Women are entitled to adequate maternity leave, and paid maternity leave. The United Nations declaration on the elimination of discrimination against women provides not just for the principle of leave but for the principle of paid leave. We, therefore, propose and have mentioned in the motion that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended. It should be amended to provide for women contributors to be entitled to unemployment benefits for a period of 18 weeks, or for the period to which their contributions entitle them when they stop paid work temporarily for maternity reasons, or during a period for which they are receiving unemployment benefits and are unable to work for maternity reasons. The same principle requires the amendment of the federal Fair Employment Practices Act to provide for employed women's entitlement to 18 weeks maternity leave, and the prohibition of the dismissal of an employee on any grounds during maternity leave to which she is entitled. The provinces should also follow suit.

We are glad to read that the legislation introduced today by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to amend the Canada Labour Standards Code will include provisions for mandatory maternity leave. We will scrutinize this legislation carefully to see whether it lives up to the standards proposed by the report.

The government of Canada itself should be giving the lead in affording equal opportunity to women, not only for entry into but promotion in the public service. It is hard to preach to others what you do not practice yourself. Of employees under the Public Service Employment Act, there are 41,000 women. Almost 83 per cent hold office support or administrative support jobs. Only 1½ per cent are professionals and scientists. In 1968 only 444 women out of a total of 43,796 made over $10,000 annually.

In a report to the Public Service Commission by Kathleen Archibald, made in 1969, entitled "Sex and the Public Service," the following statement appears:

> The Canadian government has in the last few years adopted a passive approach, i.e. one that merely attempts to ensure that the existing structure is administered fairly; it does not concern itself with inequities built into the structure, but concentrates on educational campaigns to change attitudes, individual cases of discrimination brought to light through formal or informal complaints, and "token" appointments, that is, active attempts to get minority group members into a few particularly visible positions, with respect to equal employment opportunities for women. For several years before that there was no approach. And before that, the approach was on the negative side of passive —it was one of promoting unequal opportunities for women.

There may have been some improvements in the last year or two, as the Prime Minister has claimed, but they are minimal. The picture remains very much the same as that portrayed by Mrs. Archibald. The federal government must lead the way to ensure that those limits that contribute to discrimination in the Public Service are removed and provision made to encourage and enable women to work out of the home. In this connection it is my understanding that a program for part-time employment of women was instituted in the Public Service and has since been discontinued. This should be looked into and the question of part-time employment reconsidered. We recommend to Parliament the setting up of a women's program secretariat to promote the increase of women working in all levels of the Public Service.

The recommendations of the royal commission are all geared to providing women with more opportunity to compete for available jobs, and the recommendations are welcome. To this end, the Federal Adult Occupational Training Act should be amended so that full-time household responsibility be equivalent to participation in the labour force in so far as eligibility for training allowances is concerned. A bill to this effect, Bill C-89, has been put on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. In the absence of government involvement, it will suffer the usual fate of a private member's bill.

More effort should be made to satisfy the educational needs of immigrant women. The report recommends, and we support this proposal, that there should be education in the native cultures for those in the public services dealing with Eskimo and Indian women, and encouragement of native women to take training to equip them to work in the community building process.

The royal commission report deals with "Women and the Family." It refers to the statement of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that, "The family is a natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the state." With this statement we are in entire and enthusiastic agreement. I have already dealt with one of the major recommendations in this field and that is federal assistance for provision of day care centres. It would certainly have the effect of strengthening the family.

We also approve of the proposal that a family planning program should be initiated by the Department of National Health and Welfare with the objective of making birth control information available to everyone. This would include federal financial aid to establish birth control clinics and funds to train health and welfare workers in family planning methods. I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or someone delegated by him, will state his views about the implementing of this recommendation. I know that the Prime Minister has said that the Department of National Health and Welfare is taking steps to support the development of family planning in Canada. We would like to know what are the steps, and if they are the same steps as those specifically recommended in the royal commission report.

In our view abortion should be removed from the Criminal Code. The commission recommends that the Criminal Code be amended to permit abortion by a qualified medical practitioner at the sole request of any woman who has been pregnant for 12 weeks or less. This is a subject which the Prime Minister did not mention in his speech the other day. I would very much like to hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) on this subject. The present provision in the Criminal Code has been a complete failure. It produces discrimination, degradation, and the present state of the law is responsible, in some cases in my view, indirectly for premature deaths. My colleague the hon. member from Vancouver-Kingsway will be discussing later in this debate the question of a family planning program and the question of abortion.

We also agree with the proposal in the report that the Divorce Act be amended to allow divorce after separation for one year. There is not much reality left in a marriage where the parties are separated for so long a period.

Part of the report of the commission deals with taxation and child care allowances, and recommends that the federal Income Tax Act be amended in order that the extra exemption allowed the taxpayer for a dependent spouse be reduced from the present $1,000 to $600 when the dependent spouse is under 60 years of age. Frankly, we do not agree with this recommendation. We think that the taxpayer is entitled to at least the present exemption but we do support the proposal for a federal annual taxable cash allowance for each child under 16 to be paid in monthly instalments to the mother.

We have supported and will continue to support a guaranteed annual income which would eliminate the need for separate deductions for dependants and family cash allowances. Until the day when this is implemented we think the recommendation of the commission should be adopted. We also agree with the proposal that the family unit concept be recognized under the federal Income Tax Act. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is taking note of this recommendation and will incorporate it in the proposed tax reform.

The royal commission deals with the question of poverty. Pending the institution of a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians, we do heartily support the recommendation of the commission that a guaranteed annual income be paid by the government to the heads of all one parent families, and that the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security benefits be increased so that the annual income is maintained above the poverty level and that the supplement be adjusted to the cost of living index.

The royal commission recommends symbolic but important changes in the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act, and I hope that the ministers in charge of these respective subjects will take note. I also hope that the Minister of Justice will look carefully at the proposals for the amendment of the Criminal Code. In particular, we support the proposal to repeal the discriminatory clauses in the Criminal Code dealing with prostitution and vagrancy.

Chapter 7 of the report deals with "Participation of Women in Public Life". The record on this subject speaks for itself. We do not believe, however, that the situation can be remedied by the recommendation in the report that two qualified women from each province be summoned to the Senate as seats become vacant. This recommendation seems to be inconsistent with the principle that women should have equal but not special status. We cannot support such a token recommendation.

We are happy to say that this party does not have a separate women's organization and that women as well as men are full members of the constituency, provincial and federal, organizations. I would like to point out to other parties which have not adopted the same rule the way in which this system works. We have developed within our party a fellowship based upon an equality of status. It works well. But although our party has led in the number of women candidates for election, we realize we have a long way to go before the goal of equality in practice is reached and political representation by women is accepted as a matter of course. We believe that we must all make an effort to have more women active in all areas of public life.

I have already made it clear that we attach the greatest importance to the actual implementation of the proposals contained in the report. As a first step to this end, we urge the designation of a minister of the Crown to be responsible for planning, co-ordination and implementation of the recommendations. I have already indicated that many different departments of government are affected, including the Prime Minister's office, the Department of Labour, the Department of Justice, the Immigration Department, the Secretary of State Department, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Finance, and no doubt there are many others. What is everybody's business is nobody's business.

Perhaps the Prime Minister himself would undertake the responsibility, but it may be that the burden of his other duties would make it impossible for him to do so. If so, the duty of following this report through, taking the responsibility in cabinet, giving adequate priority to the legislative program arising out of the report, should be delegated to a senior minister.

Those familiar with the report will be well aware that many of the recommendations fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. This is particularly true in the field of the recommendations with regard to education which are designed to ensure that education as a whole, including textbooks, will portray women as well as men in diversified roles and occupations and not in restricted stereotypes. In fact, over 30 of the report's recommendations specifically call for a joint approach, that is for participation and co-operation between different levels of government. We, therefore, have included in the motion a proposal to convene a federal-provincial conference to consider the recommendations of the commission which fall within provincial jurisdiction or which are the joint responsibility of the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces.

It is our conviction that if the report is effectively implemented it will make for a healthier and happier society. The onus is on us. We know that an extensive legislative program is not carried into effect overnight. But we suggest that there is more than the usual need for urgent, persistent and even impatient activity to implement the report. The confidence of a large part of the Canadian people in the efficacy of parliamentary institutions is at stake. There are many people, including many women, who are watching what we propose to do in this regard. This party will co-operate and even insist, in so far as lies within its power, that this report will not be pigeonholed. We urge that the report should be used as a basis for a fundamental far reaching revision of human relationships and for greater justice for women in Canada.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, a 17th century French feminist complained that "All that has been written about women by men is suspect for the men are at once judge and party to the lawsuit". I wonder if it is a valid query whether all that will be said today will be equally suspect.

I shall try to be objective as I respond to the motion on behalf of my party but I often question whether there is or, for that matter, should be total objectivity. I speak, hopefully in no way smugly, from the vantage point of watching members of my own family who in days gone by asserted their right to independent status. A great aunt was amongst the first graduates in nursing from Bellevue Hospital in New York and another was dean of women at McGill University. Their nieces, equally independent were and are part of the university scene in Canada and the United States. One, of unforgettable memory, was so anxious to avoid platitudinous farewells from people she did not particularly like that she retired from university service one year early. My sister was, almost until her death, a lawyer with a busy practice. I cite what are obviously personal references so that my colleagues will understand the perspective from which I address myself to this question. I am strongly dissatisfied with the traditional restrictions on women's role. Most enlightened males share this view and join women in opposition to the restrictions. I cannot imagine that very many people would want to close off any traditionally male occupations to competent women or condone unequal pay for equal work.

Where the agreement breaks down, suggests a note to the reader in the current issue of Dialogue, "is on the relative importance of biology and culture in determining the past and present roles of women in society. Has modern technology made the bilogical distinctions between the sexes largely irrelevant to their social functions? Or are there profound instinctual and temperamental differences that point to at least partially different paths for fulfilment?".

It is my hope and expectation that today's debate will help to answer these questions, and that the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will be used by the government as a program for action, so that the rights and needs of women in Canada will be met. It is neither trite nor tendentious to say that Canada and the world need the special talents of women for nurture and conservation. Margaret Mead, one of American's most distinguished anthropologists, sees the liberation of women coming from a new partnership with men, rather than a struggle against them. Margaret Mead writes evocatively of the expansion of women's role of staying close to the hearth, caring for young children and preparing food. "However much later generations elaborated this pattern, with greatly extended families, complex systems of feudal inter-relationships and one-sex religious communities, this central core remained."

She went on to write:

> But such was added to it. To the care of the infant and toddler was added the protection of young people through adolescence, the care of the sick and the care of the old. And a place was found for the wisdom and wider generosity of women past childbearing, who were heavy with the memories of earlier solutions and free to care, not only for their own children—with fierce maternal protectiveness, as the young mothers did—but with a wider concern for all the children within the community. Elaborate rituals grew up around death, and it was women who straightened the limbs of the dead and washed their bodies for burial. Knowledge of midwifery grew, and it was women who attended woman in labor, washed the newborn, and wrapped him, in bark or swaddling clothes, and laid him on his first bed.
> Wherever religious or social attitudes flowered in a new concern for the welfare of the poor and the sick and the orphaned, it was women who arranged to take on these widened responsibilities. As widows or members of religious orders, they continued these extended activities that had once been confined to the home. Then as nurses, and as teachers, their traditional role was widened. In the early days of the United States, it was the raised voices of valiant older women, who fought against slavery, against child labor, against the horrors of the slums; who fought for schools, for libraries, playgrounds, legislation and funds, to improve our communities and to protect our children. Many of these women were unmarried, and gave their entire lives to make a world safe, not for their own children, but for all children. In England, even as late as World War II, it was devoted unmarried women who carried a tremendous amount of the burden in the days of bombing and buzz bombs.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are the inheritors of this tradition; of women who left their homes, many of them never to return, to extend the services once performed within the home to the wider world outside. We may well ask, in these days of great freedom, when education is as open to women as to men, when the great professions of medicine and law, teaching and scientific research are open to women, how do we stand? The answer is very simple: we stand very badly indeed. The royal commission spells out just how badly, and presents the government with a substantial list of recommendations. I want to discuss the report and some of its more important recommendations as I proceed in this debate.

There are three central and pointed criticisms generally made of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. They all, I think, contain some merit. The first involves the too great attention to detail by the commissioners themselves. This, say critics, will go some way toward preventing the quick acceptance of major recommendations. The second criticism relates to the possibility or perhaps probability that the report has been superseded by events. A great deal has happened regarding women's rights since the commission was established. "Women's Lib." has become a force to be reckoned with, and there are those who say with some contempt that the mild recommendations of the report do not go nearly far enough. The third criticism relates to a form of tokenism noticed in the report. This is evident, particularly in those recommendations regarding representation in the Senate and parts of the public service.

There is another, general comment that is often made about the report, and it has to do with its readability, or lack of it. I am not sure whether I am a fair judge of this. One observer noted that, "as a literary document, the report rates somewhere below that of the Royal Commission on Taxation and rather higher than the one on farm machinery." The problem with this criticism regarding the elegance of language is that it tends to give an excuse to those who would summarily dismiss the very valid list of recommendations contained in the report. There is, of course, some truth to all the criticisms. I have listed them in order to make this debate, hopefully, more relevant. The fact of the matter is that the general criticisms really have gone beyond the point of relevancy. They are now irrelevant, because the only valid criticisms of the report much be specific and in reference to particular recommendations. The tone of the report, the general thrust, must, I suggest, be approved, along with recommendations on some of its particular suggestions.

These provisos are not brought forward in any attempt to protect myself or my party. They are, instead, an attempt to give validity to the whole series of recommendations. Each recommendation, obviously, must be studied and judged, not on the premise that women deserve special status or have been discriminated against in the past and so require special treatment now, but on the firm belief that they should be treated and judged on their merit as individuals, nothing more or less than that. The systematic and thorough listing of these inequalities in law, the documentation of discrimination, is probably the most valuable aspect of the report, and it enables us to deal with these inequalities in a systematic way.

However, the report illustrates the basic difference between equality of rights and equality of opportunity. Equality of rights can be achieved through the implementation of some of these recommendations, some of those regarding taxation reform, day care centres, maternity leave, and especially those involving reform of the criminal law regarding the laws of vagrancy and so on. Equality of opportunity is more difficult. It involves not only a change in the law or new legislation but rather, or in addition, a change in the basic attitudes of society.

The old maxims and accepted beliefs that a woman's place is in the home are being outstripped by urbanization, increased leisure time, new social welfare measures and new technologies. We require new and more realistic responses to a rapidly changing social order. The organization and function of each member of the family has been gradually altering over the years. Indeed, Governor General Georges Vanier pointed to this as one of society's great challenges; to recognize and deal with this change in family life, and to do it in such a way that the family is not torn apart in the process is a matter of fundamental responsibility for government and Parliament. He was one of the first of Canada's public figures to recognize this and launch research projects into changing family life in the modern world under the auspices of the Vanier Institute of the Family, the funding of which was established in his memory. I think it is a useful adjunct in the ongoing research into this very basic and core matter of our whole social order.

We adapt to this change and try to make it as easy as possible for a woman to live her life to the fullest, while at the same time ensuring care for her children. The woman, on the other hand, must realize that, with her new status, she has added responsibilities. The basic problem, even after government action is taken on all aspects mentioned in the report, is the attitudes that society holds towards women. And these will still be with us. One of the Toronto daily newspapers attempted to criticize the commission's report on the basis that it did not give us an answer on how we can change this attitude. It chastised the royal commission for not coming up with an answer to this dilemma. As a philosopher said in another context, you cannot compel men to be just.

All that governments can really do is lead. That is their mandate. They can influence people because of the information they give and the leadership they exercise. They can lead people into changing attitudes and ways of thinking about problems. Surely, this is what must be done with reference to the report of the royal commission.

The government can make itself a model by ending all forms of discrimination against women in the public service, for instance. All governments can work together toward establishing day care centres so that the women can be free to find self-fulfilment in the career of their choice. I suggest that if the government finds a constitutional hangup on the matter of day care centres, it could exercise leadership by establishing as a pilot project a national day care centre for the children of people in the public service in this capital area. Experience would be gained from this pilot project and provincial jurisdictions and other federal jurisdictions, such as the armed forces and the RCMP, could find their fulfilment in day care plans.

We must not over-react to the situation. I find that a good deal of debate, not particularly here because unfortunately we have had very little debate, but some of the public debate is so shrill and strident that the issues being discussed are being drowned out in slogans and rhetoric. Unfortunately, this is all too true of much of public discussion in our time.

A former moderator of the United Church has pointed out that Canada is put in a paradoxical situation because the status of women in developing and so-called backward countries, such as India, grew much earlier and more rapidly than for women in Canada. He said:

> Therefore, the struggle for equality instills over-reaction—This is not healthy, nor is it in balance.

This tendency to over-react has led to what are, in effect, other forms of discrimination. The recommendation of the commissioners regarding appointments to the Senate are an example of discrimination in reverse; women are not being appointed on their merit as individuals but because they are women. This does nothing but perpetuate a form of discrimination. This particular recommendation has received more criticism, I suppose, than most. This is good, because it shows that the public realizes what is wrong with it.

No doubt the type of over-reaction expected of us in this House is of the other kind, the reactionary approach typical of male chauvinists. I say with all earnestness that what we seek is a balanced view of an extremely important and fundamental subject. I entered this debate armed with a mass of statistics, most of which can be found in the report. There are one or two which might be useful in underlining my comments.

The 2.5 million Canadian women who work at paying jobs occupy an obviously inferior status to their male counterparts. Women hold less than 1 per cent of the top corporate positions in Canada. Only 2.3 per cent of all working women were in managerial positions in 1967. Women receive less than 20 per cent of the total incomes of men and women, 37 per cent of gross dividends from stocks, 36 per cent of rental income and, if anybody cares, 31 per cent of mortgage interest. Women earned 15 per cent to 22 per cent less than men working under similar conditions according to 1961 census figures. In universities, women academics earn an average of $2,000 per year less than male academics. In the federal public service, 41.2 per cent of women earn less than $4,000 annually as compared with 7.1 per cent of the men. I will not go on to bore the House with a long list of statistics. They are in the report and in other research data on this subject.

The commission adopted four principles: first, that women be free to decide whether to work inside or outside the home; second, that the care of the children be a joint responsibility of parents and society; third, that women need special treatment because of pregnancy and childbirth; fourth, women will need special treatment to overcome discriminatory practices.

I have tried to identify what I think are eight or ten of the more important of a very long series of recommendations. Hon. members will recognize that these are choices that I have made. Other participants in the debate will obviously have another list that commends itself to them. The first surely must be the recommendation about the day care centres and a national day care act. I suggested that the government might spearhead this with a pilot program for children of people working in the public service. There are amendments to the National Housing Act which could permit loans for the construction and renovation of buildings for use as centres. I am sure this is part of the consideration in which the department is even now engaged.

As those who have read the Commission's report will know, there is a dissenting opinion by Professor John Humphreys. He rejected the proposal to spend half a billion dollars on day care on the ground that it would be an intrusion into an area of provincial jurisdiction. More than that, he believed the concept was wrong because it would establish day care centres as part of a welfare scheme. With great respect, I do not accept this dissent. I believe the urgent need for day care has commended itself to people who work in this field; perhaps it has not yet commended itself to all parliamentarians, but it certainly has done so to those who are concerned with on-going social needs.

The second on my list is the issue of abortion. The Commission speaks of this issue very clearly. Obviously, an issue which affects each of us in such a fundamental way should be made the subject of a free vote in parliament. Surely, a change in the law cannot be too much longer delayed. It seems to me that the law governing abortion must match with other social legislation so as to provide a comprehensive approach to the whole issue. Many women find motherhood a happy prospect but must resort to abortion because they cannot extricate themselves from difficult living or working conditions. Until there are sufficient opportunities for women to maintain an acceptable standard of living through easy access to day care centres and fair labour regulations, simply liberalizing the abortion law will not solve anything.

There has been a statistical battle, a battle of figures, going on all this winter between the extremists on this issue, those who want abortion on demand and those who feel, very sincerely and genuinely in my opinion, that there should be no alteration in the law. I beseech the government that when this issue is considered by us, Members of Parliament should be allowed to vote as individual members according to their consciences.

I have already used a great deal of the time allotted to me, but there are five or six other issues which remain. The report suggested the government study the idea of permitting the spouse at home to contribute as a self-employed worker to the Canada and Quebec pension plans. There are other recommendations affecting family allowances and taxation. The difficulty here is that the recommendations run counter to the approach taken by the government in the white paper on income security. The idea of a taxable bonus in respect of every child under 16 has met opposition from those who believe that the world population explosion should be discouraged, not encouraged. The recommendation did not place a limit on the number of children in respect of which a mother could receive $500.

The recommendations go on. For instance, the minimum age for marriage should be 18; the Divorce Act should be amended so that the three-year separation period now provided would be reduced to one year. Then, there is a very helpful section on the whole question of a guaranteed annual income, whether by way of negative income tax or by a rationalization of payments. As I have mentioned, there is a recommendation in relation to public office; it is recommended that a certain number of seats in the Senate be reserved for women. Personally, I do not accept this recommendation believing it to be an extension of the very discrimination which the report seeks to avoid. Then there is the point which was well-made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin); it has been made by others engaged in the practice of the law, namely, that prostitution should be regarded as a social, not as a criminal problem. That part of the Criminal Code which deals with vagrancy, section 64(1) (c), is discriminatory because it singles out women and restricts the right of women to move about in freedom. Surely, at this stage in man's evolution the section to which I have referred should be changed.

The report contains some plans for action. It speaks of establishing implementation committees at federal, provincial and municipal levels composed of senior administrators and so on. It suggests the establishment of a human rights commission at federal, provincial and territorial government levels. It looks to the establishment of a permanent Status of Women Council, national in scope. I agree with the point made by the hon. member for Greenwood: there should be one minister responsible for the on-going aspects of this report. The government cannot allow this report to lie fallow.

As stated by the Canadian Federation of University Women, the issues which arise are not beyond the area of interest or concern of any Member of Parliament. The concerns we discuss today are real concerns felt by real people. If I have a minute left for philosophy, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help noticing the aptness of a quotation by Tom Wicker in the New York Times who reminded us of an occasion when Robert Penn Warren spoke wittily of the forgetfulness, among politicians, of real issues. He was commenting on American poetry. Marianne Moore had said her kind of poetry deals with real toads in imaginary gardens. The kind of poetry in Congress, and it would not be stretching it too much to include this parliament, might often seem very similar to hers. It deals with real solutions to imaginary problems. Occasionally, it deals with imaginary solutions to real problems. Sometimes, however, and this is where genius begins to be inflamed, it deals with imaginary solutions to imaginary problems of imaginary people. If that kind of poeticizing could not touch us where we live, Robert Penn Warren asks us, then what can? The answer is easy: any kind that is real, for the disease of our time is the sense of being cut off from reality. Man feels that a screen has descended between him and nature, between him and other men, between him and himself.

What I have been trying to do is to discuss this issue first from a little bit of a philosophical view followed by an appraisal of the Commission's report, some statistics to give the necessary thrust, and then an identification of the more important recommendations. As I have suggested, the government ought to designate a minister to be responsible for the co-ordination and implementation of the recommendations. The partnership of which I spoke at the beginning of my speech, the new partnership between women and men rather than a struggle of women against men, prompts us to recognize that women want to be treated as people, as full human beings. There must be a new regard for women's traditional occupations, within and outside the home. Otherwise there is a very real danger that we shall lose what is most precious in human life, the ability to give devoted and cherishing care to other human beings, just at a time in human history when it is most imperative that we learn how to expand our capacity for caring and translate it into ways of protecting the earth itself.

• (4:00 p.m.)

We have been told how to begin, Mr. Speaker; let us then begin.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, first may I thank the mover of this motion which allows us to state our views on the status of women in Canada.

Many comments have been made already on the report of the Royal Commission, but those of the people's representatives are obviously very important since the Canadian electorate has give us legislative power.

When we speak of the status of women in Canada, we must go back to what precisely started this talk. For centuries, our eastern mentality has been conditioned to a factual situation. Woman is not the equal of man. The analysis of what brought our world to this line of thought would take too long. I will therefore limit myself to an acknowledgement of this situation.

For many generations, outstanding evidence has been offered that there were no reasons for considering one half, at least, of humanity as inferior to the other. Little by little, a few scraps of rights and privileges were granted, which no doubt improved the situation.

An individual capable only of preparing meals and looking after children was made a more responsible being by the granting, for instance, of the right to vote. Then this was discussed more and more widely, until some degree of civic and legal equality was achieved.

In other words, the total emancipation of women is accepted, but with some reservations. All too often, this emancipation remains theoretical. In practice, people continue to act as though women were at an inferior level.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this situation is deplorable and that it even proves disastrous. The result is obvious, in the form of a society headed almost exclusively by men. I realize that a whole mentality and deeply rooted habits may have to be changed in order to achieve complete equality. Perhaps women themselves are not enough aware of every opportunity available to them.

However, I feel we should do a lot more to speed up the process of emancipation and progress of Canadian women. On the basis that there is to be no difference between man and woman apart from the physiological point of view, one is entitled to wonder why practically all management and legislative activities are carried out exclusively by men.

Obviously, if the true principle of democracy were to be integrally applied in this House, half of our representatives would have to be women since the population of any country is divided somewhat equally into males and females. Fortunately, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) is here to save a small fragment of democracy.

This situation would be corrected by effecting a new distribution of the Commons seats. Canada could have some 150 constituencies represented by both a male and a female member. Then the absolute equality we are seeking would thus be achieved at the parliamentary level.

Some people will laugh at this suggestion but when we see so many men apparently lost in a maze of thoughts which are more or less constructive, I wonder the practical way of thinking and action which characterizes women could not bring a little more efficiency to the business of this House.

Their practical common sense, their taste for what is concrete, and even their intuition would offset the lucubrations of some hon. members. Women in this country have been proving for generations that they know how to manage a house and are quite able to do so. Most of our homes, at least in Quebec, have been managed by women. They have been entrusted almost exclusively with the education of children at home, and they have done a marvellous job.

And what about the tremendous success obtained by all the institutions run by nuns? Mr. Speaker, I say it again, there is a lack of women in our government services. They have neither soul nor heart. How I understand why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has at last decided to fill the void in his life! May his charming wife, by sharing somewhat his authority, make more flexible he who was turning into the greatest dictator of all Canadian Prime Ministers.

To come back to the precise wording of the motion, I would like to point out the uselessness of the recommendation for——the inclusion of housewives in the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans—

—and I explain myself, Mr. Speaker.

All women who contribute to pension plans will be entitled to benefits. Therefore there is no problem in that area. The problem is not there, but rather in the fact that the housewife, in the home, is not considered a worker in the same capacity as any other employee. She works unceasingly to achieve a grand objective, that of preparing our youngsters to take their responsibilities tomorrow, or to support the actions of responsible adults. In short, the woman in the home is a professional and at the same time a manual worker. Yet, she is not paid for it. That is unfair, Mr. Speaker. And so, the problem would be solved by granting adequate compensation to the woman in the home. She could be included in pension plans and receive the benefits provided for at the proper time.

The maternity benefits mentioned in the motion under consideration deserve my whole support. It is loathsome to see unemployment insurance investigators discourage mothers-to-be by telling them that they are not entitled to benefits owing to their condition. This is degrading the most beautiful function of mankind, which has enabled all of us to be here and is responsible for our existence. This deficiency should have long been corrected.

As for the establishment of a family planning program, I am reluctant when I think about the real intentions of our good friends from the N.D.P.; as for their planning, ranging from all kinds of contraception means up to abortion, I cannot accept it.

In a country as rich as ours which has to deal with overproduction problems, in a vast country where communication problems arise, a country in which, among other things, the birthrate has decreased to a point which I find alarming—especially in Quebec where the average has suddenly declined from 5.4 to barely 1.8 per family, such conditions are, in my opinion, disastrous.

At this rate, the francophone element of our country shall disappear more or less rapidly. That is no doubt one of the reasons why certain people want desperately to establish a boundary around Quebec.

As for the other recommendations of the motion, I think that these deserve full consideration from the House. Equality of treatment in the public service is intimately tied to the basic principle: equal work, equal salary. No discrimination should be tolerated in this respect.

Calling a federal-provincial conference for considering implementation of the Commission's recommendations which pertain to provincial jurisdiction, or which are under joint jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and of the provincial legislatures, is essential. Quebec has particular rights that it wants to keep in their integrity, and unilateral decision making in this field would be most unwelcome.

Mr. Speaker, in short, the importance of the question raised in this debate is self-evident. I hope that all Canadian women will realize that the time has come for them to assume their responsibilities and to stop letting the men alone work out their liberation. We of the Ralliement créditiste are ready to let women invade our ranks. In saying this, I am in no way referring to Gilberte Côté-Mercier and her group, nor even to the wife of a certain Pierre Mercier of Vancouver.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I believe the New Democratic Party does us and Canada today a service in bringing out for public debate the matter of the status of women in this country. The government welcomes the debate. We hope it swells and continues across the land. I say that for the sake of Canadian women and for the sake of the general goals in respect of social equity in Canada, and not specifically for the sake of the New Democratic Party. I might add that the party that thinks of itself as both the conscience and the foretaster of Canadian politics does well to act as our polestar today, pioneering for women with all the vision of Lester B. Pearson and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Perhaps my hon. friends opposite will forgive me if I should appear to be a little partisan, which is not my natural style. However, I must say that my moral indignation at the mediaeval laxity of this government regarding women is a little hard to raise when the N.D.P. attacks us just six days after the Prime Minister, in a major statement of policy, made this promise:

> I pledge the full support of the Liberal government to the removal of discrimination and the provision of opportunity to women in all fields of Canadian life.

That may be a case of unfortunate timing for the NDP, but it is a solemn promise by a government that does not make many promises. It is a promise of quick government action on all the recommendations, that are considered feasible and within federal purview, of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. As hon. members know that report was tabled in December and, as I shall detail later, we have already begun to implement as far-reaching process for action. The royal commission in 1967 was asked to recommend what steps might be taken by the federal government to ensure for women equal opportunities with men in all aspects of Canadian society. That Commission was instructed by the government of Mr. Pearson. After two and a half years, it has reported in lengthy detail and raises complicated and interlocking questions of policy.

I do not think it is any secret that this government maintains, and constantly updates, a listing of our chief priorities which we try to follow fairly closely. I think it is true that all Canadian governments have felt, rather uneasily, that perhaps they might have provided more leadership and reform in the provision of opportunity to women. We have in this House done much which affects women, not the least of which has been in respect of divorce and abortion laws. So, we may have been better than most. I must say, however, that while I shall not state precisely where women were on our priority list before, they have recently ascended it as fast and as far as any ski tow goes up Whistler Mountain.

There are many specific things this government has done and will do. They are important and will have a far-reaching effect not only for women but for the improvement of Canadian life in general. I wonder, though, if they provide all or even very much of the answer to the question of the inclusion of women as full and equal partners in Canadian society. That is the real issue, even more than the specifics of pension provisions, minimum wages or special hiring practices.

A prime issue for society in the contemporary world is the inclusion of women in the society of modern Canada, or the inclusion of the young, or the poor, or the old, in fact the inclusion of all those who have not been quite brought in, all those who do suffer discrimination. Our own Parliament, in terms of social background, is not fully representative of the people of Canada. Certainly by denying women, and all the other groups, we deny our society. The Public Service, the public bureaucracy at all levels of government, does not represent well the Canadian mosaic—nor do trade unions, major private enterprises and other institutions. So, I guess no one group in society can point a finger at the other. Certainly, we, as governments, must remove the legal and employment barriers to those who are excluded as the first step.

There is also the question of how a society looks at itself, and how that can be altered. What about the attitudes of all the institutions of our society such as the family, the neighbourhood, the trade union, the firm and public enterprise? How do they mould and motivate individuals? How and why do they exclude large segments of our population from their activities? More importantly, how and when will they take positive steps for inclusion, not exclusion? I think it is certain, as the Prime Minister said last week, that we do know that immense numbers of talented persons have not had a chance to compete and contribute in the fields of their choice, whatever bent their talents might have disclosed. But why are they not in the mainstream? In my opinion, the answer rests in the degree of commitment by which a society and its individual members and groups pursue objectives of equity and social justice. In other words, the buck quite properly passes back to Canadians individually, singly and in groups.

I am increasingly aware of the truth that national objectives of equity and social justice remain words until people support policies and measures that are designed to increase equity. As an example, I cite measures such as tax reform where a little generosity of spirit would be welcome. In my own field of responsibility, housing, we have sought, to the best of our ability, to shift our objectives to the provision of housing for low-income people. Is that popular? One would like to think so, but I continually have to resist pressures across the country to shift our direct emphasis back to providing housing for the middle-class or to place low-income housing projects somewhere else, in some other neighbourhood.

So, what I am saying is that governments can lead, and this government has done so, but until we Canadians stop our rhetoric and participate through our own pocketbooks and through changing our own built in attitudes, progress will be slow. Until we do that, the exclusion of and discrimination against many groups from participating in our society will continue. But I believe that a climate for such change is developing in Canada. However, this process is slow and painful. The government will help the process along with regard to women. I would say in passing that all members will appreciate the fact that when you are in the business of encouraging a major social upheaval—and that is what any real inclusion of women will be, an upheaval that will change institutions from the family through to the Public Service Commission—life can, and probably will, get quite complicated.

Policy solutions are not as immediately obvious as one might think. Take for instance the subject given considerable and justified attention in the debate so far, the question of day care centres. It is increasingly obvious to most of us I think that day care centres add immensely to the quality of life, both for children and for parents. They are more than parking places for kids, or certainly should be more than that. The best means of providing children with superior care must be found, ways that involve parents in the operations of the centres. Right now, through the Canada Assistance Plan, this government shares the operating costs of day care centres with provinces which regulate and administer the centres. But we recognize that some drawbacks in the legislation and the programs are becoming evident. For instance, the initial capital required is difficult for many groups to raise. The wellbeing of Canadian children is certainly a national responsibility, and we are exploring ways to improve the legislation.

The recommendations of this royal commission directly affect the programs of 25 federal departments. Actions on the recommendations can easily be counter-productive, tending perhaps to cancel each other out if they are not very carefully co-ordinated. This government wants action, as the priority pledge of the Prime Minister indicates, but it does not want a mish-mash. So, there has been established a central co-ordinating function within the Privy Council office. I might go so far as to say that if our friends in the opposition will help us get through the government reorganization bill, it might even happen that the minister chosen to handle this subject will be appointed. In the meantime, an interdepartmental committee is being established to examine all the recommendations and to draft policy suggestions for the cabinet.

Status of Women Study

I might add here that in seeking the best brains available for the committee and its working parties, the chief co-ordinator herself is seeking, wherever possible, women of competence who may not, as yet, have quite pushed to the front of the public service. This is part of an emphasis directed toward women that this government will continue. A decision to seek out wherever possible women for Order in Council appointment is another instance of this emphasis.

The interdepartmental committee to which I referred will submit to cabinet immediately, as they become available, the policy alternatives that it supports from five working parties. The working parties cover the following areas: First, the economic participation of women, what the federal government can do regarding women as investors, homeowners, producers of goods and services as well as employees. The second area covers women in political and judicial life. I might say here that the government is already planning to attract more women into citizenship programs, into the administration of corrective institutions and other areas recommended in the report we are discussing. The third area is a workshop dealing with education and training of women. This will include such issues as formal professional education for women, occupational education, and continuing education.

The fourth area is family and community services. Here, policy recommendations and guidelines will be in the areas of abortion, family planning, day care centres and other matters. The fifth working party will be particularly attending to the problems of disadvantaged women, in which we include the aged, the disabled, the poor, women who are the sole support of their family, women of minority groups, immigrants and geographically isolated people.

The cabinet expects to have policy recommendations before it well within this year. We have already seen considerable progress. The Canada Labour (Standards) Code, to which amendments were presented to Parliament today, will be of special interest to women. Amendments to the Fair Employment Practices Act are under consideration. The white paper on unemployment insurance proposes broadened coverage and the provision of benefits for interruption in employment owing to sickness and maternity. We plan legislation removing discrimination against women with regard to citizenship.

The report recommends the establishment of information and referral services at the local level, which is certainly in harmony with some of the aims of Information Canada; in fact, some pilot projects are under way now.

In my own area of housing, there will be a change made in the national housing loan regulations in line with the first recommendation of the report. It will remove the discrimination inherent in any federal regulations against women as creditworthy mortgage borrowers. Last spring we made provision for an allowance for one parent families in the calculation of income to which the rent scale for public housing is applied. Similarly, the previous allowance for working spouses was increased substantially.

I also announced that space for social and recreational facilities, which can and I hope will continue to include day care centres, will be eligible for federal assistance when provided in housing for low income people. Furthermore, I have asked the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to look into the report's further proposal that CMHC make loans for the construction, purchase and renovation of buildings for day care centres. This, I might say, is not an issue for CMHC or myself alone to decide, but would have to be one possible aspect of a wider federal policy for which I must admit having a bias.

At various levels of government, not only federal, we can and should remove discrimination and constraints. I suppose that many will argue that we should stop there and thereafter let women as well as men make their own way. But this government has a feeling there is some catching up to do. There may be a need for some special incentives.

To address myself specifically to one other recommendation here may I say that we are not biased against the idea of a federal-provincial conference. If our informal discussions which will be taking place support this idea, it is very likely that we will proceed.

The debate is useful, and I will summarize by saying that our bent as a government is, in areas open to us, to encourage and to seek out women of competence, to provide special support where that is feasible and practicable, and to encourage other levels of our society to do the same. I hope and expect we will give leadership. More important, I think that as individuals and as groups Canadians have to address themselves to this question of the elimination of discrimination wherever it appears.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in this important debate I must first congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) for bringing this matter before the House this afternoon, and on doing it in such a substantial way by the motion he has presented to the House. It is quite likely true in this discussion, as in many others, that the events and realities of the situation may greatly outdistance both the type of discussion we have here and the issues which are of principal concern. However, even if we are dealing with this subject somewhat late in the day, in comparison with the concerns and interest expressed in this far-reaching question of the status of women, better late than never must surely be the axiom and this must justify the argument that we should be spending the time of the House on this particular issue.

In fact I feel that, in dealing with it in the context of a one day debate, we do nothing more than open a host of questions that need to be raised and looked at very carefully in the hope that we may first discover the exact nature of the problem and, secondly, determine whether there are certain steps that can be taken by Parliament to alleviate the most serious aspects of the problem. The question that confronts us in this debate is a basic one. Are half the members or our society living in an inferior or discriminated position with respect to the other half? Is there in fact a basic question of inequality for women in this country today, or has this whole concern for women's rights and women's liberations simply been generated as another in the endless series of fads that seem to be the product of our culture, and are perhaps the result of the tremendous flowering of the devices of mass communication in our time?

Is it not true, as an earlier poet was moved to comment, that "the hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world"? It is a pleasant phrase, a phrase that I am sure all hon. members have heard. I would assume that in an earlier day it was a convincing one. In spite of the fact that men occupied the prominent positions in society, became heads of state and for the most part, produced works of art, the person who stayed by the hearth, who cared for the young, who provided a home for her happy warrior when he returned from another victory, provided evidence of the essential truth in this statement that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world.

Well, of course in this age of enlightenment we are finding that that was one of the clever put-downs of an earlier time, one that may still be used by some people who would like to believe that in our modern society women enjoy all the opportunities, all the access and status that seem inherently the right of their fellow citizens of the world, men. But of course we know it is not true. We know it is nonsense. In fact, we are not so many years removed from a time in which some of the discrimination was so obvious and blatant as to be impossible to believe. Here, I refer to the time of good Queen Victoria when the ladies were concerned about such basic things as having the right to vote and about being recognized as human beings. It was a time when Queen Victoria was moved to comment:

> The Queen is most anxious to enlist everyone who can speak or write to join in checking this mad, wicked folly of "Woman's Rights" with all its attendant horrors... It is a subject which makes the Queen so furious that she cannot contain herself. God created men and women different—then let them remain each in their own position.

One would have liked the opportunity, having heard the Queen declare herself in that fashion, to ask her whether or not there should be a limit put on such things as the right of succession. However, I gather one did not ask those kinds of questions of Queen Victoria. We know, however, there were those who tried to respond to the problems of women's inequalities in the early part of this century, such as the well known Mrs. Pankhurst who, trying to make her point crystal clear, at one stage said:

> Trust in God: She will provide.

Mr. Anderson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes.

Mr. Anderson: I am just wondering whether the hon. member is implying that Queen Victoria did not have enough power and should have had more. I thought Queen Victoria was a lady of considerable ability, and if anyone would have made it perfectly obvious that women should be treated equally it would be her. I hope the hon. member's suggestion is not that the most powerful woman in history should have been given more power, remembering that her husband played a very subservient role in comparison with her status.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I do not know when the hon. member tuned into my speech, but the point I was trying to make was that Queen Victoria was a person who obviously was a prisoner of her own time. reflecting a view commonly held by a great number of women at that time concerning the woman's role in society. At the same time, however, she supported a double standard because she was willing to acknowledge for herself a great number of powers but was in no way willing to see such powers exercised by her colleagues in her day and age. I cited this as an illustration of the fact that while it may seem a long time since the reign of Queen Victoria, in the history of the world it is but a short time. When we hear a statement like that now we think we are living in a completely different age, and that there is absolute equality and acceptance for women. We could well ask the question, as I ask it rhetorically this afternoon, are women accepted as equals in our society, or should we be concerned about the increasing number of demonstrations and discussions centring on the role and status of women in society? I answer that we must be concerned, and concerned for a number of reasons.

Time will not permit me to deal with all of the reasons this afternoon, but we should recognize the fact that in our civilization today we have a most unique situation in which we have in our midst an oppressed not minority but majority. Unlike many minorities who suffer because of racial, religious or ethnic considerations, women in our society, who are not even a minority but perhaps a majority, are oppressed. Women in our day are oppressed in a new and much more sophisticated fashion and that is why I find the speeches made this afternoon, and the motion proposed by the hon. member, unsatisfactory to a degree. Essentially, I am not criticizing the motion for going too far, but rather I feel the motion does not go far enough. I must immediately hasten to add that I would have great difficulty in drafting an effective motion to try and deal with what is a very pervasive and thorough going form of discrimination towards women which exists in our society.

It is all too easy to recall times when, because of technology and the nature of society, a woman was very obviously in a discriminated position. She was treated almost as a beast of burden; she stayed at the hearth and carried out all of the chores. As one person has said before, and as has been repeated many times since, a woman's work is from sun to sun. She did all the manual tasks necessary to maintain that family unit. She suffered drudgery to such an extent that today, when you walk through an old cemetery, you can see recorded on the tombstones the premature deaths of a host of the women of this country.

An hon. Member: Men, too.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): We know as well that there was a particular horror associated with giving birth. In a sense, a life of desperation was lived by the women in earlier times in relationship to their fellows in society. We rejoice in the fact that women have been released from the drudgery of the kitchen and the home, that they have been spared much of the horrible pain and possible death by childbirth. We rejoice that it is now possible to think of the woman's role in the home as one that at least does not involve being treated as some kind of willing slave.

In moving from that difficult time into an era of great technology, I suggest that we are now permitting, and indeed encouraging, a new kind of exploitation of woman. I think it has been referred to as "sexploitation", in which woman herself is being treated in many cases as a consumer product, as an item to be selected from the shelf, to be packaged, labelled and presented for easy consumption. We have been treated to a host of beauty contests and activities which primarily promote the biological aspects of woman. In its most extreme form, we have been treated to the concept of woman as a plaything, as a bunny for the playboys of the world.

The tragedy of this new form of discrimination is that in establishing standards for women in our society, the standards are such that they are measured not in terms of individual integrity or identity but in terms of proportions, measurements, bustlines, what have you. The tragedy is that while men to some slight degree might be forgiven for making these measurements and standards, certain women all too readily acquiesce and give credence to the thought that everything depends on how a woman can present herself. It is too bad that some women are willing to measure themselves by these standards of sexploitation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that by allowing this to happen in society we have indeed subverted and destroyed not only the possible role and fulfilment of woman in society, but we have downgraded to an effective degree the possible relationship that might exist between man and woman. The perfect female citizen of this country, if we are to listen to the commercials, spends the morning at the mirror, the afternoon in a bubble bath, and the evening discussing breath mints or candy mints at some amusement park. The parallel to this is that, of course, man is always at the job or driving or flying to it. It is small wonder that the more extreme women's liberation groups seethe with a pathological hatred aimed at the various males who have concocted these two public images of male and female.

In discussing what I think is a basic problem in our society today, obviously I am dealing with a problem that cannot easily be changed through legislation. I think it would be a challenge far surpassing the abilities of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) or perhaps the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) who has responsibility for culture, to prescribe new kinds of regulations by which we could move away from the kind of willy-nilly consumer approach that has been adopted toward women in our society. How one changes basic attitudes is certainly a question that cannot easily be answered in the course of this debate or by the legislative response in this chamber. There are situations that have been referred to today which indicate there is discrimination which could be resolved by law.

I was extremely disappointed to note that, according to the report on the status of women, my native province of Prince Edward Island was still making a real difference between men and women in the minimum wage laws. We know that in government service and private employment there is far too much sex typing, which in many cases prevents capable women from seeking positions. The situation pertaining to manpower retraining in Prince Edward Island causes me some concern. I think we must be more aware of the difficulties faced by women if these retraining schemes are to be of use to them.

In concluding these brief remarks, in what I hope is the opening debate in an ongoing series of considerations to be given to this question, I should like to come back to what I think is essential to our concern and that is, the role to be played by woman in our society. The problems in this area, while they may be met to a degree by legislative or bureaucratic decisions, are basic problems. I think they can only be dealt with in terms of the essence of the main problem. A moment ago I mentioned the basic problem of attitude, but I think that in terms of the status of woman there is the basic problem of identity. I was struck by a quotation from "The Feminine Mystique" by Betty Friedan, which reads:

> The core of the problem for women today is not sexual but a problem of identity—a stunting or evasion of growth that is perpetuated by the feminine mystique. As the Victorian culture did not permit women to accept or gratify their basic sexual needs, our culture does not permit women to accept or gratify their basic needs to grow and fulfil their potentialities as human beings.

I think that is the problem, Mr. Speaker. Even if we were to implement at once all the recommendations contained in this report, I would be willing to argue that a large proportion of the women in our society would still be imprisoned within their own attitudes in so far as development of their potential was concerned. We would still be faced with the problem of finding the answer to a more effective and realistic family unit in modern day society. As the member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) said, we still would not have dealt with the question of finding a more productive and positive outline for a relationship between man and woman in our society. I believe that the new-found freedom and potential for woman in our time is not only important for woman herself but for the man she will marry and with whom society will be shared.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have been named as the seconder of the motion presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), and I am happy to take part in what I am sure those of us who are here will agree is a very important debate. One could wish that such importance were recognized by more of our colleagues in all parts of the House. But all good causes have to be pushed.

May I say respectfully to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) responsible for housing, who spoke awhile ago, that despite the short reference of a partisan nature in which he indulged, we appreciate his acceptance of this motion and of this debate as an attempt on the part of the New Democratic Party to get the discussion rolling on this important subject. We welcome his being able to stand in his place and announce a number of things that the government is doing. I do not think they all began with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) speech of last Wednesday night. However, it has been our experience in this place that even though the government announces good intentions, it takes an awful lot of prodding to get action on those intentions. I think it is fair to say that hon. members on both sides of the House this afternoon and this evening will be doing that, prodding the government into acting on the proposals contained in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and into acting on the suggestions being made by members on the floor of the House.

Sir, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), my colleague, has already said, it is our desire, in this part of the House, to concentrate in each of our speeches on certain specific aspects of the over-all problem. Hon. members will not be surprised if I say that the areas I shall talk about will relate to such things as pensions and insurance programs and employment in the public service. I should like to indicate some of the things that we think ought to be dealt with in these two main areas.

The more I study the report of the royal commission, and the more I think about the problem, the more I am impressed with the magnanimity of the task. You can hardly turn a page of most of our statutes without finding some differentiation between men and women. This is particularly true of the areas about which I am especially concerned, pensions and insurance, employment and so on.

Mr. Alkenbrack: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, did the hon. member not mean to say "magnitude" instead of "magnanimity" when he referred to the task?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I said that, I welcome the correction. I suppose my hon. friend feels that we are now even, since the other day I pointed out that although he meant George III, he said George IV.

Mr. Fairweather: The kings and queens of England are being shuffled around this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I accept the correction, and thank my hon. friend for it.

I have said that I am impressed by the tremendous number of changes that we shall have to make; but that, I submit, is no reason for our not getting on with the job. Let me name some of the pieces of federal legislation, and allude to some provincial laws as well, which I think we shall have to act on soon. In the first place, I want to speak about a few federal statutes that have general application, in the sense that they apply to the entire population. The second group I shall speak about will be statutes that refer to employment in the public service.

It really is amazing that in statutes like the Canada Pension Plan and its partner in Quebec, the Quebec Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Fair Employment Practices Act, the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and in the workmen's compensation legislation in the provinces and in similar, federal legislation covering the Northwest Territories, and so on, there runs this thread of differentiation between men and women. It turns up in two ways. On the one hand, there are frequent occasions where a benefit is provided to a widow, or the wife, or the survivor of a male, but the corresponding benefit is not provided to the widower, or the husband, or the survivor of a female. You know, we cannot go on talking about equal rights if we keep things that way. In the Canada Pension Plan, for example, I think it should be provided that the survivors of a female contributor are to be treated the same as the survivors of a male contributor.

In addition to those kinds of changes that ought to be made, we should consider this: the more one looks at these various pension and insurance programs, the more it becomes evident that, in the main, a woman's right to security in time of illness, or disability, or unemployment or old age comes to her because she is the wife of a husband or the survivor of a male. In the main, these rights do not come to her because she is a person, in the sense that a man is a person. I think that we must get down to brass tacks and correct this situation. Maybe it was nice in the time of Queen Victoria to keep women in what she thought was their place. Actually, the changes that have taken place in society that have been dealt with in the philosophical portions of speeches made thus far have changed the picture. I do not think that relations between men and women can continue to be satisfactory if this situation continues as it is, namely, that a woman will get pension or insurance benefits only because she has been married to a certain person, or because her husband had a certain number of years of employment or because that husband was hurt or took ill or died. To my way of thinking, that is now wrong. Perhaps it was always wrong; but it certainly is wrong today.

I think that we must begin building into these various pension and insurance programs the kinds of provisions that will treat both sexes exactly the same way. Where this may become particularly difficult is in legislation like the Canada Pension Plan. That legislation, as we know, is a wage related plan. It is part of a two deck scheme, under which people can have their basic old age security pension and another pension on top of that which is related to the income they have earned while working. When it is suggested that a married woman who stays at home and raises the family ought to be able to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, those who understand the workings of that plan say that that will upset its rationale, its philosophy and its whole basis as a wage related operation. I recognize that and I am inclined to agree. It may be that something other than just the right of women to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, although they are staying at home and raising the family, must be found. I believe, when a woman has spent 20 or 30 years or more in the home and contributed in that way to the raising of the family, to family life and to the part that the family plays in society, that when it is time for her to get a pension, it should come to her as of right, on the basis of the contribution that she has made, not just through her attachment to a husband.

Perhaps the answer to this is a guaranteed annual income. Maybe the answer, as some people suggest, is wages for homemaking so that there will be something to relate to the Canada Pension Plan. Whatever the method or device that is found, I strongly submit that we have to revise our thinking about the Canada Pension Plan so that when a woman is of pensionable age, she not only receives the old age security pension at age 65—indeed that age should be a lot lower—but she receives a pension because she is a person who has contributed to society. The pension should not just be based on the fact that she was the wife of Mr. "X". I could go on with these various facts of general application such as unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation. These various acts have different kinds of provisions for men as compared with women. There is no doubt about the magnitude of the task, if I may use the word I wanted to use the first time, but failure to grapple with it just because it is too large a task is not good enough for Parliament or for the government of Canada.

Legislation was introduced today by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to improve the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. This raises the question of matters such as minimum wages and hours of working. Reference has already been made to the fact that at least three provinces in this country provide for lower minimum wages for women than for men.

In the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and in the Fair Employment Practices Act there are differences between men and women. These pieces of legislation I have been talking about, most of them federal, but one or two provincial, have general application, but shot through and through them is the notion that there is a difference. It is a man's world. Women get into it if they can, but in the main a woman gets what is coming to her because she is related to a man. It is not good enough in a society that says we are all equal as people and entitled to our rights. It is not good enough just to indulge in these philosophical niceties about this whole problem.

Nor is it good enough just to boast, as the minister did earlier, that the government has already started to correct the situation. There are a tremendous number of pieces of legislation that must be overhauled if we are going to implement the idea that women are people and entitled in their own right to protections that we are able to provide under the heading of insurance, pensions and so on.

Having talked about acts of general application, I now wish to say a few words about employment in the public service. I think it is a truism that how the federal government treats its employees sets the pattern for Canada as a whole. The recent report on Sex and the Public Service and the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women have brought out a number of strange situations that apply in the federal public service. One of the most ridiculous is the fact that there is paternity leave, but not maternity leave in the public service. The father can get a day off because his wife is having a child, but there is no leave, certainly no leave with pay, for the mother because she is having one. There are a lot of little odds and ends. If a husband is moved by the federal government, there are moving expenses for the wife and family. The same does not apply in the case of the wife. This does not only apply to the public service, but it applies in general. The motion is that it is the man who is boss and whatever has to be done to suit his convenience or working arrangements, the necessary cost must be met. However, if the woman is moved or if her position is changed, that is different.

A good deal has been said about the level of employment of women in the public service. For the most part it is sex-typed. They occupy certain jobs and we accept this. As pointed out in the report of the commission, surely the time has come for this situation to be improved. No time should be lost in establishing the women's program secretariat recommended by the commission so that active attention can be paid to increasing employment opportunities for women in the public service, not just at levels typed for them, but at types and levels which they are just as capable of fulfilling as men.

Then, there is the question of the federal government pension programs such as the Public Service Superannuation Act, the armed forces superannuation act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and others. The main difference there is that the rate of contribution varies. The rate of contribution is 6.5 per cent for a male and 5 per cent for a female. Some of the women who want us to proclaim equal rights might not be overly excited if we say that their rate should be increased to 6.5 per cent. However, I think something can be done. Perhaps a rate in between those two would fill the bill if we could change a certain premise. The reason for the difference of 5 per cent for females and 6.5 per cent for males is the assumption that most females in the public service are not married. That, of course, is changing. The other assumption is that most of the males in the public service are married, although many of them are not.

If a male public servant leaves a widow when he dies, she receives a pension. When a female public servant dies, even if she is a married woman and leaves a widower, there is no pension for him. This does not jibe with our concepts of equality at the present time. If there is to be a distinction in rates of contribution to the federal government's pension plans, it should not be on the basis of whether a person is a man or a woman. It should be on some other basis. I would not mind it being on the basis of whether there are dependents; wife, husband or other relatives.

I am deliberately not trying to give the final answer or say what the actual terms of a revised plan should be. However, a plan that makes a distinction between people simply because they are men or women is not fair. If there is going to be a distinction, it should be on the basis of something far more significant than that, and I urge that something be done about our various pension plans.

I said my two main areas were the general legislation which applied to everyone and then the legislation and practices affecting the public service. By the way, I did want to mention the public service terms and conditions of employment regulations; there is a tremendous area here for doing away with discrimination. But I want to go on and say a few words about one particular area of the public service, if we may call it that, namely the area of employment on this Hill, in the Senate and in the House of Commons, in the Library of Parliament, and so on. I think the report does well to point out that there is far too much typing of people in jobs on this Hill. One of the interesting things set out in the report is that men cleaners who work for us in this building are employed full-time but women cleaners are employed part-time. The distinction is as simple as that. If you are a man and you get a job as a cleaner in this building, you get it on a full-time year round basis, but not so if you are a woman. I hope that after another election we shall end another unfairness around this place, namely the fact that our 264 seats are held by 263 men and only one woman. This, of course, is not something we can do by legislation. But let us not make fine speeches about it being a good idea to have more women in Parliament when we continue to maintain a fair amount of sex typing among the employees of this institution on Parliament Hill.

I hope I have at least made the point which had impressed me in my study of this matter, namely that the problem is a tremendous one. Two or three amendments here and there will not do the job; amendments will have to be carried out all over the place to establish greater equality between men and women in the areas I have been talking about, pensions and social insurance on the one hand, and employment in the public service on the other, including work here on Parliament Hill.

I have heard others in this debate today say this subject brings up the whole question of social attitudes. Sometimes this is used as an excuse; it is suggested we cannot get these legislative changes until society changes its attitude toward women, until it recognizes they have equal status with men. It is the old story of which comes first, the chicken or the egg, or, to put it in other terms, a new attitude on the part of society toward women or leadership in changing our laws and regulations. I think there is a very real possibility that social attitudes are ahead of us now, and that our job is not to sit back and wait until those attitudes are so far ahead of us that we are forced into action. Instead, we should be providing real leadership. I say again in the spirit of most of the speech made by the minister that we welcome his statement about the things the government is doing. We welcome the acceptance throughout the House of our having brought this subject forward today but I earnestly plead that it be not just one days' debate, which goes on the record and that is that, but that it be the beginning of serious consideration of specific changes which we can and must make without delay.

Mr. Cullen: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired, but if there is unanimous consent he could reply to a question. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cullen: I should like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whether, in all the years he has been in the House, he has ever known students other than male students to be hired as guides in Parliament during the summer recess?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member talks about all the years I have been here, but it is only in recent years that students have been hired as guides. I believe all of them have been male students but I do know that in recent years there have been two or three occasions when students were hired for various other purposes, and that women were included among them. I am happy to say that even though this has been done by the Canadian Political Science Association, which is outside our immediate jurisdiction, there are women among the student interns who are with us during this present session. But the point the hon. member made is well taken. This, too, is an area in which we must improve our own record.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Don Valley, may I deal with the proceedings on the adjournment motion? It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Trade—Development of U.S. markets for Atlantic Provinces products—transportation facilities; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Radio Canada—Action respecting alleged separatists and terrorists on staff; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Pollution—Contamination of west coast of Vancouver Island by oil—responsibility for cleaning up beaches.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—STATUS OF WOMEN IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Brewin):

That in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately designate a minister of the Crown to co-ordinate the implementation of the proposals contained in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women which come under federal jurisdiction, and that it should give special and urgent consideration to the implementation of those recommendations designed to establish a basic equality of rights between men and women, including the recommendation for the inclusion of housewives in the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, the provision of maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the adoption of a National Day Care Act, the initiation of a family planning program and certain amendments to the Criminal Code, and equal treatment in the federal public service; moreover that the government should convene a federal-provincial conference to consider the implementation of the recommendations of the commission which fall within provincial jurisdiction or which are the joint responsibility of the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces.

Mr. Robert Kaplan (Don Valley): Like other speakers, I welcome this opportunity to discuss a subject which was, I suppose, most recently brought to public attention by the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Toronto last week. I wonder why the opposition has failed to attach a vote to this particular resolution, because they could have counted on the support of many members on this side of the House for the motion which has been put forward. They would have obtained my support for almost everything that has been proposed.

I am afraid, though, I cannot agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the Canada Pension Plan should cover women in respect of their role as mothers and housewives. The Plan is one which, as he knows, has an actuarial basis, and his proposal would result in the inclusion of, I suppose, double the number of people presently covered without the housewives and others having any responsibility to make contributions. This would greatly change the nature of the scheme. The hon. member seemed himself to recognize the weakness of his argument when he suggested that sooner or later a guaranteed annual income program might take care of the situation.

Mention has been made of the recommendation that a minister of the Crown should be designated to take particular responsibility for this subject. The Prime Minister referred at Toronto to some of the steps which have already been taken. He said:

> In the short interval since the report was tabled, a number of steps have been taken to ensure informed and co-ordinated federal government action in response to it. Most important of those steps is the government's announced decision to give priority consideration to the recommendations.
> We have already appointed within the Privy Council Office a highly qualified person whose responsibility it is to ensure informed and co-ordinated government action with respect to the report. An interdepartmental committee will examine those recommendations directed to the federal government. It is under instructions to complete its work as quickly as possible and to submit reports periodically to Cabinet.

The report calls for the appointment of a minister to deal with this issue. The Prime Minister, in his speech, said that a bureaucrat from the Privy Council Office had already been appointed to co-ordinate the program. Frankly, I prefer the approach suggested in the motion. I think that if we are going to focus attention on this priority and give it the kind of urgent action that is required, it is well for the public to have a minister looking after the matter rather than, as I say, some bureaucrat sitting in an office in Ottawa who is responsible for co-ordination. If we believe that politicians should assume the responsibility for policy decisions and policy implementation, it follows that there should be a minister at whom we can take shots if necessary when action is taken not in the way we think it should.

In this connection, the minister who spoke this afternoon hinted, in what perhaps was the major achievement of the debate, that there may well be a minister appointed one day soon to deal with this area of responsibility. I would very much welcome that development because it is one of the most worth-while features of the motion we are debating today.

I should like also to deal with the question of attitude. There has been a lot of discussion today about attitude toward equal rights for women as contrasted with the law and legal changes. We have been talking about changing attitudes and changing the law, and perhaps I could introduce this subject by taking a quotation from Doris Lessing, who said:

> We have been given ample warning that the next ten or fifteen years will decide whether the human race can survive. Our survival is threatened by almost certain war, by famine, by contamination, by climatic change due to pollution. Perhaps the sex war could be postponed until more urgent issues are settled?

That kind of statement leads me to respond that I think there is a relationship between the priority we give to recognizing the contribution that women can make and the speed with which fundamental problems of our society will be solved. Discrimination of any kind is a luxury, a waste, something that Canadian society in particular cannot afford at this time. It is true that there are tremendous problems facing us. It is true that the world faces tremendous problems. But to relegate the problem of dealing with the inequality of women below other priorities denies to us the very important contribution that women can make to solving such problems. Attitude is a very important part of this question.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) was able to put before us a proud record of contributions made by his female ancestors to the establishment of women's rights in Canada, and I only wish I could respond with a list of contributions made by my own ancestors. However, I cannot do so. Perhaps they are more anonymous than his. But I can put forward in a personal vein, as he did, a story concerning one of my descendants which might make the point. I think that when you are a father and have, as I have, both a son and daughters, you can see in a very real way the way that social attitudes affect your own children.

Occasionally at weekends I work and do my reading and so on, in a very large office building in downtown Toronto. One day I took my daughter with me to help get her out of the house, and so I could spend some time with her. While I was on the telephone, and after I had been working for about two hours, she asked me whether there was a ladies washroom in the building. This is one of the largest office buildings in Toronto and I said: "Of course there is; there are many women working in this building". She replied: "Oh yes, the secretaries". She is a seven year old child who is just reaching the point where she is beginning to think about what kind of future there is for her. This is in marked contrast to my six year old son who sees the world opening up for him and offering opportunities that are virtually limitless. This story illustrates the tremendous disparity between aspirations and expectations which practically cripple many children from childhood.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women deals with this point, and I should like to read this paragraph which indicates the price that we pay for the attitude of discrimination that we have. Paragraph 73 of the report on page 180 reads as follows:

> While they are still in school, girls tend to have low occupational expectations, even when they express interest in more challenging fields. Responses to a recent survey based on a national sample showed, for example, that although only 18 per cent of fourth-year high school girls preferred sales and clerical careers, 32 per cent seemed to assume that they would eventually work in these fields.

In other words, given the attitudes of our society they would not achieve their aspirations.

> According to the results of the survey, the careers boys want are closer to those they expect to have.

I do not think we can afford to perpetuate such a system, and for that reason if for no other, I think Canada has to change. We have to try to find ways of utilizing the goodwill, talent and enthusiasm that is just as much available from our girls and women as it is from our men.

A number of hon. members who have spoken today have contrasted changing the law with changing attitudes. The Prime Minister spoke about this and tended to regard the two as separate problems. The Prime Minister said:

> Attitude has been the contributor of most of the obstacles which now confront women in Canada. But more than a change of attitude is required in order to overcome discrimination and to provide opportunity. Some laws have to be changed to eliminate the anomalies—

Other members have spoken in similar vein. For example, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal said there is a difference between equality in the law—equality of rights, as he put it—and equality of opportunity. He talked about the extent to which we should deal with equality in the law, but he also indicated that dealing with equality of opportunity was an attitudinal problem, one which was much harder to reach. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) went so far as to say that we cannot change attitudes in this House but that at least we can change the law, and he urged that we do. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made his plea in terms of the chicken and egg situation—which comes first, the law or the attitudes? He indicated that we ought to deal with the law because the law was amenable to this Parliament.

On this particular point I should like to observe that the two are not separate problems as might appear. Law and attitudes are closely related. I can testify to that since I am a member of a group which traditionally has been the victim of discrimination and of oppression for one reason or another. I could refer as well to the experience of the blacks in the United States. I think that the experience of my own group and the experience of the blacks in the United States is that if you can and do change the law, change of attitude will follow; that there is a close relationship between the two. We should not sit back waiting for attitudes to change to accommodate changes in law; we should take the initiative. At least we should catch up with prevailing attitudes, and then even move ahead to use the law to change attitudes.

Finally, I should like to deal with one other subject, the question of abortion law reform. This subject is touched on in the motion moved by the opposition and a number of hon. members have spoken about it. With considerable difficulty, I have come to the view that we should permit abortion on request. In coming to that view I must say that I recognize that there is, at least in my view, a certain immorality in abortion, whatever are our standards.

I believe, as well, there is also a moral aspect on the other side of the question. There is a certain immorality in forcing a mother, who for a number of reasons does not want to have a child, to have that child and in forcing a child to be an unwanted child and raised as such. So there are moral questions on both sides. Through all this I have reached the view that abortion ought to be permitted on request. My other reservation about it is that I do not particularly want to see abortion used as a birth-control device, because there are birth-control methods and devices available which can easily be used and which should be accepted. But, as I say, although I have this reservation about abortion I am in favour of its being permitted on request.

I should like to close my participation in this debate by making a suggestion to the opposition in respect of a way in which this issue could be brought forward. In the Speech from the Throne the government indicated there would be a one-day debate on abortion. That is not wholly satisfactory; I doubt if it would resolved any problems or result in any changes. I think the government indicated that because of the length of time such a debate would take it was unwilling to place this matter on the Order Paper; there are other matters which—I agree—deserve higher priority.

I believe, however, that the opposition could take advantage of Standing Order 75B. That Standing Order provides that if a majority of the representatives of the several parties of the House agree on a time allocation, there can be a time allocation in respect of a bill. I should like to challenge the two opposition parties which are not as encrusted by hidebound ideology and stubbornness as the Social Crediters to get together and challenge the Government House Leader to allocate time to settle this question. I have reviewed the rule, and in my judgment if a weekend should intervene, an abortion reform bill could be finally voted on and disposed of in six days of parliamentary time. That would by no means mean there would be a full debate every day; there could be as little as one hour's debate or less on any one of those six days.

Let the opposition not feel they have no recourse in this matter. I would urge them to make a proposal to the government that the question of abortion be brought forward in the form of a bill, that there be a time allocation for putting the bill through the House and that the matter be dealt with on that basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kaplan: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that Standing Order 75B can operate only if a minister of the Crown makes the appropriate request in the House, is the hon. member undertaking that a minister of the government would agree to such a proposition?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking for myself and not for the government. But if such a proposal were made by the opposition parties I would use whatever good offices I have in an effort to persuade the ministers to take the proposal seriously and allocate time for debate. Although I have not canvassed any of my colleagues, I am confident some that would agree to a similar disposition.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. We are touching on some very fundamental and important questions. I have no intention of being caught in the trap of appearing to be against motherhood. However, there are four subjects rolled into one, any one of which might well set a trap for politicians and for any well-meaning or well-thinking person in this country. Whether or not there should be a minister who would look after the affairs of such a ministry is a question which I will leave to the government.

Women's rights are extremely important, but I take exception to the equivocation of those people who try to make this a political football. Women's rights, among all well-meaning men, have had a very important and enshrined place since the beginning of our Judaeo-Christian history, if not since men came down out of the trees. My grandfather was a gentleman and my grandmother did not in any way feel she was a slave. She was one of the happiest women in the world because she thought that upon her fell the onerous job of keeping the family together, teaching us our basic morals and providing a safe and comfortable home.

Grandfather, like so many other pioneers in this country, was out busily buying furs from the Indians, paddling his canoe and hunting for the buffalo, moose and elk which would provide food for the table. In terms of present-day society it might appear that this was a simplified society—but I believe the basic rules still apply. Someone must bring home the bacon, someone must cook the bacon and raise the babies if the human race is to survive. I do not accept responsibility for some of the onerous tasks which have fallen to women thoughout the centuries because the Almighty ordained that the female of the species should have the babies.

An hon. Member: They are different.

Mr. Bigg: They are different, and they are built for it. We are not.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Bigg: In the 20 minutes at my disposal I shall not go into biology other than to say that mothers are provided with an extra layer of fat under their epidermis. This kept them warm through the centuries in the caves while pregnant and while waiting for father to come home. They are not equipped with the type of biceps or other muscles men have which enable them to leap over stumps or hurl a spear. I do not think that leaping over stumps and hurling spears should be done in time of war, but it was very essential in primitive society not too many years ago when this ability was of prime importance.

Women have not changed, particularly in one very basic respect. They look for the good hunter, the good man to bring home the bacon. Before we rush into some sort of an omnibus bill which will guarantee women all the money in the world, all the bacon, I think we should see what we are doing in respect of the male who has full responsibility at present under our laws for supporting not only the child of the marriage, be it his or not, but the wife for so long as she is his legal spouse. It may be that in some of the states of the United States the law is different, but so far as I know, unless the spouse is crippled no such responsibility under our law evolves upon women.

I ask the women's liberation leaders: Do you want our laws changed so that from this time onward women will be responsible equally for the upkeep of the unemployed husband, the inadequate husband, the poorly dressed husband, the lazy husband or the sick husband? That is what equality means. I do not believe you can legislate equality. Certainly it cannot be legislated in respect of marriage. There is only one kind of marriage. Perhaps I should pass this information on to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whose marriage is only a week old. If he or any other man is looking for a 50-50 marriage, that marriage is doomed to utter failure—because there is only one way a marriage between human beings will work, and that is if it is a 90-10 marriage working both ways. Unless the male spends 90 per cent of his time trying to please the little woman, and unless the woman spends 90 per cent of her time trying to please the ornery male, the marriage will fail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: We cannot legislate equality. We can only have a series of pious hopes. Now I shall start with mine. I should like to see most of the laws in a democratic legislature such as ours passed equally, but I agree with the last speaker that housewives generally are not classified as labourers. Their rewards are not in the form of money. They do not receive pensions, in a great many cases. They are dedicated women. They are the backbone of the nation. If you look over our history you will find that women, often unpaid and unrewarded, have in fact given us leadership—at least by their influence—in the highest and most important fields of life.

I hope I will not bore hon. members if I remind them of people such as Nelson's mother kissing the young midshipman goodbye, he standing proudly in his uniform. I have no doubt that respect for his mother, honouring his father and mother, led to his victory in the great battle of Trafalgar. The result could have been predicted. With such men and women, the human race has little to fear. It was no statute of Westminster that made Nelson; but I venture to say that it was the statute handed down by Moses to "honour thy father and thy mother" that contributed to his greatness.

It may well be that if we got back to those basic principles, instead of whining about Women's Lib, we would be better off. I would say that if some women from Women's Lib did their duty and honoured their fathers and their mothers they would receive a great deal more respect from their children. You cannot expect children to give up marijuana if the parents will not give up the afternoon cocktail. You cannot expect morality in school and hard work if your only reason for existence is to have bigger and better abortions so you can spend more time in the beauty parlour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bigg: I told you this is dangerous ground. The Unemployment Insurance Act is a piece of social legislation offering us social justice. Social justice is an attempt to equalize incomes of those who want to work. The Unemployment Insurance Act starts out the right way; it tries to give some security to people who work. What is wrong with the act is that we give insurance to people who do not want to work. We are trying under this omnibus motion to give a reward for being pregnant. The rewards of being pregnant should be self-explanatory: the reward is children. Anybody who has had them or who has had grandchildren knows that this is a reward in itself and that it requires no federal statute.

Day-care centres are a wonderful idea. I believe it would be workable if we lived in communal dwellings. But I see difficulties connected with setting up day-care centres all over Canada, because I believe only in universal legislation. I do not believe that only the city mother who wants to go to work in Woolworth's as a shop girl should have her babies looked after from cradle to school age. What about the Eskimo woman who helps her husband trap seals? She should have her babies cared for while she is out with her husband on ice-floes. She is a Canadian also, and probably a taxpayer.

