willingness on the part of the central Government to consult with the provinces "for the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co-ordination and implementation of policies and programs designed for the control and abatement of air pollution." Clause 20, on the other hand, provides the federal minister with an opportunity to act unilaterally within a province in dealing with emission standards. The federal Government gives the impression in this section that it plans to use the goodwill and co-operation of the provinces regarding ambient air quality objectives as a lever to assume an unwarranted degree of supervision over emission standards.

The ubiquitous federal Government should not be permitted to engage in unnecessary "snoopervision".

Clause 22 states:

> No person shall produce for use or sale in Canada or import into Canada any fuel that contains any element or additive in a concentration that exceeds a concentration prescribed with respect to that element or additive in relation to such fuel for the purposes of this section.

This could have far-reaching economic and social consequences. It could also have the effect of nullifying carefully worked out and flexible control methods in use by the provinces. For example, the effect on Ontario

Hydro of a low sulphur coal regulation could be disastrous. Ontario Hydro is required to make long-term decisions on fuel types in order that it may design and build generating stations of particular types using certain fuels in advance of the need for the electric power by the community. It also has to enter into long-term contracts for the supply of fuels in order to guarantee the continued operation of such generating facilities in the future. Hence, it becomes imperative, once again, that any national policy governing the production and importation of fuels be worked out in consultation with the province or provinces concerned.

In closing I should say, honourable senators, I think that the definitions of the terms emission "standards" and emission "guidelines" should have been included in the interpretation section. The terms are bandied about the bill with graceless abandon, and I was at times hard-pressed to know exactly what they meant.

I would also point out that the control provisions of this bill may well result in duplications of programs with the provinces. This could lead to chaotic bickering unless the programs of the two levels are made complementary rather than competitive. This, of course, depends again on the degree of consultation between federal and provincial governments.

I should like to have permission of the house to include in Hansard at this point a series of references relating to diseases of the chest. I think these references would be of utmost value not only in connection with this legislation but for some of the officials in the department.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that these references appear in Hansard?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: Honourable senators, the key to the success of this bill is consultation, serious consultation between the federal and provincial governments. Without it the whole thing will not be worth the paper it is written on.

Senator Fergusson has ably given the Government side and the point of view of those in the department. I have tried to stress other angles which I think in a small way make a contribution, and I particularly emphasize the medical aspects. All the amendments that were proposed on Monday night were voted down in the other place. I feel this is most essential legislation. I feel we should get it through as fast as possible, and in my humble opinion it does not need to go to a committee.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand it is the intention of the honourable Senator Fergusson to close the debate now?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Fergusson speaks now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I am not going to make a prolonged speech. I would like to thank Senator Sullivan for his contribution, which shows his vast knowledge of this subject and the great deal of study he has given to this bill. I am sure that his suggestions will receive the attention of and study by the Minister of the Environment, and that account will be taken of his feeling of urgency that national emission standards and guidelines be established. I am very glad to know that Senator Sullivan endorses the bill, and that he thinks it does not need to go to a committee for study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HON. PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I see a red rose in the lapel of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin). It reminds me that today is his birthday, and I am sure I speak for all of us in wishing him well, and telling him that we are very happy to see that he continues to maintain good health and good spirits. We hope to have him with us for many years to come. He is doing an excellent job for the Senate and for the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Thank you very much.

PILOTAGE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Daniel A. Lang for second reading of Bill C-246, respecting pilotage.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, our present legislation on pilotage is out of date. It was drawn up, at least in substance, about or over 100 years ago and it has been seldom amended since then. Some attempts were made to cope with the situation in 1962 when the Royal Commission on Pilotage was established. As we know, the commission was presided over by Justice Yves Bernier, from Quebec City, assisted by Messrs. Smith and Renwick. It is, as pointed out by the sponsor of the bill, the senior commission of inquiry, since it has almost 10 years of existence, having been created in 1962. We must not, however, forget that its first volume was published in 1967 and that this first report contained all the general recommendations which were to be more specifically dealt with in the other volumes. For almost four years, the Government has been in a position to introduce amendments or still better another act on pilotage. It was, moreover, the first recommendation stated in the first report of the commission.

In other words, it was proposed to take out of the Canada Shipping Act, where they are presently, the provisions concerning pilotage so as to make a separate act out of them. It is, obviously, this first recommendation which is being put into practice now, but, as I said, more than four years after its presentation to the Government in the first volume of the commission's report.

The obvious purpose of the pilotage legislation is to provide for safety of navigation. This purpose, this object, is moreover to be found in clause 12 of the bill which states precisely that an Authority—and I shall come back on the meaning of these words—

> The objects of an Authority are to establish, operate, maintain and administer in the interests of safety an efficient pilotage service within the region set out in respect of the Authority in the Schedule.

However, I stress, by the way, the fact that the English text uses only the words "in the interests of safety". I do not think that this covers exactly the same thing. It would be better to state "for the safety of navigation"; but just the same, whether this is a typographical or other type of error, this may perhaps be considered in committee. I do not think that this requires a formal amendment, but I wish to stress this difference between the two texts.

So, as I was saying, the purpose of the legislation on pilotage is to insure the safety of navigation. Well, there is a strange thing in the existing legislation: only pilotage charges are compulsory. Shipowners must pay pilotage charges in areas where it is indicated that such charges are due, but they do not have to take a pilot on board. In other words, according to existing legislation, pilotage is not compulsory; only the payment of charges is. This rather strange situation did not have too many consequences in practice, because since pilotage charges were to be paid in any case, the ships might just as well take pilots on board. But it remains that this is the existing legislation. However, it is a recommendation of the Royal Commission on Pilotage to make pilotage compulsory, that is, to establish the principle that it is not the payment of charges which is compulsory, but recourse to a pilot's services in a stipulated area.

Secondly, the report also recognized the fact that the pilotage problem differed according to the areas, a great number of them, that it was not the same thing, that it did not require the same proficiency and knowledge to pilot a ship between Quebec and Les Escoumains, or to enter the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, or Halifax, or Saint John, New Brunswick, or to sail up river from Quebec to Montreal, to guide a ship through the Seaway, the Great Lakes, and that the situation is also quite different on the Pacific coast, at the entrance to the various ports. So, the royal commission recommended that administrative services concerning pilotage be decentralized. This bill does not take full account, I would say, of the position of the commission in this regard, since it establishes four large administrative regions, four authorities. As we know, the Atlantic region comprises all waters around Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and New Brunswick including the waters of Chaleur Bay south of Cap d'Espoir. But, as I have mentioned, we find that, in that region, a large number of different situations occur, which may require that the authority adopt various sets of regulations.

The second region is that of the Laurentians, including all waters in the Province of Quebec up to the south, that is the southern exit of the St. Lambert lock.

The third region is that of the Great Lakes, extending from the southern exit of the St. Lambert lock to the Great Lakes. I believe it also comprises the waters of Manitoba, which would include the James Bay region, Port Churchill in particular. Finally, there is the Pacific region.

So, these are the four regions created by the bill and whose management is entrusted to four similar authorities made up of seven persons, including a chairman and a vice-chairman in each case.

The powers given to such authorities are quite extensive and maybe too extensive in my opinion. They are incorporated in clause 14 of the bill—and I should like to quote part of it:

> (1) An Authority may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make regulations necessary for the attainment of its objects, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, regulations
> (a) establishing compulsory pilotage areas;

It is normal, I think. I see no difficulty in entrusting this power to these authorities. We have to determine, for instance, under these clauses, whether a pilot will be needed to get into the port of St. John's, Newfoundland or Saint John, New Brunswick, and so forth. But this power may also raise problems, were the authority to decide, for instance, the elimination of some existing pilotage areas where the payment of pilotage charges is compulsory. For the time being, however, it is to be presumed that the authorities are going to maintain the pilotage principle in the areas where, presently, the payment of charges is compulsory.

(b) prescribing the ships or classes of ships that are subject to compulsory pilotage;

It can be seen there that an authority may reduce very substantially the scope of the legislation, since it may exempt any class of ship from the obligation of having a pilot on board, in a compulsory pilotage area.

How far shall we go? Of course the authorities can be trusted to some extent, but what if they should have different views about such a matter?

The Governor in Council will have to see to it that standards are established and included in the legislation. But, as far as safety is concerned, as we all know, these authorities are made up of persons appointed by the Governor in Council, and the legislation does not require from them that they should have any special ability, nor that they represent any interested group, as for instance shipowners, pilots, or others.

Then, the Government, when selecting the members of such an authority, must be most careful to appoint persons that are really competent in this field.

(c) prescribing the circumstances under which compulsory pilotage may be waived;

Under some circumstances, one can say it is unnecessary to have a pilot on board in spite of the fact that the ship is sailing in a compulsory pilotage area.

I shall now refer to subparagraph (f).

(f) prescribing the qualifications that a holder of any class of licence or any class of pilotage certificate shall meet, including the degree of local knowledge, skill, experience and proficiency in one or both of the official languages of Canada required in addition to the minimum qualifications prescribed by the Governor in Council under section 42;

Obviously, there again is the problem of having competent personnel in each authority.

As everyone knows, in the main pilotage areas, and especially in the St. Lawrence, there are pilots corporations acting as any ordinary professional association, they are the ones that established standards, hold examinations—and I don't know if the authority will be able to completely do away with the experience and standards already established by these corporations. But, it would be dangerous, it seems to me, to try it in the particular cases I just mentioned.

I pointed out that, in my opinion of course, clause 14 grants immense powers. Before the committee, the minister or his representatives might give us some clarification in this regard for the reassurance of pilots, many of whom I know are worried about the excessive discretionary powers conferred on the authority by that clause.

Also, regarding clause 15, the problem of acquired rights of licensed pilots at the time the new law comes into force has been brought up.

As is generally known, there are now pilots active for instance in Quebec, where another licence is required for piloting ships between Quebec and Montreal. However, both areas where payment of pilotage charges is mandatory will come under the jurisdiction of the same Authority—the Laurentian Authority, where transition arrangements exist—but one wonders what will happen. Some pilots would have no licence because their present one is not valid for the whole Atlantic region. Problems will therefore arise and pilots are wondering what will become of their rights under the present licence. They will not be happy with the transition arrangements in this regard. I hope that this point also can be clarified in the committee in order to reassure the pilots.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Another comment I also wish to make is that under the legislation which is before us, provision is made for punishment in cases where pilots are guilty of violating the regulations applying to them. This is normal, but still the provisions of the Shipping Act which are not repealed by this Pilotage Act, involve a dual jurisdiction with regard to a pilot who would commit an offence by violating either the regulations or the act.

