POETRY.

Opportunity.

Master of human destiny and fate,
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait.

Cries and calls I walk I penetrate
Desires and passions and yearnings
Have and mark and place soon or late
I knock, unbidden, once at every gate.

If sleeping, wake! If feasting, rise
If I turn away! It is the hour of fate,
And those who follow me reach every state.

I am pleased to recommend
Mortal desire and conquer every foe
Save death. But those who doubt, or Suffer, I turn away!

Contentment is a false friend,
Sick me in vain and useless I employ
I answer not, and I return no more.

SELECT STORY.

GOOD BYE.

BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

He had a little tray with a letter lying on it which he offered to Adair, and as he took it he asked—"Will you dine here to night, sir?"

"No—I'll dine at the club," Adair answered—not that he meant to dine anywhere.

"Shall I light the fire again, sir," the young man asked.

"Presently, presently—I am going out after a while—light it then," Adair answered irritably.

He waited until he was alone again before he looked at the letter which he held in his hand—oh, yes, he had seen a glimpse from whom it came; he knew Hugh St. John's big bold handwriting as well as he knew his own.

But he did not open it at once—indeed he had more than half a mind not to open it at all, but to send it back with a curt line written across the cover to the effect that there either could nor should be any communication between them.

"I suppose he will marry Hope now as soon as he can," he thought to himself.

"He thought to blind me with his cock and bull story of a letter written to another woman, the lady he hoped to make his wife—and yet—yet he refused to give the name in court, because the engagement had not been made public, owing to the unfortunate mistake which had been made with Mrs. Adair—yes, the mistake of being found out."

But should he open that letter or not? There might be explanations in it, some word, even if it were only an admission of the truth, which would set his mind at rest, so far as it ever could be set at rest after all that had happened. Yes, he would open it—it would be easy enough to send it back, perhaps over across the border to express his contempt for the writer.

In another moment he had broken the seal and had drawn the letter from its envelope. It was without prefix and ran thus—"God forgive you, Adair, for what you have done this day. It is a fine piece of work truly, one for a man to be proud of. You have blasted your wife's innocent life, and mine is ruined as completely as it is possible for a man's life to be. We have been close friends for many years, you and I, and I would like you to ask yourself now that all is over, have you ever known me do a dirty trick in my life to any friend, to any enemy, for the matter of that? Look back over the years that you have known me—do you think if I had wanted to make love to your wife that I would have conducted myself like an assassin? No, a thousand times, no. If I had wanted her to go away with me and she would have gone (which she never would have done, for God help her, poor child, there was only one man in the world for her, and he was a fair-weather lover who hadn't heart enough to trust either wife or friend)—do you think I would have been content to see her now and again on the sly? No, Adair, and when you are calm enough to think reasonably about it, your heart will tell you that whatever else I may have done, that particular sin is not one of them.

"I saw you near in the court today because I would not give a lady's name to the public—yes, I dare say, you have not hesitated to drag your wife's name and your own through the mire, will hardly understand my wish to spare a woman the pain of having her name brought into a case like this.

Well, I can tell you now and I will, believing that you have still a sufficient sense of honor left to let it go no further. The lady to whom that letter was written was Miss Maturin—and an hour ago she wrote to me definitely refusing to fulfil her engagement to me, or to have it made public in any way—she positively refused to see me or to have any explanation from me—she even forbids me to write to her, saying that, if I do so, she will return the letter unopened. Now, Adair, when I tell you that this is the very case, every vestige of my emotion, that for many months past the sole aim and object of my life has been to win her for my wife, you will perhaps understand how I feel towards you at this moment.

"As to the unhappy girl whose stricken face to day ought to have carried conviction of her innocence to any but a heart of stone, what you have done is, of course, a matter for your own conscience, a burden which I, with all my disappointment and trouble, thank God I am not mine to carry. For the last time I protest to you that your suspicions against your wife's honor are absolutely unfounded—would that all other women were as pure and true, and although, poor child, her purity and truth have not availed her much—or I should say have not availed her at all, against what at best was a mistake, or at worst a cruel trick to bring about her downfall.

"HUGH ST. JOHN."