I believe, also, that by and large it is our job to enact legislation which assists us all. Goodness knows, there are thousands of things we could do if we had the money. Where will the money come from? Are we going to tax the day-care mother? Certainly not. We are going to tax the rich. But who are the rich today? It is not anyone earning $10,000 a year, because if you earn that amount you will get none of these benefits. Your baby bonus will be cut off and you will get nothing free. If you build a decent home in which to support your children, let alone day-care centres for somebody else's children, you will pay up to $1,500 a year and income tax on top of that.

I think that today, faced as we are with many economic illnesses, we should try to find out how we are going to earn take-home pay for the goose that is supposed to lay the golden egg, for the $10,000 a year man who aspires to that level and to the social benefits which we all know he should have. But we find few people who are willing to pay more than they are paying today. As I travel up and down the country—I hesitate to say how many thousands of miles I travel to try to do my job in this House—on every occasion I hear, "If you cannot beat them, join them". What do they mean? They mean that if you cannot afford taxes which a $7,000 to $10,000 a year man has to pay, you had better be unemployed and get everything for nothing. Nobody within the sound of my voice, or nobody who will take the trouble to read what I am saying this afternoon, would disagree that this is the horrible truth. What the people of Canada are looking for today is for us to come up with sound economic answers to what will happen to the middle-class wage earners' take-home pay.

I have an imagination second to none and I could dream up fancy schemes for spending other people's money equal to anybody's in this chamber. But I have to scratch my head to tell you how we can take one more dollar out of the ordinary taxpayer's pocket in Canada without making him face economic ruin. It is no good boasting about our gross national product. I am shocked when I read about our gross national product being doubled while my take-home pay is being divided in two. It does not add up. There are a great many people in the country who are desperate for answers. I venture to say that if we had a strong man in Canada who had answers to these questions, people would flock to him like the children did to the Pied Piper. But they are not being fooled by the kind of Pied Piper music they are being given today. They are sick with worry and they are tired of talking about sex, abortion, day-care centres and unemployment insurance when what we should be talking about is more jobs, more production, more employment and less taxes.

If I do not agree with abortion, I am left with only two choices at present, either to be called a cold-blooded butcher of women or a cold-blooded butcher of helpless children. Is there truth in both? Are they both wrong? Or is there something about the whole thing wherein a man of common sense can find an answer? I am old-fashioned; I am what the younger generation might call a square. I go back to the standards taught me by the same grandmother who thought it was a good thing to have babies and to have grandchildren. She said that human life was sacred and that we should do all we can to protect it. That is a good starting point. That is where I stand and that is where I intend to remain.

I voted in this House against the death penalty. The Criminal Code is nicely vague. I think they are talking about abortion. I may be wrong. Perhaps they are talking about the death penalty. I voted for a change from capital punishment because although I am a policeman by profession I feel strongly about the sacredness of human life, even the sacredness of a condemned criminal, a cold-blooded killer of a policeman. I voted against the amendment to make a policeman's life more sacred than that of anyone else.

I believe in the universality of democracy. I believe that human life is sacred, that it is not expendable. There is only one excuse for taking a human life, and that is if it is for the greater good. That is why I was a soldier; that is why I was a policeman—to try and uphold the right, which is nothing more than maintaining the best possible good for the greatest number. I voted against the retention of the death penalty because people told me, and they cited statistics, that it would take the human race one step further along the road to the Utopia which we are all striving to reach. So going against what was common sense to me, I agreed to give the abolition of the death penalty a chance, to see if humane treatment of cold-blooded killers, killers of children and of bank tellers, killers of people who had worked hard to buy their own property and believed they had a right to keep it, would do the greatest good.

I did this, Mr. Speaker, because I have a profound belief in the decency of human life. Let nobody in this House or this country tell me that if I vote such and such a way on abortion it is because I am a cold-blooded killer either of women or of children. I will vote as I have indicated because I have a profound respect for human life. If anybody can convince me that I have a right to terminate the life of an unborn child for the good of humanity, for the enoblement of the human race, for the greater good and decency of society, then I will vote for it. At one stage I was weakening in my stand. A lot of people were telling me that thousands of young women were risking their lives undergoing non-therapeutic abortions, and the removal of abortions from the Criminal Code was supposed to be the answer. But then, Mr. Speaker, on television I saw a man boasting that he had performed 13,000 abortions. In this age of the pill surely this is an abominable attack on human life and is completely inexcusable. The pill provides an alternative which is something short of cold-blooded murder.

When I see pictures of the human fetus sucking its thumb—psychiatrists tell me that sucking the thumb is the child's subconscious seeking of comfort; he is trying to get the human contact which he does not get in the mother's womb; he is looking for his mother's breast and for the human contact that he soon will have—don't tell me that he is not a human being and that subconsciously he is not going through mental torture and requires comfort. But we say, in our kindness, to avoid a little embarrassment for those concerned, that the mother should be aborted. Mr. Speaker, with every passing year there is less embarrassment over such a situation. The fact that one is answering the call of nature is no excuse for killing the unborn fetus. Pre-natal killing is only excusable if it will have the effect of benefiting society, of being for the greater good of humanity.

Now people say that because of the population explosion we cannot afford these unborn children and that we should terminate their lives as soon as possible. Well, we still have hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat that we are trying to get rid of and could be used for food. We still have immigration laws which welcome people into our country. We still have the baby bonus; it has not been outlawed yet. We still encourage people to raise families—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: I thank the House, Mr. Speaker. This is an important subject and I hope I am not boring the House. The question of abortion is a very important one. I do not think that we who have religious scruples should try to force them on anybody else, but on the other hand those who do not have religious scruples should not expect to force their atheism upon us. If, in the wisdom of the Canadian people, 51 per cent decide to take abortion out of the Criminal Code, that will be our law and we will honour it. But, Mr. Speaker, I feel very strongly on this subject.

I believe that from the moment of conception there is a human soul which is every bit as important as mine. To clinch my argument I say that only when you become a grandfather can you look at this question in its proper context. Time does alter attitudes. Last weekend six of my grandchildren came home. One of them is a little adopted girl. Legally she had no daddy. Her mother abandoned her and my daughter took her in. She is our eldest granddaughter. If you want to see a little cherub, a little walking argument against abortion, come home with me some weekend and we will make up a little party of seven.

Which of those grandchildren did I have a right to destroy? If my daughters did not want them, they would not have ordered them. This little six-year old, the eldest, the sweetest of them all, is the product of an unhappy adventure. But there is a much happier ending to the story. She came into contact with love—ordinary, motherly love, unpaid, unpromised, unrewarded with unemployment insurance, unrewarded by old age pension or other such benefits. She has fallen into a home filled with love. This is the complete answer to our problems whether they be unemployment, old age pensions—you name it. It is certainly a complete answer to the question of abortion.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may call it six o'clock if there is unanimous agreement to do so. Is there such agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have gained a lot of satisfaction from the fact that this subject has been chosen for debate in the House of Commons. Yesterday was International Women's Day, a day which has for many years been celebrated by women all over the world. It seems to me fitting that we should be marking International Womens' Day by having this debate.

I think a number of us, although we were very greatly surprised, were pleased with our unpredictable Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who at a Liberal gathering last week chose this as the subject of his speech. We were not quite prepared for the enthusiasm with which he entered into the subject and which he displayed a night or two later by becoming married. This was a great delight to people all across this country.

It is my hope that some hon. members who may be a little lukewarm about this subject will find that as they discuss the matter their enthusiasm will increase. I would not like to see that enthusiasm increased to the point where married members of the House will get into difficulty with their wives, but who knows what will happen if men's liberation takes hold? No one knows where it will end.

I should like to address myself particularly to the approach taken this afternoon to certain recommendations contained in the report on the status of women. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), who is the chairman of our caucus, made a very fine survey earlier today on the recommendations of that report and the areas the recommendations covered. I should like to deal particularly with two of these areas. The first area has regard to day-care centres, and the second is the matter of family planning.

The recommendation urging day-care centres was received by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women from one coast to the other. More than any other recommendation it kept cropping up in the submissions of delegations which appeared before the commission. I think there are various basic reasons why this recommendation was so strongly urged. I would like to refer to the three most important reasons.

Day-care service is important, first because it fits in at this particular time when women, whether everyone appreciates it or not, have reached the point in our society where they have a capacity and a desire to become not merely women but fully rounded out individuals. They intend to spend part of their time in the home with their families and part of their time away from home working in the community, just as men have been able to do for a long time. This is the point women have reached, and we might just as well recognize that fact. Women will no longer be satisfied to be given the choice of home and family on the one hand or creative work in the community on the other.

They will say: We will not take one or the other. We will have some of both. That is one reason why day-care centres have been urged as a means of making it possible for women to do this without neglecting their family duties.

In the second place, child-care centres, or day-care centres are urged for the very obvious reason of protecting children and providing the proper place where they may grow and develop under proper supervision with children of their own age. The third reason is that in our society we are realizing that today the family foundations are not as solid as we should like them to be. We know that they will not be too solid on the old basis any more. Our choice today is either laying down family foundations on the new basis, which would be a solid basis, or allowing them to slip and disintegrate.

Today the cold, hard truth is that we have reached that stage in society where child care and the life of the home will no longer be the sole responsibility of the mother or woman: it will be shared with the father and husband and with society. Those are the patterns that are emerging, patterns to which we must pay attention. Therefore, the Royal Commission on the Status of Women recommended that the Parliament of Canada pass a national day-care act which would provide funds for half of the operating costs of child-care centres, or day-care centred as they are now called, 70 per cent of the building costs for the first seven years and that the provinces shall operate these day-care centres through child-care boards.

The royal commission was well aware of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan under which if a province wishes to embark on a program of day-care centres it can apply to the federal Department of National Health and Welfare and obtain 50 per cent of the operating costs. The commissioners knew that perfectly well. They also knew that this provision did not go far enough. Therefore, the whole business of capital costs for child-care centres and for renovating older buildings to be used as child-care centres, to say nothing of the provision of new ones, had to be considered in the context of a much broader framework of child care. So they had in mind a federal child-care act under which funds would be provided to the provinces for the measures that I have mentioned. The provincial authorities and, under their aegis, the local authorities, would operate the child-care centres. I use the term "child-care centres" from preference. The commission talked about day-care centres because day-care centres are usually the first step: they provide care for the children of mothers who must work by day. The commission recommends that as a beginning, because the need there is the greatest and because we must begin with day-care centres. Later we can build up the whole framework of child-care centres.

Canada is industrializing quickly. We are told that by the end of the century a large percentage—I have heard the figure of around 80 per cent mentioned—of our people will be living in the three cities of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. So we are beginning to wonder what is to happen to children of mothers who are out working and earning their living. Of the total Canadian labour force, according to figures released about the middle of January this year, 32.6 per cent are women. Of these, 33.1 per cent are single, 57.6 per cent are married and 9.2 per cent are widowed, separated or divorced. According to a Department of Labour estimate, of the women who have been married and who are now in the labour force, 19.1 per cent have children under six years old. Practically 20 per cent, or one-fifth of those women, have children under six years old. That means that there are nearly half a million children—489,000 to be exact—under six years old in this country.

What happens to so many of these children who in many, many cases are the children of working mothers in low-income groups? Not long ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) estimated that in Canada more than 900,000 children of working mothers might need day care, but only 9,000 are getting it in day-care centres. This means that we have excluded most children and have exposed them to all the physical dangers that children can be exposed to when they run around without proper supervision. We have exposed them to the dangers of delinquency, maladjustment, alienation, the danger that they will adopt the habits of the drug culture and all the other dangers that children without supervision and proper care encounter. It means, in addition, not only neglected children but overwrought mothers, mothers who have to divide their energies between work and home. Many of them have spent a whole day at work, then they must come home and in the evenings try to take care of the family and do their housekeeping.

Why do these women work? According to the 1967 figures, the latest ones I could get, about a quarter of the women out working who have children of under school age were married to men with incomes of $3,000 a year or less. Therefore, a quarter of these women were out working for the sole reason that they had either to support their families—they were the sole support—or because their husband's income was so low that the woman's pay cheque was necessary if there was to be enough for the family.

Dr. Reuben Baetz, of the Canadian Council of Social Development, said a little while ago:

> We suffer from a kind of double vision in Canada: people appear to approve the enrolment of children of the affluent in nursery schools and to disapprove the enrolment of the children of the poor in day nurseries.

Why is this so? Why are there objections to day-care centres for the children of people on low income? I believe our choice today is between caring for the child or neglecting the child. That is our only choice. No, there is another. I think we ought to be prepared to do what I have suggested in this House. Where there is a woman with small children, I think she ought to ge given the choice of staying home and looking after them, as opposed to being forced out to work because the family income is too low.

I have proposed twice in this House that we do as they do in France, pay a salary to that mother. This would enable her to stay home and care for those children. However, in Canada we are apparently deciding not to follow that way. Therefore, we shall have to take the day-care way, which has proved to be a very good way indeed where it has been tried. We have lots of precedents for this. For example, England now has a variety of programs for pre-school care and a three-year training program for pre-school teachers. Sweden's pre-school centres are very well equipped. France has pre-school institutions directly under government control. Crèches, boarding nurseries, day nurseries, baby-sitting centres and counselling centres are under the ministry of social affairs. Nursery schools and kindergartens are under the ministry of education. In Denmark, day-care facilities are available to children from birth, in Britain from the age of one month, in Sweden from six months and in France from early infancy.

It is evident that Canada is far behind in the provision of services for pre-school children. I think that behind every objection is the expense. It would cost the taxpayers money to have child-care centres. But I quote Jerome Kagan, Harvard child psychologist, writing a few days ago:

> —if the family is to survive as the central unit in western society many billions must be spent for a system of day-care centres for children of working mothers.

Otherwise, the family is headed for disintegration and deterioration. I picked up the latest copy of Chatelaine magazine which is well known to Canadian women. I wish to quote as follows from an editorial entitled, "Yes, dear governments, we can afford day care":

> We are the second most affluent country in the world but away behind other western countries in day care. Yet we can afford to spend $17 million refitting an aircraft carrier we didn't need.
> Almost 40 years ago we found the money to set up a national broadcasting system. After the war we got around to subsidizing ballet, opera and the arts. We spent $50 million on the Seaway, and $375 million on a pipeline. We've also managed to set aside $10 million to help develop Canadian films. Isn't it about time we found money to spend on our children?

I believe that it is. That is the reason we are pushing this recommendation. I wish to deal briefly with the need for family planning and its various aspects of birth-control, abortion and sterilization. I am not going to be drawn into debate on abortion, not that I am not tempted to go down that particular garden path, but we have been promised time to discuss that subject in the House on another occasion.

We in Canada are deplorably slow in acting on family planning, birth-control information and contraceptives. We need to consider this from many angles. As I have stated previously, birth-control and the widespread knowledge of contraceptives are the proper and sensible first line of defence against unwanted pregnancies. To those people who are always speaking about the awfulness of abortion and its dreadfulness, I say that if they are serious about wanting to cut down on the number of abortion cases in this country, legal and illegal, they should get busy and push a great deal harder for the dissemination of birth-control information and contraceptives. That is the only way to keep down abortions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: As far as I can learn, and I believe this is in the report of the status of women, out of the 900 large general hospitals in Canada only three have birth-control clinics attached to them. I would be glad to learn that I am wrong. I am not happy at the speed with which the Department of Health and Welfare is proceeding on this matter. There is too much everlasting planning and not enough everlasting action. In an editorial in this morning's Vancouver Province, the minister responsible for housing was complimented on saying:

> We can't research forever. We have to move, even if still somewhat crudely, in some direction.

One area in which we have to move is birth control and family planning. We have to move to implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I am glad that the minister has appointed a task force. Esther Greenglass, a member of the task force, stated:

> First we must have changes in the law and then the changes in attitude will follow.

I think the changes in attitude are coming. However, there is nothing like changing the law to help those who are laggard. A lot of people in Canada need to be helped in their thinking. Thinking in the old-fashioned manner is just too dangerous. If we are to make good progress in this country, and if women are to take their position as full partners alongside men, this government must take immediate action to implement the report on the status on women. Sufficient research has been done on this report and in other places. The time for action is now.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate today with great interest. I am rather surprised at the level of debate and the diffidence with which members of the House seem to have approached the subject of the rights of women in society. Hon. members should have much stronger views on many of these subjects than have been expressed today. One member indicated that he was opposed to any changes with regard to the status of women. He then went on to say what great people women were. I thought he was going to end up by saying that some of his best friends were women. That was about the extent of the contribution he made to the importance of the rights of women.

I do not see how any politician can be under any illusion about the value of women in our society. In my political work I have found that women are involved in politics and men talk about it. When you want to get something done in politics, you get women to help you. After all is done, the men sit in the back room and discuss politics. It is the women who do and the men who discuss.

I do not think any member of this House should be backward about assisting women to achieve the rights in society which they deserve. Roughly 50 per cent of our population is composed of women. We do not see a representation of that extent in the House of Commons. A number of minority groups are represented here. We have one Indian, one black and one woman. It is a disgrace that a group in our society which represents half of our population is represented in such a meagre way.

Mr. Alexander: What do you suggest?

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I do not mean that in reference to the very excellent representation we have from the hon. member who spoke before me. She makes up for many members in this House.

Mr. Alexander: You almost got out of it, but not quite.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Over the centuries we seem to have developed a kind of mystique in dealings between the two sexes in our society. A couple of days ago I met a member of this House in a gift shop on the Mall. He was shopping. When I asked him why he was shopping, he said that his wife had not spoken to him for three days.

Mr. Dinsdale: Lucky fellow.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): He said he wanted to pick up some little thing just to show his appreciation. This is the kind of impasse we have reached in our society as between men and women. It is time we approached the subject seriously and paid attention to the obvious wrongs that exist in our society and in our dealings as between the two sexes.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Without question there is unfavourable discrimination in respect of half of our population and it is time we did something to clear it up. A number of hon. members have dealt with specific examples of discrimination in our society and I, too, wish to refer to specific examples. Discrimination under the law is surely one of the most tried and true methods of eroding society. Wherever the concept of one law for the rich and one law for the poor has been carried out to any great extent, major revolutions have erupted with the oppressed class shaking off the shackles with the frightening violence of the Russian revolution, the French revolution, or the restrained violence of the racist upheavals in the United States.

Usually such discrimination has been directed against a minority in society, whether based on race, religion or social class. Women, however, are not a minority group. My guess is that they make up about 50 per cent of our population and yet in one area we see discrimination under the law against this non-minority group based solely on the difference of sex. While it is doubtful that the women of Canada are on the verge of sharpening their guillotines, laying in a supply of gunshot or studying the tactics of urban guerrilla warfare, an examination of the laws against discrimination in the labour forces as they affect women can only lead us to the conclusion that they are more honoured in the breach than they are in the observance. Nobody in Canada seriously denies the validity of the conception of equal pay for equal work. Many of those who dispute the claims of women regarding discrimination in the labour force point to provincial and federal legislation as proof that such discrimination does not exist. This is not proof.

As the Royal Commission on the Status of Women has stated, "International, federal and provincial acceptance of the principle of equal pay has largely settled the former issue"; that is, the issue whether or not there should be different rates of pay for men and women. But what these jurisdictions have failed to do is ensure that the principle is universally observed. Those words are to be found on page 66 of the report. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a failing in the judicial system which is, unfortunately, not uncommon—that while the law exists on the statute books, it is not enforced and thereby loses any significance in terms of its impact on the social questions with which it is supposed to deal.

The studies undertaken by the royal commission indicate that while every province, with the exception of the Yukon Territory, has legislation specifically prohibiting different rates of pay on the basis of sex, and while the federal government also has regulations governing equal pay for female employees which apply as well to Crown corporations, there is nevertheless real evasion of the intent of the law not only on the part of employers but on the part of labour unions. The report cites the example of the experienced female fish worker who receives $2.15 an hour, while an experienced male fish worker receives $2.83 an hour. The report adds, at page 72:

> We were even more mystified when we were told that an inexperienced male fish worker was receiving $2.37 an hour.

Female nursing assistants who must have received in addition to grade 10 education a training course of about ten months duration as well as special provincial licensing, are often paid less than male nursing orderlies who have no qualification requirements to meet and get their training on the job. As a matter of fact, the commissioners had to look no further than the publication of Canada's own Department of Labour, economics and research branch, whose 1967 table of wage rates for male and female knitters in the hosiery and knitted goods industry showed glaring differences in pay scales.

In some cases it appears employers go out of their way to differentiate duties as between women and men so they may be within the letter of the law but outside its intent. But employers are not the only villains on the scene. Labour unions have been markedly slow to fight on behalf of women employees, not only in the matter of pay but with respect to all other fringe benefits. However, since we are dealing with the principle of equal pay and not with other matters pertaining to the welfare of worker I will confine myself to quoting only that portion of the union brief received by the commission which deals with pay. The brief in question states bluntly:

> It has unfortunately been impossible, we must admit, to secure real implementation of the principle of equal pay for equal work in certain sectors.

This type of discrimination does not exist only at the social level of the labourer, blue-collar and white-collar worker. For once the discrimination is not discriminatory along class lines. Professional women are not excluded from the misery of their less educated sisters. The average salary of women in the academic professions was $2,262 less than men in 1965-66, and only about half of the difference could be explained away by age, degrees held, field of specialization, university, region or academic rank. Difference in women's salaries ranged from $433 for associate professor to $2,790 for dean. In other professional fields similar tendencies were tabulated, the greatest differences being in the field of medicine.

We are therefore looking at the most classic and reprehensible form of injustice, the injustice which makes mockery of the law and civil and criminal codes. We are looking at the type of injustice which has been well documented in the case of the southern American negro who, when accused of a crime, finds that the ordinary processes of law are subverted by the prejudices of the white juries who sit in judgment. We are looking at the type of injustice experienced by the Russian peasant whose recourse against excessive taxation in the courts is non-existent, although it is given usual lip service in the statute books.

When a law to prohibit discrimination exists in our legal codes but does not exist in fact, then we are eroding our own legal system and the eventual victims of such a course can only be each one of us. The reason for the continuation of this type of discrimination is not any concerted effort on the part of masculine oppressors to keep women in economic subservience, in spite of what the women's liberation movement might think. On the contrary, it is male legislators by and large who have drafted the laws outlawing discrimination on the basis of sex. The main reason for the breakdown of these laws is that the onus of proof is on the aggrieved person.

As the commission points out, many employers go to considerable lengths to make identical jobs slightly different. Another example which they cite is worth repetition. A large manufacturing firm with union representation has two wage scales for the virtually identical job of janitor and janitress. The male janitor's wage is 5 per cent higher than that of the janitress. The only small difference in the two jobs is that the janitor is required to wheel the garbage from his work area to the disposal area, while the janitress places the garbage from her work area outside the washroom. Despite this deliberate circumvention of the intended law, one further factor makes it almost impossible for the female worker to seek redress under present legislation.

Under the existing legislation, with the exception of the provinces of Ontario and Nova Scotia any complaint has to be lodged by the person aggrieved. In what position does this put a female worker if she has to lay a complaint that will get her fired in the long run, even if she succeeds in getting her complaint heard and acted upon? To compound this unfairness, where a woman has been willing to risk the wrath of her employer the penalties for breaking the law have been so low that the employer has often felt it more financially beneficial to continue to break the law and pay a small penalty than to worry about being charged with discrimination. Obviously, a law that demands unreasonable proof on the part of the complainant, which threatens the complainant with the loss of her livelihood if she seeks redress under it and which has so few teeth that any convictions are not a deterrent in the future, is a poorly drafted and unjust form of legislation.

As members of the federal Parliament, it behooves us to give serious consideration to the recommendations on pages 76 and 77 of the commission's report concerning the federal Female Employees Equal Pay Act and the federal fair wages and hours of work legislation, just as it is to be hoped that provincial legislatures will also incorporate the intent of these recommendations in their legislation.

In detail, the commission recommends, first of all, that the concepts of skill, effort and responsibility be used as objective factors in the determination of what is equal work. This first recommendation is obviously designed to stop the dishonest practice of making some slight change in the female and male work categories in order to justify salary differences. It seems to me that the interpretation of this provision could well be handled by unions wherever there is union representation, in cooperation with governmental agencies, so that the union could, with the knowledge that comes from close association with this day to day work situation, determine when two jobs fall roughly within the same category of work.

The recommendation makes the second point that an employee who feels aggrieved should be able to refer the grievance to the agency designated for that purpose by the government administering the legislation. Obviously, all governments need to establish such an agency. The report further recommends that the onus of investigating violations of the legislation be placed in the hands of the agency administering the equal pay legislation. Further, and most importantly, it is recommended that the agency be free to investigate whether or not complaints have been laid. It is this which is the crux of the whole matter.

Ineffectual laws are laws that are not enforced. Anti-discrimination laws have not been enforced because no one has been empowered to find out when they are being broken. Clearly, the breaking of such laws is not within the jurisdiction of a police force. For one thing, most of the legislation requires the aggrieved party to lay a complaint. Even where such provisions do not apply, how could we expect charges of that kind to be investigated by a policeman? Therefore, clearly the laws have been lacking in their failure to establish a policing authority, and this particular recommendation that each governmental jurisdiction which has passed such laws also be required to set up an agency which will have a policing authority is the only way justice can be done. As I have said before, it is the aggrieved party who is in the peculiar position that she may suffer, in fact probably will suffer, the punishment of losing her job if she wins her case. It is similar to saying that although the operation was a success, the patient died.

The commission's recommendations go on to suggest that the anonymity of the complainant be maintained wherever possible, and that provision be made for an authority to render a decision whether or not the terms of the legislation have been violated. It advocates appeal procedures, guarantees that the employee's status be in no way adversely affected by application of the law in her case and also that she be compensated for losses in pay and fringe benefits, loss of vacation pay, and so on, in cases where the law has been violated. It is also advocated that the laws be applicable to part-time workers as well as full-time workers, and above all that the penalties be sufficiently heavy to be an effective deterrent.

In conclusion, it seems clear that in the interests of justice no government body with equal pay for equal work legislation already on its statute books should lose any time in establishing agencies to see that the laws are not merely hollow expressions and idealistic theory but, instead, are vital, workable and enlightened statutes that will free about 50 per cent of our society from a legitimate discriminatory grievance.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the subject that has been chosen by our friends of the New Democratic Party is one that, so far as the male of the species is concerned, leads one to the conclusion that angels move in where devils fear to tread. As the previous speaker has mentioned, the contributions of the male members of this House have been somewhat reserved and circumspect because they are moving into an area of discussion which is loaded with guilt feelings and complexes for most members of the House. The most vigorous presentation that has been made in the debate was that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who represented the so-called weaker sex very forcibly in the discussion of this important subject.

The reason it has been chosen as a topic for debate today arises, I suppose, from the fact that we have had in our midst during the past few years a protest movement, among many other protest movements in this rapidly changing society in which we live, which has become somewhat strident. I refer to the Women's Liberation movement. Some very famous exponents of the tenets and philosophy behind the movement have appeared on the horizon, perhaps none more knowledgeable on the subject and better known than Mrs. Betty Friedan, who with her book "The Feminine Mystique", written in 1963, leapt into fame and, I would presume, a considerable fortune because of the vigorous manner in which she presented the viewpoint of feminine libertarians, if I may use that phrase.

I must confess I have not read the book "The Feminine Mystique" in any great detail, but I have been intrigued by the word "mystique" because it seems to me to have some interesting connotations which require further investigation. I did look in the dictionary in preparation for the remarks I shall make tonight and I found this most intriguing definition:

> Mystique: concern with the direct communion of the soul with God; seeking absorption into God or the infinite; believing in the spiritual apprehension of truths; intellectually incomprehensible; spiritually symbolic; esoteric; mysterious; awe inspiring.

Now, Mr. Speaker, faced with a formidable definition of that kind I think you will understand why I am moving in this debate, as I have already indicated, where angels fear to tread. That definition brings the phrase "feminine mystique" within the category once referred to by the great parliamentarian, Winston Churchill, when he used the phrase "a riddle wrapped up in an enigma".

There is no doubt that the current feminist movement is the most vigorous, if not strident, we have seen in the long history of the gradual evolution and development in respect of a position of equality for the female of the species with the male of the species, homo sapiens. I immediately ask a very practical question. Perhaps this is why over the years the term "the weaker sex" has been applied to the ladies. As I leave my house every morning, I contemplate the great piles of snow resulting from the unusually heavy snowfall and I ask myself who is going to shovel the snow. Obviously, this is definitely a male role in society because of the male's superior physical capacity and strength. This no doubt is the reason for the well known cliché in reference to the ladies being the weaker sex.

That weaker sex, I submit, has made gigantic strides considering the great handicap with which they started. If we go back a millennium, certainly in the period A.D., we have seen women make enormous progress. Men once debated whether or not a woman had a soul. Some have said women were the first domestic animals of the male. This is a situation which actually existed in one society. They were excluded from education and from the professions. They were regarded as chattels. Then came that period of the romantic glow when knighthood was in flower, and suddenly the feminine mystique blossomed in the romantic aura of courtly love.

But I suppose the greatest step forward was in the industrial revolution when the militant feminists first appeared in our culture. This period extended from the end of the nineteenth century to about 1930, the period marked by the militancy of the suffragettes and the ladies who led the campaign against demon rum. Actually, I suppose we must give them credit for introducing prohibition through the political process. In Manitoba we had a most interesting representative of the suffragette movement in Mrs. Nellie McClung, who brought down a government by her forceful feminine militancy. I am sure Mrs. McClung, who is being commemorated for her part in the feminist movement by having her home declared a national historic shrine, deserves all the credit she is now receiving even if posthumously as is so often the case in respect of those who play an important role in advancing specific social issues.

It was the vigour of the feminist movement of that period which led Emmeline Pankhurst to elevate the role of women almost to the level of a deity since she is supposed to have used the famous words, "trust in God; she will provide". Certainly there was some of the power and influence we usually attribute to the Godhead in the movement that was a very important part of the social change and involvement during the first 30 years of this century.

There is a new dimension to the current feminist movement which should be noted. It is the most strident feminist activity that has appeared during the period of history to which I have been referring briefly tonight. It is part of the radical left which repudiates all values. It is represented mostly by the extremely young, sometimes the very beautiful and quite often the permissive element of the youth culture which often has been represented in the protests which have been made on our university campuses. If we attempted to analyse the situation in detail, we would find it results from the period of prolonged adolescence which is a part of our current social situation when young people remain in university for as long as ten years in the search for an identity in a rapidly changing society.

These people sometimes become quite violent in their expressions concerning issues about which they are particularly concerned. We had a demonstration of that in this chamber not too many months ago, and in the 20 years I have been a member of this House it is the only time I have seen a protest group bring the deliberations of Parliament to a temporary cessation. I am sure Your Honour will recollect the vigour, vociferousness and strident nature of that event. This, as I see it, is one of the aspects of the current feminist movement which doesn't help create a positive image on behalf of the women of our society who after all have a legitimate claim.

Actually, without prejudice, I think I can say the women have done quite well for themselves in the western culture. They have achieved the heights in the professions, the arts, the sciences. There is one area where the role of women, of course, is unique and indispensable. I do not think we will ever get around the very basic and elementary fact that women of the world are the mothers of the race. Even though there have been such flights of philosophical fancy as those of Aldous Huxley in his "Brave New Yorld", where he anticipated the elimination of the basic role of the other sex through the use of test tubes, and so forth, I believe that era is still far off in the fantastic future.

As someone said when they were debating in the chamber of deputies in France during the suffragette movement following World War I, "After all, there is very little difference between men and women in our society", whereupon an enthusiastic voice was heard to exclaim, "Vive la différence". I am sure that that basic difference is one that will be perpetuated and is not likely to be subject to change, no matter how many Parliaments deliberate on the matter or how many voices are raised in protest.

The basic role of women in every nation is that of being the cornerstone of the family. You can put into better words the fundamental role of women in our society than those of the wedding ceremony in which most of us have taken part at some time or another in our life, namely, "to have and to hold, to love and to cherish until death do us part". There is no doubt that the role of women is changing in our industrial, urbanized society. I think it is changing for the better. In the family relationship there is now a partnership, a companionship, a sense of equality between husband and wife. There is now a deeper appreciation of the other half of the partnership on the part of the husband, the helpmate role that has even been recognized by the man who has the highest position in the nation and the greatest responsibility, our own Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This is a fundamental role and, as I say, it is the cornerstone of society.

I believe that the role of the housewife, even though women are more and more entering into various aspects of the work world, is the basic and most important challenge that any woman can assume and accept in this confused day and age. Some say that there is a great revolution going on in mores, moral codes and the other disturbing changes that are taking place in society. But if you get down to the essence of the problem you will find that there is no real revolution in mores, and the majority of women as well as men believe that the basic function of sex in perpetuating the species should go only hand in hand with the serious, permanent emotional involvement that comes with marriage.

All this has been brought into focus for the purposes of this debate by the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. There are 167 recommendations that have been put forward, and many of them, as has been pointed out by earlier speakers in this debate, will undoubtedly improve the status of women in our society. A good many of them, some 68, deal with the new responsibilities and the increasing role of working wives and working mothers.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway made an eloquent plea for child-care centres and there is nothing further that can be added in this regard. I believe that women with their mystique—if I can use that word in the broad definition that is given in the dictionary—have a great contribution to make in the workaday world as well as in the increasing area of activity and responsibility, namely that of voluntary service. It is obvious that this is an adjustment that must be made if we are to make it possible for women to make the contribution that only they can make.

I am interested in seeing among the 167 recommendations the emphasis on the necessity of research and broader programs of self-help for our Indian and Eskimo peoples. The Indian, Eskimo and Metis associations have had among some of their most creative and vigorous leaders these voluntary lady workers. I agree most enthusiastically that this is a role that they can play with increasing effectiveness.

To bring these brief remarks to a close I should say, however, that I am on the side of John Humphrey who was the dissenter in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Maybe he is a prejudiced male, but there are some areas that have been covered in the 167 recommendations which I agree call for some reservation. As an example, he mentions the quota system. The suggestion that was put forward by the ladies on the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was that the way to get equality of representation and of opportunity is to establish a specified quota of women designated for various appointments.

I do not think women themselves want to be placed in this specialized category, because I know from experience that if given the opportunity and if the legal restrictions and prohibitions are removed, as they are gradually being removed, women will find their niche without any condescending attitudes on the part of the dominating male to make sure that they get their equitable share of appointments by an arbitrary quota system. They want no special treatment in this regard.

Perhaps, finally, I can use the male cliché that is usually resorted to in discussions of this kind, that suggests that most men envy the special role and status occupied by women. One of the popular comic strips which depicts the typical middle-class family relationship in our society is Dagwood. These comic strips are a very penetrating commentary on our social phobias and hang-ups. The message that comes out loud and clear from Dagwood is that men are also on a treadmill. Perhaps they should launch a liberation movement of their own, because in the final analysis, as the old cliche says, the hand that rocks the cradle inevitably rules the world. George Meredith, another male commentator, put it in slightly different terms and I will close my remarks with a quotation from him as follows:

I expect that women will be the last thing civilized by men.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it has been said by many people that Eve was born from the rib of Adam, but there is also a general feeling that it was not from the rib she was born but from man's funnybone.

Mr. Dinsdale: How about his backbone?

Mr. Gilbert: We find that a cruel joke has been played on women from the beginning, because the struggle for women's rights and their dignity has been hard and long and it is probably because of men's attitudes that the struggle has been so difficult. To bolster my contention I quote Aristotle, the Greek philosopher, as follows:

Woman may be said to be an inferior man.

And the German philosopher Nietzsche, who said:

Woman was God's second mistake.

Then there is the general feeling amongst many today that behind every great man stands a devoted and talented woman, his mother-in-law. I think it was Freud who said, "Despite my 30 years of research into the feminine soul I have not yet been able to answer the great question that has never been answered: What does woman want?" If Freud had been present in this chamber today he would have heard some of the rightful demands of women.

I am rather proud of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I am very happy to see the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Stanbury), in charge of Information Canada, present this evening because as you know, Mr. Speaker, just recently a small pamphlet was issued by the government telling Canadians how their tax dollar is spent. I would like to think that the minister in charge of Information Canada would summarize the report on the status of women and have it circulated throughout the country.

Mr. Stanbury: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that has already been done. There is probably now in his hands a very fine summary of the report, which was financed by the government and distributed by the National Council of Women.

Mr. Dinsdale: Financed by the people.

Mr. Stanbury: By the government, on behalf of the people.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the information just given by the minister, but I thought he would have given it such wide circulation that it would be in the homes of all Canadians where every woman, child and man could read and act upon it, because really it is the bible for Canadian women: it outlines some of the rights to which they are entitled.

As I was saying, if Freud had been here today he would have heard the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) say that it had been enunciated in the Declaration of Human Rights that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. It is really our attitudes as Canadians which determine whether we are civilized in making women equal in dignity and in rights with men. The hon. member for Greenwood dealt in a broad sweep with the recommendations contained in the report on the status of women. The speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) centred upon day-care centres and touched lightly on abortion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) dealt with pensions and employment of public servants. I would like to deal with chapter 9 of the report which sets forth recommendations regarding criminal law and women offenders. These number 13, running from Nos. 150 to 163, and most of them concern federal jurisdiction. In this chapter it is set forth as follows:

> The criminal law of Canada is built upon a nineteenth century philosophy of the role of punishment in the control of antisocial behaviour ... Canadian criminal law also reflects a nineteenth century view of the status of women.

It points out that women as criminal offenders have a very low ratio with regard to the number who are apprehended and convicted. It points out that only 12.5 per cent of all persons convicted of indictable offences constitute women, a ratio of one to eight. It says that women are rarely convicted of violent offences and that convictions for possession of drugs, vagrancy and attempted suicide involve a higher proportion of women than other offences committed by women. It says that offences by female juveniles usually involve behaviour associated with disorderly conduct and not the violent behaviour often found among male juvenile offenders. This chapter also points out some of the grave injustices which women have suffered under the Criminal Code. With regard to criminal sexual behaviour of women, it says that women involved in criminal sexual behaviour have been either victims of men's assaults, or sexually exploited by men for material gain. This has been clearly shown in the Criminal Code. The best example is prostitution. Prostitution appears to apply only to the female. Prostitution itself is not a crime. Prostitutes are controlled by the vagrancy provisions of the Criminal Code. Section 164(1)(c) provides:

> Every one commits vagrancy who being a common prostitute or night walker is found in a public place and does not, when required, give a good account of herself.

Thus, the law prohibits not prostitution but being unable, it found in a public place, to give a good account of oneself. Prostitutes are ordinarily charged with vagrancy, not prostitution. The man who accepts the solicitation of a prostitute is not prosecuted. A man commits an offence only if he is found in or keeps a bawdy house. Convictions for prostitution open the door to arbitrary application of the law by the police and the setting up of traps to arrest the so-called prostitutes. Under the Canadian Criminal Code, prostitutes are charged, not for what they do but for what they are considered to be: "Once a prostitute, always a prostitute" appears to be the rationale of the law.

Prostitution is fundamentally a social not a criminal problem, and a criminal conviction makes a prostitute's rehabilitation more difficult. Therefore, it is recommended that the section dealing with prostitution under the vagrancy section of the Criminal Code should be repealed. The report also states that if there is evidence that prostitutes are disturbing the peace as defined by the code, they should be charged under that section and not the vagrancy section. Any modification of the law should be followed up with facilities and programs designed to rehabilitate adult female prostitutes. The establishment of halfway homes and training for work which will enhance their dignity are methods of rehabilitation. Section 164 (1) (a) of the Criminal Code also adversely affects women. It provides as follows:

> Everyone commits vagrancy who not having any apparent means of support is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found.

This provision is directed to the homeless and transient male and female in need of shelter. Most charges of vagrancy are not contested, and once convicted these people have criminal records it makes their rehabilitation and reformation much more difficult. Therefore, they recommend that section 164 (1) (a) be repealed. This deals with vagrancy.

Another section in the report concerning the Criminal Code is that which differentiates sharply between male and female in many sexual offences. It is very discriminatory. In four sections of the code the presumption of "chaste character" of a girl—up to 21 years of age—forms one of the basic elements of the offence. The onus of proving that the girl was not previously chaste rests upon the accused. This does not mean that the girl has to be virgo intacta but, rather, points to "those acts and disposition of mind which constitute an unmarried woman's virtue or morals".

It is unjust to define a crime on the basis of the moral character of the victim. A girl's reputation, her physical purity, her conduct in the past, her conduct on the occasion, do not determine, although they may influence, the matter. It encourages the accused to manufacture evidence and force her to defend her virtue. Whether she is chaste or not, she should be entitled to the protection of the law. Therefore, they recommend that the words "of previously chaste character" be deleted from all sections of the Criminal Code.

Age raises problems because the criminal responsibility of the offender often depends upon whether or not the victim was under age. For example, a child under 14 cannot give valid consent to sexual intercourse or indecent assault. Age is important in seduction cases. The law states that only men or boys can seduce women or girls, and there is no offence if the boy is under 18 or the girl over 18. The law should clearly emphasize protection for everyone, particularly young people. Therefore, they recommend that the Criminal Code be amended to extend protection from sexual abuse to all young people, male and female, and protection to everyone from sexual exploitation either by false representation, use of force, threat or the abuse of authority. Section 23 (3) of the code states:

> No married woman whose husband has been a party to an offence is an accessory after the fact to that offence by receiving, comforting or assisting in his presence and by his authority any other person who has been a party to that offence for the purpose of enabling her husband or that other person to escape.

This provision recognizes the special relationship created by marriage and rejects the idea that any married woman should be liable as an accessory after the fact if she helps her husband to escape. However, this section makes it an offence for a married man to help his spouse's accomplice to escape. Therefore, in support of equity before the law they recommend that subsection 3 of section 23 of the code be amended to apply to the husband and the wife.

Many women have received ill-treatment within the administration of criminal law. Pre-trial detention of offenders both male and female is closely related to the ability of the person to obtain bail. Lack of money should not determine the obtaining of bail, and pre-trial detention should not be required unless it is for the protection of the public. There is a serious shortage of adequate pre-trial facilities and remand homes to which the court can refer a woman awaiting trial. It is only right that credit should be given to the government with regard to the recent bail bill before the House. It will be returning very shortly at the report stage and for third reading. Some of the difficulties in respect of obtaining bail will then be eased: it will be easier for women and for men to obtain bail. We should also emphasize the point that there should be pre-trial facilities and remand homes to which the court can refer women awaiting trial. Therefore, they recommend that the provincial and territorial government either provide or contract with suitable voluntary associations to provide homes for women on remand.

One of the main approaches in respect of correctional treatment of women is lacking in our present system of correction. The correctional process should respect the dignity of every person. This involves the personal appearance of offenders and the provision of proper clothing and usual accessories. Policewomen should be used to search arrested women. There are very few female police officers now employed in Canada. Therefore, they recommend that the federal government, provinces, territories and municipalities whenever possible assign female instead of male police officers to deal with women taken into custody.

The nature of offences committed by women has a strong bearing on the kind of sentence they receive. Statistics indicate that judges take a more lenient attitude to women than men. The sentence should be directed at rehabilitating the offender. Dangerous offenders should be segregated. The casual offender should be imprisoned only when other dispositions are not appropriate. Time should be allowed for the payment of fines. Probation services should be increased.

One can see the lack of a total correctional service which should be provided not only for men but for women. Therefore, the recommendation is that the provinces and territories ensure that when the administrative policy of their corrections program is being determined, the differences in the counselling and supervisory needs of women and men probationers should be considered, staff requirements should be based on these needs and case loads adjusted accordingly.

Women present few custodial problems in prison. Therefore, it should be possible to reduce security requirements in prison. For crimes without a direct victim—vagrancy, public intoxication, drug addiction, attempted suicide—imprisonment of the offender is inappropriate. These problems should be dealt with by health and welfare authorities. No conduct should be defined as criminal unless it represents a serious threat to society and cannot be dealt with by other social or legal means. Most crimes without a victim should not be considered crimes. Vagrants should not be considered criminals. Attempted suicide is a manifestation of emotional and mental disturbances and should be referred to mental health authorities. Alcoholics are not criminals but are people who need medical help. A similar approach should be used toward drug addiction. The next recommendation is:

> Therefore, we recommend that the provinces and territories (a) develop a health and social welfare policy that would remove from the penal setting the handling of persons found apparently intoxicated and assign the responsibility for diagnosis and treatment to health and welfare administration; (b) ensure that there are treatment facilities for female alcoholics; and (c) in cooperation with health and welfare authorities establish treatment programs, where they do not now exist, for female alcoholics being now detained in a penal setting for criminal offences.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for permitting me to continue. I will make my remarks short. I have almost finished. I point out that the Penitentiaries Act makes no distinction between the treatment of male and female offenders. The word "refuge" to designate a correctional institution for girls, and "industrial school" for boys, indicates the use of outdated terms. Some provinces discriminate on the basis of sex in determining the minimum age for sentence. Some provinces determine the type of institution by a woman's religion. The commissioners indicate that these outdated words and procedures should be eliminated. Adequate treatment programs, Mr. Speaker, and services should be organized for women offenders. Women should not be incarcerated in the maximum security prison at Kingston at a time when the trend of penal reform is toward small, open institutions. As a result, quite rightly, the commissioners recommend that the federal women's prison at Kingston be closed.

Speaking on the question of release and after-care, the commissioners indicate that parole services for Indians and Eskimos call for special attention and that these people require parole services to fit their general needs. The commissioners ask that these be recognized and implemented with regard to parole. On release, most offenders find it difficult to become reintegrated in the community. Halfway houses for people newly released on parole or discharged from correctional institutions, where they can stay until they have become adjusted to life outside, are extremely important. If we are to provide follow-up and after-care services for young women we shall need halfway houses in which they can be reintegrated in society and in which they can find friendship, employment and fulfilment.

Of all chapters in the report on the status of women, chapter 9, dealing with women and the criminal law, is perhaps the most important. I underline the necessity of the government's moving rapidly in bringing about changes in the criminal law so that women may obtain equality and fulfilment.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to participate in the debate on the status of women. I will take note of the fact that in the report significant mention was made of the subject of abortion. I will use the time at my disposal to discuss in the House the very difficult, emotional, brutal, tragic and complex question of abortion.

You will remember, Sir, that on Friday last Bill C-32 was debated in this House. That bill had one main purpose, to remove the subject of abortion from the Criminal Code and treat the question as one of individual choice to be made as the individual judges best, without reference to society in general, to the values that society exalts and to the powers to give life or determine death which that society champions and which society says belongs to society as a whole. That decision must be made by society. However, if abortion were completely removed from the Criminal Code, that power would be abandoned. Since my time is limited this evening I will go directly to my main points and state categorically that abortion is death. The decision to abort is a decision to terminate life. Allow me to explain why I think so.

As a free agent, I am free to cut off my own hand or to drop a giant cleaver on my leg. The limb, which was part of my body, which is flesh and blood, tissue and bone, was alive. But once severed from the larger body of the host, the tissue soon dies. It is not able to sustain itself once it is separated from the host body.

If abortion were simply the removal of a small bundle of tissue from somebody's body and were similar to the removal of the bundle of tissue that is my hand, which would not sustain itself apart from the host body and which would therefore die, that would be one thing. That, if it were to happen, would be arrestingly tragic. Anyone who has worked in the healing arts must know this, as must anyone who has read Arthur Hailey's novel "Hospital". We feel a sense of awe when tissue is severed. We must ask, what do you do with an arm or a leg once it has been severed or cut free? Hopefully, we will never have a society with so little sensitivity for the physical presence of the human personality that we will ever treat casually portions of a human body.

A person might cut off a portion of his body from choice. Certainly we have thought that traditional wrist slashing in suicidal attempts, or wilful severing of a limb, was an offence that ought to be condemned by a society in which the value of people is beyond measure and in which the physical life of an individual is something that no one individual has the right to terminate. Now we are moving toward taking suicide out of the Criminal Code. I say that this would be a wise move. But it is precisely because society treats self-destruction as arising from a mental illness, as something done by an ill person who is no longer able to take responsibility for himself, that suicide attempts are being removed from the Criminal Code. That is not being done because society in any way takes lightly the mutilation of one's body or the death of oneself, but because the person is deemed to be deranged and incapable of sound judgment.

A fetus of 12 hours, three weeks or two months is, in one respect, like a limb or portion of a human body. It is human tissue which cannot survive apart from the host body. It is like the victim of polio who dies without his iron lung or the injured hockey player in a coma who exists so long as another person wills that he shall exist and who, unless someone fills the role of host every hour of every day, will simply die. The human embryo is more than a hand or a leg or an eye. When a sperm enters the egg and the chromosomes line up, the genetic characteristics of the third person, now growing, now developing, are determined. Those characteristics are different from the characteristics of either parent. The new combination of characteristics and physical traits are all established and are unique to the individual who is now in the embryonic stage.

This human embryo in its early stages is just like some people who line the wards of hospitals for the aged throughout our land. If you take away the tubes, the oxygen masks and the intravenous feedings—in short, if you remove all the supports to life that must be provided for the individual by others—the individual will die just as the embryo will die if separated from the host body, because neither the individual nor the embryo are capable of sustaining life on their own. Why do these old people die? They die for the identical reason that an aborted child dies: they cannot survive without being surrounded and supported by a human life other than their own.

There may well be a valid argument in favour of mercy killing—euthanasia, to use the fancy word—of one person deciding that it is better for another to die than to live. Every doctor, in the case of critically ill patients, must at one point or another make a decision along these lines. But we have hitherto believed in our society that life is better than death and that so long as life can be sustained we ought to sustain it. Who among us can assume the role of God and decree from on high that this or that life ought now to end?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McBride: If we want to appoint such temporary gods or committees of the "final solution", what should their terms of reference be? When should grandfathers or grandmothers lives' end, and how many years should that boy in the coma be kept around when neither can exist without another human being supporting and keeping them alive? Abortion is much the same.

The decision to be born is never made by any of us. No person has ever decided or had a share in the impregnation of his or her mother which resulted in one's own birth. Out of the union of two people a wholly other third person came into being. That third person was just like the boy in the coma, except he was not injured. He was just like the old man on intravenous and oxygen, only he is not aged or decrepit.

The only argument for euthanasia or ending the life of the month-old embryo is that it cannot make it in the big, bold world on its own. It, too, needs a host person. The mother, father or both, or society, want off the hook. They do not want the pregnancy to continue. It was not the child's choice to be created. That was the choice of the parents. Once the child is created, ought it also to be the choice of the parents to destroy the child? I think not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McBride: Until society is willing to leave to the next of kin the decision as to whether those who cannot survive by themselves ought to live or die, we can scrape up mighty little logic for free abortion on demand that delivers an unborn child into the panicky and often murderous hands of its reluctant mother. Only a very primitive society of the most backward sort would need abortion in this day and age.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McBride: To use abortion as a means of birth-control demonstrates a lack of concern for human life, the dimensions of which words are not adequate to describe. There are hundreds and perhaps thousands of abortions each year in our nation. Some are performed by competent doctors, most by amateurs. This is an intolerable situation. Those pregnancies need never have occurred if our homes and institutions in society were providing complete, thorough and adequate training, knowledge and materials for preventing conception, especially to the youth to prevent the tragedy of pregnancies among teenagers.

In the final analysis, the sexual life of an individual is one's own decision, a highly personal concern. If a female and a male person decide to have intimacies of any sort, that must obviously be their own decision. Except where individuals are mentally retarded or where rape occurs, an individual's action and the results therefrom are theirs and theirs alone; that is, a couple's actions concern no one else directly up to and until a pregnancy occurs. Then a very different situation arises. It becomes one where an innocent third party is directly involved. While a person may do what he wishes with his own life and body, hopefully short of destroying both, no such freedom can be given any person over the life and body of another individual.

All members of this House and all members of society who support any kind of permissive abortion legislation, certainly free abortion on demand, must do everything in their power to encourage the free availability of birth-control information and material. In this area we are surely a retarded nation. Only a nation in sad circumstances would be forced to consider abortion to make up for its lack of family planning. If we could do that, Mr. Speaker, it would seem wise that we make it a severe social stigma to hurl into the world a child for whom the parent has made no preparation and whose life the parent is not prepared to support with love, affection and respect.

I think I could make a very profound case for having to do a great deal about family planning and education in our culture so we do not fall into the pattern of some countries where abortion becomes a form of family planning and regular abortions are a habit. Rather, we must use some of the means available to us, and there are many. Perhaps the scientists need to work harder to make them better. We must do that.

I want to raise the question, what do we do now? Abortion tends to be considered in at least four differing circumstances. First, in the situation of a single, unmarried girl; second, the married woman who does not want or cannot have more children; third, rape or incest; fourth, where the child is known to be malformed. In every one of these situations there are instances where abortion may be the best alternative. Given the present sad circumstances of family planning, training and knowledge in Canada, abortion may be the best alternative—but it is never a happy or good alternative. It must always be done with extreme reluctance, just as any other form of capital punishment is meted out with reluctance.

Abortion is death. Once a pregnancy occurs that is unwanted, there are no good alternatives open. One has to weight the degree or amount of dying that will occur in the mother's life if the pregnancy is allowed to continue against the death of the child. One must decide where there is the lesser degree of death or where the lesser degree of dying will occur. It is a tough, brutal decision, one which anyone who has not worked with young, pregnant, teenage girls will find it difficult to fully comprehend.

There are no good alternatives. Abortion is not a good alternative. It may be the lesser of two very bad ones. It is simply a question of death on both sides. Will the child die, or will the degree of dying that will take place in the mother's life outweigh that of the child? This very brutal decision must be made. It is perhaps the toughest decision our culture affords in any set of circumstances anywhere, always an unhappy and often a deadly decision. But it is a decision with which no individual should be faced.

The very consideration of abortion is an admission of failure—failure in family planning. It represents a failure of society to make fully available to our citizens, both the youthful and the more mature, the knowledge, the will and the means of preventing conception; and it represents—more serious yet—a failure to establish in our culture a social tone and a public attitude of respect and reverence for life which would bring an intense social pressure to bear on all, both youthful and more mature, to take advantage of the knowledge and the means now available to us to prevent most unwanted pregnancies.

If all else should fail I, for one, would prefer that we introduce a substance into the diets of our citizens which would render them sterile—I might point out to the House that the word is "sterile", not "impotent"; these are two very different concepts and they should not be confused—so that an antidote would have to be taken before a pregnancy could be initiated. Then even the most illiterate, the poorest, the most victimized or the most mentally retarded would have no need for abortions. Failure to take such basic action is accepting, it seems to me, a far more repulsive and primitive alternative. It is accepting a continuation of what I would describe as a modern-day "slaughter of the innocents". All the removal of the abortion provision from the Criminal Code would do would be to make this slaughter of the innocents legal.

I would therefore use all the influence a member of this House may have to appeal to hon. members, to the government and to the nation in general to reject this barbaric destruction of unwanted children and accept in its place some humane measures which would clean up this literally bloody mess and bring our social sexual tone into line with this century and the greater emphasis on human values which we all, surely, seek to enlarge within it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to say a few words on the motion brought forward by the New Democratic Party. Such a motion corroborates the fact that women have rights and prerogatives that should be considered.

Mr. Speaker, a woman wants her rights, her prerogatives and her needs as well as those of her family to be satisfied. It is a proposal of that kind that we must support, although we have to go a little further, as regards abortion.

I shall limit my remarks to the rights and prerogatives that are necessary to a woman to enable her, as well as her family, to live decently in a country that can provide all citizens with everything they need.

It concerns love and interest. Love and interest are the most powerful motives that drive men in their individual and social activities. Every individual lives by himself in his family and in society. Everywhere someone is doing something because he likes to do it, because it is profitable. Love stands on one side and interest on the other. Let us stop believing that they cannot go together.

It must be possible to reconcile love and interest. The government must assume responsibility in that respect. The 264 ministers and members elected by the Canadian citizens according to the Canada Elections Act, must see to it that justice prevails among the 21,000,600 Canadians in 1971, taking into account the production of goods and services.

Perhaps it is normal that, while wielding the ultimate power, the governments should, all things being equal, be inclined to favour their friends, their electors and the party members, to the prejudice of the love they owe to other citizens as part of Canada's population. Interest should not make us forget love.

Since we are talking about women, it is only fair to display a little love. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) feels any love for his relatives, his wife and the 21 million Canadians under his ultimate authority, in conjunction with the 23 ministers and other hon. members, he should cause all monetary, financial and political bodies to proceed to a fair distribution of goods and services between all Canadian citizens, according to their essential needs, before someone hoards too much of our tremendous production, after having spent what was necessary to live in plenty and even luxury.

This is what we want. We have to love and help each other—

We certainly do not want to be members of Parliament, or ministers, or to establish a new political party, or to set up a new government tonight. We just want this government to instill some social consciousness into the economical and political bodies of Canada. This is clear and simple and would permit all citizens to live. Women would be less demanding since most of them could stay home and take care of their children.

The economy should take into consideration the family, the individual. If there are revenues, expenditures and profits, each family and each institution should have its share. Buying power should be in proportion to population. Each individual has a right to live and therefore is entitled to buying power which enables him to live decently.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock, the debate is deemed to have been concluded in accordance with Standing Order 58 (11).

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—DEVELOPMENT OF U.S. MARKETS FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS—TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on December 10, two days after the Prime Minister's speech in Saint John, New Brunswick, I asked him to indicate what plans he and his government had made to facilitate the movement of goods from the Maritimes into what he described as the "great consumer market of the United States seaboard". In his Saint John speech, not so lurid as some of his recent utterances but nevertheless an interesting one, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to, in his words, "an unprecedented opportunity to take advantage of shifting trade patterns". In the same connection he referred to an opportunity for a much improved economic future in the Maritimes.

Increased trade with the eastern United States is not a recent aspiration of the people of the Maritime provinces. In the days before confederation a good deal of our prosperity was based upon commerce between our region, the New England states and adjoining parts of that great republic. Much of our economic depression and recession developed from the dislocation of our trade with this region, resultant from confederation. This is an old story but one which still means a great deal to Maritime people. Thus, when the Prime Minister painted his glowing picture of new trade movements to the south, he doubtless struck a responsive chord in his audience and rekindled the interest of our people.

My question to him then, and I repeat it now, concerns the efforts of the government of Canada to make possible an improvement in trade between the Maritimes and the eastern United States. In the first place, consideration would have to be given to easing tariff restraints. This is a matter which has been discussed for some time. When my hon. friend from Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming) was Premier of New Brunswick he made constant allusions to the need for taking note of our special trade problems in the Atlantic region. But apart from the tariff we must look at transportation opportunities. We can certainly produce choice products of sea and soil. We have, as the Prime Minister mentioned, a skilled labour force; we have the traditions of competent production. But we must have the facilities to move our goods quickly from production areas to markets.

I therefore asked the Prime Minister, and I ask again, what his government will do to allow Maritime goods to move quickly from the Maritimes to the new markets which he so glowingly described last December. Will he reverse his repudiation of the government's promise to build the Northumberland Causeway so that Island farmers and fishermen may get their produce quickly south? Will he make a big new effort to give major assistance to the corridor road? Will he and his government give the necessary impetus and the necessary wherewithal to get the Fundy tidal power project under way? This important undertaking would work wonders for the economy of the region—and certainly no one needs to prove that there is a market for power: in the northeast United States indeed there is a crying need for it, and the capacity to fill this need is existing in the Fundy.

Again, in the realm of transportation I ask what is being done to upgrade the airports, to assist in shipping subsidies, to move quickly on the provision of boats which could carry produce quickly and easily from our ports to ports in the south. These, I believe, are the kind of practical things which the government of Canada should do to bring into reality the very enchanting vision which the Prime Minister presented to the people of Saint John last December.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was moved by the eloquent words of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on behalf of the region of the country from which he comes. Before proceeding further I should like, on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to apologize for a reference by my colleague, as reported at page 2795 of Hansard for January 26, to the hon. member for Hillsborough not turning up for a debate which was scheduled. This was quite in error. There was a misunderstanding over the arrangement made that the debate would not take place at that time; the parliamentary secretary was not aware of that. While we may not agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough's politics, certainly he can never be faulted for being an eloquent and diligent member of the House, always in attendance not only when he is required but when he is not required. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs particularly asked me to express his apology at this time.

Regrettably, the only province or territory in this country that I have not visited is the province partially represented, though I think totally represented in heart, by the hon. member for Hillsborough. The question, as I understood it, was directed to the Northumberland Causeway, though he covered many more areas of particular interest in his discourse this evening. The question is a difficult one that has faced virtually every government since they "built" Prince Edward Island. I refer to putting something between it and the mainland. It has become a bit of a sad joke on the part of politicians, particularly at election time, to discuss the great prospect of such a causeway. This government, I submit, has never made any such promise. On the contrary, our promise was to look at things carefully and to see what is practical and economic.

I would not think for a moment that the hon. member for Hillsborough was suggesting that a project that all reasonable studies have considered uneconomic should be proceeded with. There might, of course, be some dispute about the findings of such studies. Nevertheless, in the judgment of this government, even though a great deal of money has been spent on the causeway engineering studies and on some preliminary work the economics of the project did not stand up to the reality of the situation.

This, of course, does not detract from the need for the adequate transportation that is required to make certain that the markets of the northeastern United States are properly reopened for trade with the Atlantic provinces. It always seems rather sad that there was a great trade at one stage of our national development, which has dwindled. I do not quite understand how this could be better handled with tariffs which would have to be of a selective or even discriminatory nature, but I look forward to exploring that question further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his time has expired.

RADIO-CANADA—ACTION RESPECTING ALLEGED SEPARATISTS AND TERRORISTS ON STAFF

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 I inquired of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) concerning certain remarks he is reported to have made before a meeting of the federal wing of the Liberal Party in Quebec which were strongly critical of the separatist element within the French network of the CBC, Radio-Canada. The minister did not have an opportunity to reply in the House, but outside the House he did comment on the issues I had raised at that time. I did not have an opportunity to comment, so I must carry it further in Parliament at this time. Outside the House the minister, in a Canadian Press report, is quoted as having said that the separatist sympathies of many Radio-Canada employees represent a democratic freedom of which he is proud. By contrast we have the following report of the meeting to which I have referred, at which the minister spoke:

> A group of angry Liberals charged last night that Radio-Canada, the French-language network of the CBC, is contributing more to unrest in Quebec than the terrorist FLQ.

The minister is reported as having said:

> Perhaps we'll have to put the axe into Radio-Canada some day when we feel the country's very existence is threatened.

The article continues:

> Mr. Chrétien urged delegates to draft a resolution calling on the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to look into Radio-Canada operations.

The report states, further:

> People who watch Radio-Canada are likely to know more about terrorism in Algeria and other places than about constructive happenings in their own country.

Then the minister is reported to have said:

> In my 2½ years in Ottawa I have been given only five minutes on the French-language network, to explain the wonderful things Canada is doing in the north for its native peoples.

Then we find this passage:

> [Mr. Danson.]
> Mr. Chrétien said he had been invited by Radio-Canada to "spend five minutes on TV to plug a hole between two half-hour separatist programs."
> About 100 strong, the group accused Mr. Pelletier of shirking his duties by allowing Radio-Canada "to systematically destroy the country."

Those are indeed strong statements coming from a minister of the Crown. It was because of this I thought it should be read in the high court of Parliament. I think this should be dealt with in a specific fashion because it represents a dangerous schizophrenia on the part of the government which is running in two directions at once. It is the schizophrenic attitude toward subversion in the mass media which has partly resulted in the situation which made necessary the suspension of civil liberties during the crisis in Quebec last October.

Over the past two years protests have been heard before the Committee on Broadcasting from many Quebec Members of Parliament who have raised the same problem. We had the difficulty in respect of the Company of Young Canadians which had become infiltrated by violent terrorist elements which destroyed the usefulness of that creative idea until today it is just a shadow of what it might have become. We have the Canada Council giving a grant to Stanley Gray who spoke not only in violent terms but—this is the important point, because it is not a matter of freedom of speech—led demonstrations in the streets of Montreal.

To all those protests the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) replied that it was not his intention to curtail these terrorist and violent activities with reference to the CYC and Dr. Stanley Gray's activities. Those matters, incidentally, have since sorted themselves out. But the Secretary of State also replied to the charges made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I quote as follows:

> Mr. Pelletier replied that direct government control of the CBC would be more dangerous than any separatist influence within the network and said the CRTC does adequate job of policing broadcasting.

That, I submit, is begging the question. Nobody wants direct government control of the CBC. What we do want is a consistent policy on the part of members on the treasury benches of this government that will prevent the schizophrenic tragedy which for a few weeks last October placed the existence of this nation in jeopardy.

The point I was trying to bring out in my question was that I trust that the resolution has gone forward to the CRTC which has assumed rather unusual powers of regulation and control on Canadian content, foreign influence and other marginal problems of that kind. Surely it can deal with the situation in such a way that the most powerful media of communication developed by man is used for positive purposes in helping to create national unity rather than for the destructive purposes of which it is capable, as has been demonstrated by the "Chicago Seven" and other terrorist elements in the United States.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I noted that in his question on March 2 he referred to the minister's reference to terrorists and separatists. I should like to correct that. I presume he now realizes that the information was inaccurate; that reference was made to separatists but never to terrorists. I do not think it has ever been denied that there are separatists—

Mr. Dinsdale: I quoted the word "terrorists" from the article.

Mr. Danson: The article was incorrect. I am sure the hon. member realizes that newspaper reports are not always completely accurate, and certainly the minister is not necessarily called upon to defend remarks made outside the House. Nevertheless, I am assured that the reference to terrorists was inaccurate.

The question of separatists is different, of course. Being a separatist is not illegal in this country today, nor is it illegal to be a Tory—and some people think it is quite bad. Some people think that being a Liberal is bad, also. So we have this freedom of political choice. Some espouse the separatist doctrine, which is that of a legal party in our system. I think it is generally acknowledged that a certain percentage of people are of this persuasion.

The important thing is whether the people involved in the mass media are using their position unduly—which is suggested by the hon. member—or whether they are doing their job capably and not using it as personal propaganda media. Perhaps that is really the nub of the question. Certainly it is a matter of balance; and the balance we always seek is to maintain the freedom of dissent and not to abuse it. It is a very difficult and sensitive balance and we have to make certain that we do not throw out the baby with the bathwater.

Mr. Dinsdale: Like the War Measures Act!

Mr. Danson: I need not apologize for the War Measures Act, and I do not think the people of Canada want an apology, because of the circumstances which brought it about.

Mr. Dinsdale: A stitch in time saves nine.

Mr. Danson: A stitch in time may save nine, but I am not quite sure how it relates here. Nevertheless, I think the hon. member has pointed out a problem—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

POLLUTION—CONTAMINATION OF WEST COAST OF VANCOUVER ISLAND BY OIL—RESPONSIBILITY FOR CLEANING UP BEACHES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the things I would like to say tonight would be much easier said if I had 40 minutes rather than seven. The question I want to deal with was first raised by myself on March 1 in these terms:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question on a matter of emergency which is causing widespread concern on the Pacific coast. Normally I would address it to the Minister of Transport but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Prime Minister. I may say I was in touch with the office of the Minister of Transport on Friday after news of this event reached Ottawa. Can the Prime Minister report to the House on the nature and extent of the mass of heavy oil moving on to the shore of Vancouver Island's west coast in the vicinity of our new national park, and can he advise what steps are being taken by the Department of Transport or any other agency to effect a clean-up?

The Prime Minister said he would draw the matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport because he had no information on it. On the following day, when the Minister of Transport was in the House, I referred to the question I had asked the Prime Minister and indicated that in a communication from the minister's office I had been advised, in addition to certain other information, that the cleaning of beaches was not within the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. This information was also transmitted to the MLA for Alberni who had wired the Minister of Transport from Victoria on the same subject. This led me to ask the Minister of Transport:

> Under what jurisdiction was the clean-up at Chedabucto Bay undertaken?

Mr. Speaker, who was in the chair at that time, felt that was not a proper question for the oral question period and suggested I might raise it at ten o'clock, which I am doing. I would like to refer the House of Commons Debates of February 20, 1970, page 3893, where the Minister of Transport, dealing with the matter at Chedabucto Bay, is reported as having said:

> On the question of what we are doing about it, I might advise the House that this morning I appointed Dr. P. D. McTaggart-Cowan to be the Department of Transport project manager with regard to the whole problem in the Chedabucto Bay area.

Elaborating on that statement on February 24, as recorded at page 4012 of Hansard, the minister said:

> —I have asked Dr. McTaggart-Cowan and his associates to have the pollution cleaned up by the start of the major fishing season in the area about May 1st. They have undertaken to do so to the very best of their ability. In their effort they will have the full support of all government and many private Canadian and international agencies.

He went on to explain that Dr. McTaggart-Cowan was meeting that day with the Premier of Nova Scotia. I submit that by that statement the minister clearly indicated that the Department of Transport was accepting responsibility and recognized jurisdiction in respect of the situation at Chedabucto Bay. More recently, in the debate on the report stage of Bill C-2 the Minister of Transport on March 1, as recorded at page 3835 of Hansard, said:

> It is perfectly clear that in terms of the sections with regard to pollution matters and the like, the expertise and the capability repose in the Department of Transport. It is also evident, I think, from events of the past year or so—

I might interject that this was an obvious reference to the situation at Chedabucto Bay.

> —that we have quite the best capability that exists at the present time for dealing with pollution incidents of this kind. I would not want to argue that our capability is by any means 100 per cent ... there is a great deal more to be learned about this subject.

Further on he said:

> One or two other illustrations may help to reinforce my contention. For example, it is clear that the coastguard will have to play a major role in terms of carrying out these responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, in the immediate area of this onslaught of oil onto the glorious beaches of Vancouver Island there exist two installations of the Canadian Coastguard, in the form of a lifeboat station at Tofino and one farther down the coast at Bamfield. I submit that in light of action previously taken by the department, the minister's recent emphasis on facilities and expertise within his ministry and the role of the coastguard in the circumstances I have been describing, the minister must recognize responsibility in this area.

Some rather graphic pictures reached me in the mail today. I suggest that this kind of thing should not be left completely, as appears to have been the situation in this case, to high school children in the area. I give them full credit. These pictures show how hard they worked in cleaning up this heavy mass of gobs of oil from the beach.

This fact should be underlined by the recommendation contained in the report of the task force, volume I, at page 9, which states among other things:

> We recommend that the Minister of Transport have the responsibility for dealing with pollution arising from oil spilled in water when the extent and nature of the spill makes it a federal responsibility.

This is what my question is all about. I wanted to know the nature and extent of this pollution, what coordinating role the government has been playing and the element of expertise the Department of Transport has brought to bear on this problem.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). I know of his keen interest in pollution problems, whether they be of a specific nature—as in the case of the small slick that came ashore near Tofino—or in a general way, and I recall his amendments to the recent government bill relating to the Canada Shipping Act. The hon. member has made his views known many times in this House and before the standing committee on transport. I hope I can clarify some of the questions tonight in the limited time that is available.

Only in recent years has the Canadian public become fully aware of the disastrous effect on the coastal environment when oil in considerable quantities comes ashore. The unfortunate Arrow accident has dramatized this fact. It also dramatized the tremendous expense in funds and manpower to effect a proper clean-up of properties and land. In the specific case of the oil traces which came ashore in the area known as Chesterman Beach, near Tofino, the amount involved was very small. The origin of the oil is unknown. It could have come from any number of ships using the Pacific waters or, indeed, even from a shore installation or other sources. The clean-up was undertaken by a group of school students who completed the job in a very short time.

As a straight matter of responsibility to act in such circumstances, there is no hard and fast rule. Canada has thousands of miles of coastline and it would be impossible, even if it were deemed desirable, to assume responsibility for every trace of oil that came ashore. As in the case at Tofino, where the incident cannot be said to be beyond the resources of local authorities or private interests, it is customary and it has been the practice for clean-up to be undertaken at the local level. In the case of Chedabucto Bay, which was referred to, the federal government assumed responsibility to deal with this incident, and it would no doubt do so again in a case of such catastrophic proportions.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE ON WHITE PAPER ON TAX REFORM AS BASIS FOR LEGISLATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 17(2) I gave you notice of my request to raise a question of privilege at the opening of today's proceedings arising out of a statement attributed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) at a meeting last night of the Kingston Junior Chamber of Commerce. The minister is reported to have said:

—and I've been asked by people "when are you going to legislate the white paper on taxation" and the simple answer to that is never.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Apparently there was loud cheering and clapping at that meeting. My question of privilege is that the minister has made a statement of policy of the greatest importance outside the House, which is not subject to direct comment, on a matter on which he has rejected giving forthright answers in the House and, because of the equivocal nature of the statement, has created further confusion and doubt in the House and in the country on the subject of proposed tax reform.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

That a transcript of all of the remarks of the Minister of Finance to the Kingston Junior Chamber of Commerce on Tuesday, March 9, 1971, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that the Minister of Finance be invited to appear before the said committee to explain his remarks concerning the implementation or rejection of the white paper on tax changes, and to indicate clearly both the timing and the method to be used for any tax changes so as to remove the doubt and confusion now existing in Canada about the government's tax policy, which contribute in large measure to the present economic recession in the country.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has given notice to the Chair of his intention to rise on a question of privilege in the sense that he has just indicated.