Then, they may be reassured about an extremely difficult situation where they might become liable to legal proceedings or become the subject of an investigation under the provisions of the Pilotage Act and also under the provisions of the Shipping Act.

Hence the possibility of a double penalty and a double investigation. In this respect, I think an amendment should have been brought in to let it be clearly known that only one charge would be laid.

Now, in the case of suspension, each of the authorities was given the power to suspend a pilot's licence for a valid reason and a right of appeal to the minister was provided. I seriously question the opportunity of giving this right of appeal. The minister can hardly say anything in circumstances such as these unless he relies, let us say, on the authority people, on the officers of each authority. In other words, he has to trust those who gave the first ruling. I wondered whether, under the Federal Court Act, there was a right of appeal from the decision of the minister. If so, then it would be sufficient to correct the defect I have pointed out. But, if there is no right of appeal to the Federal Court, if this is not allowed, it would have been preferable, in the case where a pilot's licence is suspended, that an appeal be allowed to the Federal Court rather than the minister, since the decision of the authority is quasi-judicial, so to speak, and in fact it is really strictly administrative and not judicial. I therefore believe that the Federal Court should have the right to look into, correct or revise such a decision; that is the principle of the Federal Court. I am not sure that right of appeal exists, and—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It does not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If not, the situation can be remedied when the bill goes to committee.

The drafting of this bill strikes me as the result of a very laborious effort. There is no doubt, however, that very little is known about the problems brought up by the royal commission. And in view of these circumstances and during the next few years, I am almost certain that this legislation will need to be revised and changed and that the breaking-in period will certainly suggest many amendments. For the time being, this is certainly an improvement on the present legislation, which again is obsolete and needs to be changed.

For all these reasons, I support the bill. I think it is useful to refer it to the committee, because pilots and other parties concerned did not have an opportunity to be heard before the committee in the other place. I think further that in accordance with our tradition we should allow people concerned by this bill to be heard and to appear before our committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should simply like to add that I took the opportunity yesterday to arrange a meeting between some lawyers representing interested people and the minister and that in the course of this meeting the minister gave the assurances that they requested. But we shall be able to continue along these lines this afternoon.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, for the second reading of Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as has been so well stated by Senator Prowse, the bill before us contains important amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. Some of the amendments are for the purpose of clarifying or modifying some of the present provisions, while others are additions to the code, and it is to some of these that I would like to direct your attention.

The minimum wage is to be raised from $1.65 to $1.75 an hour in those industries which come under federal jurisdiction. I do not know all the industries to which the minimum wage will apply, but I know that it does apply to transportation, even to trucking services when they extend beyond provincial boundaries, pipeline operations, telephone and cable communications, radio and television, grain elevators, banking, uranium mines and various federal crown corporations.

I was surprised to learn that only about 50 per cent of those employees covered by this bill are organized and members of a union. It would be interesting to know in just what industries the unorganized work. I anticipate that a goodly number of them work for the chartered banks. It would also be interesting to know just how many such employees are not receiving the minimum wage of $1.65 an hour or $66 for a 40-hour week. It must be remembered that various deductions are made from that $66.

It should be borne in mind that with few exceptions the industries which do come under federal jurisdiction are rather prosperous. I was interested in reading the evidence given before the House of Commons committee that little if any objection was made to increasing the minimum wage. The main objections were to other provisions of the bill, especially to that concerning hours of work and the total hours of work per week. In some industries a 40- or 48-hour week is not practical. Apparently some accommodation has been worked out between employers and their employees in these industries which they do not wish to have done away with. Again, I take it that such arrangements can be continued under the proposed regulations.

The main concern about raising the minimum wage has been the effect that this will or could have on minimum wage rates in industries under provincial jurisdiction. Apparently, although I am not sure about some cases, provincial minimum wages generally have been less than federal ones. Consequently, any increase in the federal field brings about strong pressures to increase provincial ones by at least the same amount.

I suppose we can all agree that the ideal would be for the minimum wage rates to be the same all across the country. Yet, as realists, we have to recognize that this does not appear to be possible at the present time. It is a hard though unpleasant fact of economic life that there are cases where raising the minimum wage rate could well result in putting some marginal industries out of business. Of course, I am familiar with the argument that such industries are not entitled to survive if they can only do so by paying a lower wage rate. Yet I think it is another hard fact of economic life that the employees of such industries might prefer to work for such wages where they reside, rather than not being able to obtain employment there at all.

The Minister of Labour recognized the effect that the federal minimum wage has on the provincial wage scales. In his speech on second reading he said, in part:

> The impact that federal minimum wages could or do have on the provinces and on their own particular norms is felt as the Ministers of Labour of the provinces realize the need to keep alive and in existence a labour incentive industry rather than a capital incentive industry.

And later in the debate he again referred to this when he said:

> I have a sense of responsibility which prompts me to take into consideration the problems of the provinces, particularly the Atlantic provinces where many small communities still engage in labour-intensive industries. Those industries do not lend themselves easily to automated methods of production or to technological change.

So, honourable senators, while many of us would like to see the federal minimum wage higher than $1.75 an hour, yet I think we probably have to accept the argument of the minister against making it any higher at this time as being a valid argument. Personally, since it will now be possible to raise the minimum wage by order in council, I hope that it will not be too long before the federal minimum wage rate will be at least $2 per hour.

I believe the other new provisions of the bill are not only welcome but overdue. Certainly the provision, modest though it is, for severance pay deserves support. However, I want to protest again against using severance pay, holiday pay or wage arrears as an excuse for denying unemployment insurance to a laid-off worker for the first two weeks of his unemployment.

The notices to be given when industrial lay-offs are expected should also be helpful. I noticed in the evidence given before the committee of the other place that concern was expressed about where a strike or a works stoppage in one industry could force another to close and it would not be possible to give the required notices. This is a valid objection, and I expect it will have to be resolved by the authority given to make regulations.

I think, too, the provision for maternity leave will find general acceptance. Indeed, as has been pointed out by the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Prowse), it is connected, as it were, with the new provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act dealing with the same matter.

Mention has been made of the provision of equal wages for equal work. It is good that discrimination is pretty well done away with in these industries coming under federal jurisdiction. Personally, I could never understand why there should be any differential in wages paid to persons doing the same work. I am a great believer in equal pay for equal work, and that is why I protest against the policy of the Government itself in paying different wage rates for the same work done in different parts of Canada. I charge the Government with practising discrimination in their own wage rates on a geographical basis.

Only last April there was a particularly vicious example of this. Wage rates were being negotiated by the Government with their own employees in the dockyards of Halifax and British Columbia. The Government insisted on the British Columbia workers receiving a higher wage rate than those in Halifax for doing exactly the same kind of work. Honourable senators may find it difficult to credit this, but the President of the Treasury Board, instead of apologizing for such action, tried to justify it.

Here was an opportunity for the Government to give real leadership in overcoming economic disparity, to give real leadership as a fine example to private industry, yet instead of doing so the Government chose to perpetuate this pernicious system. I realize that this type of discrimination cannot be corrected by this bill, so while I support the bill I urge the Government to end geographical discrimination in order to make the principle of equal pay for equal work apply to all.

[Hon. Mr. Macdonald.]

Honourable senators, this bill was given consideration in detail by the committee of the other place. Unless there is some group of persons or organizations who have indicated they wish to make representations to our committee, I do not believe any good purpose would be served by sending it to a committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether any representations have been made, and I would therefore move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h), moved:

> That the name of the honourable Senator Smith be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable Senator McDonald leave to proceed with his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if we might recess now to the call of the bell at approximately 3 o'clock? We have progressed fairly well in our work in the chamber this morning, but there is considerable work to be done in our committees. We should be in a position to come back into the house at about 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Has not an arrangement been made that Senator White should speak at 2 o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There was an arrangement.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I said "approximately". Perhaps the bell will ring at 2 o'clock. I should like to see Senator White when we leave the chamber.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Perhaps we could adjourn to the call of the bell at 2 o'clock. There would be no problem in not ringing the bell until 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I will see Senator White in the meantime.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to know the approximate time to which we are adjourning.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Three o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: We might compromise and say 2.30.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Three o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

POST OFFICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Monday, June 21, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Denis, for the second reading of Bill C-240, to amend the Post Office Act.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, we are all in debt to honourable Senator Denis for his clear and capable explanation of Bill C-240, an act to amend the Post Office Act.

There are three main items in this bill. The first is an increase in rates for first-class mail under clause 3. The second is the establishment by regulation of rates of postage for letter mail over one pound not established by this act as provided in clause 2. The third is that, according to clause 1(3) on page 2, the bill gives the Postmaster General the authority to delegate powers, duties and functions to certain departmental officials.

There is one provision in the bill which will appeal to all honourable senators. I refer to clause 2(2)(l) at the top of page 3, which provides for the transmission by post, free of postage, of letters, books, tapes, records and other similar materials for the use of the blind.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. White: The present act only provides for the transportation by post, free of postage, of books for the use of the blind. There is no doubt that this amendment will be of great assistance to the blind people of Canada.

In moving second reading of the bill in the House of Commons, the minister made this very pertinent statement, as reported in Hansard at page 6216:

> Among the specific problems, one which concerns me greatly is the loss of public confidence the Post Office has experienced in recent years. As I have said before, this confidence must be restored if the Post Office is to be able to continue its vital role in Canadian society. To this end, we are moving to improve services through major reforms.

Now, if the minister really wants to make major reforms, they should not consist merely of a 33⅓ per cent increase in postal rates. It will be necessary, indeed, to improve the postal services throughout Canada so that the Post Office might retain public confidence and be more widely used, because the annual report for 1970 shows that the mail volume of pieces handled declined from 4.9 billion to 4.8 billion.

The honourable Senator Denis, in introducing this bill in the Senate, stated at pages 1169 and 1170 of Hansard:

> I consider this increase to be amply justified by a succession of substantial deficits, and necessary in order to bring about an improvement of postal services—I consider it to be desirable that the Post Office Department should cover its expenses or, at least, that the gap between costs and revenues should not be too great.