When Adair got to the end of the letter he had no longer any idea of sending it back to Hugh St. John. He felt that it was manly and brave in tone, and that it was hard on him to have his engagement to Miss Maturin brought to an end in that way. He had no longer any doubt that St. John had been engaged to some one, and now like a flash of lightning there came back to his memory the many occasions on which he had seen him in attendance upon Mrs. Adair—yes, he was so sure of the less convinced of his wife's guilt and of his friend's treachery.

"It's a manly letter, evidently written in a boiling passion," he told himself—"and it's a clever letter too—but false, every word of it that concerns Hope. All the better for Miss Maturin that she has found it out before marriage instead of afterwards, she ought to be thankful to me, though I dare say she isn't. But she will be some day—some day! And I! Shall I be thankful too? My God, no! If only I had let it pass—if only I had let sleeping dogs lie—and they were sleeping—there would have been no scandal, no fuss, nobody would have known. I could never have been so happy again, but I should not have been so apparently wretched as I am now."

An hour went by! The quiet young man came twice and listened at the door, and the second time all was still that he opened it softly and ventured to look into the room—"And I came out quiet-like," he explained to his wife when he went downstairs again—"so as he shouldn't hear me. Poor gentleman; he'd do better to take it to his heart."

"What was he doing?" his wife asked curiously.

"Nothing—he was just leaning his head on his arms and never moved nor spoke. I should say as he didn't hear me, so I came out quiet-like and shut the door."

"He's had naught to eat all day," remarked Mrs. Smith feebly. "I know when I thought you were going to take up with that Ann Timmins, never a bit passed my lips for nearly a week except what I had to taste in the way of cooking. I couldn't have sat down to a regular meal not for a king's ransom, that I couldn't."

"Ann Timmins wasn't worth troubling yourself about, Jenny," returned Mr. Smith dispassionately—there had been a time when his feelings had hung trembling as in a balance between the two ladies, but he had ended by marrying Jenny, and was eminently satisfied with his partner in every way.

"Perhaps not—and perhaps you wasn't worth it neither, Smith," said she quickly—having made her establishment in life Mrs. Smith had no notion of allowing her better half to do what she called "get above himself."

But Mr. Smith was equal to the occasion—"Which I never was one to butter myself, Jenny," he remarked with dignity—"but all the same, I hope I always respected myself better than to run after Ann Timmins anyway."

"There's many a marriage comes about without any intention on the man's part," said Mrs. Smith rather sentimentally—"and Ann Timmins isn't the one to remain in a single state for want of encouragement or of side, that's certain! Eh! but, Smith, my heart do bleed for the poor gentleman upstairs. I wonder if he'd manage to eat a few oysters if I sent 'em up with out saying anything about 'em."

"Best leave him alone," Smith replied.

"Perhaps. But he's had one visitor you say."

"Yes! And Jenny—Why—it was her!"

"Her—what her?"

"Why, his wife, of course. I thought she looked white and scared-like. By—, but she's a pretty creature—no wonder he gives such a sigh when he reads the note."

"What was she like? What sort of a way had she with her?" Mrs. Smith asked curiously.

"She was very white-looking—and I noticed that she'd very blue eyes—and she was quietly dressed and a lady every inch of her. She had a commanding way, too; but a very gentle voice, and she gave me a shilling when I helped her into the cab. 'Thank you,' she said, 'I am much obliged.'"

"Where did she go?"

"To Albert Gate," Smith replied. "I dare say she'd give him directions when she got there."

Adair had then she'd be in her comfortable house still and we should be one gentleman the less—not that I should mind that, pore thing. I never was one to fatten on the troubles of others. Well, Smith, I'm going to do something unusual. I'm going up stairs to see Mr. Adair, and ask him if he'll oblige me by eating something."

"Do as you like, Jenny—but you'll take the consequences if he's offended about it?"

"Oh! yes," she responded readily enough.

She was a comely young woman, neatly dressed in black with a large white apron with a bib to it. She glanced at herself in the glass, then went straight upstairs to the drawing room door, at which she knocked. There was no reply and she knocked again, after which she went in only to find the room empty—Adair had gone.

"I wonder where he is," she said anxiously to herself—"please Heaven he comes to no harm—it's a bitter night."