The hon. member knows that the Chair must determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. After having considered the situation as carefully as possible, I must conclude that the circumstances are not such that the Chair could ask the House to consider the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Hon. members know that on many occasions in the past it has been suggested that it was tantamount to a breach of the privileges of the House when a ministerial statement of policy is made outside the House. I suggest to hon. members that this is a practice which has been adopted over a long period of years. Although hon. members may feel that this gives rise to a grievance, and thus some hon. members might be dissatisfied with such procedure and they may want to suggest that such statements should more properly be made in the House rather than outside. With respect, I suggest to the hon. member for Edmonton West that it cannot be judged that there is a prima facie case of privilege. In the circumstances I cannot put to the House the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1970-71

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES—RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps at this point I might refer to the motion offered by the President of the Privy Council on Monday and indicate the conclusion I have reached after giving the matter much thought.

On Monday last, when the President of the Privy Council offered a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 59 to send supplementary estimates to certain standing committees, the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre raised a point of order regarding the propriety or, if one wishes, the legality of considering supplementary estimates which are in effect amendments to existing statutes. The hon. member for Edmonton West argued along the same lines. In support of the motion, the President of the Treasury Board claimed that his proposal was amply supported by precedents. He referred to certain guidelines which he suggested should be looked at by the government when proposing such items and that the proposals were entirely within those guidelines.

The minister is right, of course, when he suggests that the introduction and passage of statutory items in supplementary estimates is not an innovation in this House. This is a practice which goes back many years. At the same time, it has never been accepted readily by the House. Our debates record many instances when members have taken exception to the practice. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself is not a neophyte in this regard. For example, on March 31, 1952—if he does not mind my going back so far—as reported at page 969 of Hansard of that day he voiced strong objection to an item in the estimates which, he contended, would circumvent section 3 of the Atomic Energy Control Act. Another example of such objection is a statement by the then hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, who stated in part as follows:

> You have statutes; you may repeal them; you may amend them; but you cannot do it by supply bills.

Another random selection was picked from page 3,368 of Hansard for March 27, 1961, where the then hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River went on record to oppose this practice and called as his witness the then absent hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Again, on April 1, 1964, as reported at page 1,680 of Hansard, a similar discussion arose.

There are countless other instances which indicate that statutory dollar items have been used in the past but that this practice has not gone unchallenged.

In the situation now before us, the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Edmonton West have distinguished so-called statutory items from those which merely propose a transfer of funds. The members take exception to both types of one-dollar items, but the thrust of their objection is against specific items which they suggest are clearly legislative in intent.

In support of their argument the hon. members suggest that the procedural situation has been radically changed by the adoption of the new rules in December of 1968. They urge that in view of the new supply procedures introduced by these rules, statutory dollar items should not be included in supplementary estimates. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre contends that past practice should not be used as a guide in relation to the present machinery for the consideration of estimates. He suggests that when the House eliminated the committee of supply a new situation was created because it was in committee of supply that formal objection had been taken in the past to these one-dollar statutory items.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Those members suggest that there is now no real opportunity for the consideration of such items by the House itself. That, of course, is not entirely correct since the new Standing Orders do provide for such an opportunity, albeit restricted, under the terms of Standing Order 58. Clearly the Standing Orders do provide the machinery for the consideration by the House itself of specific items in the estimates to which the opposition might take exception. However, this opportunity is undoubtedly limited and depends very much on the number of allotted supply days which might still be available by virtue of Standing Order 58. In other words, under the old rules there was unlimited time to consider supplementary estimates, including items intended to amend statutes. Under the new rules there may be only a limited time to consider supplementary estimates.

Is the difference between the two situations so substantial that the past practice of allowing statutory dollar items in the supplementary estimates should now be disallowed? Should the very limited time allotted by Standing Order 58 be restricted to the consideration of what is strictly supply? There is much to be said to support an affirmative answer to these questions.

The argument proposed by the hon. members for Edmonton West and Winnipeg North Centre is cogent. They contend that any rulings that may have been made in the past about dollar items prior to the changes of the rules do not now apply. They suggest that the rules changes were effected to remove the consideration of detailed estimates from the floor of the House but that no decision was ever made that a motion which is tantamount to a legislative enactment should be removed from the floor of the House. They urge that the items which have a legislative effect should not be allowed to be proceeded with by way of items in the supplementary estimates but should be introduced in the usual way, as is done for all other legislation, by way of a bill.

Let us, if you will, examine the items singled out by the hon. members. The first one is vote 35c. It proposes to amend the Pension Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. The vote proposes to repeal schedules A and B of the Pension Act and substitute therefor new schedules A and B as found in vote 35c. At the same time, it seeks to amend section 38(2) and section 38(4) of the Pension Act. Second, vote 35c proposes to repeal the existing schedules in the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and substitute a schedule set out under the vote, in effect amending two sections of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Schedules A and B of the Pension Act were previously amended by statute, other than an Appropriation Act, in the years 1953-54, 1957-58, 1960-61. Schedule B was amended in 1966-67. None of these amendments was enacted by way of an appropriation measure. Item 10c, affecting the War Veterans Allowance Act, purports to repeal Schedule A of that act and substitute a new Schedule A in this vote. It refers to Schedule A of the War Veterans Allowance Act which was amended in 1957-58, 1960-61 and in 1965 by statutes other than an Appropriation Act. In other words, this is the first instance where amendments to the Acts in question are proposed by way of statutory dollar items in the supplementary estimates rather than by the normal process of separate legislation.

These three items in votes 35C and 10C are clearly and unquestionably legislative in intent. There can be no suggestion that there is an attempt to dissimulate the purpose. This is clearly identified by the language of the items themselves.

The fourth item dealing with the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act is not as clear to me. I have spent considerable time attempting to ascertain the exact purpose of the item, and although there is strong evidence that the item might well be procedurally defective on the same basis as the items dealing with veterans legislation, the very complexity of the matter which has been alluded to by the hon. member for Edmonton West leads me to give the minister the benefit of the doubt in respect of item 7c. However, in relation to items 35c and 10c I must come to the inevitable conclusion that, in view of the situation created by the new rules, these items are not before the House in proper form.

It should be stressed that we are dealing now with an entirely new situation and with an entirely new set of circumstances. If it could be said that since the adoption of the amended Standing Orders in 1968 the House had already accepted as part of a continuing practice the consideration of dollar items intended to amend statutes, then the argument might be made that the procedure proposed in respect of these specific items conforms with a new practice and is supported by precedent. But that is not the case.

Since the adoption of the new rules, it seems there has been only one item with direct and specific legislative import that has been included in supplementary estimates. This particular item, included in the estimates for the year 1970-71, was allowed to go unchallenged and no point of order was raised in respect thereto. Thus, no practice has yet been established except perhaps that particular items proposing to amend directly and specifically a statute, have not been included in supplementary estimates since the rules were changed in 1968 but for the lone exception just mentioned. The House therefore has not had the opportunity at this point to reaffirm the proposition that such proposals, when they are clearly intended to amend existing legislation, should come to the House by way of an amending bill rather than as an item in the supplementary estimates.

I am not unaware of the possible delay in the adoption of the veterans legislation covered by items 35c and 10c by having the proposed amendments introduced by way of a bill. However, there is a long established practice in the House that veterans legislation is dealt with expeditiously on a non-partisan basis and it may well be that the House Leaders will want to agree to a timetable which will prevent any delay in the adoption of such important measures. I would therefore suggest to the President of the Privy Council that his motion, amended to take into account this ruling, would be put in the following terms:

That the Supplementary Estimates (C) tabled in the House on March 4, 1971, with the exception of those items relating to Veterans Affairs, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and that Veterans Affairs items 15c, 40c, 45c and 50c be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

I make this suggestion at this time to the President of the Privy Council. I hope he will find it possible to allow the Chair to put the motion in the terms I have just suggested.

Mr. MacEachen: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

OIL

NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION POLICY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to make a motion under Standing Order 43 under the following circumstances. Recently, two members of the government have made major speeches and statements with regard to the question of the development of oil pipelines in Canada, the northern part of Canada in particular, which convey entirely opposite points of view. In order to set at rest the uncertainty and concern which these opposing statements have created and to find out what policy, if any, the government has, I ask leave to make the following motion:

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be asked to appear together at the earliest possible date before a joint meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 the unanimous consent of the House is required before it can be put. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and the motion cannot be presented.

Fisheries

FISHERIES

OPERATION OF FOREIGN SHIPS WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask leave of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43. I do so for the following reasons. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for my motion to be considered because of the repeated violations of Canadian territorial waters by foreign ships operating off Newfoundland and especially because of the difficulty in enforcing the 12-mile limit which has recently been proclaimed by the government of Canada. I feel that these foreign vessels, operating at will, are flouting Canadian regulations. Among other things, the situation requires, in my view, a sustained military presence in Newfoundland not only to protect Canadian sovereignty in this regard but to protect the rights of Canadian fishermen. I would therefore ask unanimous consent to move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the House refer the question of naval and air surveillance of foreign fishing vessels operating in zones adjacent to the Canadian coast to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

That the committee explore the question of repeated intrusions into Canadian territorial waters by foreign trawlers and draggers and that the committee further explore possible methods of detecting and preventing such intrusions by the use of air and naval components of the Canadian Armed Forces.

That the committee give consideration to the possible stationing of operational maritime command aircraft in Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this motion will receive the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members know that the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

1. KLM, Lufthansa and Alitalia, and other air carriers (except BOAC) operating trans-Atlantic scheduled air services are not authorized to exercise traffic rights at Toronto in the operations of their scheduled air services.

Bilateral air agreements between Canadian and European countries do not provide for landing rights at Toronto for their designated air carriers. BOAC exercises traffic rights at Toronto because the Canada-UK bilateral air agreement provides for such rights.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE ON WHITE PAPER ON REFORM AS BASIS FOR LEGISLATION—NEW PROPOSALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who I am happy to see has not disappeared as his white paper has. Now that the minister has announced the scrapping of the white paper on tax reform as a basis for tax legislation, to the hooting and cheering of a large crowd, is he going to make a statement at an early date as to the contents of a new tax reform package?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, over a hundred times at least, I would think, during the last year, including many times in the House, I have indicated that we produced a white paper on tax reform, a discussion document.

Mr. Baldwin: You mean a monster.

Mr. Benson: I tried to persuade my hon. friends that this is what we produced, that we would listen to submissions. We have received a great many useful submissions from across the country, from business institutions and from the provinces. We had reports from the Senate and House of Commons committees. The only quarter from which we have not had useful suggestions is from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: Now my hon. friend has been running around the country shooting at windmills.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister was simply looking for applause. I should like to ask the minister, now that he has stated that the white paper will not be the basis for his tax proposals, whether the tax measures that will be put forward will be as comprehensive in scope as those in the white paper, or may we expect tax legislation that is much narrower in scope?

Mr. Benson: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I did not say what my friend indicated at all. I would be glad to send him a transcript of what I did say. I have also been sending him copies of my speeches over past years, which I trust he has read. I indicated following my statement last night that we would have comprehensive tax reform and that it would be introduced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Finance has made his white paper disappear, does he intend to follow it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—ASSESSMENT OF VIEWS OF PEOPLE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the unrepresentative nature of the submissions that were made to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs regarding the white paper, most of them having come from business and organized industry, can the minister say to what extent he has assessed the views of ordinary people in Canada in terms of reaching a decision on the white paper?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the past 18 months or so I have spoken to a great many ordinary people in Canada, unlike the Leader of the Opposition. I am also taking into consideration their views, not just the interests of Bay Street as represented by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I say it is music to the gambler's ears to hear the suckers roar. I address my supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement last night by the Minister of Finance that he does not intend to introduce his white paper on tax reform as legislation, may we expect in the future that the government will accept the opposition's views and suggestions in other important fields as well?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, now that we also have the St. James Street view as well as the Bay Street view, I would simply like to say that in this whole exercise—

Mr. Hees: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a point of order. The House is in a very cheerful mood today, but perhaps we should be allowed to go on to another subject in a moment after we have heard the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that my supplementary question was addressed to the Prime Minister, and I am not aware that the Minister of Finance has assumed that portfolio yet.

Mr. Bell: We want Gordon back.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—STATEMENT RESPECTING PROVISION OF RIGHT OF WAY—DEVELOPMENT BY FOREIGN CAPITAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the speech made yesterday by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Dallas, Texas. In his speech the minister stated that if it was desirable to build a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay through Canada to the United States the right of way through Canada would be made available. In view of the fact that twice within the last few weeks ministers of the Crown have offered this route, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government is now indicating its willingness to provide a right of way through Canada despite the fact that, according to the minister's own statement in the House, studies of the ecological effects of such a route have not yet been completed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Monsieur le Président—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members know the rule about statements made outside the House. The hon. member quite properly asked the question of the Prime Minister, and perhaps in the first instance, at least, a reply might be made by the Prime Minister. If questions are asked directly about the matter, these could be addressed to the minister thereafter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the benefit of reading the speech which the minister made—

Mr. Hees: Take my advice; don't bother.

Mr. Trudeau: —and I would hesitate to comment on it on the basis of the no doubt very brief, if not distorted, summary by the leader of the New Democratic Party. Therefore I cannot comment on the speech. That is why I suggest that perhaps the minister might be given the opportunity of saying that what he was quoted as having said was not so.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, and this is no more distorted than my previous statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: It was an actual quotation from a transcript of the minister's speech which I have in my hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I should like to ask the Prime Minister about the second invitation which was extended by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to United States oil companies to come into Canada and develop the Canadian north.

An hon. Member: And take over the country.

Mr. Douglas: Was the minister stating government policy, and is it the intention of the government to invite foreign capital to develop the Canadian north before the white paper on foreign ownership has been completed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it has always been the position of this government that a certain amount of foreign capital was needed to develop this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I know of no provincial government, not even the government of Manitoba, which takes a contrary position. As far as our general policies concerning foreign investment are concerned, of course we will make them known in due course. I do not think this is reason to suggest now that all foreign investment in Canada must be delayed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECOLOGICAL STUDIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Who is making the ecological study in the north in respect of the proposed oil pipeline which would be a hot line and a possible threat because of the permafrost? Is this study being made by his department or are any United States oil companies or the American government involved? Will this information be submitted to the National Energy Board before any decision is made by that body?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had taken the trouble to read my statement of last week, he would have noted that I said that my department and others were studying this question. In my speech yesterday, in Denver, I told the Americans that they would be welcome to invest in Canada, and that if they built a pipeline, they would have to follow the directives that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had conveyed to the House and that I repeated last August.

[English]

MACKENZIE VALLEY—POLICY RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF GAS PIPELINE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development if his department or the government is now making a definite distinction between a gas pipeline and an oil pipeline, as implied in his speech? If this is the case, is the construction of a gas pipeline definitely government policy now?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I said in my speech that the government anticipated less trouble with a gas pipeline than with an oil pipeline. Of course, the building of a gas pipeline could be carried out faster. However, we are considering both prospects simultaneously.

[English]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, has the minister or his department received a definite proposal in respect of a gas or oil pipeline for approval or rejection?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker, neither the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources nor myself have so far received any formal proposal from the industry.

USE OF FOREIGN CAPITAL TO DEVELOP NORTHERN RESOURCES—CLAUSE IN BILL C-187

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of his invitation to participate, extended to foreign investment capital, in the development of oil, gas and other mineral resources in the north, is it now the government's expressed intention to remove the foreign ownership clause from Bill C-187 respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is the privilege of a Liberal to be called a socialist by a Conservative, and a Conservative by a socialist.

[English]

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—EFFECT ON WILDLIFE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Apparently his wildlife officials have not yet completed their study of ecological problems. Have they indicated that in principle it is possible to build pipelines without disturbing the wildlife in that area of the north?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that all questions concerning the construction of pipelines in the North are now under study, and that research has been conducted for more than two years in this field. We have much more information at this time than we had two years ago, including information concerning wildlife, but we are not yet in a position to make a final decision on this matter.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DEPARTMENTAL STUDIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask a supplementary question. The minister suggests that various departments are studying this matter. Will he at this time, or perhaps later on motions, make a statement indicating the evidence on which he bases his recommendations or his opinion of that evidence? Would he give us some indication of the type of personnel who provided the evidence on which he bases his opinion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have been considering this problem for some time and, last August, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I set up the first category of restrictions on construction and we said repeatedly that final instructions would be issued, we hoped, in the course of the coming months.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon in just a moment. There are four or five members who are seeking the floor to ask supplementary questions on this matter. I suggest to hon. members there will have to be a limit to supplementary questions if we want to get on to another subject. Hon. members representing the group to my extreme left in the House have not had a chance to ask a question. We should move on to another subject as soon as possible. There are other members who I am informed have questions to ask during the question period.

USE OF FOREIGN CAPITAL TO DEVELOP NORTHERN RESOURCES—CLAUSE IN BILL C-187

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister must have misunderstood my previous question; it had no reference to his political alignment. My question was in relation to his remarks in Dallas inviting foreign investment capital to participate in the development of our northern resources. Is it now the intention of the government to withdraw the foreign ownership clause from Bill C-187?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in my speech I said we were looking forward to foreign investment in Canada, but in compliance with regulations enacted here.

The bill referred to by my hon. friend contains the same restrictions as in the case of investment in the Northwest Territories and I cannot figure out why they would not apply to the Yukon to the same extent as they do to any other area in the Territories.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—STUDY OF ECOLOGICAL EFFECTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister as it involves many departments. I refer to what the Acting Prime Minister said two days ago, and I quote from page 4040 of Hansard for March 8:

> At present, departments are studying very thoroughly the ecological threat that might occur as a consequence of pipelines running through Canada.

Would the government therefore state its position on the ecological aspect of this whole question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position is that these aspects are being considered and studied very thoroughly by two, and perhaps three, departments. We cannot give the results until they are known. In addition to the two previously mentioned departments, the future department of the environment will be concerned in this matter and is already involved through the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. This is the government's position. It is very straightforward.

HEALTH

ALLEGED RECRUITING OF MEDICAL DOCTORS OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he tell us whether the government intends to recruit doctors outside Canada? If so, is this attributable to a shortage of professors or to the small number of medical students?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): It would not be accurate to say that the department has a program of bringing doctors, or any particular class of people, to Canada. Of course, doctors are among those who seek admission to Canada and who are admitted in significant numbers over a period of years. This has been welcomed by many people, including the medical profession in this country, and one presumes that this kind of inflow will continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister say if there have been pressures by officials of the Department of Immigration in foreign countries to get doctors to come and settle in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I know of no pressures whatever on us in this regard. It is a matter of our immigration policy. Doctors, because of the nature of their training and educational qualifications, do obtain points in our system under the regulations and, accordingly, if they are eligible to practice in this country are certainly apt to be admitted fairly readily. But I know of no other features in this situation.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I want to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Is the minister ready to state that no extraordinary or special measure has been taken abroad, outside current administration, in order to get doctors to come and practise in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Lang: It depends, I suppose, on what is called an ordinary or extraordinary measure. Over a period of time the department did indicate until some months ago particular occupations or professions where there seemed to be a shortage or demand in Canada, and did this in the form of advertisements. Certainly in the case of doctors advertisements of this sort were run in some countries as part of our regular policy in relation to occupations in short supply. I know of no additional special measures.

POST OFFICE

REFUSAL TO PERMIT USE OF WORDS, "THE HOME OF RAPE AND HONEY", AS CANCELLATION STAMP

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question dealing with a less serious matter to the Postmaster General. I wish to ask him whether, when he made the ruling that the town and area of Tisdale should not be able to have a cancellation stamp put on postage that reads "Tisdale, the home of rape and honey", he was aware of the fact that both of these products were mentioned in the diversification suggestions of the Minister of Agriculture and the minister who reports for the Wheat Board? Why does he deny that portion of Saskatchewan, indeed the whole province which has an international reputation for the production of these two products, the use of these words on the postage?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister Without Portfolio): I am lost, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the most intelligent answer that this government has given, and I congratulate the minister. I now ask him whether he will find out the facts. Not knowing of the situation at all, which has been dealt with at length across this country, both on national television and in the newspapers, will he look into it now and reverse the asinine decision that was made?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): What I will do, Mr. Speaker, is to read the question in Hansard tomorrow and try to give another intelligent answer.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of this question. I shall inquire about it and be happy to give the hon. member an answer tomorrow or Friday.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that students are involved in this program and there is a shortage of summer employment for students, would the minister, while he is looking into the matter, consider stepping up the program of animation?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT BILL NOT BE PROCEEDED WITH UNTIL MEASURE CONCERNING PHASING OUT OF FISHERMEN INTRODUCED

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising out of the fact that earlier today we gave first reading to a bill having to do with the Unemployment Insurance Act. I direct my question either to the Minister of Labour or to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, whichever minister wants to reply. Can we have an assurance, in view of the announced intention of the government to phase out fishermen from coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act, that the details of that proposal, either in the form of a bill or whatever is appropriate, will be placed before the House before we give consideration to the second reading of the bill respecting the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Certainly before changes are made a bill will be submitted to the House for consideration by Parliament.

Mr. Barnett: I wish to direct my supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as House leader. Would the House leader on the government side undertake to schedule the business of the House so that information with respect to what is being proposed to replace unemployment insurance for fishermen will be placed before us for consideration in order that we may intelligently understand what approach we should take with respect to the proposed new Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): When I have a bill I will be glad to schedule it in the best way possible.

FINANCE

STABILIZATION OF DOLLAR TO KEEP EXPORTS COMPETITIVE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the rise of the Canadian dollar to near parity with and above the United States dollar, which with the inflationary factor of 3 per cent last year makes the price of our exports to our customers about 10 per cent higher than a year ago, has the government any plans to stabilize the dollar at a price that will allow our exports to remain competitive?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend will look, he will find that inflation in our main exporting market, the United States, was almost double that in Canada. With respect to the Canadian dollar, it is continuing very strong.

BROADCASTING

FAILURE OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN BUSHNELL BROADCASTING AND MARCONI COMPANY—GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): My question is directed to the Secretary of State or to his parliamentary secretary. Following the unfortunate difficulties between Bushnell Broadcasting and the Marconi Company, and because of the approaching deadline for negotiations, would the minister consult with the interested parties and determine if some government intervention might assist in resolving the impasse and thereby favour Canadian ownership as well as the public purse?

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): If I am not mistaken, Bushnell's option has expired, so I am not sure what sort of intervention the hon. member is considering. However, I might meet him afterward and hear what suggestions he may have.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN UNREST—EVACUATION OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for either the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister. In light of the reports that various countries are making arrangements to evacuate their nationals from East Pakistan in view of the internal problems there, what steps, if any, has Canada taken in this regard?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the High Commissioner for Canada in Pakistan is presently in Dacca and, according to our latest information, there is no question yet that the Canadians who are now in the eastern part of Pakistan leave the area. At any rate, if the situation were ever to deteriorate to the point where they should leave, discussions are already under way with the British authorities so that their removal can be carried out as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. Muir: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his reply. Am I to take it that there are no Canadians in any danger at the moment in East Pakistan?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; they would not yet be in danger.

OIL

EFFECT ON EASTERN CANADA OF VENEZUELAN PRICE INCREASE—EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO MONTREAL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the increased taxes imposed on foreign oil companies operating in Venezuela, the heavy reliance of eastern Canada on that oil and the almost certain increase in oil prices in eastern Canada, is the government re-evaluating the national oil policy with a view to supplying eastern Canada with Canadian oil by a pipeline?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, these questions are under continuing review. The price structure on the eastern seaboard is not yet firm, in that the Libyan negotiations are still not completed. Certainly the Venezuelan determination will lead to higher cost, but there is no new policy because the facts are not yet clear and determined. When the price structure is made clear, a further comprehensive review will be made.

Mr. Orlikow: I would like to ask the minister whether his department or the government will make their own study of the economics of a new pipeline, rather than leaving it to the oil companies or to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, both my department and the National Energy Board have a great deal of economic information in regard to the viability of a pipeline, and the question is continually under review. I still feel very sure that under our present system, if a pipeline were economic the private sector would make application to build it. But certainly we undertake independent studies as between ourselves and the National Energy Board.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister says "the private sector", is he referring to Interprovincial Pipe Line Company which now has a pipeline to eastern Canada, or would the government consider an application from any other group? Also, would the government insist that Interprovincial Pipe Line allow such a group to tie into its system in order to take oil to the Montreal area?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I have every reason to believe that the government and the National Energy Board would entertain an application from any entrepreneur or company that wished to build such a line. If it involved tying into the Interprovincial Pipe Line system, we would have to consider that proposition when the application was made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the hon. member for Calgary North a supplementary, but again I seek the co-operation of hon. members.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether, when he talks about the private sector, he is talking about the same corporate bodies that are the producers of crude petroleum in western Canada and in the north and also import crude petroleum into Canada.

Mr. Greene: Under our system the pipelines, of course, have investment from the producing sector and from its integrated companies, but they do operate as independent entities.

GRAIN

STUDY OF HANDLING AND TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the president of the Canadian Transport Commission stated in committee that the grain handling system is largely obsolete and needs tremendous improvement, could the minister inform the House whether or not a study is being done and, if so, when will it be completed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has been a well-known fact that studies have been under way in regard to the handling and transportation system for quite some time. Good progress is being made and it should not be very long before these studies are the basis for discussion, first with the co-operatives and other companies concerned and then with the public generally along the lines of the statement made at the time of the announcement of the studies.

ALLEGED LACK OF STOCKS AT VANCOUVER TO LOAD SHIPS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the backlog of ships in Vancouver and the fact that the grain on hand and in store in Vancouver is taking up less than 40 per cent of the capacity of the terminals there, what action is being taken to speed up grain movement and ensure sufficient stocks to fill the ships presently at Vancouver or en route?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, action has been taken consistently in order to deal with this problem as effectively as possible. I seem to have figures that are different from those used by the hon. member. I am told that the amount of grain in store is 15,113,000 bushels, that the number of ships waiting at noon today was seven, which have passed inspection, and this, of course, is a decrease from the figure earlier.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain whether they are meeting at the present time, but we are in communication with respect to a possible review of at least portions of the Minas Bay study. Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the sale is still being negotiated. I have already indicated to the House, in reply to an earlier question, that the interests of the labour force will be taken care of in the negotiations.

Mr. Nesbitt: As soon as the negotiations are completed, will the minister tell the House the exact terms and conditions and in what way the labour force will be protected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we did have discussions with a number of organizations, including members of those mentioned by the hon. member, about suitable appointments prior to their being made.

Mr. Gleave: Did the minister ask the Canadian Federation of Agriculture or the National Farmers Union to submit to him names of persons who would be suitable for appointment to the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, they did this themselves in advance of any request having been made to them.

MANPOWER

ESTABLISHMENT OF CIVILIAN SERVICE CORPS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

To enlighten the House, on March 3 I asked the Acting Prime Minister if the government intended to establish a civil service—a resolution to this effect having been agreed to at the Liberal convention recently—for students. The minister then replied: "The government will be bringing its plans before the House". However, after the oral question period, the minister is reported to have said to newspapermen that he had misunderstood my question and that was why he had given this answer. I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if the government will establish this civil service since the resolution was passed at the last Liberal convention.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is possible that I, too, misunderstood the question, which to me seemed rather complex, and I would not want to mislead the hon. member. If this is the matter of summer employment for students, generally, I repeat what has already been said in this House, that is, that in a very short while a series of announcements shall be made concerning this. To get acquainted with the details, the House will obviously have to wait for the government to make them.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that we have already reached the end of the oral question period. We might perhaps allow him to put his supplementary question tomorrow, at the very beginning of the question period.

POLICIES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE WHO ARE NOT STUDENTS

In view of the fact that the Secretary of State is now consulting the provinces regarding summer employment for students, can the Prime Minister assure the House that the government is also formulating employment policies for young people who are not students but who are unemployed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government is in the process of formulating such policies. The reason consultation with the provinces is taking place is that some of our policies would perhaps indirectly concern the educational function, which is under provincial jurisdiction. For that reason we want to be sure that the provinces have been duly consulted before announcing anything.

QUEBEC POSITION ON NEW BILL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the government having introduced a bill on unemployment insurance, and in light of the opposition that has come from individuals and in particular the province of Quebec, which seems to believe that this bill is moving into the welfare field, can the minister state whether all difficulties which have arisen with respect to all provinces and in particular the province of Quebec, have now been resolved?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): That would be my interpretation, Mr. Speaker. I think the consultation with the province of Quebec, which has been going on for several months, has resulted in a better bill. I have no objection to the dialogue which I and members of my department entered into with the provinces if the end result is a better piece of legislation. In the final analysis we are interested in the well-being of people.

Mr. Alexander: If I may have Your Honour's indulgence I should like to ask a supplementary question. I have not seen the bill, but I am wondering whether the minister has made any change in his extension of interruption of earnings due to sickness and pregnancy. Has this area been discussed, and is it one in which changes have been made?

Mr. Mackasey: I do not want to get into a debate, Mr. Speaker. To be precise would require considerable time. I would simply say that unemployment insurance benefits will be provided for people who are temporarily unemployed as a result of sickness or maternity. I think the bill as drafted is acceptable to all provinces.

I shall return to the hon. member for Wellington in a moment.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I believe that neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister have understood my question.

I would like to come back to the resolution passed at the last Liberal convention concerning the establishment of a civil service for students next year. That is in the interest of all young Canadians and I trust that the Prime Minister can inform the House whether the government is in favour of such a resolution or not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette will admit that this is not a case for a question of privilege.

Moreover, the hon. member has put his question for the third time, I believe, and the Prime Minister should perhaps take this opportunity to answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his patience. I have well understood his question this time. It refers to a resolution passed at the convention of the Quebec Liberal party and I am told that some members of the party are considering its various aspects. However, it has not yet been examined by the government.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, through you may I ask for consent of the House to return to routine proceedings? I apologize for not having heard Your Honour call for reports of standing and special committees.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS ACT

PROVISION FOR EXAMINATION, PUBLICATION AND SCRUTINY

The House resumed, from Monday, March 8, consideration of Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the events of the last hour have again indicated that the bill under consideration emphasizes the arrogance, the insolence and the contempt for Parliament which is more and more characterizing this government. When the white paper was first referred to, I said on the following day that it was a hoax, a delusion, a deception and that the government would never dare bring it in. That hoax has continued for one year. The government, which is afraid to face facts, decided that it would pretend to be securing the views of the Canadian people. That white paper is a condemnation—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What bill is this?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is only a praeceptor primus; he was not the founder of it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I was wondering what bill you were speaking of.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not bringing the minister into it at all, Mr. Speaker. He is a member of the cabinet; but after the experience we had again today we know that one member of the cabinet does not know what another is doing; the right hand does not know what the left hand intends to do. Today's example again emphasizes that this government does not conform to constitutional procedure. What it does is deceive the people, and when it finds itself in difficulties it runs for cover. It was a sorry sight today to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), denuded of all responsibility, finally having to admit by inference that he had to back down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: He turned tail and ran.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is an example of what is being done in certain portions of the bill before the House. We are dealing with clause 26 and with a further clause which Your Honour allowed to be discussed because of their similar nature. What is being done is glossed over simply as an endeavour to bring order out of chaos, to bring clarity out of uncertainty. I remember the election of 1935 when the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the then member for Prince Albert, ran on a platform of "King or chaos." We got both.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now the government wants to substitute sections in this law for others that have proven to be efficacious in protecting the rights of Parliament. Let me refer back to 1955. Instead of reading the lengthy debates at that time on the subject of the Defence Production Act, I will point out that nothing contributed more to the defeat of the Liberal party in 1957 than the fact that it came to regard itself as divinely appointed, divinely in office and divinely there for the welfare of the people of Canada. Certain legislation was brought in then, the excuse being, of course, that it was the Right Hon. C. D. Howe who was bringing it in, for he did not like Parliament and wanted to get away from Parliament.

We fought the Defence Production Act and ultimately secured an amendment to that act which gave to Parliament and members of this institution the right to challenge any of the resolutions that were passed, that is, the right to challenge any statutory instruments. Ten of us could join together and challenge them. And now what do we find? This government has decided that those provisions ought to be changed. Mind you, it is all in the interests of the people of Canada! That is the way the government sees it. Read clause 26. It provides that "every statutory instrument issued ... other than an instrument the inspection of which and the obtaining of copies of which are precluded by any regulations . . . shall stand permanently referred to any committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments."

Why were the words that were in the old act deleted? We had power then to act. Now, in place of the power to act there is to be substituted submissions to a committee. It will not have any right to act. It may not recommend that an instrument be approved, varied or repealed. It is restricted to reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not! If the minister really believes in Parliament, he is one of the few ministers on the treasury benches who does. I have always given him credit. He has had some "Joe" jobs to do recently, which indicates that he is the one who is to bring before Parliament those things that will abrogate our rights.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This bill will not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not accept our amendment? What is wrong? You will allow the committee to have submitted to it all these instruments. They may review and scrutinize them. They may look, see, talk—but not act.

Mr. Nielsen: They may not be heard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can you imagine a committee, strangled before it commences to sit, that is permitted by Parliament to consider but to do nothing else? I ask the minister, what possible reason has he to oppose the amendment which provides that the power of this committee shall be to recommend that the instrument be approved, varied or appealed? Why does he want to take away that power? Why does he want to emasculate the committee before it is set up?

Mr. Nielsen: Answer, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is governed by either one of two reasons: he is afraid of what the committee will do or might do, or he does not want the committee to do anything. There are no alternatives. The committee may hear and see, but not do. If the government wishes to restore to Canada to full vigour of the parliamentary system, this amendment ought to be accepted without delay. There was a time—it lasted from the time I first came here until 1963—when governments used to listen to suggestions from the opposition. Over and over again, during the King administration, the St. Laurent administration and my administration, if the opposition raised a matter that was worthy of attention, it received attention. Today suggestions are contemptuously cast aside.

The amendment suggested is reasonable. Of course, the government may be trying to prevent action being taken; that will be the result if the amendment is not accepted. Let us take our first step forward in the restoration of this institution by accepting the amendment. At the conclusion of Orders of the Day the government evacuated the chamber as a body. For years and years we have not seen the equal of what is happening, the evacuation from the chamber of those in positions of responsibility. Indeed, sometimes as I watch these ministers disappearing I think of the evacuation of Dunkirk.

Mr. McCleave: There goes another.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never have I seen Parliament being degraded as it is now through the instrumentality of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In other days ministers used to stay in the House when a serious matter was before Parliament. The Prime Minister did: he had time then. Now the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is a busy man. When matters affecting the lifeblood of Parliament are brought forward, think of the interest the government shows! The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is here because he must be. There is one other minister sitting in the back row.

Mr. Hees: And he is paying no attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No doubt he is saying how he will get out of any difficulty existing between him and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) connected with the building of pipelines.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: The minister must speak from his own seat.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the minister seek the floor on a point of order, or on a question of privilege?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the right hon. gentleman, I was not discussing the subject matter he was referring to. I was discussing the very fine address that the right hon. gentleman was making to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This will be the first time in the history of this government that anybody has admitted that anyone in the opposition has something to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have always said that the minister is a fine parliamentarian. I should like the process of osmosis to be instrumental in influencing the Minister of Justice who is sitting next to him. In earlier days ministers stayed in the House. In those days members of the press gallery stayed to cover the proceedings. There was no outside forum enabling ministers to say one thing in the House and revise, enlarge and dilute outside the House what they had said in the House.

I speak with utmost seriousness about what is happening to Parliament. In a complete compendium of wisdom,

Your Honour earlier today set out the difficulties of Parliament. Sir, I opposed the changes in the rules. It was said that the changes would make things more simple and bring about greater efficiency. Under the guise of doing that, this government has emasculated this institution.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: A private member cannot get anything before Parliament today. Members are becoming a statistic and promoting purpose. Matters of particular consequence to the people of Canada are raised each day for discussion at the adjournment of the House. They cannot get them through. Why? Under the rules, Your Honour asks whether there is unanimity. The answer from the government side is always no: they squelch every possibility. Nothing is discussed in this chamber except that which goes through the sieve of partisan consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The arrogance of this government is again represented in this clause to which an amendment has been moved. I am not expressing my view at the moment but I wish to indicate how general the feeling is becoming. I wish to state the view of John Varley, who was a Liberal student leader and president of the Canadian student Liberals. He ceased to be that after he made this speech. He said:

> Recent actions by Prime Minister Trudeau show he has become "very arrogant"—

He then goes on to deal with certain words that were used, mouthed or lipped in this House. With regard to the expression which the Prime Minister used, Mr. Varley said:

> "The Canadian people know dam well it wasn't fuddle-duddle"—

If we pass this clause, Mr. Speaker, we will simply put a throttle on a committee established as a result of this provision. It is arrogant to introduce this particular section to this bill. Why was it changed? Why was it not allowed to remain as it was, with the committee having the right to make recommendations or negative proposals? The answer is simple. This government has come to the conclusion it cannot even trust its own majority in committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is afraid because many government members will realize how wrong are the actions of this government. If only some of these walls had voices—some of the criticism of members who give their consistent support to the government might be heard by ministers of the government! The Minister of Justice is different. He has been placed on a pedestal. He is a man who believes in Parliament. I suggest to him that, believing in Parliament, he should accept the amendment. If he accepted the whole amendment no one could say that the Minister of Justice was not the first to accept suggestions of the opposition.

As I pointed out a moment ago, the essence of the amendment is to give the committee the power to recommend that statutory instruments be approved, varied or repealed. It is as simple as that. Parliament is your institution and mine. The Prime Minister said that if they don't like it, they can lump it. When the labour men from Montreal were here the Prime Minister brought up to date the immortal words of Marie Antoinette—but he did not tell them they could eat cake: he modernized the words of Marie Antoinette!

This particular clause of the bill constitutes another attempt to secure absolute power on the part of the government. I can just see the march of the committee that will examine these various instruments. It will be appointed, it will march out, it will talk, it will come back and say, "We must say to you, Mr. Minister, that we have discussed the matter, read the section and considered the instrument; but a lack of independence demands that we say nothing, and we are reinforced by the fact that the Parliament of Canada does not require us to do so." We had another example of this today in respect of the white paper. I come back to that matter because it is an example that stands out like an outbuilding on the western Prairies in a fog.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There it is. You see it. For more than a year the government has said we are going to have participatory democracy. This does not apply to committees and members of Parliament. They can speak, but they cannot participate in any decision. The government has said they will give the people of Canada that grand opportunity. What have they done in the past year and a half, through the white paper? They have undermined the Canadian economy to a tremendous extent because of the fear engendered by its implementation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This applies to the strongest of Liberals, honoured by the highest decorations that can be awarded. Mr. Bruce Hutchison dealt with this question the other day in an article entitled "Victory by Default". He wrote:

> The Canadian government is said to be an unequalled master of propaganda.

The article then deals with the Minister of Finance. It shows the arrogance of the minister, whom I do not regard as having a monopoly on arrogance. The article says that the Minister of Finance is—> —the kind of man who, if the world is finally destroyed by nuclear bombs, will prove, next day, by unquestionable figures, that the destruction is only 99 and not 100 per cent when seasonally adjusted.

We do not want seasonal adjustments in the examination of statutory instruments. I know that in his heart of hearts the minister wishes he could allow this amendment, but in the shadows stands the Prime Minister keeping watch over his own. He does not like "yes men." When he says no he wants them to say no also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, while I can hardly think of a greater delight than listening to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I can hardly think of a worse fate for a young member like myself than standing up and following him. I am afraid that after his flight of oratory the House will be brought back to earth with rather a dull thud.

I wish to take a moment to set my remarks in context. I think I can best do that by quoting from an article by Professor J. R. Mallory, printed in the Ottawa Law Review, volume 4, No. 1, summer 1970. Professor Mallory dealt with the question of statutory instruments in Canada and said:

> Parliament cannot, and should not, attempt to consider in detail all of the great variety of regulations which are necessary in a modern, urban, and highly technological society. It has more important things to do. It must keep a constant and wary eye on the major policy questions which affect the public interest. In spite of the very large flow of legislation which is now necessary, parliamentary time must not be so taken up by the legislative process that opportunity is lacking for the other very necessary parliamentary function under responsible government, which is to keep under constant review the policy and actions of ministers of the Crown.

Professor Mallory went on to say:

> Accordingly, the detailed regulations to make the law effective must be made by officials in the name of the government or some statutory public authority. These regulations are no doubt carefully considered. One can be sure that official committees will consider them carefully before they are promulgated. But, unlike acts of Parliament, they will not be publicly debated before they become part of the law. And after they become part of the law there is little chance for them to be reconsidered. In most cases, public debate would not help and is not necessary. What can Parliament say that is essential or constructive on the safe load of a commercial aircraft or the safety precautions necessary in the use of a chemical pesticide, which the experts cannot say with greater authority? Not much. But the problem is as follows. Does the executive agency which makes the regulations stay within the authority provided by the statute? Does it lay down a regulation which unduly restricts the proper liberty of the subject? Does it interfere with the remedies of the subject? Does it interfere with the remedies normally provided by the courts? Who can say? In my view it is the business of Parliament to act as a watchdog for the public interest. I have great confidence in the professional integrity of the public service but I feel that no man should exercise power in the absence of public scrutiny.

Professor Mallory is arguing in favour of parliamentary supervision over statutory instruments. I think there are three steps in achieving the kind of parliamentary surveillance of statutory instruments which Professor Mallory argues to be necessary, which the Committee on Statutory Instruments deems to be necessary and which the bill before us indicates the government itself considers to be necessary. The first is publicity, making sure that the regulation has been promulgated and made known in order that people can examine it and see what its effects are likely to be. This is provided for in the bill before us by the requirement that regulations be gazetted and otherwise publicized.

The second requirement is that there be some means of scrutinizing the regulations to make sure that they conform with clearly understood principles governing delegated legislation. Such mechanism is provided by clause 26 of the bill which deals with the establishment of a parliamentary committee. The third requirement, if there is to be adequate surveillance of delegated legislation, is that provision be made for some means of remedy when a regulation is considered to be unwise. Provision for this is made in the bill in the case of certain specific acts. I refer to clause 30 which does this, fundamentally, though it does so in a manner which gives Parliament less power than it has at present; it provides that a negative resolution of the House of Commons can result in a regulation being revoked. Nevertheless, there is no general provision for remedy in the bill.

Having outlined these three requirements, I think it becomes readily apparent that the type of committee to be established under clause 26 to scrutinize subordinate legislation, and its terms of reference, will have great influence upon the effectiveness of the measure before us. In my opinion the definiton of the role of the committee, as referred to in the amendment of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), is of great importance. The essential effect of that amendment lies in paragraph 3 in which the hon. member says:

> Where a statutory instrument stands referred to such committee, the committee has, in respect to such statutory instrument, the power to recommend that the same be approved, varied or repealed.

Moreover, it is necessary to adopt some procedure which will ensure that Parliament can rapidly effect a remedy should the scrutiny committee feel it necessary to recommend that the regulation be varied, repealed or amended. Under the present rules of the House, what options are open to us? First there is the option of raising the matter under the terms of Standing Order 58(5). This order deals with the days allotted to the opposition, days on which the opposition may select a topic for debate. There is some difficulty about this approach because opposition parties must already choose from among a number of conflicting and urgent claims upon this allowance of time in the House.

Another option would be to resort to the use of Standing Order 26 when it came to the attention of the House through the scrutiny committee that a regulation needed to be amended or repealed. However, difficulty would be likely to arise here in connection with the question of urgency. I believe I can envisage circumstances in which a good many hon. members would deem it necessary for a regulation to be repealed but in which Mr. Speaker would be correct in ruling that the matter was not properly one for debate under the terms of Standing Order 26 because it was not sufficiently urgent or of general application.

Another option would be to take action under the terms of Standing Order 39A which allows an hon. member who has asked a question of a minister in the House, and received what he considers to be an unsatisfactory reply, to raise the matter at the time of adjournment. In this case, though, only two people are allowed to engage in debate on the subject under discussion and I do not think this is sufficient guarantee that the House has available adequate means of remedy should it consider there is need to vary or repeat a regulation.

It is on this basis that I support the kind of provision suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in amendment No. 4. I refer to paragraph 3 of the amendment which reads as follows:

> In the event that the said committee should in any report recommend the amendment, replacement or annulment of any statutory instrument, such report shall be brought on for consideration in the House of Commons within 15 sitting days after the tabling thereof in the same session, should such be possible, or within the first 20 sitting days in the next session following, and any debate thereon should continue subject to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons until the report shall have been finally disposed of.

I realize the minister has given the House an assurance that the terms of reference of the committee to be established under this legislation will meet the points raised by hon. members in their amendments and by those of us who speak in support of those amendments. However, since the committee to be established under clause 26 really represents the only means of scrutiny of delegated legislation, the only possible vehicle for redress, I am sure the minister will understand our reluctance to let the bill get out of our hands until we have received definite assurance from him that the problems we have drawn to his attention will be met in the terms of reference of the new committee. I am sure he will understand, too, that we would like to see these guarantees placed within the framework of the bill itself.

Speaking about the nature of the committee to be established by this legislation, there are two other factors I wish to bring to the minister's attention. The first is that the committee to be established must be adequately staffed. I suggest to the minister that he give serious consideration to basing that staff upon the legal counsel of Mr. Speaker and their staffs. It is not enough for such a committee to be assisted by members of the legal staff of the Department of Justice, because it is important that the committee, as a servant of this House and not of the government, should have the services of persons whose loyalties are completely undivided. In this regard I think it is an analagous situation to the relationship between the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee.

The other suggestion I wish to make in regard to the form of this committee is that it be empowered to deal not only with the form of statutory instruments or regulations but also with their substance. That is, it must deal with more than questions such as: Is the regulation clearly drafted? Is it based on statutory authority? Is it certain that it does not employ such wide and sweeping powers that constitutional principles are offended?

Such a committee should also be able to decide whether a regulation is a normal or an unusual and unexpected use of statutory authority. In this regard I would draw to the attention of the minister the suggestion of my colleague from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) that one of the powers of the committee should be to refer the substance of a regulation to another and appropriate standing committee of the House.

In his remarks on Monday, I believe it was, the hon. member for Peace River drew the attention of the House to certain recommendations made by the Committee on Statutory Instruments dealing with the nature and function of the scrutiny committee to be established. He drew the attention of the House to the recommendation that the committee be allowed a preview of regulations so that before they come into force there might be an opportunity for Members of Parliament to express their opinions upon the validity of a regulation, its utility, its conformity to the statutory authority, and so forth.

In this regard I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this particular power for the committee has not been included in the bill. Further, there will be certain regulations that are entirely excluded from the attention of the scrutiny committee. I find some difficulty in my approach to this question. What I really want to do is draw the problem to the minister's attention in the hope that he can clarify the issue for us in his remarks on these two amendments. I can deal with the matter very briefly.

Clause 27(c), on page 13 of the bill, empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations exempting any regulation or class of regulation from publication or scrutiny "in the interest of international relations, national defence or security, or federal-provincial relations". This is a pretty wide and sweeping power of exemption, and it bothers me. But what really concerns me is the seeming lack of provision in this bill similar to that in the Regulations Act requiring the exempting order itself to be published. This bill does provide for wider dissemination of information on statutory instruments, and therefore perhaps the wider powers of exemption are in order. But in their present form they are very wide indeed, with no assurance at all that anyone would get to know about the exemptions. I consider that to be a very dangerous feature of this bill, though perhaps I have misunderstood the situation. I would very much appreciate the minister devoting some attention to this problem when he eventually comments on these amendments, even though I am perhaps ranging a little far from the subject in drawing this matter to his attention.

Publication of an exempting order would at least alert a parliamentary committee or an opposition party to make discreet inquiries about why it was felt necessary to publish the exempting order. If that is not enough, then the committee or opposition party could raise the matter publicly. However, it seems to me that as this bill is presently constituted, parliamentary committees and Members of Parliament would not even know that a regulation had been exempted from the necessity for publication and, as I have said before, I consider this highly dangerous. I think the publication of an exempting order is a necessary safeguard. I should like to hear the minister's comments on the reason for the exclusion of such a provision from this bill when he chooses to make his remarks on these two amendments.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have already spoken on them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made when this matter was before the House earlier this week, the Chair will first put motion No. 3, and subsequently motion No. 4. The question is on motion No. 3. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion shall stand deferred.

The question is on motion No. 4. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion shall stand deferred.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

That Bill C-182, an act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be amended by deleting therefrom clause 30 at page 18.

• (4:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, after some of the fireworks we have enjoyed during the last day and a half of debate in respect of what may seem a very mild resolution, I venture to suggest there is probably more dynamite in what I suggest in this motion than there is in the motions of my colleagues. I shall explain briefly what I regard as an extraordinarily important motion.

The effect of what is proposed here would be the knocking out of clause 30 on page 18 of the bill. This would mean that section 41 of the Defence Production Act of 1955 would be restored. Most parliamentarians are perhaps not aware of the significance of section 41 of the Defence Production Act of 1955. I am certain that members of the press gallery are not aware of its significance, because there is only one pressman there at the moment. The fact is that the debate of 1955 was one of the two or three significant debates which has occurred in this chamber since the end of the Second World War. That alone should make one pause and consider what the minister and the government are attempting to do here.

Perhaps the situation is even more compounded and the confusion more confused by virtue of the fact that the bill most members have on their desk is Bill C-182 as it was originally returned from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This is not the original bill presented to us on November 3, 1970. This is important, because unless hon. members have referred to the original bill, as well as members of the press gallery, they will not know what is taking place. In the bill presented to us for first reading there was an element of explanation. That explanation is not given in the reprinted bill. Let me turn to the page opposite page 18 of the original bill presented on November 3 and read from section 41 of the Defence Production Act, which would be repealed if we accept the bill now before us. I think this is important. It reads:

Every regulation, as defined in the Regulations Act, made under the authority of this act that is required to be laid before Parliament under section 7 of the Regulations Act and every regulation made under section 9 of the Regulations Act in relation to a regulation made under this act, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as may be after it is made.

(2) Where a regulation has been laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1), a notice of motion in either House signed by ten members thereof, and made in accordance with the rules of that House within seven days of the day the regulation was laid before that House, praying that the regulation be revoked or amended, shall be debated in that House at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day the motion in that House was made.

I hope hon. members now start to prick up their ears and realize that something special was laid down in subsection 2. Perhaps we should ask ourselves why this provision was laid down in an act passed by a Liberal government in 1955. We should also ask ourselves what will happen in this regard as a result of the measure we are now considering. To complete the story I should read subsection 3 of this act passed by Parliament. It provides as follows:

A regulation that has been laid before Parliament pursuant to this section need not be laid before Parliament under section 7 or 9 of the Regulations Act, but nothing in this section shall be construed as affecting or limiting the obligation under section 6 of the Regulations Act to publish the regulation in the Canada Gazette.

Subsection 3 is not germane to the argument I am advancing, but this is the law of the land as it now stands. Section 41 (2) of the Defence Production Act provides that ten members of this place can sign a notice of motion to the effect that they do not like a regulation and ask that it be revoked or amended. That notice of motion has to be debated. The subsection does not say it may be debated, or that it may be put on some list, to be drawn out of a hat and taken up in due course. It says it shall be debated. Section 41 (2) provides that the regulations shall be debated in the House at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day of the motion in the House. That is the law as it stands. In a moment I will explain some of the circumstances that led to the adoption of that provision. Let us compare that with what we find on page 18, clause 30 of the bill. It provides:

Section 41 of the Defence Production Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"41. Every regulation, as defined in the Statutory Instruments Act, made under the authority of this act is subject to negative resolution of Parliament.

Again I ask members to prick up their ears. I ask our faithful reporter in the press gallery to prick up his ears. Each of us must ask ourselves the question: What on earth is a negative resolution as suggested in this section of the act? The answer is that nobody in this chamber can remember such an animal as a negative resolution. Never has there been one proposed or considered in this chamber. There have been some proposed and debated in other parliaments. Perhaps we have a hint as to what a negative resolution is: it would seem to be something that destroys a resolution.

As a matter of procedure, one can search our rule book from cover to cover without finding any procedure, suggestion or practice in respect of a negative resolution in this House of Commons. We are in effect being asked to replace something which was fought out in this House of Commons in 1955 and adopted, even though the procedure has never been used. We are being asked to throw that away and replace it with something that is called "subject to negative resolution of Parliament", a procedure which we simply do not have in existence. This is a positive thing being cast away for something that may or may not provide for some parliamentary action one day. I think I have set the stage in respect of what we are being asked to do and perhaps for what I am suggesting we do not do. I give the minister the alternative. If we are to have a negative resolution procedure, it should be spelled out clearly in respect of application or commitment by the government. In that way we will know where we are going.

I turn now to the background of the reasons section 41 of the Defence Production Act was adopted. I shall do so by referring to a book which was placed in the hands of hon. members a short time ago. It was written by Alderman William Kilbourn and is entitled "Pipeline". At page 101 he characterizes the debate that took place in this chamber in 1955. I have already suggested that this was probably one of the two or three most important debates held in this House since the end of the Second World War. He sums it up in this way; and this will save going through several volumes of Hansard for the year 1955. I can compress what happened in that debate by reading one paragraph at the top of page 101. At the bottom of page 100 he is dealing with the start of the pipeline debate—but as we all know, that was the forerunner. It reads as follows:

Statutory Instruments Act

The opposition for the first time sensed the possibility of a major victory in the House of Commons. They had already succeeded in the summer of 1955 in forcing Howe's first public defeat by splitting the cabinet on the issue of the indefinite extension of his powers in the Defence Production Act. Since Howe's powers as Minister of Defence Production could make him "the virtual dictator of the whole economy," as Donald Fleming put it, they dug in and fought for a compromise. Some members of the cabinet who half agreed with such criticism were a good deal more anxious than Howe to avoid a summer-long filibuster. While Howe was prepared for some concessions, he rejected the idea of any time limit on his emergency powers. During his absence over a long weekend he left the matter with his colleagues to act as they saw fit. Prime Minister St. Laurent and opposition leader Drew arrived at a compromise which in effect was a capitulation to Drew's terms. As one observer put it, it was "the issue on which George Drew enjoyed his greatest hour of triumph in the House". The Liberals had barely concealed division in their own ranks and then retreated despite their vastly superior numbers. Howe was furious when he heard the news, and summoned House leader Walter Harris to his House of Commons office. St. Laurent got wind of this and within moments of Harris's arrival, slipped into Howe's office unannounced, and nodded to Harris to leave. St. Laurent told Howe that the decision to compromise was entirely his own, and there the matter ended.

When Alderman Kilbourn says that the matter ended, what really happened was that in the House of Commons the Defence Production Act was amended with that compromise, so that the right that was won by the opposition in those days in a bitter debate was secured by the passage of section 41 of the act, the section that we are now being asked to repeal. So it is perhaps not surprising that when this issue came before the justice committee I had the following to say, as recorded in issue No. 7 of the proceedings of Tuesday, February 16, of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs:

This caused quite considerable debate back in 1955 when it was brought in and just offhand perhaps Mr. Beseau—

That is Mr. P. D. Beseau, member of the legislation section of the Department of Justice.

—could answer my question because it seems to me we may have watered down the right here. Under the procedure established in that year you could get notice signed by ten members. I wonder whether we could have a comment on that.

MR. BESEAU: With respect to clause 30 it was expected that quite possibly the rules made to deal with negative resolutions of Parliament would be similar to what is already provided in section 41 of the Defence Production Act. For that reason we thought instead of repeating three subsections, and having that become obsolete likely at an early date once this act is proclaimed in force, Parliament might well want to use the negative resolution of parliament that will be provided.

MR. MCCLEAVE: The only difficulty I really had, I notice the ten members it said here, but I do not notice that in the provisions dealing with the negative resolution. You are suggesting this is something we cure by rules of the House just as we take that other section which has been stood?

That was a reference to my suggestion that clause 26 be stood. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) replied:

Yes, we have never adopted the practice of spelling out how the House should exercise its powers under a statute. This issue has come up before this committee with the Federal Court Act, for instance. The Department of Justice has always felt that we would draft what the statute should do and provide a general umbrella for parliamentary action but that the action Parliament should take and how it should take it should be left to the rules.

I interrupt my reading from the record to say that I think I can agree with this. Unfortunately, I do not notice the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) around, since we are getting into a question about rules dealing with a negative resolution, and I will have to ask the minister at least for a commitment —perhaps a pretty specific commitment—and other people may want to do the same. However, before asking for that commitment I should like to complete my reading from the record of the justice committee. I then said:

Then I suppose I should ask for the assurance that we will come quickly to grips with matter of setting up the committee and with establishing the procedure here.

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): I have that undertaking from the House leader.

MR. MCCLEAVE: You give it to us, thank you. I think that is satisfactory.

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): I hope so. I hope we can introduce the resolution and then it is up to parliament to decide how to do it. I would think that it would be subject to some negotiation.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in a subsequent exchange said:

Mr. Chairman, I have never heard the expression "negative resolution" before. Am I to understand that there is no other authority excepting that within the Defence Production Act, that you can have a negative resolution with respect to regulations? Is that what I understand?

MR. BESEAU: It is my understanding that in some other statutes, terminology similar if not identical to that is used. At the moment, the procedure is spelled out. It will be on a motion by ten members of parliament or something to that effect. Under this bill with the amendments to the Interpretation Act, the words "subject to negative resolution of Parliament" will be defined. It is anticipated that rules of the House will be established to say how this motion will be introduced and what will happen.

We found Mr. Beseau to be a very fine witness, but when public servants appear before committees or outside the House they can hardly say what, if anything, we are going to do in this chamber. I do not say that unkindly. It was perhaps a field in which he should not have trodden. The hon. member for Hamilton West then said:

That is not quite my question. Perhaps you have answered it and through my ignorance of the entire matter I do not understand. Is there any procedure within the proposed act whereby this type of manoeuvre is spelled out, whereby you can have a negative resolution or regulation as the case may be? Am I making myself clear? I notice how you have spelled out so definitely in here: "41. Every regulation, as defined in the Statutory Instruments Act, made under the authority of this act is subject to negative resolution of Parliament."

I am just wondering why it is spelled out with respect to the Defence Production Act and perhaps it is spelled out somewhere else in this proposed act that you can still have a negative resolution of Parliament regarding the regulations?

MR. BESEAU: If you would refer to page 17 of the bill, part of the proposed section 28A to the Interpretation Act, paragraph (c) goes on to say: "(c) the expression 'subject to negative resolution of Parliament'..." It defines what that expression means for every act of Parliament and regulation.

[Mr. McCleave.]

AN HON. MEMBER: It is presently meaningless.

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): That is right until Parliament enacts the rules to supplement it "...in accordance with the rules of those Houses..."

Does the minister wish to ask a question or is he having a private exchange?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I apologize. It was a subterranean exchange between the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and myself.

Mr. McCleave: As long as I have such august gentlemen talking about this problem I will be very happy, because to me at least it is a pretty substantial one and I hope that I can enlist from the back benches whatever weight hon. members can bring to bear on this problem. As I said, we are left with the option of replacing a very definite procedure, albeit one that has not been used to my knowledge, with a procedure that has not been accepted by the House and would be set forth in the statute. It may be years before the House gets around to dealing with its procedure in this direction.

I do not know about the effect of the suggestion on the rules of the other place, but by that statute there is a clear direction to go through the statutory process of enactment, namely, first reading, second reading, committee of the whole and third reading. We now have a slightly different procedure, but legislation still goes through first reading, second reading and consideration in committee. Then it comes back to the House, through report stage if there is any question about it, and then third reading. Compare that with the process of setting up rules and regulations by the House where you have referral to a committee. The committee may struggle for a long time or a short time with it. Then it comes back to the House and the committee's report is presumably adopted or varied in some way.

There are several complications in establishing a procedure by way of statute, more so than by establishing it through the rules of the House. Because it is more complicated, I suggest it gives a greater right. It is difficult to disentangle something like section 41 of the Defence Production Act and that is why I am fighting for it and making the best argument I can. It may be said that the repeal of this section is of little moment because it deals with procedure, but some of us can recall great words of wisdom from a former justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Rand. These words have always appealed to me because he was a Maritimer. He was asked about the development of jurisprudence in so far as it affected human rights and fundamental freedoms in Canada, and he said, "The procedure is the source and protection of all our rights." In short, a right is meaningless and non-existent unless we can invoke it. If we feel that our rights are infringed upon, we can scream in one direction, write a notice in another direction or summon up some procedure whereby our complaint will be looked at.

I would also point out that a pretty substantial right was won by a minority in Parliament. For example, it was a right that our friends to my far left, with the support of only one or two other members, could have used if they felt that the regulations under the Defence Production Act were in any way wrong. It was a right that members solely within the ranks of the NDP could use, or any group within the official opposition or, for that matter, within the rump that sits alongside Your Honour, or on the other side flanked around the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his group. As I say, it was a pretty substantial right and probably was as good a check as one could have found on the powers of a minister who had grown so used to power that probably he was a little indifferent to the processes by which power is granted to a minister. That is my argument and I will not belabour it. I think I have put all my points on the record.

I understand that negotiations have been going on all around me even while I am still on my feet, Mr. Speaker. I am just trying to catch the flavour of them and also to present my concluding peroration. Since my contribution seems to have had some effect, I will conclude by saying I hope I get from the Minister of Justice an amplification of the assurance that he provided in committee, namely, that we would learn a little more about this mystic right known as the negative resolution. Then if we have to march off in new directions in the law, we will carry with us the spirit of something that was fought for and won in 1955 in this Chamber.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think I could do somewhat better than that by the hon. member and not only give him an assurance but, in effect, accept the purport and substance of his amendment, if the House would allow me to have an amendment presented which I think serves his purpose better than the one he introduced. I will explain why. The words "negative resolution" are found in clause 30 of the bill and can be related to the amendment to the Interpretation Act which is found on page 17 of the bill, subparagraph (d), and reads:

—the expression "subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons", when used in relation to any regulation, means that such regulation shall be laid before the House of Commons within 15 days after it is made or, if the House is not then sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting and may be annulled by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House.

I am quite willing to allow section 41 of the Defence Production Act to stand as it is, but in order to have it stand we have to amend it, not in the way the hon. member seeks to amend it but in another fashion—because it is my submission that section 41 would become meaningless on the coming into force of the statutory instruments bill. Under the Statutory Instruments Act there is no requirement that regulations be laid before Parliament. This procedure will become obsolete by clause 13(1) of the bill which requires that a copy of the Canada Gazette in which a regulation is published be delivered to each member of parliament.

The proposed section 41 of the Defence Production Act will require that every regulation made under that act be published in the Canada Gazette. There will therefore be no power under the Statutory Instruments Act to exempt those regulations from publication. The procedure relating to revocation or amendment of those regulations will be tied to publication, rather than laying before Parliament, but in other respects will be analogous to that provided in existing section 41 of the Defence Production Act.

But to make it perfectly clear, and to accept the argument of the hon. member, I need the unanimous consent of the House because I will not have met the requirement of the rules requiring 24 hours notice for this type of amendment, although I could argue that this is consequential upon the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I need the unanimous consent of the House to have another amendment moved which I have informally circulated and copies of which could now be distributed to all hon. members. I could read the amendment into the record with the consent of the House, and without prejudice to my own argument I point out that the amendment I am suggesting is consequential upon the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. Baldwin: He might have to withdraw his.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister read his amendment into the record for the purpose of informing hon. members. Then debate could continue and the necessary steps could be taken, depending upon the disposition and will of the House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I accept the point of order of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and with your permission will say it will be moved by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard), seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), as follows:

That Bill C-182 (reprinted as amended and reported by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs) be amended by striking out lines 34 to 38 on page 18 and substituting the following:

'41. (1) Every regulation, as defined in the Statutory Instruments Act, made under the authority of this act shall be published in the Canada Gazette within 30 days after it is made.

(2) Where a regulation has been published in the Canada Gazette pursuant to subsection (1), a notice of motion in either House signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that House within seven days of the day the regulation was published or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first seven days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting, praying that the regulation be revoked or amended, shall be debated in that House at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day the motion in that House was made.'

I think that would correct the situation and I leave it to the House to decide how to dispose of the matter. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I may have inadvertently misled the House on Monday. I should like to refer to page 4067 of Hansard where I stated that I agreed with the recommendation of the special committee that the scrutiny committee should normally sit in public session. This was an exchange between the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and myself. I went on to qualify that statement by saying: "...unless it involves regulations which are exempt because of national security."

Under the terms of the bill, a regulation that is exempted under clause 27(d)(ii) on grounds of national defence or security would not be referred to the scrutiny committee under the terms of clause 26. Thus, there would be no need for the scrutiny committee to hold in-camera sessions because it would never be dealing with regulations that were exempted under clause 27(d). The point remains that there may be occasions when the committee would want to sit in camera and I want to clarify that point. I am quite prepared to accept the substance of the hon. member's amendment.

The hon. member for Edmonton West suggested to me that if the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants were agreeable to withdrawing his motion, this would allow mine to be put, waiving the rules if necessary although without prejudice to my argument that there may well be a consequential amendment, and then the matter could be disposed of.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) would see fit to withdraw his motion, then possibly there would be unanimous consent that all Standing Orders be suspended to the extent necessary to allow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to move this amendment, which would then become part of the bill. I know this is rather extraordinary but I think it would be the simplest way. We are not really at the right point to do it, but if the House agrees that all rules be suspended in order to achieve this result it would be much simpler.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate approval of the proposed procedure. It seems to me that in effect what we are doing is accepting the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) that the proposal in clause 30 of Bill C-182 be eliminated. If that was all we did we would be putting it back the way it was in the Defence Production Act. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) pointed out, a consequential change needs to be made in view of the fact that these regulations are not now tabled but are published instead.

I do not think we are doing violence to any rule. I think the Minister of Justice is right, that he could probably have moved his proposal as an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. Rather than go through all that rigmarole, I think if we have unanimous consent that the motion of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants can be withdrawn, the Minister of Justice can make his amendment at the report stage, or his parliamentary secretary can, and we shall all be happy.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I shall resist the temptation sparked by the speech of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants to which I might have yielded had we been carrying on this debate. This recollection of the history of 1955 is interesting to those of us who were here. I think that was not the only concession that Mr. St. Laurent made to Mr. Drew. He also changed the five year limit to three years, and I think this annoyed Mr. Howe even more than the one we are now debating. The hon. member suggested that was Mr. Howe's first defeat—or William Kilbourn suggested this. Since we are making this brief reference to history, it is a matter of record that because Mr. Howe was crossed up that way in 1955 he made sure in 1956 that his pipeline legislation was all signed, sealed, delivered and ready for Parliament before telling the cabinet! So this is interesting history that some of us are reliving. But I rose simply to say that the procedure to do this by unanimous consent would meet the situation.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the proposals made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). We are satisfied with the position that he has taken, and we thank him for letting us know of his intentions beforehand. I feel that this is an example of cooperation between parties.

As for us, we support this measure, and we are pleased to give our concurrence.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my comments are merely intended to clear up any misconception that may have arisen that there is some value to the expressions "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament" or "subject to negative resolution of Parliament," and that somehow or other the idea has crept in that these were safeguards. In the amendment that we are now considering and the act to which it applies, such a phrase as "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament" or the contrary, "subject to negative resolution of Parliament," would not appear. The amendment must be carefully read. Clause 28A(1)(a) reads:

> In every act, (a) the expression "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament", when used in relation to any regulation means that—

The only point is that none of the statutes that lie behind us have the phrase "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament" or "subject to negative resolution of Parliament". There would be no application whatsoever, so all regulations made under the legislation now in force would not be subject to the so-called safeguard that was being put forward. Of course, it was readily admitted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that he cannot guarantee that any act in the future will contain such phraseology. It will be necessary for the opposition, I suppose, in appropriate places to insert this provision. But as I indicated to the minister on Monday, I am not entirely happy with having this type of suspensory power; in other words, that regulations being made under the act should stand still until they have been either approved or negatived by Parliament.

I would be just as happy to see this whole thing wiped out. I think it is meaningless and I think Parliament can accomplish a great deal more by following the amendment I made to clause 26 because then, without going into repetitive debate, if the scrutiny committee runs into anything, it has to bring it forward. I think it strange that the minister would reject the argument that it should be brought forward, when in actual fact the amendment the minister now brings forward to restore certain provisions under the Defence Production Act provides the period of time during which the debate must take place. It is not provided for in the rules but it is provided for in the legislation. The minister's amendment, in which he repeats what was necessary in 1955—this is all I am saying in my amendment to clause 26—reads:

—or if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first seven days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting, praying that the regulation be revoked or amended, shall be debated in that House at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day the motion in that House was made.

In other words, it is not the rules of the House that will provide when such a motion shall be debated; it is the statute. That is all I say. In the amendment to clause 26 the report of the committee which wants to draw attention to any statutory instrument shall be brought forward within the specified time and shall be debated and disposed of. That is all that is contained in the Defence Production Act amendment—and this is a parallel argument. If the minister was prepared to accept the argument in that case, why not in the others?

I suggest to the minister that we have no undertaking from the Government House Leader with regard to the rules or anything of that nature. There is no indication whatever as to what will happen to the reports of the scrutiny committee. I am glad the minister was able to accept this suggestion and I congratulate him for bringing forward his amendment. I also congratulate him for seeing the wisdom of my argument with regard to my amendment to clause 26. He has inferentially accepted it, and accepted it entirely in regard to this amendment. Since the Minister of Justice must be logical, I will expect his entire support for my amendment which will be voted on later this day.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I request leave of the House to withdraw the motion which stands in my name.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) asks leave of the House to withdraw the motion in his name which is now before the House for consideration. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. McCleave) withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is consent, the Chair has an indication from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard) that he wishes to move a motion. He can only do that if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Division

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice) moved:

That Bill C-182 (reprinted as amended and reported by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs) be amended by striking out lines 34 to 38 on page 18 and substituting the following:

'41. (1) Every regulation, as defined in the Statutory Instruments Act, made under the authority of this act shall be published in the Canada Gazette within 30 days after it is made.

(2) Where a regulation has been published in the Canada Gazette pursuant to subsection (1), a notice of motion in either House signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that House within seven days of the day the regulation was published or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first seven days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting, praying that the regulation be revoked or amended, shall be debated in that House at the first convenient opportunity within the four sitting days next after the day the motion in that House was made.'

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now revert to the deferred divisions on motions Nos. 3 and 4.

Yanakis—105.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now? Is the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) rising for the purpose of registering an objection to third reading being proposed now?

Mr. Rowland: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will pass by six o'clock. My leader, who would normally be here, has gone out to reflect upon the sins and omissions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) after reading the speech he made in Kingston. However, there is no better way of spending 40 minutes than reflecting upon the sins and omissions of this government.

Mr. Baldwin: If there were more open minds and fewer open mouths we might get somewhere. Let me refer to the bill itself. This debate has been fascinating because it has indicated that in reality it is the civil servants who run the affairs of this country. Our affairs are conducted by bureaucratically-oriented civil servants with the assistance of aspirants to the cabinet on the other side of the House. I must make certain exceptions in respect of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), who raised his eyes when I made that remark, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). I am sure he is able to establish his credentials but he has not presented them up to now. It is the civil servants, with the aid of volcanic exchanges between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and others, with belches of smoke and lava, who run the country. These are the people who deal with the affairs of this country by means of statutory instruments and regulations.

To illustrate the position let me point out that out of 600 statutes on our books, 430 have been created by Order in Council, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by tribunals or by other innocuous bodies. If we were to consider the last ten years on a percentage basis, I am convinced that a much higher percentage of our statutes has been created or amended than the 70 per cent I have referred to in respect of the figure of 430 out of 600.

The other day during a debate in the House of Commons the Minister of Justice participated in some interesting exchanges. In particular, I had occasion to refer the minister to recommendations of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, whose report was the basis upon which the minister brought in this measure. Some of us in the House worked a long time on this matter. I give credit to members who sit on the government side as well as those of other parties. We created what we feel is a good example of legislation in respect of statutory instruments and regulations. We obtained a consensus of hon. members in respect of changes that should be made. These are changes which the government has avoided.

I suggest that the government's bill falls far short of the proposals put forward by the special committee. The Minister of Justice took issue with me in this regard by referring to the recommendations contained in the MacGuigan report. In this regard I intend to meet him in the same way because I think this is an important matter. Among the proposals of the committee was one in respect of a change in dealing with statutory enactments. Many suggestions were made by the committee which could and should form policy of the government in this particularly vexatious and difficult situation. In addition, there were proposals in respect of the establishment of a committee of scrutiny. In this regard the committee made a categorical recommendation.