The Government has decided to make mail users pay for this deficit. Honourable senators, the Post Office Department renders and should render and provide service to all Canadians in every part of Canada. That is true, but when you consider such corporations as the CBC, Air Canada, the National Film Board, the Canadian National Railway Company, the National Art Centre in Ottawa, and the many other companies or corporations that are subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer, you begin to think that perhaps the Post Office should also be subsidized. After all, there are many Canadians who make little use even of the CBC. Many Canadians never travel by Air Canada or by CNR. The great majority of Canadians will never witness a performance at the Arts Centre in this city. On the other hand, every Canadian taxpayer pays his share of the deficit of these enterprises and groups. Why, then, when the Post Office renders services to every citizen in every part of Canada, should the Post Office not be subsidized in the same manner as these other enterprises and groups? Why subsidize newspapers and magazines and not the Post Office?

The honourable senator also stated at page 1170:

> This increase for individuals as well as for companies and business firms is very small, in comparison with price increases for consumer goods or with salary increases and I also have in mind the present cost of clothing, food, housing and services.

The honourable senator knows, and every other honourable senator knows, that any increase to large business firms or companies is simply going to be passed on to the consumer. The honourable senator certainly made a significant statement when he referred to the present cost of clothing, food, housing and services. Everyone knows there have been increases, and one can only marvel, considering the rate at which utilities and services have increased as well as clothing, food, housing and services, at how it can be explained that in one month the cost of living goes up only a fraction of one per cent.

The increase proposed in this bill for postage rates will amount to 33⅓ per cent. If this bill is passed, it is expected that the minister will announce increases for third-class mail. In his remarks, on second reading, as reported at page 6217, of Hansard of the House of Commons he mentioned $30 million as the deficit for the present year for providing services to newspapers and periodicals. In this connection it is interesting to refer to page 35 of the proceedings of July 10 of the Commons Committee on Transportation and Communications, to which committee this bill was referred. The officials of the department were questioned as to how much it cost the Government to handle Reader's Digest and Time magazine. The information was given that as far as Reader's Digest was concerned, the Government received in the course of a year $346,000, but it cost the Government $1.173 million to deliver this magazine, leaving a deficit of $827,000. As far as Time magazine was concerned, the Government received $452,000 while it cost the Government $1.562 million. This resulted in a total deficit of approximately $2 million for these two magazines. It would appear that the average Canadian taxpayer is subsidizing these two very rich and powerful American magazines to the extent of about $2 million per year.

Honourable senators, everyone knows that the Canadian edition of Time has no more than four to six pages of Canadian news, and the rest of the magazine is devoted to United States news. The same situation applies to Reader's Digest. Most of the articles appearing in the Canadian edition are copied from the American edition. So, it is rather difficult for the minister to justify the expenditure of $2 million taken from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize these two magazines, and at the same time ask for an increase of 33 1/3 per cent in the postal rate for ordinary letters.

The anticipated loss in third-class mail for the current year is estimated at $38 million. Much of this mail is classed as junk mail, and much of this junk mail comes from the United States. Canada and the United States exchange mail handling services free of charge, although one country has a population approximately 10 times that of the other.

During the last two or three years everyone has had the experience of long delays in receiving letters. It is difficult to understand or explain why it takes days for letters to go from one city in Ontario to another. Personally, I have had the experience of posting letters in the Senate Post Office and it took nine days for one letter to reach Pointe Claire, and six days for the others to reach Kitchener. This is poor service, and the minister should not increase postal rates until the Canadian taxpayer receives a proper daily service.

Apparently the minister does not propose to restore the six-day service. The postal service has not improved since the last increase in postal rates from five cents to six cents. What assurance can the minister give that the service will improve as a result of this increase of 33⅓ per cent? Post offices in small communities are closed on Saturday afternoon while stores and most places of business are open and operate all day Saturday. Much of the problem concerning delayed mail delivery arises from the fact that mail received between Friday and Monday is often not delivered until Tuesday. In my opinion, post offices, which have a monopoly on certain types of service which the public demands, should be open six days a week.

Few Canadians will agree with the closing remarks of the minister during the debate on second reading of the bill. His final remarks are reported at page 6314 of Hansard as follows:

> In closing, I want to say that in my department priority is being placed on service and I believe we are now giving Canadians the kind of service they deserve.

I emphasize the words "the kind of service they deserve." If the minister inquires around the country he will soon find out what the public think of the present postal service.

Speaking of third-class mail, the minister stated at page 6217 of Hansard:

> This year's loss on third class mail is expected to be just about $38 million. This category covers printed material of various sorts, such as advertising circulars and catalogues, Christmas cards and small packages of merchandise that do not weigh over one pound. The postage rates for this class of mail were last adjusted in November 1968.

Included in third-class mail is mail put out by voluntary, charitable health and welfare organizations and other such groups, which give out information to their members on a non-profit voluntary basis. The minister should not lump profit-oriented third-class mail and junk mail with mail posted by voluntary health and welfare and other charitable organizations that come under this category, yet the minister proposes to increase the rate for third-class mail.

A short time ago all honourable senators received a pamphlet from the three groups who interviewed the minister in May. These groups were the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled, which operates what we know as the Easter Seal Campaign, the Canadian TB Association, which operates the Christmas Seal Campaign, and the War Amputees of Canada, who operate the key tag service. All these groups are non-profit organizations; all are rendering a necessary and valuable service to Canadians.

The minister has stated that he will defer any increase in second-class mail until the in-depth study which is presently under way is completed. Why, then, does he propose to increase third-class mail rates without an in-depth study of third-class mail, which will divide the junk mail from mail sent out by voluntary health and other non-profit groups?

The three groups to which I have referred asked the minister in an interview to establish a special category of mail for organizations such as those that operate the Christmas Seal and Easter Seal Campaigns and the key tag service. Why should the mail of these organizations be lumped in with junk mail? A start in this direction has been made, as I said at the beginning of my remarks when I referred to certain postage-free mail for the blind.

It was stated in the other place that the postage paid by these three organizations in 1970 amounted to well over $1 million. Any further increase will most seriously cripple the work of these most worthwhile organizations. The minister stated in committee that he was considering the matter and would give an answer before July 1.

The main amendment in this bill comes under clause 10, which proposes the further major increase in the first-class ordinary letter rate. Until 1968 local first-class letters were handled for four cents, while out-of-town letters were handled for five cents. These rates were increased to a flat six cents. This represented a 50 per cent increase in local first-class rates, and 20 per cent for out-of-town letters. This considerable increase was accompanied by a major reduction in service to a five-day week, and the closing of many rural post offices for half a day per week. It is now proposed to increase the flat rate to seven cents, and early in 1972 to eight cents. This will represent a 100 per cent increase in local mail delivery for ordinary letters and a 60 per cent increase for out-of-town letters in a period of only four years.

These further proposed substantial increases in postal rates affecting consumers should be opposed as inflationary. Before any further increase is made in postal rates, the minister, through his department, should provide a proper mail service for all Canadians.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the intention of the honourable Senator Denis to close the debate by speaking at this time?

Hon. Mr. Denis: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Denis speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Denis: Honourable senators, I must thank the honourable Senator White for his important contribution to the debate. I think he approves the bill generally, because instead of discussing the bill he discussed other matters such as second- and third-class mail and other aspects of the post office. We are not considering the Estimates of the Post Office Department; there is plenty of opportunity to ask such questions.

At any rate, as far as first-class mail is concerned, when he speaks of delays, two or three members might recall two or three delays here and there, but we found during the last year that out of four to five billions of letters and other material mailed, there were only a few thousand complaints.

Trust or confidence in the post office has been a little damaged by the transportation and rotating strikes. But that is all over now. Provision is made in the bill to reduce such delays. For instance, there is the assured mail service. It guarantees delivery within 24 hours for items deposited, before a certain time of day, in the new blue and white striped boxes. Those who are in such a hurry as to require their mail to be delivered within 24 hours now have that service available. That is an improvement which costs money, and we must recognize that the post office service will cost money. This was explained by the minister in the other place.

The honourable senator mentioned the percentage of increase in the cost of stamps as being 100 per cent. I must remind him that 100 per cent of one cent is only one cent. It would be different if there were an increase of 100 per cent on $100. An increase of 100 per cent on $100 would mean a $100 increase, but on one cent the increase is only one cent.

Honourable senators, the ordinary citizen uses the mail once or twice a month, so we get an average of 50 cents to be spent by the ordinary citizen in a year, on account of this increase which is being asked. Big stores, telephone and hydro companies, and other companies with a large volume of mail, will absorb about 80 per cent of the expenses. They use the mail service regularly to their benefit.

Honourable senators, in regard to delay, it is not always the fault of the department if a letter is a day or two late. It may depend on the climate, on a storm when aircraft cannot move the mail. This was the case last winter when we had such heavy snowfalls across the country. Sometimes letters are not properly addressed or not well sealed. The delay may not be the fault of the department, but through the negligence of the sender. I understand there have been only 18,000 complaints, out of five billion of mailable material. That is only a drop in the ocean.

Some have said that business firms might pass this increase on to the customer. It is not a sufficiently large increase to warrant such a step. Firms do that where the increase might be 3 cents or 5 cents every day, but that is not so in this case. I think of those newspapers which sometimes like to criticize the Government. I think of a newspaper like Le Devoir, which used to be sold for 2 cents or 5 cents. It cannot be bought under 15 cents now. One has to pay that every day. On the other hand, this postal increase affects the citizen only once or twice a month. That is all I have to say about first-class mail.

Honourable senators, there has been some talk about Readers' Digest and Time magazine. There is some good reason for the way the rate has been fixed. I understand many hundreds of Canadians are working because of these periodicals. There might be some international arrangement. This question has been studied constantly. The minister also said that it is intended to bring the international mail problem before the postal union convention in 1974. They have already taken steps to correct the imbalance there is between mail coming from the United States and mail going to the United States. At a recent convention they settled upon a compensation of eight cents per pound. So, there is still a saving in respect of the United States at the present time, and I can assure you that if the Canadian Government can save money in that way it will do so with great pleasure.

I should point out that if this bill is given second reading now I will move that it be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which I have been given to understand will be meeting at four o'clock for the express purpose of considering this bill. The departmental officials will be available for questioning by Senator White and others. I am sure any questions honourable Senator White may care to ask will be answered to his satisfaction by those officials, not only in respect of first-class mail but also regarding second-class and third-class mail. They will have the right answers and the right reasons for bringing this bill in at this time.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It will not be White-washed.

Hon. Mr. White: May I ask honourable Senator Denis a question? He referred to big business and what the increase would cost them, and he mentioned the two utilities, the hydro and the telephone companies. Would he not agree that, so far as the hydro and telephone companies are concerned, any increase in rates would simply be passed on to the consumers?