It was a bitter night, and at that moment Adair was tearing along the Embankment as if ten thousand fiends were after him. The icy wind whistled about his ears, but he felt it not because of the passionate fires burning in his heart. As he passed by Charing Cross Station a man who knew him well almost ran against him, but avoided speaking to him from an instinctive feeling that he would rather be left alone—a little further on a painted woman caught hold of his arm only to be shaken off with an oath—so he sped on and through the dark night until at last he reached a lonely spot where he came to a standstill, and there he stayed leaning his arms on the stone parapet. For a long time he stood there looking across the dark river and over his own desolate future. In his heart a terrible question fought fiercely—with the knowledge that a jury of impartial men had found guilty in the man and woman whose denials had been so full of indignation and of warning. If his wife and his friend were innocent of offence after all, and he had in his anger—"Oh, God! oh, God!" he cried to the fierce night, and for answer there was only the sound of his own sobs and the scolding pain of his own bitter tears as they fell upon his clay-cold hands below.

CHAPTER IV.

For a few days Adair remained in his rooms in Jermyn Street, seeing no body, not going out of doors during the day, eating next to nothing, and then, after the dusk had fallen, spending hours tearing up and down the almost deserted Embankment, or standing resting his arm on the stone parapet and staring wretchedly at the dark millen water below.

At last on the third night after the dreadful day in the court, when he had been standing motionless for nearly an hour, a policeman came up and touched him on the shoulder.

Adair looked up. "Well—what is it?" he asked.

The policeman coughed apologetically. "If Adair had been in rags instead of the good clothes of a rich man, he would have taken him by the arm with a rough, even though it might be kindly—'Come, young man, you'll get no comfort staring at that 'ere water—you'd best move on.' As it was he coughed—'I've seen you hereabouts for several evenings, sir. I—I thought—I'm afraid you're in trouble, sir.'"

"Yes," answered Adair briefly.

"Well, sir—people in trouble do desperate things sometimes, and it's our business to stop them if we can. I wouldn't get looking too long at the water if I were you—it seems to draw you like."

Adair laughed, a harsh laugh without a trace of mirth about it. "My good fellow," he said, "I haven't the very smallest intention of going over there,"—pointing to the water gleaming here and there as it was touched by the lamp-light—"if I had had any inclination that way I should have done it several days ago. But I'm obliged to you, policeman, all the same."

The policeman looked, as he felt, rather sceptical. "You'll excuse me, sir, but I don't like to leave you here. You look desperate—hadn't you better be going home?"

"Home,"—echoed the other bitterly—then remembered that the man knew nothing of him or his story. "Look here, policeman," he said suddenly changing his tone—"you're a good fellow—here's a sovereign for you—I'll walk as far as Charing Cross with you if you're going that way. Policeman—I hadn't any intention of putting myself in the water, that's not my form at all. But I doubt if there's a more miserable devil in the three kingdoms than I am."

"I'm sorry for that, sir," said the policeman sympathetically—and in truth he thought that Adair was out of his mind more or less—"and I hope you'll understand that I meant no offence at all in speaking to you. You see, sir, a good many poor things get into the water somehow, and if they're in a position to give their account afterwards, they generally say as they didn't know how it happened. For my part I'm always more easy in my mind when them that's in trouble is out of sound of the river."

They walked on a few steps further, and then Adair suddenly stopped in the full light of a gas lamp.

"You've heard of the Adair case?" he asked.

"Yes! Well—I am Adair. Now you'll be able to understand why I find the dark Embankment more pleasant than my club, and that my home has not much attraction for me."

"I see, sir," replied the policeman, now thoroughly surprised—"I've thought it very 'ard lines on you, sir, all along. But I wouldn't loiter about—thoughts may come into your head that'll be 'ard to drive out, and it's a bitter night, too. You'll get over it after a bit, sir—praps there's better times in store."

Something in the man's tone made Adair pull himself together in a minute.

"Ah! well, I was bound to satisfy you, policeman, and I'm obliged to you. Good-night."

He hailed a passing cab and got into it. "No, 00 Jermyn Street," he said, and the next moment the policeman was alone on the wind-swept pavement.

"H'm," he muttered—"there's another of 'em gone wrong through a hussy of a woman. Aye, but the women have a lot to answer for. And as for that one, if a fine handsome young fellow like 'em did not satisfy her, she ought to be trounced, that's all."

And Adair in the course of a few minutes reached his chambers and went straight upstairs, and as he flung open the door of his sitting room, a man who was sitting near the table got up and said "Good-evening, sir," in a quiet respectful tone.