The Minister of Justice said he could not meet us in this regard and that the House itself should be the instrument through which the committee was established. He suggested this House should set up the terms of reference. I agree with him basically in most respects. Having in mind the stage to which we have advanced, I think it would be wrong for us to pass this bill without first obtaining from the Minister of Justice, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister—I am convinced they are now discussing this matter with an eye to agreeing with me—an assurance that a large percentage of the proposals made by the special committee will be adopted.

The Minister of Justice has indicated that it is his intention to bring about the establishment of a special committee with powers parallel or equivalent to those the committee proposed. He has given us the assurance, as a member of the government, that this will be done. This is still a matter for cabinet decision before a resolution is presented. We may wait until the end of this session or perhaps the next session before witnessing any attempt by the government to create such a committee. Without the establishment of such a committee and the passage of this bill, Parliament will be useless.

I suggest there should be a categorical statement on behalf of the government that there will be introduced to this House within a specified period of time legislation setting up the appropriate committee. This could be achieved as the result of discussion among the Government House Leader and leaders of the other parties. By agreement they could decide the terms of reference. Anything short of that falls far short of achievement of any value.

Let us examine the recommendations found at pages 90, 91, 92 and 93 of this report. The report contains a very cogent series of proposals which the Minister of Justice has not seen fit to introduce; he has made an attempt to slough them of. Proposal No. 2 is:

> Except in the interests of national security, there should be no exemptions from the requirements of the Regulations Act other than as to publication.

The bill goes much further than that in its restrictive effect. As I understand it, an amendment will be introduced later and I do not intend to go too far into this matter. I do not intend to say anything about what has been accomplished, because this bill goes far beyond the restrictive effects proposed in the recommendation. The recommendations continue:

> The Minister of Justice should be charged with the responsibility of deciding for all regulation-making authorities which documents should be classified as regulations.

That is not the case. A committee of civil servants has been established and there have been terms agreed upon which direct that there shall be liaison among the Minister of Justice, the deputy minister, the department and the committee. What we now have in so far as this bill is concerned is one committee of civil servants sitting in judgment, deciding on the character of restrictions which should exist in respect of regulations and Orders in Council. What we have in mind is a committee answerable through the Minister of Justice, who is an elected representative of the people, through the medium of questions in the House of Commons, to Members of Parliament. We must be in a position to make sure he is discharging his responsibility as minister, particularly in the establishment of this committee.

The minister has suggested that the recommendation in this regard has been met. We believe such a provision is very important. I am sure that hon. members on this side, as well as those who sit opposite, will agree with me and the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) that it was made crystal clear that the committee felt the Minister of Justice was ultimately responsible. The minister could delegate that responsibility but we would be entitled to look to him for answers to our questions. However, the bill does make this provision.

We went on to recommend that all enabling acts in respect of regulation-making authorities should meet certain principles. I agree that when we come to examine those it is very difficult to include in statute form the kind of restrictions and proposals which were made by the committee. But I think we should have such a declaration by this government, which I admit is not binding on future governments; and there will be another government within a comparatively short time—as to that there is no doubt. While not binding on other governments, there should be a declaration by this government as a matter of principle, either a written declaration or a statement in the House on motions, that with respect to the enactment, promulgation and the type of regulations which will be passed, basically the proposals contained in recommendation 7 will be followed.

In saying this I concede that the minister would have a problem in putting all the recommendations into statutory form. I will not read them all; they are available to all Members of Parliament. But it is my submission that the failure to do this constitutes a grave breach of what the committee had in mind when it laid down this series of recommendations in its report.

Under recommendation 8 the Minister of Justice should refer the enabling clauses to the proposed standing committee on regulations at the same time as the bill is referred. That cannot be put in statutory form either, but I think it is a useful suggestion and I throw it out so it may be followed. What happens when we are discussing in this House on second reading bills which contain a regulatory-granting power? We will always find in those bills one clause which enables the Governor in Council to deal with regulations. I would think that if there is serious doubt in the minds of the government or of the minister involved, the matter should be referred to a committee with special reference to examine the issue before the statute is passed, or contemporaneously while it is being considered. All too often we find that the simple, sometimes insidious words contained in these regulatory-granting powers and in the regulations go far beyond what was contemplated and have effects which were not in the minds of the members who were dealing with the issue.

I read recommendation 9 when I was speaking on my motion. I do not think it would do any harm to summarize it. Before making regulations, regulation-making authorities should engage in the widest possible consultation with the public at large as well as with those most directly affected. I think that is probably one of the most important functions to be considered. When regulations are enacted they do not have the publicity which statutes receive when they are being discussed in the House. I am not suggesting it should apply to every regulation but when we are dealing with questions of transportation, for example, it should apply. Another typical example is immigration regulations. There is no doubt that there are in existence a number of regulations which are not within the knowledge of a great many people in this country. I would say that 99 per cent of the members of this House do not know what these regulations are. They do not know whom they affect and what could be their result.

I think it would be wise in situations where important matters are being considered that advance notice be given and that there be an opportunity for representations to be made by members of the public as to what the regulations should be. We hear all this mockery about participatory democracy, but I think without some opportunity being given for the public to be advised, to be warned, to make its comments as to what regulations are going to be enacted, regulations which more than statutes affect us seriously, we are not dealing adequately with the subject.

There are many other recommendations which I will not take the time of the House to read. I want to conclude on this note. I repeat what I said before. I urge, first, that a statement be made on behalf of the government indicating that there will be brought into the House within a reasonable time before this session is ended, proposed amendments to the Standing Orders which will provide for the establishment of a committee of scrutiny and the terms of reference of that committee. Second, there should be made, on behalf of the government, by a responsible minister a statement that in dealing with regulations the recommendations made by the special committee will follow as closely as possible. These are the kind of recommendations which cannot come into a statute but which form the pith and substance, the essence of our proposals to this House. Without those statements being made I say that this House is being short-changed by this bill.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I would like to add to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that I am very sorry that I do not have the enthusiasm for this bill that I had hoped to have. I feel, as I indicated to the minister, that this bill was designed by the Department of Justice for the benefit of the officials of that department. It creates a fine administrative sieve. In my view, statutory instruments may have to go through such an administrative sieve; but the purpose of the whole exercise, right from the time proposals were made in the House for setting up this committee, and the burden of all the argument has been that there shall be a review by Parliament, because statutory instruments are delegated legislation and surely to goodness Parliament has the right to review.

A partial step only has been taken. The legislation says that there will be a scrutiny committee, and that is all. The exceptions to the regulations that will be referred to this scrutiny committee are fairly wide; As a matter of fact, they are too wide for my liking because unless they are published they do not go to the scrutiny committee. Particularly those that apply to a few people—and there are some exceptions to that in clause 11—go too far for real safety because there can be as great an injustice in a statutory instrument that applies to a limited class of people, or even to an individual, as there can be to one of general application; yet the limited ones are exempt from examination.

The third point I would like to make is that I regret that the minister has not seen fit to include in the legislation amendments to section 26. I will come back to the arguments I made. This is a grand gesture. There is authority now in the statute for Parliament to set up a scrutiny committee; but you have not given it any tools to work with—merely that certain classes of instruments shall stand referred to the committee and from there on there is nothing. This House has not one guarantee, one indication of any kind, saving and excepting, shall we say, the benevolent good wishes of the Minister of Justice that he will use his good offices with his colleagues, and so forth and so on, so that parliament might get a good resolution. But that is not enough.

We do not know, as my colleague from Peace River said, when this resolution is to come forward. Can the Minister of Justice in all honesty tell the House when we might expect such a resolution to come forward? Will it be this session or next session? The next question is: What will it contain?

Mr. Gibson: Progress.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would like to get the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) up on his feet. He should have been up on his feet at the report stage.

Mr. Gibson: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Certainly.

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member has been very critical of the bill, but I suggest that part of the advantage of the bill is that it is not tied down in watertight compartments. We are hitting new ground. Is it not true that in Westminster, in New Zealand and Australia where they have scrutiny committees—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. Has the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gibson: Yes. Is it not true that in the mother of parliaments most of the work done by a scrutiny committee is done by convention, practice and experiment, and isn't that why it is a success?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no indication whatsoever that there will be any convention or otherwise in this case. The legislation provides that the rules of the House shall determine, and that means nothing so far as Parliament is concerned.

Mr. Gibson: But most of it is done by committee.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no indication that the government will at any time bring in the changes. The resolution is entirely at the initiative of the government. There is not one opportunity for a backbencher or a private member from either side of the House to bring forward a resolution which would have the effect of getting this scrutiny committee established, or of setting down the procedures to be followed. And certainly to me this is a disappointment.

If the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth would only look at the logic of the amendment introduced this afternoon by the Minister of Justice with regard to section 41 of the Defence Production Act, he would see that what was included in it was precisely the same logic and the same general procedure that applied to the amendment to clause 26 that I put forward. However, under the Defence Production Act one does not move under the rules of Parliament. It states that on a motion signed by ten members the regulation should be brought on for debate within four sitting days after the motion is tabled.

My amendment provided for the report of a committee in which there was a recommendation for the variation, the annulment or the amendment of any statutory instrument, and that that report would be brought forward, debated and disposed of in government time. What is the difference between the two? They apply the same logic. It is not a question of rules determining how this is going to happen, but the statute lays it down. What is the difference? We should still have the resolution in the House to set up the scrutiny committee, but on this there was no undertaking.

I have been critical in certain respects but I know the minister will admit there there were a lot of areas in which there was agreement. I think the bill is a step forward, but I had hoped it could be that great bold step forward which the minister had hoped would come about. I regret that the minister was not quite as bold as he should have been. That is the burden of my criticism. We will keep after the minister to see that we get this scrutiny committee, not next year or the year after that: we want the appropriate resolution on the Order Paper in good time, with the knowledge that the House leaders are meeting to discuss its general terminology. I will leave the matter on that basis.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke earlier this afternoon I indicated that I was somewhat uneasy about one of the provisions in the bill empowering the Governor in Council to make regulations exempting regulations or classes of regulations from publication or scrutiny, in the interests of international relations, national defence, security or federal-provincial relations. That is a pretty sweeping set of powers given to the Governor in Council, powers which could cover a multitude of sins. As I indicated earlier this afternoon, perhaps wider powers of exemption than is the case under the Regulations Act are required because there are stronger provisions for publication in the bill now before us. But even so I am concerned that there is no explicit provision in this bill for the publication of the exemption order which would be made under the authority of clause 27 in any one of these four rather broad and all-encompassing areas.

I repeat that there is no specific provision in the bill that the regulation which exempts other regulations from publication or scrutiny must be published so that Members of Parliament and the public can be aware that such an exemption has taken place and, if they are interested in determining why such an exemption has been allowed, they can then make inquiries in order to determine the reasons for it. If they find the reasons unsatisfactory, they could bring the matter to the attention of the public and raise it publicly in this House. There is no specific provision for that in the bill. I consider this to be a rather glaring omission in the legislation. I think it is a lack of a proper safeguard which must be in the bill if it is to be the sort of legislation we want to see passed by this House.

I am very reluctant to do what I am about to do, because the minister has shown a considerable degree of co-operation with the House this afternoon in making accommodations to suggestions put forward by the opposition. In fact, I feel somewhat culpable in not having put forward this amendment at report stage where it properly fitted, but it is not something that came to my attention in time for me to do that. I think it is an indication of how serious an omission I think it is that I feel compelled to move the amendment which I am going to move at this time, even though it will somewhat delay the activities of the House. Nevertheless, I consider the omission of the right of the public to know a regulation has been exempted from the provisions for publication or scrutiny under the terms of the bill is something which we cannot allow to pass unchallenged. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Bill C-182 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for the purpose of reconsidering clause 27 thereof.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I can make my remarks in about two minutes. I regret that I did not bring in an amendment on second reading to deal with clause 27. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) will recall that I did bring an amendment before the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. I, too, feel that clause 27 provides for exemptions from the very salutary provisions of the bill, for publication and inspection of statutory instruments. I feel that it provides a dangerously wide breach which threatens to deprive the act of the effect which I think it should have and which I think Parliament would intend it to have.

I want to refer particularly to the provisions in clause 27 that allow exemption from the necessity of publication in the Canada Gazette of any statutory instrument which in the opinion of the Governor in Council would not be in the interests of federal-provincial relations. It seems to me that this is a very broad provision. In all democratic countries governments have used powers like this to exempt from publication and to seek to get behind some sort of curtain of secrecy, certain things that are done. If they are invited to do so by legislation, merely by a declaration that federal-provincial relations might be affected, we know how often that would prevent an instrument that ought to be published from coming to public attention. I regret doing it at this stage and I confess it is my oversight. I did not bring in an amendment at the report stage, but the matter is so important that I thought it should be brought forward now.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know that under the rules of the House I do not close debate at third reading stage, but it might be appropriate for me to say a few words because I feel the debate will close out and perhaps the vote could be agreed upon tomorrow. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was all for having me give a number of undertakings. What I am saying now represents my attitude to the bill, and I think it is shared by the House leader. These matters have not been considered by executive council but I can say to him, first of all, that a resolution amending the Standing Orders with the effect of establishing a scrutiny committee will be presented at this session of Parliament to implement not only the recommendations of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments but also to fulfil the provision of clause 26 of the bill before the House.

The hon. member for Peace River wanted me to give some sort of undertaking on the recommendations of the special committee's report. I can say to him that within the reservations I stated the other night when I analyzed the recommendations one by one, I favour, as does the government generally, the recommendations contained in the report. I intend to draw up some criteria implementing regulation No. 7, that is to say, those proposals that should govern enabling acts for regulation-making authority.

Hopefully, those criteria will be accepted by the government and will govern the drafting procedure of future statutes. I am hopeful that this will be done, but the ultimate control will be Parliament when statutes are brought forward. I would expect this House and the standing committee considering bills to compare the enabling statutes with the criteria in recommendation No. 7 of the report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments. Although the hon. member for Peace River did not mention it specifically, regulation 19 (9) of the report establishes criteria for the examination of regulations by the scrutiny committee. That being the case, I intend to have those criteria set forth in an internal cabinet directive before regulations are made and drafted in order to anticipate the criteria which the scrutiny committee would want to apply to those regulations.

In the enabling powers of bills themselves and as affecting the regulations that will be drafted and inspected by the Privy Council and the Deputy Minister of Justice, those criteria I hope will be binding internally and I will advance them within the framework of the recommendations. Hon. members can weigh what I am saying by referring to the statement that the then President of the Privy Council, now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), made when he appeared on behalf of the government before the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments. That statement can be found in the evidence of the committee.

I hope that will deal satisfactorily with the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who was re-establishing the argument that he made in presenting his amendment at the report stage. I have nothing further to add except to say that he, and to a certain extent the hon. member for Peace River, feel that the scrutiny committee ought to be under an umbrella set forth in the statute itself. I believe the scrutiny committee ought to be governed by the Standing Orders of the House. But that is a matter for this House or the other place if it is a joint committee. That is basically the difference in our views.

Dealing now with the amendment of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), supported by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), it is true that the hon. member for Greenwood did present an amendment to the standing committee. I dealt with the argument as to why those exemptions were what they were, and what the government's philosophy was in widening the exemptions beyond those established in the report. It is true that the special committee said the exemptions should merely be limited to national security, but we widened them and the reasons are found in the evidence given to the standing committee.

The hon. member for Selkirk made a valid point, that the problem of exemptions as such is that the scrutiny committee might not know what regulations have been exempted because there will be no record. All regulations for statutory instruments will go to the scrutiny committee, except those regulations that have been exempted from inspection by the public. They are limited to the criteria for international relations, federal-provincial relations, security and where they affect individual rights or involve specific classes of people or individuals found within clause 27 of the bill.

The regulations providing for the class of regulations that are to be exempt will be sent to the scrutiny committee. That committee will have before it the criteria as to the type of regulations which in future will be exempt. I think it is a matter for the scrutiny committee, the government and individual departments to work out from time to time. The hon. member has a valid point. There is no way of curing that when you get to matters which relate to security, and so on. We went through that intellectual exercise internally and did not come up with a satisfactory solution. But the committee will have the regulations under which exemptions are made.

In conclusion, I thank the House and hon. members for this constructive debate in which the highlights of the bill have been tested. Although privately hon. members, I think, concede that this is a step forward, I think that the bill will provide, in terms more optimistic than some hon. members are willing to concede, for a more open society for Canadians through their representatives in the House of Commons.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to talk for a minute, because we have almost concluded our business? I made the statement that I did at the beginning of the debate because I felt that the bill did not include some necessary provisions. I obtained what I wanted from the minister, and thus I except him from the role that I ascribed to his colleagues. That, of course, does not apply to all of them. I see a smile on the face of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). You can never tell what he is thinking.

The minister's statement did not go as far as I should have liked. He did not say, "Being instructed by the executive, by the cabinet, I am going to do so and so." He said, instead, "I intend to try and secure this." I know how much trouble he must have had, how much in the way of blood, sweat, tears and blows, and how much pressure he had to exert in order to get as far as he did with some of his stubborn and difficult colleagues. I accept his statements at face value and say that this statute when passed will constitute a real monument in our dealings and those of the people of Canada with regard to problems caused by the tremendous number of regulations with which ordinary people have to deal.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply on a point of order. My purpose is to confirm what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said a few moments ago. We should like to have a recorded vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) but we are prepared to allow the debate to end at this point and to make the formal request for a vote tomorrow. We should like a House order saying that the vote will be taken as the first item of business tomorrow.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would that include the vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Selkirk and, if necessary, the vote on third reading?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As far as we are concerned, yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that the debate be now terminated and that the question on the amendment and the question on third reading of the bill be put tomorrow when Orders of the Day are reached?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being past six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6.06 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OPINION OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION CHAIRMAN THAT JOB PROGRAM MAY BE INFLATIONARY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope I may induce the Minister of Finance to come into the House as I should like to direct a question to him.

Some hon. Members: We want Ben!

Mr. Paproski: We want Bad Ben!

Mr. Baldwin: Here he comes carrying his brown paper with him.

Mr. Stanfield: I would not want the minister to feel unwanted, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask whether the Prices and Incomes Commission has advised the government of Canada against a program to create jobs at this time in view of the possibility of this being inflationary and in view of the fact that even if the government did accept the inflationary risk and changed its fiscal policy it would not have any effect on the job picture for about 18 months? Has the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission given this advice to the government that he has given to the people of Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not to me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the view of the government of Canada that in fact a program to create jobs would be inflationary, would not affect the job picture for 18 months in any event and that the only course for those who are impatient is to support local community projects to help those who are suffering from unemployment, as the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission said in Toronto?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, no, that is not the opinion of the government.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the warning about inflation given by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission in Toronto recently, has the government considered how it can stimulate the economy to produce the level of employment which we want, and must have, without, as the chairman has warned, bringing back the high level of inflation we experienced a year ago?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: When may we expect the government to outline the policies that it expects to follow in this regard and to begin implementing them?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would read my speeches, he would see this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have read the minister's speeches and they do not outline how he intends to deal with this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has repudiated the views publicly expressed by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, may I ask whether the commission and its chairman continue to enjoy the confidence of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Prices and Incomes Commission has served a very useful purpose for the past 15 months in Canada, as is evidenced by the fact that the rate of inflation in Canada has been much lower than that of any other western country. I respect the Chairman of the commission and—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Our unemployment has also been much higher than anybody else's.

Mr. Benson: —I appreciate his point of view, but he was not necessarily expressing the government's view. He is an independent commissioner and can express his own opinion.

Mr. Hees: There is no government view to express.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the Prices and Incomes Commission is there for decoration or to give advice to the government?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the Prices and Incomes Commission is free to give advice to the government. The government can accept or reject the advice. I have not read the particular speech that my hon. friend speaks of, but I will be pleased to read it and to digest everything that was said by the chairman.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister should be careful. It may give him indigestion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think I should bring to Your Honour's attention that on Thursdays, under the roster system which members of the opposition do not endorse, seven ministers are to be absent. Today seven other ministers are absent as well making a total of 14, if one includes the Prime Minister, who are absent. I do not know how we can carry on an intelligent question period in the circumstances. I see that the Minister of Justice has just come in.

Mr. Laing: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is accepting an invitation from the chairman and mayors of Metropolitan Toronto to see them today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: Why do that at two o'clock?

Mr. Laing: He is accompanied at that meeting by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the minister in charge of housing and the minister responsible for Information Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, in light of the representations we have heard for the last several weeks from the other side of the House in respect of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member has not made his point. The Acting Prime Minister has risen on a question of privilege. I wonder whether the matter should be pursued. I have some doubts whether it would be very helpful. Perhaps, for the moment, the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, there is probably a reason for the Prime Minister's absence, but surely he could arrange his timetable differently so as not to hold a cabinet meeting during the question period, or at the very least he could inform the House. It is all very well for the minister who has just spoken to whitewash the thing, but there would have been 14 cabinet ministers absent if the Minister of Justice had not just come into the House. I do not think the whitewash by the Acting Prime Minister has added to the decorum of business in this place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

STEPS TO ENSURE THAT CANADIAN DOLLAR WILL NOT EXCEED PARITY WITH UNITED STATES DOLLAR—FOREIGN EXCHANGE RESERVES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the continuing upward pressure on the Canadian dollar and the distinct possibility it may reach or exceed parity with the American dollar. In view of the serious, adverse effects this will have upon the export industries of this country and the employment situation, what steps is the government taking to ensure that the Canadian dollar will not exceed parity with the American dollar? Is the minister considering such matters as the possibility of reducing interest rates or expanding the money supply? What steps is the government taking to meet this situation which may be upon us very soon?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If the hon. member recalls, interest rates were reduced about ten days ago. I believe that in the past the hon. member has been a very strong advocate of a floating dollar in Canada.

Mr. Douglas: The minister is talking about a floating dollar. One of the reasons for unpegging the dollar was that it would prevent tying up large sums of money in foreign currency reserves. Since we have reserves of some $4.85 billion which are not being used effectively, what steps is the government taking to reduce these very large reserves which Canada is holding at the present time, such as the purchase of Canadian securities in the hands of persons in the United States?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the use of the foreign exchange reserves is, as the hon. member knows, quite limited by parliamentary action. I really cannot add anything beyond that.

Mr. Douglas: Am I to assume from the minister's answer that despite the fact that some banks in the United States today have further reduced their prime rate the Minister of Finance intends to take no action at all with respect to the upward pressure on the Canadian dollar and no steps with regard to the very large foreign reserves which we are building up in this country?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is not entitled to make such an assumption.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether the government is prepared to allow the Canadian dollar to go to a five-cent premium over the American dollar, which is predicted by a leading economist as a likely development unless the government takes some action?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it is not usual in the House of Commons for the Minister of Finance to indicate what action is to be taken with regard to the level of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the rather tantalizing suggestion the minister made in reply to my leader's question that he is limited as to the use of foreign exchange reserves, as he feels there is such a limitation on the use of the foreign exchange reserves is it his intention to come to Parliament and ask that this be changed?

Mr. Benson: If I had any such intention, Mr. Speaker, I would make it known to Parliament in the usual way.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the statement made a few moments ago by the Minister of Finance to the effect that if answers are required to questions asked in the House we should read his speeches. Will the minister table these speeches? I have not read them previously because I only read for interest or profit.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TAX ADVANTAGE OF UNITED STATES INVESTORS IN CANADA

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister take steps to remove the tax advantage which American investors possess when making investments in Canada as compared with Canadians investing in their own country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First, in answer to the right hon. member for Prince Albert may I say that I read all his speeches. Second—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to hear that. I would have expected some action.

[Later:]

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, with reference to the question I put to the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, the minister rose to his feet and said he wished first to reply to my right hon. friend from Prince Albert. As he began to answer my question there was a certain amount of uproar in the House and perhaps Your Honour did not see him.

Mr. Speaker: I was looking in another direction. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Benson: As I have pointed out previously, this is an extremely complicated question; it is one which was asked by the Leader of the Opposition some time ago and I replied to it at that time. The position is partly alleviated by the proposals in the white paper on tax reform, and I trust all hon. members opposite will support the proposals that will ultimately be brought forward by the government with respect to tax reform.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROVISION OF DOCKING FACILITIES AT COME-BY-CHANCE, NFLD.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): May I address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On Friday, February 25, I inquired concerning the status of the proposal to build dock facilities at Come-By-Chance and whether public tenders would be called. Is the minister now in a position to reply?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I believe this project is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Carter: Then may I direct the question to the Minister of Public Works?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): In respect of the proposal to build a dock at Come-By-Chance, negotiations are still proceeding. At the present time they cannot be regarded as complete.

OIL

USE OF MADE-IN-CANADA DRILLING EQUIPMENT OFF ATLANTIC COAST

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the federal government considering a made-in-Canada rule to govern the equipment and apparatus used in oil drilling off the Atlantic coast and, if so, when may we expect the details of this policy to be made public?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will inquire and report to the House if I am wrong in assuming there is no such consideration.

FINANCE

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF FIXED EXCHANGE RATE FOR CANADIAN DOLLAR—REPRESENTATIONS BY INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Have international financial authorities recently been in touch with the Canadian government with a view to pegging the Canadian dollar?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Benson.]

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Richmond wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Beaudoin: Yes, Mr. Speaker,

What position does the Canadian government intend to take if the Canadian dollar continues to rise above the exchange rate of the American dollar?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will agree that the question has been asked earlier. I would not know if the minister has given a satisfactory reply to the hon. member who asked it, but, anyway, it has already been asked.

[English]

USE OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS TO PREVENT INFLATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us whether the government intends, in order to prevent a recurrence of inflation, to bring in compulsory wage and price controls?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This is a hypothetical question.

TRADE

ACTION TO INCREASE EXPORTS OF MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that exports of manufactured products, which are the products that produce the jobs, are 5½ per cent lower so far this year than they were in the same period last year, following a year in which the rise was very small indeed, will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what steps, in addition to the single development loan he signed recently with Argentina, he and his department intend to take to reverse this trend?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I expected this question and I had this subject thoroughly analysed. The report I have, which I will share with my hon. friend if he so wishes, indicates that exports for the first two months have been very good. There has been in particular, a revival in Canadian exports to the United States.

Mr. Hees: I am talking about manufactured goods. Answer my question.

Mr. Pepin: I will. This development reflected in particular a resurgence in the export of motor vehicles to the United States following the major strike at the end of 1970. The study made by professional economists concludes by saying that present trends will be reflected in a higher ratio of end products in our total exports for 1971.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister aware that our total exports this year are down 3½ per cent? How can he claim that this is a good and satisfactory picture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this is a debate between the hon. member and the minister.

INDUSTRY

CHEMCELL LIMITED—ARRANGEMENTS TO AVERT LAY-OFFS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of the announced lay-offs by Chemcell Industries and his answer relayed to me on March 4. In view of the consultations which the minister indicated were taking place between officials of Chemcell and representatives of his department, is the minister in a position to indicate to the House whether any suitable arrangements have been made or negotiated with a view to averting the mass lay-offs announced by Chemcell?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, conversations did take place and a full explanation was provided by the company. It is not government policy to prevent a closure when a company makes an assessment that this is necessitated by factors of international trade, as in the present case. The government is not now, nor might it ever be, in a position to tell companies to remain open when the assessment of owners of the company is that it should not.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that the federal government has indicated to the premier of Alberta that the problems which have developed in the chemical industry, particularly with respect to Chemcell in the province of Alberta, are problems of a federal nature, can the minister indicate whether the government is prepared to accept responsibility and provide an equitable solution?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, in my previous answer I indicated that the main reason for the partial closure of this plant was international trade. It is apparently the case that our petrochemical plants are not as big as they should be to be internationally truly competitive, and this is because of the limited size of the Canadian market. We are working on this problem at the moment.

Mr. Mazankowski: A further supplementary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the minister indicate to the House whether the government of Alberta has been in touch with his department in regard to the consideration of a special joint program to deal with the loss of jobs created by the announced lay-offs by Chemcell?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I shall look into it.

THE CENSUS

SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT OF STUDENTS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week I asked the minister whether he would look into the question of student hirings and he indicated he would have something to say on that matter.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did. I am informed that there will be 2,700 processing clerks jobs in Ottawa with Statistics Canada for the census of 1971. These jobs will be for approximately 13 weeks. These positions are to be filled through the Canada Manpower offices on university campuses. I would advise my hon. friend and other members of the House to tell students requesting jobs to go to these offices. There will also be 700 or 800 other census jobs which will be for a shorter period of time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—RELEASE OF MONTHLY FIGURES BY BUREAU OF STATISTICS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary or perhaps a related question. In view of the fact that during the last several months unemployment statistics have been released by DBS by the tenth or eleventh of the month, can the minister say when we may expect the release of this month's figures, and can he also indicate whether trouble with any new formula has been experienced?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not expect so. I have not been informed of any difficulty and I expect the usual timetable will be followed. If there is difficulty somewhere I will find out and report.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—USE OF CANADIAN LABOUR, EQUIPMENT AND MATERIALS—DISCUSSIONS WITH SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Normally I would have put it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but he is not here. As the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated that the government would entertain a United States project to build a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley through the Prairies, has the Canadian government set down terms under which Canadian labour, equipment and pipeline supplies will be used if such a project is undertaken by the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the guidelines issued last August, which represent the government's position in respect of a pipeline, were very clear in this respect. Guideline number one, I believe, indicates there will be a clear preference for maximum Canadian content in any application that is made in respect of the construction of a pipeline.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position to advise us whether there have been any discussions with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan in reference to their position regarding such a pipeline which will go through their territory, and have there been any guarantees given to these two provincial governments that producers of natural gas and crude petroleum in those provinces will get a share of the oil flow going to the United States or elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Greene: There have been discussions of a general nature with the governments of both Alberta and Saskatchewan but not in respect of the specifics of a proposed pipeline. Until there is an application we cannot indicate to the provinces exactly what might be their interests and what might be the resolution in respect of their property rights.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has said to the United States that the government would likely entertain such an application for the construction of a pipeline by the United States, does the minister not consider that, because of the jurisdiction of the two Prairie provinces I mentioned, some form of discussion should be had now with them before any further suggestion is made to or negotiations carried on with the United States? I ask this question in view of the fact that this proposed pipeline will go through the territory of the two Prairie provinces.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, in the normal course when there is an application in respect of the building of a pipeline the provinces are represented at the hearing before the National Energy Board. They make their cases very clearly and their viewpoints are always considered. It may well be that in a matter of this national importance, and because of the fact this will be such a tremendous economic undertaking to the benefit of Canada, if it goes ahead, there should be earlier discussion. We are certainly prepared to consider that at the appropriate time.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that an application for the construction of such a pipeline would be considered by the National Energy Board and that it has the responsibility for ensuring the safety of the ecology. I should like to ask the minister whether the National Energy Board has carried out ecological studies and has the necessary staff to do so, or whether it will use the surveys which have been made by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is a very clear emphasis placed on the ecological safety of such a line. The National Energy Board has very competent engineers who consider these questions on a continuing basis. The private sector, both at Normal Wells in respect of a gas line and at Inuvik in respect of an oil line, are doing very comprehensive research. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has a very clear responsibility, which it has undertaken, as enunciated again by the guidelines of last August. That department is responsible for the area in the territories, and the entire federal government responsibility in respect of ecology is being correlated by an interdepartmental committee on the ecological safety of pipelines in the north.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will notice that there are at least four hon. members seeking the opportunity to ask supplementary questions on this matter. Very shortly we will be running out of time, and I wonder whether we should spend another five or ten minutes on this important subject. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Energy Board Act deals mainly with safety and makes no reference to the protection of the ecology, although a broad interpretation could be placed on the words "safety and public interest", can the minister assure the House that all the research which has been carried out and will continue to be done in respect of the ecology of the north will be placed before the National Energy Board when this application is heard, in the event that such an application is made?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I believe that in accord with the guidelines the ecological question will have to be considered and approved by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That department has the primary ecological responsibility. The evidence of the department's findings and its views would then be placed before the board. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the actual wording of the National Energy Board Act refers to safety and the public interest. It may well be a valid suggestion that the Act should be amended to make specific reference to pollution and ecology.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt, but the hon. member for South Western Nova is rising on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest there are many supplementary questions because of the existence of the roster system in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Comeau: Because of the roster system we are only permitted to ask questions of certain ministers on certain days. This is why we have so many supplementary questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I do not quarrel with the point made by the hon. member, but there still has to be some limitation. Hon. members will realize that the discretion is left in the hands of the Speaker. I see a number of other members to my left who have been trying to ask questions for two days. If I consulted them I am sure they would recognize, as I do, that although the matter on which questions are now being asked is very important there are other important matters on which they would like to direct questions to the government, with or without the roster system.

MONTMAGNY, QUE.—DESIGNATION AS SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I would like to ask him whether he is aware of a resolution of the municipal council of the city of Montmagny mentioning the intense unemployment situation in Montmagny and the neighbouring region and asking that Montmagny and its suburbs be designated as special zones, or else be included in a new development program to be set up as early as possible.

I would also ask the minister whether he has taken action on this request. If so, could he tell the House what steps will be taken to cope effectively with this request which, in my opinion, is quite justified?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, Montmagny is included in a designated area, which means that industries wishing to locate there are entitled to subsidies from my department. In spite of that, not many new industries have settled in that locality. I do not think that the fact of making Montmagny a special area would greatly alter the situation.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion tell us if he has received such a request from the authorities of the town of Montmagny?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I recall having read a resolution from the council of the Town of Montmagny. I would have to read it again to be sure if such a request was contained in the resolution.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I did understand the explanations of the hon. minister regarding designated areas, but my question is as follows: Since the minister has introduced a legislation, which was passed by the way, to benefit certain regions which have been labelled "special areas" and under which municipal councils may draw financial advantages for certain public utility projects, would he be prepared to answer favourably the request put in by the municipal council of Montmagny?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we have received a great number of applications from several municipalities in Canada. We shall soon review our program, probably this year, and see whether in the order of priorities Montmagny or some other centre must be selected.

FISHERIES

PREVENTION OF FISHING BY FOREIGN SHIPS WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT—REPORTED VIOLATIONS—PATROL MEASURES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Would the minister advise whether he has had any reports from his officials in southwestern Newfoundland indicating there have been violations of the 12-mile limit by foreign draggers?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I have not had any reports, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that reports emanating from Newfoundland fishermen indicate that foreign draggers are fishing within three miles off Cape Ray and Cape Anguille, and since it is now obvious that they are ignoring the declaration of the 12-mile limit north of Cape Ray, would the minister advise what action he now intends to take to enforce the declaration and finally resolve the problem?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have several fisheries protection vessels in the area and as it is also being continuously overflown by Department of National Defence aircraft, I have reason to doubt very much the reports allegedly made by inshore fishermen.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, since reports from lighthouse keepers and other persons in the area indicate that most of the fishing within the 12-mile limit is carried out after dark, can the minister say if he has any night patrol? If not, are there any plans to bring about a night patrol in an effort to enforce the 12-mile limit?

Mr. Davis: Yes, we do have a night patrol.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, this is not in any way intended to obstruct the business of the House, but we have had official reports from fishermen and lighthouse keepers about the very critical problem off the southwestern shore of Newfoundland at Cape Ray and the minister in his statement seemed to question the credibility of the reports and therefore of our fishermen. I think he should make a clarifying statement and guarantee that there will be a stepping up of activity by his department to try to identify the nature of the reports, which are also broadcast on the CBC.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. The hon. member has asked what is perhaps a supplementary question. The minister might be allowed to reply to that part of the question asking whether he would make a statement.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I really do not know what to say. The allegation is that individual fishermen, in the dark of night, have seen vessels either just inside or just outside the 12-mile limit. I cannot comment on that.

ENERGY

STUDY OF EASTERN CANADA'S FUTURE GAS REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if I can get his attention. In view of the fact that Trans-Canada's gas pipeline is operating at 98 per cent of capacity and in view of the fact that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is asking for an increase in the price of gas to consumers in eastern Canada, is the minister making a study of the future needs in respect of this form of energy in eastern Canada?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think there is continuing study and there was a very comprehensive study published a year ago last December, I believe, in respect of the future needs and future supplies that were available.

[Mr. Marshall.]

I do not want to comment on the matter before the National Energy Board, which is really sub judice, but I believe the need will be met by continually increasing availability of the pipeline. I think the inherent question is whether or not the price of gas is sufficiently high to enable such a pipeline to be underwritten. That is the basis of the application.

Can he tell us whether it is true that the heads of his department are reviewing the higher positions in order to have more French-speaking Canadians with salaries over $18,000 per year.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the press reported yesterday that I had unduly intervened to increase the number of French-speaking Canadians in my department. This allegation is now being considered by the Department of Labour and the investigation will follow the normal course of procedure taken by that department.

The last time this charge was made against me, it had been said that it was more difficult for someone who was not French-speaking to be hired by my department than for a Jew to become a Pope. However, at that time, my executive assistant was a Canadian of Jewish origin.

AVAILABILITY OF "SPAN" RAPESEED

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the special rapeseed known as "Span" now being reproduced in the Imperial Valley in California for Canada. In view of the great importance of the rape crop to our western economy, can the minister assure us that this special rapeseed will be available in time for spring planting?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the whole idea of renting some land in southern California was to increase the seed during the winter months so as to have enough seed available for the seed growers in Canada to again increase the supply during 1971, as well as to have a reasonable quantity available for crushing into oil to do the research and testing that is necessary on the oil.

RECOVERING OF INCREASE FOR CAPE BRETON MINERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Would the minister report any progress he has made in recovering the recent 10 per cent increase in unemployment insurance on behalf of the Cape Breton miners?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have never made any effort to recover it. I think the question should be best directed to the appropriate minister, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who could explain in all probability that the 10 per cent unemployment insurance increase will be reflected in increased benefits to the miners.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure I heard the minister right. Did he refer to 2 per cent? I am speaking of the 10 per cent made available on January 3, 1971. My question is directed to the minister who has jurisdiction over that department. No other minister is permitted by the rules of the House to answer for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I can say simply that anybody entitled to unemployment insurance benefits anywhere in Canada at the present time is receiving the additional 10 per cent that was spelled out in December.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that the UIC funds made available to the men are being distributed to their advantage or have they been taken over under some scheme by a Crown corporation that will deprive them of this increase?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if this fund is being used improperly or immorally by a Crown corporation and the Crown corporation is the one to which the hon. member appears to be referring, then I suggest that he refer the question to the appropriate minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the hon. member a further supplementary, but we are running short of time.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, regardless of whether it is improper or immoral, whether he would care to see me after the question period when I will produce the written evidence which has been signed by the minister himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Surrey.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Surrey. I will recognize him in a moment, I hope.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege arises from the question of morality the minister brought into this particular situation. I see no reason the minister should be allowed to get away with the answer because I can give him the written evidence signed by the minister himself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this matter might be discussed, as the hon. member suggested, privately between the minister and the hon. member.

STATUS OF WOMEN

DESIGNATION OF MINISTER TO CO-ORDINATE IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and perhaps he will want to refer it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras), speaking in the debate last Tuesday on the status of women, indicated that the government might be willing to designate a minister of the Crown to co-ordinate the implementation of the royal commission's recommendations, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if this action will be taken and when it will be taken?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his interest and I promise him that I will draw this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister.

STEPS RESPECTING IMPLEMENTATION OF INCENTIVES PROGRAM IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of criticisms levelled at the regional industrial incentives program by the Industrial Developers Association of Canada at their recent meeting in Toronto and the criticisms also expressed by leading mayors across the country that the Act is not properly co-ordinated and is not fulfilling its function, as further substantiated by the disparity in the dispensing of funds under the program, can the minister tell the House what steps he is taking to ensure that this program is being carried out as Parliament intended?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will be rather brief in replying to this speech. I oppose the criticism expressed, as we are trying in fact to distribute money in keeping with the employment situation in each region of Canada.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister if he intends to take some new initiatives in the light of the experience with the program, to ensure that the funds are more equitably distributed on the basis of provinces?

[Mr. Rynard.]

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I believe that funds must be distributed according to the employment level and not necessarily according to the number of provinces.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: That is precisely what I meant.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Privy Council, the government House leader, about the business for the rest of this week and next week? At the same time, in view of the great interest shown in the question of the transportation of Arctic oil to the south, may I ask him whether the government is considering setting aside a day for debating this very important issue?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, after disposing of the first item on the order paper for consideration today, namely, statutory instruments, we will move to the budget bill, followed by the packaging and labelling measure, textiles, bail reform, Yukon minerals, young offenders, Canada Labour (Standards) Code and the Unemployment Insurance Act amending measure. All these will be called in that order except I would reserve the opportunity on Monday to discuss further with House leaders a possible rearrangement of that order or the continuity of that order. In response to the final part of the hon. member's question, we would like to establish two opposition days next week, probably on Tuesday and Friday, but that also can be discussed.

Mr. Baldwin: On the point raised by the President of the Privy Council, Mr. Speaker, and as the government will not set aside a day, I give him notice that we will be discussing the matter tomorrow.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the session today the Acting Prime Minister excused the absence of the Prime Minister and several cabinet ministers because of an important meeting they were having with the mayor of Toronto and members of the Metropolitan Council. If this meeting was sufficiently important to justify the absence of these hon. gentlemen, why was a former mayor of Toronto, the hon. member for York West, not invited to attend because obviously he could have made a very good contribution at that meeting?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member himself might have raised the matter as a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I tried to get Your Honour's eye for the past 25 minutes. The reason I rise now is that I want to ask a question of urgent importance to the grain producers of western Canada. It relates—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the position in which the hon. member is placed. I admit that he has not been recognized during the question period, and unfortunately he is not alone. The hon. member for Hillsborough in particular I was anxious to call today, as well as others, but unfortunately we did run out of time. As a matter of fact, we extended the question period by approximately five minutes. Perhaps the hon. member, by unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is some difficulty. If the question might wait until tomorrow I can assure the hon. gentleman I will see that he is called immediately we begin the question period. Orders of the day.

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, the House dealt with the amendments we proposed to Bill C-225.

It worries me to see so many members leave the House at this moment because this is an important bill since it seeks to tax Canadians for one more year.

The explanatory notes to clause 2 of Bill C-225 read as follows:

> This amendment would extend for one year the temporary surtaxes imposed under Part IA of the Income Tax Act.
> The surtax on an individual is 3 per cent of his "basic tax" in excess of $200. It would be extended to apply to the 1971 taxation year.

And it is also stated:

> The surtax on a corporation is 3 per cent of its tax computed under section 39 or 69 of the Income Tax Act. It would be extended to apply to profits earned in 1971.

The specific and only purpose of this bill is to extend this tax for another year, namely, to April 1, 1972.

I should have liked, Mr. Speaker, to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), but as the economic situation in Canada, for which he does not bear the whole responsibility, but the major part of it is very bad, particularly with regard to unemployment, more especially in Quebec. I find that instead of praising him I must tell him that he and his government have failed in attempting to find solutions to the economic problems of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we are members of the sovereign Parliament of our country which has all the authority required to eliminate any anti-human conditions created by man. This is not a municipal council with no authority to legislate in financial matters. This is the sovereign Parliament which is all-powerful in the field of finance. It is not in a sovereign Parliament such as ours that financial limitations must be discussed. The financial resources of a country may be limited only by its economic resources. If there are financial limitations in a country of unlimited resources such as ours, it is only because there are financial limitations due to the ignorance of those whose responsibility it is to govern the country. The difficulty lies within human brains which are conditioned by ignorance and finance, or are contaminated by them.

Mr. Speaker, the financiers' intellectual constipation is at the basis of all our economic problems.

Recently, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Corriveau), in the only speech he has made in this House since he was elected, taught us a new expression in the economic field. He said that there was a "capitalism of the mind", but he did not explain what was this "capitalism of the mind". I never saw, in any book of political economy, the explanation for "capitalism of the mind".

The hon. member said also that it was necessary to increase our production in order to solve our problems. He should go and say that to the Frontenac farmers, who are presently penalized because they have produced or are still producing too much milk. He should say that to the farmers of western Canada who are in the same position. And immediately afterwards he said we should produce more and sell our surpluses.

Finally he said that there was a puzzle to solve.

Mr. Speaker, if there is a puzzle, it is not where the hon. member for Frontenac and many others think it is, but it is in his imagination, in his head.

You may recall however that the government did and promised everything in order to get that champion of the "capitalism of the mind" elected.

"It should sit at the negotiation table", he told us. What kind of negotiations? Where are their results?

Once more the expectations of the people of Frontenac have been disappointed. The election campaign in the riding is now over, and so are the wild utterances. Let us now look at the only results, which are negative at all levels of the national economy.

Last year, I often happened to listen to a popular program on the Hull radio, which invariably began by the same words: "The world is sick". The speaker, through this remark, unfortunately was reflecting the economic climate in which we live, which the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) complacently enforces on the Canadian people.

Since 1968, we have been witnessing the government's political and economic somersaults and we must recognize that the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance, that financial quack, who is not in the House this afternoon, have no remedy to offer which is likely to solve the country's economic problems and bring Canada back to the prosperity it formerly experienced, so that the people could also live again, because Canadians are still prepared to make the necessary efforts to bring economic prosperity to Canada.

• (3:30 p.m.)

As reported in Hansard of December 3, 1970, on page 1743, the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

—I have no new general tax measures to propose tonight—

That sums up the speech made by the Minister of Finance and this government fiscal policy: "No tax measures to propose". That means we shall continue to suffer our ills and have the same troubles that we have had for the last several years. We shall continue to be economically ill.

This means also that we shall continue to walk blindly, to retreat, to go round in a circle, progressing towards a just society for some, as we have known it, especially in the last few years.

The people, a large proportion of which is unfortunately too easily misled by the government's well-organized propaganda, continue to believe in the financial quackery of the Minister of Finance.

A quack, Mr. Speaker, is a man who is always trying something new and who, when a patient consults him says: Take these white pills; we shall see what happens. When they do not produce the expected result, he will say: Take these pink pills. They contain the same ingredients, only the colour is different. The pink pills having failed, he will be given a new green liquid: Try that, then come and see me again. The quack thus continues his experiments, exploiting the patient who hopes to be cured.

These past 100 years, financial quacks have given us similar results. Who can tell the difference between the liberal taxes and the progressive conservative taxes, between the liberal debts and the progressive conservative debts that have been inflicted upon us for 100 years? What is the difference between "red" and "blue" taxes or between the liberal tax to which we are going to object but which, unfortunately, the government will still pass?

What difference is there between "red" and "blue" crises? Between "red" and "blue" bankruptcies? Between "red and "blue" rationing? Between "red" and "blue" inflation? Between "red" and "blue" misery? Between "red" and "blue" bureaucracy? Between "red and blue" unemployment?

Mr. Speaker, I could keep on indefinitely with the list of these economic ailments under the present system treated by the quack doctors of finance who are interested in keeping Canada and Canadians economically ill, so as to carry on with their practice of financial quackery.

All those who still believe in quacks, such as our present Minister of Finance, and who are still taking red or blue pills, can for a long time to come expect to pay the price of our Canadian economic ills such as those for which we have paid over the last century, since Confederation. I have just mentioned a fair number of them.

From a monetary point of view, we are at the present time living under a humbug system, that of the "taxing machines" of the Minister of Finance, as evidenced by Bill C-255.

Mr. Speaker, this Parliament is a manufacturing plant for a host of bills which tend in the short or long run to slowly but surely fleece the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is not true.

Mr. Rondeau: If, for instance, we look at the descending curve of private enterprise in Canada since the last war, we can only admit that our governments have failed to protect private enterprise and personal initiative.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians still love their country and have faith in its productive capacity. But because of the tremendous speed at which the government is heading towards a socialist state, private enterprise and the initiative of Canadians are completely, or nearly, paralyzed. Steps can be taken to promote regional economic expansion through the minister (Mr. Marchand)—who is presently in the House—but any accountant or wise businessman knows very well, or can easily ascertain, that the subsidies that the minister grants or has granted in my constituency—and I do not blame him in any way in this regard—constitute, in fact, the financing of the 11 per cent sales tax on the investment of the factories that will be devoloped and the personal income tax that individuals will have to pay during the first six years after the factory has received subsidies. These subsidies are the immediate financing of taxes which will be paid by industrialists and employees of the companies during the first six years.

Mr. Speaker, our economic system shows symptoms of being a sick economic system, which makes social life sick and makes our world become more and more of a sick world, as a Hull radio announcer said every morning for some time.

The quack Minister of Finance is responsible for the circulation of the economic blood, which is money, and responsible also for the quality of this economic blood. Instead of treating our financial anemia, he deals, like every true quack, with the effects of the sick and vitiated economic blood.

Instead of using the Bank of Canada as a monetary reservoir to balance the monetary circulation of the country with its production capacity, he acts like a quack. I keep on repeating this word, because it is very important. The minister acts like a quack or like an amateur mechanic. Instead of fixing the distribution system of fuel from the tank to the carburetor which is defective, like the whole economic system of financial distribution, the Minister of Finance reduces thousands of Canadians to unemployment. He forces some of them to apply for a pittance to welfare organizations, condemns others to utter misery and compels those who are still able to pay for these social services, to bear a crushing tax burden, they who still believe in the economy and still have some initiative, but who, in their political simplicity—

Mr. Béchard: What solution do you propose?

Mr. Rondeau: The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) should know because the Creditiste solution has been explained time and again for years. But he has ears and does not hear apparently. We have repeatedly stated in this House that the Bank of Canada should be used to supply our Canadian economic life blood. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I keep explaining this to him, but he will not listen to me.

Mr. Béchard: This is not serious.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is getting ready to stifle the Canadian people economically.

What I find most shocking is how the government can, on the one hand, show such ability, through the Minister of Finance, in stifling private enterprise and, on the other hand, thanks to its well planned publicity—and Information Canada will soon confirm this—convince the Canadian people that they are being stifled for their own good.

Unemployment and bankruptcies are the symptoms of an ill-planned economy. The FLQ, in Quebec or elsewhere, is another economic symptom. The millions of people on welfare are yet another economic symptom. The widespread dissent as well as the strikes are as many economic symptoms. And if the Minister of Finance is unable to root out the causes of all our economic ills, either he is a quack or he is party to our economic system which keeps the country and its people in a state of economic illness.

As for me, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance is more a quack than an accomplice. And I feel only pity for the poor Canadian people who will have to pay, in 1971, more than $2 billion in interests on the national public debt, because of a Minister of Finance who does nothing but deprive the people in order to make finance thrive all the more.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I have in hand a copy of Bill C-225 entitled: An act to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an Act to amend that Act.

The title itself is ambiguous. No doubt this is due to the confusion that existed in Parliament in 1968, when the Liberal partisans, caught off their guard, had to make important concessions to taxpayers and refund overpayments under a legislation which had not yet been passed.

What a contrast between the slowness of the government to seek answers to unemployment and other problems and its undue haste to carry out regulations establishing the right to tax. They are the ones who accuse the members of the Ralliement créditiste of delaying the proceedings of the House. Yet taxpayers are in no hurry to be taxed, either under an amending bill or another legislation such as Bill C-225 now under consideration or any other money-pumping method to get at the generally insufficient income of Canadians.

The moment income tax is mentioned, very few citizens are enthusiastic, except the lackeys of the financial system who do not seem to realize all the problems they are creating for Canadian workers with their taxing gimmick that takes the most different forms they are forced to imagine because of the stupid system they try to defend.

For a long time, various categories of workers, particularly forest workers and others, have been trying to make the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) understand that travelling expenses incurred in their search for a job, the purchase of costly tools such as power saws and others should be deductible under the Income Tax Act. No improvement is coming in that regard.

It is only after 20 years of making representations that Canadian workers who were helping red or blue governments ease the unemployment problem by going to work for the forest industry in the United States, particularly in Maine and New Hampshire, that authorities on both sides of the border understood that they should allow those workers to get unemployment benefits when they were out of work. The "tax pumping" system begins to work from the very first working days. In order to please the tax-happy people in the United States Canada and Quebec, the worker who has to work hard to earn a living must file three income tax returns, with all the complications involved. It is therefore easy to understand why the workers revolt at times.

We are living in a period when laws and regulations are being extended for the purpose of maintaining a taxing right, which at the outset was to last only a year. We must therefore condemn such extended taxes. Even though the supporters of such a system do not like to be reminded of the ill effects of their laws and regulations, they must recognize that only indebtedness is making some progress.

I have here an article from the March 9, 1971 edition of La Presse, bearing the title: Canadian indebtedness increases. Canada's Minister of Finance keeps on sailing through those stormy circumstances, tossed about by the elements of an artificial financial system, that is creating taxes, debts, unpaid and unpayable, under the present system. By means of the surprising acrobatic stunts he resorts to at times, he succeeds in maintaining the dollar in a floating position.

An hon. Member: It is the last straw.

Mr. Dionne: His rather eccentric behaviour reminds us of the recent enough story of a ship that sailed for some time at random, and was sold later for less than the cost of repairs and painting. Let us hope that the ship of state will succeed in overcoming the imaginary waves of inflation and that it will finally reach a port where competent engineers will be able to perform the necessary repairs to its rudder.

If we look at the way the government is spending the money which it succeeds in taking from the taxpayers thanks to disguised taxes of all kinds, we quickly agree with the Auditor General about the administrators' blunders.

I have with me an editorial of the CJMS broadcasting station of February 20, 1971, which shows that the taxes paid by the Canadian taxpayers are not always properly used. And I quote:

—In the same week, two facts have come to our attention. Further inquiry might multiply them by ten, twenty and even more. Let us take the case of adult education. Everybody knows that for retraining purposes, a person can be paid $35 to $80 per week depending on family conditions provided he is attending adult training courses. However, do you know that, in Montreal, a part-time teacher is teaching on the Canadian novel to permit workmen aged 20 to 35 and more to obtain the credits they need to complete grade 9 while his own education stopped at grade 8? This teacher is paid $25 per night for a 2-hour course and the others are paid, as we said, to attend such courses which will be useless to them when they get back on the labour market. This is incredible nonsense which shows the lack of seriousness of those responsible for the programming of these courses. And this is done with our money, with taxpayers' money. Another case—

Since he came to Montreal, a German immigrant has first attended French lessons. He was paid to attend. Once the French course was over, he registered for English lessons. Again he is getting paid. When he has acquired a knowledge of English and French, it is possible that he will immigrate this time to the United States, after having lived here two years at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers. All this is not serious. I am prepared to get the publication put out by the federal government and entitled: "How your tax dollar is spent". I am eager to know whether such facts are recorded in that publication. To you, to me, taxpayers, rotating teachers' strikes are costing $50 million. And what about the postal strike? Taxpayers are fed up and rightly so.

The supporters of the Ralliement Créditiste positively state that the purchasing power which is in the hands of Canadian consumers is inadequate to buy Canadian production, taking into account prevailing prices. It is not by taxing them that the problem will be solved.

Although there are many causes to that state of affairs, it is possible to demonstrate easily the validity of that statement.

The banking system is the source of all the Canadian money which is issued in the form of loans. However, the banking system lends money on the sole condition that a larger amount—capital and interest—than that which has been loaned will be paid back. Therefore, when a producer borrows to finance his production, if he is to remain in business, he must include that charge in prices when he sells his product. But since the equivalent of that additional amount has not at any time been distributed as purchasing power to the consumer, it is obvious that the consumer is unable to pay the prices charged by the producer for his products.

In his book entitled Distribution of Production, Major Douglas states:

Banks can create money in five minutes and this is what they have been doing for centuries.

On the other hand, Mr. Reginald McKenna, of Great Britain, at the annual meeting of the Midland Bank, on January 25, 1924, had this to say, and I quote:

The amount of money in existence varies only through the action of the banks, as they increase or decrease the deposits. Any bank loan destroys a deposit.

Banks can create and destroy money and bank credit amounts to money. It is with the help of that money that most transactions are being performed and not through what we usually call dollars.

Moreover, I am in agreement with the remarks that Mr. Hawtrey, under-secretary of the treasury in Great Britain, over the B.B.C. network, in London, on March 22, 1933; he asserted his agreement with Major Douglas explicitly:

Moreover, I agree with him (C. H. Douglas) when he says that the banks create money and economic crises are created by the banking system.

When a bank makes a loan, it creates money out of nothing.

In his book The Art of Central Banking, the author also says:

When a bank provides a loan, it creates credit. While a loan is being shown as a credit in its books, an equal amount is being registered as a liability.

Finally, Lord Keynes, economist, and during the last world war, governor of the Bank of England, had this to say:

There is no doubt that all bank deposits are created by the banks.

In conclusion, may I quote from the evidence Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, gave before the committee on banking and commerce in Ottawa, in 1939:

Each time a bank provides a loan or buys securities, new banking credit is created—new deposits—truly new money. Generally speaking, all new money is created by the banks under the guise of loans.

In 1965, Mr. Paul A. Samuelson, internationally famous economist, in a book that was translated into French under the title L'économique: techniques modernes de l'analyse économique, explained how the banks provided an irrefutable answer to the question: Where does the money come from?

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the phenomenon is not too well understood. Most people have heard that, thanks to some sleight-of-hand trick, banks are able to make money out of nothing. Few people, however, realize how that is done. In this regard, I will quote from page 277 of Samuelson's book:

In fact, there is nothing magic or unintelligible about bank deposits. Any intelligent person can follow step by step what happens to bank accounts. The real explanation of the creation of deposits is a simple one. The only difficulty is to understand the false versions which continue to abound.

According to such frivolous explanations, managers of normal banks can, by a stroke of their pens, lend several dollars for each dollar deposited with them. There is nothing surprising about the fact that seasoned bankers see red when accused of such action.

They would surely be only too happy to be able to do this. But they know better than anybody else that no banker can invest funds which are not at his disposal—and any money used to purchase securities or to grant a loan must immediately leave his bank.

This is why bankers often go to the other extreme.

Since a small bank can only create money to a limited extent

They readily maintain that on the whole, the banking system is also unable to coin money. "After all, they say, we can only invest the funds left to us by our customers. We do not create them. We only put the community savings at work." Now, the bankers who put forward this argument are completely mistaken. They have been snared by an old acquaintance of ours, the rhetorical sophism—but we must not forget that what is true for each of us is not necessarily true for all. The banking system on the whole can accomplish what a single bank is unable to do.

We there answer in the affirmative to the question which heads the present section:

CAN BANKS REALLY CREATE MONEY?

Yes, the American banking system and the American public jointly create approximately $5 worth of bank deposits for each dollar taken out of circulation and handed over to the banks.

In the same book, in order to back up his statement, the economist uses four tables starting with the first bank stage and tracing the chain reactions of a $1,000 deposit on the other banks.

This explanation may be understood by all those who are willing to go to the trouble of studying the system thoroughly.

Let us recall the following words of the wisest of statesmen, Abraham Lincoln:

The privilege to create and issue money is not only the sovereign prerogative of a government, it is also the greatest creative power.

Money must circulate for the sake of the country's development, just as if Canada were at war, and we are actually at war against internal foes, that is unemployment and hardship.

If this government really wanted to establish the just society that its leader promised the Canadian people during the 1968 election campaign, it could do so. A serious effort, a simple decision would be enough, and Canadians would be assured of a decent living, of freedom and security, because the two always go together. Our ancestors have fought for those two ideals in order to be able to pass them on to us. Even if the people enjoyed security from the cradle to the grave, as some socialist and communist leaders claim to be able to guarantee, in losing their freedom the people would also lose their soul. There is no happiness in security if one becomes a slave, if one loses one's right to choose.

[Mr. Dionne.]

On the other hand, what kind of happiness may we expect from this freedom of ours if we have lost our security? The one without the other serves no purpose. We can and we must enjoy freedom and security at the same time in a country such as Canada.

Let us consider the vast natural resources with which our country has been blessed by Providence. Let us consider the fertile lands from which we could draw more food than we need. Let us ask ourselves whether there is not enough of this plenty to provide economic security for our whole population for hundreds of years to come? What is preventing us enjoying it all? With more riches per capita than any other country, we should enjoy the highest standard of living in the whole world. Why is it not so? We, Creditistes, maintain without fear of being contradicted, that it is this deteriorated and outmoded financial system controlled by trusts, fostered and supported by stupid politicians, which prevents the nation from distributing the abundance that surrounds us.

To be truly consistent with man's natural aspirations, the real solution will have to be sought in an increased freedom for all individuals, and not in new limitations of the freedoms they have left. Such a solution would in no way be incompatible with the security that governments impose upon us on the grounds that it is the wish of the public. Citizens do demand a minimum of security, but they do not ask for a straightjacket. Security must be confortable and pleasant if we are to enjoy it fully. It must not stifle us and become execrable under the clumsy hands of its makers. Individuals can achieve it, if only governments would remove the obstacles that they themselves have put in the way, if only governments would consolidate the foundations of our economic structure instead of merely making occasional repairs. Sooner or later, the building will collapse. A chronic headache cannot be cured by taking tablets: the pain may be temporarily eased off, but its cause still remains.

Once the building has collapsed, the only thing left for our progeny will be to write our history and they will gaze with amazement at the unbelievable spectable that we will have supplied them with. If we were to be confronted with them, their opinion would shame us. They may write: "The people of the twentieth century had a strange behaviour! They were great masters in the art of producing goods and wealth but unsuccessful in distributing them. These same people, rather than increase figures, for fear of shortage preferred to restrict the production of goods. Their greatly advanced knowledge enabled them to reach the uninhabited moon while whole populations on their own planet remained inaccessible and destitute.

They feared production more than destruction: they restricted money deliberately in order to limit production, consumption and life. Money flowed profusely and without limits to stir up war and hasten demolition and death. They wasted with unspeakable lavishness the time of thousands of their fellow citizens as they condemned them to unaccountable unemployment. They sowed broadcast, happily, remorseless, the precious time of other thousands of citizens, to dole out to these unemployed a relative security from savings previously forced upon them.

They asked for an acceleration of production in order to cut down prices, and they recommended decreasing consumption with for the same purpose. Out and out imports were considered a disaster, the source of all misfortunes for a nation: a citizen was neither virtuous nor patriotic if he consumed imported products. But strangely enough, the citizens as a whole would become patriotic and virtuous if they succeeded in imposing this calamity to another people through out and out exports. Their big mistake was failing to realize that time is the only wealth that can be lost irrevocably. All other riches can wait until man is ready to exploit them to his own profit.

All this is strange, bizarre, extraordinary! But nowadays just mentioning these self-evident truths is enough to be branded as a dreamer, to make other people shrug their shoulders.

Advocates of this theory will be asked to be realistic, they will be suspected of being a little off the beam, but no one will never try to prove them wrong. They will be given the chance to admit it freely, that is if someone takes the trouble to listen to them, but they will never venture on the field of evidence. Obviously, they are wrong and they are told that they do not think the same way as the masterminds of our century. And yet, the truth is so simple that it seems incredible: the time of man is the only resource needed to develop matter, and it is the only one which is unrecoverable once it is lost.

Taking into account the present situation in Canada, the government authorities should not take too long before deciding to establish the "just society" that all Canadians aspire to.

Mr: Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, no member of this House can offord to miss the opportunity of blaming openly the present government for its fiscal policy, as stated in the bill now under study, namely Bill C-225, entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an Act to amend that Act".

Last Wednesday night, March 3, I took part, with a few colleagues from the opposition, in a discussion with the management of the Canadian Labour Congress. We discussed with this organization, which represents a million workers or more, the implications of the brief they had submitted to the government of Canada last March 1.

I agree generally with what is included in this brief, and I fully endorse a paragraph on page 13 dealing directly with the bill we are presently studying, which reads:

> It seems that a number of measures could be taken, most of them having a rather immediate stimulating effect on the economy in addition to bringing some relief to the people who need them. We should like to propose, for instance, an immediate personal income tax reduction in favour of lower income groups. Since those people have a strong tendency to spend any extra income or savings they might have, this would stimulate economy. Moreover, we cannot see any reason for maintaining the 3 per cent additional tax, and we therefore recommend its abolition. We are well aware that your government has undertaken to introduce shortly a new tax legislation, but the unemployment problem is so urgent that tax reductions should be considered first.

We then find in this bill that the government has completely ignored, as usual, the proposals of the Canadian Labour Congress. I realize that for the government, this brief has been prepared by mere workers but all the same, the government should at least have considered it and delayed the passage of the bill now before us.

With regard to clause 2 of the bill, the explanatory notes read as follows:

> This amendment would extend for one year the temporary surtaxes imposed under Part IA of the Income Tax Act.
> The surtax on an individual is 3% of his "basic tax" in excess of $200. It would be extended to apply to the 1971 taxation year.
> The surtax on a corporation is 3% of its tax computed under section 39 or 69 of the Income Tax Act. It would be extended to apply to profits earned in 1971.

• (4:10 p.m.)

And the same old story repeats itself today. Having reached that stage, why does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) not seek a temporary extension—to use his own words—of that surtax, for an indefinite period? Thus, the population would not know where it stands with such a government and, at the next general elections, it would know what to do.

Mr. Speaker, in order to believe in those temporary extensions, one must really have divine confidence in our leaders, which I, unfortunately, do not have.

Not only do they continue to tax Canadians with such laws, but they also contribute to get us bogged down in a system which has already proved, and which is still proving every day how illogical it is.

I consider that taxes, as they are used in the present system, are to say the least a little dishonest because, in my opinion, they must exist only to withdraw the excess money in circulation, in the face of the obvious fact that there is a lack of consumer products. But are there really too many products? I do not believe so. Is there a surplus of money? Certainly not, at least as far as I am concerned, and I would be glad to know anyone who is in the opposite situation, except naturally the few politicians who continue to believe that there are such people.

Why not at last realize that it is not the taxes which maintain a healthy economy, but a system adequate to the needs of consumers. We all know that bills like the one before us have been introduced since the coming into existence of the system and that we shall have more of them as long as the system exists in its present form.

What would be the use of freeing the producer within the industry, if the whole economic system, including the producer and the consumer and therefore industry itself and its elements, remains under the yoke of banks, which seem to be the "parents" of the present system? The only thing to do in order to free the community would be for the State, brain of the social body, to administer the banking system and oblige it to serve the people and not enslave them as it does, especially since we have been hearing about the just society from this government which I look upon as the most autocratic the Canadian people, have ever know.

Through this bill, we are laying for another year a new fiscal load on the taxpayers who have not enough money to get what would be necessary for a decent living, while there is an abundance of products in this country. Therefore I regard this extension of the 3 per cent surtax as pure and simple robbery or at least like something dishonest. If a concern is the site of a burglary over and over again, we look upon its owner as a very unlucky man. I believe the Canadian people are really unlucky. It has been like that for three years and it seems that things will not change.

Why not use the reins of power we have to reform the Canadian economy? Why manage in such a way that the taxpayer cannot provide for his most basic needs, by getting out of him the little money that would enable him to live decently?

On the contrary, the Canadian people have to pay absurd taxes like this 3 per cent surtax that the government was to put into force for a year only, a few years ago.

If the government removed the 3 per cent tax, this would encourage the workers, merchants and businessmen, it would help to stimulate the economy which is being jeorpadized by a burden of taxes, surtaxes and temporary taxes of all kinds, the plague of our citizens, especially small wage-earners, industrialists and businessmen.

If the government finally decided to face the truth, and specially to keep the promises made at election time, it would withdraw the bill or at least delay its passing until less drastic solutions are found to restore the Canadian economy. It is high time to do so. It is imperative for the Canadian government to do everything in its power to enable our economy to catch its breath.

To my mind, there are glaring contradictions in the means used by the government in managing our country. When that so-called temporary tax was levied several years ago, it was mainly to control alleged inflation.

Now, on December 3, the government stated that inflation—a term used to conceal the government's mistakes—had been checked. Then, why has that temporary surtax become permanent? Perhaps in anticipation of new inflation or perhaps the government is using that measure to play politics, reserving the right to repeal it before the next election.

After all, as recently stated by the minister, the people who are drawing social welfare or unemployment benefits are wel lpaid by the government. The surtax will increase unemployment still more, because it will take from the Canadian consumers part of their purchasing power which will reach some $245 million for the financial year 1971.

Thus, the government may add that amount to the one already allocated for the support of the unemployed.

Indeed, 25 per cent of the budget is now appropriated for social welfare and 14 per cent for development and economic support.

Mr. Speaker, we are spending more money on people doing nothing than to get the economy back on the road. Thanks to the amount produced by this 3 per cent surtax, the government will find funds to increase unemployment insurance benefits.

Hard as I try, I cannot begin to understand the logic behind this government, which leaves people unemployed, and then assists them through all sorts of social welfare schemes. I want to make this clear: I am not against the principle of social welfare, but against whoever wants to keep people out of work, as this is happening now.

This is nonsense, in such a rich country, and I would surely not want to be in the position of the Minister of Finance who can see numerous debts falling due and finds himself forced to keep a great number of Canadians in poverty, because of the shortcomings of the present system.

As long as the wheels of the Canadian economy have not been changed, Canadians will be forced to keep on pulling this wagon toward a destination which looks rather gloomy.

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-255, which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is asking us to extend for another year, seems somewhat dishonest to me, since in 1968, the same minister levied a 3 per cent tax which was to have been for a period of one year. The Minister of Finance will be reducing the income of those earning small salaries by some $200 million in purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, taxes are robbery when applied to taxpayers who do not have enough money to acquire the requisites for a decent life while there is an abundance of products in the country. Taxes are robbery so long as there are unsold products, forced unemployment, unused productive capacities due to lack of sales of products resulting from lack of purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, taxes are robbery in a period such as the one in which we live, because they reduce purchasing power, result in the overstocking of products and despoil the population just as inflation does.

Mr. Speaker, we of the Ralliement créditiste, are against the extension of the provisions of Bill C-225 for the following reasons: taxes should be intended only to take excess money out of circulation when products are scarce. When there is a shortage of money, the answer is not more taxes but a distribution of the purchasing power by means of a dividend or a compensated discount which would bring prices back to the level of the actual cost of production.

The financing of governments and public investments must be achieved through new financing or new credits according to the actual needs and the production capacity of a country.

To be efficient and socially adequate, an economic system must fulfil two conditions. Firstly, it should be able to produce goods to meet the needs of the people, and secondly, to distribute those goods in such a way that they meet the needs where they exist.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in introducing Bill C-225, goes against the logic of that "just society," about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked so much during the 1968 election campaign.

At the present time, there is not enough purchasing power to meet the needs of our many workers.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Do we in Canada lack anything necessary to fill the temporal needs of our Canadians, Mr. Speaker? Are we without sufficient food to satisfy the hunger of all? Do we lack shoes and clothing? Are we incapable of producing enough goods to meet the general demand? Do we lack railroads and other means of transportation? Do we lack wood and stone to construct a good house for every family? Are there not enough contractors, carpenters and other types of workers necessary to build them? Is there an insufficiency of machinery? As a matter of fact, we have all these things and more; in fact, we could have a lot more in Canada if our Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would only stop taxing the poor.

We have three-quarters of a million people who want to produce for the benefit of those in need, but they are paralyzed by the unfair policy of the Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, if there are a great many things to sell in a country, then logically there must be a great deal of money in order that these goods may be purchased. The more people and goods the more money there must be in circulation, otherwise the flow of goods is stopped. Money was created for the purpose of moving products into the hands of consumers. Why, then, does the necessary money not find its way into the hands of the people in amounts equal to the flow of goods from the production line?

The founder of Social Credit, Major Douglas, had this to say, "The industrial system, which makes goods, is not to blame for poverty; it is the financial system." We will never build a strong Canada by taxing those with low income for the benefit of those with high income, Mr. Speaker. This proves to us that the government always protects the strongest in the country

With Bill C-225, our Minister of Finance is attacking not only the individual with an ample income but also the individual with the bare minimum of income. He is taxing what is necessary to life, and that is money. People cannot live without money, even though we have plenty of everything in Canada.

When the Bank Act was passed, the Rothschild brothers, under date of June 25, 1863, wrote as follows:

It (this act) gives the National Bank almost complete control of national finance. The few who understand the system will be either so interested in its profits, or so dependent on its favours, that there will be no opposition from that class...the great body of the people, mentally incapable of comprehending will bear its burden without complaint.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a while ago I noted that some ministers in the House seemed to find the Social Credit opposition strange. In 1934, the Right Hon. Lyon Mackenzie King, then leader of the opposition had this to say:

Division

[English]

Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's law. Usury, once in control will wreck any nation. Until control of currency and credit is restored to Parliament and recognized as its most sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of Parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the words spoken by the former Prime Minister of Canada are clear enough to convey to the government that this is truly the case at the present time.

There is an abundance of goods, the people want to work, but, because of our financial system, they cannot do so and must rely on welfare to support their families.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfair, especially to the workers of Canada, to maintain the 3 per cent tax.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 1—Deemed capital cost of certain property.