Hon. Mr. Denis: Yes, but in the case of Hydro Quebec, for instance, that would mean only four cents per customer every two months, because Hydro Quebec sends its bills out every two months.

Hon. Mr. White: But they send out tens of thousands of bills.

Hon. Mr. Denis: It applies to every bill, yes. I should like very much to get the profits that Hydro Quebec has at the end of each year. A few cents more will not mean much to them. At any rate, they get the benefit out of it because they use the mail only to send out bills to their customers and they simply ask the customers for more money. But, in my opinion, the increase to the customer would be there despite any increase in postal rates.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Denis, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the lucid explanation of Bill C-239 by Senator Argue, a reputable authority on agricultural problems, has made it easier for me, a non-farmer, to understand the unenviable position of the western farmer. I should therefore like to congratulate the sponsor of this bill not only for his clear presentation of the essential points but also for his enthusiasm in promoting the just cause of the farmers who are hard pressed by conditions over which they have little control.

I have some understanding of the problem of the prairie farmers, because I was born in the largest wheat-growing province in Canada. I was born in a coal mining district near Estevan in southern Saskatchewan. Although I was raised in Saskatoon, in the early 1930s during the great depression as a young lad I went harvesting in several farming communities, where I stooked and pitched sheaves into rumbling threshing machines, sometimes 16 hours a day. The money I earned by hard labour and sweat helped to put me through secondary school and teachers' college. Then I taught in public and secondary schools for eight years in farm districts near Hafford, 70 miles northwest of Saskatoon, not far from Borden where former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker was raised. My pupils were children of farmers and thus I became keenly interested in their work and way of life.

I went among the farmers, helped them with some of their work and even set up experimental plots of grain of superior quality. I also assisted farmers to organize themselves in co-operatives. Later, during my university career in Winnipeg, I often visited farming communities in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and kept up with the general developments in agriculture.

Agriculture is still the backbone of the nation and an important element of the Canadian economy. If agriculture is depressed, the whole economy is adversely affected. The trouble is not in production, except in drought years. The main problem is the sale of the staple grain, and this is dependent on a world market. Because of stiff competition on the part of other grain producing countries, Canadian sales of wheat and other grains have often been slow, which has meant that grain elevators and storage bins have been overfilled, forcing the farmer to store more grain on his farm. This grain could be sold only on a quota system, which often was slow-moving, thus hitting in particular the small farmer. Many farmers were not able to realize enough cash to pay their debts and were often forced into bankruptcy.

The Wheat Board was established to regulate, control and promote the sale of wheat, oats and barley. The farmer became dependent on the Wheat Board for the sale of his grain. Under the quota system the receipt of cash was slow. The Wheat Board was under the control of a minister in the Government and thus the Government became the "big daddy" for the farmer. If the Government could not sell the wheat in certain years, the farmer received only a minimum of income, causing a depression in the prairies. The farmers could then blame the Government for poor management of sales. In general, however, it is recognized that the Wheat Board is necessary but should improve its competitive efficiency in the world market.

Basically, the farmer is hard-working and progressive, and he wants to be independent. He would like to get full payment for his grain upon delivery so that he would be able to pay off his debts on high-cost machinery and his taxes. He wants to maintain and increase production and not reduce it, as the Government required recently. If he cannot get full cash, he wants to get as much advance payment as possible for the grain that he has already produced but is not allowed to deliver to the elevators because of Wheat Board and government policy.

The DBS statistics for the three prairie provinces show that there is a marked decline in farm cash receipts from farming operations. Manitoba's cash receipts dropped from approximately $351 million in 1969 to about $336 million in 1970; Saskatchewan's dropped from $709.7 million in 1969 to about $691 million in 1970; and Alberta's went down from $727.5 million in 1969 to about $694 million in 1970. This decline can be attributed to Government policy. It is true that large wheat sales have been made to the Soviet Union, China, Poland and other countries, but it is also true that the deliveries have fallen behind, and in some cases far behind. It shows poor management on the part of the Government. This is not the fault of the farmer, yet he is the one who has to suffer.

The Government has realized the seriousness of the situation and is now coming to the aid of the farmers.

Bill C-239 was explained in this chamber yesterday by Senator Argue, from Saskatchewan. It consists of amendments respecting rate per bushel, emergency payments, and extension of application to rye, flaxseed and rapeseed of legislation introduced in 1957 by the Diefenbaker Government. The success of the original legislation becomes evident from the report of Minister Otto Lang. Of the 285,000 farmers there were 121,092 advances for the crop year 1969-70, for a total of $270,754,372, the bulk of which was paid off. A total of 51,285 advances was issued in the 1970-71 crop year, for a total of $90,605,350 as of April 23. Since losses have been minimal, it proves that the legislation has been very beneficial to a large section of the farmers.

The changes proposed in this bill should prove, I hope, to be even more beneficial to the agricultural industry. Under the old act the rates for cash advances were $1 per bushel at half the initial price for wheat, 40 cents for oats, and 70 cents for barley. Under this bill the Government can set rates at any time by order in council, the amount of the advance to be related to the delivery opportunities and the likely delivery value of the grain for that year. The repayment amount for each grain will be set at a per bushel rate in the same amount as the advance, so that the advance will be repaid as delivery takes place. Under this system the producer will obtain interest-free cash at the time the delivery opportunities are slow or limited. The cash that is so desperately needed by the farmers now becomes available to them to a considerable extent. This legislation will bring assistance to rye, flaxseed and rapeseed producers, and this is a new feature. It will also be helpful to farmers having problems with the drying of damp grain, and unharvested and unthreshed grain, due to climatic conditions such as early snowfall, and who would therefore need the extension of cash advances.

In general, the principle of this bill is good. There are some features of it that are not quite clear to me. For example, the amendment to section 7(4) is:

> (4) The Governor in Council shall prescribe as the advance payment rate per bushel for a kind of grain in a crop year a rate that, in his opinion, approximates sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of the initial payment that will be payable in that crop year for the prescribed grade of that kind of grain.

Why has 66⅔ per cent been designated and not 60 per cent or 70 per cent, for example, which are easier to calculate? How much will this program cost the Government and the taxpayers of Canada?

The withholding of the amount in default in clause 12, amending section 16(1), is provided by the following:

> —interest at the appropriate prescribed rate per annum from the time of the making of the advance payment —

Will the interest be the current market rate?

Another question that I would like to ask is how effective are the safeguards against abuses by farmers who might not need the cash but could secure it on an interest-free basis for exploitation purposes?

I understand that rapeseed producers are doing well under a free-enterprise system, and are not anxious to come under the Wheat Board regulations. Is that the case also with rye and flaxseed producers? Has the Government consulted these producers prior to bringing them under this legislation?

I still think that since the Government is the "big daddy" for grain producers and has tried to improve the financial condition of the farmers on the prairies, it will have to step up sales promotion and the delivery on schedule of the export grain committed to countries in various parts of the world. The objective should be that farmers receive full payment for grain delivered at any time without quota restrictions.

I support Senator Argue's proposal that this bill be referred to committee for closer scrutiny.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

PILOTAGE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-246, respecting pilotage, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McDonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

VIETNAM

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES IN 1964—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Benidickson asked me a question, and in view of its importance I preferred to give consideration to it and reply later. Senator Benidickson's question related to the transmission of information between Canada and the United States in 1964. It is a long question and is to be found at page 1180 of Senate Hansard. My reply is as follows:

In his statement to the house on June 17, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave an account of the actions of the Government at the time of which Senator Benidickson was speaking. I refer honourable senators to that statement, which includes one which I myself made on June 10, 1965, before the Standing Committee on External Affairs.

We were made aware, in general terms and through normal diplomatic channels, of the United States assessment of the situation in Indochina at that time. This assessment, it is important to note, reached us six months after Mr. Seaborn delivered his message referring to the probable United States reaction to further North Vietnamese activity in South Vietnam.

In his visit of December 1964, Mr. Seaborn was authorized by the Government, and by me as Secretary of State for External Affairs, only to ask if the North Vietnamese authorities had any message for him to pass on. We were not allied to the United States in its operations in Indochina and were not as fully informed about its various plans and intentions as seemingly were some other governments. Consequently, the Canadian Government had no precise advance information on what later transpired.

Throughout the period—now the subject of so much attention—the Canadian Government acted in good faith and with the sole object of reducing the chances of an extension of the war in Vietnam. I doubt very much if any responsible government would have refused to take part in an effort of this nature if it believed that by so doing there was some chance that the tragic war in Indochina might be brought nearer to an end. In this context I might also add that the facilities of the Canadian Commissioner to the International Control Commission, of which Mr. Seaborn was then the chairman, were used not only by the United States Government for conveying its message to the Government of North Vietnam, but that the same facilities were available to the Government of North Vietnam for conveying any messages it wished to communicate to the Government of the United States. Indeed, the reaction of the prime minister of North Vietnam to the messages he was given was faithfully conveyed to Washington by our Commissioner and the Canadian Government.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act relating to ambient air quality and to the control of air pollution.

An Act respecting unemployment insurance in Canada.

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March 1972.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 28, at 8 p.m.

Honourable senators, originally we planned to meet at 2 o'clock Monday afternoon, but in view of the progress that we made in the chamber and in our committees today, it is possible to arrange to sit at 8 o'clock Monday evening. The work for the chamber may not be extensive on Monday evening, but there is a possibility that when we have completed our work in the chamber we may go into committee. Furthermore, many honourable senators have expressed their desire to sit Monday evening rather than Monday afternoon. I understand that many of them have commitments in their home provinces and that it would be more convenient for them if the house were to sit in the evening. I think this adjournment will meet the wishes of the majority of senators, and I am sure we will be able to accomplish our work before Wednesday when we expect to adjourn for the summer recess.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 28, at 8 p.m.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM 1971

PROJECTS SUBMITTED BY BOY SCOUTS OF CANADA—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, on June 16 the following questions were put to me by the honourable Senator Molson in connection with the Opportunities for Youth Program:

(1) Is it correct to say that approximately $23.4 million has been allocated already out of a total grant of $24.7 million?

(2) Have any of the 2,300 projects apparently approved included any of those submitted by the Boy Scouts of Canada?

(3) Does the Government consider that this, the oldest and largest responsible boys' organization, is not as worthy of support as some of the hippy and activist groups already supported?

(4) Could the Deputy Government Leader explain to this chamber why the submissions of March 1971 of the Boy Scouts of Canada to the Department of the Secretary of State suggesting 116 projects covering 10 provinces, for the total value of $185,000 and involving 180 boys for the benefit of 12,000 other boys, did not even receive the courtesy of an acknowledgement?