Adair started and looked at him more closely by the dim light of the shaded lamp. "Oh! it's you, Jenkins, is it?" he exclaimed. "Well, what brings you here? Is anything wrong?"

Jenkins coughed behind his hat.

"I have had no proper orders, sir," he replied. "When Mrs. Adair left on Tuesday immediately after the—the—she hesitated for a word and Adair made an impatient gesture to signify that he understood."

"Well?" he said. "Go on."

"When the mistress left, sir," he told me that I was to wait for your orders, and that she thought you would probably be coming the next day. We should like to know—"

"What I'm going to do?" interposed Adair harshly. "Then you'll all have to do without knowing. I don't know myself, Jenkins, so I cannot tell you. You can go on very well as you are."

"Excuse me, sir," returned Jenkins with studied politeness—"but if you would be so kind as to look over the plate and the valuables I should be more easy in my mind. And—and I should be glad to give you my notices."

"Your notice," cried Adair, more thoroughly astonished than he had ever been in all his life before—"your notice, Jenkins! Why—what on earth are you talking about, man?"

Jenkins drew himself up. "Well, Master Richard," he said, unconsciously reverting to the way in which he had been used to address him twenty years before—"Well, Master Richard, I dare say you will think that it's no business of mine, and that a servant, even an old one like me, that's been in the family man and boy for over thirty years, ought to have no feelings of any kind, but the truth is I am deeply attached to the young mistress, and I can't get over the feeling that wrong's been done. And she has been wronged. Master Richard, as sure as you and I are stood here together at this moment, I but Adair shook his head. "No, Jenkins, no—she had the greatest lawyers in England to try and prove her innocent and they couldn't do it."

"Who could prove anything when they had to deal with a liar like Rosalie Vallin?" Jenkins asked sturdily. "You may believe me, Master Richard, I didn't live in the same house with Rosalie Vallin for three years without knowing her well, and being able to read her through and through like a book. I know her better than the others did, far better, for she had an idea at one time that we might do a better better than we were likely to do apart. I believe she flew as high as Arlington Street and three sets of titled ledgers. But not for me—no, Master Richard, if ever old Jenkins makes such an ass of himself as marrying I'll not be to Rosalie Vallin, nor any other French hussy that finds her own country too hot to hold her. But I got to know her well—and I have my own opinion as to what her behavior to Mrs. Adair means—"

When I was a Boy,

Wrote Postmaster J. C. Woodcock, Forest Hill, W. Va. "I had a brachial trouble of such a persistent and stubborn character, that the doctor pronounced it incurable. I tried ordinary medicines, and failed. I then tried Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and I did so, and one bottle cured me. For the last fifteen years, I have used this preparation with good effect whenever I take and I know of numbers of people who keep it in the house all the time, not considering it safe to be without it."

"I have been using Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for 20 years, with the most satisfactory results, and can cheerfully recommend it as being especially adapted to all pulmonary complaints. I have, for many years, made pulmonary and other medicines a special study, and I have come to the conclusion that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral occupies a position pre-eminently over other remedies of the class."—Chas. THE ACADIAN

WOLFVILLE, N. S., JAN. 26, 1894.

Acadia Electric Co.

The above named concern, which was organized in Wolfville a little over two years ago, may now be said to have become an established institution of the place.

The plant which the company have secured is all of the best make and especially suited for the work required of it.

An adjourned meeting of Council was held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 23d.

C. M. Vaughn, Robert Harris and J. W. Vaughn were appointed assessors.

The afternoon session opened at 2 o'clock. Several resolutions were passed among which was one confirming the previously expressed opinion of the Association that there should be some legislation to assist in the prevention of the spread of injurious insects and diseases among fruit trees.

The next speaker was Prof. Saunders and as on the day previous, the hall was packed to hear this gentleman tell of "The Results of Fruit Tests at the Experimental Farms," and for nearly an hour this large audience listened with marked attention as the Prof. in his particularly easy manner unfolded to view work in this line being carried on at the Central and the other Experimental farms in the Dominion.

After partaking of refreshments, three hearty cheers for Miss Graves were given, and the girls gathered in the hall preparatory to plundering the tree according to the german custom, each seeking to secure a souvenir of the tree and a most delightful evening.