Mr. Burton: When this bill was being considered at the second reading stage, a number of hon. members raised questions concerning the effectiveness of the proposed changes in capital cost allowances as they applied to the manufacturing and processing industries. I wonder whether at this stage the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Finance himself, who I see is just leaving his place, has any comments to make on the points which were made. I know that only one member on the other side of the House chose to take part in the debate during the second reading stage and that was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance when he spoke introducing the measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Burton: Government supporters cannot be very proud of this bill because not a single one of them stood up to speak in its favour. All they could do was stand up to say yes when the time came.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Burton: I can understand their lack of enthusiasm for it. I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance whether he would care to make any comment on this particular aspect of the bill as provided for in clause one. In fact, I would invite him to make any comments he might wish to make, though perhaps he would not wish to begin now, because I see it is almost five o'clock. I believe it would be appropriate for us to hear from the government with regard to the various points raised during second reading.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt)—Agriculture—Alleged trafficking in industrial milk quotas—request for information; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—Unemployment Insurance—Montreal—Inquiry as to government's intention to repair supposedly defective computer; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Youth—Cancellation of conference sponsored by Canadian Council on Social Development.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR COPY OF CONTRACT FOR SALE OF RESEARCH REACTOR TO TAIWAN

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the contract between the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Atomic Energy Council of Taiwan regarding the sale of a nuclear research reactor.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on November 4, 1970 I asked that the contract between Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Atomic Energy Council of Taiwan regarding the sale of a nuclear research reactor be tabled in this House. The reason I asked that the terms of the contract be tabled is that there is a growing suspicion among many Canadians that we are having difficulty in selling reactors in the export market. This growing suspicion was confirmed in the month of March 1971 by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), who admitted that Canada's attempt to sell nuclear reactors in the export market has been a dismal failure. The minister went on in no uncertain terms to cite the poor record Canada has in this regard and indicated that efforts to sell nuclear reactors in Finland, Argentina, Yugoslavia, Roumania and now Australia had failed.

I note that some members on the other side of the House look on this matter rather lightly, failing to realize the tremendous loss suffered by Canadians not only in terms of profit but in terms of employment. I am sure that when they have heard my remarks, and the remarks of some of my colleagues, they will take a more serious attitude to this question. We in Canada had high hopes that our CANDU system would make its mark in the sale of nuclear reactors throughout the world, that it would create not only a great deal of employment for Canadians but would produce a profit as well. The minister has stated that Canada stands little chance of beating a British bid to build a $150 million nuclear power plant in Australia. In other words, we have been up to bat five times and have struck out five times. The question therefore arises whether we are in the right league in this expensive and important field. Perhaps it is a field that is too expensive, one from which Canada should withdraw.

I suggest there is a comparison here with the ill-fated Arrow project. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that back in 1958 and 1959 Canada launched a program to sell aircraft to other countries. After an expenditure of some $300 million we had to cease production of the ill-fated Arrow, resulting in a great loss of money and, more importantly, loss of employment and potential markets. It was said at the time that the reason for the loss of sales was that many of the major powers that would have been purchasing the ill-fated Arrow had insufficient confidence in the ability of 20 million people to produce such a high powered and high priced aircraft. We now have an analogy in the nuclear reactor field. This is the reason I have brought this matter to the attention of the House, and I am asking that the details of the contract between the Taiwan government and the Canadian government regarding this sale be put before the House so that a study can be made to determine whether we should withdraw from this field.

One is reminded of the glowing optimism displayed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a year ago March when he literally put his cabinet portfolio on the line with regard to the potential of the CANDU system, saying that we stood an excellent chance of penetrating the market, making sales, creating employment and producing profits for Canadian companies. Now, like a dog with its tail between its legs, he is running for cover, trying to cloak himself with excuses. The minister may be right. We may be in a very expensive field in which our research know-how is insufficient to compete with that of the United States and some European countries. As the minister indicated, it looks as though we are going to fail in our bid to sell a $150 million reactor to Australia. However, I would remind the minister of the remarks he made about the CANDU system, which uses natural uranium and heavy water to moderate an atomic reaction and to transfer the heat to the generating turbines. If I am correct—and I must admit to very limited knowledge of this specialized field—this would mean that countries in the world would not have had to depend on our neighbour to the south which is the main supplier of enriched uranium.

It is very easy to have hindsight and to be able to criticize a government that has failed so many times. But, Mr. Speaker, I think you should appreciate that my intention, and the intention of the members of my party, was to draw the attention of the minister and members of the government to the serious situation that prevails. We wanted to know what were the terms of the contract between the Canadian and the Taiwan governments since it would have been foolish for the minister to misrepresent the position of Canada in this very important field.

One is quick to realize the limitations of a country like Taiwan, which is why one becomes rather suspicious that in announcing a sale to Taiwan the government may be attempting to cover up. In fact, this is not a sale in the real sense of competing with other countries in the supply of a nuclear reactor but more an extension of foreign aid to this particular country. It therefore behooves me, as a member of the New Democratic Party, to ask why the government refuses to place the terms of this contract before members so that we may study them. It may be said that the terms are very confidential and that to disclose this information might be detrimental to Canada's position in bidding in this field. I am sure that the members of our party, as well as members of the opposition, are fair and reasonable men and if the minister had said that he would agree to a meeting of the natural resources committee, the meeting could have been held in confidence. Let me point out to you the difficulties we are having in competing in foreign fields. The contract between Taiwan and Canada was more in the nature of foreign aid than the result of high powered competition among countries throughout the world. Had it been otherwise, members of the committee might have been able to report their satisfaction.

I have had great respect and regard for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources throughout the years. I know he has had legal training and has a legal mind. He has been able at times to persuade Canadians, in a rather shallow and empty way, to accept certain matters. When I look at some of his energy policies, I am acutely aware that we must be alert at all times to make judgments which are objective rather than subjective, completely dependent upon the minister and his officials.

Therefore, I have great confidence that the minister will agree to this motion this afternoon. I am sure he will agree to refer the matter to the appropriate committee and will appear before that committee with his officials to give the details of this contract as well as the problems we are facing regarding the sale of nuclear reactors. I would think if he sets forth the problems he has, and listens to the constructive criticisms of members of the committee, he may be able to salvage something in respect of this very important undertaking. I will not take any more of the time of the House because I have the greatest confidence in the minister. I know he will present his problems so we can study them and be better equipped to suggest solutions.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, it does my heart good to hear the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) admit in this House that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) has a large department to handle and that he is handling it well. I know that his liaison with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is extremely efficient because he has an excellent link between one of its major parts and A.E.C.L. in Renfrew North. The questioning of the expenditures in respect of Atomic Energy of Canada by the hon. member has raised some questions in my mind. Not very long ago, the committee on National Resources and Public Works visited Chalk River and Deep River. I am sure there was no intent on the part of the hon. member for Broadview, but at a dinner for us sponsored by the town of Deep River he criticized the government for not going ahead with the intense neutron generator at a cost estimated at that time of $150 million. Today in this House he has criticized this government for spending money in respect of Atomic Energy of Canada.

An hon. Member: That is not very consistent.

Mr. Hopkins: These statements are in conflict. There is one very important point I should like to put on the record at this time. On June 23, 1969, during a speech I made in this House, I brought out facts about the Glace Bay heavy water plant which, as we know, has been the subject of an expenditure of something in excess of $110 million. I criticized the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for decisions he made in the beginning regarding the construction of that plant. After I sat down, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) stood up and made the following statement while looking at me:

> Mr. Speaker, it is a great temptation to go rabbit hunting but I will not do that tonight. I simply say to the previous speaker that the events of this summer and fall will prove the point. I know the hon. member is a sensitive individual, and I know he will be quite embarrassed when the announcements are made that will indicate to the people of Canada, and in particular of Nova Scotia, the wisdom of the then premier of that province moving into this field.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: That is what the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East calls wisdom. The present Leader of the Opposition in this House supports the expenditure of $110 million on a heavy water plant in Glace Bay which is still not producing heavy water. If he is going to run the province of Nova Scotia into that kind of debt, God help Canada if he ever becomes Prime Minister.

The hon. member for Broadview has questioned whether we are in the right field, and whether we should be involved in this area of development. Let me say to the hon. member for Broadview that I am one of the members in this House who has on previous occasions, at public meetings, in reports, on radio and on television, stated that if Canada is to play its role in the future of this world it will have to spend more money on research programs in many fields, not only scientific but trade, commercial and technological. The perfect example of this can be found in the fact that the Japanese are building specific types of ships. They are buying Canadian wood from the west coast of Canada, manufacturing plywood, and selling it to Canada and the United States cheaper than we can produce it here in Canada.

I am sure it was not the intention of the hon. member for Broadview to leave the impression that people on the government side of the House are not interested in research projects. Let me make it very clear that it is deplorable that the science community in Canada has been criticized to the extent it has in the past few months. Every one of us in this House knows that we must carry out research in order to obtain realistic answers to our problems. Mistakes have been made in the past. Is there anyone in this House who is willing to say that from now on every science program to be undertaken will be perfect from beginning to end? This is not the meaning of research. There are many cases in which the trial and error method must be used. If we are not willing to take such a gamble Canada will stand still and will drag farther behind the other nations of the world who are willing to take that gamble. We must spend money to build up such industries as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. When the hon. member for Broadview was speaking I could not help but wonder what the Hon. C. D. Howe would be thinking if he were able to hear his speech. In spite of all the citicism that has ever been made inside or outside this House about the Hon. C. D. Howe—

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Right Honourable.

Mr. Hopkins: Thank you; I am glad to be corrected because I have always held him in very great esteem and have always considered him as a great Canadian. Last summer I had the pleasure of attending the unveiling of a plaque in his honour in my constituency. We, as Canadians, owe a great debt to this statesman who placed us in a forward position in respect of scientific research in this field. He was a very capable administrator and should certainly be remembered in this House during such a debate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, recently there has been a great controversy in Canada concerning heavy water. There certainly has been a great controversy in my constituency because recent reports about the scarcity of heavy water have placed doubt in the minds of the 2,350 employees who work at the Atomic Energy Plant at Chalk River. In a riding such as mine, this number represents a large portion of the total labour force in the area. I have been informed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited there is no danger that the research work being carried on at Chalk River will be affected by the situation in respect of heavy water, so the people employed there can feel secure in this regard. This is the report I have received from AECL. Despite the failure of the Nova Scotian plant at Glace Bay, Canada has been fortunate in being able to purchase 187 tons of heavy water from Sweden.

An hon. Member: At $30 a pound.

Mr. Hopkins: I am glad you mentioned the figure. I have not checked it. This is the figure you are giving me, and I do not wish it to be considered as my figure. I do happen to know that if the heavy water had been produced in Canada we would have been able to buy it for $7 less per pound. The consequence of our depending on the people who built the Glace Bay heavy water plant for our source of heavy water is that we are paying over $7 a pound more for heavy water for all our research plants, and for the commitments we have made to such institutions as Ontario Hydro and others using reactors or generators.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sin no more.

Mr. Hopkins: I should like to point out to the hon. member for Broadview that it seems to me every time there is a labour settlement with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited his party seems to like to take full credit for all the negotiations and for all the increases the employees receive. Well, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited employees have been receiving their increases from Liberal governments in this country and they owe the birth of that industry to a Liberal government. I think this should be placed on the record and remembered very well by hon. gentlemen.

As late as three weeks ago, the personnel working on behalf of this Liberal government made a settlement with 600 people, mostly tradesmen, at Atomic Energy of Canada Limited at Chalk River. There are still other negotiations to be completed but I believe they are progressing very well. So, I just wish to place on the record, on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the House, the fact that it is not always the NDP which does the major part of the work for labour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I do not like to interrupt the speech of the hon. member but we are a little far away from Taiwan.

An hon. Member: But he is telling the truth.

Mr. Hopkins: Geographically, Mr. Speaker, and possibly even verbally, we are away from Taiwan. I think, however, that we should consider the historic perspective of this whole program of atomic energy in Canada because I do not think hon. members opposite have done all their homework, nor do I pretend to have done all mine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is obvious.

Mr. Hopkins: Historically, Canada's position as one of the five most advanced nations in atomic energy development may be said to have had its origins in the discovery and exploitation of uranium deposits for the production of radium in the 1930's. The switch during the war to interest in uranium for nuclear weapons development, concurrently with the need for a base for the British atomic energy research program, brought Canada into the tripartite council with the UK and the United States. Moreover, French scientists, who had pioneered the idea of the heavy water natural uranium chain reactor, were working with the UK team. Canada undertook, jointly with them, to develop the heavy water reactor for the production of plutonium. Based on pilot experiments with the ZEEP, a zero energy pile which started operating at Chalk River, Ontario, in 1945, the adjacent NRX reactor was built and came into operation in 1947. It was so successful that in 1949-50 both the United States program of giant heavy water production reactors at Savannah River and the combined research and production reactor, NRU, at Chalk River, were committed.

To conduct the growing program of atomic energy research and development involving reactor construction and operation and the production of isotopes, the Crown company, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, was formed in 1952 to take over the research from the National Research Council and the radioisotope business from a sister Crown company, Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited.

The direct cost of the NRX reactor did not exceed $10 million. The NRU reactor, completed in 1957, cost $58 million but earned a revenue of more than $30 million from the sale of plutonium to the U.S.A. Since 1951 these two main reactors at Chalk River have also produced radio-cobalt—cobalt-60—and other isotopes for commercial sales and use in cancer therapy units, and in irradiators for sterilizing packaged medical supplies and other purposes.

An hon. Member: How much of it is going to Taiwan?

Mr. Hopkins: The Canadian isotope production business has increased from about $500,000 in 1952 to a sales volume of more than $10 million per year. Research and development have grown from prime interest in nuclear physics, chemistry and biology to embrace basic materials research and large-scale engineering for nuclear power.

Canada's development of a distinct line of highly economical nuclear power reactors has now reached the stage of initial commercial acceptance by electric utilities. This has been achieved in spite of the fact that our expenditures for nuclear power development have been very modest compared with those of the U.S.A., U.S.S.R., U.K., France, and now Western Germany and Japan. Much benefit has been derived from technical collaboration with the U.S.A. and U.K. Similar collaboration is being established with France. Since 1955 there has been successful collaboration with India which has led to the operation since 1961, near Bombay, of the CIRUS reactor similar to NRX and to a sequence of Canadian-designed power reactors of 200 megawatt electrical rating now under construction.

The total employment roll of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has risen from 1,396 at its formation in 1952 to 4,685 in 1970—not a bad employment record in spite of the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview who said more employment should have been brought about by this particular industry. A more extensive history has been published under the title "Canada's Nuclear Story," by Wilfrid Eggleston.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, Canada's position so far as heavy water is concerned would be much better if the Nova Scotia government had hired expertise from the scientific community of Atomic Energy of Canada instead of running off to the U.S. to hire someone else. But today, with Atomic Energy officials looking into the heavy water plant at Glace Bay to see whether it can be repaired or salvaged in any way, I am sure that production of heavy water in Canada is now in far more capable hands.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I wish to advise the hon. member that having travelled from Chalk River to Nova Scotia to France, the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy, we never did get to Taiwan.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had known earlier that this topic was coming up for consideration today because I have some quite definite feelings on it. I would like first to comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins). He suggested that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), when he was Premier of Nova Scotia, made some serious errors in regard to the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. That is quite obvious, and probably no one regrets it more than the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McBride: There is small comfort in that.

Mr. Thomson: But there is one thing that I think should be mentioned relating to our export sales, to the fact that we do not produce heavy water to accompany any possible sales of plant that we make abroad and to the difficulty we have acquiring enough heavy water for our own use. It is the fact that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited cannot be absolved of all responsibility in regard to the Glace Bay plant. When Atomic Energy signed a contract with the government of Nova Scotia it should have made certain that the production methods at Glace Bay were of a satisfactory nature. To my knowledge this was never thoroughly checked out by Atomic Energy. If it did not do so, why did it sign the contract on behalf of the federal government? This is a point that should be emphasized.

But, Mr. Speaker, all that is in the past. We want to concern ourselves now with the production of atomic energy in Canada and with sales of plant abroad. We would like to know more about sales abroad; this is the purpose of the motion. Are we going to be able to sell more atomic energy plants abroad? I have visited two atomic energy plants in Canada, the Pickering plant where one unit is completed or practically completed, with three more units under construction, and the prototype plant at Gentilly, Quebec. As a result, I cannot help feeling that the government should have got the lead out sooner with regard to new ideas in the scientific field covering new methods of producing atomic energy.

I was impressed with one of the new ideas being used at Gentilly. One of the main criticisms of the CANDU operation is its high capital cost. The plant at Gentilly is reducing considerably its capitals cost in the sense of boiling light water for steam instead of using heavy water. When one considers that heavy water costs $30 per pound you realize this will reduce the plant's costs and it also cuts out the costs of a heater changer. The plant does not have to worry about losing heavy water at $30 per pound, because what does it matter if it loses only a little ordinary light water. I may be speaking without proof that the plant at Gentilly is going to work. But if I were in the market for an atomic energy plant I would hesitate about purchasing an installation such as the one at Pickering. I would look seriously at the prototype plant in Gentilly because I believe it has good possibilities.

It has been said that capital costs involved in the production of atomic energy are too high. I would point out that these days the costs of producing energy in all fields are going up. When costs in these other fields rise, atomic energy will come into its own. Mention was also made of the late C. D. Howe. I suggest that the present government is not approaching the production of atomic energy, and many other things, with the enthusiasm that Mr. Howe displayed. I believe that if Mr. Howe had had an opportunity to collaborate with Japan in producing enriched uranium he would already have talked Japan into a contract. The present government has not made that progress. Further, if we hedged our bets a little by producing something which we do not use in our own atomic energy plants, if later on we decided that our type of production of atomic energy is not the best we could change, particularly if we had an enriched uranium plant in Canada.

There are one or two other items I would also like to mention. Just the other day I read that an American experimental group is producing energy from hydrogen. This is a new concept and one which we may use in the future. There is no radioactive waste in connection with this production. If we are to keep up to date in producing atomic energy, I feel we must invest more money in research. I compliment the hon. member for Renfrew North for recognizing this fact, but part of the problem in any scientific project is paying the development costs. If we have only two or three plants, the development costs are high compared with the cost of the plants themselves. If we could sell 10 or 15 plants, obviously the cost would come down. If we had 15 plants for sale we could afford to invest more money in research. It is a cycle that would logically grow. First of all, however, we have to sow the seed and have some faith.

I commend the government for the faith they have had in moving into some of these fields. I feel they could have done much more in developing new ideas and spending more money on research. Employing our own technicians and engineers here in Canada rather than letting them go abroad to do research would be a better arrangement. I wish I were in a position to quote figures in connection with some of the research done in other countries, and the return on the dollar invested.

I am impressed with the general principle that if we want something, atomic energy plants or anything else, we must sow the seeds in research and try out our ideas. In view of the savage competition from abroad, if we demand that some countries pay us in American dollars for atomic energy plants they may well ask themselves: Why not buy plants made in the United States?

We have seen that Britain has tied itself to a tobacco deal with one country, and there is also evidence that in negotiations with Australia other factors are involved in trade which Canada is not willing to consider. If we want to sell for straight cash and not be bothered with any other form of trade, we may have to be prepared to take second place or perhaps not sell at all. I should commend the hon. member for Broadview for initiating this discussion. I feel something more should be done in the committee and in our scientific community, and a lot more should be done in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I thought in this private members' hour we would be debating the production of papers, specifically papers in this particular field. However, in my humble opinion the hon. member for Renfew North (Mr. Hopkins) has turned this hour into one for making a very political speech which, with great respect to him, has no place in private members' hour. This is one of the things the loud-mouthed preacher from Renfrew—

Mr. Bell: He would not know any better.

Mr. McCutcheon: —should remember, too. He should not let his politics stick out all over the place. I enjoyed the remarks of my friend from Renfrew North—

Mr. McBride: Now you are just being personal.

An hon. Member: The parsimonious parson.

An hon. Member: Please keep quiet.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, let it be on the record that the former Premier of the province of Nova Scotia is on record in this House as welcoming the construction of the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. He made a statement here that he was very happy and proud about it. What is more, in the last two months he has been optimistic about the rehabilitation of the plant when speaking on television, and we were too.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCutcheon: Just as soon as I am through.

Mr. McBride: Is the hon. member aware that there were $42 million of federal money—

An hon. Member: He said no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) has the floor.

Mr. McCutcheon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will only be a minute and when I am finished I will be happy to entertain any intelligent question. The fact remains that we are obviously out of our depth in this big league of atomic energy, and the correspondence no doubt would prove it to this House. That is the purpose of the exercise today, to discuss the production of papers.

Mr. McBride: Would the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. McCutcheon: I don't think there is time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McBride: He makes charges which he is afraid to substantiate.

Atomic Energy

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to enter this debate and speak on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). At the outset I would say that I cannot accept the notice of motion as presented, but with other members I appreciate the opportunity to comment on atomic energy, nuclear power and the agreement with the Taiwan government.

In his remarks the hon. member for Broadview mentioned the concern—I believe he said suspicion, but there is concern—about the fact that the Canadian atomic energy program, so eagerly anticipated for different parts of the world, has not as yet met expectations. However, he misquoted the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) and I should like to set this straight for the record. The minister said that the CANDU reactor, based on the use of natural uranium and heavy water, would stand on its own merits against any other atomic energy system—in our own domestic market. Of course, we have many reactors completed or under construction in Canada: the Rolphton reactor, the one at Douglas Point, Pickering One, Pickering Two, Three and Four are projected, the Gentilly reactor and the Bruce reactors One, Two, Three and Four which are projected in the future.

I want to make it quite clear that the minister was very definite in his statement regarding our domestic market. Of course, in the international market many factors can be involved. We are all aware of the recent discovery of uranium ore in Australia. Of course, our government thought that this would assist us in our discussions and anticipations regarding reactors for Australia. Unfortunately, the British nuclear power group has offered to share with Australia its program on the manufacture of uranium.

There is no question that the CANDU reactor's capital cost is higher, but the operating cost and the differential in price between natural and enriched uranium can play an important part in operating expenses for any power reactor. Of course, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says that he is not fixed to the CANDU program. In a speech he made, or at his press conference in Japan last December he suggested it was possible that some capital assistance could be obtained from countries of the Pacific rim to develop a plant for the enrichment of uranium in Canada. I think we have to consider all these factors in regard to the potentiality of our role in nuclear energy in the world.

I now wish to make a few general remarks about the Taiwan contract. I think the hon. member for Broadview and other hon. members would be interested to know that the contract for the reactor was signed in September, 1969. It is not a power reactor, but a research reactor.

Mr. Gilbert: That is what my motion talks about.

Mr. Hymmen: The hon. member did not say that, I submit. As I say, this is a research reactor. The hon. member failed to stress that point in his remarks.

[Mr. McBride.]

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Hymmen: The hon. member talked about the failures of the Liberal government. Once in a while I think we want to hear about some successes.

Mr. Gilbert: So do we.

Mr. Hymmen: It is nice to hear of the successes of various organizations and agencies serving this country under a Liberal government. The reactor in question is a research reactor similar to the one at Chalk River. It is intended to produce cobalt-60, one of the discoveries of Canadian nuclear research scientists.

May I at this point refer to the first report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, volume 1 of which criticizes considerably Canada's efforts in the field of nuclear energy. It completely ignores the fact that the heavy water and research program carried on at Chalk River resulted in cobalt-60, one of the important discoveries in the treatment of cancer. As a result, people suffering from cancer can be treated in our own country and can be so treated in the republic of Taiwan. Instead of always talking abour our failures, hon. members ought to recognize that this is one of our successes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hymmen: The total cost of this project in Taiwan is approximately $35 million, the Canadian content of which will be some $28 million. It is a 100 per cent commercial contract, with no lending arrangements or other special financial considerations. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is the prime contractor. Most of the Canadian content will be provided by Canadian firms in the form of engineering services, fuel and project management. Construction began at the site in 1970 and is going ahead well, and there is every indication that the project will be completed by 1973. I know that hon. members will be interested to know that the Taiwan authorities agreed to accept the application of the safeguard system of the international atomic energy agency to ensure that the reactor is used for peaceful purposes only.

The Taiwan research reactor, as my colleague said, is a development of the NRX reactor that was first started in Chalk River in 1947 and has twice been rebuilt since that time. Capitalizing on and benefiting from the experience with our NRX reactor, the Taiwan research reactor is a highly sophisticated research and development reactor and was selected by the Taiwan Atomic Energy Commission after much careful consideration of the various research reactors available in the world. It is similar to the CIRUS reactor, originally called the Canada/India Reactor, or CIR, at Trombay, near Bombay, India. This reactor, completed in 1961, was based on the NRX design. Its success and contribution to the Indian atomic energy program undoubtedly influenced the Taiwan decision in favour of a Canadian reactor.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited hopes, and indeed expects, to market its reactor elsewhere. Roumania has shown serious interest in acquiring one of these NRX reactors for its national atomic energy program.

Roumanian interest was sparked by the integrated nuclear program of India, with its heavy water research reactor and a series of heavy water power reactors starting with the two units in Rajasthan which are modelled on the design of the Canada, Douglas Point, nuclear power reactor.

Other countries interested in natural uranium-fueled power reactors recognize the merits of the NRX reactor and are potential customers. International bidding for large and expensive items of equipment is intense and contenders, for good reason, do not show any more of their cards than is absolutely necessary. When a job has been obtained it is normal for the total price to be divulged and, possibly, the value of some of the components.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause I—Deemed capital cost of certain property.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I see that my comments just before five o'clock failed to induce the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary to rise and deal with some of the points which were raised on second reading.

I believe it is one of the functions of the committee of the whole to consider the points which have been raised in debate in a realistic and honest fashion, and I hope a statement will be forthcoming from spokesmen on the government side of the House dealing with some of the observations which have been made concerning cost allowances. In an effort to bring the parliamentary secretary to his feet, I should like to address a question to him at this point. Possibly this was reported at some point and I overlooked it. Could I be informed how much the government expects to lose in revenue through the application of this provision? At the same time, while it is not immediately relevant to the clause under consideration, could the committee have figures with respect to the gain in revenue that will be achieved as a result of the extension of the 3 per cent surtax on both individual income tax and corporation tax for the year 1971?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the first question, this was dealt with in the speech on second reading. It is estimated that the manufacturing and processing enterprises which are likely to be able to take advantage of this incentive undertake some $3 billion worth of capital investment annually. This would entitle them to claim extra capital cost allowance over the lifetime of the assets in the sum of $450 million. It is expected that for the fiscal year 1971-72 the cost of this incentive to the treasury will be $25 million.

With regard to the second question, which relates to clause 2, it is my understanding that the estimated revenue from the 3 per cent surtax for the current year would be $240 million.

Mr. Burton: I wonder whether the minister would make further comments about some of the observations that have been made about the capital cost allowance program as it is proposed in this clause.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if it will please the committee, and particularly the hon. member, I will do so. In his comments immediately prior to private members' hour he invited discussion of the government's assessment of the efficacy of the measure proposed in clause 1 of this bill. He also remarked during second reading that I had been the only government member to speak on the bill as I had introduced second reading on behalf of my minister.

In reply to the latter point, I suggest to the hon. member that he would not, I am sure, have made that point had his parliamentary duties required him to attend in the House and listen attentively to the entire debate, as I did. Had he done so he would have recognized that except in a couple of rare instances the debate did not deal specifically with Bill C-225 but, rather, was of a general nature which really continued the six-day budget debate for a further period, three days so far. Government members participated fully in the six-day budget debate. Being no doubt respectful of the rules of this chamber, and being in accord with the government's economic policies in general and those reflected in this bill in particular, they feel no compulsion to join in extending the budget debate beyond the six days that the Standing Orders provide and which the House had completed prior to the introduction of this bill.

I am here ready, willing and able to deal with specific questions regarding this bill, including those that the hon. member alleges were posed during the second reading debate, although if there were many of them they must have escaped me in spite of my attentiveness. The government is confident that the measure proposed in clause 1 will be an effective incentive for the rather specific purpose for which it is designed, namely, the encouragement of capital investment in new manufacturing and processing facilities. This in turn will have a direct, positive effect in terms of increased employment.

Since the measure will apply to capital expenditures made between December 4, 1970, and March 31, 1972, it is not possible to assess the impact of the proposals with precision at this time, and it will not be possible to do so until after the income tax returns of businesses taking advantage of the incentive have been filed for the taxation years ending between December 4 last and March 31, 1972. What is certain is that the direct effect of the 115 per cent capital cost allowance base on the cash flow of qualifying taxpayers constitutes a very real and significant incentive when taken into account with the cost of financing capital expenditures. Its exact value to a given taxpayer will depend on a number of factors, including depreciation class, interest rates, term of borrowing and so on. Inquiries concerning the proposal, as well as announced capital expenditure intentions, confirm the government's assessment of the value of the incentive.

I might say that I took the opportunity during the dinner hour to review the hon. member's speech on second reading on March 3. I found none of the specifics that he alleged earlier today in his speech. There was a specific in the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton West, who was concerned that the 115 per cent base would be available only for prescribed property not previously used for any purpose whatever. That is precisely the intention, to inspire new plant and facilities, and we make no apology for it.

I commend clause 1 to the committee. If the hon. member has any specific questions relevant to the clause I shall be pleased to hear them and to have an opportunity to respond to them.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could clarify one matter that has puzzled me a little. I refer to the incentive to encourage enterprises to decide to move forward investment decisions; I presume that is the purpose of the measure. I am a little puzzled as to the appropriateness of this provision by itself, in view of the forecast of business investment for 1972 received by the Economic Council of Canada, which showed quite a dismal expectation for that year. If the effect of this provision is to encourage enterprises to make investments in 1971 and as far as April 1, 1972, which they would otherwise have made in the year 1972, then it looks like a pretty feeble effort in view of the anticipated investments reported to the Economic Council.

Mr. Basford: They were made before this bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, they were. I would be happy to engage in a debate with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who, if he is not careful, may become Minister of Finance himself one day. My point is that since the purpose of the measure seems to be to move forward investment decisions, if the investments to be moved forward are very insubstantial in any event then surely the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance ought to present to this committee some more substantial stimulus in view of the very weak expectations reported to to the Economic Council for 1972 through to 1975.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, may I simply say that the forecasts of business expenditures have been out in the past, as my hon. friend has seen for himself today. Last year people were saying that it was a terrible year, whereas the increase in capital expenditures in Canada was 8 per cent, much above what was expected by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. If we are talking about creating jobs now by means of this kind of incentive and one can write off 15 per cent beyond the cost of a particular asset, I suggest this is certainly a great incentive to moving the installation of that asset back into 1971 as compared with, say, 1972 and 1973. I am not at all worried about the economic forecasts in 1972 and 1973.

I think the economy of Canada is moving upwards and I think it will continue to move upward in spite of the great concern the Leader of the Opposition has expressed. He realizes that this is the case; he knows the economy will move upward in 1971 and through 1972. He knows that is why we are including this particular incentive at this time. In the over-all picture it will mean that a lot of assets will be put in place in the fiscal year 1971-72 which would not otherwise be in existence, in that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, this is exactly what we want to do: we want people to move their capital expenditure programs forward in order that we can create jobs as soon as possible without creating inflation. My hon. friend has talked a great deal lately, even during the question period today, about what is and what is not happening. This kind of program represents an incentive which businessmen really understand. They understand that when they are investing in their assets the most important thing to them is the cash flow, how much they can write off and the amount of capital available to them and when. I maintain this is a very strong incentive in respect of the movement forward of capital expenditures into the current fiscal year instead of putting them off until the fiscal year 1972-73.

I would simply like to say again that I am not worried about what will happen in 1972-73, although I know this is important to my hon. friend because there might be an election about that time. I think the Canadian economy is moving upward. I am sure it will continue to do so. This will create jobs, and we want jobs as fast as we can get them.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not fast enough.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I was not really asking the minister whether he was worried about investment expectations in 1972-73, because it is quite irrelevant whether he is worried. The fact is that the most accurate and most reasonable indication we have had is that investment in 1972-73, on the basis of the present policies of the government, will be poor. I suggest that the minister should try to move forward in another way rather than following this weak method. He ought to be encouraging expansion in the next few years instead of simply attempting to move forward the investments which have been forecast.

I have made many suggestions to the hon. minister, to which he has paid no heed at all, as to what he might do to stimulate economic growth and investment confidence in this country. Whether the minister is worried, and regardless of the forecast he has made, I would be less than honest if I did not take this opportunity to say I have no more confidence in his forecast today than I had in his forecast in 1968. At that time he forecast a surplus, and we ended up with a deficit of about $700 million.

Mr. Benson: In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I have no more confidence in the Leader of the Opposition than I had when he went into Deuterium of Canada Limited. I simply say that the economy is moving upward. This bothers the Leader of the Opposition. He has been running all over the country talking about an election in 1971. He has suggested that we have to call an election now because he knows things are going to be good in 1972. He does not want to see the economy move upward: this is because of political reasons and nothing else. I believe that the Canadian economy will move forward and upward. I believe that in the fiscal year 1971-72 we will find a decline in seasonally adjusted unemployment. I am sure we will also find an increase in the gross national product. People outside this country forecast a much greater increase than I forecast in my budget speech in December. We will also find an increase in productivity in Canada.

I can understand how this upsets the Leader of the Opposition. He really has had a very tough time. He wants to upset everybody in Canada by suggesting that we are not doing things for 1971. All the time in the House of Commons he suggests that we should be creating more jobs now. He suggests the Minister of Finance should be worried about creating jobs in 1972-73 but should not be worried about creating jobs at this stage. I suggest that a government which is responsible must be worried about creating jobs now. A responsible government must be concerned about moving forward, as this government is now doing, with a sound economic policy for Canada. Such a government must adopt a policy to increase the number of jobs, increase the gross national product and decrease unemployment in the economy without undue inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to reply to the Minister of Finance. I am not surprised that the country is in the state it is now, in view of the way the minister has attempted to twist what I have said into the suggestion that I am concerned only about unemployment in 1971. What I am saying is that the measures being put forth by the minister are inadequate to sufficiently stimulate employment in 1971. His suggestion that I am worried is irrelevant. The fact is that there are about 750,000 unemployed people today as a result of the government's inflationary policy.

I am surprised that the minister would play politics with an issue as important as this. I suggest to him that it is not adequate to provide an incentive designed to move investment forward in 1972-73 to 1971. This is particularly true when the forecast by the Economic Council of Canada is so dismal in respect of these years. What the minister ought to be doing is listening to someone other than himself. He should be attempting to stimulate investment generally, rather than relying on a forward movement in the coming fiscal year. He is thinking in terms of investment which has already proved to be inadequate. Instead of this mockery in which he is engaging he should be stimulating sound investment during 1971-72 and 1973. I am suggesting that his policies are inadequate to create employment in 1971. I have tried to explain to him why his policies are inadequate, but he does not seem to understand.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition has brought politics into this debate. I suppose the place for politics is the House of Commons. I believe that the policies developed by this government are the best possible. I am sure it upsets the Leader of the Opposition that we are overcoming inflation to a large degree. He never really overcame inflation or unemployment in his province. I like to think back on his speeches last year in which he talked about inflation. I recall his colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward Hastings, standing up and saying that a .5 per cent monthly increase means we will experience a 6 per cent inflation ratio during the year. This is the sort of thing I heard said a year ago. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition is very upset about the successful developments in the economic situation.

Mr. Stanfield: I am very upset about the unemployment situation.

Mr. Benson: The hon. member did nothing about the unemployment situation in Nova Scotia when he was Premier. He is responsible for starting that province in the direction of a serious debt position. That province will find it very difficult to recover from that situation. In spite of his experience with Deuterium of Canada, he stands up now and says that we should stimulate the economy. How to stimulate the economy at this particular time is really a matter of judgment. We have moved through a period in which the economy has bottomed out and started moving upward. We have done much better in this regard than our neighbours to the south. We have had less increase in unemployment. We have had an increase in our gross national product, whereas theirs has declined; and we have had a price performance which is almost twice as good as that of the United States.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I do not know how much the Leader of the Opposition would expect the Canadian economy to achieve. I would say, however, we are looking forward in Canada—and indeed economists throughout the world and those in Canada say we are looking forward—to a basic growth in our economy. The one thing we must worry about, which I consider to be a very serious matter, is that we do not get back onto an inflationary spiral in this country. The economy is moving upward and is doing much better than any other economy in the western world.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't give us that.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to read the reports by independent economists, including a report in Business Week a couple of weeks ago which said we are miles ahead of what is happening in the United States, to look at what is happening to the Canadian economy and see if he can say we have not moved through this difficult period, a period which really started about 10 years ago when we moved through an expansionary period in Canada, when we got rid of the last Tory government and moved through a very dangerous inflationary period in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the Minister of Finance, but we are getting a little away from the subject of the bill. We are talking about things which are not covered by the bill. However, perhaps the House wishes to hear more of the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Go ahead; finish.

Mr. Woolliams: Even one of your own chairmen cannot take it.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I really do not want to speak at length on this because we discussed the economic situation in Canada during the budget debate. I think the economic situation in Canada looks very favourable. I can understand that this upsets the Leader of the Opposition. If I were sitting over there it would upset me too. We have had very great problems in Canada which we had to overcome.

The situation in Canada in respect of the United States has been very favourable through the current period in moving through very high inflation which caused all kinds of difficulties to all the people in Canada, not just the unemployed but everybody who is working in Canada and particularly those people who do not have the power to force their demands upon the Canadian economy. I think we have moved through it reasonably well and are looking toward a period of expansion. I can understand why it upsets the Leader of the Opposition. I sympathize with his position, but nevertheless this is happening in this country and I have not heard him deny it.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition, if we were to accept all his suggestions and inject another billion dollars into the Canadian economy this year, what would he be saying 18 months from now when inflation in this country would be away ahead of inflation in other countries and we would be unable to compete in the export markets and carry on with the relatively easy prices we want to achieve in Canada?

The Deputy Chairman: I recognize the Leader of the Opposition once more, and after that I think we should go on to another member.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say something that is relevant to the bill. As I did when I started, let me say that when the minister talks about my being concerned, I am very concerned about the unemployment that exists. I am very concerned about the inadequacy of the measures proposed in this bill. I am concerned about the increase in taxation, which is a step in the opposite direction to that which the opposition proposes at the present time. I am concerned that the clause with which we are dealing is very inadequate for the purpose for which it is designed.

The minister can talk all he likes about his confidence, his forecasts or anything else, but the fact is that there are some 750,000 people out of work. He says this figure is moving down. I say as I said before, that I see no forecasts by independent economists this year which indicate any expectation of growth based upon the present policies and which would cut into unemployment to any degree. I am not talking about unemployment moving down as summer approaches; I am talking about unemployment seasonally adjusted.

The minister cannot point to any prediction by any independent economist that any growth forecast this year will cut into unemployment to any extent. We read a statement made yesterday by the chairman of one of his own commissions to this effect. I urge the minister not to be so stubborn, to listen to advice that is being given to him by others and recognize that the measures he is taking will not in fact reduce unemployment this year.

He spoke a few minutes ago about the measures I propose as being inflationary. One day he says these measures are inflationary and the next day he says they are not. I say to the minister there is no reason to believe the kind of tax reduction I have proposed would be inflationary in the present circumstances. The minister admitted the other day in the House that he was not making that complaint. Now he has reversed himself and is arguing that it is inflationary.

Dealing specifically with the bill, I say that this provision is directly opposite to what is required today; it is a deterrent to expansion. This measure is inadequate. One reason in particular it is inadequate is that investment forecasts for 1971, 1972 and 1973 are too weak in any event, and there is not in this measure any encouragement to investment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am not rising to attempt to say whether the Minister of Finance or the Leader of the Opposition has the greatest cause to be worried. I am inclined to agree, as the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, that by the vigour of his rhetoric the Minister of Finance at least sounded a bit worried. I suggest to the minister that we consider the politics—as I understood him to use that word a few minutes ago—of the particular clause which is before us. I was a little amazed at the argument the minister advanced in supporting what he sees as the merits of this provision, because he launched into a rather windy dissertation on the causes of unemployment and what one should do to correct it.

I could have understood it if the minister had stood up in the House and suggested that in his view this capital cost allowance arrangement was designed to increase the long-term efficiency of the industrial machine of Canada by encouraging firms to invest in modernized equipment. This would have made political and economic sense. But if the minister is going to argue that it will help cope with the current unemployment situation and will have the effect of reducing unemployment, I would like him to bring some cold, hard statistics and facts before the committee to bolster and verify his argument.

My own observation is that the immediate result of the introduction of new machinery into plants is a reduction in the level of the work force required in a particular form of production. As a matter of fact, unless the minister can prove otherwise, this is almost axiomatic. There may be a long-term effect in the stimulation of the economy that over a period of time will lead to a total increase in the level of economic activity and which will have a beneficial impact in respect of the numbers of people required in the work force, but that was not the basis of the minister's argument.

The minister was trying to tell the committee that this clause would have an immediate beneficial effect on the unemployment picture. He could argue that there would be more employment in construction, but if he wants the House to give serious consideration to his proposal he should say exactly what he means. He should say how much this will improve employment, and in what sector of the work force, for how long it will improve it and what will be the net result in relation to construction activity as compared with the reduction, if any, that will take place in the production work force.

To give an example of what I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, I remember that we had a discussion on this very point when the President of the Privy Council first made the announcement in the House about the decision to construct the heavy water plant at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. I asked him questions on this very subject. He had made a statement to the effect that it would be a great stimulation to employment in that area of Nova Scotia. But when some of us tried to pin him down, we discovered that while there might be a very temporary increase in the number of employed, the actual number of permanent jobs to be created by that project would be very small.

Rather than taking off into flights of fancy about what this clause will do in relieving unemployment, it seems to me the Minister of Finance should analyse the effects of his proposal, for the benefit of the committee, in such a way that those of us who are prepared to give it serious consideration on its political and economic merits would have some grounds to go on.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I rise because of references that have been made to a matter which is of great concern to me, to many Nova Scotians and to Cape Bretoners in particular. First of all, I take strong exception to the remarks of the Minister of Finance suggesting that the Leader of the Opposition said the minister should not be interesting himself in creating jobs. In suggesting that the Leader of the Opposition said he, the Minister of Finance, should not worry himself about creating jobs, the Minister of Finance reached far overboard to accuse the Leader of the Opposition of something he did not say.

The Minister of Finance has brought the question of Deuterium into the debate this evening. I am concerned about the effect of those remarks and about the sniping that has been carried on by the preacher from Renfrew who does not know anything about what he is talking about, whether it be about heavy water or about his own constituency—

Mr. McBride: Read the record.

Mr. MacInnis: I will give you something to read. If you want to read the record, read it tomorrow morning. I am very concerned about the attitude taken on the other side of the House, with the government's remarks more or less pointing in the direction that the heavy water plant at Glace Bay may not be rehabilitated. I am sorry to say this is the interpretation I have taken from their remarks. I hope I am wrong. Recently the government made a considerable amount of money available for further study of the project, and there is no question that the Premier of Nova Scotia at every possible opportunity has expressed the hope that the plant will go on.

Mr. Benson: So do I.

Mr. MacInnis: I am glad to hear the minister say that. I will repeat that he said, "So do I."

Mr. Benson: I hope we can afford it.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister has made another crack, which I won't try to interpret, about Nova Scotia not being able to afford it. I wonder what consideration the government of the day gave to what Nova Scotia could afford when it pushed that province into a position which it did not want to occupy. I will give the minister a few facts which he can check out. I say that the federal government at that time pushed the province of Nova Scotia into an investment far above what it first intended, when it insisted at the time the heavy water plant was being initiated as a result of the efforts of the Nova Scotia government—

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacInnis: Sit down.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the remarks being made by the hon. member are completely out of order in that they do not relate to the bill. I submit that his remarks are diverging from the point of the debate and are irrelevant, and that he should be brought to order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I do not think the hon. member has a point of order, although I am still waiting for the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond to indicate how he relates these remarks to the clause in question.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the point of order, I submit that the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth should go home and dry behind his ears. So far as the basis on which I am making these remarks is concerned, I have taken my precedent from the fact that the Minister of Finance on many occasions this evening referred to the deuterium plant at Glace Bay.

I have stated that the federal government pushed the Nova Scotia government into an investment far above that which it intended, when the federal government insisted upon 51 per cent ownership. One of these days I will tell the complete story. I suggest that the Minister of Finance look back at who took the credit for the heavy water plant. I would remind him that it was the then minister of industry, Mr. Drury, and the then Minister of Labour, Mr. MacEachen, in a joint statement, one in Ottawa and the other in Halifax, who laid claim to bringing that plant to Nova Scotia.

If he wants more proof he can look into the record at a question asked by the then hon. member for Halifax, now the Premier of Nova Scotia, when he stood up in this House of Commons and asked the then Minister of Labour whether he would continue the same type of representations that brought the heavy water plant to Glace Bay. I say the record is quite clear. They claimed credit at that time when it appeared to be a very sound investment, and I still say it is sound.

What has happened there is technical. It is a difficulty which I am sure the engineers can correct, given the proper opportunity to do so. But the record shows that it was the then minister of industry, who is now the President of the Treasury Board, and the then Minister of Labour, who is now President of the Privy Council, who claimed credit for this, as well as the premier of the province of Nova Scotia who is on the record as having given full credit to the then Minister of Labour for bringing this plant to Nova Scotia. Furthermore, it is on the record of the House that the then Minister of Labour, who also represents the province of Nova Scotia, took full credit for the fact that there will be 2,000 jobs involved in the construction of this plant.

I am telling the Minister of Finance that this is only part of the story, and if I get into the details of it I will give him a few more shocks. It is within the power of the government to correct the mistake with which they have burdened the Nova Scotia government, whereby the province is in the position of trying to finance something which, as the minister said, is above their means. This they did at the insistence of the federal government of the day. The record is clear. I ask any member on the other side of the House who would like to contradict me to stand up now and tell me that I cannot produce from the records of this House the claims made at that time by the then minister of industry, the then Minister of Labour and the present premier of Nova Scotia. They are all on record as claiming the credit. Now let us see them go ahead and bring about what I want to see in Glace Bay.

The minister need not point the finger any more, because there is a great deal of responsibility over there. The minister might want to refer to the fact that if the plant had not been originally brought into Glace Bay, there is no question that a plant would not have been established in Port Hawkesbury. When it comes to the question of Deuterium of Canada, I could say something about this and thereby tell a tale which the minister would not want recorded in this House. But if he wishes to insist on this point, the minister will do a great disservice, not only to the heavy water industry but to the Atomic Energy Commission of Canada.

The handwriting is on the wall with regard to the remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He made his comments in Halifax but then he ran away. He did not want the image of a small town lawyer so he ran away from Renfrew. The question being asked in Renfrew these days is: What is the matter; is Greene yellow? Now we hear reflections from the preacher who knows nothing about the situation.

An hon. Member: Read the record with regard to Bill C-5. Where were you during the committee hearing?

Mr. MacInnis: Where were you when the people of Renfrew were looking for a decision from here?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I think the hon. member will appreciate that he has made his point.

Mr. MacInnis: No, Mr. Chairman, I have not concluded.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): This is not the place to make that point. I think many members have been out of order tonight. It has been entertaining, if nothing else. Some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond might well have been made earlier during private members' hour, because the comments he is now making were made at that time. However, I think he has been allowed to make his point and perhaps he should develop it in another debate. At present we are on a very simple clause which, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni explained a while ago, refers to everything but that which has been mentioned this evening.

Mr. MacInnis: May I continue my remarks, which were initiated by the Minister of Finance who was not called to order on this matter?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I think the hon. member should be fair to the Chair. I called the Minister of Finance to order, and we have not heard statements of that type since. I think the hon. member has had as much time as the Minister of Finance on this matter.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to deal with the interjection of the hon. member for Renfrew who went on national television not long ago and told the people that he was going to speak to certain ministers and to the Prime Minister, if he could. That gives you an idea of the direction this government is taking under a Prime Minister who cannot even speak to his backbenchers.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please.

Mr. McBride: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. What the hon. member has just said is categorically untrue. I did not say on television, nor did I say either inside or outside the House, that I was going to speak to the Prime Minister, if I could.

Mr. MacInnis: I apologize to the hon. member for Renfrew. He did not say he was going to speak to the Prime Minister, if he could.

Mr. McBride: I am not the member for Renfew; I am the member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton.

Mr. MacInnis: Again I apologize, Mr. Chairman; I did not know the hon. member was from Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton. I made a mistake in referring to him as the member for Renfrew. However, did you notice that he himself had trouble in naming his constituency? He staggered over the name.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair. The Chair has been very generous and understanding, which is not in accordance with my Irish temperament. However, I will allow the hon. member to continue.

Mr. MacInnis: I have one more remark to make with regard to the concern of the Minister of Finance for the unemployed of this country. I wonder if the Minister of Finance realizes that his government is supporting a board of directors who can pass a bylaw which would violate existing working agreements and contracts. I wonder, also, whether he is aware of the fact that there are about 1,500 miners walking the streets of Cape Breton who receive a cheque every second week amounting to one cent. I have here one dated October 12, and another one made out to the same person, dated October 26, for the sum total of one cent, in other words, half a cent a week. If the Minister of Finance wishes to check this, I will lay these samples on the table for his benefit.

Mr. Baldwin: Table them.

Mr. MacInnis: I will table them for the benefit of the Minister of Finance, to demonstrate the generous approach of this government. This is the retirement allowance for a whole month for one man. If the minister wants to question that further, I can say something more on it. To return to the situation in Glace Bay, where the people of the province, including the Premier, hope that the situation will be corrected and that jobs will be provided, I can only repeat what they ask in Renfrew: Is Greene yellow?

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, some of the exchanges that we have heard tonight between members of the government and members of the official opposition remind me of two schoolboys who start a dialogue that goes something along these lines, "You are a stinker," followed by "You are a stinker too", followed by "You are a bigger stinker", and on and on it goes.

However, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for providing an answer to one of my questions tonight when he gave the figure of $450 million as being the total benefit which the government estimated would accue to corporations, for the most part as a result of the extension of capital cost allowances between December 4, 1970, and March 31, 1972. He also pointed out that of this sum, $25 million would be written off, it was estimated, during the 1971-72 fiscal year. The minister also pointed out in answer to my question that it was estimated that the revenue increase as a result of the proposals contained in clause 2 to extend the 3 per cent surtax in 1971 would amount to $240 million. The greater proportion of this $240 million will of course be charged against individuals as they pay their individual income tax, and a portion of it will apply to corporations paying corporation income tax. So when we say the sum approaches $200 million, I am not sure what the exact figure is in terms of the ratio between the two taxes. It will approach $200 million which will be charged to individuals as a result of the changes to be effected under this bill.

There will also be a net benefit of $450 million to corporations, less the extra amount that they will have to pay in corporate income tax on the other side of the ledger, as a result of this legislation. Thus we see that we have a transfer of benefits as a result of this legislation, Mr. Chairman. Under the proposals contained in clause 1, corporations and business enterprises of this country will achieve a significant saving; they will benefit a great deal. If it could be safely said that this would stimulate the economy and make it healthier, possibly some justification or rationale could be developed to support the government in the proposals we are now considering.

I noted that the parliamentary secretary in his remarks after I had asked him some questions shortly after eight o'clock, indicated that he had reviewed my speech of March 3 during the supper hour. I do not know if he had read it before then. However, he seemed to indicate that he did not find too much to comment on in the speech. If that is his view, he is entitled to it. I ought to point out to him, in case he happened to overlook it, that I referred to the impact and some of the consequences that would flow from some of the proposals in this legislation. I draw his attention to the statement to be found near the bottom of the first column on page 3930 of Hansard of March 3, where I said:

> There are really two important consequences which arise out of this which should be noted. The first is that businessmen could accelerate their investment plans or proceed with investment plans that had previously been marginal, both in order to take advantage of the more generous allowance being proposed. Secondly, businessmen who had already made investment plans will receive a windfall gain.

The proposition that such a change in capital cost allowances as is contained in this clause will benefit enterprises which might be considered marginal does, of course, involve some judgment and might be difficult to support in argument one way or the other. I simply advanced it as a point which should be subject to further study. I do not know whether the government has studied this point or whether it has conducted any studies on the consequences of this proposal. The other suggestion was that businessmen could accelerate their investment plans. This may be so. I want to deal with that point later, Mr. Chairman. That, of course, is another point that I feel deserves consideration and further comment by the government.

The other point I raised was with respect to businessmen whose investment plans had already been made. I suggested that they were going to be the beneficiaries, for the most part, of a windfall gain resulting from this change in capital cost allowances. That, of course, is not just my assertion or suggestion; that proposition has been brought forward by reputable people who have given the matter close study. I noted later in my remarks that I felt the proposals presented by the government with respect to the proposed change in capital cost allowances would not have very much impact in 1971; they would not have very much impact right now—and this is the time, of course, when the economy needs stimulation.

I pointed out that there could be some resulting distortions in terms of benefits received as a result of this change in capital cost allowances. I also pointed out that the DBS survey of capital spending intentions for the 200 largest companies in Canada indicates an 11 per cent increase in 1971. That survey was taken before the Minister of Finance made his budget statement. I pointed out that the increases in the manufacturing sector are expected to be rather moderate. That by itself could be used as justification for some policy change, if it would have a beneficial effect on the economy.

I also pointed out that while the over-all change in capital investment in manufacturing be considered rather moderate in impact, there were considerable differences as between various sectors of manufacturing industries. It was noted that the Economic Council of Canada, in its medium term capital investment survey, projects about a 9 per cent increase in 1971 for all industries and some 6.2 per cent in the manufacturing sector. For foods and beverages there is an increase of only 1.2 per cent; for pulp and paper there is a drop of 11.9 per cent; for primary metals, an increase of 40.8 per cent; for chemicals, an increase of only 11.4 per cent; for transportation equipment, a drop of 36.6 per cent; and for others, an increase of 15.7 per cent.

The primary metals industry, which is to experience a 40 per cent increase in its capital expenditures during 1971 as a result of plans made prior to the budget statement of last December 3, will benefit a great deal as a result of these proposals. The pulp and paper industry on the other hand, which is currently suffering from overcapacity, will not receive very much from these proposals. Thus we see a very uneven impact on the economy as a whole resulting from this proposal.

Later, Mr. Chairman, I also noted that a Financial Post survey published in the December 12, 1970, issue suggests that the immediate reaction of companies surveyed was not one of enthusiasm for the proposal of the Minister of Finance. I drew the attention of the House to part of an article in the Financial Post of that day which reads:

> Ottawa's policy makers are counting heavily on the budget's extra write-off to spark new capital investment in 1971—but so far industry is reacting coolly to the incentive.
> Finance Department officials told Financial Post they expect that the rise in capital cost allowances to 115 per cent will have the biggest economic impact of the various measures proposed.
> Industry—to judge by an FP round-up of opinion this week—thinks the incentive will provide "only minor stimulus" to industrial expansion.
> That is the view of most makers of pulp and paper, food equipment, plastics, steel, computers and other products canvassed by FP. Only a few companies said Benson's proposal might have any effect on their expansion plans.

I drew the attention of the House to some of the reasons for this situation as pointed out in this Financial Post article. In that connection I read these paragraphs:

> But design, land, purchase, and other preliminary activity would take about a year and a half. Construction could probably only be started when Benson's program was ending.
> Ironically, companies that had already made expansion decisions but had not yet received machinery or equipment or taken possession of new buildings will receive an unexpected windfall.

Thus it seems to me that we must consider a serious problem. If the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary have learned anything as a result of their studies, or as a result of their contacts with business and industry, which would counter the propositions put forward in this article we should like to hear them say so. The House and the committee are entitled to hear them because, Mr. Chairman, we are considering a very generous new capital cost allowance to business and industry. We have to make certain that it will achieve the objective hoped for by the government and that in fact it is introduced in an equitable fashion. I think there is little hope for the latter. That is a question we could argue at considerable length: it is a very important matter.

We still have not heard the government's assessment of the situation with respect to its stated objective of stimulating economic growth in Canada. As I indicated earlier, one of the major points we made on second reading was that this proposal would have very little impact at the present time. It will have very little impact during the life of the proposal. It may encourage or stimulate some further activity. However, Mr. Chairman, I suggest the time for economic stimulus is now. There are 668,000 people out of work. When the latest figure is published shortly it will probably be somewhere in the area of 750,000. Most reputable studies indicate that the pick-up in the economy through most of 1971 will be relatively slow. It will be near the end of 1971 before there is any build-up of economic activity. That will be near the end of the period when the benefits will be available.

In his exchange with the Leader of the Opposition earlier, the Minister of Finance expressed his concern about inflation in the future. I wish we had some evidence that his financial proposals are constructive. The proposals contained in this bill are such that they will contribute to any inflationary trends that may develop during 1972. I suggest that we have a quite different consideration. It has been suggested on a number of occasions that the government is not very concerned about economic activity being stepped up quickly at the present time. The government would like to pace it. In fact, the government would not be at all unhappy to see economic activity really begin to build up near the end of 1971 and continue into 1972. The situation in 1972 would then be as suggested earlier by the Minister of Finance. The reasons for this are not only well known to the Minister of Finance but to all members of this House.

If a different course were adopted and there were a tax cut, an increase in exemptions or a changeover to a tax credit system now, this would be of direct benefit to Canadian taxpayers. It would provide the needed stimulus in the economy at the present time—not six months, nine months or a year from now—when the minister would like to see the highest level of pick-up in our economy. We need stimulus now to deal with the problem of the thousands of people out of work. In his earlier remarks the minister spoke about the success of the policy of the government. I am sure those words sound very hollow to those out of work at the present time.

In my remarks on second reading I pointed out—the parliamentary secretary seems to have overlooked this—some remarks made by the Minister of Finance in an interview with a reporter of the Monetary Times in September, 1968. He pointed out that he had some doubts about the way the capital cost allowance program was working. It has been stated on a number of occasions that the government is going to review the capital cost allowance program and the manner in which it is working. I do not know what stage that review has reached. There are further features built into this program as a result of the proposals of the government. The government is going to use the capital cost allowance program as a further stimulus. They think this will help the economy, while at the same time they have serious doubts about the entire program. This is a matter of real concern.

There are two other concerns which should be noted. One, which I referred to in my remarks of March 3, is in connection with the regional implications of this program. What effect will it have in terms of regional development in Canada? Is there any co-ordination between our regional development programs? There is now a very high level of assistance to many companies in various parts of Canada to expand their secondary manufacturing and processing facilities. This is of very material benefit to many of these companies.

Serious doubts are being cast on this program at the present time. I do not intend to deal with them now. However, it must be noted that there are implications involved in terms of the proposals presented by the government in this legislation. We need to examine what impact this measure will have on the entire regional development program.

I wish to comment on one further point which deserves consideration. That is the question of the relationship of the government' proposals in this clause to its forthcoming policy on foreign ownership. We presume this will be brought forward within a reasonable time. Has there been any attempt to take account of the government's policy in the coming weeks, months or possibly years, if it drags on that long? I presume that this legislation will be of as much benefit to American and other foreign-owned concerns as to Canadian concerns.

The Chairman: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I have a few questions to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Why has he forced Canadians into unemployment under the pretext of fighting inflation? If he imposed the 3 per cent tax to control inflation, how come we are told today that inflation has disappeared all of a sudden? Why in the name of economic conditions, is there now a proposal to extend the application of this surtax under the pretence that it will allow investments, reduce unemployment and create incentives?

Could the minister explain what is logical in all this?

[English]

Mr. Benson: I very much respect the opinions of the hon. member for Compton. When the government introduced its budget last December it had to make the very serious decision whether it would stimulate the economy through increasing expenditures in selected areas of Canada where unemployment was very high, or whether it should take general measures with regard to a tax reduction. At that time the government decided it must choose to spend money in selected areas rather than make a general, across the board tax reduction.

I appreciate that one is walking a thin line: how much can a government raise from the public in order to carry out its activities? The change in the government's position over the past two years has been remarkable. Whereas the government in 1969-70 was taking net cash out of the economy, we are moving into a position where this year we shall be putting more than $1,500 million into the economy and the figure will run over $2,000 million in 1971-72.

It is a matter of choice. We cannot have it both ways. If the government is to put substantially more into the economy by spending in particular areas, tax levels must continue along the same lines, unless it can both reduce taxes and increase expenditures without causing interest rates to rise or pressure on the dollar to increase.

Mr. Burton: I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance having to do with the application of this proposal. It has been suggested that it would be of greater benefit to the Canadian economy if some way could be found whereby the benefits proposed in this clause could be restricted to machinery, equipment and facilities which were manufactured in Canada.

I recognize that this might be of benefit to certain Canadian firms, enabling them to raise their prices in an unnatural way. At the same time, there would be undoubted advantages. I wonder whether the minister gave any thought to means whereby this proposal could be restricted to facilities and equipment made in Canada so as to ensure that the greatest benefit from this proposal, to the extent that there may be any benefit, would accrue to Canada and Canadians.

Mr. Benson: Certainly the government is interested in having as much of the equipment manufactured in Canada as possible. However, we did not think this particular provision in the Income Tax Act should be limited in the way suggested. After all, we are trying to encourage investment of all kinds. As far as the encouragement of the manufacture of machinery in Canada is concerned, tariff barriers are set so as to discourage the entry of foreign equipment. Only in cases where people can prove, through the machinery adjustment board, that the machinery they require is not manufactured in Canada may they import machinery at favourable rates. The object the hon. member seeks is handled through other means than the measures we are introducing here.

Mr. Burton: Has the minister any estimate as to the proportion of machinery and equipment which is likely to be Canadian in origin, or principally Canadian in origin, as a result of expansion carried out in consequence of these arrangements?

Mr. Benson: That is a difficult question to answer because the proportion varies so widely as between industries. Other programs approved by the House tend to encourage the manufacture of machinery in Canada as far as possible. I recently had dealings with spokesmen for a particular industry who wished to take advantage of this program, and I emphasized the importance we place upon having machinery manufactured in Canada if at all possible. In connection with several major projects now under way, the people concerned have tried very hard to have the machinery manufactured in Canada as far as possible, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, together with my own department, have given every encouragement to work in this area.

Mr. Skoberg: The legislation now before us deals with the subject of assistance to industry generally. It would be interesting to know whether the minister has given any consideration to the situation of those who have to travel to their places of employment and pay for the tools they use. I realize this may not be relevant to the bill before us but having regard to the assistance this measure is designed to bring to those engaged in industry, surely action could be taken amending the Income Tax Act so as to make the necessary provision in the two areas to which I have referred.

Mr. Benson: I can assure the hon. member that in the government's consideration of taxation generally, great consideration is being given to both the points he has raised. They are not involved, of course, in the bill before us, but I can assure him that serious consideration is being given to both those points.

The Chairman: Shall clause one carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—

Mr. Woolliams: We are dealing here with surtax. Surtax is imposed on an individual at the rate of 3 per cent of his basic tax in excess of $200 and is to be extended to the 1971 taxation year. Is there a ceiling on the amount which can be paid?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Chairman. As hon. members may recall, the ceiling was taken off in 1968.

Mr. Stanfield: There is no ceiling on taxation under this government.

Mr. Benson: Really! You and I have had enough discussion for one night. With the encouragement of the opposition, the ceiilng was taken off. There is a bottom level, though.

Mr. Woolliams: We remember the famous surtax which at that time was 5 per cent instead of 3 per cent. The government was brought to defeat on that issue, though it would not resign. I understand that because of the shakiness of the dollar at the time there was some question whether the constitutional issue should be pressed. The story has been partly told. Our memories are not so short that we do not recall that occasion.

It seems to me, from what the leading economists both in Canada and the United States are saying, that the only way in which to get the economy rolling, to use the minister's words, is to cut taxes. The minister leaves the impression that this budget does not increase taxes. Nevertheless, the government is reinstating the 3 per cent surtax, thus adding to the incidence of taxation on an individual or on a corporation. So really we are running contrary to everything recommended by economists both here and in the United States. The United States has recommended and has cut taxes. I did not speak on the first clause because enough was probably said, both relevant and irrelevant. But there is nothing in the budget to suggest any stimulation as far as the economy is concerned.

I agree with my leader that this Minister of Finance is unique in his predictions. Every prediction that he has ever made in any budget speech since he has been Minister of Finance, and I have been here all the time he has been Minister of Finance, has been millions and millions of dollars out, so it is difficult to take anything he says seriously. He seems to talk without reference to any authority, economic or otherwise, and as far as I am concerned we cannot take seriously any predictions that he makes tonight or on any other occasion.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, may I say we have a mutual admiration society. I believe the same thing of my hon. friend.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I know my words have gone very deep, because he has been very hurt since I attacked him on his white paper. He was a professor at university, and on that occasion I called him a small town bookkeeper. My diagnosis at that time has not really changed as far as his ability as Minister of Finance is concerned. The minister talks of getting the economy rolling. One of the reasons taxes should have been cut is that at the end of this month 300,000 students come out of universities and colleges and enter the market seeking employment.

Mr. Stanfield: And there is no plan.

Mr. Woolliams: No plan whatever. We have continually asked questions about this and been told that there is a plan up the government's sleeve. Two or three days after the questions were put to the minister and to the Prime Minister we read in the paper that so many million dollars would be provided to enable students to travel either in Canada or overseas. This is a good time, when considering this amendment, to hear from the minister. The minister talks of doing something to get the economy rolling, to provide more jobs so unemployment will drop, so I suggest we should have some definite proposal now, not only for university students but for college students.

I would have thought the minister would have reduced taxes instead of increasing them. I suggest he come forward with an incentive plan for individual business people and corporations whereby if they hire a student they will get a tax benefit as an incentive. Perhaps the government might go in on a 50-50 basis. We do not want to go through another season like last year when thousands of students wandered aimlessly across Canada. Even the students themselves were not impressed with the armouries and other federal buildings that were used as hostels for Canadian youth. The minister said we are doing more for our youth than any other western country, but we are doing less, because there are more university graduates with degrees out of work at the present time than ever before.

I am glad the hon. member for Calgary South is here, because he is a lawyer and knows about this. Indeed, he and the Minister of Finance applauded the government when they had a capital cost deal to kill off the economies of Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. Let me inform hon. gentlemen that out of 61 young lawyers graduating in Alberta, 32 students do not have a place to article this year. That is an example of what is going on across this country as far as our youth are concerned.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I think if the hon. member re-reads the letter he will find that the figure is 81 rather than 61.

Mr. Woolliams: Then if that is right, it makes it worse. If my memory serves me right it is 61, but if the hon. member is correct and it is 81, that means there are still 31 or 32 students looking for jobs. Whether it be this field or any other field, what have you got? You have no opportunity, no incentive for youth. This clause should be opposed vigorously because it does absolutely the opposite to creating incentives for business to hire young people and students. The government talks about seasonally adjusted figures, but unemployment is nevertheless on the climb at the present time. I should like the Minister of Finance to prove that the proposition that the only way to increase employment at the present time is to cut taxes is economically unsound. Yet he is increasing taxes and therefore aggravating the situation.

The Minister of Finance attacked our leader and other members of this party. Let me say before the press tonight—

Some hon. Members: What press?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Well, the fact there is no member of the press present does not disturb me at all. If the friends of the Minister of Finance agree that the proposed increase in taxes will provide opportunity and jobs for the young people of Canada, they are in the same camp as the Minister of Finance. I should like to hear the minister say now that the fact he is increasing taxes in the budget will get the economy rolling and give opportunity and jobs to Canadians, the young and others. I need not say any more.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah!

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friends over there, particularly my friend from the Northwest Territories, seem to have got somewhat exuberant over the supper hour, though I do not know why. Perhaps they are more impressed with their supper than with the budget, which is why they are applauding at the present time.

Mr. Reid: We would not have the nerve to disgrace ourselves like this in the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I leave it to the Chairman and to others to decide who are disgracing themselves now. I see the minister moving back from his squad, the group that has been yelling and shouting all night, which shows that even he is ashamed. I hope the minister will answer my question before others speak. Does he take the position that he is going to give opportunity and jobs to Canadians by increasing the taxes of Canadians? Or, putting it the opposite, more positive way, does he admit that the only real solution, one put forward by people who have knowledge of economics, is to cut taxes and get the economy rolling?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the question asked by my hon. friend I answered in some detail a few minutes ago—

Mr. Woolliams: Say yes or no.

Mr. Benson: —when replying to the question raised by the hon. member for Compton. If my hon. friend reads what I said, he will find I answered this question in some detail.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, taking a look at the wording of this clause, it becomes more interesting each year. It provides:

> This section is applicable to taxation years commencing or ending in or coinciding with 1968, 1969, 1970—

And now the government is adding "or 1971". How many more years is this tax going to continue? Our only hope is that we are likely to have an election in 1972 and quite possibly the government might not want to see this tax continued into what presumably will be an election year. I hear some hon. members suggesting it may possibly be 1971, so I guess we are getting to the season for election rumours.

There are some important points to be made in respect of clause 2. I noted statements made by the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget on December 3, and later when he and his parliamentary secretary put forward the reason for continuing this surtax into 1971. At that time they said it was for the purpose of obtaining revenue in view of the government's cash requirements.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Let us compare that with the statement made in 1969 when the minister presented his budget. At that time he said he wanted to make it clear that he was not proposing an extension of this tax from 1969 to 1970 for revenue or cash purposes but for purposes of economic stabilization.

At one time the government extends this tax for purposes of economic stabilization, and by the time it gets around to putting legislation before the House there is a downward trend in the Canadian economy or we find there is a low ebb and the government then suggests it needs more revenue. Consequently, it is going to impose this tax on the Canadian people in 1971. I think we have to go back to the situation which existed on budget night. At that time the Canadian people expected a tax cut or some benefit. The psychological impact of the budget that night was akin to a wet dishcloth in the face. The budget of December 3 last served no good purpose as far as the Canadian people are concerned; in fact, it did a disservice to the Canadian people.

I should like to make it clear that we in this party have suggested on many occasions that there should be an increase in exemptions or, better still, a changeover in respect of the tax credit system. I believe Canadians had a right to expect a tax cut last December. It would have been an effective stimulus to the Canadian economy. It would have had an immediate effect. It would have been beneficial. Instead, we have had a repetition of a tenuous struggle as manifested in the provision contained in clause 1 of this bill.

I suggest the government did not follow the course of tax reduction when it presented the most recent budget because it had an election timetable in mind. The government had taken into account the fact that if it stimulated the economy too soon, this would have an important effect on the economy and a resulting effect on the impending election. As a result, the government decided to take protective measures in respect of the economy, keeping in mind an election in 1972.

The government would never consider anything that involved a reduction in taxes or, for that matter, a tax increase until the time was ripe. I suggest this is the very callous reasoning of the government which led it to bring forward this type of proposal. The government has in mind a time period in respect of tax benefits. Anything that is of benefit to the Canadian economy should be a matter of importance to the government. The Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary have made no attempt to come forward with any point to indicate that clause 1 will be of assistance in stimulating the Canadian economy. On the other hand, we have in clause 2 a measure which will dampen the Canadian economy and hold back economic growth.

I suggest this measure will lead to a continuation of high unemployment. I suggest the government will maintain and continue this situation until the time is ripe to stimulate the Canadian economy in preparation for the next federal election.

The Chairman: Order, please. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: All those in favour of clause 2 will please rise.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Get out.

The Chairman: Order, please. A vote has been called. If there are hon. members who entered the chamber after the calling of the vote, they will refrain from voting or leave the chamber.

Clause 2 agreed to: Yeas, 27; nays, 19.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At the next sitting of the House.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand there is not unanimous consent that the bill be given third reading now.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to revert to motions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister have the consent of the House to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CYGNUS CORPORATION LIMITED—NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO ACQUIRE CONTROLLING INTEREST

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the House that following previous exploratory conversations, government officials and R. A. Brown, Jr. commenced negotiations after the close of the stock market today for the purpose of considering the possibility of acquiring Mr. Brown's controlling position in Cygnus Corporation Limited. I will give a further report in the event such negotiations reach a stage of firm understanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that in the circumstances there may be no alternative to what the minister is proposing to maintain control of this company in Canada. But I must say that if this is so, then this country has reached a sorry state indeed if the only possibility is for the government to move in and there is not enough incentive in this country for private industry to maintain control of private industry in Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the shortest and clearest way I can put it, may I say that we welcome this announcement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we call it ten o'clock.

Some hon Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—ALLEGED TRAFFICKING IN INDUSTRIAL MILK QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the inquiry I wish to make concerns the matter of trafficking in industrial milk quotas. I think perhaps I should make clear exactly what I mean. Mr. A has a herd of cows and wishes to sell them to Mr. B, who happens to have a sales arena. As a rule, Mr. A also transfers his industrial milk quota to Mr. B. Incidentally, there would seem to be quite a few Mr. B's in the province of Ontario, and no doubt elsewhere. Then Mr. B, who has a sales arena, sells off the herd cow by cow to individuals throughout the country.