These questions have been in the form of a letter from the Secretary of State, dated June 23, 1971, which read as follows:

In answer to your letter of June 16, 1971 regarding the Honourable Senator Molson's question to the Honourable Senator Langlois in connection with the Opportunities for Youth Program, I wish to inform you that the total amount of money allocated for the Program is correctly $23.4 millions. Those projects, submitted by the Boy Scouts of Canada that we accepted are:

"Camp Lloaskite" by the 18th Scout Group in Calgary, Alberta amount: $12,125.

"Project Beachhead" by the 100th Rover Crew in Windsor Ontario amount: $5,380.

With regard to the third question I wish to point out that the federal Government recognizes the validity and worthiness of the Boy Scouts Association. In this respect, the Citizenship Branch provides annually grants up to $15,000 plus the moneys made available to them through the Young Voyageur program. The Department of Health and Welfare also provides them with substantial grants.

In respect to the Opportunities for Youth Program, all projects submitted were studied on an individual basis and evaluated according to their compliance with program criteria, which included the involvement of young people in the development, management and evaluation of projects, the provision of benefits to the community and the development of new services. In addition, the cost per job was considered, as was the regional and subregional distribution of jobs. All projects submitted were considered on the same basis and rated on these criteria. You can be assured that all projects submitted prior to the April 15th deadline were given careful and serious consideration and were analyzed within these criteria.

In answer to the fourth question, in view of the large number of applications received, totalling some 13,000, telephone contacts were used rather than written acknowledgements; I was also assured that several discussions were held between officials of the Boy Scouts Association and the Opportunities for Youth Program.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask who wrote that letter?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It was written by the Secretary of State to the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Martin).

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committee:

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-9, to amend the Copyright Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-240, to amend the Post Office Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Denis: Now.

Hon. Mr. White: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

GENERAL CONFERENCE IN KUALA LUMPUR

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(2), I give notice that on Tuesday, June 29, 1971, I will call the attention of the Senate to the forthcoming General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association to be held in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, from 3 to 18 September, 1971, and in particular to the participation therein of a delegation from Canada.

Honourable senators, I believe this is the traditional motion which has been passed over the years. I have no intention whatsoever of making a speech, but I will ask leave of the Senate to place in the record of our proceedings merely the agenda of that conference.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved third reading of Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PILOTAGE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved third reading of Bill C-246, respecting pilotage.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved third reading of Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by honourable Senator Denis, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NEED FOR A REASSESSMENT OF CANADA'S POSITION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 9, 1971, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Manning, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for a reassessment of Canada's position in the matter of Canada-United States relations.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, at the outset I want to commend and congratulate most sincerely Senator Manning for introducing this inquiry. It not only serves a most useful purpose so far as this house is concerned but is, indeed, timely in view of the current trends in political thinking in our country. I wish also to compliment those other senators who followed Senator Manning; their contributions were of such breadth and depth as to make our discussion more meaningful.

This evening I should like to narrow the area of inquiry and deal specifically with the economic aspect of our relationship with the United States, which undoubtedly is the most pervasive subject-matter of the constant discourse between our two countries.

In these days we very often criticize the United States freely with regard to their economic policies, particularly as their economic interests impinge upon our own interest, but in that respect it might be advisable for us to take note of the biblical admonition:

> Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye.

Honourable senators, to the end of limiting the inquiry to the economic area as far as my contribution is concerned, I should like first to direct your attention to some of our own economic weaknesses and to our own economic situation today vis-à-vis the rest of the developed western world. I think it is useful at this stage to remind ourselves that among the countries of the western industrial world Canada is today the least competitive country. This conclusion derives from figures produced and research done by the OECD.

If we take the United States as a standard of 100 today in terms of productivity, by comparison we rate 60. In terms of competitive abilities we in Canada today rank behind Germany, Japan, France, Australia, the United Kingdom, and Sweden.

It is also useful to remind ourselves that in terms of productivity we have been falling behind the United States continually since 1910 when figures pertinent to this subject were first published. In 1910 a worker in the United States produced $62 more of goods per year than his Canadian counterpart. Looking at the picture as of 1968, and using constant dollars, the same comparison shows that the worker in the United States produces $1,400 more of goods than his Canadian counterpart. In other words, from a $62 edge in 1910, the United States worker now has, in constant dollars, a $1,400 edge per annum.

On top of this, we enjoy—if I may use that word—the highest taxation levels of any of the developed western countries. Today taxation in Canada at federal, provincial and municipal levels takes up 38 per cent of our gross national product. Let us compare that 38 per cent with comparable figures for other countries.

For Japan the figure is 20.8 per cent; for Germany, 26.1 per cent, and for the United States, 28.3 per cent. For New Zealand, probably the most socialized country in the western world, the figure is 30 per cent. But, in Canada today we contribute, as I have said, 38 per cent of our gross national product in the form of taxation at all levels.

This heavy drain from our gross national product into the coffers of government is producing a shortage of venture capital, and this is hobbling us severely in our innovative skills, and hampering the development of technology in the industrial sector. I might add at this point that if the proposed Income Tax Act places a higher burden of taxation on the middle-income groups, we will suffer additionally because it is from this group, in fact, that one-third of all the capital available for industrial expansion is generated. So, if we tax this middle-income group more heavily, we restrict again our prospects of industrial expansion. Today an American citizen has left to spend, out of each $100 earned and after taxation, $27 more per annum than has his Canadian counterpart.

There is another thing of which we could remind ourselves, and that is of all the western developed countries we are probably the least attractive to foreign investment, except in the exploitation of natural resources. Let me illustrate what I mean, again using 1968 figures. Of manufacturing firms in Canada with assets over $5 million, less than 25 in number made more than 8 per cent on their investment, and only three made a rate of return of over 12 per cent.

I would also remind honourable senators that between the years 1958 and 1967 we had one of the lowest rates of increase in gross national product in the western world. In Canada the average increase per annum was 4.7 per cent whereas in Japan the average increase per annum was 10.7 per cent; in Italy, 5.6 per cent; in France, 5.1 per cent, and in Denmark and the Netherlands, 5.0 per cent. As I said, during that period our average annual increase in GNP was 4.7 per cent. It is interesting to note that only the United States was lower than we were—just barely lower—with an average annual increase of 4.6 per cent.

It is, of course, wise to put this in perspective and to realize that the United States' annual increase in its gross national product is equivalent to 30 per cent of our total gross national product.

I might well be asked what these gloomy facts have to do with our relations with our neighbour to the south. I have mentioned them because I would hope that as a result of their mention we might experience a due sense of modesty before reappraisal.

We have set out in Canada today upon a crusade of economic nationalism; we have become involved once again in a preoccupation with the so-called evils of foreign business investment. Since United States investment forms such a large percentage of our total foreign investment, it follows that our concern with foreign investment becomes a concern largely with United States investment. I should say that this phenomenon is not a new one in our country; we have had a very long history of preoccupation with it.

An American, probably to his country's everlasting regret, made a statement during the days of the United States Civil War which provided us with a peg upon which to hang our hat of fear. I am referring, of course, to John O'Sullivan's famous statement:

> Our manifest destiny is to overspread the continent allotted by Providence for the free development of our yearly multiplying millions.

The ghosts of the War of 1812 stalked again and we are hearing nothing new today.

I suggest, honourable senators, that philosophically these attitudes based predominantly on fear have historically found expression in the Conservative Party. I am reminded of a story told by my father-in-law some years ago. As a young man he attended an election rally in a rural riding just north of Toronto where the local Conservative candidate had just been selected to contest the riding. The man was of somewhat inarticulate bent, and during the hush following his acclamation, he walked to the front of the platform with his hands behind his back, stood in front of his audience, pulled out two small Union Jacks and violently waved them. With that the audience burst into cheers, and he had assured himself of a victory during that election of 1911, and in which the day was carried under the banner of "No truck or trade with the Yankees".

However, now we are enjoying one rather unique political experience as we find at the same time this basically Conservative party philosophy being expressed in many other quarters, and most notably by the Left Wing element of the national New Democratic Party known as the Waffle Group. How to reconcile this ironic twist, we shall have to leave to the historians. We also find the same approach being espoused by a group, prominent among whose members is a former Liberal Cabinet minister.

Honourable senators, with this as background I should like to deal very briefly with some of the myths associated with our fear of foreign investment and promoted by our economic nationalists. The foremost myth being heard today is that Canada has an unduly high proportion of foreign ownership, that this proportion of foreign ownership is growing as a percentage of total ownership, and that we are faced with one takeover after another, particularly by United States interests.

It is interesting to note that during the years 1926 to 1930, 50 per cent of all new capital formations in Canada were created by foreign residents, largely from the United States. During the period 1950 to 1953 this figure had fallen from 50 per cent to 29 per cent of the total, and during the years 1953 to 1963 non-resident capital formations had fallen to 43 per cent of all capital formations. In other words, new non-resident capital formations in Canada have fallen from 50 per cent of the total in 1930, to 43 per cent in the period from 1953 to 1965.

It is also interesting to note that since 1945 new capital formations in Canada by non-residents have been created almost entirely out of retained earnings accumulated in the subsidiary Canadian operations. In the period from 1945 to 1961, one-eighth of non-resident capital formations in Canada—only one-eighth—was produced through foreign takeovers of domestic enterprises.

To pursue this same myth—namely, that we have an undue proportion of foreign ownership—let us look at some of the figures on U.S. investment in Canada. Latest figures show that total U.S. investment in Canada in petroleum and natural gas amounts to 58 per cent of the total; in manufacturing, 46 per cent of the total, and in mining, 43 per cent of the total.

These figures at first blush look rather damning, until we realize that they, when added to foreign investment in all other areas of Canadian economic activity, constitute only 21 per cent of the total capital stock of this country.

Another interesting fact concerns Canadian companies that are more than 50 per cent owned by non-residents. This includes again, not only United States ownership but other foreign ownership. However, by far the largest share would be American. Fourteen per cent is in construction, 31 per cent in wholesale trade, 21 per cent in retail trade, 20 per cent in services, 6 per cent in agriculture and fisheries, and 4 per cent in finance.

In 1968, of all the businesses in Canada, only 27 per cent were, in the full sense, controlled by foreigners. During the period from 1957 to 1966 there was, in fact, no overall increase in U.S. ownership of Canadian businesses.