To fortify the system against La Grippe there is nothing better than a good Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil combined with hypophosphites of Lime and Soda.

Meeting of the Fruit Growers' Association.

TUESDAY EVENING SESSION.

There was a good attendance at the opening of the evening session. Dr. A. P. Reid read a very interesting paper entitled, "The orchard and garden in Nova Scotia." The writer pointed out the lack of interest manifested by the average farmer throughout the Province in the kitchen garden, and, with the exception of those in the Valley, the same would apply to the orchards.

This paper was followed by an address by Prof. Parilla, subject, "The Progress of Horticulture." The professor handled his subject in a plain and forcible manner which held the attention of his hearers to the close; and all were impressed with his practical remarks.

The Rev. H. How, of Annapolis, followed, reviewing the remarks of the previous speakers and interspersing wit and wisdom through a half hour speech, which marked the gentleman as a very ready and eloquent speaker.

Mr. B. Starr, of Paradise, who was one of the judges in the pomological department at the World's Fair, gave some interesting "Notes from the Fair," comparing the fruit exhibits made by different states and provinces.

Nova Scotia fruit stood well in comparison, although from the far West there was shown much larger apples than any we could boast of in these parts.

Col. Spurr, of Kingston, also gave some account of his recollection of "Nova Scotia at the Exposition," after which the meeting adjourned till the following morning.

WEDNESDAY MORNING SESSION. Wednesday morning shortly after 10 o'clock the President called the meeting to order and Secretary Parker read his report, which was carefully prepared and contained a fund of information. We regret that our space will not allow of our publishing it in full.

The Treasurer followed with a most satisfactory report, showing the financial affairs of the Association to be in a splendid condition, and showing a balance of $1865.73 to the credit of the Association.

The afternoon session opened at 2 o'clock. Several resolutions were passed among which was one confirming the previously expressed opinion of the Association that there should be some legislation to assist in the prevention of the spread of injurious insects and diseases among fruit trees.

In this connection Mr. W. H. Hardwick, of Canada, read an exhaustive paper upon the "Black Knot on the Plum and Cherry tree," showing the life history of that disease and the importance of prompt action in destroying it whenever and wherever it shows itself.

M. P. Freeman, Secretary. Our esteemed contemporary, the Western Chronicle, has gone back to a weekly publication, finding a semi-weekly not profitable. The Chronicle has been enlarged, and is now published on Fridays. We congratulate the publisher on the improvement made.

The town court has been busy this week with Scott Act cases. Complaints against the proprietor of the Wolfville Hotel failed for want of evidence, but three convictions were secured by the inspector against the proprietor of the Royal. Another case against the latter was adjourned until Tuesday next, in order to secure witnesses.

The following from the Presbyterian Witness will be of interest to many of our readers:

We made mention last week of the kind gift of the Wolfville and Lower Horton congregation to Rev. B. D. Rose, their late pastor, who has been laid aside by illness now nearly two years. We have a note from Mr Rose which makes very grateful mention of the gift.

"The fine remembrance of my late people greatly cheered and warmed me. I had a very kind letter from the pastor. May the Lord bless them all!" Mr Rose states that his prospects of restoration to health are better than at any time since he was taken ill. He is still weak; and his cough is troublesome, but he is strengthening, and he has gained about five pounds in weight within two months.

The best recommendation for E. D. C. is the cure it makes. It has cured suffering from every stage of indigestion. It will cure you too.

A very pleasant, but quiet, wedding took place Wednesday evening, 10th inst., at 425 Highland Avenue, West Somerville. The contracting parties were Miss Julia E. Griffin, daughter of Vernon E. Griffin, Esq., of Greenwich, N. S., and Mr. A. Albon Augusta, of North Cambridge, Mass. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Arthur L. Snell, pastor of the West Somerville Baptist church, only the immediate relatives and friends being present. The happy couple were the recipients of many beautiful presents, among them a wicker rocker, and many other useful and pretty presents.

Woman's Temperance Crusade—Its Origin and Spirit.

PAPER READ IN THE W. C. T. U. MEETING

BY MRS GEORGE KEMPTON ON CREBUDE DAY.

AFTER TWENTY YEARS.

"Twenty years since the bell rang out, twenty years since the first air of the hall of death;

With its poison breath, its drunken revel, and fell despair

Was written through by a woman's prayer.