Mr. B. then has a quota and he sells the quota to a person in another part of the country, which in most cases seems to be in province of Quebec. The quota is sold to someone who has a herd and not a large enough quota on which to make money. I have received a great deal of information in this regard. I have the names and addresses of a good many vendors, a good many Mr. B's, the intermediary who sells off the herd cow by cow and transfers the quota to somebody else. I do not intend to put the names and addresses on the record because I do not think it would be fair. It is not the fault of the individual but, rather, of the Dairy Commission and ultimately the government for allowing this kind of thing to go on.

One farmer who had a 9,000 pound butterfat quota sold it for $4600 in another province. This kind of trafficking goes on all the time. While apparently this is within the letter of the law, the government and the Dairy Commission have the power to stop it because, as I understand it, the Dairy Commission can prohibit the transfer of quotas either in whole or in part. This, however, is not done. I have more information in front of me, but again I do not wish to place the names and addresses on the record. However, I have substantial information and am prepared to show it to the minister privately.

These traffickers, as I choose to call them, go around to farmers' meetings and tell them they have so many quotas for sale and ask how much they will pay. The fact is the vendor does not do very well. The purchaser of the herd, because the herd is usually bought cow by cow, does not do very well. But the middleman, as in most cases in our country, does very well; he just needs two or three of these transactions in a year in order to do pretty well.

When one has private information in respect of individual cases, one then would like to know the extent to which this kind of trafficking is going on. Therefore I placed a question on the Order Paper—I shall not go into all the details—asking in effect for the number of transactions that took place in Ontario only between April 1 and December 1 of last year. There could not have been too many transactions.

Mr. Olson: Three thousand and fifty.

Mr. Nesbitt: I asked for the names and addresses of persons who sold herds and to whom they were sold. I asked for this information in the hope that it could be made clear who is doing these things. The answer from the Dairy Commission is that it would take 700 hours to do this. I do not believe it would take that long. The minister who reports to the House for the Dairy Commission wrote me a letter in which he said he had brought my question to the attention of the Dairy Commission who replied that it would take too much time to furnish the information. I indicated I had some doubt it would take so long to produce the information. The minister then indicated it was not government policy to give out this information.

Mr. Olson: You said yourself it was not proper to make the information public.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister will have his three minutes in a moment. I said I did not like to give the names of individuals because I do not blame them. I blame the government for allowing this to go on. The government said it was not policy to reveal these transfers between individuals, and so on. The minister may be right, but I still think he should not resist these questions as he has a habit of doing, as he did last year when he said there was no powdered milk coming in from Ireland, until the farmers broke into the plant and dumped it on the floor.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) did not take that position. We have this situation, and what annoys members on this side of the House is that when something is brought to the minister's attention, instead of looking into it and trying to co-operate he digs in his heels and says no, it is not so. The minister has been in this House for a long time. When he was a member of the Social Credit Party he was critical of government policy, and yet he will not look into these things.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy to answer as much of this garbage as I can. The hon. member indicated that it was not proper to place on the record the names and addresses of the people involved in these transactions. His question in part 5 asks for the names and addresses of the transferees in part 2. He is doing here exactly what he considers to be an impropriety.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nesbitt: If all the names were given, that would be one thing, but giving one or two names is another thing.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: If you examine the answer given to the question which the hon. member placed on the Order Paper, as recorded at page 2261 of Hansard of January 11, 1971, you will find that I gave the hon. member all the information to the eight parts of the question that he himself regards as proper. I told him there were 3,050 parties who had transferred quotas during that period: that is what he asked for. I told him no milk quotas were retained by the Canadian Dairy Commission: that is what he asked for. I told him there were 8,758,290 pounds of butterfat transferred in the quotas. The only thing I have not told him is the personal business of individual farmers, including their names and addresses.

It is true that it would take 700 hours or 800 hours to go through the electronic files to find all that information, but even if we disregard the cost, which I am not willing to do, the hon. member has said it would be an impropriety to reveal in public documents the personal, private business of each of these farmers. I have told him I am not willing to do that, and he has said it should not be done. He is talking out of both sides of his mouth at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—MONTREAL—REPAIR OF ALLEGEDLY DEFECTIVE COMPUTER

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on March 1, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) the following question:

> Whereas some unemployed workers who have been entitled to withdraw unemployment insurance benefits for the past two months have not been paid such benefits and whereas the Commission's staff in Quebec City and Trois-Rivières are doing a great job, is the minister thinking about having the Montreal computer repaired since it appears to be responsible for all the errors that occur?

Mr. Speaker, if I asked the Minister of Labour that question, it is because I was convinced that it was a very good way of pointing out to him that there was something wrong at an Unemployment Insurance office.

As some citizens have been unemployed for two or three months and have not yet received a penny from the Commission, even though they are eligible for benefits, I believe questions should be asked.

Some unemployed resorted to the services of their parish priest, the mayor of their municipality, their member of Parliament and even sometimes to lawyers in order to obtain what was due to them by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Fifteen or 20 years ago, when businesses often kept their books part-time, errors could happen, but we know that this is not the case today, because contractors, industrialists and businessmen have the control of their business due to a good accounting system.

To my mind, those who are responsible for this are neither the employers, nor—I am pleased to repeat it—the employees of the Commission in Quebec and in Trois-Rivières.

I should like to mention the case of a citizen who was unemployed for two months, who was penniless, who had worked for the Canadian National for five years and who was merely advised that his contributions did not entitle him to unemployment insurance benefits.

A man whose social insurance number is 226-330-979 registered at one of the offices of the Commission on October 30th, 1970. He was unemployed for three months, namely November, December and January. Early in February, he went back to work for a Montreal company with branches throughout the province of Quebec. He had worked continuously for the same company since the end of the year 1968.

Although 4½ months have elapsed since his first report, he has not yet collected anything and the Commission still owes him benefits for that period. He started to work again early in February and at the same time, he resumed his contributions. Even though neglected and forgotten as far as his benefits were concerned, he still had to pay his contributions.

I recognize that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is one of the federal organizations which has rendered the best services. However, we would like the quality of its services to be maintained and the payments to be made by more than one of the parties concerned.

In my opinion, the contributors must be protected and I am still convinced that the computer used by the Commission in Montreal is the source of our problems.

We know that the efficiency of the computer depends first of all on programming, that is the drawing up of a detailed list of instructions telling the machine how to perform. We also know that if the programmers do not provide for all contingencies, it will be practically impossible for the computer to solve the problem or else it will have to operate on unfounded hypotheses leading to problematical answers.

Technicians claim that of the three main components a computer one is the mathematical unit divided in two parts: the adding and storage units.

The adding unit is also used for subtraction and other operations ordered by the control unit. As for the storage unit, also called memory, it is part of the mathematical unit.

So, I feel that a minor investigation should be made in this field, and if the memory of the computor is faulty, it would be in order to have it repaired. According to experts, those responsible for the making and the operation of computers have added to the technical vocabulary a whole series of entirely new terms.

There is a second point worth considering. It may be that we shall have to forget about some of these terms to get back to the dollar sign, the only symbol through which the unemployed, like all other members of society, may find the satisfaction of their needs.

For all the unemployed which have been affected by a really too long period without pay, I should like the department to let us know about its projects and tell us when we can expect a normal situation in this field.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the Minister of Labour that the unemployment Insurance Commission has been reorganized and now has five computers throughout the country.

During the last two weeks of February 1971, none of these machines were out of order. During the first two months of 1971, all break-downs of the machines were dealt with within a few hours, the companies who rent the equipment to the government having supplied the Commission with their own computers.

No problem of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Portneuf has been referred during this period in the Trois-Rivières region. Shoud the hon. member, as he stated earlier, have specific complaints to submit for the minister's attention, he should give more details to the minister himself, who will gladly take them into consideration and scrutinize them closely.

YOUTH—CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, I put a question to the Acting Prime Minister regarding the announcement that a conference concerning transient youth and student summer employment had been cancelled. This conference was scheduled for March 14, 15 and 16. I asked the minister why at such a late date the unexpected announcement of cancellation was made. The reply that I received was that the government had been consulting the provinces about a program for student employment and it seemed to them the conference that was to be held might have been useful, but according to the Acting Prime Minister the taxpayers' money could be spent in a more useful way.

What prompted me to ask this question was a communiqué issued by the Canadian Council on Social Development. I think the best thing to do would be to read the pertinent part of that press release as follows:

> The Canadian Council on Social Development announces the cancellation of its conference on Services to Transient Youth and Student Summer Employment scheduled for Ottawa on March 14, 15 and 16. In light of the crisis situation, the council reached this conclusion with deep regret but felt there was no alternative when it was informed by the Department of the Secretary of State that the federal government would neither assist financially nor actively participate. The dates had already been postponed from February 21 to 23 to accommodate federal planning.

The Canadian Council on Social Development which was organizing this conference did not know why the conference had been cancelled. As I have already said, the conference was already scheduled for a period of time in February and because of the federal government it was postponed until March. This suggests to me that someone in the Department of the Secretary of State, one of the officials or perhaps the minister himself, must have given the green light to the organizers of this conference and someone in the department or in the government must have asked the Canadian Council on Social Development to postpone the conference from February until March.

My understanding is that after all the planning had gone into the organizing of this conference, and after many people had become really enthused about the prospects of such a conference which would bring together young people from all across the country—from perhaps 50 or 60 universities—as well as representatives of different community organizations, it was cancelled without explanation a few days before the conference was supposed to take place.

That is why I elected to raise the matter in the "late show" tonight. Hopefully, the congenial parliamentary secretary will shed some light on why that action was taken. The conference, in my opinion, would have been most valuable. It would have brought young people together to discuss what they want to do and means and methods of solving the problems that they have in common. I understand that the federal government would have had to pay only a very small sum in helping to cover the travelling costs of some young people and students who could not afford to bear the expense of coming to Ottawa, the location of the conference.

This conference would have dealt with problems facing transient youth in Canada and suggested suitable programs for them. It would have dealt with the problem of student unemployment and with unemployment among youth in general. In Canada about 45 per cent of our unemployed, I believe, are under the age of 25. This is a very serious problem and we ought to do something about it.

I think that a conference of this sort would have been a small step to providing some of the participatory democracy that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked so much about two and a half or three years ago. This input by young people would have been valuable because it would have given them more faith in our parliamentary system and government. When you cancel such a conference you are not restoring their faith. You are not restoring hope in the minds of young people about the kind of society we live in or about our government. I am afraid that when things like this keep happening young people will say: You do not look on us as people. You consider us as mere bodies, numbers, small slots in a machine. You do not think we are really here. That is the type of thinking we may find among our young people.

Perhaps the federal government or the department were afraid of any criticism that might have emerged from a conference of young people. I hope the parliamentary secretary can clarify this situation. I suspect that one reason the conference was cancelled was that the government was afraid that young people would be critical of the Prime Minister or of the type of society that this government appears to want. I ask: Why was the conference cancelled at such a late date after the green light had been given? Why suddenly, after all the plans had been made, was the conference cancelled? Perhaps the parliamentary secretary, in the short time allotted to him, will tell us if there are any alternatives open to the young people at this time.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the main goal of the Conference on Services to Transient Youth and Student Summer Employment was to urge the government to implement their program in a particular way, and it is at present in the process of achieving that goal. The federal government will be able to make a general announcement on the matter of services to transient youth and summer employment when all consultations with the provinces are completed, which should be some time next week.

As has been said before, the federal government did not feel it would be helpful to participate in a conference prior to the completion of the consultations with provincial ministers and officials, or prior to the formulation of firm proposals for student summer employment. As well, the federal government did not regard such a conference as an urgent need since up to now it has supported a number of similar meetings with public funds. The information accumulated through earlier conferences, in addition to the experience of last summer's programs, was sufficient for the establishment of its new policy, and the consultation process now begun will offer a basis for achieving the main objectives sought by this proposal.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution. This is a brief report, being one paragraph long, and its subject has some bearing on what we are to discuss this afternoon. I wonder, therefore, whether hon. members would give unanimous consent to having it read so that at least those members who speak this afternoon will be aware of it.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member is asking for the report to be read. That is all right. However, if he is asking for unanimous consent for acceptance of and concurrence in the report, that will not be given. I am not quite sure what he is asking for.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not making myself clearer. I am only asking that the report be read. I have no intention of moving concurrence in the report until Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, this is an unusual procedure. Normally when a report is read it is, as suggested by the hon. member for Peace River, for the purpose of having a motion proposed later, but the House can do many other things by unanimous consent. Is it agreed that the report be read on the understanding that a motion will not be put later?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Whereupon the report was read by the Second Clerk Assistant, as follows:

The Special Committee on Environmental Pollution has the honour to present its second report.

Your Committee recommends that it be authorized to travel to Victoria and Vancouver, from the 28th March to the 2nd of April 1971, for the purpose of hearing witnesses on the proposed oil tanker route in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Gulf of Georgia, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Respectfully submitted,

David Anderson, Chairman.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Fourth report of Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs—Mr. Forget (for chairman of the committee).

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

On the order: Motions:

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Shortly before the House rose last night, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated in eight short sentences the possibility of a takeover of Home Oil. He properly made the statement after the close of the stock market. I wonder whether the minister intends to make a full statement on motions on the government's intervention with regard to Home Oil, particularly since his remarks last night lacked any detail and created ambiguity even for brokerage houses across the country? The decision appears to have been made on an ad hoc basis. There is uncertainty as to any guidelines. I wonder whether the minister would make a statement at this time. If not, we will have to ask for these facts in the question period and there will be many supplementaries.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, during the question period he might ask whether there is unanimity to return to motions for the purpose of allowing the minister to make a statement. The hon. member has done this before. I do not see anything basically wrong with it. If the minister wishes, he can indicate whether he would like to make a further statement in addition to the one made in the House last evening. If not, we will proceed with the item of motions.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, if I have permission to speak at this time, I wish to indicate it is not my intention to make a statement on motions. The statement last night was made as soon as it could be made, bearing in mind the sensitivity of the negotiations and the fact that we had to wait until the stock markets had closed. I do not think I can usefully make any broader statement at this time. Negotiations are taking place. Needless to say, they are very sensitive.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has indicated that he will not make a statement. Perhaps it would be better if he did not reply to the question in such a way that it might be construed as a statement. I appreciate that there may be difficulty in the sense that this matter is of very great interest to hon. members and there will be many supplementaries. I will take this into consideration during the question period.

HOUSING

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL REPORT ON INNOVATIVE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43. A few days ago the housing committee of the Canadian Council on Social Development issued a booklet setting forth a commentary on the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation $200 million innovative program for housing. Their findings are important and relevant if we are to improve this aspect of housing in Canada. On Tuesday of this week I asked the minister in charge of housing to refer the report to the appropriate committee of the House. He replied that we would probably find some ingenious way to do so. Therefore, under Standing Order 43 I move:

That the report by the Canadian Council on Social Development on where the $200 million went be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Broadview under the terms of Standing Order 43. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. The Chair must inquire whether there is unanimity to put the motion to the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO ACQUIRE CONTROLLING INTEREST IN HOME OIL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in connection with the caught-short statement he made last night in the House. Would he indicate the criteria which motivated the government's action in intervening in the case of Home Oil in contrast to earlier cases also involving foreign take-overs in which the government did not intervene? Can we also be told whether these same criteria will apply in future instances despite any recommendation which may be brought in by the Minister of National Revenue in his report on foreign ownership?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We are, of course, awaiting the report of the Minister of National Revenue and government policy which will flow from it. At the present time there are no specific criteria concerning these matters; each case must be judged on its merits. Certainly one of the very important factors in this instance was, I think, the extremely good debate which took place in the House the other day and the very clear impression given by all members who spoke that the people of Canada, as represented by the members of this House, were very anxious that this company should be maintained as Canadian. I believe this House does represent, on these great national issues, the will of the people of Canada very clearly, and during the debate in question I think that will was made manifest very forcibly.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): That was quite a statement. Maybe my question will clarify it. Bearing in mind the fact that the government has intervened and declared its intention to purchase a controlling interest in Cygnus, thereby controlling Home Oil, may I ask whether the thousands of shareholders have been assured by the government that they will not be penalized as a result of this ad hoc decision? Further, would the minister tell us what price the government intends to pay for the shares, and how many shares it is purchasing?

Mr. Greene: As to the details of the purchase, I do not think I would be serving the public interest by discussing them until the negotiations are completed one way or the other. With respect to the interest of the shareholders, I cannot believe that the purchase of Mr. Brown's holdings by the government of Canada or one of its agencies would be more detrimental to other shareholders than to have them purchased by a United States company.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not think this question will prejudice anyone, Mr. Speaker. Is there at this stage a formal agreement or statement of intention on the part of the government to purchase Mr. Brown's controlling interest?

Mr. Greene: I do not believe it would be advantageous, as I have said, to do our negotiating in public. Because of the great concern shown by the House with regard to this issue I did indicate as soon as I could the fact that the game had changed to the extent that the government was now negotiating. I thought I owed this courtesy to the House in view of the great interest displayed in the subject by hon. members. However, I do not think it would be useful to carry on the negotiations more publicly at this time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the government will be naming directors of Cygnus Corporation and, in turn, of Home Oil and, if so, by what method will this be done?

Mr. Greene: Again, I do not wish to go into details but I can assure the hon. member that in the event the people of Canada are involved as a result of the purchase of Mr. Brown's shares, their interest will be protected in whatever ways are adequate and proper since the people of Canada would then be the shareholders.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister who is not one to use words loosely. In answer to the hon. member for Calgary North he said, as I recall it: "I am not in a position to reveal the terms of purchase". Has any option agreement been entered into? In answering that question the minister would in no way reveal the terms of the agreement or anything like it. Surely some arrangement in the nature of an option or an intent to purchase must have been entered into; otherwise the minister would not have made the announcement he made last night.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I made my announcement last night not because anything at that time had been realized, not because any firm agreement had been reached, but because I had attempted to keep the House abreast of the situation from time to time to the best of my ability. I had indicated to the House that we were attempting to get private Canadian buyers to purchase. As soon as the situation changed in that private Canadian buyers satisfactory to the vendor could not be found, I felt I owed it to the House immediately to inform hon. members of that change. I also thought it fair to other potential Canadian buyers who were considering the situation to let them know that the government itself was now negotiating.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question was simply this. Admirable as was the purpose and objective of the minister in taking Parliament into his confidence, is there or is there not an option? Otherwise the announcement that was made is simply nonsense.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated at the time, the announcement was made purely because negotiations were taking place. If it is nonsense to take the House into our confidence at the earliest possible moment when the information I had previously given hon. members had changed, then nonsense it be; but the announcement was made last night because negotiations were being commenced.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the comment of the minister a couple of minutes ago that the government of Canada or an agency of the government of Canada may be making the purchase, could the minister indicate, if he is in a position to do so, which will be the likely course of action? Is the minister in a position to indicate which government agencies may be involved in any purchase that may be agreed upon?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, until there is something concrete and specific to disclose to the House I do not think I would be helping the successful realization of the negotiations by discussing the possibilities that are involved. But I can assure the House that our record on this issue is established by the fact that we did make a statement on motions to the House last night. As soon as I am able to give further information to the House without in any way impeding the negotiations, I shall undertake to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Abitibi wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Since the minister has not found any Canadian investors, either because of a lack of confidence in the profitability of Home Oil, or because of a shortage of funds, does the Canadian government intend to take steps to cope with this matter which puts the country in an awkward position?

[English]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain it was lack of money that made it impossible for Canadians to purchase; there may have been many other reasons.

Mr. Woolliams: The white paper on taxation.

Mr. Greene: I cannot assess why no Canadian buyer was ready, willing and able to meet the desires of the vendor. All I can say is that to date there has been no meeting of minds between the vendor and Canadian purchasers, and I cannot envisage any Social Credit solution that might enable the solving of this problem.

GOVERNMENT AND ASHLAND OIL PROPOSALS RESPECTING HOME OIL—POSITION OF SHAREHOLDERS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he can assure the House that the proposal made by the government to Home Oil is as favourable to Mr. Brown and the other shareholders, who are scattered widely throughout Canada, as the offer made by the Ashland Oil Company?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that there is no expropriation facet to this offer of the government. This is not compulsory buying and we are attempting to discover a position through negotiation that is satisfactory to the vendor, Mr. Brown.

Mr. Harkness: What is important, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister should be able to reassure the shareholders of this company that they are not going to be in a less favourable position or suffer a loss because of this action on the part of the government. Can he assure these people that they will be in no worse position than they would have been had the sale to the Ashland Oil Company gone through?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, this certainly will be the purpose of the government. Every attempt will be made, and I feel confident that we will be successful, to meet the position the hon. member has supported.

NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO ACQUIRE CONTROLLING INTEREST IN HOME OIL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance stated on January 31, and since that date in the House, that the Canada Development Corporation will not be used as a buyer of last resort, will the minister advise the House what mechanism the government has in mind for taking over the shares of the Home Oil Company and assure us that it will not be adverse to the shareholders?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think a member of the New Democratic Party asked the same question earlier. As I indicated then, I do not think I can give the details of the mechanism at the present time. As soon as there is anything firm, binding and valid which I can disclose without breaching the confidence of negotiations, I will do so.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that present Canadian tax law puts potential Canadian buyers at a considerable disadvantage compared with United States buyers of a company such as Home Oil, is it the intention of the minister to recommend to the government that tax changes be made in order that Canadians may have the same opportunity to take over companies that the Americans have?

Mr. Greene: I feel sure that when the current agenda of the House is cleared the tax reform measures can be brought before the House, and that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will bring tax measures before the House that will be in every way in the best interests of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member on a further supplementary, but perhaps hon. members will very soon feel that we should move to another subject. I will also recognize the hon. member for Calgary North and a few others, but we should try to limit questions on this subject as soon as possible.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister see to it that the government brings forward tax changes that will give Canadians an equal chance to take over companies such as Home Oil when the legislation is introduced in the forthcoming budget?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the hon. member is suggesting that Canadian companies should be encouraged to invest in foreign oil holdings—

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Hees: No, not Canadian companies, and you know that perfectly well.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member should know that this is the effect of the United States legislation which he is suggesting we imitate.

Mr. Hees: I am asking the Prime Minister whether he will put Canadian companies on the same basis as United States companies in regard to takeovers of Canadian companies.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence perhaps the Prime Minister or the parliamentary secretary to the minister might answer. This is a repetition of a question I asked on February 24. Has the minister received any reply to his letter of February 17 to William Rogers, the United States Secretary of State, offering to co-operate with the United States in a study of tanker route problems on the west coast of North America?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression that this is not a supplementary question. We may be getting away from the subjects we are trying to exhaust at the moment. I will recognize the hon. member later in any event. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a supplementary question. In view of the fact it will be the Canadian taxpayers' money that will be used to purchase shares of this company, will the Canadian government give an undertaking that its main aim will be to protect the position of Canadian people?

Mr. Greene: That is certainly our main aim, and also to maintain this company in accordance with what was the very clear will of the House during the debate that it continue as a Canadian company.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow through on the question. Since it is to be the taxpayers' money which will be used to purchase the controlling interest, and since there are shareholders in both Canada and the United States, in view of the statement, which is very wishy-washy, what protection will Canadian taxpayers have if there should be a dumping of shares both in the United States and Canada which drove down the market for the stock?

Mr. Greene: I would think that is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that at this point we are reaching the area of debate and argument. The hon. member for Broadview.

URBAN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON METRO TORONTO REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING MEASURES TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AND WELFARE COSTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister send the mayor of Toronto and his officials and Metro officials back to Toronto emptyhanded after his discussions with them yesterday? If so, does he think it is fair that Toronto taxpayers should bear the major burden of the high unemployment and welfare costs in the city which were caused in large part by the anti-inflationary measures of the federal government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not send them back emptyhanded since we said we would consider every one of their requests and give an answer very shortly. On the second part of the question, of course that would not be fair, but that is not the case since the federal government is the government responsible for unemployment insurance and with respect to welfare the federal government pays 50 per cent of the shot under CAP.

Mr. Gilbert: In view of the difficulty we will have in implementing the unemployment insurance changes prior to May 15, would the Prime Minister consider extending the seasonal benefits cut-off date beyond May 15 so that this burden will not fall on the taxpayers because of people being transferred to the welfare rolls?

Mr. Trudeau: That is precisely one of the submissions made yesterday in the brief presented by the Metro representatives to which I answered that we would give a reply very shortly.

TORONTO—REMOVAL OF DEADLINE FROM SPECIAL LOAN

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the joker of the March 31, 1972, deadline been removed from the special emergency loan of $17 million to the province of Ontario as a result of the meeting yesterday of the Minister of Finance and Chairman Campbell of Metropolitan Toronto and, if so, how has it been removed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. My understanding of that meeting between the minister and Chairman Campbell is that this problem was discussed and that the minister suggested that perhaps some ways might be found to use the loan fund in a way which might be acceptable to Metro, but that was just a suggestion discussed and to my knowledge there has been no agreement yet as to the way in which that arrangement might be arrived at.

Mr. Ryan: I take it there will be no need whatsoever for any legislative change and that the program will proceed without any hindrance in respect of the extension of the Gardiner Expressway in Toronto?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: That is right, Mr. Speaker. So far as the loan measures are concerned, there has been no indication by the minister that there would have to be any changes made in the announcement he made in the House last December.

INCREASE IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PAYMENTS UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN TO MEET WELFARE COSTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the representations made yesterday by the representatives of Metropolitan Toronto about their difficulties, is the government giving consideration to increasing the amount of money made available to the municipalities under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to meet the emergency problem of very high welfare costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the hon. member asked if there was any consideration given to an unfreezing of the percentage. If that is the question, the answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—SECTION RESPECTING REVOLUTIONARY PROPAGANDA

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice being absent, I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Is there anything in the Public Order Act that would enable those who are responsible for law and order to put a stop to the type of revolutionary propaganda such as that delivered yesterday by Jacques Larue-Langlois before students of the University of Ottawa and Carleton University?

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING BILINGUALISM—AVOIDANCE OF DISCRIMINATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the important statement made before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates by the President of the Treasury Board on bilingualism in the Public Service, particularly at the senior executive level, has the minister any reassuring statement to make that in implementing this policy discrimination such as is alleged in the affidavit evidence of one Jules Demicher, a senior executive officer, involving the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will not occur?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me, or, indeed, for any member of the House, to comment on this particular matter which is now under investigation.

Mr. Nowlan: Before this policy was enunciated, and levels of bilingualism were defined for years ahead, was there any prior consultation with the official bilingual commission to ensure there would not be discrimination against either French-speaking or English-speaking Canadians in the Public Service?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what body the hon. gentleman has in mind when he talks of the official bilingual commission, but I can assure him that the plans we have will pay particular attention to guarding against any discrimination.

ALLEGED LANGUAGE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST JULES DEMICHER—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INQUIRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who did give me a reply yesterday, on a matter involving his department. I will quote his statement:

—the press reported yesterday that I had unduly intervened to increase the number of French-speaking Canadians in my department. This allegation is now being considered by the Department of Labour and the investigation will follow the normal course of procedure taken by that department.

Is the Department of Labour's investigation of the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to be carried out at the request of the minister himself or of an official of his department?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker it is being carried out at the instigation of Mr. Demicher.

[English]

[Later:]

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING BILINGUALISM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the questions addressed earlier to the President of the Treasury Board. The minister said that the government has plans that will deny discrimination. Will he tell us what those plans are because Public Service people all over Canada are deeply concerned? Now that the plans apparently are formulated I ask the minister this question, not to be answered by a parliamentary secretary.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. gentleman to attend the meetings of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee where this subject is being extensively explored.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that type of answer does not brush off anything and emphasizes the fact that the government does not want to let the Public Service of Canada know what ill-treatment they are getting at the hands of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the previous answer of the President of the Treasury Board, is it correct to assure that there was no discussion at all of this policy with the official language commissioner, a servant of this House, before it was announced?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker. Such an assumption is entirely incorrect.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPENING OF NEW DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS—CONFINEMENT TO FRANCOPHONE COUNTRIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the suave and sage Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in respect of the announcement concerning the opening of a diplomatic mission in Algeria and the interesting comments thereon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Africa. Can the Acting Minister advise if other new missions are to be opened in the near future and if the minister's statement is to be regarded as an indication that these will be confined to Francophone countries?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already informed the House, on March 1, that as far as he was concerned, he hoped that embassies would soon be opened in Barbados and Zambia, but that he would have to reach an agreement, in the course of the following months, with the Treasury Board.

[English]

OPENING OF DIPLOMATIC MISSION IN ALGERIA—ASSURANCE RESPECTING NO FURTHER TRAINING OF TERRORISTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in respect of the opening of our new mission in Algeria. Did the government, before opening this mission, receive assurance from the government of Algeria that there would not be any further training of terrorists in Algeria, with them then being shipped to Canada to carry on their activities in Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, that claim is groundless, and I cannot accept the remarks of the hon. member.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—INVESTIGATION OF RUSSIAN CONSTRUCTION METHODS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the possible building of a pipeline through Canada's Arctic, has the minister done any checking with his opposite number in the Soviet Union to see how such pipelines are built there?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are informed that pipe-lines are being built in the USSR, but I do not think the Soviet Union has made much progress in the realization of these projects. However, we have quite regular exchanges with this country at the scientific level and during my coming trip to that country, at a date which has not been set yet, I hope to have the opportunity of visiting them, if possible.

[English]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): In light of what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said two days ago, that there should be a moratorium on statements made by ministers until the government makes up its mind on the subject, does the government intend to follow this advice?

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—RESPONSE TO CANADIAN OFFER TO UNITED STATES TO CO-OPERATE IN STUDY OF POLLUTION THREAT

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): I rise at a very appropriate time, Mr. Speaker. I would like to repeat my question to the parliamentary secretary—

An hon. Member: About the moratorium?

Mr. Anderson: —to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him whether he has received a reply from the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, to the letter of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of February 17 which offered to co-operate with the U.S. in a study of tanker problems on the west coasts of Canada and the United States?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already announced to the House that the American authorities had agreed to his request, and I can say today that consultations should begin soon in Washington.

[English]

Mr. Anderson: I wonder whether he would give more details on the timing of the beginning of these talks and on their duration. Perhaps he can tell us also at what level they will occur.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, it is to be expected that consultations will start as soon as a date has been agreed upon by both parties. With regard to the level of the consultations, I am not in a position to report to the House on this today.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANADIAN PITTSBURGH INDUSTRIES LIMITED—MEASURES TO PREVENT TRANSFER FROM QUEBEC TO ONTARIO

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but in view of his absence I should like to put it to the Prime Minister. It is important because it concerns employment in Montreal.

Canadian Pittsburgh Industries Limited of Saint-Laurent intends to move its operations to Ontario, thanks to a federal grant, which move will lead to 200 lay offs. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to intervene immediately to prevent the transfer of that industry to Ontario, since it will affect employment severely in Montreal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take note of the question and discuss the matter with the minister.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the importance of the situation, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he intends to make a statement on Monday in order to prevent such a move?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making a statement, but the minister will doubtless be in a position to answer questions if the hon. member is in a position to put them at that time.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED MISUNDERSTANDING RESPECTING APPREHENDED INSURRECTION—DISCUSSION OF INCREASED POWERS OF SEARCH AND DETENTION WITH PROVINCES—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to the remarks of the Minister of Justice last night in Toronto. In view of the continuing concern of the Minister of Justice for those who have not fully appreciated the extent of the threat last fall or the response of the government to the threat of apprehended insurrection, what steps is the government taking to clear up the possible misunderstanding that the Minister of Justice believes still exists in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Possible misunderstanding of what, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Possible misunderstanding both as to the nature of the threat of last October and the nature of the government's response.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no misunderstanding on this side of the House, nor indeed in the country, I believe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps the Prime Minister would like to take notice of the question and consult the Minister of Justice about it. I would like to ask as a supplementary question whether, in view of the minister's remarks about the possible need for increased powers of search and detention and arrest, these matters have been discussed with various Attorneys General across Canada, and whether the government is now in fact preparing legislation of this nature to bring in before the end of April.

Mr. Trudeau: The government indicated that before the end of April the Parliament of Canada will be seized with this very matter, and it is our intention at that stage to hear the opinions of the opposition and indeed of any other authorities in Canada who want to participate in the elaboration of such a legislative measure.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that we are running short of time. He will have noticed that members behind him, in front of him and to his sides are anxious to ask questions. If there are only a few minutes left and he wants to ask three questions, someone will suffer. I will allow him a further supplementary question and then go on, with my apologies, to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since this is a matter of major importance and three months have passed since the passing of the temporary measures act, when will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice be prepared to put forth federal government proposals so that there can be a thoughtful discussion by the Canadian people?

Mr. Trudeau: We have always undertaken to the House that it would be done before April 30. We have never said that it would necessarily be before that time. It will be done as soon as it is possible, and I am sure that the House will be very anxious to proceed with the discussion at that point.

CRIMINAL CODE

MAINTAINING AND STRENGTHENING OF BREATHALYZER PROVISIONS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question I wanted to direct to the Minister of Justice, but in his absence possibly the Minister of Transport will be allowed to take notice of it or perhaps to reply. Having in mind the very agreeable recent drop in the number of motor vehicle fatalities, about 15 per cent to 18 per cent, or 850 lives saved in one year since the advent of the breathalyzer legislation, is it the intention of the government to maintain and strengthen this law despite the occasional misguided attacks made upon it in courts?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): We have every intention of maintaining and strengthening the law and coupling with it other safety measures, as I have indicated to the hon. member on previous occasions.

POLLUTION

WINDSOR, ONT.—CONTROL OF CONTAMINATION CAUSED BY UNITED STATES PLANTS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who is in charge of the environment. With the installation of an air pollution index system in Windsor soon, the possibility exists of Canadian industry being forced to shut down when pollution reaches too high a level. What steps can be taken by us to stop the 90 per cent of the pollution caused there by United States plants, and will we be able to instigate legal proceedings against them in the same way that they have instigated legal proceedings against Canadian firms in Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, problems of this kind are bound to arise if our standards of air quality are higher than those of the United States. I have, however, had communications from the U.S. authorities proposing high standards which are also uniform throughout North America rather than our standards being different from those of that country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTEREST FREE LOANS TO AFRICAN COUNTRIES—SIMILAR ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN PROVINCES

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister about the trip of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Nigeria, the Congo and other African countries.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs is handing out during his trip interest-free loans for the construction of railroads, highways and bridges, does the Canadian government intend to implement the same measures to help Canadian municipalities and provincial governments?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the question of the hon. member is rather in the form of either an argument or a suggestion to the government. He must suppose that it will be considered.

POLICY RESPECTING AID TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

While on his trip to Indonesia, he stated that he had learned much on Canadian aid to developing countries. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to make a statement shortly about the change of policy that he announced in Indonesia at that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not really announce a change of policy, but an improvement of the policy we have been following, namely, that it is the intention of the government to assist developing countries.

I could also suggest to the hon. member that interest-free loans represent only a very small fraction of the federal budget, whereas we give each year, in the form of grants or equalization payments, hundreds of millions of dollars to the provinces and indirectly to municipalities which are dependent on them, without interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall allow the hon. member to direct a supplementary question but I suggest once more that we should presently limit the number of supplementary questions.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

As these are small amounts, would the Prime Minister be ready to allow a loan similar to the one granted to India, that is $211 million, interest-free, for the development—

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REMOVAL OF NON-PUBLIC FUNDS FURNISHINGS FROM CLINTON BASE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that considerable furnishings in the non-public funds category have lately been removed from Canadian Forces Base, Clinton, after the minister promised a delegation from the county that this would not happen until the new occupiers of the base had had a chance to purchase these furnishings, would the minister take immediate action to stop the removal of these furnishings until the future disposition of this base is known?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I gave no such promise nor could I make such a promise. Non-public funds are not government property and of course it is a matter for decision by that particular group. We have, however, recommended to the CANEX people that they delay action in this regard until a decision can be taken.

EXTENSION OF ARRANGEMENT COVERING CANADIAN FORCES IN CYPRUS—ROTATION OF TROOPS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether an extension of the existing arrangement covering our Canadian troops in Cyprus is presently the subject of negotiation and, if not, is rotation being contemplated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. As the hon. member knows, the mandate is renewed by the Security Council every six months. The present mandate was renewed at the commencement of this year and will expire in June, 1971. Negotiations with respect to this renewal would fall within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Rotation is planned and the battalion of PPCLI based at Calgary will relieve the battalion of PPCLI from Esquimalt next month.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY TIDES—DISCUSSIONS WITH NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has he been having discussions with the Premier of Nova Scotia and have they discussed the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides and the programming board's report? If so, would the Prime Minister report to the House anything that has transpired and any decision that might be made regarding re-examination of the programming board's report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be having some meetings with the new Premier of Nova Scotia following a series of meetings I have been having in private with the premiers of other provinces on a more or less continuing basis. The long established practice at these meetings is that they are private. In order to ensure a better spirit of co-operation between the two levels of government and a better knowledge of the situation of the respective governments, it has not been customary to disclose the details of such private meetings.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I do not really care whether the meetings are private or not, but would the Prime Minister discuss with the Premier of Nova Scotia the programming board report on the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides in the hope that we can have a re-examination made to the benefit of the whole Atlantic area and the whole of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: If the talks are private, Mr. Speaker, obviously it is not logical to assume that I will say what we are talking about.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he could not initiate such discussions with the Premier of Nova Scotia on the basis that what is good for Nova Scotia is good for Canada and it is time that principle was adopted again?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we will make an effort to examine all questions in the time available to us which are of interest to the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Canada.

DOCKYARD WORKERS DISPUTE—INQUIRY AS TO SETTLEMENT—REGIONAL DISPARITY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister tell the House whether there has been any settlement of the dockyard workers' strike in Halifax up to this time?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a few minutes ago the negotiations were still in progress.

Mr. Skoberg: In view of the statement of the President of the Treasury Board to the effect that he supports regional differences in wage rates, can he say whether he subscribes to the widening of these regional wage rates as is suggested between the workers of Esquimalt and Halifax?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, as I stated to the committee yesterday, regional wage rates are a fact of life in both the public and private sectors. Their widening or narrowing is not something over which the government has direct control. We have a large and increasingly effective program to reduce these regional disparities and we are having some degree of success in this.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH SHIPS FISHING WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if he can report to the House whether French ships have been fishing within our 12-mile limit off the coast of Newfoundland?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, no French ships have been fishing within the 12-mile limit off the southern coast of Newfoundland, namely between Cape Ray and La Poile.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister whether he has had discussions with the French authorities with respect to the proclamation of the 12-mile limit?

Mr. Davis: I have not personally, Mr. Speaker, but the Department of External Affairs has been in contact with the French government. France is the only country which has protested our approach to the over-all process of phasing vessels out of exclusive Canadian fishing zones. Our regional fisheries officer in St. John's is also in daily contact with the French consul there, so we are in communication. We have had a protest from the French government about the over-all—

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS BY ASHLAND OIL FOR TAKEOVER OF HOME OIL

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who went behind the curtain just a minute ago so in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the negotiations under way between the government and Mr. R. A. Brown concerning Cygnus Corporation and the Home Oil Company, can the Prime Minister indicate whether negotiations are still open between Ashland Oil and R. A. Brown or have these negotiations for the purchase of Cygnus shares been suspended? I see that the Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources has returned to his seat.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for being out for a moment but I think I caught the gist of the hon. member's question. I am not familiar with the present state of negotiations of other companies but we have done nothing to prevent any negotiations at this time. We have made very clear to the Ashland Company the government's determination and the will of this House, as has been demonstrated. In fact the president of the Ashland Company was in the gallery on the night of the debate and I think he caught very clearly the message—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR CANADA

DECLINE IN PASSENGERS AND INCREASE IN FARES

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister responsible for reporting to Parliament on the activities of Air Canada. Has the minister seen the report in this morning's Globe and Mail observing that while passenger levels are declining on Air Canada flights, fares are at the same time being raised? Could he please find out for the House from the president of Air Canada how the company reconciles these contradictory events?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would not permit me enough time to go into the mechanics of the airline business but I should like to tell the hon. member—

Mr. Woolliams: The service is terrible.

Mr. Jamieson: Perhaps I can take supplementary questions afterwards. The president and the chairman of the board of Air Canada will appear before the parliamentary committee on Transportation and Communications in a couple of weeks and I am sure they will be glad to explain this in detail.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Before I call orders of the day, I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a point of order. I understand, also, that the Postmaster General wishes to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to reply to a question asked previously. We will begin with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME LIMIT ON SPEECHES ON BUSINESS OF SUPPLY MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the length of speeches in today's debate. Standing Order 58(13) provides 30 minutes for the mover of the motion and 30 minutes for the principal government spokesman to reply. We are content that our lead-off speaker have 20 minutes, and my hon. friends to my left agree so far as their first speaker is concerned. We suggest that all other speeches be limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Postmaster General leave of the House to reply to a question asked previously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

RESUMPTION OF MAIL SERVICE WITH UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer rather briefly two very serious questions which have been put to me this week.

[English]

In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, I must say that the embargo on all classes of mail for the United Kingdom is now repealed and any Canadians who want to play post office with the British can now do so.

REFUSAL TO PERMIT USE OF WORDS "THE HOUSE OF RAPE AND HONEY" AS CANCELLATION STAMP

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I understand today why I was lost the other day when my hon. right hon. friend, the member for Prince Albert, asked me a question about the land of rape and honey.

The right hon. member has changed in Hansard a word which completely alters the meaning of his question: he had the phrase "cancellation on stamps" substituted to the word "surcharge".

Mr. Speaker, in answering this question, I must say that due to the limited size of the cancelling stamp and due to the requirement that a bilingual message be used, we are in no position to grant this request, even after removing the seed from rapeseed.

We would be glad to accept any suggestion for a shorter message.

[English]

Even I do not know what interpretation other countries which do not know what rape is will give to this slogan, because not everybody knows what rape means.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the minister and ask him this: if the phrase had not included "rape" but had been restricted to "honey" would it have been acceptable to the Post Office Department?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly look at that suggestion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—OIL—OPPOSITION TO TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE AND TANKER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR FEASIBILITY STUDY OF ALTERNATIVES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

That this House opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project because of the ecological dangers posed by this project to the people, towns, and cities of British Columbia and the national resources of Canada's western seas and coasts and that this House therefore urges the Government to immediately institute an independent economical and ecological feasibility study of alternative routes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it has not been without some thought that this motion has been brought forward in order to provide hon. members of the House with an opportunity to express their views on this most important issue. We do not say that the importance of the issue transcends other considerations. It involves, to some extent, the question of the internal operations of another country. There are times, Mr. Speaker, when the representatives of the people must speak out loudly and clearly. We have been trying to force this government, which is or should be the natural guardian of the safety of our land and the organization responsible for securing the resources of the people in any part of this land, to act. The government has failed dismally to do anything other than bring forward pious proposals such as the one brought forward by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) when he said, "Yes, this is a serious problem; I invite all Canadians to write to the American government." More than that is involved. The people of Canada have a right to hear their government express its views. The government has refused to act. We shall see what the people of the country will think of what is said in the House today, because this House can and I hope will take a very positive position in supporting the motion.

We contemplated moving the motion as a non-confidence motion, because a great many members, some of whom are on the other side, have been very free with their comments. In our opinion, they would probably have considered very carefully how they would vote. We decided on the present form of the motion for the very simple reason that there ought to be no inhibitions in this debate. I hope that every hon. member in the House will support this motion.

This government has been undecided and has vacillated a good deal. When they come to the edge of the water, they shiver and tremble and are afraid to enter. Usually, at that point there is a flurry of contradictory statements by ministers. Some ministers have not harboured an unuttered thought in the House or outside on this issue; other ministers have never made a thoughtful utterance.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

This has placed two, three or four ministers in a difficult and perplexing position, and it is partly for that reason we have brought forward the motion.

The motion begins in this way, "That this House opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project because of the ecological dangers posed," and so on. Let me say that so far as I am concerned, the question of the pipeline across Alaska lies exclusively and peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the United States government and the state of Alaska. There can be no doubt of that. We may have our views, and we have every right to say what dangers may be inherent in the construction of the pipeline, but the ultimate decision rests exclusively with the United States authorities.

At first blush we might say that the same objections apply to the further means of transporting oil from the Port of Valdez down to the Washington area, where the oil will be processed and refined. It is abundantly clear, I think, in view of the collisions between giant tankers which have caused immeasurable damage to the ecology, to the beaches and to the economies all over the world, that we face a particularly serious problem in this regard. Those matters have been mentioned from time to time in this House. No one will deny that the route to be utilized by these tankers, from Valdez down to the port in the state of Washington, is across dangerous waters. The final passage over the high seas, just before the ships come to port, will be particularly dangerous. The people of Canada in general, and the people on the west coast in particular, have a vested interest in the matter and a right to demand that their opposition to this means of transportation shall be expressed formally and categorically. If it is not expressed by the government, it certainly ought to be expressed by the members of this House.

The issue has been befogged by contradictory ministerial statements. Actually, a member on the government side from British Columbia said on television the other day that there should be a moratorium on ministerial statements. That is a good idea and ought to have been put into effect some time ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: These contradictory statements have not helped. It is not as if this were some new problem. For several months hon. members have been dealing with the matter in the form of questions, trying to get this slippery and devious government to answer, without any measure of success. There is a very distinguished member of the other place, the former premier of my province of Alberta. Aside from some of the defects he may have, he is one of the most knowledgeable persons in this country with regard to natural gas, oil and petroleum and the means of transporting them. On March 9, a few days ago, Senator Manning made a speech dealing with these issues. I wish to put on record some of the remarks made by this distinguished ornament of the other place with regard to this issue. At that time he was dealing with the bill before the Senate to amend the shipping act and establish a maritime pollution claims fund. We had already dealt with that in this House. He said:

> On the other hand, perhaps the greatest single pollution threat to Canadian coastal waters will not arise at all from oil being imported into or exported from Canada, but from the offshore movement of oil between Alaska and the western parts of the United States.

He went on to say this should not have come as any surprise to the government because the last official representation which he made to the government of Canada when he was premier of Alberta had to do with this very matter. At page 651 of the Senate Hansard, he is reported as saying:

> My representations to the federal Government were twofold. I urged, first of all, that immediate steps be taken, in advance of Alaskan oil coming into the world market picture, to ascertain as accurately as possible the impact that this new source of American oil supply could have on our economy, and especially on the petroleum industry in this country. Secondly, the view of the Government of Alberta at that time, was that it would be very much in Canada's interests to make representations to the United States to endeavour to interest them in moving that oil, as and when it did develop, by a pipeline through Canada to the main market areas of the Chicago region, rather than by the proposed pipeline across Alaska and by tanker down the Pacific coast to Seattle, and then back by pipeline to the Chicago area.

The government should have listened to this firm and definite caveat filed by this man two or three years ago. The advice was worth following. He knew what he was talking about. The then premier of Alberta laid down in plain terms the dangers and suggested alternatives.

The government has not done anything; it has failed to act. We will be faced with a crisis before we realize it. This government will not act. We in the Opposition are compelled to bring the matter forward in order to engage the attention of the public and secure the support of views which have been expressed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The United States has a very deep and vested interest in the Alaskan oil fields and the transportation of that oil to the centre of the continent. In rounded figures it is estimated that total U.S. consumption to date lies around 90 billion barrels, with existing conventional reserves pegged somewhere around 40 to 45 billion barrels, exclusive of Alaska oil. The present U.S. daily consumption lies somewhere near 12 to 13 million barrels. Furthermore, according to the U.S. interior department, over-all consumption of electricity rose 9.2 per cent in 1970 with petroleum supplying 43 per cent of all energy used. At a predicted increase of 4 per cent oil consumption per year, it becomes apparent that the U.S. needs Prudhoe Bay oil for its immediately foreseeable energy demands.

This is a fact we cannot change. We are a friendly neighbour, so we must contemplate their needs and requirements. They have secondary effects upon his country and our people. The government will not listen when we plainly and honestly say to them that there are inherent dangers in the proposed route, that there are alternatives and that they should examine these alternatives. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) has indicated that certain studies may or will be made. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is not quite as specific. I am inclined to accept at face value the views of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. However, he is only one member of the government.

We have had experience with this slippery and devious government. We do not believe them when they tell us what they are going to do. We had faith in them two and one half years ago, but that faith is gone.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not.

Mr. Baldwin: I am inclined to give credence to a newly elected government with a mandate. However, I simply cannot accept the fact that the government will do these things. The minister is doing what he can, but how long will he be in that position? There is the absolute necessity of firmly and irrevocably indicating what steps will be taken and how long it will take.

What are the alternatives? First, if any country has a vested interest, there should be some form of international discussion followed by a treaty and an arrangement. This country has petroleum and natural gas reserves on the Atlantic, Pacific and Arctic coasts. Canada is a middle sized nation. Until the past year, it had a lot friends in the world. It is to our advantage to take the initiative to bring together the countries of the world which need to be involved in working out a long range plan for international control of pollution, particularly the oil pollution which is threatened by the proposal envisaged in the TAPS system of transporting Alaskan oil to the south. One of the ministers who will speak in this debate should make a categorical statement and give an undertaking that the government will, if it has not already done so, initiate this step. A firm commitment with regard to the type of international convention which I suggest is absolutely essential.

Apart from that, what are some of the problems which we face? First, there are the dangers which are to be found in the actual proposal for the TAPS line. A report was made by the United States Army Corps of Engineers which warns that they might prohibit construction of port facilities at Valdez. This is a statement by a responsible organization charged by a statute of the United States with certain responsibilities. If this proposal is considered dangerous by the United States army corps, it must be considered even more so by the people of British Columbia.

A study of future tanker traffic in Puget Sound by the Honeywell Corporation of Minneapolis has predicted two to four tanker collisions in this area in the next ten years. Furthermore, two experts who testified at the recent Anchorage-Washington meetings pointed out that one collision by a supertanker would turn that area of the west coast into a dead sea. Canada is concerned about possible serious oil pollution along the Pacific coast if the tanker system is to be used. In addition, of course, there is the risk of damage to the ecology; we are sympathetic to the position taken by the conservationists who have voiced these fears at Anchorage but this, of course, is something which directly affects the people of the United States, particularly Alaska. In this connection there is also, of course, the knowledge that earthquakes are frequent in the area to be traversed by the proposed pipeline, but this question, too, lies within the jurisdiction of the American people.

Taking all these things into account, together with the growing knowledge which is becoming available to the people of the world as to what is happening to our environment, how could this Parliament possibly fail to express in the strongest terms its objection to the use of tankers to bring down oil from the north along the line which has been projected? I realize there will be other speakers in this debate and I do not intend to take up the full time allotted to me. But there are alternatives which have been considered.

There is the alternative of transportation through the Arctic sea, as illustrated by the experience of the Manhattan last year. I, myself, together with others in opposition parties, had occasion to express our objection to this being done in the absence of greater safeguards than were possible at that time. It would appear now, from the statement issued by the Humble Oil Company, that this project has been shelved. It was in connection with this voyage, however, that the government saw fit to bring before Parliament and have passed a bill dealing with the control of waters in the Arctic. That bill dealt with the control of Arctic waters within 100 miles of the edge of the Arctic archipelago. Although I had some doubts as to the possible legality of this legislation, although I doubted whether it was entirely necessary, I nevertheless, together with my hon. friends, gave the bill support. If the government can do this in the Arctic, Mr. Speaker, what inhibits it from making the strongest official representations with regard to the west coast, assuming, as I am assuming, that it would be doing so with the unanimous support of this House?

I need hardly point out that opinion in the United States is divided on this issue. The very fact that the program has been postponed for some time indicates that this is the case. It may well be that the United States government is just playing for time. In both nations there may be an election in 1972; it may even be that both governments concerned are trying to brush this issue under the carpet until the elections are over. I hope not, because if there is anything far too important to admit of playing politics it is pollution and, in particular, pollution caused by oil tanker collisions.

Then, there is the alternative of the Mackenzie route. This represents a difficult problem for Canadians, particularly those in the region which would be affected. We might be accused of opposing one solution in order to secure an economic benefit from the other. But this is beside the point. There are people in this country, and I count myself among them, who would be completely opposed to the construction of a pipeline through any part of northern Canada until it had been shown clearly that such a pipeline could be built with a minimum of damage. It is unfortunate that this was not done a long time ago when the then premier of Alberta, Premier Manning, requested it. He stated, in language which could not be plainer: here is the problem, here are possible solutions; do something about it. Now, the government is in a position where it is called upon to act precipitously and, possibly, without the degree of care which is necessary. The Mackenzie route does provide a reasonable alternative provided a careful study is made beforehand and great care taken to avoid harmful effects. Other members of my party will be going into this in more detail.

I conclude on the following note: I do not think there is anything in the terms of this motion which should inhibit any member of the House giving it his undivided support. I wish it could be the subject of a vote in order that the government would be armed with an unanimous expression of support from this House of its determination to press forward with objection to the maritime part of the TAPS route. As it is, I hope the voice expressed here will be so strong and certain that the government will be obliged to act. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said this morning that the government had been greatly moved by the debate in this House on the question of Home Oil. I do not know whether or not he was speaking with his tongue in his cheek or not, but I will give him credit for meaning what he said. In the past, it has not seemed to me that the government has been particularly responsive to the mood of Parliament. If the government is prepared to take action on the basis of the views expressed here, then I hope the House speaks with such a loud, clear voice today that those sitting on the treasury benches will act in the way in which they are called upon to act by the terms of the motion before us.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Official Opposition has put this motion down for discussion today. The general subject has received a certain amount of attention in recent weeks. Attempts have been made under Standing Order 43 to bring about a discussion of the subject mentioned in the first part of the motion. The first such attempt was made in a motion of my own by which this House would have put its stamp of approval on the opinion expressed unanimously in the British Columbia legislature against the idea of a massive movement of oil by large tankers down the Pacific coast of Canada.

The motion which the Conservatives have placed before us is capable of a natural division into two parts. I should like to comment on each of those parts. Part one exposes what I might call the ecological dangers of a Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker route which would involve shipping large quantities of oil close to the west coast of Canada. As hon. members know, this motion will not be brought to a conclusion by way of a formal expression of opinion by the House. I must say at once that I believe the position of the Official Opposition, let alone that of the government, would have been much more credible had they supported the amendment which I proposed not long ago to Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act. This amendment would have asserted Canadian control over navigation to a distance of 100 miles from both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada. In the circumstances, I feel the Official Opposition has declined to take a firm position. Had they, and had the House as a whole, seen fit to adopt the amendment to which I have referred, the voice of Canada could have been much more definitely expressed to the world at large, including our neighbour to the south and to the north, since we are talking about Alaska.

As the question is put in this motion, we are still going to be left somewhat up in the air by the time the debate is over. It seems to me that in view of the fact we took a clear position in respect of the 100 mile jurisdiction proposal last year in the Arctic, while at the same time leaving unprovided for the similar ecological dangers posed to our Atlantic and Pacific Coasts, in some respects we have locked ourselves in, in the discussions that are now current concerning the movement of oil from the north slope of Alaska to the continental United States. I should like the House to recall that my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) attempted last year to include the provision of a 100 mile pollution control zone off our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, at the same time that we were indicating our strong support for the government's position on the Arctic.

So, first of all, my chief regret must be that by its initiative in the Arctic last year the government, and I suppose Parliament as a whole since we supported it, may very well have precipitated the situation which we are discussing with great concern today, namely the massive movement of oil along the Pacific coast of Canada. This must be my first comment on the motion, and in all fairness I must include, in my criticism of the way in which we are boxed in today, the official opposition as well as with the government. When it came to the crunch, both the government and the official opposition refused to take a firm and clear Canadian position on the need to protect the ecology along our Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The second part of the motion suggests that this House should urge the government to immediately institute an independent economical and ecological feasibility study of all alternative routes. This raises many broad issues, as the hon. member for Peace River indicated. In the course of the discussions which took place last year a number of alternative routes were considered and examined, in a rather cursory fashion of course, including the transportation of oil across the Arctic by oil tanker. One of the committees heard quite extensive evidence as to the possibility of transporting oil under the Arctic ice pack by large submarine tankers. Incidentally, during discussion of the Territorial Lands Act Amendments there was a good deal of discussion of the question of pipelines and their relationship to the ecology of the Canadian Arctic and, in particular, to that of the Mackenzie valley.

We now find ourselves in the position, because of the developments that have taken place in Alaska and the initiatives that have been taken in the United States, of being in danger of being stampeded into a quick decision, on the question of alternative routes, one which would be ecologically damaging and might not be in the long range interests of the Canadian economy.

The question I should like to ask in relation to the second part of this motion is this. For what purpose does the official opposition suggest that a study of alternate routes should be made? I listened carefully to the speech made by the hon. member for Peace River in introducing this motion, but I failed to detect any clear statement as to what should be the basic and underlying purpose of this study. Is this study to be undertaken for the convenience of the United States? Is its basic purpose to be to find for the United States some system of moving oil from Alaska to the southern part of their continental possessions without regard, except in a minor way, for the ecological consequences of an interior route through Canada? These are questions that have not been answered by spokesmen for the official opposition; nor indeed have they been answered in any way, shape or form to date by ministers of the government who have spoken in various ways and at various times, both inside and outside the House, on this particular subject.

About the only thing that we have had has been the picture of a couple of our ministers scurrying off to Texas to have some discussions with those people whom not too many years ago the then leader of the Conservative party described as "Texas buccaneers". Is this the place where the decision as to the future routing of oil from Alaska to the continental United States is going to be made, down in Texas with a few oil magnates? This is the impression that has been left in this House by the only definitive actions taken by the government to date, apart from the very nebulous comment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that he hopes to have some kind of discussions with the Secretary of State of that country. These are the kinds of questions that we in this House should be asking ourselves in discussing a motion that suggests that a study concerning the economic and ecological feasibility of alternative routes be undertaken.

The question why we should undertake this study is one that I examined in my own mind as soon as I was acquainted with the contents of the motion that has been moved today. I propose to move an amendment to the motion which I hope will serve to focus attention on why a study should be undertaken on some real and basic issues as far as Canada and its future are concerned. I hope that when the spokesmen for the government reply they will relate their comments, in part at least, to the proposal I want to make. So that the House may clearly understand what I have in mind, I should like to move at this point, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"with a view to developing under public ownership a transport system for oil and gas which will best serve the long-term interests of the Canadian economy".

If we are to undertake a study immediately, urgently and in depth, and in a way which will take into account all of the ramifications of this question for the purpose enunciated in this amendment, then let me say at once I am in full support of the proposal made by the official opposition. But I must say I am not too confident that the official opposition will agree with this particular approach as the basic reason for this proposal. I happened to come across an article in the Ottawa Citizen for March 10, 1971, written by Mr. Dave McIntosh. In this article he suggested that there may be another great pipeline debate shaping-up, with additional ingredients. I hope he does not mean that we are going to have the kind of parliamentary shambles associated with that earlier debate. I should like to suggest that the issues coming to the fore in relation to the transportation of petroleum products are even more basic and fundamental to the future of Canada as a country than the issues which were involved in that infamous pipeline debate. Mr. McIntosh says:

It was the NDP, then the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), that began the big 1956 pipeline fight.

As I recall that debate, I cannot help but compare it in my own mind with the situation that prevails now. The focus of that debate as far as we were concerned was how the pipeline should be built. There is no question in my mind that there was anything but basic agreement on both sides of this House, certainly between CCF members and the minister who proposed this pipeline bill, that the destiny of Canada as a nation should be strengthened and made viable. I have always given the late C. D. Howe full credit for his efforts in this regard. We had little objection to his enunciated intention in respect of the construction of an all-Canadian pipeline. This was something we understood and supported. I have always been prepared to give him full credit in this regard because I think he was right.

I sometimes wonder what the reaction of the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe would be today if he were sitting in the gallery listening to the lily-livered, wishy-washy statements of policy we receive these days from members on the government benches? I am sure the late C. D. Howe would hoot in scorn and cry with derision at the concept of the future development of Canada as espoused by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). Not that I am suggesting that the statements made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development do not express his genuine concern about the ecology of the Canadian north. In this regard, I give him full credit. But what assurance have we received that the effect of the total package of government policy will not be a sell-out, again to use a phrase current in 1956, to the "Texas buccaneers"? This is the nub of the question we have to consider when we are expressing our concern about current dangers to all parts of Canada. Does it matter if we preserve our ecology if we do not preserve a viable economy for the benefit of a future generation? To me this is the basic and underlying issue of this debate.

It is apparent that there is an entirely new dimension to this question of the future transportation of petroleum products and the effect on Canadian interests. The ecological dangers have become more and more apparent to all of us. This new dimension has in part become apparent because of the fact that we are considering the exploitation of our resources in areas where the ecology is very different from that which existed in those areas involved in the earlier pipeline debate. This new element of danger is increased by the fact that what is now being done is so much different in degree as to become different in kind as far as its impact on the ecology of this country, the continent and, indeed, the world, is concerned.

We have had discussions which indicate that this is true not only in this area of our economic activity, but also in other areas because of the tremendously increased power to change the whole face of the world, which has become evident since 1956. In the discussions about the trans-Canada gas pipeline a great number of exclamation marks were placed behind the words that we were going to be building a pipeline larger than had ever been built before. It was to be 36 inches in diameter.

As I understand it, and I refer for a moment to the report which appeared in the New York Times of May 3, 1970, the proposed pipeline across Alaska would be four feet in diameter and close to 800 miles long, carrying a deluge of oil through otherwise frigid terrain at a temperature of 150 degrees Fahrenheit, or more. It is suggested in this report:

Secretary Hickel has referred to an above-ground line as a "Chinese Wall". If the pipe were on stilts two feet high and covered with six-inch insulation, it would stand seven feet above the landscape.

These are some of the factors we have to think about when we start talking about an alternative pipeline through Canada. In relation to the concern expressed by the people in British Columbia, we must think not only of where this pipeline will commence but where it will end. I have here a draft statement on environmental matters prepared under the auspices of the Department of the Interior of the United States. This is a preliminary study. I should like to quote briefly from it:

A pipeline route through Canada serving the U.S. Pacific Coast would eliminate the hazards of marine operations only if it is assumed that oil reaching Puget Sound by such a pipeline would continue southward to California by way of a pipeline yet to be proposed. It should be noted, however, that economics heavily favour the movement of oil by ship from Puget Sound to destinations in California. If the decision is made in favor of trans-shipment by water, then any potential hazards of marine terminal operations are merely shifted from Prince William Sound to Puget Sound.

I think one or two of my colleagues may have further observations to make during this debate on this and other related matters.

I noted an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning concerning an interview with Secretary Morton. The report indicates that the Canadian alternative is one into which certain oil companies should be looking. He also suggests that there is very little difference in the ecological dangers involved. A pipeline route to Puget Sound and transportation of oil by tankers from there to California would create the same ecological dangers which would be created by the transportation of oil by tankers from a port in Alaska to Puget Sound. I introduce this point in the debate, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley is not necessarily any quick and easy solution to the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), which reads as follows:

That this House opposes the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker project because of the ecological dangers posed by this project to the people, towns, and cities of British Columbia and the national resources of Canada's western seas and coasts and that this House therefore urges the Government to immediately institute an independent economical and ecological feasibility study of alternative routes.

Mr. Speaker, I believe a degree of inconsistency is to be found in the motion. It calls upon the House to oppose the Trans-Alaska pipeline as well as the movement of oil by tanker down Canada's western coast. I really cannot see what other means there is.

Even though a thorough study of the possible consequences of the two alternative routes might be worthwhile, I believe that a pipeline is the best solution. However, before the pipeline is built, approval should be secured from the province or provinces through which it would run and special measures taken to prevent a break that could disturb the ecological balance of the area involved.

I suggest that the government require the builders of the pipeline to hire Canadian workers and use Canadian funds to finance the project.

I do not share the opinion of the hon. member for Peace River who opposes the two solutions already referred to. I am sure that the development of the Alaskan oil industry will very much help our own in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that there are in the Yukon large quantities of unexploited oil, since it is very difficult for companies to make their operations profitable, due to the great difficulty in moving the oil to consumers in large centres. If a pipeline goes through the Yukon, it will be much easier for companies to move the oil to refineries located farther south.

I wish to make a suggestion to the government in connection with that problem. In my opinion, it should study the possibility of having oil refineries built in Canada. If the government authorities were to decide to subsidize adequately those industries, the Americans would probably be interested in having their oil processed in Canada.

I would have many more suggestions to make but I prefer to wait until we know more about this project and how much it will cost.

We, in the Ralliement créditiste, are therefore partly in favour of the motion of the member for Peace River at least as far as the necessary study is concerned and we ask the government to consider seriously the viability of a Trans-Alaska pipeline.

We agree with the NDP on the possibility for Canada to own a pipeline and to set up a corporation which would be the owner since it would facilitate the transportation of our oil to the centres which need it or to the processing plants which would be located where labour is available and the costs lower.

I also suggest that if we owned a pipeline we could propose to the United States to use it against payment of a fee which would ensure the pipeline's viability.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker: It being one o'clock, I now leave the Chair and the House will resume at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we have the opportunity today to have a debate on the very important topic of the construction of pipelines in the north. I think that every one of us agrees that it is very important that we find ways and means of building pipelines in the Canadian north because this will help Canada generally, and in particular it will assist the development of our north. Being minister in charge of northern development, I think it is appropriate for me to express our views on that.

I will not deal with the problems of the Alaska pipeline running from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez, or the tanker route. I think that some of my colleagues will have the privilege of speaking on this. But the last part of the motion presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) requests that we institute immediately an independent economical and ecological feasibility study of alternative routes. I want to point out to the hon. member and to the House that when he spoke this morning he said we had done nothing about it. I want to put on the record what we have done.

Mr. Woolliams: What have you done?

Mr. Chrétien: In 1968, immediately after the oil discovery in Prudhoe Bay we started work.

Mr. Comeau: Give us more information.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, but may I point out that it would have been very easy for a member of parliament who was doing his job to find this out for himself because I made many speeches on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Greene: They would sooner play politics.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we started to talk about pipelines right after that, and at the beginning of 1969 the Canadian government established a special task force of officials on northern oil development with the duty of looking into the possibility of a pipeline route running through Canadian territory as well as the possibility of tanker routes in the Canadian Arctic. We were quite concerned about all the problems, and our concern was translated into action. We passed legislation to prevent pollution by tankers. Last winter we passed legislation to make sure that if tankers operate in Canadian Arctic waters the environment will be protected. Members of the NDP spoke about that this morning. Even the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) spoke about it. So, Mr. Speaker, I think we have shown our preoccupation with the problem of pollution in the north.

In August last year the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) and I issued some guidelines with respect to the construction and development of pipelines in the north. Those guidelines were issued after the task force had recommended that some limitation be placed on the construction of pipelines in the north to make sure that the ecology would be looked after, and to ensure that the native people would benefit from any pipeline construction. Our Canadian native peoples must have a priority with respect to permanent jobs because we believe we must protect their interests. We also stipulated that if there are to be pipelines they must be common carriers so that Canadian interests may use them, even if they are not built by Canadians. In addition, we stipulated that there must be Canadian participation if Canadians themselves want to participate in the development of pipelines.

A lot of people have talked about research, and I have said that we have not yet concluded the research that we have undertaken. In my speech in Dallas, I said that we think eventually there will be pipelines in the north. I am glad to see that all parties in this House agree that this will be so. The hon. member for Peace River spoke about this prospect, as did the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). I am very happy that the House is behind the government's policies as enunciated by my colleague and I, on the necessity for pipelines in the north.

In Canada, we have done some research. The United States first started by shipping pipe to Alaska, but here in Canada we started by undertaking research. Last year, after we amended the Territorial Lands Act, we established a new program, the ALUR program, which stands for Arctic Land Use Research program. Under it we have hired all sorts of interested people to do research on the protection of the ecology and the effects of pipelines on the permafrost.

Participating in this program are some university people, some Indian people, some Eskimos, and representatives of the oil industry. Right now they are gathering all sorts of useful facts. The Wildlife Service which used to be a part of my responsibility, has also taken part in this work. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), who now has responsibility for that service, has told me it will continue this work. I am very happy that we will have the benefit of the expertise available in the Wildlife Service, and of the fisheries' research officials who are already studying the effects of northern development on fish in the rivers, and on wildlife in general.

What is important to convey to the House is that the north can benefit immensely from these developments. There will be an investment of some $5 billion if two pipelines are constructed. Of course, there will be problems, but modern technology should be able to solve them. We must make sure that no great amount of pollution is created in the north. I devoted five pages of my speech in Dallas to this topic. Prevention of pollution is one of the conditions we will lay down if application is made to build a pipeline. We must make sure that the northern ecology is protected, and that if pipelines are constructed they will result in minimum damage to the ecology.

We said all these things months ago, Mr. Speaker, and now because we are stressing the Canadian interest some people say we are contradicting ourselves. That is not the case at all. We have a policy which we have spoken about for many months. We have decided we will develop the north and not repeat in the north the errors we have made in the south. This is a commitment we have laid down, not only in speeches but in legislation. As evidence that we are carrying out this commitment, I cite three pieces of legislation passed last year, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the Northern Inland Waters Act, and the amendment to the Territorial Lands Act. While the opposition were sleeping on the topic, we passed those three pieces of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We passed those three pieces of legislation which indicated our concern about northern development, and our concern about protection of the ecology.

Mr. Greene: And nobody told the Tories!

Mr. Chrétien: Now, after two years, they are waking up. I am glad to see that at last they are waking up, and are supporting our policy that we need pipelines in Canada, but not at any price. That is the point I stress—not at any price. I have said, and I repeat, that in developing the north we will not repeat the errors we have made in the south.

On many occasions I have said that one of the first preoccupations of the government is that development in the north must benefit the native peoples in the north.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We must do this because we have disturbed their traditional way of life. Many of them are no longer primarily trappers and hunters. Under our programs many of them are getting the necessary education to enable them to participate in the development of the north. They must have certain priorities with respect to jobs, and I may add that industry is collaborating with us.

Those who say we have not done the research must be blind. There have been numerous newspaper articles printed within the past two years outlining the research we have undertaken. There has been the construction of an experimental pipeline at Inuvik, where the oil industry is working in collaboration with the government to discover the effect of a hot oil pipeline on the permafrost. The Opposition do not seem to realize that this experiment has been conducted for some two years. I am a bit surprised at that.

Right now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform members of the Opposition, if they have not read the newspapers and have not followed the actions of the government, that at Fort Good Hope an experimental gas pipeline is being constructed to discover the effect of a gas pipeline on the permafrost.

All these things have been done by the industry in collaboration with the government. We do not need confrontation. What we are seeking is balanced development in the north. Mr. Speaker, I am not a doctrinaire person. The NDP members say the pipeline should be built only by Canadians. I have no objection to that if we can find the money here in Canada, but I am not a Social Creditor and I know we don't print money. If we are to spend $5 billion on the construction of a pipeline, we must first discover what the effect will be on other sectors of our economy. Perhaps that is a bit complicated for some. I say that this is a great day for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and for me, because everyone who has spoken in the debate so far seems to have said that we are moving in the right direction. Even the New Democratic Party has supported our idea. I am glad the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that we were going in the right direction.

Of course, we have not solved all the problems. We need to know more about the ecology and about building pipelines on the permafrost. In my judgment, however, it was advisable to let Canadians and Americans know "that the north is there." Pipelines will be built. If the Americans do not build a pipeline from Alaska I will not be too upset, because I know that we will find enough oil in the future in Canada to justify an oil pipeline. Perhaps it will take two or three years more, but there will be an oil pipeline.

So far as gas is concerned the Americans will have to use the Canadian route if they want a gas pipeline. There is no other way. You cannot ship gas, you must put it through a pipeline. Of course you can liquify it, but that is a very expensive operation. I therefore think that economic factors will force the interests at Prudhoe Bay to use the Canadian route. Since they will build a gas pipeline, perhaps factors of economy will prompt them to build an oil pipeline at the same time. We are not pushing the Americans; we are just putting before them the important fact that the north of Canada is opening and that great amounts of resources are there to be discovered. There is five times more sedimentary rock in the Canadian north than in Alaska. The resources are there; perhaps it will take a few years before we find them. As an example, Panarctic drilled eight wells and made two discoveries of immense proportions. They are major discoveries, perhaps unequalled by any others in the world. I do not think that we could discover gas or oil at the same rate elsewhere, not even in the Middle East. All this indicates a great potential for Canada. We must make sure that these resources go to market, and pipelines are the safest way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister. I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister may only continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, you know these resources are there for the benefit of all Canadians. Last year we passed the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, because we were afraid that technology which could be applied in the Arctic Ocean was not sufficiently advanced to assure safety. That was not an easy decision for us, because we know that there is oil and gas on the Arctic islands. We know, also, that the relevant technology is not far enough advanced for us to be certain of safety. We could not be sure at the time that those tankers would go safely through our Arctic waters. It was for this reason we made that decision. This route is not open and no outline has been given of the conditions under which shipping could take place. The pipelines, however, as compared to tankers, are a different ball game. We know a lot about the technology. Even so, we know that we shall need to devote a great deal more time and research to certain aspects of pipeline building.