Let us look at these figures. In that period, United States ownership in manufacturing went from 43 per cent to 46 per cent; in petroleum and natural gas it fell from 70 per cent down to 58 per cent; in mining, from 52 per cent to 53 per cent. In fact, today the total known U.S. investments in Canada, expressed as a percentage of all investment, is less than it was during the 1920s.

It is useful to remind ourselves that there is constant buying and selling between Canadian and United States interests. The Government supplies lists of foreign takeovers and admits that those lists are compiled from newspaper reports. However, the Government does not provide us with the number of acquisitions by Canadians of United States interests, and information concerning the expansion of our economic activity in that country. Just recently Bombardier of Quebec made one of the largest U.S. acquisitions, in terms of dollars, ever made by either United States or Canadian interests in the other country. Indeed, the Government has never to this date produced any study to ascertain what induces these purchases or sales, and which would enable us to take action to determine how to assist in one case or to deter in the other. I hope that the current study undertaken by the Government, and soon to be produced, may provide some of the answers.

Honourable senators, I suggest we are inclined to assume that there is nothing but minuses produced by foreign investment in our country. May I suggest that there are many pluses to foreign investment in this country? First, and on the whole, through it we enjoy increased improvement in the quality of our agents of production and greater efficiency in their use. We gain from economies of scale, and we gain new techniques, new access to foreign markets, and entrepreneurship. Foreign investment produces more tax revenues and, by and large, lower prices through new competition. We enjoy generally a better quality of goods and, very basically, through it, achieve an overall higher real wage rate. However, we hear only of what this foreign-controlled investment pays out of Canada in interest, dividends, royalties and fees. We hear very little of the positive contribution made by this investment to our economy. That is enough for myth No. 1.

I would like to turn to another prevalent myth, namely, that the inflow of money that comes with these U.S. companies is less than the outflow which passes from them to their foreign parents. I will only suggest to you that all studies indicate that this is not so. In all likelihood the reverse is true, namely, that the inflow exceeds the outflow. This is particularly so if one takes into account the exports generated by these companies for Canada and the imports that we would otherwise make and that they displace by production in Canada. Indeed, studies in the United States and the United Kingdom show that their companies operating abroad take a long time to recover the foreign exchange losses they initially create, if they ever in fact are recovered.

May I pass to what I term myth No. 3, namely, that the foreign-controlled companies in Canada, through the generation of profits here, are able to purchase further Canadian companies, and by so doing "our savings are being used to finance foreign takeovers." I suggest to you that these savings by foreign-controlled companies in Canada are no more ours than was the original foreign capital invested to generate those savings. These savings might well and properly have been paid out by these foreign subsidiaries in the form of dividends and to their foreign parents. Therefore, I suggest to you that it is quite false and misleading to say that re-investment of savings by foreign companies operating in Canada is financing takeovers with our own money. In this regard it is interesting to note that in the 1920s foreign business and portfolio investments combined received payouts in interest and dividends in total amounting to 2.9 per cent of Canadian GNP. During the past 15 years these payouts have dropped to 1.9 per cent of our total GNP.

Another myth currently touted is that the economic performance of foreign-owned firms in Canada is inferior to that of Canadian companies. Again, studies show that this is not so. What is more interesting is the fact unique to Canada that these foreign-owned companies perform at about the same level as Canadian-owned companies, or a shade better, except as to exports. In that regard, Canadian-owned companies are only somewhat more proficient than their counterparts. Uniquely, we seem to drag foreign-owned businesses down to our own level. I say that because this does not generally hold true with respect to United States firms operating in Europe.

I am reminded of a conversation I had several years ago during a flight from London to Belgium in connection with one of the NATO meetings. I noticed something familiar in the inflection of a gentleman next to me on the airplane. In reply to my inquiry he informed me that he was born in Montreal. I confirmed that he was a French Canadian by birth. He had been carrying on postgraduate work and teaching at a university in New York City and had studied at the London School of Economics during the previous years. I then inquired why he was on his way to Brussels. He advised he had been retained by the Belgian Government to conduct a study into the reason for the competitive inferiority of Belgian companies to American companies operating there.

That has not been our experience in Canada. American and other foreign companies operating here come down to our level of performance; they do not exceed their domestic competitors as they do elsewhere. That fact should give us serious concern.

Why do we inhibit foreigners who operate in Canada? I suggest to you that we have in Canada today poor, if any, industrial policy. Our high tariffs inhibit foreigners who operate here. We have a poor policy on competition, an uncertain patchwork of tax policies and we provide only the most meagre of research facilities. Added to these disadvantages, competition amongst the various areas of Canada for resource development funds from abroad results in poor bargains for Canadians by and large, and inefficiency and loss in our tax revenue.

I will now pass to what I consider to be the final myth in this debate over economic nationalism. It is the current Canadian assumption that Canadian-owned companies in Canada will serve the public interest better than United States-controlled companies here. The fact and the truth is that neither Canadian nor U.S. companies serve the public interest. Let us be honest—they both serve their best private interests, which is only right and proper.

I would like to suggest that we have much more power over foreign investment in Canada right now than we credit ourselves with. We can make the rules under which it must operate; we have the power to tax. These companies operating in Canada are, in fact, vulnerable to us, not vice versa. I often ask myself: what hypocrisy do we exhibit as Canadians when we endorse the integration of a major industry with that of the United States, as we have done with the automobile pact, while on the other hand we provide every incentive or preventive to curb the integration of other industries including the publishing industry? I know, of course, that my honourable friends will say one lies in the realm of culture and the other lies in the realm of industry. I think we need to do a lot of thinking about where and how we mark distinctions between these various areas.

Of course, the criticism of foreign ownership in Canada does have a very legitimate basis when it questions the extraterritorial effect sometimes imposed through these entities. I feel this criticism in this area is legitimate. We all recall particular incidents such as the prohibition on the sale of trucks to communist countries such as China and Cuba, and we recall the extraterritorial effect of certain United States anti-trust decisions. If these are, in fact, infringements of our sovereignty, we should also be very concerned with the very real extraterritorial effect of the United Kingdom law on United Kingdom subsidiaries operating in Canada, which country in fact requires the repatriation of earnings from hard currency countries such as Canada. However, we never hear about this extraterritorial effect. We should also be concerned with the very real extraterritorial effect of French law on French subsidiaries operating in Canada, which is far greater than the impact of the United States in this field. However, because proportionately the United Kingdom and French interests in Canada are so much relatively smaller than those of the United States, we hear little or nothing of these effects.

I think also we should remind ourselves that this effect is not the result of business investment policies but is rather the result of a clash of national policies. We should remind ourselves that before the United States entered the last war we in Canada, through subsidiaries of ours operating in the United States, produced a very real extraterritorial effect then and curbed the sale of war materials from the United States to Germany. I merely mention this to demonstrate that this phenomenon is solely the result of a clash of national policies, it has nothing to do with business investment. Solutions must be worked out on a national basis between the respective governments of the countries concerned, not through the imposition of some economic ideology on the business community.

Honourable senators, I would like to ask you who are the beneficiaries in Canada of foreign investment? I am going to suggest to you that the beneficiaries are the labourers who gain employment, they are the labourers who gain higher wages, they are the tax collectors who find a new source of taxes, they are the consumers who find new goods, hopefully of better quality and at better prices. On the other hand, who are the losers from the introduction of foreign investment? I suggest that the losers are the domestic owners of competing businesses. It is the vested interests of capitalists who lose, and particularly those in Ontario. Accordingly, embargo on the importation of foreign business has historically been a plank of the Conservative party, and those policies have stood to gain for Ontario, but they lose, and lose severely, for the capital-short provinces east and west of Ontario. The NDP waffle group has still to face up to this dilemma.

Recently the Committee on Industrial Affairs and National Defence of the other place made a recommendation that 51 per cent of all Canadian industries should be owned by Canadians. This is an expression of what I would call the "Buy-back Canada" syndrome. It naïvely assumes that 51 per cent of any industry is control. It completely overlooks the fact that 49 per cent, or a far lesser percentage, will in fact control a company if the 51 per cent or larger is widely distributed. This would certainly be the case in the event of repurchase of these foreign interests. Diverting capital into such repurchase would, in my opinion, benefit only those who could afford to buy, and would compete with the need for the new capital that new enterprises require. To accomplish the same result through public action—that is through nationalization—would again consume the capital available for new enterprises. It should also be borne in mind that any industry is more than the sum total of its capital; it is also an aggregate of knowledge, experience and expertise that can be lost in these processes.

In essence, I am going to suggest to you that the economic nationalists today damage the lower income groups, they damage the less developed regions of our country, and on most scores they contribute to the danger of national break-up.

If we really want to avoid or diminish foreign ownership we can easily accomplish this by lowering our tariffs and purchasing our goods abroad rather than having them manufactured here in Canada. But, of course, that is no answer. Rather, I suggest the more positive approach of increasing our skills in specialized areas of increasing the versatility of our financial institutions, including our banking system, of encouraging our entrepreneurial talent and our ability to invest in it.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I suggest that, in general, we must take positive steps in Canada to increase our productivity. We must avoid the negative protectionism of the economic nationalists, and in so doing we will not only serve our own best interests but we will enhance our relationships with the United States in so doing.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Lang on the remarkable speech he has just made. He quoted some figures at the beginning of his speech, in comparing Canada's productivity to that of the United States. Those figures were extremely interesting. May I ask the source from which he obtained them?

Hon. Mr. Lang: The source is the Organization for Economic and Cultural Development (OECD).

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Thank you.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROTOCOL ON CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. AND JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ON VISIT TO SOVIET UNION BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 3, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Martin:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Protocol done at Moscow, May 19, 1971, between Canada and the U.S.S.R. respecting consultations on important international problems of mutual interest and on questions of bilateral relations, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 25th May, 1971, and to the Joint Communiqué on the visit to the U.S.S.R. of the Prime Minister of Canada, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 1st June, 1971.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, in the debate on the Canada-U.S.S.R. Protocol in the Senate on June 3, I was strongly critical of the actions and certain statements of Prime Minister Trudeau. Among other points on which I took issue with him, honourable senators will recall that I condemned his comparison of the imprisoned Ukrainian intellectuals in Ukraine—who are legally struggling for the just rights and freedom of the Ukrainians but who were sentenced illegally and unconstitutionally in secret trials—on the same basis with the subversive and revolutionary FLQ. Several daily newspapers, including the Winnipeg Free Press, the Toronto Star, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Windsor Star, and others likewise denounced this unjust comparison, and urged the Prime Minister to retract this statement as well as other aspersions. Letters and telegrams of protest from Ukrainian Canadian leaders, organizations and others poured into the Prime Minister's office. Demands for an apology, including my request for one, were not favourably received by the Government Leader in the Senate, who spoke after me and tried to justify Mr. Trudeau's stand.