When love and pain under holy spell, Aided for their own at the doors of hell."

"Why did the women choose such a strange method of carrying on this reform?" asked one who was annoyed to see a company of women kneeling at prayer in front of a saloon. "They did not choose it," was the reply of one of them, "it was the work of God marked out for us, and we simply did it according to order."

Do you like to see your wife singing psalms in a saloon? asked a critic of a judge—whose wife was one of the most active Crusaders—"No, my friend, I cannot say I do; but would rather see my wife singing hymns in such a place, than my son singing bacchanalian songs; and I have seen that."

"Do you like to see her marching through the streets with procession, and kneeling on the dirty sidewalk in prayer?" "No," said the judge, "neither do I like to see my son marching in a procession of criminals on their way to prison, and I have seen that."

This conversation shows the great sympathy which this Crusade awakened, for rum does not seek its victims, among the lowly and ignorant only—but like the Angel death, the rum fiend "Loves a shining mark."

The credit of projecting the plan of the Woman's Crusade has been given to Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston. When residing at Newton nearly twenty years ago, I had the pleasure of seeing and hearing Dr. Lewis several times—and will tell you a little of his history. His father was a drunkard, but his mother was a prayerful woman, whose trials were many, the abuses of her husband almost beyond endurance. Many a time he said she went up to the parrot to pray, and the children would hear her crying out in agony of spirit, "How long, O Lord, how long, how long!"

She would return with swollen eyes, but radiant face. From his mother he learned to pray—and grew up with faith in prayer.

In the winter of 1875 he went through various parts of the West, lecturing on temperance and organizing temperance bands; and suggested woman's prayer meetings in saloons. It was tried in some sixty places, but took deepest root in Ohio. Women of the highest standing in society were foremost in the work. At Hillsborough, Ohio, on the evening of December 23d, 1875, seventy-five ladies enlisted to visit the saloons, having bound themselves by their solemn obligation—"We, the ladies whose names are hereto appended, agree and resolve that, with God's help, we will stand by each other in this work, and persevere until it is accomplished; and we see that, so far as our influence goes, that the traffic shall never be resumed."

They started out on Christmas day—it was a strange experiment to them, contrary to all the rules of womanly conduct—these drinking dens, which respectable people abhorred at a distance, they were to enter, and in the presence of the half-drunken crowd of profane and vicious men, they were to engage in solemn worship. "They shrank from the task, half in doubt and half in fear, but the thought of the drunkards that would go reeling home on that Christmas night, gave them new courage, and they went on their way in the spirit of Him who came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Of this company, one was Mrs. J. H. Thompson, daughter of Geo. Trimble. She offered the first prayer in an Ohio liquor saloon.

"This excellent woman, now in her 90th year, is known as Mother Thompson. When introduced at the late National Convention—the leader asked perfect silence that all might hear her, and Mother Stewart said:

"The saloon keepers heard her," Aye they did," rang out with British fervor. "The saloon keepers heard her when she struck the first notes of that mighty diapason which to their death dealing trade meant destruction, but to the world of lost humanity meant life and peace. These were deep notes from the very heart of God Himself as he goes on echoing around the World as they have done."