I have talked to the House about some programs we have carried out. I do not yet know when all the research will be completed: I hope it will be finished as soon as possible, but we are not being rushed. We will take all the time we need, because we want to make sure that our pipelines are safe and that our wildlife and tundra in the north do not suffer.

Although I may be preoccupied with the ecology and wildlife, there is one factor that surely cannot escape the attention of members of Parliament. If we build these pipelines in the north, they will benefit the northerners. I am always talking about them. A few months ago when I showed a bit too much sensitivity for the well-being of the tundra in the Mackenzie delta, the Eskimos and Indians of Inuvik protested because they were in danger of losing their jobs with the oil companies. We have to keep all these factors in mind and, of course, make our value judgments. We are trying to do the best that we can.

An hon. Member: It is not good enough.

Mr. Chrétien: In the Northwest Territories, the Indians of Fort Good Hope are very happy, because they are working on the experimental pipeline and related activities. These developments in the north will benefit the northerners. We must make plans and make sure that the development in the north helps the people in the north and the people of Canada everywhere.

A few years ago we wanted development at any cost. Today, we have to take other factors into account. We cannot stop development. If we build pipelines in the north, the economic activity will be good for the area; and when there is a good level of economic activity in Canada, all the people of Canada benefit. You know, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will recognize that we have accomplished some things in the last three years. I am glad that hon. members realize we must face a challenge. We have been facing it for three years and have done a lot of work on solving it. I hope everyone will appreciate that this House is unanimous today on the question that pipelines have to be built in the north. These pipelines will benefit the Canadian economy and, I hope, especially the native peoples of the north. The pipelines will increase the opportunities for our native peoples. I thank hon. members for allowing me this extension of time to finish my speech.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been most refreshing. If the motion has done nothing else than elicit some explanation from the minister, it has served a good purpose. I think that we are dealing with a very important subject which must be considered carefully if Canada is to stay one nation for generations to come. The economic decisions that we make now, and the decisions we make about pipelines, will decide not only whether we shall stay together as one nation, but whether we shall remain independent.

For the last two years we have interrogated this government on this subject. We have wanted to know the facts. On what has the government based its studies? May I refer to two speeches that two ministers of this government have made. One of those, made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is a very "heavy" speech that was delivered at Denver; the other was made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) at Dallas, Texas. I wish I had time to read the speeches, because one minister took one position and the other took another position.

We have asked about this matter in the question period, because something seemed to be amiss. There has been confusion in the government ranks and ministers have contradicted one another. I, personally, along with other members of my party, have asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources what kind of study he has been making. Do you know what his answer has been, Mr. Speaker? He has said, "We are leaving this to free enterprise." I have examined dozens of answers in Hansard which indicate this position. That has been confirmed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). It is at least refreshing to note that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has listened to the opposition and got on the right wave length. As I say, the other minister said, "We are leaving this to free enterprise." I am a free enterpriser. Nevertheless, in any field in which the parties have interests to accommodate, whether those are the export of crude petroleum to Canada or other interests, those parties will be apt to say what suits them. In this case we are asking people who produce oil on the Prairies, in Alaska and elsewhere, to undertake an independent study which will tell us whether a certain proposed action of theirs will benefit the ecology or the economy of any part of Canada. You are asking people who have a high degree of interest in the answer to undertake a study. I am not criticizing what they might say, because anybody in their position would do the same.

What we are asking for is very simple. We are asking for an independent study to be made by a task force which will look into the ecological and the economic factors and determine what is good for Canada. The minister has said that the government has done a great deal. He told us what the government has done during the last three years. In the meantime, the sections of pipe have been piled up in Alaska. The Americans do not play ducks and drakes. They do not take pipe up there merely because they want to employ their people or keep their ships busy. They have taken pipe up there because they have decided what to do. They did not stockpile all that pipe for nothing.

In the meantime there has been a big finding of crude petroleum on the northern slopes of Alaska. The Americans now see that they can pipe that crude petroleum from the northern slopes of Alaska to Valdez and take it by tanker down the coast of Canada to Seattle or other ports. The minister says, "There is nothing to this; we might come to some decision this fall or next spring". The United States is not going to wait for the vacillation of this government or the contradiction of one minister. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said to the Americans in Dallas that we need their money. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources practically threatened the Americans when speaking in Denver. He said we might even jam their television and radio stations. He said we want to preserve everything for Canadians, even our culture. Never has the cabinet been so divided. I see the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) laughing. He knows I am correct. The success of this government is to be on all sides of all problems at all times so that no matter how attacked, they are always correct. That is really what they are doing.

The next question is why is there urgency? Why is the United States acting now? It is not just for the purpose of immediately developing the industry in Alaska. The facts are these. The outcome of the mid-east oil showdown resulted in quick price boosts which made cheap oil vanish from Europe and Japan. Oil is no longer a cheap commodity. Consumers in Canada and the United States are going to have to pay higher prices for their gasoline. That hard fact is sinking in around the world now that these old, rich countries in the mid-east have won unprecedented price increases. Twenty-three of the world's giant oil firms knuckled down under the pressure of the six countries around the Persian Gulf to increase the price of crude petroleum. The same happened in Venezuela. What happened? The 200 million consumers to the south of us will not pay just any price for gasoline and the byproducts of crude petroleum because of economic developments, so they started to stockpile. They do not have time for our procrastination. They have consumers and therefore have to move.

I hoped that one of the two ministers who spoke today would have stated that negotiations are going on with the United States. The minister did not state that, as a result of discussions, the United States have now decided not to use that pipe. They are going to use the pipe and the tanker. Even with the limited knowledge I have, I would like to see a forum set up like the Borden commission so that we would know how to handle the ecology of the north and everyone would be informed. I agree with the minister that a pipeline through the Mackenzie valley is the answer. The oil line may have to go above the permafrost and the gasoline line underneath. Neither I nor the minister are here to solve these technical problems. These must be solved by experts.

The United States is not going to wait. They have moved the pipe into Alaska. They have billions of barrels of oil in their state of Alaska and intend to move it by tanker to the other 48 states. This is what they are saying to the Canadian government. I hope the government will say that they have made a deal with the United States whereby they have agreed to share the cost of building a pipeline down the Mackenzie valley because of the danger to the ecology and the western coastline. I would be reassured if I heard a statement like that. In fact, I would not even bother speaking today if I could be assured the government made that kind of deal with the United States.

I have read the United States world news reports and watched American television programs. They still get into eastern Canada, even though they are jammed out of the west because we must live differently from the people in the east. The feeling is growing that the United States is on the move. They are going to supply gasoline to their consumers at a price that the Americans can afford to pay. That is what this is about. This is not a game, it is an economic problem. I say that we need a study. The problem is that it is two years too late. Tanker oil pollution near Canada's western shoreline, in conjunction with the announced increase price of gasoline, are two of the foremost problems facing Canadians. We cannot divorce oil pollution from unemployment or the economic growth of this nation.

A pipeline could carry crude petroleum from Alaska and Canada's northern Arctic or gas from the Christian Islands, about which the minister spoke. The government talks about 100,000 jobs for Canadians. At a time when we have great unemployment, if we had a plan for a pipeline now this program could be negotiated with the United States. As a result, many Canadians could be put to work. We could negotiate with the United States to use Canadian steel, pipe and workers. This is what was done in connection with the Trans-Canada pipeline. If it had not been for the debate, this would not have happened. The pipe was made in Canada.

What will this do to the central industrial areas in Ontario and Quebec as well as western Canada? The government could work out a plan with the United States to protect the ecology and the economics of this country. All the government has promised has been to continue unemployment and pay the unemployed $100 a week. This keeps taxes at such a high level that it is impossible to even get Canadians interested in purchasing Home Oil. That is wrong. One subject cannot be isolated from the other.

With the increase in the cost of crude petroleum and natural gas throughout the world, the United States intends to get supplies of these resources out if at all possible. That is what is happening. There are two routes, one of which is the route to Valdez and then by tanker. There are now 500,000 ton tankers being built. One spill is all we need. Are the ministers strong enough to tell the United States that they cannot bring tankers down our shoreline to United States ports? I would like to hear a statement like that. I would like to see how we could stop this development if the United States decides to undertake it. It would be very interesting.

In the countries with a high gross national product, the United States, Japan and Germany, they realize they have to pay more for their crude petroleum. A London correspondent wrote and I quote:

> The era of cheap oil has ended in the West and cannot be expected to reappear in the foreseeable future.

Has the government told the Canadian consumers in the big cities such as Montreal and Toronto that they are going to be paying more for their gasoline? That is what is going to happen in the very near future. I continue to quote:

Trans-Alaska Pipeline

• (2:40 p.m.)

Industry experts here are convinced that the precarious balance between producing and consuming nations has tilted sharply in favour of the producers. From Geneva, this assessment came after talks with some of Europe's top business economists:

Throughout most of the post-war period, especially in the 1960s, Europe has benefited from rapidly expanding imports of low-cost oil from the mid-east and from North Africa. Petroleum surpluses and sharp competition among international oil companies have tended to hold prices low.

Now the picture is sharply changed. European consumption has risen faster than was foreseen. Western Europe now meets well over 50 per cent of its energy requirements from oil and covers more than 85 per cent of its total oil consumption by imports from the mid-east and North Africa.

World oil consumption could double again in the 70s according to estimates prepared by the Royal Dutch/Shell Group. And there is little hope that Europe can reduce its dependence on Arab oil in the next five or ten years.

Bear in mind, too, that these forecasts are based upon relatively stable conditions. All we need is a blow-up in the middle east and we are in trouble. Bearing in mind the obligations and commitments of the United States as the world's leading power, may I ask whether Canada has negotiated with the United States to cover a situation in which the United States was involved in the kind of conflict I have envisaged, and Canada remained neutral? Would oil continue to flow through the pipeline? Are we prepared to guarantee that it would continue to flow under such circumstances? I have no doubt that American business people will ask us these questions.

The minister admits we do not have enough money in Canada to finance these pipeline projects. I agree, and I am glad to hear him say this. I am glad there is one minister in the cabinet who tells the truth. The truth is, we have no choice but to tell the Americans and other foreigners that we need their capital. It is up to us to set guidelines, and that is another story, too. The fact is that the government moves from crisis to crisis, as it did in the case of Home Oil. Today there is no trading in Home Oil shares on the stockmarket as a result of the decision which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has taken. If there is to be an independent study, say so and produce the facts. I would point out that the National Energy Board in whose hands, we gather, the whole industry is to be left, is not properly equipped to handle such situations. Witnesses are called to appear before the Board as if it were engaged in a judicial process. Afterward, decisions are made. If an independent body were set up, working for the national interest, I would think the board itself would make the proper decision when the evidence came before it. But everything has to be worked out in consultation with the United States.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to inform him that his time has expired.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I welcome the opportunity to take part in this extremely important debate today. Certainly, in economic terms, the issue is probably the most important one we shall face for many years. When one considers that the seaway, which we look upon as probably the greatest Canadian accomplishment in the field of construction during our history, cost some $500 million, excluding the power generation aspects, and when we consider that the two pipelines would cost some $5 billion to construct, the equivalent of ten seaways, we realize that this issue in economic terms alone is an extremely important one for the future of our country.

A debate at this time might be early in the game but it is certainly warranted. Hon. members in the opposition have shown concern about the need for a feasibility study. It might be as well to put on record what has been done to date. The timing of this debate is important when we consider the fact that in Prudhoe Bay there is some $50 billion worth of oil plus a potential of some $250 billion of oil and the Americans have made it manifestly clear that they intend to move this oil. Yesterday, Secretary of the Interior Morton, as quoted in the Globe and Mail, when asked whether it had been decided that the oil should go to market, replied: "That is correct. It would be negligent to seal up those resources." So the picture is clear. The oil is there in Alaska. It will be moved by the Americans and there are only two possible ways of doing so, either down the Pacific coast in tankers or by a cross-Canada line in the construction of which Canada would be a land bridge over which the oil would pass, some of it to the Canadian marketplace but the vast majority of it, certainly, to the United States marketplace. The oil will certainly be moved, one way or another, and the question which arises is: which is better for Canada?

We have taken a position, strongly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) reinforced by myself and by many of my cabinet colleagues, that we are greatly concerned as to the safety of huge oil movements by tankers buffeted by Arctic ice on their way to the west coast close to the shoreline of British Columbia. We have expressed great concern about this proposal. On the other hand there is a possible route through the Mackenzie Valley. As the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) stated, we do not have all the answers to questions vis-à-vis this route but I think it well to place on record some of the information which we do have.

The situation has changed to a considerable degree. The Prudhoe Bay find took place in June of 1968—that will be three years ago this coming summer. Until fairly recently there appeared to be a decision on the part of the companies concerned that the oil should be shipped through Valdez and then down the coast. Evidence of this was many million dollars worth of pipeline piled on the tundra. Those of us concerned about the possibility of a Mackenzie route for this oil thought it could be the second line. Recently, though, events have taken place in the United States, outside our immediate jurisdiction. Hearings have been held, a pronouncement has been made by the Secretary of the Interior and a report has been issued by the defence authorities in Washington. There is now great doubt as to whether the Valdez line will, in fact, be the first line, and there is a possibility that the Mackenzie line could be the first and possibly only line built.

Again, Secretary of the Interior Morton, referring to the possibility of a Mackenzie valley line, said yesterday: "At the present time it would be appropriate for oil companies to talk to the Canadian government about a Canadian route". This, of course, the Canadian government is perfectly prepared to do. As the Secretary of the Interior said yesterday, obviously the Canadian route is an alternative. So that there is a very real possibility that the Mackenzie valley route will be the first line.

What the Canadian government is immediately responsible for is to determine whether or no such a route is preferable to Valdez and thence down the coast by ship. If it is preferable, then we must make our decision, and attempt, if we can, to ensure that that will be the line that is going to carry these northern resources.

Quite properly, I think both the country and hon. members opposite are entitled to ask what has been done. As is to be expected in an adversary forum such as this, hon. members opposite allege that nothing has been done. Quite often under our way of life governments, like all human institutions, do not move as fast, as effectively and are not as far seeing as we would like them to be. But if there is one area, one subject matter, with regard to which the government and those officials who are responsible to the people of Canada, have been looking a long way ahead, and in which we have moved forcibly, effectively and taken action in time, it is the possibilities for Canada of this Mackenzie valley land bridge for northern resources.

I should like to put on the record what has taken place in this regard, and this should assure hon. members opposite as well as the country that on this particular issue the interests of Canada have been well met indeed by the Canadian government.

First of all in regard to the offshore question, assuming the Valdez line were chosen, let me point out that the government has already taken definitive action to prevent oil damage in coastal regions, particularly on the west coast. We are, for example, in the process of adopting high safety standards for coastal shipping in our waters through the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. In addition, we have moved to prevent any further drilling for oil and gas in the Straits of Georgia region, recognizing the unique recreational attractions of this area. I am convinced that residents of the Pacific northwest and the United States have no less concern for the protection of their coastal environment than their northern neighbours in Canada.

What have we done in regard to, to use the words of the motion, the ecological feasibility of an alternative route, the Mackenzie valley line? As I have said, the Prudhoe Bay oil discovery was disclosed in June of 1968. As early as within one month from the time of that declaration the chairman of the National Energy Board met with the presidents of the oil companies who owned that oil—Arco, Humble and BP—and pointed out to them that the Mackenzie valley line had advantages as an alternative and should be considered by them. Those corporate citizens determined, as was their right, that the quickest way to get oil to the markets would be via an all-American route.

In January 1969 it was announced that the Valdez line would be built. Shortly after that the pipe was ordered, and shortly thereafter was piled on site. But apparently that decision was arrived at without pervasive ecological and economic surveys being conducted. Indeed, there was not time to conduct them between June of 1968 and January 1969 when the announcement was made. Now, perhaps, the chickens are coming home to roost as a result of that fast decision. Environmental authorities in the United States, defence authorities, as I said, and the executive of the United States themselves, have voiced great concern about that line, as we have, vis-à-vis the potential danger of an offshore marine disaster.

What did we in Canada do? Even though it did not appear that the first line was going to be through the Mackenzie valley, it certainly appeared that the first gas line would be through the Mackenzie valley for there is no way of getting gas out of Prudhoe Bay except through Canada. There is, apparently, no known technology for the liquification of gas in those cold northern climes at the present time, so that the choice for the company would be to reinject the gas or transport it over Canada. So it did appear that there was a good chance of constructing a gas line across Canada, and that at that time there was the potential for a second oil line across Canada.

I do not blame hon. members opposite for having forgotten the action we took. Equally I am sure that they are not deliberately misstating the facts or attempting to take partisan advantage in this debate. However, it may be that by placing the facts on the record, most of which have already been put there, we can clear up any doubts that they may have as to the very responsible and really dynamic action that has been taken by the government from the start on this matter.

First of all there was the meeting between the chairman of the NEB and the companies. Then on December 20, 1968 the then Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin), in answer to a question from the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), announced to the House, as reported at page 4221 of Hansard—I am sure hon. members are familiar with these words—as follows. He was asked:

> Can the minister confirm recent press reports that a task force has been or is to be created to study northern oil development?

The minister answered:

> Yes, I can confirm that, Mr. Speaker. The core of the task force consists of the deputy minister of energy, mines and resources, the chairman of the National Energy Board, and the deputy minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This is a governmental task force and its purpose will be to bring together all information on the existing oil situation in the north, on transportation routes that might be used, and to co-ordinate all available information, from all federal agencies and departments, and then report and make proposals to the government.

So as early as December 1968, long before anyone was even concerned about a pipeline through the Mackenzie valley, the government had seen, had understood and had acted and the task force was created. What has the task force done? I think that would be a very proper question to ask, one I am sure members are interested in, as is the country at large. First of all, to the task force has been added since the Department of Transport and now the new department of the environment.

The task force immediately established four sub-committees. The first sub-committee was a marine feasibility sub-committee. Its function was largely directed toward the progress of the Manhattan voyage. Members of that sub-committee not only travelled with the Manhattan and made economical, ecological and environmental reports, but I think they had a comprehensive overview, both before and after, of the Manhattan voyage.

The second sub-committee was the pipe line engineering and construction sub-committee. This committee was chaired by the National Energy Board; the first sub-committee was chaired, I believe, by the Department of Transport.

This second sub-committee has been making engineering feasibility studies of pipeline economics, the cost of such a line, the cost of a gas line, and then the cost of such a line compared with the TAPS line, including comparative tariff costs. As a result of such comparison I was able to give, for instance, not too many days ago, a comparison showing that we believe that a barrel of Prudhoe Bay oil could be delivered in Chicago 30 cents cheaper via a Canadian route than via the Valdez marine route.

The third Committee on Environmental Matters was chaired by an official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That committee has been sufficiently successful in its researches that it has now reached the position, after more than two years, of drafting guidelines pertaining to ecological matters of pipeline construction and operation in the north.

The fourth committee of the task force is the committee on marketing. It was chaired by an official of the National Energy Board. As my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated, this research has been co-ordinated with the work done by the task force, along with the information provided by various government departments. All this effort and structure has been at work since discoveries at Prudhoe Bay. This information has been continuously provided to government departments and others in respect of investigations carried out by these various organizations. We may be inclined to look upon the economic, environmental and ecological problems as being something particularly referrable to ourselves, or to Canada in general terms. We should never lose sight of the fact that the most important consideration is, surely, the well-being, the desire and the decisions of the northern people themselves; the people who live in this area. What do they want? That is the paramount question.

Of course, any pipeline will change the nature of life in the area. It will not be exactly the same north as it was before. That is probably always the question in a free society, to resolve conflicting—in this case conflicting interests between the economic well-being of Canada and the people of the north in particular, and the very rational and proper environmental interest, that economic well-being will not, as my friend the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs (Mr. Chrétien) has said, be at the price of the depreciation of the environment and the quality of life, as the price whereby we have accomplished economic progress in the southern part of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, what about other departments? What has the National Energy Board been doing? We have had the task force and its four subcommittees. At the same time the National Energy Board has made computer studies on the effects of hot oil pipelines upon permal degradation. Degradation used in those terms has not a moral connotation. It means melting, Mr. Speaker, I am informed, of permafrost. Secondly, investigations into special properties of steel in extremely cold temperatures have been made by the board during this period. Thirdly, engineers of the board have attended at every research site and at every symposium on arctic research, including those in Alaska. Fourthly, they have been doing very comprehensive research, which I think one of my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party was concerned about, as to what the Russians have done in the area of the pipeline construction in the north. They, of course, as all of us know are many years ahead of other countries, certainly in northern settlement.

One of the scientists at the National Energy Board is completely fluent in Russian and he has been at work translating and interpreting all known Russian works on northern pipeline construction. At the same time, the officials of both my department and of the National Energy Board have been recently in Russia and have had considerable discussions with their Russian counterparts in regard to northern pipeline construction.

What about my own department as well as the NEB? What have they been doing in this period of two and a half years? Have they been asleep? Is this sudden concern an ad hoc decision? No! The mines branch has been doing research as to how steels acts in extreme rates of temperature and pressure from minus 80 degrees to 160 degrees and above. The geological survey of Canada has done extensive programming in the north concerned with terrain examination to determine routes which would present the least difficulty from a geological and terrain viewpoint and which includes permafrost conditions. I might say that the Geological Survey of Canada has had some 20 years of experience in permafrost research. They were well prepared to do this kind of work long before it became necessary by reason of the Prudhoe discoveries. I might point out that all this work by the board and by my department has been co-ordinated with the northern affairs studies of ALURA, to which my hon. colleague, the minister, referred.

The combined programs of my department, the board, and the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, is supported by programs of university research specifically dedicated to this proposition of pipeline building in the north.

At the University of New Brunswick, with its permafrost group, at the University of Alberta, environmental studies, at the University of Saskatchewan Arctic studies, at the University of Laval permafrost studies, and even at the University of British Columbia we have had comparative studies which have been commissioned by the government to go hand in glove with those being done by the government. A total of over $1 million has been distributed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to these particular studies. The surveys and mapping branch of my department has given special emphasis and high priority to special mapping being done in the area of the Mackenzie Valley in order to assure that the proper routes are chosen.

The Arctic Research Centre at Inuvik, again under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has been active in research. The polar continental shelf program under my department at Tuktoyaktuk has coordinated the many land programs that have taken place in regards to the research.

Again, the mines branch has conducted a study in its fuels division on the behaviour of oil under severe low temperature conditions.

So much for what has been done specifically. I can in this short time allotted to me only refer generally to programs. But surely to any fair-minded observer of the situation, this clear decision, this emphasis on research and development, this programming of departments was to assure that we would know and learn as much as possible, so that when the time came to make a decision on the pipeline issue we would be prepared in this matter.

At the same time, what about the private sector? What have they been doing? Have they been asleep? This is a mixed economy, I suppose, as between government and the private sector in our country today. What have the private sector been up to? I would point out that these private sector studies to which I am going to refer have at all times been attended, at the invitation of the private sector, by officers of my department, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the National Energy Board, who have worked on-site on these private studies in order that we might have the benefit in government of everything being done by the private sector as well.

My friend referred to the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Research Limited at Inuvik. Here the resource of 15 of Canadian and world oil companies have been put to work, including all of the science and research engineering and know-how that they possess, in order to study the effects of pipeline construction in that cold climate.

I have had the privilege of attending at Inuvik there is a 48-inch line which is moving hot oil over the permafrost—two different studies; one above ground on piles and the other on gravel, BERM, with thermometers every few feet at various depths to determine how that oil might be carried safely without melting the permafrost. That is the key, as you know. I believe this is their second winter of complete study. Certainly when I was there last summer they were very encouraged that they were very close to being able to assure the country, or the National Energy Board who together will be the arbiters, as my hon. friend stated, of the safe conduct of oil under these conditions.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will also have to be satisfied. Certainly this study has proven a great deal. These 15 companies, in conjunction with government scientists, have gone a long way and are very close to establishing the safe construction of a pipeline. Secondly, I might also point out that this private study has involved aerial surveys of the possible routes, soil analyses, ecological studies and construction and operation and maintenance studies of pipelines.

The second major private group is the northwest project study group at Norman Wells at the Sans Sioux Rapids. This is the first winter of study for them. That group is composed of six private companies. Again, all the government scientists have attended there and are invited there on a continuing basis. They too, have the back-up of all the science, engineering and ecological people within those companies on these very important major studies. Their low-temperature research in respect of gas pipelines is being done as well as photography re routes, checking of terrain, soil studies and ecological investigation. Alberta Gas Trunk is also continuing studies. This is all the scientific and research back-up which preceded the government's overt policy announced last August—long before there was any outcry in the House or any public concern in Canada about the construction of a pipeline, because then it did not appear that a pipeline was imminent. I am not critical of the House or the country for not having been aroused last August, or before, because it did appear that the first line was going to Valdez. But this was done well ahead of time, last August, because we wished to avoid some of the mistakes, possibly, of 1956—where there may not have been enough study or enough government direction before the event—and because we wanted to demonstrate very clearly that we had not done what occurred in Alaska, namely, make the decision to build before the research had been carried out. As a result of all this work and all these studies we were able to announce these guidelines which really form the foundation of the government's policy in respect of northern pipeline construction. These are not final and definitive, as was stated at the time.

We are not sure where the $5 billion is to come from. That is a decision which must be made. If it cannot be raised in Canada—Canadians and the Canadian Parliament no doubt will have a voice in it, and a choice—do we permit outside capital, non-Canadian capital to build this pipeline? Will it be good for Canada if we do? We have said a maximum of Canadian content, both financial and otherwise. The NDP, although they did not argue it very fully in their motion today, envisaged that the public of Canada will build this pipeline under public auspices. Would this be good use of $5 billion worth of public funds, with diminishing priorities in other areas? Maybe the NDP are starting to print money too. We have not made a final decision. The guidelines are not final.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister's time has expired. Is there unanimous consent that the minister continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five minutes.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I will try to wind up very quickly. I thank my hon. friends for their courtesy. These guidelines indicate the general tenor of the policy—a single corridor, not pipelines all over the north; a maximum Canadian content without being dogmatic, because we do not know exactly what proportion of the financing can be done in Canada. We do know—some members have voiced concern in this regard—that every pipeline construction company in Canada will be working full steam and every bit of pipe we can produce in Canada will be used in that line, and maybe every bit of pipe that can be produced all over the world will be used in the construction of that line. There will be a maximum right to the indigenous people to participate and have a voice which will be protected by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Most important of all will be the right of entry to Canadian resources into this pipeline. It is not good enough that this be merely a bridge to transport United States resources to United States markets and that we have the boom that would go with construction, but no downstream benefit.

The most important thing is that the presently locked-in northern resources of oil and gas would have transportation to the marketplaces available to them. I think probably the key to growth and development in this great country of ours has always been transportation. It has often been said—maybe this is not too popular in the west at this time—that without the CPR there would have been no Canada. Without a transportation method for our northern resources, they will remain locked in and not be resources at all but merely something in the ground that would be a hope for the future. Possibly they might never be found in sufficiently great quantities or in close enough proximity to warrant the billions of dollars represented by the cost of a pipeline. So the most important guideline, under the conditions referred to, is that Canadian resources must have a right of entry into that method of transportation.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not take much more time of the House. The House has been most generous with me. The studies have continued since last August. They have not stopped. At the political level, when we saw there might be a possibility for the oil line to be the first we did approach our United States colleagues and voice our concern about the ecology of the west coast in respect of the marine route. We asked that this alternative Canadian route be considered. Remember, the law of this land is not that I, or the government, can tell anybody they can build a pipeline. The law quite properly is that a quasi-judicial body, the National Energy Board, will determine whether or not a pipeline can or should be built and whether it is in the public interest of Canada. But that decision must be ratified or denied by the government.

Therefore, I think we can assure the United States oil companies and the United States government, to the best of our ability and with the knowledge we have and the certainty we have achieved—and it is not complete yet in respect of the ecological factors—that there will be no unnecessary roadblocks at the Canadian end and Canadian governmental side. The key, as a United States official put it to me, is time. If this line is in the interest of Canada, if it is preferable—once you premise that Prudhoe Bay oil is going to moved by one route or another—in economic and social terms as well as environmental terms for it to be the Mackenzie Valley line, then the key is time. Can it be built more quickly? Will it get through the barriers, if you like, the slow-up processes of regulatory authority; and will the oil be delivered to market more quickly if it is to go via a Canadian route than if an effort is made to satisfy the various regulatory and environmental agencies and bull it through the Valdez marine route?

Therefore it is incumbent upon us, I believe, to expedite our procedures to the best of our ability, without rushing into something that is so important to Canada's future. I believe we have moved as quickly and as responsibly as possible. I believe we have been foresighted in this issue. I think we are in a position to move with considerable expedition if it appears that the entrepreneurs, the oil companies, and the government of the United States are interested in having the Mackenzie Valley line as the primary line and if it appears in the Canadian interest that this is where we want the oil to flow rather than down the coast of British Columbia.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is a thrill for me to follow the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) in this debate and to see that there are five ministers in the House. One minister left a minute ago. It is better than the question period.

Mr. Anderson: Look at your side. You do not have six members.

Mr. Comeau: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) stated that the opposition had been asleep. Let me point out that the opposition got the ministers out of the woodwork today and made them participate in the debate. But you need many ministers for each Tory member!

Mr. Reid: You may believe it, but no one else does.

Mr. Comeau: That is the problem; it is not the problem stated by some ministers. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave us a lecture on some of the things he has done. He said in his emphatic way that back in 1968 reports on this subject had been prepared. The trouble is that we have to act now and that we do not have the reports on studies that were supposed to have been started back in 1968. This is the problem we are faced with

now. A decision has to be made, and we must make representations on the basis of that decision. We have to bargain on it and on the results of the surveys that are supposed to have been made 2½ years ago and which, I presume, are still continuing.

The TAPS system will no doubt have profound and far-reaching economic, social and ecological effects. I do not want to deal with the economic and social effects but I want to deal with the ecological effects since this is the area that concerns me. I am not a westerner, and only the ecological effects concern me. Let us face the fact that the U.S. government wants and needs oil. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who moved the motion, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and others have quoted statistics regarding the economics of this route. It is for us either to accept the proposed TAPS route or to find an alternate route in view of the ecological effects of a possible oil spill on the west coast.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred to the Canada Shipping Act. The minister knows better than that; he knows that the Canada Shipping Act has no effect on the proposed new tanker route. An hon. member from the NDP stated this morning that if we had accepted their amendment, the problem would be solved. He also knows better than that. He knows that international agreements are needed and that only through international agreements can these problems be solved. You cannot simply say that we will have a 100-mile limit and that this is the way it will be. The minister knows very well that the 12-mile limit does not apply in this case. I am sure he did not want to mislead the House but was only trying to pretend that the government is doing something.

The ecological problem is not restricted to the west coast because shortly we will be faced with similar problems on the east coast. There will soon be an oil discovery on the east coast. This is being predicted by everyone. The point, therefore, is that consultations with the United States are absolutely necessary. I will not speak about alternatives, discuss what routes we should be taking or what the government should do. I only have one secretary at my disposal and I have not carried out the necessary studies to decide what is the best route.

What concerns me is that we have to protect our Canadian environment. Canada must speak strongly in this regard. Canadians have spoken, and so have I and many Members of Parliament. One hon. member has gone to the hearings, other members have sent letters to the U.S. Department of the Interior which is studying this matter, and Canadian organizations such as the Wildlife Federation have spoken out. But the government has not spoken out in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Comeau: It is true that the government has carried out studies, but we have not been able to find out the definite position of the government. As recorded at page 2848 of Hansard of January 28 this year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said he did not consider the matter urgent enough to make representations to the U.S. government on the Valdez pipeline. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should be asked to take a position on a pipeline through United States territory. Just to clarify the point, I did not say we had made representations. I said there bad been consultations between ministers and secretaries.

When asked to put forward the Canadian position on the tanker route through Canadian coastal waters, he merely said:

> We consider this to be a serious problem and we are examining the matter now.

On February 9 of this year the minister rejected the idea that the Canadian government should make an official submission at the hearings opening in Washington the next week on the pipeline and tanker route. He merely said:

> We will be approaching the U.S. authorities at an appropriate time to seek their assessment of the risks of oil spills in the Pacific Northwest.

Incidentally, the main reason given by the minister for not officially appearing at the U.S. hearings was diplomatic protocol. Yet only one week later he urged residents of the northwestern United States, and Canadians, to speak out against the proposed shipping of oil down the coast from Alaska. In his article on this appeal, a Globe and Mail reporter commented as follows:

> The unusual nature of the Sharp appeal was heightened by the fact that Ottawa has not yet made any formal representation to Washington on the plan—
> The appeal, made before television cameras in the parliament buildings was an unusual departure for Mr. Sharp. Normally, he adheres strictly to the rules of diplomatic protocol in his public statements.

Thus we see that no definite stand has been taken by the Canadian government in this regard. The Canadian government sent a letter to the United States Department of the Interior asking for consultations on this matter. We have not even had a reply. This morning during the question period the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) whether a reply had been received and whether consultations would begin. We were told that no reply had been received and that there were no consultations; that consultations would be started at some time, but he did not know when. This is the type of answer we have been receiving from the government. This is the way we have been bargaining.

I submit that this is not enough. Even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, this afternoon—in order to put forward the U.S. position on this whole matter—quoted an article from today's Globe and Mail. He does not even have an official document from the U.S. government stating the position of the United States; he had to quote an article from the Globe and Mail in order to tell the House what the Americans are proposing.

I asked whether representations had been made from the ecological point of view, because that is what interests me. The minister answered that no such representations had been made. I asked that a motion be made, and that is why we have a debate today. I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would accept a motion from Parliament stating our objections to the TAPS oil tanker route and the concern of Canadians in this respect. I will read my question as it appears at page 3914 of Hansard of March 3:

> I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since he is also responsible for external affairs, it will have a double effect. In light of the enormous ecological implications of the TAPS oil tanker route, will the government consider presenting a motion in Parliament to enable the whole Parliament of Canada to express Canada's insistence of full bilateral discussions and the frank recognition of Canada's interest in an ecologically satisfactory transport system?

The government did not want to accept a motion or to draft one in this regard, and so today we have a debate. I know this debate will be profitable because it allows the expression of points of view by many hon. members. But even after the speeches of the two ministers who have taken part in the debate—and I do not anticipate that any more ministers will speak—we still have not been told the Canadian government's position on this aspect of the matter. As I said a minute ago, today we find that consultations have not even begun in this area and no notice has been given of when talks will begin. As has been pointed out by some hon. members, pipe is already in Alaska ready to be placed in position—but we have not started consultations. This demonstrates the lack of interest displayed by the Canadian government.

I can see why the government has not started consultations. It is because the government has not yet decided what it wants. Last year the government made a big showing of its stand against pollution, as mentioned by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). He stated that Parliament had passed many pieces of legislation dealing with pollution. This is true. He also stated that ecological studies had been undertaken. This is also true. But we have not yet been able to find the answers to the problem—and it is an urgent problem at this point.

A couple of weeks ago when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) was Acting Prime Minister, in reply to a question he said that government departments are studying the threat to the ecology which could be presented by a pipeline running through Canada. But we still do not know the position of the government. We still do not have the results of all the studies that have been carried out.

[Translation]

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development spoke this afternoon about the studies made by his department. I do not know how long the minister has been in charge of his department, but he should certainly look after the North, and if he really does look after its interests, he should at least state the department's position on this matter. He did not do so. He talked about what his department had done, but not about what he, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and protector of the North, wanted done. He simply talked about a few small things his department and the government have done. He did not reveal the attitude of his department, which is really involved in this problem.

[English]

He has stated it is very easy for a member to get information on the position of the government. He has stated that guidelines have been issued. These things are true, Mr. Speaker; guidelines have been issued—but we still have not been told the Canadian government's position on this whole topic. Therefore I ask: Is it the policy of the government to oppose the TAPS oil tanker route as being ecologically too dangerous, and has the government expressed this opposition in a formal way to the Americans?

We do not know what the government has proposed to the Americans. This afternoon the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us some of the things his department has done, but he did not state the government's position. We do not know how much bargaining the government has done on this whole subject. If it is the type of bargaining it has undertaken in other matters, then I would imagine it has been very scanty.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred to an article in this morning's Globe and Mail. I quote the first paragraph of it:

> Putting all oil and gas pipelines from the north of the continent in a single corridor through Canada would have "much less environmental impact" than if pipelines are built both through Alaska and Canada, U.S. Interior Secretary Rogers Morton said yesterday.

That report comes from Washington; it does not come from Canada. The U.S. Secretary of the Interior thinks it would be appropriate for oil companies to talk to the Canadian government about a Canadian route—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time expired about a minute ago.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to take part in a debate on this topic. I only wish, however, that the wording of the resolution were a little more precise and had been thought out a little better. One might say it is a pious resolution, one which is careless in its wording and in some respects naïve. I say this because on the one hand it is asking government to take a position opposing one form of transport and at the same time it is suggesting—statements made since the debate began have supported this view—that we should encourage another type. The point I wish to make is the same point I have been making for some months now. Indeed, it is now a year since I first spoke on the west coast tanker route problem, and my point was then and is now that the information on both routes is quite inadequate for proper decision-making.

First let me deal with the western route, that is, Prudhoe Bay to Valdez, and Valdez to the lower 48 states. A certain part of this route has been studied, namely, the pipeline portion, the portion from Prudhoe to Valdez. The Department of the Interior of the United States has produced a draft ecological impact statement on the pipeline. I am holding this statement in my hand; it runs to some 250 pages. Also, the department has published an internal paper which was leaked to the press, which runs to some 40 pages and is a critique of that report. In addition, there have been hearings held in Washington and Alaska on the draft statement. In other words, there has been a fairly thorough study of the Alaska pipeline route. I have no wish to go into the question of whether it has been adequate or not. I tend to think it could have been done better but, after all, that is a decision for the American government.

Where I think the western route—the Prudhoe Bay to Puget Sound route—has not been properly studied is the tanker portion of the route between Valdez, a port in southern Alaska, and Puget Sound; in other words, between Alaska and the lower 48 states. This has not been studied. This fact is perfectly clear from the report which I held up a moment ago, the American draft ecological impact statement. There are one or two paragraphs in it which deal with pollution at terminals, but nothing which deals with the ecological hazards of the route itself and the damage that might occur from spills in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Puget Sound area. All I suggest to hon. members on this point is that there is a very real risk in this area and there is need for considerable study of this risk.

I have no wish to deal at great length with the reasons I think there is a prima facie case of danger in this area. I refer hon. members to a book by Major Nicholson, entitled "Vancouver Island's West Coast". I also refer them to another book entitled "Breakers Ahead", by R. Bruce Scott who has studied the southern portion of Vancouver Island's coast. I would just like to give one quotation from Mr. Scott's book. He lists 55 wrecks on a portion of coast less than 55 miles long and says:

> As can be seen from this record, most of the wrecks were due to human error, and despite the development of modern life-saving techniques and aids to navigation (especially radar, which permits the navigator to see in fog and darkness), ships continue to be wrecked on the "graveyard".

The "graveyard", Sir, is the portion of the coast from Port San Juan to Cape Beale. It is known to mariners as the graveyard of the Pacific and it is for this reason that Mr. Scott refers to it as the graveyard in his book. Next I wish to quote from the British Columbia "Pilot". Pilot books, I might explain for hon. members who are not from the Maritimes or British Columbia, are the reference works which captains of vessels keep on board their ships for use when approaching unfamiliar waters. I have used them myself when navigating on my own small yacht and I know how valuable they are, particularly when entering an area not well known to the mariner. The British Columbia "Pilot", the standard reference book on the subject, under the heading "Navigation" says this about the Strait of Juan de Fuca:

> Navigation is simple, in clear weather; the aids to navigation are numerous and the chart is a good guide. In thick weather, however, owing to the irregularity of the currents and tidal streams, every precaution must be taken. The strait is liable to all those vicissitudes of weather common in these latitudes—

I would ask hon. members to pay particular attention to these words:

> —and in few parts of the world is the caution and vigilance of the navigator more called into action than when entering it from the Pacific Ocean.

I think I can state that there is definitely danger at the entrance to the Strait of Juan de Fuca. I quickly add this is only one problem in that body of water. There are many miles of water between the entrance and the refinery at Cherry Point, near Bellingham, now under construction. Some of these waters are very narrow, particularly Rosario Strait, Haro Strait and Boundary Pass, one or the other of which must be used by large vessels entering the Strait of Georgia from the Strait of Juan de Fuca. We know, of course, of a tragic accident in Active Pass, a much smaller body of water entirely within Canadian waters and to the north and west of the two channels I have named, where a ferry and a Russian freighter collided with the loss of three lives last year. We know that the week before that accident, the flag ship of the Alaska ferry fleet piled itself up on the rocks and, in the words of Time magazine, "tried to put itself ashore, amid the trees". That was only a week before the ferry and freighter collision.

The area is not an easy one for navigation. I think there is good reason for the closest possible study of this area prior to any decision on the tanker route. That is the point I wish to make at this time. This is a dangerous area. It is in need of study. That study has not been done by the Americans and has not yet been done in Canada, although I welcome the comment made by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) who referred to the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that this will soon be done. The importance of this is recognized by the Americans as well as by ourselves. I sincerely welcome the initiative taken by the United States Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Morton, who promised one month ago at the Washington hearings, which I attended, that he would carry out a study. He said that his department would carry out studies on the sea route. The next day the Secretary of State for External Affairs wrote to the United States government and offered Canadian co-operation. We heard earlier today that there has been an exchange of letters and that co-operation between the two countries is proceeding very well. In this regard I only say, Mr. Speaker, that the position of our Secretary of State for External Affairs in this entire affair has been exemplary. He refused to be panicked by statements of opposition members in making diplomatic protests at a time when they could do no good. He played his cards well.

Mr. Comeau: And he has not been panicked by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson)!

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member is interested in the details of this matter or not. It is very serious for British Columbia.

Mr. Comeau: Don't get so upset.

An hon. Member: Facts upset the hon. member.

Mr. Anderson: The statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs were, in my opinion, excellent because he did not, so to speak, waste his ammunition before the enemy was in sight. He waited until such time as Mr. Morton made a statement that he wished to have such a study undertaken and then immediately volunteered our co-operation. This was accepted and now there is the possibility of a binational study of this matter. I might say, however, that as a result of concern expressed in this House our Special Committee on Environmental Pollution decided, prior to the statement we heard today from Mr. Sharp's parliamentary secretary, to go to the coast and hear evidence from various people and experts on this question.

In other words, what the committee of this House wishes to do is to obtain evidence which, unfortunately, some of us in the west think we have but which we may not be right about. In other words, while I feel, as I have stated, that there is a prima facie case in this area and that I know a fair amount about this subject, I think it is most important for this House to accept the proposal of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution and allow it to carry out its own study and to give an opportunity for all interested parties to be heard on the issue. We need more evidence; more facts.

The second aspect of this motion deals with the proposed pipeline which is to run from Alaska, up the Mackenzie Valley into southern Canada and down to the southern 48 states. I was delighted to hear it confirmed that a great deal of study has been done in this area. I believe that the people carrying out this job are doing a good job. I have confidence in them and in their ability to do the job. What I am not confident about is whether the organization of this material, from an ecological point of view, is adequate. I trust that we shall get further information from government spokesmen on this point.

In particular, I should like to know exactly what will be the composition of this committee which is to examine the ecological problems of the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline. How, in other words, is this study to be carried out? We do not have that information now. Although statements have been made about what is being done, we have not heard enough on how it is being co-ordinated. As I say, I trust that further information will be forthcoming from the government on this point. The government should make a clear response so that we may understand clearly how this information is to be evaluated. We know that information is being obtained. How, may I repeat, is it to be evaluated? Who will do the evaluation? Will there be public hearings? We want to know what will be the role of the Department of the Environment which, after all, will be taking over the wildlife services from the Department of Northern Development and Indian Affairs; and, as well, the responsibilities regarding water, of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is important for us to have this information.

In this context may I commend to hon. members the American National Environmental Protection Act of 1969, one of the major pieces of President Nixon's legislation. If we had such legislation in Canada it would enable us to surmount some of the difficulties concerning responsibility which we face. That act makes it clear that certain government departments, in conjunction with the people interested, must carry out such studies as the one I have in my hand, which I referred to earlier, entitled "Draft Environmental Impact Statement on the Trans-Alaska Pipeline". The department is required to hold hearings on such draft statements, and interested parties may appear and comment. I did this myself in Washington last month. After that the decision is ultimately made on the basis of what has emerged from the public hearings as well as on the basis of information which the department of government and, of course, the companies concerned, produced.

I feel that the American act could well serve as a model for similar legislation in Canada which would straighten out the responsibilities of various departments in this field. It would not solve all our problems, because problems in this area arise constantly. We must be constantly aware of them and all departments must pay attention to them. Such legislation at least would make clear what procedures must be followed in the ecological evaluation of matters such as the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline route.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that in connection with the Territorial Lands Act, concerning the land in the north, we have the right to conduct similar public meetings?

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite right in mentioning that amendment. What I should like to have, Sir—and I am speaking generally at the moment—is an act which could be applied, no matter where a proposed development occurs, be it in Quebec, British Columbia, the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. It should spell out standard procedures to be followed when ecological studies are being undertaken. For example—and it is a small one—if such an act and such procedures had been in existence before the seaway was built it might have warned us of the lamprey problem. That is the type of thing we ought to attend to. Certainly, the situation at present is far from that because, although we have excellent people who are concerned and who are doing good work, there is not an adequate standard procedure in these cases which can be followed. That procedure could well be based on the American National Environmental Protection Act. I urge hon. members to consider this.

It is clear, then, that we have on the one hand two routes to consider. One of these is from Prudhoe Bay to Puget Sound, half of which has been examined. We are not sure that it has been examined properly, and the Americans are uncertain about it. The other half, the sea portion, has not been examined at all. As well, we have the Canadian route with respect to which, as the minister said, we have not completed the required studies. We do not know what the impact on the ecology on that route would be. We are discussing two routes. Half of one route has been properly examined from the ecological point of view; there is doubt about that. It is obvious at this point that we are faced with an area where knowledge is inadequate. We must wait until knowledge is better before we proceed. We cannot make decisions now. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) make a commitment to wait.

When we are discussing transporting oil from Alaska to the southern 48 states, it is important that we do not become too involved with the red herring of ownership of this pipeline, such as the NDP has done. The minister referred to this. If a pipeline between Alaska and the lower 48 is to carry American oil—and let us remember we do not have oil of our own to carry—there is no reason why we should deprive growth areas of investment of Canadian dollars putting into the pipeline to carry American oil between two portions of the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member who is making such an interesting speech. We have tried to limit speeches to 15 minutes in order that as many members as possible will have an opportunity to participate.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), and to commend the official opposition for having made their opposition day one in which this very pressing problem can be discussed. Some interesting speeches have been made by government members. However, I am left with the general impression that these members, particularly the minister, really had the intention of pouring oil on troubled waters, whereas at least in this portion of the House our party is diametrically opposed: we want to pour cold water on troubled oil. What confronts many thousands of people in British Columbia is the potential oil spillage, ruinous to our maritime life, beaches and the welfare of our people. I ask hon. members to consider these effects which illustrate a threat.

The plan of a section of the United States oil industry is to bring oil from Alaska down our British Columbia coast-line to a refinery already rising a scant 11 or 12 miles south of the lower mainland of British Columbia. Half of the population of British Columbia lives in the lower mainland. This tanker fleet will travel through zones and straits especially dangerous to the vast floating bathtubs that they are. They are so vast that before they can slow down to change course, it is reported that they cover three miles. These tankers will be four or five times the size of the Arrow whose oil loused up the Maritimes coast and cost millions of dollars to clean up.

I have a special concern in this matter. My constituency of Surrey-White Rock is just across the international border from the Cherry Point area in the state of Washington, where the refinery which will receive the oil from these tankers is being built. I wish to quote from the White Rock Sun with regard to the refinery, the situation facing British Columbia waters and the waters of Washington state. Many Americans are as much against this project as we are. I quote as follows:

> The $150 million Atlantic Richfield oil refinery at Cherry Point bristles with industrial spires. Huge trucks continually stream back and forth through the guarded gate. Outside the compound some 300 cars in the parking lot are mute evidence of the numbers of workers within.

It is later than some hon. members realize, Mr. Speaker. We should not overlook the additional potential threat which will exist in the northern Pacific waters if the oil is brought down by the land-bridge plan instead of by oil tankers along our coast to the Puget Sound area. Possibly part of the crude will be reshipped out of that zone through the waters to the south. If that happens, we will still have a potential oil water spillage threat, although admittedly reduced.

Bearing in mind the confined waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, the passageways through the Gulf of Georgia and the San Juan Islands and the heavy shipping traffic already using these waters—the increased tanker traffic to handle the hundreds of thousands of barrels a day—will surely result in a collision and an oil spill. An oil spill from a tanker carrying 300,000 tons, if it is washed on shore, will create a blanket of oil one inch thick, 30 feet wide and 3,000 miles long. Those who know estimate that if this oil shuttle-service of huge tankers is established, we can count upon two to four oil spillages every 10 years. In other words, we can count upon our marine life, beaches and way of life along the coast of British Columbia, Vancouver Island and the gulf almost being desecrated.

Hon. members are familiar with the findings of Dr. Patrick McTaggart-Cowan who directed the $3 million clean-up required off Nova Scotia after the comparatively minor wreck of the Arrow. I say "comparatively minor" because what is proposed with regard to the giant oil tankers that will travel down the Pacific coast will be four or five times the size of the Arrow. Dr. McTaggart-Cowan said:

> Seven per cent of the world's ships are involved in collisions every year—Incidents involving oil tankers average one per week. Some 300 million gallons of crude are leaked into the seas every year from such incidents.

The people of British Columbia are not easily united; in fact, they are very easily divided. However, the threat of the oil tanker shuttle-service off our shores has united the people as one. They have rallied as one against it. The ecologists, ordinary citizens, city councils, the British Columbia legislature, unions, churches, the old and the young all have one concern and one determination: they will do everything they can to see that no oil is shipped along our coast and that we are spared the inevitable desecration and ruination of our shores.

I remind hon. members that we should not overlook one additional danger in this area. We must keep in mind the pending underground massive nuclear blast by the United States which is scheduled to take place this fall in the northern Pacific. It will take place in a very prone earthquake zone not far from the shores of Alaska where it is planned to build a pipeline from the oil fields to the port for transshipment by tanker. In my view, this is an additional threat to the people on the west coast of Canada and the United States. It is evident that the matter of carrying oil, whether by sea or the alternative route by land through the Prairie corridor, is too important to be left to an industry, municipality, province or state. Indeed, oil and oil pollution, particularly with regard to the movement of vast quantities by water, is a global matter. We need international agreements as well as a clearcut, well-defined Canadian oil policy.

We must stop the threat to British Columbia, research the proposed pipeline corridor through the Prairies and bring under public direction and, in my view, under full public ownership this growing section of the oil industry. But the thought foremost in my mind, speaking as a British Columbian, is to do all we can to stop this plan to move the oil by water along the B.C. coast. It is the duty of the opposition to keep an eye on the government to see that it follows a course which puts people before the profits of industry.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, this whole question of the oil and gas reserves in the Arctic areas, both in Canada and Alaska, and the means by which they can be delivered to the market naturally divides itself into two main lines of consideration. One concerns the ecological dangers which the transportation of oil and gas involves, and the other relates to economic considerations—the cost, the effect on the people of the north and the ultimate benefits to people living on this continent.

In considering these questions there is no place for what might be called narrow nationalism. The only way in which the oil and gas reserves of the Arctic slope can be utilized to the advantage of Canada, the United States and the world as a whole is through close co-operation between Canada and the United States and agreement as to the best and most economic means of getting oil from these far-northern areas to places where they will be urgently needed in the years ahead.

Neither is there a place for what might be called highly-charged emotionalism in connection with ecological damage. The taking out of any natural resource inevitably causes a measure of ecological damage. This act needs to be realized. Some of the people who are completely sold on the idea of preserving the ecology would, it seems to me, prevent the exploitation of any of our natural resources if they had their way. We should avoid this attitude.

One thing which is certain in connection with the large amounts of oil known to exist in the Prudhoe Bay area, and the large amounts which will undoubtedly be found in the Canadian Arctic, is that they will be brought to market. The Americans will transport the oil from Prudhoe Bay for use in the United States and, to a lesser extent, in Canada. We must look at this question, then, from the point of view of deciding how the transfer of this oil and gas can best be done in a way which will cause the least possible damage and result in the greatest economic benefits for the United States and Canada.

It has been pointed out by government speakers and others that if the oil is transported by tanker from Alaska to the Seattle area a large oil spill is inevitable in the course of time. The whole picture of the transfer of oil by tanker shows that accidents occur with predictable regularity. No doubt widespread ecological damage will result to the Pacific coast of Canada and the north. In these circumstances, the only alternative is to take out the oil by pipeline through the Mackenzie valley. Perhaps the Canadian government has been slow in putting pressure upon the United States government to recognize that this is indeed the situation and to arrive at a scheme for bringing the oil through the Mackenzie River valley to the ultimate advantage of both countries.

As the minister has pointed out, the estimated cost of delivering oil to the large United States markets centred on Chicago would be appreciably less if the oil were brought out by pipeline, through the Mackenzie route, than if it were moved by sea. In considering this question I think a clear distinction should be made between oil pipelines and gas pipelines. There is urgent need for supplies of gas at the present time, and within five or ten years the need will probably be desperate. There is no question that a gas pipeline will be built.

The ecological damage likely to result from building a gas pipeline will not be very great; it will consist chiefly of the damage done to areas of permafrost directly involved in the construction and maintenance of the line. An oil pipeline is another matter. Unless a satisfactory means of constructing an oil pipeline over permafrost can be found, a certain number of breakages in the line will probably occur and spills of oil will have to be reckoned with. On the other hand, the damage done would certainly be much less than would be the case in the event of a tanker spill off the Pacific coast.

I do not believe most people realize that the Mackenzie River Valley route does not present nearly as many difficulties with regard to permafrost as does any other overland route, particularly the route from Alaska to Valdez. The tree line in the valley extends very much further north than it does in areas to the east and west. As a matter of fact, I think the permafrost extends only 70 or 80 miles south of Aklavik. From there on one is really out of the heavy permafrost area. The difficulties of building either a gas pipeline or an oil pipeline through the Mackenzie route are therefore very much less than would be involved in the case of any other route.

I agree with previous speakers who have described this subject as one of the most important to come before the House for discussion. But I do not believe we should mix basic considerations with the question of the way in which the pipelines are to be financed. For this reason I deplore the NDP amendment, which, is an expression of Socialist ideology. I do not believe this is a matter in which ideology should be a dominant or determining factor. To the extent that it is, it will merely complicate the issue and make a proper decision on basic questions more difficult to achieve.

I think there is little question that the pipelines will be built by Canadian-incorporated companies who will probably get as much financial support from Canadian citizens as possible, securing the rest of the funds required from sources outside the country. It seems to me that that is the reasonable way to handle the building of the pipelines or their financing. The question of raising taxes or taking money from the Canadian taxpayers to finance transportation of what will be primarily United States-owned oil and gas does not seem to me a very reasonable or sound proposition. I hope the government will take a much more definite stand than they have hitherto in urging upon the United States government the necessity for making a co-operative effort to bring the oil and gas resources of the north down to market, and will drop the more or less stand-offish attitude the government has taken so far.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will abbreviate my remarks since hon. members who have spoken before me, particularly the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), have confirmed in their remarks many of the matters I have been made aware of by the petroleum industry, and repetition would not be of advantage. I want to try to make sure that the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), through whose riding much of the subject matter of today's debate will ultimately flow, has an opportunity to say a few words.

I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) and particularly in his claim for credit for this motion, which I am sure hon. members on both sides of the House appreciate. Had we not had his assurance that he was responsible for it, one might have assumed that the hon. member who moved it, or the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams)—whose inimitable prose comes through in the wording of the motion—had had responsibility for the motion.

I share the confidence of the hon. member for South Western Nova in the ultimate success that will meet the exploration efforts off the east coast of Canada. I am wondering whether he will be able to resolve this matter to the single criterion of ecology, as he is able to when this resource is lying some 4,000 miles away from the territory with which he is most familiar. Perhaps when faced with the reality of the matter, some of the technological, economic and social consideration involved in the business of petroleum exploration and transportation will assume a more important role in his thinking. Of course, rolled up in a ball of wax all these considerations amount to political considerations, and this is one of the facts we must face.

We are talking today of oil that is located in the state of Alaska. We are talking about getting that oil from the state of Alaska to the southern 48 states of the United States—and we are talking about this question in the Parliament of Canada. It seems to me that the state of Alaska will be very concerned about getting that oil to market as well as about the public works required to achieve this result. A pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley is something that we can understand would be very desirable for Canada. Certainly we can argue for this from the ecological point of view; and I think we could probably very sensibly argue for it from the economic point of view as far as the customers at the end of the line in the United States are concerned.

It seems to me to make no sense at all to build a pipeline across Alaska, to transship the oil down the west coast by vessel, transship it to another pipeline in the state of Washington and then through that pipeline across the Rocky Mountains and into the Chicago market. In the long run, the Mackenzie Valley line, in spite of the fact that it will cost some 2½ times that of a trans-Alaska line, simply has to be the logical and sensible way of moving this oil. The state of Alaska will have a great deal to say about this pipeline and will demand the greater share of the works to be constructed. That is a reality of political life. I think the people of Alaska are in a much better position to bring political pressure to bear on the government of that state and on the government of the United States than are all the Canadians in and out of the House of Commons who are concerned with Canada's ecology.

I also suggest the Japanese market is another very important factor to be considered in this whole issue. Japan is a market that depends on the Middle East for 95 to 97 per cent of its petroleum supplies. Anyone who has any knowledge of world petroleum supplies will realize that today's situation is not a particularly enviable one to be in for a growing economy such as Japan's.

Whether the pipeline is built this year or next year, whether the technological problems and the ecological and economical considerations are resolved now or later, I am very firmly convinced that there will be a trans-Alaska pipeline. There will be a trans-Alaska pipeline because of the advantages to the state of Alaska of building the line in Alaska, because of the necessity of building it to serve the Japanese market and because of the necessity for the pipeline as part of a delivery system to the California market. The California market and the Montreal market are two areas in North America that will have to suffer gasoline rationing if supplies of petroleum from outside the North American continent are ever cut off. There is no way, given the continental pipeline system today, to deliver the fuel requirements of California or of the Montreal industrial complex without petroleum from outside sources.

In speaking of a Mackenzie Valley line in terms of oil, we are speaking of an additional line, not an alternative line. Both lines will be built. The Mackenzie Valley line may very well be built first, and I hope it is; but ultimately there will be a TAPS line.

In my submission, the Canadian government had done a very good job in making representations on behalf of the petroleum industry of Canada and Canadian interests in the United States. When the United States government imposed quotas on the importation of petroleum to the United States, the Canadian government kept its cool. It did not succumb to the blandishments of those who suggested that Canada should impose counter quotas, as if to say, "Let's show them". We allowed the political pressure on the United States government in that situation to come from where political pressure counts, and that is from the United States.

That is why I am very firmly of the opinion that in this particular case the government, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in his appeals to the United States public to be conscious of the ecological dangers posed by a trans-Alaska route and the shipping of oil down the west coast, are following precisely the course of action that will lead to results. We know from this morning's Globe and Mail that the United States Secretary of the Interior has already indicated his desire that the Mackenzie Valley route be explored. I suggest that in view of this sign of the effectiveness of our policies and the effectiveness of the pressures put on the United States government from their own constituents, it will not be too long before results will be achieved.

In conclusion, I can only say that we are talking here about United States oil, about United States markets and the problem of getting that oil out of the ground and into the market. It is really a United States problem, one that is within their sovereignty. The United States government will have to respond to real pressure from within the United States. All the pressure brought to bear by the Canadian government can achieve only one result, and that is the weakening of the bargaining position of the Canadian government. If the U.S. government feels that the Canadian government, as a result of public pressure, has its hands bound in some way, then the Americans, good businessmen that they are, will take advantage of that fact. Let us keep the ball in the United States' court, and let us at the same time express our willingness to deal fairly with them, bearing in mind continental, Canadian and the United States interests.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, I agree with the motion of the official opposition blaming the government for its attitude with regard to the construction of a pipeline for the transport of oil from Alaska to the United States.

I would like to make two brief observations, the first of an ecological nature, the other of an economic nature.

Obviously, the first is the most important. Oil production increases by 4 per cent annually, while its transport by sea increases by approximately 60 per cent. At the present time, the production and transport of oil presents particularly great dangers of pollution in the waters of the Arctic, where polar conditions slow down considerably the degradation of oil.

We have seen the destruction that resulted from the wreck of the Arrow in Chedabucto Bay which happened in the temperate zone.

In 1954, 1962 and 1969, Canada was one of the countries signatories to an international convention on sea pollution. The United States have not yet agreed to sign the document.

International maritime law seems to evolve very slowly and does not sanction any measure regarding sea pollution although the maritime pollution treaty Canada signed allows the contracting parties to impose fines to ships causing pollution within 100 miles of shore. The fine can be levied only against ships of countries that have signed the international agreement, and not being one of them the United States are exempt.

Since international maritime law is very slow to change, I would like to quote what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, in spite of the objections raised by the United States about the Canadian legislation extending to 100 miles the control area in the Arctic waters, in order to prevent pollution. The Prime Minister stated the following:

> Canada will not submit that legislation to the Hague court as long as international law has not caught up with technological developments.

Indeed, more than 40 countries have approved that treaty and the Canadian government's attitude has been one of indifference with regard to its southern neighbour when it should have urged it to sign that agreement.

To place the problem in another context, I would say that the United States have already suggested the construction through Alaska of a pipeline to be known as the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System or TAPS. The oil products would then be carried from Alaska to the United States by tankers, which, obviously, would present a serious threat of pollution along the coastline of British Columbia. This threat becomes that more obvious when one considers that the United States have, on several occasions, refused to recognize the Canadian rights of maritime control up to the limits claimed by the Canadian government.

There is a second problem regarding which the Canadian government has shown apathy. Faced by this threat, the Canadian government claimed that it could do nothing more than to suggest the construction of a pipeline through the Canadian North and Northwest, down the Mackenzie Valley.

For too long, Canadian development has been dictated by the profit motive. This is no longer a question of profit or investment, but one of quality of life and means of survival. The environment of central Canada has been spoiled badly enough, through the lethargy of the government, without doing the same thing now in the North.

Until today, the problem was dealt with in such a way as to oppose the interests of the West coast of Canada to those of the North, and the decision was made to give preference to the latter. In so doing, we are guilty of a third mistake, since in giving preference to the interests of one region of Canada rather than to those of the country as a whole, the national interest is being ignored. I shall come back to this later.

And that is not all. It is not only a question of maintaining a balance between different interests, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) would have us believe. We must go further and not be afraid to impose our Canadian viewpoint. We must not resort to force for this purpose, but we must get our feet out of the same boot, and quickly.

If, as it was suggested by the federal government, we offer the United States an alternative to TAPS, it is absolutely necessary that this system and the route should be better. The Mackenzie route is certainly not so, at the moment. No sufficient study has been made up to this day of the permafrost problems and of the risk of the pipeline system heating the ground and thus damaging the pipeline.

In addition, unfortunately, polar conditions would offer many a problem, should oil be spilled.

I agree with the motion of the Progressive-Conservative party to the effect that no development should be undertaken without the problem being scrutinized, which has not been done. We must not always yield to our southern neighbour, even though we are mindful of our own interests. We must solve the problem before taking any action and make sure that our interest will really be protected, because in the North, we might be able to prevent rather than cure. That is why I feel this debate is extremely important.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks here to comply with your wishes that I limit my speech to ten minutes, in order to give my colleagues the opportunity to take part in this debate.

I suggest that under the Canadian Constitution of 1867 the Canadian Parliament has the power to legislate on all coastal and inland fisheries. It can not only make all laws involving marine and aquatic life, but even reassume, as and when it deems advisable, powers in this field which may have been delegated to one or other of the provinces.

Marine and aquatic life includes plants as well as animals. Any kind of aquatic life comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government whose powers in this field are unrestricted.

Mr. Speaker, the present government, vested with such powers, is placed in a critical position by the requirements and the needs of the United States and is now inclined to compromise with that country, but an examination of statements made by the various ministers of the Crown on this matter and a consideration of the underhand positions of the government will tell us that three points are being ignored which I want to bring to your attention.

In the first place, for us Canadians living in 1971, ecology is the art of survival and in this respect nothing, not a single study even, has yet been undertaken. Here, I have a copy of a speech made by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) before the Capilano Liberal Workshop Acadian Gardens in North Vancouver last February 12. In this speech the minister was confessing to the fact that no studies had been undertaken, that everything still had to be done in this field and that could not proceed any further for the time being until we became more knowledgeable on ecology.

The minister himself said that for him and his government ecology was a new science and a word they could not even spell.

The second thing the government will have to do will be to guarantee our economic interests. Instead of conducting thorough economic studies to defend Canadian interests, ministers merely make startling and contradictory statements, which is not likely to reassure Canadians.

I was a member myself of task force on oil last year with a group of American parliamentarians, and we had absolutely no document to defend the interests of the Canadian government, unlike the Americans. They came with documents, helped by researchers and experts. They knew where they were going. As for us, we did not know exactly what to say or what to do, since the Canadian government was sending us there for show, without a serious position and without a thorough study.

This is why, if we rely on appearances, we will be forced to conclude—I speak about those who have studied this matter quite seriously—that, after all, there is nothing.

The government does not seem to take a position about the sovereignty of Canada. According to the British North America Act, it is the sole valid power to protect the environment in Canada. But as it constitutes the only power and claims the exclusive use of this power, it will have to suffer the defeat of its policy, if it is not careful, if it is not really Canadian but simply the puppet of the Americans.

For this reason, I support without reservation the motion of the Progressive Conservative party because it allows us to discuss a very important problem, namely, pollution.

Mr. Speaker, if the Canadian government does not make a real and extremely thorough ecological study, if it keeps on with its noisy and conflicting statements—whenever it sends its members on a visit to our southern neighbour—if moreover, it forgets it is the supreme authority in such a field and that the Canadian people are ready to invest large amounts of money for the preservation of their environment, if, for the sake of petty interests it forgets Canadian sovereignty and fails to convince the United States to adhere, along with 40 other signatory countries, to an agreement that has existed for more than 17 years, I seriously wonder what influence the government believes it has now to safeguard Canadian interests in the problem that concerns us at the present time.

It is still time today, more than ever, to do something because the situation is extremely urgent.

[English]

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I believe this debate has been most useful and productive. I believe the Canadian public now understand better what this business of a pipeline in the north is all about. Northern people have been aware of the possibilities of pipelines through their country for some time. Naturally, like other people they have questions and concerns and wonder what it will do in respect of their lives, the environment and the area in which they live. The majority of the people whom I try to represent to the best of my ability are the Indian and Eskimo people of the Northwest Territories. These people are aware of what is happening as a result of oil and gas exploration in the Mackenzie Valley and in the high Arctic Islands. They have a number of apprehensions in respect of how their lives will be affected.

At the very outset I believe it might be useful to read into the record a letter sent to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) by the people of Fort Good Hope which is an Indian community in the Arctic circle on the Mackenzie River consisting of 400 or 500 people, most of whom are hunters and trappers. This letter was sent to the minister by the Fort Good Hope Settlement Council, which is composed primarily of Indians and Métis. It is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and states:

> In view of the apparent increasing opposition by the people in the N.W.T. to oil exploration, gas and oil pipeline construction etc., we the Fort Good Hope Settlement Council on behalf of the people here wish to give you our support in this area of northern development.
> Our people realize that exploration does, in some ways disturb the environment and cause problems, but we strongly feel that progress must be encouraged and not discouraged, as it seems a minority group are trying to do. The people who say that the N.W.T. natives are united in their attempts to halt the pipeline are wrong. We feel that the pipeline when construction starts, will give us nothing but benefit, and at that, less benefit than these settlements who are right on the proposed route of the pipeline.
> If it were not at this time possible for our men to work on experimental pipeline, seismic or drilling crews, there would be no employment at all in our area, our men on these jobs are being well paid and treated very well by their employers. Rey Geophysical and the experimental gas pipeline run by Williams Bros. have been exceptional in hiring from here.
> We also feel that if the government and the oil companies when moving into the area first of all have a discussion with the people of that area and explain their purpose for being there, and most important to the people, hire some of them to work on the project. If this is done there should be no opposition to oil work in the north, and certainly not for the Fort Good Hope area. It is when a company move in and start work in the area without us knowing who they are, or what they are doing, and without hiring our men that we have resentment against them, early discussion will save later problems.
> Sincerely,
> Fort Good Hope Settlement Council

Mr. Speaker, in the few moments I have available to me I want to stress to the government and the oil industry that it is important that the people in the north benefit from the construction of oil and gas pipelines. I think up until this point the government and the companies have been aware of the importance of involving the northern people in this program. As has been outlined by the two ministers today, we have seen the attempts by the government to communicate with the native people in respect of the plans for and effect of oil and gas exploration and oil and gas pipelines. I should like to think that the northern people generally want pipelines, but under proper conditions. They want part of the action. They want to be involved. We want to see these people involved not only in the construction phase but in the operational phase. Already as a result of the test programs conducted by a number of the groups interested in building these lines and operating them, certain programs are under way. I say to these companies and to the government: It is a good start, but it is only a start.

If we look at how much of our land we will use in the construction, we will find that statistics show that less than 40 square miles of the Northwest Territories would be used for the construction of a gas and oil pipeline. However, this line will move through various parts of our country, from permafrost through muskeg, along eskers and into the boreal forest area where pipelining should not present any particular or unusual difficulties. However, the Arctic areas concern us. We have heard again today of the work that has been done in Inuvik by the Mackenzie Valley pipeline group to investigate the effects of pipelines on the tender Arctic ecology.

I am one of those fortunate people in this House who has had an opportunity to observe this pipeline experiment. As I understand it, this experiment is designed to test oil pipelining under all possible conditions. It is in the second winter of its operation and, as the ministers have indicated, hopefully results will be forthcoming on the effect on permafrost before the end of this year.

There is a third area which I think must be considered. Some discussion has taken place today with regard to the route. Regardless of whether we end up with an oil pipeline in the Mackenzie before or after the TAPS line is built, as was so well put by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) I am convinced that there will be a gas pipeline. This gas line will run from Prudhoe Bay, along the Arctic coast, possibly make a detour through the Yukon and the Old Crow Flats and then go up the Mackenzie River.

There is a problem of which I know the government is aware, but I think it has to be brought out—that is with respect to the route of the first part of the line.

There are two alternatives. One is that the pipeline goes down the Arctic coast from Prudhoe, turns the corner at Richardson Mountains over the Mackenzie River and then continues on up the Mackenzie Valley. The second alternative is to avoid the Arctic coast, because of a wildlife reserve which is in Alaska, and cut across the Porcupine Valley into the Old Crow Flats. I would be concerned about this direction because it would have a very great effect on the Old Crow Indian people in the Yukon territory. They are completely self-sufficient today as hunters and trappers. Unless we are absolutely satisfied that this route will have no effect on their future habitat, I think the only alternative is to make an adjustment so far as the Alaska wildlife reserve is concerned.

To a northerner and to a Canadian these pipelines can set the tone of prosperity in Canada in the 1970s. We hear these astronomical figures of $5 billion, $6 billion or $7 billion for the construction. When you take into account the amount of pipe, the use of transportation and the volume of employment during the construction phase, you see what this will do for our Canadian economy. I believe that at this stage the Canadian government holds all the cards that they need to ensure that Canada get a fair deal from whatever develops as the result of the construction of one line or both.

I know that the feeling is that we want to have as much Canadian participation as possible, not only in the financing of the pipeline but in its construction, the use of materials, supplies and the employment of men. So I would like to think that these problems can shortly be resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned, to the satisfaction of the people who require the oil and gas, to the satisfaction of the people whose lives will be affected by whatever route is taken and to the satisfaction of the Canadian people generally. We must ensure that Canadians get the full benefit from a development of this magnitude.