In the meantime, the Prime Minister became aware that the situation was serious, and that perhaps he could be wrong. Accordingly, he invited for an interview to his office on June 7 the leaders of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee, the co-ordinating body of over 30 organizations, which in reality represent the vast majority of the over half-million Canadian citizens of Ukrainian descent in Canada, over 80 per cent of whom have been born in this country and this year are celebrating the 80th anniversary of their settlement. The delegation of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee, headed by the President, Monsignor Basil Kushnir of Winnipeg, presented a strong memorandum to Prime Minister Trudeau, part of which I want to put on the record in this chamber, as follows:

> The Ukrainian Canadian Committee urges the Prime Minister to correct the most unfortunate impression which his recent statements have created within the Ukrainian Canadian community, which has been deeply hurt by his failure to acknowledge the legitimate aspirations of the Ukrainian people. and by his comparison with the FLQ and the Ukrainian patriots struggling for the realization of the constitutional rights of the Ukrainian people.
> The Committee expresses its intention to continue to bring to the attention of the federal Government those matters which affect Ukrainians in Canada and particularly the injustices of Ukrainians who find themselves under the totalitarian rule of the Soviet Union.
>
> Firmly believing that this Government will uphold the well-established tradition of defending the cause of justice, that this Government will discharge its duty as a signatory of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and that this Government will respect the deeply-felt concern of its citizens regarding the status of rights of nationalities in the Soviet Union, the Committee submits that this Government use all peaceful means at its disposal in order:
> 1. To state to the United Nations and the government of the U.S.S.R. the objections of the Canadian people to the continuing abrogation of constitutional and fundamental human rights which is being perpetrated by the Soviet authorities against Ukrainians and other peoples who have peacefully expressed their concern for the well-being of their peoples and their cultures, and to press for speedy rectification of these injustices. We particularly request that the Canadian Government inquire into the present treatment of prisoners, such as Valentyn Moroz.

2. To protest and to press for speedy rectification of the abrogation of constitutional and fundamental human rights being perpetrated by the governments of the U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. in their continued and relentless repression and persecution of Christians and Jews, particularly exemplified in the recent illegal imprisonment of the Primate of the Ukrainian Catholic Church in Ukraine, Archbishop Vasyl Velychkivskyj, together with numerous members of the clergy and faithful.

3. To protest the continued and relentless efforts of Soviet authorities to stultify the free development of Ukrainian culture and language, and the cultures and languages of other national minorities, in favour of an imposed Russian culture and language.

4. To request the removal of restrictions in the Soviet Union on the free flow of information, in all forms and in all languages, and in particular in the Ukrainian language, between the U.S.S.R. and Canada.

5. To protest the imposition of travel restrictions in the U.S.S.R. and Ukraine in particular, for Canadians who wish to visit relatives and friends and/or to pursue research and cultural development.

6. To press for the lifting of restrictions by the Governments of the U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R., on the emigration of their citizens, and particularly of their Ukrainian citizens.

7. To initiate efforts at establishing diplomatic relations with the Ukrainian S.S.R. and the establishment of a Canadian embassy in Kiev and consular offices in the cities of Lviv, Kharkiv, and Odessa.

The Ukrainian Canadian Committee reaffirms its offer to furnish additional evidence to corroborate the above-mentioned injustices. It is prepared to assist the efforts of the Canadian Government in implementing the above recommendations.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: May I put a question to the honourable senator, before he proceeds further?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): As a senator, I would like to know from the honourable gentleman what were the exact words pronounced by the Prime Minister of Canada while he was in the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: In the first speech I made in the Senate on this question, I quoted the exact words of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, and I will refer to those words a little later.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Very well.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: At that time I was away in Edmonton and the Northwest Territories with the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution of Canada, but I was hopeful that Mr. Trudeau would clarify the situation. I kept in mind Senator Martin's characterization of him which is found at page 1086 of Debates of the Senate for June 3, 1971. I see that Senator Martin is unfortunately not in the chamber tonight, but I now quote his words:

> We all know Mr. Trudeau. Everyone in Canada knows that he is a man of utmost frankness, who sometimes, to those of us who have been in politics a long time, is overly frank. That is his method, that is the technique; I think that is one of the reasons why people have such confidence in him. They know that he looks at all aspects of a problem, fearlessly.

Personally, I admire a man who is frank and even "overly frank", because I can be sure of his stand. I wondered what would be the outcome of this "utmost frankness" when he met the leaders of the Ukrainian group. Some of the headlines in the press after the meeting—such as "Trudeau apologizes to the Ukrainians" and "Trudeau makes peace with Ukrainians"—appeared to bear out this frankness, at least on the surface.

Careful reading of the Prime Minister's remarks to the press following the meeting with officials of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee throws a different light on the frankness. Here is his official reply regarding the controversial issue of comparing Ukraine Nationals with the FLQ, and I take this from a statement issued with the compliments of the Prime Minister. These are the answers the Prime Minister gave at that time:

> Well, I told them I was sorry if I hurt their feelings but I was rather sure that their feelings had been hurt by people who misrepresented what I said rather than by what I said in fact, and I read to them excerpts from my press statements and I think they are quite different from what they thought I said. So, on this ground, I don't like to hurt people's feelings but of course I can't be blamed for people who twist my words. What I did explain to them was that it is... Well, I read the quotes that I had said to you people of the press, that I wasn't comparing the two countries, that democracy in the Ukraine wasn't comparable to democracy in Canada, that any attempt to compare them was misleading, and therefore there was no attempt to put the FLQ on a parallel with the Ukrainian nationalists.
> Q. Do you intend on trying to help out in any way in getting the jailed intellectuals out of jail?
> A. What I told them is that on this and other like cases, our only chance of making any progress was by appealing on a humanitarian basis and not by demanding as of right or as by the constitution of the U.S.S.R. because the answer would be that they are able to apply their laws and their constitution without help from us. And I pointed out to them that this was a normal reaction we could expect from the Soviet Union, in the same way as we tell other countries who try to solve our constitutional and legal problems: "Look, stay out of it, we can do it ourselves". Therefore, if there was any chance of making any progress on this, it would be by making appeal on a humanitarian basis, and I explained to them that I had made such appeals on reunification of families which concern a great many Ukrainians; I had made such appeals on the emigration of Jews which concern a great many Soviet citizens; that members of my party, like Walter Deakon, had raised the particular question of imprisoned intellectuals, and so on, but that we were making these representations as a country which wanted to have good relations with the Soviet Union, as a country which had many Ukrainian and Jewish Canadians who felt strongly on these and we were hoping that they would concede these things, once again, not as a matter of right but as a matter of good relations with Canada.

Q. Do you still compare the Federal system of Canada with that of the Soviet Union and do you see Quebec in the same light as you see the Ukraine?

A. No to both questions. You know, many Quebecers want us to put in the Constitution the right of self-determination; I shouldn't say many, but some Quebecers, which is...

Q. But the Ukraine is in the United Nations at the moment.

A. Yes, so what are you arguing, that the Ukraine is more independent from Moscow than Quebec is from Ottawa?

Q. Yes.

A. Well you don't know much about the Communist Party and the way that...

Q. (Inaudible)

A. Well, yes, of course it's in the Constitution that the Ukraine can exercise its right to self-determination. Why don't they?

Q. It's the same thing as Czechoslovakia—the Brezhnev doctrine.

A. Well, exactly. So the comparison is not right because the political apparatus in the Soviet Union can hold the country together even if the Constitution says it might fall apart. There is no comparison.

Q. Do you know who Valentin Moroz is now?

A. No, do you?

Q. Yes.

A. Good.

Well, what did all those remarkable remarks really mean? Was this an apology? For what? Apparently for "hurting people's feelings". It was certainly not an apology for making false comparisons and false statements, as was proven to him. Was this circumlocution and casuistry? Or was this one of Mr. Trudeau's fuddle-duddle exercises? Most leaders and people whom I have spoken to in Edmonton, Calgary, Yellowknife, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa stated that the Prime Minister's clarification was evasion of the issues, and putting the blame on the press for misrepresentation.

The Globe and Mail editorial of June 9 entitled "Misinterpreted Again" tries to interpret the misinterpretation, and I quote:

> One of the more intriguing—and often distressing characteristics of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau is what seems to be a complete inability to admit error. He may be misinterpreted, misquoted, misread, misunderstood, but never mistaken. The art of graceful retreat is one that he has yet to master.
>
> Mr. Trudeau was recently very strongly criticized when he explained that he had avoided raising with Soviet leaders the question of jailed Ukrainian nationalists because this might have brought the rejoinder: "Well, you know, why did you put in jail certain FLQ leaders? After all they think they are only fighting for the independence of Quebec."
>
> It is understood, of course, that Mr. Trudeau was paraphrasing a hypothetical point that might have been raised by the Russian leaders—although it is curious that he should have considered himself vulnerable to such a proposition. The main point at issue, however, was Mr. Trudeau's comment—

And this is a quote from the statement.

> "My position in the Soviet Union or in Canada is that anyone who breaks the law to assert his nationalism doesn't get too much sympathy from me."
>
> In other words, he is not prepared to make distinctions. His sympathies are reserved for those who remain within the law, no matter whose law it is or what shade of justice it defines.

I am still quoting from this editorial.

> Mr. Trudeau has told a delegation representing the Canadian Ukrainian Federation (Ukrainian Canadian Committee) he is sorry—sorry if their feelings had been hurt, that is. But, of course it was the fault of those ogres who are always out to make mischief.

And quoting Mr. Trudeau again:

> "I was rather sure their feelings had been hurt by people who misrepresented what I said rather than what I said in fact... So on this ground, of course, I don't like to hurt people's feelings but of course I can't be blamed for people who twist my words."

And the last paragraph of the editorial—

> What twisting? Which words? As we understand it, Mr. Trudeau made it plain enough that neither the Ukrainians nor the FLQ deserved his sympathy if they asserted their nationalism outside the law. Or are we still misrepresenting what he said?

If Prime Minister Trudeau does not want to recognize the grim facts evident under the Soviet totalitarian police regime, I am sure that we shall get nowhere by asking him to apologize for his apology. The people will be the judges of the justification of his stand.