In a few days five of the saloons surrendered. The movement spread and was soon the theme of pulpit discourses, and newspaper articles. I might give you one example of the method employed. In the town of Washington, about forty women, wives of clergymen, doctors, lawyers, etc., started out. On reaching a saloon kept by J. Smith, one of the ladies knocked at the door and said: "Have you any objections to the ladies on the sidewalk coming in?" "Certainly not, come right in ladies," said Smith. "I want to read an appeal to you," said the leader. No objection made. "Have you any objection to our kneeling down here and having prayer?" The man was too much surprised to object, and prayer followed prayer. Then they sang what afterward became campaign song in Ohio—"Nearer my God to Thee." Then they went to the next and the next, until thirteen saloons were visited. The next day the same thing was repeated. One dealer said: "Look here, I cannot stand this. If you won't come again, I will stop." We hope we never did anything offensive," said one of the women. "No, no, but I really cannot stand it. I have thirteen barrels of spirits in my cellar, you may put the heads in them all. The leader acceded, and a time was appointed, the bells rang, and hundreds of people gathered. One lady who had suffered most from the traffic, seized an axe and dashed in the heads and the liquor ran over the street. The Crusaders were not always allowed to enter the saloons, sometimes on the sidewalk they prayed and sang. Sometimes by fiddling and dancing inside, they tried to drown the voices outside. Sometimes they were stoned and insulted, or pelted with water. But almost without exception the walls of Jericho fell before seven days, and the work went gloriously on. Many notable women were raised up. Foremost among them is Mother Stewart. She was born in Ohio, converted in early life, an earnest worker in the church for over forty years before the Crusade, and since that time in both England and America a great temperance worker; also Mrs. L. H. Willing, through whose efforts the Woman's National Temperance Union was organized. Mrs. Willing was elected President of the first W. C. T. U. of Illinois. She has worked with Dr. Dio Lewis. She has worked with Dr. Mother Thompson. I have already spoken. All denominations united. In some towns Presbyterians took the lead, and in others our quiet Quaker sisters. One spirit moved all—and that was the spirit of Christ, who came to save the world. One power led all, and that was power from on high. Their only hope was in God, and they prayed expecting to move the Arm that moves the World, and they were not disappointed. Let us follow their example.

The Crusade movement led to the organized work of the W. C. T. U. which has been called the Child of the Crusade, and thus through time will it reach unto Eternity.

Of Interest to Women.

A Lady Cured After Seventeen Years' Affliction With Rheumatic Pains, by the Use of Dodd's Kidney Pills—Other Unfortunate Cases Cured as Well as She.

TOLEDO, Jan. 22.—The publication of the letter of Mrs. Renny, of Ashland, Wis., concerning her cure by Dodd's Kidney Pills after 17 years of sickness, has awakened wide-spread interest amongst the women of Canada. It is truly marvelous that a woman afflicted as long as she was, who had tried all the remedies within her reach and all that doctors could do for her, should be cured by so simple and easily accessible a remedy as these pills. What they did for her they will do for all other women suffering from disease peculiar to their sex. Dodd's Kidney Pills are manufactured by Dr. L. A. Smith & Co., Toronto, and are sold by all dealers, or will be mailed on receipt of price; fifty cents per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

Origin of "A.I."

"The expression of 'A number one' is popularly used to designate goods of any kind of the first quality, it is taken from the symbol of the 'British and Foreign Shipping List,' of the English firm of Lloyd's. 'A.I.' is used to designate the condition of the hull of a vessel, and the figure '1' is used to denote the efficient state of her anchors, cables, etc. If these are insufficient in number or quality, the figures 2, 3, etc., are used to indicate the same. Therefore, when it is said of a thing it is 'A. I.' it is equivalent to saying that the article is all right and first class in every respect. It is hardly necessary to remark that the letters 'O. K.' are used in America for the same purpose.

Yes, said the editor, as he put his mulligan brush in the ink bottle and tried to write on a slip of paper with his stub pen, yes, the great fault of newspaper contributors is carelessness. Indeed, he continued, as he dropped the copy he had been writing into the waste basket and marked "Editorial" across the corner of a poem entitled "An Ode to Death," contributors are terribly careless. You would be surprised, said he, as he clipped a column of fashion items and labelled them "Fam Notes," to see the slip about writing that comes into this editorial sanctum. Misspelled, unpunctuated, written on both sides of the sheet, illegible, ungrammatical stuff. Contributors are terribly careless. They are—just then the office boy came, in that dictatorial and autocratic manner he has, and demanded more copy, and the editor handed him a love-letter he had just written to his girl, and as he had forgotten what he was talking about, went on with his work.

A Great Offer.

GREAT PAPERS

GREAT PREMIUMS.

WE are in a position to offer THE ACADIAN and the Family Herald and Weekly Star, of Montreal, for one year for $1.75. This offer entitles the subscriber to a choice of the two great premiums given by the publishers of the Family Herald. These premiums are the "Star" Almanac for 1894, a superb book of 450 pages, or if preferred a copy of the great Family Herald Souvenir Picture which retails at twenty dollars. The premiums—Almanac and Picture—will be ready about the end of November, and will be forwarded in the order in which the subscriptions are received. Subscriptions to the paper may begin at once. Remember the offer of a choice of premiums holds good only to people who subscribe during the autumn. Afterwards the choice will positively be withdrawn.
