you acknowledge your guilt or no?"

"That is a psychological problem, of which perhaps the solution is not so very far to seek. Why, you are poor, you are in want of books, as the poverty-stricken appearance of your bookshelves testifies, as does the order for the bookseller which was found lying on your desk. You wanted to furnish rooms for your mother. I am told she has a struggle to make both ends meet here was an opportunity to help her, and perhaps others too, and the temptation was too much for you. You see the idea that you did it for your mother's sake makes me more lenient in regard to what is in itself a dreadful crime, and I promise you that every extenuating circumstance shall be urged in your favor and your mother's, and you shall not suffer the full rigor of the law, if you frankly confess your guilt."

"My mother !" Father Montmoulin exclaimed, "How can my mother be implicated in this affair? "I feel convinced that your mother carried the money away in the little handbag she had with her, if we fail that is to find it concealed on these premises. At all events, your mother will be arrested as accessory to the deed. "For heaven's sake have mercy on her! "It will be her death." cried the priest. But the magistrate showed no sign of relenting. "Confess your guilt and your mother will be treated with the ntmost consideration. Otherwise I shall order her to be arrested. And you too shall be taken ing your innocence, you will be dealt with as a common criminal. Do you imagine that your profession will entitle you to any indulgence; a clergyman who can perpetrate such a deed deserves to be put to public shame ten times more than a vulgar "I can do nothing more than assert my innocence, and leave the rest to God." Father Montmoulin responded calmly. The magistrate shrugged his shoulders and passed the protocol, after it had been read over by the clerk, to the accused for signature. The unfortunate man felt as if he were signing his own death called in the police and gave him into custody. The prisoner held out his bands without a murmur, yet he could not retain a shudder as the handcuffs closed on his wrists. He raised his eyes to the crucifix, and was enabled to maintain outward composure, The Mayor and the

"Perhaps you will have the goodness to leave it to me to decide what treatment he is to receive, and whether his guilt is to be considered as proved or not," the magistrate replied haughtily.

"That is what it is," rejoined the Doctor, in a tone of annoyance. "This is but a fresh manoeuvre in the plan of campaign against the clerical party. Hear the people outside shouting down withthe priests."

The others retorted angrily that it was no such thing, and declined making any alterations in their arangements. The doctor turned to leave the room, muttering under his breath. The unhappy priestly feelings as they drove off may be better imagined than described. He looked up once more at the shurch, and remembered the last sermon he had preached within its walls, only two days before ing how soon he himself, would become a victim of that stringent law.