Our paramount concern at all times in Canada, and particularly now when our nation is subjected to various stresses and stains, should be to cherish and uphold the freedom and democracy that have been won through the past generations. The Ukrainians and all the ethnic groups who have come to Canada from countries behind the Iron Curtain are ever conscious of the fact that the false propaganda followed by the military invasion of Soviet Russian communist dictatorship have destroyed the freedom and democracy of their people in the homeland. We must always guard against Soviet communist propaganda subtly engaged in undermining the democracy of the free countries of the world with whom we should always maintain a close alliance.

Canadians must be constantly vigilant in order to preserve our way of life. The defence of freedom, democracy, justice and honourable peace must always be the cornerstone of the Canadian foreign policy.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHERN OIL AND GAS

GOVERNMENT TRANSPORTATION STUDY URGED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications reported that the committee had considered the subject matter of a motion respecting Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker projects and reports as follows:

Your committee recommends:

That the Senate oppose the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project and urge the Government to proceed with the various economical and ecological feasibility studies of alternate routes and to report from time to time upon the most appropriate steps that in the Government's opinion may from time to time be taken to accomplish the prudent and efficient transportation of northern oil and gas.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator Haig leave to proceed with this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to say a few words. I am exceedingly pleased that the Senate has before it this unanimous report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, and I want to thank the members of that committee for their co-operation. At our first meeting we had great difficulty in getting a quorum. Last night, on behalf of the Whip, I did my best to organize a quorum for the committee meeting when the house rose, and we had a wonderful attendance. My only problem was that I was on the telephone at the time and did not hear the bell, so I missed the committee, which produced a very good motion without my presence.

I should like to say a few words at this time, because I think this is an important occasion for the Senate and for Canada. I am confident that today will mark a major milestone in Canadian parliamentary action. I trust that the Senate of Canada will unanimously support the report now before us opposing the Trans-Alaska pipeline, just as the other place last Wednesday unanimously supported the report of its Special Committee on Environmental Pollution.

If the roles were reversed it would be as though the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives and the President and his cabinet unanimously asked Canada not to take an action that would endanger and ruin the American coastline but to use instead some other alternative safer method. I am sure that in light of such a unanimous request Canada would comply.

I hope that in light of this unanimous opposition by the Senate, the House of Commons and the Canadian Government, President Nixon and his administration will abandon the proposed Valdez Seattle Tanker route.

Why should the United States ship its oil through the Straits of Georgia and Juan de Fuca when it will inevitably result in oil spills and the destruction of hundreds of miles of Canada's coastline?

Canada is a nation of 20 million alongside the giant United States, a nation of 200 million. If the United States proceeds with this proposed route without consideration for Canada and the damage to our coastline and our environment, it will, I am convinced, fly in the face of world opinion. It will bring discredit to itself amongst the international community. If it proceeds with this proposed grave mistake, against the wishes and interest of its small peaceful neighbour Canada, it will have adopted a ruthless, illogical course that will damage its own prestige, reduce its good will and influence among the nations of the world, and make it necessary for a future administration to reverse this tragic error.

This is a unique day for Parliament. This discussion in the Senate follows the unanimous adoption last Wednesday of the report of the House of Commons Special Committee on Environmental Pollution which states:

> —your committee concludes that the proposed tanker route is detrimental to the Canadian national interest, and unanimously recommends that it be vigorously opposed by the Canadian Government.

Mr. David Anderson, M.P., Chairman of the Commons Committee, showed courage, ability and initiative in taking the case against the pipeline to Washington, in speaking out frankly in face of opposition within his own party, and finally in bringing in a report that received the unanimous support of the House of Commons.

In a sense there has been a parallel in the Senate. I moved the original resolution, seconded by Senator J. M. Macdonald (Cape Breton), on April 1. There was considerable support in the debate. However, Senator Langlois, as Deputy Leader in the Senate, moved that this motion be not read a second time but that the subject matter be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I feared that this was a move to kill the resolution. I opposed the amendment, as did fifteen other senators. However, witnesses called before the committee supported the substance of the motion and opposed the pipeline. A proposed star witness, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, who it was rumoured would enter serious reservations, reportedly changed his mind and declined to appear. Happily, he was in the House of Commons on Wednesday last when the report of the Commons committee was carried unanimously.

As was intimated to me by one of the witnesses before our committee, the Senate motion has two advantages over the Commons action. First, it not only opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project but proposes action toward an acceptable alternate route. Secondly, a motion passed by the Senate of Canada will carry a major political wallop in the United States where its Senate plays such a powerful role.

Honourable senators, in adopting this motion the Senate of Canada is taking the correct step. As one who has had the good fortune to travel to the United States often, to meet with many of the American congressional leaders, and as one who realizes the powerful influence of anti-pollution groups in the United States, I personally am confident that this proposed pipeline route will be abandoned and that our good normal relations with the United States will continue undisturbed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 30, 1971, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Perhaps a word of explanation would be helpful. It is my hope that this afternoon we can clean up all the work that is before the Senate at the moment. However, there is a possibility that one or more bills, particularly the Judges Act, may come to us from the other place late tonight, in which event it would be wise for us to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you know whether it is the intention to have royal assent before one o'clock tomorrow, as originally planned?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: The only information I have at the moment is that if it is possible for the Senate to get the bills I have alluded to in time, we could adjourn as originally planned. However, it is more likely that we will have royal assent later tomorrow afternoon at approximately five or six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does the Deputy Leader know what the intention of the other place is so far as adjournment is concerned? Do they intend to adjourn tomorrow at noon? I had heard that they wanted to conclude at approximately one p.m.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That was the original plan, but it was hoped at that time that the legislation I have referred to would be before the Senate today. As that is not the case, I doubt that either the House of Commons or the Senate will be able to complete their work until some time later tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do I understand that the budget debate in the other place is to be concluded before one o'clock tomorrow and that there is the possibility that the house will sit in the afternoon to deal with the Judges Act or any other legislation before it?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is my understanding that there are two hours today for government business and that, if the government business can be concluded in that period of time and can be sent to this chamber, then we might well finish our work tomorrow at two o'clock. However, if the work of the house as planned for before the recess is not completed during those two hours this afternoon, there is a possibility that they will go back into government business tomorrow at about 2 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

GENERAL CONFERENCE AT KUALA LUMPUR

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave notice with leave that today I would draw the attention of the Senate to the agenda for the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Annual Conference which will be meeting in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, September 3 to 18, 1971. The names of the Canadian delegation to that conference are as follows; Honourable G. McIlraith, Senator Donald Cameron, Mr. T. C. Douglas, M.P., Mr. Romuald Rodrigue, M.P., Mr. Robert C. Coates, M.P., Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay, M.P., and myself. With leave of the Senate I would ask that the agenda for this conference, which is quite short, be appended to our proceedings for today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this agenda be appended to today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of agenda see Appendix p. 1236)

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the third reading of Bill S-9, to amend the Copyright Act.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to address myself briefly to this bill. At the outset, I must say I am neither for nor against it, but I am rather concerned about the effect it is having on the functions of the Senate. To be frank, honourable senators, I feel that in connection with this bill I am being called upon to perform a function which I had never considered to be within the ambit of my duties as a senator. Let me explain very briefly what I mean.

The subject of this bill, on which I intend to say absolutely nothing, is highly technical. When the dust finally settled after weeks of committee hearings I think many honourable senators on the committee, like myself, felt that what we were really witnessing was a fight between two private interests with little, if any, public interest involved.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: What are those interests?

Hon. Mr. Lang: On the one hand we had the manufacturers of recordings and on the other we had the radio broadcasters. Into this contest between these private interests the minister injected himself by the introduction of this piece of legislation, and came down firmly on the side of the broadcasters. During the committee stage we were faced with the rather unusual situation—a quasi-judicial situation—in which we were being called upon to act as a court in deciding between the interests of these two parties. In this more anomalous situation one party was represented by the minister, and the other by counsel from Montreal. We have here quite a kettle of fish. The executive functions of the minister are mixed up with the legislative functions of the Senate in trying to perform a judicial function. We are not constituted to perform a judicial function.

This has left me, as it has other honourable senators, with a great deal of hesitancy about supporting, or even opposing, this bill. I would not like to see the bill passed today in a perfunctory manner. If there are honourable senators who can assist in removing the dilemma in which the committee found itself in view of the nature of the proceedings, perhaps they will contribute to the debate. I do not know whether the bill, if it is passed today, will go through the other place before we adjourn, but unless there are reasons why we should deal with it today, perhaps the debate could be adjourned until we return next fall.

I have no particular feelings on that matter, and I hope that other honourable senators will contribute to the discussion.

Hon. Mrs. Casgrain: I should like to support Senator Lang in what he has said. In order to make it clearer, perhaps it would be better if we have an opportunity to study the bill a little longer. I have no special interest one side or the other. I will not be here in September, but I am sure that the Senate will deal wisely with what is contained in the bill.

Hon. Alan Macnaughton: Like Senator Lang, I have no interest one side or the other. I have tried to follow the discussion on the bill both today and in committee. Senator Lang—or perhaps it was another honourable senator—mentioned that in one of its reports the Economic Council of Canada referred to the matter under discussion.

At one time, when the bill was before the committee, there was a question of whether we should call a witness from the Economic Council of Canada. I think it was the minister himself who made the suggestion. In any event, I find it rather a strange function to try to determine between two contesting corporations. I do not think that is our function. There also seems to be the smell of retroactive legislation in this proposed bill.

Basing myself on the general principle, which I think is very sound, that where there exists a real doubt the debate should be kept open, I should like to ask the Senate to consider that we adjourn the debate until the month of September. I so move.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will first put the question and then honourable senators may, if they wish, speak to the motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I would like it to be clear that we can debate the motion, because normally a motion to adjourn is not debatable. If it is agreed that we can debate the motion, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: His Honour the Speaker may wish to put the question before we debate the motion, but on the understanding that we can debate it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there agreement that the motion can be debated?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Macnaughton, seconded by honourable Senator Hays, that this debate be adjourned until September 7. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I think this is the strangest procedure that I have ever heard proposed. Here we have a situation where a Government bill has been introduced in the Senate. It has taken its normal course in that it received first and second reading and was sent to committee, and the committee reported the bill back to the house without amendment.

Whether or not this chamber has been asked to mediate between two private parties is not a fit question, I submit. This bill has passed through its normal course. It is before the house for third reading, and I think that third reading should be proceeded with now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.