In conclusion I want to speak again about our native people in northern Canada and reiterate what I said earlier, that no effort is too great on the part of industry and government working in unison to ensure that our people understand what is happening to them, understand the meaning of these massive machines that will be cutting across their land, understand that this will not necessarily change their way of life and that they can continue in their old ways and still have new and developing functions taking place around them without interfering with their normal ways. We must ensure that when this project moves on there is complete and total involvement in the job so far as our northern people are concerned. The ministers have already indicated their determination to see that this is carried out and I am convinced that we can accept what they have said, because the results are already starting to show.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): There is not much time left, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to speak briefly on this rather important motion which is before the House. Most of all I would like to address myself to the amendment which was moved by our party. The amendment was that we add to the motion the following words:

—with a view to developing under public ownership a transport system for oil and gas which will best serve the long term interest of the Canadian economy.

A number of those who have spoken in the debate have indicated that they feel the type of amendment offered by our group does not seem to fit into this picture very well. I could not disagree more with the government members, the official opposition or those who are opposed to the Canadian pipeline. If it comes from the north and is a common carrier, it should be publicly-owned. We should control this common carrier which will bring the great wealth of northern Canada to this part of the world. What is wrong with that? Here we have a clearcut issue of Canadian ownership and we challenge the government and members of the House on this issue.

Mr. Greene: Would you raise taxes to pay for it?

Mr. Harding: If we are to have a pipeline bringing not only U.S. gas and oil to Canada and to the U.S. but a common carrier that I hope will be bringing vast amounts of Canadian gas and oil from the north, then this is a stand which we must take—and we must take it this year. The government must be prepared to see that we have the pipeline Canadian-owned and controlled.

• (4:50 p.m.)

We will not drop this issue, Mr. Speaker. If we must have a pipeline down the Mackenzie—and there will be some sacrifice involved so far as our ecology is concerned—it is the people of Canada who should benefit. We must put our reserves into this project. Even if it costs $2 billion or $3 billion to construct, within 20 years that would be paid off in the dividends it would yield to the people of this nation. This is something we cannot afford to overlook at this stage. That is the first point with which I wanted to deal.

I am opposed to a tanker route down the west coast of British Columbia. I realize we cannot stop the Americans from taking oil from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez and shipping it down the coast; and we must not forget that even if the oil were not transported in that manner, oil would sill reach the Cherry Point refinery. That refinery is already being built. The tragedy of it all is that it will be almost as dangerous to ship oil from California to the refinery as to ship oil from Alaska to it. However, the difference is that there would be 50 billion barrels less oil going down the west coast.

I endorse the position taken by several hon. members in the debate, that we have not done enough research on pipeline routes and that the government must be prepared to undertake immediate extensive research on all such routes. We must be assured of the best possible route for Canadian interests. Just a few years ago one of the most important debates that ever took place in this House concerned the Columbia River treaty. What happened in the case of the Columbia? We went to the bargaining table with the Americans thinking we had all kinds of cards in our hands. We thought we obtained a top-notch deal from the Americans. Now, looking at the effect of the treaty on Canada, we see it was one of the biggest "rides" we were taken for in our lifetime. We sold the whole of the water of an important riverway to the Americans for next to nothing.

Now we are going to the bargaining table with the Americans again—and we have even fewer cards in our hand and less information than we had with respect to the Columbia River. Whose fault is that? It is the fault of those sitting opposite. For some 15 years we have been pushing economic development in the north, but only within the last two years have we become concerned about the effect of industrial development on the ecology of the north. After 15 years we still do not have land use regulations for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Ministers tell us what the government is doing. Mr. Speaker, who are they trying to bluff? They have kidded the Canadian nation long enough. Let us sit down and face the facts. We do not have enough information on all the problems we will encounter in the north.

Someone mentioned the Old Crow Flats region, where the natives are self-sufficient. If we stop the caribou migration into that area we will create a disaster for the inhabitants. I am told that the average individual in the Old Crow area can use up to 25 caribou per year, and in the rest of the region individuals can use about five caribou per year. Some 150,000 caribou take part in the migration. If pipeline construction halts the movement of caribou, all the people of the region will be adversely affected.

We have not had sufficient time to collect all the necessary information. This is why I urge the government to redouble its research efforts. The departments must be integrated far more than even before. If necessary, we must get information from other nations on the effect of pipelines and roads on migrating animals. If we do not, we may have another ecological disaster such as that being caused in the Mackenzie River delta by the construction of the Peace River dam.

There are many other points I wished to raise, Mr. Speaker, but I think we have had a good debate. We have aired our views. At least this debate has been a start. I trust that in the coming weeks and months hon. members will have other opportunities to discuss in detail some of the plans and projections put forward by the ministers who took part in the debate this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 58 (11) the proceedings on this motion have expired.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order to make an announcement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was informed a few minutes ago that arrangements are being discussed with regard to a visit to Ottawa within two weeks of the presidents of seven of the Alaskan north slope major producers who are to meet the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) and myself as a point of contact between the government and the industry, as established in the guidelines issued in August, 1970, by the government. We hope that this meeting will be held within two weeks, perhaps on the 22nd of the month.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, before we conclude may I ask the government whip or the House Leader what the order of business will be on Monday?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, the order will be as stated by the President of the Privy Council on Thursday and recorded at page 4168 of Hansard. I believe the first item will be the packaging and labelling measure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. This House stands adjourned until Monday, March 15, 1971, at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2 (1). The Chair has listened to many hon. members this week expressing strong determination to maintain our political and economic freedoms. I am tempted to suggest that we should enshrine these feelings in a formal pledge to Canada, to be recited at the opening of our daily sittings. I hope all hon. members enjoy their weekend.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DINSDALE—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING BILINGUALISM IN PUBLIC SERVICE—OPPORTUNITY TO QUESTION PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege affecting all members of the House of Commons. Last Friday the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) questioned the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) concerning plans to assure that there would be no discrimination against public servants in the government's implementation of the program for bilingualism in the Public Service. This question arose from the recent statement by the President of the Treasury Board when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and the case of Mr. Demicher who was arbitrarily released from his position with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In reply, the President of the Treasury Board invited the right hon. member to appear before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for an answer.

I raise this question, Mr. Speaker, because last Thursday I attended the meeting of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates to discuss the implications of the government's statement with reference to promotion opportunities as they affect long service public servants, senior public servants and public servants living in unilingual areas of the country such as western Canada. The question was raised in committee of my right to pursue this line of questioning at length inasmuch as I was not a member of that committee. Furthermore, when the committee abruptly adjourned at 11 a.m. I was in the midst of my questioning and was informed that because of his many other responsibilities the minister would not be returning to the committee.

My question of privilege is the following, Mr. Speaker: Parliamentary committees are an extension of the committee on ways and means of the whole House. Prior to the downgrading of the rights and privileges of private members under the rule changes, when the examination of estimates was removed from the House, it was the responsibility of the minister to appear before Parliament to defend his estimates. Only ministers of the Crown can deal with policy matters, and it is a fundamental denial of the principle of responsibility when Members of Parliament are confronted in committee more and more by officials rather than by the responsible minister.

I therefore move:

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to ensure that the traditional rights of members of the House of Commons in connection with the granting of supply be restored.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member appreciates that the motion can be put only if there is a ruling from the Chair when there is established a prima facie case of privilege. He also knows that when there is a prima facie case of privilege the traditional practice is that the matters which have been raised by way of a question of privilege are referred not to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, as suggested by the hon. member, but rather to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, the committee that normally looks at matters of that kind.

The hon. member has raised by way of a question of privilege the fact that a minister was not in attendance in a committee of the House to answer questions which the hon. member wanted to submit to him. The hon. member suggested that the difficulty he has encountered is the result of the changes in the rules of the House of Commons. I respectfully suggest to him that this is hardly a matter which can be raised by way of a question of privilege.

The hon. member may feel aggrieved in the sense that he did not have an opportunity to obtain the information he was seeking, but I would then think that the matter becomes a question of substance, and the only way in which a debate may be initiated in the House is by way of a substantive motion. In fact, the motion suggested by the hon. member is essentially a substantive motion and in the circumstances it should not be raised as a question of privilege. I must rule that there being no prima facie case of privilege the motion cannot be put at this time.

Questions

DIVORCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE PERIOD OF SEPARATION OF SPOUSES AS GROUND FOR PETITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my hon. friend from Greenwood and at his request, may I ask leave to introduce this bill and move its first reading?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to introduce the bill on behalf of the hon. member for Greenwood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) for Mr. Brewin, moved for leave to introduce Bill C-230, to amend the Divorce Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at present the Divorce Act accepts as a ground for petitioning for divorce a submission that there has been a permanent breakdown of the marriage by reason of the fact that the spouses have lived apart for not less than three years. The purpose of this bill in the name of my hon. friend from Greenwood is to reduce that period from three years to one year as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING IN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 782—Mr. McCleave:

1. Has the Public Service Alliance proposed to the government that amendments be made to the Public Service Staff Relations Act which would permit collective bargaining in the Armed Forces and, if so, with what response?

2. Has any other group appearing to speak for organized labour made such a proposal and, if so, who and with what result?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. No.

2. No.

NEW TORONTO AIRPORT

Question No. 799—Mr. Haidasz:

Will the new airport for the Toronto and neighbouring areas contain facilities for handling (a) jumbo aircraft (b) supersonic aircraft?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): A decision has not been made as yet with regard to the site or potential role of a new airport to serve the Toronto-centred region. At this point in time, a system of airports is envisaged within which Malton would have an important on-going role. Facilities will be available within this airport system to accommodate jumbo type aircraft. These facilities would also be capable of handling supersonic aircraft if these aircraft should come into airline service.

CLASSIFICATION OF UNIFORMED CUSTOMS OFFICERS AT INTERNATIONAL PORTS OF ENTRY

Question No. 835—Mr. Mather:

Are uniformed Customs Officers at international ports of entry classified as clerical by Treasury Board and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, because the duties they perform have been identified as falling within the definition and inclusions of the clerical and regulatory group of the administrative support category. The particular inclusion in this instance covers positions in which the following is of primary importance:

"The application of regulations derived from statutes in accordance with established instructions and guidelines in order to determine eligibility for benefit or privileges, or liability for the payment of taxes or duties."

CNR—REPAINTING BOX CARS TO ILLUSTRATE CONTENTS

Question No. 847—Mr. Mather:

What, in dollars, was the cost in 1970 of repainting CNR box cars in line with the "new idea" to illustrate their contents?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Only four freight cars were involved in this promotional experiment and the cars selected were those requiring repainting. The work was carried out in the company's Point St. Charles Shop during the regular shopping program. The cost per car was approximately $500.

AIRCRAFT LANDING CHARGES

Question No. 848—Mr. Reid:

1. With reference to the answer to Question Number 728, in Hansard at page 2800, January 26, 1970, has the Department of Transport increased its charges for aircraft landing at DOT airports in Canada within the past three years and, if so, on what date and by how much, each time, in the form of terminal charges based on the number of seats in an aircraft?

2. On aircraft of the following type, DC-9, DC-8 and Boeing 737, what has been the effective increase in landing fees as a result of this new terminal charge in both percentages and in revenue for each type?

3. Does this new landing fee apply (a) to the number of passengers carried (b) to the number of seats in the aircraft (c) to the weight of the aircraft?

4. What has been the increase in revenue from this increased landing fee at Ottawa Airport, Winnipeg Airport and Vancouver Airport?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1 and 3. The general terminal charge is applicable at six airports, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver International Airports. The general terminal charge formula was revised on July 1, 1968. Prior to July 1, 1968 the formula comprised a scale of fixed fees. The fixed fees represented only one-half of the rate which had been indicated in an economic study made in 1960 when the general terminal charge was first implemented. With the advent of new types of aircraft and aircraft models the fixed fee formula became impracticable. Therefore on July 1, 1968 the formula was revised based on units of five seats assessed on the seating capacity of the aircraft, and thereby the full rate indicated by the economic study, referred to previously became applicable. The revised general terminal charge is $1 per unit of five seats on a domestic flight and $2 per unit of five seats on a non domestic flight.

2. The effective increase for the aircraft specified is as follows:

(a) Domestic Flights Type of Aircraft	Charge Prior to July 1, 1968	Charge Effective July 1, 1968	Increase $	Increase %
(I) DC9—Standard	8.50	13.00	4.50	53
(II) DC9—Stretched	8.50	18.00	9.50	112
(III) DC8—Standard	12.50	28.00	15.50	124
(IV) DC8—Stretched	12.50	40.00	27.50	220
(V) Boeing 737	8.50	18.00	9.50	112
(b) Non Domestic Flights Type of Aircraft	Charge Prior to July 1, 1968	Charge Effective July 1, 1968	Increase $	Increase %
(I) DC9—Standard	17.50	26.00	8.50	48
(II) DC9—Stretched	17.50	36.00	18.50	105
(III) DC8—Standard	25.00	56.00	31.00	124
(IV) DC8—Stretched	25.00	80.00	55.00	220
(V) Boeing 737	17.50	36.00	18.50	106

4. The statistical details are not available to calculate the additional revenue due to increased rates separately from the additional revenue due to increased traffic. The over-all increases in general terminal charge revenue are shown for the three year period April 1, 1967 to March 31, 1970 for two of the three specified airports. The general terminal charge does not apply at the Ottawa International Airport. (a) Vancouver International Airport: The general terminal charge was introduced following the completion of the new terminal building on September 10, 1968. 1968/69, $308,206; 1969/70, $768,892. (b) Winnipeg International Airport: 1967/68, $131,656; 1968/69, $272,732; 1969/70, $377,958.

CENSORSHIP OF BOOKS IMPORTED INTO CANADA

Question No. 853—Mr. Hales:

1. Who is responsible for censorship of books imported to Canada?

2. What procedures are employed in deciding whether or not a book or publication should be prohibited entry into Canada?

3. Who is involved in this decision-making?

4. What guidelines are used?

5. Is a list of unacceptable material maintained by the government, based on past rulings?

6. What is the approximate amount of money spent annually on this censorship activity?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): 1. The Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, has the responsibility for classification of books falling within the provisions of Tariff Item 99201-1.

2. The examining officer at the port of entry may permit entry or, if he is of the view the goods might reasonably be considered treasonable, seditious, immoral or indecent, they are forwarded to headquarters where they are examined. Should this view be confirmed and if they are deemed to fall within the Tariff Item, they are not permitted entry (under authority of Section 12 of the Customs Tariff). The examining officer then advises the importer of the decision, including his right of appeal to the Deputy Minister (under Subsection 4 of Section 43) for a reclassification of the goods. Should the appeal be denied, the importer can take a further appeal to the judge of the country or district court as provided by Section 46A of the Customs Act.

3. The first classification is made by the port officer and at headquarters the review is made by persons classified as senior executive officers. In the event of an appeal, see reply to Question 2.

4. A primary consideration is the wording of the Tariff Item itself. This is supplemented by internal guidelines which are based on the sense of community standards as reflected in court decisions made under the Customs Tariff Act and related sections of the Criminal Code.

5. The ordinary filing system is maintained for all items forwarded and reviewed at headquarters. No separate list of material prohibited under the Tariff Item is maintained.

6. This information is not available in departmental records as costs relating to the examination of specific goods are not isolated in field operations.

INFORMATION ON APPLICATIONS FOR EXPORT PERMITS

Question No. 862—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What persons are entitled to receive information on applications for exports permits?

2. Is access to such information restricted and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Only those persons in the Public Service whose responsibility it is to assist in rendering a decision on applications for export permits are entitled to receive information on such applications for export permits.

2. Yes. The information required from an applicant for an export permit reveals the nature of the exporter's private business transactions. The Government has an obligation to maintain the confidentiality of this information so as to avoid injury to the commercial interest of the exporter.

QUEBEC—EMPLOYMENT OF ENGLISH SPEAKING PROVINCIAL AND CIVIC EMPLOYEES

Question No. 906—Mr. Mather:

In the expenditure of federal funds to promote bilingual communication in Canada, has the federal government sought and is it receiving co-operation from the Province of Quebec in providing an increased number of English speaking public service employees at the provincial and civic levels of government?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): There is no program designed specifically to help provinces in their recruitment of employees of either language. However, as part of a comprehensive approach to the development of bilingualism in Canada, the Federal Government proposes to help provinces which wish to expand their bilingualism programs. In answer to requests from provincial governments, financial and technical assistance would be available for language training programs for civil servants, as well as for the training of the required language teachers; a program would also be set up for the training of provincial translators.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): (a) Nil. (b) About 70 percent of the $25,000,000 item, Treasury Board Vote 5(a), Government Contingencies in Supplementary Estimates (A) was to cover the costs of student summer employment in many departments during the summer of 1970. 2. Have any feasibility studies for such a project been made by engineers of the Department of Public Works or by any consultants on behalf of the Department of Public Works and, if so, what are the recommendations of such studies?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The Economic feasibility of building a bridge over the Mackenzie River near Fort Providence, N.W.T. is presently under review. Further information and analysis is required.

2. An engineering consulting firm was retained in 1958 by the Department of Public Works on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to do a feasibility study of building a bridge across the Mackenzie River near Fort Providence. 1972 UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON THE ENVIRONMENT

Question No. 982—Mrs. MacInnis:

What Canadian scientists, other than those working in government departments, are actively engaged in preparing material for Canada's participation in the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Environment to be held in Stockholm?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Countries participating in the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment (Stockholm, 1972) which is at the intergovernmental level, will submit material to the Conference in the form of National Reports outlining their principal environmental problems and the action being taken to deal with them. Scientists have not been asked individually for contributions to the National Report. Instead these have been sought through a group of non-governmental organizations chosen as offering a cross section of Canadian public opinion on this subject.

It is a joint program between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Entry to the program is voluntary during the last five years before retirement. Under the provisions of "The Adult Occupational Training Act" servicemen whose military skills and experience do not qualify them for satisfactory entry into the civilian labour force are provided with suitable occupational training. It is possible for the retiring serviceman to complete all arrangements during his final year of service so that his date of release coincides with the starting date of the chosen course. The responsibility for entering this type of training rests with the individual but the encouragement of the Civilian Employment Assistance Program is always available.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DEVELOPMENT OF PROGRAM PRODUCTION CAPABILITIES

Question No. 603—Mr. Nowlan:

1. What positive and concrete steps have been taken by CBC in each of the past five years to develop the program production capabilities of each of the regions other than Toronto and Montreal?

2. What percentage of Canadian produced programs shown on CBC English language television were produced in Toronto and Montreal, in each of the past five years?

3. What percentage of Canadian produced programs shown on CBC French language television were produced in Montreal, Toronto and in Quebec City, in each of the past five years?

Return tabled.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I have had a question on the order paper since early January. I have asked about it before. It does not take very much research to get the answer. I am wondering when answers to some of the questions of urgent importance to members of the opposition can be given.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, we are doing everything we can. During the month of February and most of March questions have been coming in at the rate of more than ten a day. Last Friday one hon. member put 32 questions on the order paper. It takes quite a number of people and a lot of work to keep up with the volume of questions coming in but, as I say, we are doing our best and we will follow up this question as well.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I have one question only on the order paper this year and I cannot understand why I should be condemned because another member has put 30 questions on the order paper. Most of my question has been answered to the press. There is only one part of the question with regard to which the press did not have the information the day after. I do not see that it takes any research to give a yes or no answer.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I have a request I should like to lay before the House. My question No. 1020 has not been on the order paper for any length of time but the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has indicated that he plans to introduce legislation in regard to the subject matter of my question. As a matter of fact, the minister tabled in the House today a document pertaining to my question. Would the minister take note of the question and at least answer it at the time he introduces the legislation?

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

MANPOWER

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, subject to your decision, I propose to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. The matter concerns the recognized unemployment crisis facing the students who will be coming out of our universities, colleges and high schools during the months of April, May and June. It is urgent that this matter be debated at once by the House in order to assist the government in establishing appropriate emergency measures to meet the problem.

If you agree, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is proper to be discussed, I shall ask leave of the House to move that this House do adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request leave of the House to propose a motion under the terms of Standing Order 26 in order to discuss the question of unemployment facing students who will be coming out of our high schools, colleges and universities in the months of April, May and June. As the Chair stated on March 3 last when the hon. member for Oxford put forward a proposal somewhat similar to the one he now advances, the question of employment for students coming into the labour market has been before the House in various forms on several occasions in the current session. It may be said that unemployment in its many forms has been debated at length and voted upon in the present session.

On March 3 the Chair referred particularly to a supply motion proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière and the amendments proposed thereto by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville which in substance dealt with the proposal put forward on March 3 and again today in the motion by the hon. member for Oxford. On that occasion the Chair also referred to the proceedings during the recent budget debate. It seems to me that the only additional element raised in the proposal by the hon. member for Oxford lies in his suggestion of the inadequacy of the present situation. I am not too sure that this is a sufficient basis for the Chair to grant the motion.

I indicated to the hon. member and to the House when the motion was made on March 3 that the circumstances might be such later that the Chair would be inclined to grant the motion of the hon. member if it dealt specifically with student employment during the summer months. It seems to me that the proposition of the hon. member is somewhat larger in its terms in that it is concerned with the employment of all students coming into the labour market in the months of April, May and June. I am not suggesting that if the motion had been in more limited terms it would automatically or necessarily have been granted, but I do recognize that this is a matter of considerable urgency and the day may come when this kind of a motion should be granted.

I think hon. members would want me to take into account the undertaking by a minister on behalf of the government that a statement would be made at an early date. The hon. member may feel that the statement is not forthcoming soon enough, and perhaps the Chair might reach a point where it will agree with the hon. member for Oxford.

I suggest that at least for the time being the motion is perhaps somewhat premature. I apologize for making this suggestion to the hon. member, but again I am dealing strictly with student employment during the summer months, but I would think that in the circumstances I should not put the motion at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED INCONSISTENCY OF GOVERNMENT ACTIONS RESPECTING DENISON MINES AND HOME OIL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. Will he tell the House why it is that, after advising the president of Denison Mines that he would be prohibited from selling the control of his company to United States interests in order to keep that company from falling into United States hands, the government is now willing to discuss with Home Oil Company the possible purchase by the government of a controlling interest in that company to keep it from falling into United States hands? Can he explain the reason for the apparent inconsistency in these two approaches toward solving essentially the same problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has some reservation about the question of the hon. member. Obviously the hon. member is asking a question which essentially is the basis of a possible debate. At the same time, the question is important and perhaps the Prime Minister or the minister responsible should be allowed to reply briefly, overlooking the argumentative aspect of the question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, they were two ad hoc decisions. I do not see anything inconsistent in those two decisions. In the case of uranium the federal government had jurisdiction under the constitution to intervene directly. In the other case it did not have that authority, and the government adopted two different approaches to two different problems.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not agree that it would be highly advisable for the governmet to work out a uniform approach to this problem instead of adopting ad hoc solutions which are often contradictory? If it is the opinion of the government that this is desirable, when may we expect such a policy to be announced and put into operation?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course it would be desirable to have a general policy announced, and we have told the House we will bring it forward as soon as possible. But even under a general policy there will have to be specific decisions made in respect of different cases. I think the House will have to accept that we will not deal with all cases in the same way.

Mr. Hees: As it is of vital importance to all Canadians that they know where the dividing line is as between companies which it is essential to keep in Canadian hands and companies which it is perfectly satisfactory to allow to fall into foreign hands, will the government announce its policy in the very near future so that Canadian industry will know where it stands in this important regard?

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the member is repeating the same question in another form. He is suggesting we have a general policy, and I have answered that. There are elements of a general policy which exist now. The country knows that in some areas such as banking and financial institutions and mass communications institutions there is a policy which applies there. It is our intention to announce in what other areas the policy will eventually apply.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—PETITIONS REQUESTING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO DISALLOW LAW RESPECTING REDISTRIBUTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that on January 11 a group of Saskatchewan citizens petitioned His Excellency the Governor in Council asking that a Saskatchewan law with respect to redistribution in that province be disallowed and in view of the fact that this petition was acknowledged three days later, can the Prime Minister say whether the government has given consideration to this request and whether an announcement about it will be made soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has not given consideration to it. I imagine the matter has been referred to the relevant department, probably the Department of Justice, but there has been no recommendation made to the government yet. I would say as a matter of general policy that we do not like to proceed by way of disallowance of provincial laws. However, I have just said and I repeat that we have not considered this special case in cabinet yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether there is anything he can say on this matter? I addressed the original question to the Prime Minister because the acknowledgement was sent from the Clerk of the Privy Council.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be recommending against any action by the federal government to disallow the legislation.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the decision has not yet been taken on this matter, would the Prime Minister and the government also take into consideration a petition which I shall forward to the Prime Minister signed by 221 residents of the Wynyard district in Saskatchewan asking for the same action on the part of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: If the member will forward the petition to me I will of course study it, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF FIXED EXCHANGE RATE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR TO ASSIST PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that the buoyancy of the Canadian dollar which is nearly at par with the U.S. currency will force Canadian pulp and paper producers to raise their prices by $8 per ton effective April 1, is the government considering a new fixed rate of exchange?

Mr. Speaker: It seems the hon. member has put the same question repeatedly in the course of these last few days. If the minister thinks he can add anything today, he might reply to the hon. member for Abitibi.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I previously said.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

POLLUTION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CONTAMINATION OF BEACHES BY OIL FROM SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of Transport or the parliamentary secretary. It concerns the recent discovery of oil globules on the north shore of Prince Edward Island, doubtless from the sunken Irving Whale. Considering the assurances given last fall that no oil had reached Prince Edward Island beaches, can the minister advise whether his department will look into this serious matter immediately and take whatever precautionary steps are necessary to protect Prince Edward Island beaches and marine life from this putrid and unwelcome pollution? Are there no ecologists over there, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: While the matter is being considered on the government side, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Malpeque.

SCIENCE SERVICES

ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY OF STATE OR DEPARTMENT TO DIRECT AND CORRELATE GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to set up a ministry of state or a department of government under some other name to direct and correlate the science activities of the government in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we did indicate in the Speech from the Throne that it would be our intention to set up such a ministry of state. Of course we are waiting on the pleasure of the House to pass the government organization bill before we will be in a position to do so.

Mr. MacLean: Is it correct to assume then that it is not the intention of the government to introduce special legislation to set up such a department, that it will be done under the government organization bill, if it is done?

Mr. Trudeau: That is right, Mr. Speaker. At this time we see no need for special legislation if we can have the consent of the House to pass the government organization bill which has been before the House for some time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIONS IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. It has to do with suggestions in the press to the effect that consideration is being given to permitting the establishment of unions in the armed forces. To do so would create a most anomalous situation. The men in the armed forces would be subject to direction as to when they should or should not act, depending whether satisfied with their salary levels. Can the minister give the House and the country the assurance that the formation of unions in the armed forces will not be condoned or permitted?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I would imagine that if and when such an eventuality became reality it would be the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board as well as to express the government's policy on this matter in the future since it would not under any circumstances come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the minister whether he or his departmental officials have been giving any study to this unusual suggestion?

Mr. Mackasey: I know it is unusual for armed forces to be unionized, with the exception of Sweden where they are organized, but I have not been giving any study to this possibility at all.

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the questions asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and I direct it to the Prime Minister. Has he yet replied to Mr. C. A. Edwards, president of the Public Service Alliance, with respect to his request that the full rights of collective bargaining be extended to the Canadian Armed Forces? If so, could he indicate the nature of his reply? Was it negative or positive?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have had some correspondence with Mr. Edwards indicating in a general way that the whole law of collective bargaining as regards the Public Service is being reviewed by the government, and that we will be looking at various aspects which have already been brought to our attention by Mr. Edwards and his association.

HEALTH

BIRTH CONTROL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRAM TO PREVENT UNWANTED PREGNANCIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of information today that the number of schoolgirl pregnancies in Metropolitan Toronto far exceeds those for the entire country of Sweden, when will the minister make his promised statement on his program for birth control in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would advise the hon. member that I have not studied the particular figures for Toronto—perhaps the hon. member might consult her deputy leader in that regard—but I have already issued a statement concerning the department's program on family planning. We have indicated the areas where we are conducting research. We have also indicated that we are prepared to back those national organizations wishing to get under way a communications policy in this area. We have also indicated that there are cost-sharing possibilities under the Canada Assistance Plan. I do not know what further information the hon. member would like.

Mrs. MacInnis: A few days ago the minister promised he would make a statement to the House. It is that statement I am inquiring about. When will he make it?

Mr. Munro: I will check my undertaking in that regard, if I did so undertake.

GRAIN

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—INCLUSION OF LIFT PROGRAM PAYMENTS IN FARM CASH RECEIPTS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is also in charge of the Wheat Board with regard to his statement tabled today. Will he clarify an obvious question with regard to the eligibility of farm cash receipts? Would payments under Operation Lift be included as eligible cash receipts in determining the amount paid out to each producer?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while I did indicate by tabling in the House today some further details about the government's position in regard to the proposed legislation, it will be most fruitful if technical details are examined at the time the legislation is before the House.

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—PURPOSE OF TRANSITIONAL PAYMENT—MAKING UP OF POOL DEFICITS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Without going into a lot of details which might reveal the weakness of the plan, may I ask the minister whether the provision for the special payment of $100 million to Canadian Wheat Board permitholders in 1970-71 as a transitional payment will follow a removal from liability of the federal government for storage of wheat on farms, which last year amounted to more than $50 million? Also, will it be conditional on removing the present practice at the end of each crop year whereby, if there is a loss in the wheat pool, the government makes it up, which last year amounted to more than $50 million. Is this simply a pre-election declaration?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am glad that the right hon. gentleman recognizes that it is a good plan and therefore he thinks it may have something to do with us being favoured by the Prairie region. As the statement indicates, if the right hon. gentleman would read it in full, the total proposal is that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is terminated and the transitional payment for the current crop year is proposed to be made in recognition of that termination also for the current crop year. However, the statement also clearly indicates that contrary to the proposal originally made in October it is now proposed that any payments which may be necessary to make up a deficit in a pool for one of the grains will not be recovered out of future pools.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without going into detail, the fact remains that you will take $50 million or much more from the farmers in the manner as set out by the minister and at the same time say to them, "we will make you a gratuitous payment". Does this mean that the election is just around the corner?

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—PERCENTAGE OF SUPPORT—POSITION OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has reduced the support aspect of the program from 100 per cent of the total cash receipts as originally proposed to 90 per cent of the total cash receipts, or about halfway between his original proposal and the task force suggestion of 80 per cent, has he received the support of the farm organizations for this move and his 2 per cent deduction?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We have had very full discussions with farm organizations, but the hon. member is misreading the plan. There will be 100 per cent stabilization on 90 per cent of the grain, excluding only a certain portion of grain in the hands of the largest farmers. Farm organizations have tended to support this approach to the use of federal money.

Mr. Gleave: I have to admit that our position is rather difficult since the minister did not choose to rise to his feet and explain this plan to the House. However, I would still like to elicit some information from him. Can he tell us when the $100 million payment to which he has referred will be made? He has said something about its basis. Can he tell us when this payment will be made during the current crop year?

Mr. Lang: It is anticipated that it will be made as soon as administratively possibly after passage of the legislation, which I hope will come fairly quickly.

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—EXPENDITURES COMPARED WITH SAVINGS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of the government's proposal to withdraw the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and to cease picking up losses in pools, can the minister advise the House if he has added up the savings to the government and contrasted that figure with what the proposed expenditures will be? Can he tell the House whether there will be a net expenditure by the government on this program or a net saving?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this year's expenditures without a doubt will be very remarkably increased over what it would have been without these proposals. In addition, if the total program as announced in October, with the variations indicated today, had been in effect for the period of years that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act has been in operation, the total assistance to farmers would have been greater than it was under existing programs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of hon. members rising to ask supplementaries. I will recognize the hon. member for Mackenzie, then the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, and after that the very patient hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Can the minister say whether or not the $100 million he suggests here is related to anything in particular or is it just an arbitrary figure?

Mr. Lang: The amount originally was related to some estimates and calculations in regard to the payments which would have been made if the stabilization program had been in effect for this year. However, there might have emerged some difficulties in arriving at exact calculations for this year if that basis had been retained, so instead we propose to put an exact figure into the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: My question is not supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN AID TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES—INCREASED USE OF MILK PRODUCTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs a question of which I have given him notice. Canadian assistance to underdeveloped countries, through the United Nations, reached $35 million last year. This assistance was made up of a certain quantity of agricultural products. Would it be possible to know whether dairy products were included, since there is a very large quantity of such products in Canada and, if so, would it be possible for next year to increase this proportion of dairy products?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I am thus able to tell him that, from the very implementation of the United Nations' world food program, Canada has committed itself to contribute $50 million. Dairy products, and particularly cheese and powdered skimmed milk, have cost $13.5 million, which stands for a little more than 28 per cent of the entire Canadian contribution. Over the next years, Canada will certainly keep on providing with dairy products countries which will ask for them.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Considering the largesse which marks every utterance of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will the Prime Minister give consideration to sending that hon. gentleman on an extended speaking tour of Atlantic Canada?

FISHERIES

PREVENTION OF FISHING BY FOREIGN SHIPS WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT—PROTEST BY FRANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in view of the importance of this question I direct it to the Prime Minister. Has Canada received a protest, official or otherwise, from the government of France in regard to our declaration of a 12-mile limit off the south and west coasts of Newfoundland and, if so, can the Prime Minister assure the House that French fishing trawlers will not be given rights that are denied to Canadian trawlers in these waters?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, I would like to say in reply to the question of the hon. member that Canada has received no official protest.

However, I would like to remind the hon. member that there has existed for a very long time a treaty with France concerning the right of French fishermen in a section of the territory concerned and that a three-month notice had to be served to French authorities. When the three-month period has expired, French trawlers will have to abide by the same rules as other trawlers.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: In view of the answer by the parliamentary secretary, may I ask what protest the Minister of Fisheries was referring to in reply to my question on Friday, as recorded at page 4210 of Hansard, when he said the government had received a protest from the government of France and he did not have time to finish the answer because of the Chair?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the minister will soon be in the House and he could probably answer the hon. member's question himself.

SUGGESTED OFFER TO FRANCE TO BUY ISLANDS OF ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON TO REMOVE PROBLEMS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is the government considering making an offer to purchase the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon from France to help clear up our fisheries problems? At the same time, would the government offer to set off the $10 million owing for Canada's NATO infrastructure which was lost because of our withdrawal from Marville and Metz?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge that the islands may be for sale, but I will inquire and if they are we will make an offer.

DRUGS

PROGRAM TO COMBAT ABUSE—REQUEST THAT DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS OUTLINE DETAILS TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would he take the course, before it may be urged on him, to arrange to have officials of his department make a thorough, detailed presentation to the committee studying his estimates with respect to the program, including pamphlets and the like, which his department is conducting about drug abuse?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be pleased to take that matter into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister also consider the possibility of arranging for an analysis of this program by those who have gone through the drug world and know what it is all about?

NATIONAL MUSEUMS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State as the minister responsible to Parliament for the National Museums of Canada. On December 7, 1970, in reply to a question of mine, the minister stated that an inquiry was being conducted into the administration of the museums branch. Would the minister say whether that inquiry has been completed, and has he received a report of the findings of that inquiry?

CANADIAN GRAIN COMMISSION

QUALIFICATIONS OF NEW CHIEF COMMISSIONER—CORRESPONDENCE WITH FORMER CHIEF

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Is Mr. Delmer Pound, recently appointed Chief Commissionner of the Canadian Grain Commission, a past president of the Medicine Hat Liberal Association, and is this the main criterion which determined the change in chairmanship?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts about the way the question is put. I am sure the hon. member appreciates that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, because the Canadian Grain Commission is a very important agency in respect of the well-being of the grain trade in western Canada, perhaps I can put the question in such a way that the minister can assure hon. members that the best qualified man has received the appointment. In his search for a replacement for Mr. Hamilton, who was fired by the minister, did the minister consider the wider experience of Manitoba's representative on the Canadian Grain Commission, Mr. Lyn Shuttleworth, both as a farmer and as a Liberal politician?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was just going to suggest that might be a new question rather than a supplementary. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the main purpose of the Canadian Grain Commission is to police the grain trade and in view of the vital importance of the commission to the producers as well as to the industry as a whole, will the Minister of Agriculture, as he promised the other day, table the correspondence between himself and Mr. Hamilton, the ex-chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, so that members of the House of Commons can determine whether or not this action was in the interests of the minister politically or those of the industry as a whole?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I advised the right hon. member for Prince Albert that I would table the reply to a letter from Mr. Hamilton if Mr. Hamilton agreed that it ought to be tabled in the House. In so far as the other part of the question is concerned, I invite hon. members opposite to examine the qualifications of all the members of the Canadian Grain Commission. They will find that they are eminently qualified to do that job.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not think that it would be simpler to admit that this was a straight case of Liberal patronage?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Make it simple. We all know what it is.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NORTH BATTLEFORD—INCLUSION IN INCENTIVES PROGRAM—GRANT TO EXPAND RAPESEED CRUSHING FACILITIES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of a statement by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that a $3 million expansion in rapeseed crushing facilities will depend on a federal incentive grant, will the minister extend the regional incentives program to the community of North Battleford so that this city may bid for this plant?

INDUSTRY

YAMASKA SHIRT COMPANY—ACTION TO AVOID CLOSURE AND LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will address my question to the Prime Minister.

In view of a telegram addressed last week to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce by the President of Yamaska Shirt, announcing possible closing down of their Saint-Hyacinthe plant, is any immediate action being considered to prevent discharge of 200 employees as a result of such closing down?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have received no communication from the minister in this regard, Mr. Speaker. However, I am sure this matter will receive the same consideration he gives all others brought to his attention.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF PRINCE OF WALES AS NEXT GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY AND EMPLOYEES—PROVISION OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour related to the work stoppage at Flin Flon, Manitoba, which is approaching two months. I understand that a mediator has been appointed to visit the area and discuss the matter with both parties. Can the minister say whether either or both parties have indicated that they will accept the mediator and co-operate in this regard?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The suggestion that a federal mediator be sent to the area was accepted readily by both sides, and I believe the mediator will hold his initial meeting on March 22.

YOUTH

EMPLOYMENT OF STUDENTS IN ANTI-POLLUTION CAMPAIGN

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. In view of the statement by the Acting Prime Minister on March 3 that the government plans to mobilize students for a pollution clean-up campaign, can the minister now say whether the details of this plan have been worked out?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe there will be a statement tomorrow about the whole program, including this aspect.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the over-all high level of unemployment in Canada, can the minister indicate whether the government is now planning for student-oriented jobs so that students will not be in direct competition with regular workers for these positions?

OIL

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF PIPELINE FROM WESTERN TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the tax just imposed by Venezuela on crude oil, and of the fact that Canadian imports of crude oil from this country amount to more than 60 per cent of our imports, especially in the eastern part of Quebec and of Canada, is the Canadian government considering listening more closely to those who call for the construction of a pipeline to move oil from the Canadian West to eastern Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister already had the chance to comment on this matter, but the hon. member is aware that oil from western Canada sells at a much higher price than oil from Venezuela, and it is not sure that the people of Quebec would benefit.

HEALTH

PRESENCE OF CANCER CAUSING SUBSTANCE, DEMETHYL-NITROSAMINE, IN FOOD

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last Thursday, in his absence from the House, I asked the Acting Prime Minister to bring my question to his attention so that he might make a statement on motions in the House. I asked whether, in view of the recent revelation that the cancer causing substance, demethyl-nitrosamine, has been found in food products, the Acting Prime Minister would convey to the Minister of National Health and Welfare the great concern of the public over this matter. I also suggested to him that the minister might make a statement on Monday. This is a matter of great concern. A tremendous number of people are anxious about this problem. They do not know what is happening. I think the government owes it to the House to say what the present situation is with regard to this material.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to make a statement on this matter this week. I have it ready and I will endeavour to make it.

EXTENT OF PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will restrictions on the advertising of tobacco apply only to the electronic media such as radio and television?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government's position in this whole area will be made known very shortly, including this aspect of it.

AGRICULTURE

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—SUGGESTED CHANGES TO MEET REQUESTS OF WESTERN CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Recently changes were made in the proposed new Unemployment Insurance Act to meet the requests of the province of Quebec. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to allow the agricultural bill, C-176, to be changed so as to meet the requests of western Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what requests the hon. member has in mind. If they are reasonable requests and not only those of the hon. member, I am sure we will consider them in detail.

Mr. Horner: In his campaign speech on June 2, 1968, the Prime Minister enunciated agricultural policy in Winnipeg. Since that time all western Canada has sincerely requested that hogs and cattle be deleted from the bill. I would hope that the Prime Minister, having initiated this program, would take into consideration the very strong regional requests in this regard.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST JULES DEMICHER—NATURE OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the department's fair employment practices section inquiring into the dismissal of Mr. Demicher from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce? If so, is the fact that government employees are not covered by the provisions of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act hindering the fullest inquiry, conciliation and settlement of the claim of unfair treatment by Mr. Demicher?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a complaint has been lodged under the fair employment practices provisions by an individual. It is not the practice to name that person because we are interested primarily in seeing that justice is done and I do not think it would be consistent with that policy to name everybody who complains. There definitely is co-operation on the part of the Public Service and all my colleagues, as has been obvious for almost ten months. Even though the fair employment practices provisions do not normally apply to the Public Service, when and if complaints are lodged the criteria included in the fair employment practices Act are accepted voluntarily by the Public Service. In this instance a meeting has been scheduled for Wednesday to discuss ways and means of handling this delicate situation with a representative of the allegedly aggrieved person and a representative of the Public Service Commission.

GRAIN

OUTLOOK FOR SALES IN CURRENT CROP YEAR

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the report put out by the Department of Agriculture regarding the outlook for grain sales in which it is indicated that only about 400 million bushels of wheat will be sold in the current crop year, is the minister as confident as he was six months ago that some 700 million bushels of grain will be sold in the current crop year, of which 500 million will be wheat?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will research the basis of the earlier statement he will see that it was indicated the range of wheat sales might be in the order of 400 million to 550 million bushels. That still seems to be a reasonable assumption. At this moment, total grain exports are running well enough ahead of last year's level that the 700 million bushel target can still be attained. It is still a distinct possibility.

Mr. Korchinski: Is the agreement between Canada and the Soviet Union still in existence or is this a lost cause? Is Russia likely to pick up the grain it is supposed to pick up?

Mr. Lang: The agreement, of course, is still in existence. Not very long ago Russia placed an order for flour under that agreement which continues the rate of flour exports at a very high level.

BARLEY—EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE ON DELIVERIES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I have a supplementary question with regard to grain sales for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister inform the House whether the additional 10 cents per bushel for barley is bringing in the required amount of barley or are we still turning down sales requests?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The flow of barley is stepping up. We hope it will continue to increase. There is space available in some provinces where there are also significant barley quotas available. We are therefore urging the farmers to deliver the grain because the Wheat Board would like to see the flow of barley established before it makes additional sales.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): In view of the apparent urgency to move barley to the west coast to have it in export position, and in view of the fact there are a large number of producers with large amounts of barley on hand and no delivery dates, can the minister state whether consideration is being given to providing a special delivery quota for that barley?

Mr. Lang: Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, the assigned acre base will remain the basis for delivery eligibility. There are cases where the producer has a legitimate explanation for not having included any barley in his assignment of acres. The Wheat Board takes those cases under consideration in a special way.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has already expired. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock who has been attempting to ask a question for 40 minutes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Having in mind the major earthquake shock in the Pacific waters north of Vancouver Island this past weekend and also the major earthquake a few weeks ago in Los Angeles, will the government make clear to the United States Canada's concern over the pending underground nuclear test in the north Pacific, an earthquake prone zone?

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the government's refusal to remove the 3 per cent surtax on incomes which, as we all know, was originally proposed for one year and extended with no justification whatsoever, is further evidence of the government's determination to continue to try to combat unemployment by the public works method, which will not work, instead of by the only practical and effective method. I refer to a reduction of income taxes, thereby putting more money in the pockets of the Canadian people which will enable them to spend more on the things they need. This, in turn, will stimulate sales and result in increased production and increased jobs.

The government's plan to fight unemployment by the public works method will not work for two reasons. First, the capital outlay required to create a single job is too costly for the Canadian taxpayer to bear if a sufficient number of jobs is to be created. Second, when the public works in question have been completed, the people employed on them will again be unemployed. We will be right back where we started.

I rise at this time to plead with the government to reconsider their policies and to realize that the only effective way to fight unemployment, the number one problem facing the country today, is to create conditions within the economy which will stimulate sales, increase production and jobs. The way to do that is to lower income taxes.

Even at this late date the government should cancel the three per cent surtax on incomes which, as I said previously, was originally proposed for one year and extended without justification. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) introduces his budget later this spring, he could follow that constructive suggestion by introducing a six per cent reduction in personal income tax. In this way, sales would be generated through people having more money to spend. This would result in increased production and increased jobs. The government has a great opportunity to solve this number one problem facing the country today in a constructive, simple and straight-forward manner. I strongly urge the government, even at this late date, to take this opportunity to show its intention to fight unemployment in the only effective way, by reducing income taxes.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-225 received extensive consideration at the second reading stage as well as in committee of the whole. I think the performance of the government has been very disappointing. We have not received the explanations and comments to which the House is entitled when considering a bill as important as this one. This bill provides for two changes in income tax legislation. The first is the provision of more generous tax allowances for business and industry.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) presented his budget on December 3 last, he proposed part of his plan to stimulate economic growth and create more jobs. We have not seen one iota of evidence from the government that this proposal, when enacted, will produce that result. In spite of questions asked and cogent observations made from a number of quarters, the government has not yet come forward with any evidence to suggest that their dream will become a reality.

On two occasions I drew to the attention of the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary an article which appeared in the December 12 edition of the Financial Post. The article pointed out that the response of industry and business to this proposal was very cool and that it really was not going to affect their plans. The articles also suggested that this provision would not stimulate more economic growth or greater economic activity. In fact, it pointed out that the only beneficiaries of this proposal would be those industries and businesses which, prior to December 3 last, had already decided to undertake an expansion program during the lifetime of this proposal namely from December 3, 1970 to March 31, 1972. By the time most industries are able to take advantage of the provisions of this section, the time will have run out. In fact, most industries which might wish to take advantage of this clause would not be able to do so on the basis of information as it has been made known to us. I asked the government whether it had any further information to suggest that this was not the case. No answer was forthcoming from the Treasury benches. On this basis, I think the bill is a fanning in the dark, an attempt to find solutions to problems with which the government has been unable to cope.

Similarly, in the case of the 3 per cent surtax, there has been a very chameleon-like approach on the part of the government. Two years ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) made it clear that the surtax was being extended not because the government needed the revenue but for the purpose of economic stabilization, to restrain the economy. When the proposal was first introduced in the House in 1968, the prime minister of the day also made it clear that the measure was being put forward for the purpose of economic restraint. Now, the Minister of Finance tells us in his budget statement that he has put forward this proposal to extend the surtax in 1971 because the government needs the cash. He seems able to find a reason to suit every occasion, and the people who suffer are the Canadian people.

In my view this proposal will not produce one new job for the 668,000 who were out of work in January or for the 750,000 who, as statistics will probably show, are out of employment this month. It will not contribute one iota to the alleviation of the serious economic difficulties which face the country at the present time. The government has such a record of abject failure in its economic policies that I feel it will be found wanting by the Canadian people when the time comes. I wish to make it clear that we certainly oppose this bill on third reading, as we did at the other stages when it was under consideration.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am really amazed to find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) persists in wanting the House to pass Bill C-225 in spite of the sound remarks made by members of the opposition and although this tax that had been levied temporarily should have been definitely removed. Yet, the government is still getting the taxpayers' money and still calling it a temporary tax, but it will become permanent automatically if it is renewed every year.

Members of the Opposition are not the only ones to oppose this 3 per cent tax; some well informed businessmen and politicians across the country have also made representations to the government and stated that this tax which will bring in $245 million will be a direct cause of increased unemployment. Notwithstanding the budget speech made by the Minister of Finance last December 3, one can note that his forecasts did not prove true. This is what he said on that occasion:

> Of prime importance is the fact that employment is rising in Canada and unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis appears to be falling. This underlying improvement is suggested in the statistics for September and October after allowing for normal seasonal patterns. There may yet be month-to-month fluctuations from the trend.

From month to month, the unemployment rate has been increasing and the number of jobs has been falling. Later, the minister said, and I quote:

> There is no question, however, that the rate of growth of employment must improve and that unemployment must be reduced if the economy is best to serve our overriding objective of the highest sustainable improvement in the standard of living of all Canadians.

[Mr. Burton.]

Last year, the same government, asked us to pass an act to extend that 3 per cent tax pretexting the fight against inflation. The Minister of Finance said, on December 3, and I quote:

> Both inflation of prices and high unemployment are our enemies—

I agree with what he said, but not with the means used to fight against those two enemies.

At the end of 1970, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the fight against inflation was over, that the monster had been brought to heel and that now we must come to grips with the problems of poverty and unemployment.

These are the direct consequences of too heavy taxes. They contribute to discourage businessmen, to increase the rate of unemployment, because of the direct effect on the consumer who cannot enjoy an adequate purchasing power to ensure the subsistence of his wife and children, to provide for his needs. When millions are misappropriated, the turnover of industries decreases, because they sell smaller quantities of products, and automatically, repeat orders become rarer, culminating in the lay-off of employees.

That situation is getting worse all the time. That is why during the fall of 1970, the premier of Alberta accused the federal government of hindering the development of the economy of his province. The relevant report follows:

> Mr. Strom points out that unemployment which has reached its highest level in 25 years, keeps on increasing in an alarming way.
> The federal government's haphazard and undiscriminated fiight against inflation did not place the retired people or others in better circumstances. The only thing it did was to drive hundreds of thousands of Canadians on the verge of catastrophe.

Considering the statistics on bankruptcies, which increase more and more, I believe the premier of Alberta was perfectly right when he said the direct consequences of that policy was catastrophe for a great number of Canadian businessmen.

I come back to the quotation:

> He said that Ottawa should create new employment opportunities, encourage businessmen and establish a general climate which would stimulate expansion.
>
> For the government, to look after economic development is to designate poor areas, developed areas and rich areas, and then inject money into the first, forget the second and penalize the rich areas.
> The penalty against the rich areas consist in postponing allowances granted for capital expenses.

After examining the results of such a policy as regards the individual, Mr. Strom is reported as having said:

> Mr. Strom declares that his government does not approve the federal policy on regional assistance, since it is based on statistics and not on real individual poverty.
> Individuals suffer from poverty or unemployment, not areas.

Certainly the individuals are the more deeply and bitterly affected. It is enough to get in touch with the people in charge of all the welfare centres in the country to find out how numerous are those who apply to those centres.

This weekend, as I was meeting in my office some of my constituents, nine individuals out of ten came to ask their representative to help them solve difficulties created by the new welfare legislation in Quebec under which inquiries and visits are being multiplied. Indeed, after having compared figures, it is obvious that the purchasing power of families in need is in no way increased. Instead, after one or two months, they get a letter informing them that their benefits henceforth will be reduced by 10, 15 or 20 per cent.

If you go and visit these families and take the trouble to check the situation, you can see that the time has not come for the government to ask the taxpayers for more money through taxes such as the 3 per cent tax. It should instead let the people keep this 3 per cent and use it as purchasing power, which would increase employment opportunities.

I believe that we are working against the grain and it is high time that the necessary measures be taken to correct a situation lending itself to correction for, otherwise, complete anarchy might prevail. We sometimes hear peace-loving people utter things that would never have been heard 10 years ago and make our hair stand on end.

We, the members of the Canadian Parliament, ought to take such hardship seriously. I am quite displeased when I see usually responsible people paying so little attention to those problems and considering the needy as somewhat limited people who have to put up with their fate.

Mr. Speaker, the Fifth Review of the Economic Council of Canada in 1968 outlined that the number of needy people was increasing and I am sure that a new report to the government on the subject in 1971 would stress that the situation has deteriorated. Still, Canada has not been so poorly endowed. I have here a statement that appeared in the newspaper Le Soleil on January 16, 1971 and according to which:

Canada ranks third in per capita gross national product.

This means that despite the work performed by men and machines in greater numbers, our gross national product places Canada third in the world for national output.

Now, what is the purpose of national production? Is it only a matter of displaying goods in store windows, of advertising them in newspapers as it is regularly done in the Wednesday issue of La Presse which has something like 40 pages of all sorts of advertisements paid by the larger Montreal stores which are asking their customers to avail themselves of whatever special sales or discounts they are offering?

Countless efforts are made to attract consumers. The time has come to give our country whatever facilities others are enjoying in the way of providing the taxpayers with public services without fleecing them.

During the weekend, I was talking to the mayor of a large municipality in the vicinity of Quebec City. He expressed dejection in the face of the requirement to increase property taxes to meet outstanding or future liabilities while they extend to foreign countries advantages that are not available in Canada.

We learned this morning that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) had just signed an agreement with three African nations to grant a $14 million interest free loan repayable over 50 years and earmarked to acquire locomotives.

I am not asking for a miracle but simply that the government—if they deem it useful to make 50 year interest free loans to foreign countries—should consider the adequacy of extending such loans to municipal governments in Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec. I suggest the government makes an experiment. They could do it in my constituency, I would not mind it at all. If the Minister of Finance were to extend a $15 million loan to the town of Montmagny and to the municipalities of Saint-Damien and Sainte-Germaine—these are all developing municipalites—I am quite certain that the whole region would experience some progress. Why? Because public bodies will be in a position to undertake works without having to strangle the taxpayers. This is why I object to Bill C-225; I did so on second reading and I do it again on third reading, because I feel that it is my duty to say to the government that it is liable to aggravate conditions instead of improving them.

If we really wanted to act for the common good and in the interests of all Canadians, we would take other steps to obtain the necessary funds for the administration of public business.

I think that it is time to pay more attention to what is going on throughout the world, in our country and more especially in our province. I was present yesterday afternoon at the establishment of a local section of the Quebec Junior Board of Trade and was pleasantly surprised to see young people of 20 to 35 years of age who work with, sustained interest, absolute confidence in Canada, in the province of Quebec, deplore the fact they are unable to find the instruments required for the development of natural resources which would allow them to do business and succeed through their work.

I encouraged them to do their utmost to convince the authorities to do something while there is still time. I explained to them how to protest, not through revolutionary means with sticks or dynamite, but in a sensible manner by getting seriously interested and informing their members of Parliament and their governments of their findings.

That is how I understand the function of intermediary bodies, as well as that of the people's representatives in this House towards such bodies, because without the co-operation of the intermediary bodies and the public, the government will not be able to make it, as no government can work miracles.

It is for this reason that, whenever possible, the people must be informed and the people must be made to believe in the goodwill of Parliament. The people must be listened to and their suggestions must be taken into account so that they will know that, if something must be done, it will be done with their help, and in this way everyone will benefit.

In conclusion, if the rules allow it, I shall move an amendment to the bill on third reading, as a logical conclusion to my argument. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), the following amendment:

That the main motion be amended by striking out the word "now" and replacing it with the words "in six months from this day" at the end of the question.

[English]

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the measure before us provides for the continuance of the surtax which I think all of us must agree adds only to the repressive burden of taxation in Canada. This is the thing that is throttling business in Canada today. I do not think there is much doubt in the mind of anyone in this House that this country has gone too far down the road of socialism. Let me read from a publication which came to my office today containing the text of an address by J. Allyn Taylor, Chairman and President of Canada Trust-Huron and Erie, to the annual general meeting of shareholders. He referred to some figures to compare the percentage of the gross national product of various countries which goes towards the upkeep of government. He states:

They show where we stand in comparison with the other major countries bordering on the Pacific, with whom we must compete for more than 50 per cent of the world's trade. Thirty-five per cent of our gross national product now goes to the upkeep of government in Canada. In New Zealand, a country that we have long considered as being highly socialistic, the figure is 31 per cent. In the United States, it is 28 per cent including the costs of Vietnam. It is 21 per cent in Australia and 16 per cent in Japan. This is concrete evidence, I suggest, that we are well along the road to becoming a socialistic state.

Socialism is based on the premise that the government takes all and distributes to each according to his need. Mr. Taylor goes on later in his address to say:

There is abundant evidence of the increasing dominance of the federal public sector over all our lives. With it has come corresponding reduction in the influence of junior levels of government and the private sector. Witness the fact that the Federal Government has grown in the last decade at over twice the annual rate of the economy as a whole. It has become so massive, so unwieldy and so all-embracing that its inefficiencies and its extravagances become harder and harder to combat, no matter how well intended government officials may be.

One of Parkinson's laws says "From size comes complexity, and from complexity, decay". This characteristic of size threatens every institution known to man and government is surely no exception.

We must recognize that it is almost impossible to reverse this trend and, with the technological advances we have today, it will be impossible to attain anything approaching, full employment in the future. In this context I refer to meaningful employment, because it is a fact of life that probably one third of the people in Canada whom we consider to be employed today are not really meaningfully employed. We know there is a great deal of feather-bedding in industry, and that there are many people in industry whose jobs could easily be performed by machines. We must recognize that full employment would only be possible if we were to revert to the situation which existed 100 years ago. We would have to set aside the technological advances we have made and revert to a manual labour. It is time all parties that believe the free enterprise system is a way of life considered the plans initiated by Kelso and some of his colleagues. I have in mind second income plans.

It is very evident to any thinking person that two factors in production are paramount, one being manpower and the other being capital. We should recognize that an individual has the right to pursue his own goal. It is up to all of us to work toward devising plans which would put capital for production back into the hands of the workers. I suggest this is not impossible. It is the only alternative we, as Canadians, have if we are going to combat complete state control in the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PROHIBITIONS, LABELS STANDARDIZATION, INSPECTION, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I move:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by deleting clause 3 at page 2 thereof and substituting therefor:

"Application of Act

3. (1) The provisions of this act that by the terms of this act or the regulations are applicable to any product apply as long and as far only as they are not repugnant to or inconsistent with or do not impinge upon the provisions of any other act of the Parliament of Canada.

(2) This act does not apply where a product is neither the subject or importation into Canada nor of trade or commerce from one province into another."

I wish to say a few words about this particular amendment, Mr. Speaker and, since this is the report stage, I wish to make a few general remarks about the bill. This bill relates to the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products and was introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). An examination of this measure would lead one to assume that it would warm the cockles of the consumers' hearts, thus making it possible for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to indicate he had done a great deal from them.

However, if we look at the history of this bill, we see that first reading was on November 2. It was introduced into the House for second reading on December 16 and now, on March 15, we are at the report stage. In the intervening time, hon. members saw the famous letter from the chairman of the committee which denied all interested people any opportunity to present their petitions. This caused a real uproar. I do not know whether the chairman of the committee had been told to do that or did it inadvertently. After a few days of reconsideration, the minister changed his mind and all the consumers' organizations, business people and trade organizations were allowed to present their petitions to the committee. The committee had some very good hearings.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

This particular piece of legislation follows the same pattern as other legislation presented in this House. It was introduced with a great deal of fanfare. However, what do we find? We find that the bill has been greatly amended in committee. We also remember a news story a few days ago in which it was reported that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had petulantly indicated to a group of young people that the opposition were holding up legislation. We find that 90 per cent of the time when a bill reaches the report stage and third reading it bears little similarity to the original bill presented to this House. If it were not for the opposition discussing, questioning and in a great many cases advising this government, this country would have a great deal of very poor legislation. I am afraid this situation will continue until the government gets better draftsmen. It is extremely important for the opposition to thoroughly scan every piece of legislation introduced into this House.

We remember the great fanfare with which the minister introduced this bill. He quoted from the Bible, quoted poetic stanzas and referred to historical events to substantiate the necessity for this bill. I was reminded of the passage in the Bible which relates how our Master went into the temple with a whip and drove out the moneychangers and gamblers. There has been a lot of discussion about an election being held one of these days. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will use this election as a whip. He will go to the supermarkets and business establishments saying "Look what I did for the consumers of this country." This is not so. This bill will not do all that for the consumers.

I sometimes wonder about the effectiveness of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The other day in Committee the minister was asked why he was not able to take action under the Combines Investigation Act against the banks of Canada which raised their service charges almost 300 per cent. When the minister was asked whether the fact that all banks acted at the same time indicated there was a combine he replied that the Combines Investigation Act does not have anything to do with services. If there is any place the Combines Investigation Act should apply, it is with regard to public services of this kind. It is not just the cost of packaged products that is increasing the cost of living. The cost of the services that people require is adding greatly to the cost of living, yet we have not seen any legislation in this regard.

If the Combines Investigation Act is inadequate, it should be amended so that banks cannot get together to do this kind of thing. The fact that one of the heads of the Bank of Canada had something to do with a big dinner in Toronto a few days ago may have something to do with this lack of action against the banks. We do not know. The Combines Investigation Act should have some effect on this kind of practice. We wonder about the importance of this legislation. In introducing this measure in committee, the minister said:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. In his opening remarks, the hon. member indicated he wanted to make some general comments at the report stage. I have been hoping that the hon. member would relate his remarks to the amendment which he proposed to the House. While I may not be correct, I think the Standing Order requires that at the report stage hon. members confine their remarks to the amendment before the House and not range quite as wide as the hon. member is doing.

Mr. Howe: If Your Honour looks at the amendment, you will see that it mentions various acts, thus opening a great many areas of discussion. I wish to refer to the minister's opening remarks in committee in which he mentioned the necessity for this bill. He said:

> The great bulk of those engaged in packaging and labelling are endeavouring to provide accurate and full information, but unfortunately the record of our inspectors, the records of Box 999, the records of prosecutions, will indicate of course that there is that small minority of people who do engage in misleading and deceptive packaging and we need more effective laws to deal with it.

Does this statement mean that the bill only applies to the small packager and small handler? What about the big fellow? Will he be given the same treatment as the others? This possibility becomes a bit disturbing, Mr. Speaker. As I say, this is the important thing about this legislation.

Many of the people who appeared before the committee questioned the necessity for this piece of legislation. They said there is already a lot of legislation that looks into their affairs and is supposed to guide and direct them. According to the Committee report, the representative of the Fisheries Council of Canada, when speaking about this bill, said:

> It will result in additional government expense, divided ministerial authority and additional costs to the consumer.

The feed producers and cosmetic people did not want to have any part of this bill; so many people suggested amendments to the bill that it would have borne little similarity to the original bill.

Getting to my amendment, the annual report of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has this to say about the activities of the food division of the department:

> Through continuous contacts with field officers, a uniform policy concerning the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations was maintained. Thirty-two food programs were developed on behalf of the operations branch. These concerned the legislative requirements of the Food and Drugs, Canada Agriculture Products, Canada Dairy Products and Fisheries Acts and regulations. A food program involves explicit instructions for surveillance, purchase, test, permitted content, seizure, and possible prosecution.

This bears out what I have been saying, Mr. Speaker. Why this extra legislation when all these measures are already in operation? This is what the report has to say about labelling:

> During the year, 4,475 food labels were reviewed, 1,896 of which required changes for conformity; 260 trade marks were considered for possible use on food labels; 2,131 advertisements were studied, and 29 found unacceptable; 15,056 radio and television commercials were approved, nine per cent of which required changes.

This supports my contention that there is already abundant legislation concerning the activities of the firms engaged in the processing of food and of agricultural products generally. The minister could indeed achieve something in this bill if he were able to tell us he had devised a package into which hazardous products could safely be packed for sale. On this point, the departmental report merely states that investigations will continue in the new year. I find myself asking why action was not taken earlier, why something was not done a year and a half ago. Fifty thousand children were poisoned last year as a result of gaining access to hazardous drugs and substances of various kinds, yet so far we have failed to discover a container of the type which a child is unable to open. It is time we did something about it. I was happy to read an announcement in the paper this morning to the effect that the provincial government of Ontario is taking action to discourage packaging in throw away bottles. We feel this legislation will merely bring about a further proliferation of laws and regulations to an extent which will prove confusing to industry and costly to the consumer by reason of increased taxation to pay for inspection as well as the extra cost of labelling and packaging.

The first purpose of my amendment is achieved by the new subclause (1). The present subclause (1) would give the bill a jurisdiction or applicability concurrent with all the other acts of this Parliament that regulate products, with two exceptions. The first exception is the statutory exemption in subclause (2), that is, a product that is a device or drug under the Food and Drugs Act. The second exemption is a discretionary exemption by regulation. In the result, a product could be regulated both under this act and another act. Evidence in committee was that there are about 20 of these acts on the statute books at the present time. In the minister's discretion, he could recommend regulations to the Governor in Council which would minimize conflict. In a matter so important as the trade and commerce of Canada—a matter which is of the utmost importance to the person who is engaged in trade and commerce and to the person who, as consumer and taxpayer, must eventually pay in one way or another for the costs involved in over regulation—the avoidance of confusion and conflict should not be left to the discretion of a minister.

This subclause fails to cut out a clearly defined area within which the bill would give exclusive jurisdiction without trespassing into other regulation-making jurisdictions. This faulty drafting is due to either of two reasons: the reluctance of the legal draftsmen to search the statutes so they might exclude products controlled under other laws as they have done with the Food and Drugs Act, or the intransigence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his colleagues, who control products under other statutes, when confronted with the need to reach agreement on sharing or surrendering authority.

The proposed subclause (1) would amend this defective drafting and the resultant potentiality for confusing and inconsistent regulations, by adapting a section of the BNA Act. Section 95 of the BNA Act gives a concurrent jurisdiction to federal and provincial governments over the fields of agriculture and immigration. However, where both federal and province make laws in either field, the provincial law has effect only to the extent it is not repugnant to the federal law. That principle is applied here in the amendment. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has full jurisdiction but where another branch of government has a particular power under another act of this Parliament and exercises that power, then any conflicting regulation under this act is void for repugnancy.

The proposed amendment to subclause (1) does away with the necessity for subclause (2). Instead, a new subclause (2) is proposed. The amendment does not alter the applicability of Bill C-180. It is merely declaratory of the law, that is, that the bill does not apply to a product which is solely and exclusively the subject of trade and commerce within a province. It makes clear that the bill does not apply to a product which is neither the subject of importation into Canada nor of trade and commerce between provinces. The definition of "product" in clause 2 (j) defines product as follows:

(j) "product" means any article that is or may be the subject of trade or commerce, but does not include land or any interest therein;

This definition can be read to mean that the federal government unilaterally proposes to extend the meaning of its constitutional power under section 91(2) of the BNA Act, "The regulation of trade and commerce" into the provincial fields of "Property and civil rights in the province" and "Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province" under section 92(13) and (16) of the BNA Act. Alternatively, the definition can be read to mean that the federal government proposes to apply a subjective test to a product, that is, the determination by the federal government that a product "may be the subject of trade and commerce" regardless of the objective fact that the product is not the subject of trade and commerce interprovincially or extra-provincially.

The constitution of Canada as it applies to the division of powers between the federal government and the provinces should not be rewritten, or appear to be rewritten, in a federal statute. This Parliament should not agree to write any statute so as to deceive the citizen whom it purports to bind as to its legal limits and to mislead him as to his rights under the constitution of Canada. This bill would make the Canadian citizen subject his person and submit his goods to government inspectors in a variety of ways. He should not be tricked into doing so by stealth and subterfuge where no right in the federal government exists. He should not be deluded that he has no right to refuse where the bill does not and cannot constitutionally apply, and that he has no right to resist through the courts.

This bill may be compared to the Fish Inspection Act, Chapter 118 of the revised statutes. Section 3 of that act provides:

3. The Governor in Council may for the purpose of regulating the export or import of fish and containers make regulations—

Section 16 of the act provides:

16. This act applies to the shipment of fish or marine plants from one province to another as though the shipment from a province were an export and the shipment into a province were an import.

These two provisions limit the scope of the act to extra-provincial and interprovincial trade and commerce. By clear implication they exclude the application of the act from operation of trade and commerce that is solely within a province. There is no express statement to this effect but the implication is clear enough to the courts and to the citizen. Although the Fish Inspection Act was enacted in 1949, it was not proclaimed in force until November 1, 1967. It is a fair conclusion, therefore, that only three years ago the government was satisfied and careful to express in a statute the government's constitutional inability to intrude into the field of inspecting packages and containers, among other things, of a product that is the subject of trade and commerce solely within a province.

The purpose of the proposed amendment to subclause (2) of clause 3 is to express that constitutional inability in the present bill. Let us apply the principle of the bill to the bill. Let there be truth in the packaging of a commercial product, but let there also be truth in the packaging of the law. Parliament should not sell this bill to the consumer as jumbo size when it is slack filled.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments to state the position of the members of our group on this Bill. I realize that some hon. members want to support this amendment because they are worried about what they feel is an unnecessary proliferation of legislation. They believe the less government intervenes in the market place, the better. I know there are dangers in proliferating legislation and regulations, and do not close my eyes to those dangers. On the other hand, this group has certain reasons for rejecting this amendment.

To begin with, those of us who were members of the joint Senate-House of Commons prices committee several years ago realized at that time that the consumer did not have a particular voice in this chamber, so great efforts were made to set up a department that would protect the interests of consumers as a group.

Mr. McGrath: You are all alone on that.

Mrs. MacInnis: Well, we managed to get a department set up, though we only got, as it were, half a department. Perhaps we got only half a minister, too.

As far as this legislation is concerned I am prepared to go along with the minister to quite an extent, though I shall have some reservations to make later on. What the legislation is seeking to do is not to proliferate a lot of new regulations, leaving things exactly as they are in the meantime; I do not think you could do this. The hon. member's amendment seeks to make the legislation applicable only as long as it does not impinge upon any other legislation, which I do not think is a sensible position to take. If this legislation is to do its job, obviously some of the legislative arrangements already made will have to be upset. What the legislation is doing in a positive sense, I believe, is placing under the aegis of this act a great deal of other legislation that affects consumers, legislation that is now administered by other departments. In other words, this legislation is going to place an umbrella over consumers in respect of packaging and labelling.

When officials from the Fisheries Council and the Meat Packers' Council were before the committee, I was broadly sympathetic to their view that they had been able to operate satisfactorily for years under existing legislation, and that perhaps we should leave things as they are. But the more I thought about it, the more I came to realize that the present situation was very confusing and upsetting to the consumers, and consequently it was much more sensible to have one piece of umbrella legislation covering all the different aspects of packaging and labelling. I believe that what the consumer wants is simplicity and easily understood legislation, rather than having regulations administered by a multiplicity of departments.

I listened to the explanation given by the minister, and according to what he told us it is not his intention to remove the inspectors presently operating under the legislation and to replace them with others. The minister gave us the assurance that the inspection services of the fisheries department, the meat inspection branch of the Department of Agriculture, and the third department, which for the moment escapes me—

Mr. Basford: Health and welfare.

Mrs MacInnis: Yes, health and welfare—will continue to operate, though he intends to mesh them in with his own inspectors and to adopt the inspection procedures that are satisfactory to the public, supplementing them where necessary. If that is the case—and the minister assured us that it was—I think it is a very sensible way of proceeding, rather than uprooting the whole system and passing fresh regulations and rules of procedure. Although certain changes will have to be made to mesh the two together, I am prepared to take a chance on the minister's proposals in this regard.

I also think it is not a good idea to worry too much about some of the existing legislation and regulations. The consumers want protection above everything else. They want to know that there is legislation that will protect them. They have not had this protection to date under existing legislation. It is obvious from all the letters and representations received by Box 99 and by members of Parliament that the consumer is not satisfied he has sufficient protection in the market place to prevent him from being deceived. The consumer has made it abundantly clear that new packaging and labelling legislation is required, and it is here that we must begin.

The minister is not taking this step on the spur of the moment; he was told to do it years ago by the prices committee. That committee gave an indication that what was needed, first of all, was a department of consumer affairs; and secondly, legislation dealing with the various aspects of consumer affairs. One of those aspects was protection of the consumer in the area of packaging and labelling.

This amendment seeks to remove from the application of the legislation certain consumer products that are not the subject of interprovincial trade. Let me point out that today our consumers are continually on the move, and they want safeguards regardless of where they happen to be living. Since Canadians are travelling more and more, this protection must be universally afforded them; and in this legislation I think the minister has recognized this fact. Therefore, I do not think it would be a good idea to remove certain products from the application of this legislation.

No piece of legislation is better than its regulations, and we have yet to see these regulations. No piece of legislation is better than its enforcement, and we do not know how this bill, when it does become law, will be enforced. But there are certain cases where one just has to take a chance. I am prepared to take a chance on this aspect of the bill because, as I say, I think the consumer wants protection. Prior to this bill coming into force consumers have not had the protection in respect of labelling and packaging they need. I feel that this bill, by its umbrella-like character, will bring together the various products in relation to which consumers need protection. These products will be subjected to the same type of inspection and handling. For this reason I cannot go along with this amendment, much as I sympathize with some of the fears of the hon. member who introduced it.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the last speaker and I welcome her support in opposition to the amendment. I listened to the mover of the amendment with some puzzlement. I really do not understand my friends opposite who criticize me and the department for bringing in consumer practices and legislation which they say are not effective, and then as soon as we bring in effective legislation they move amendments that would completely destroy the effect of that legislation.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Basford: This, of course, would be the effect of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe). The effect of his amendment would be to destroy this packaging and labelling bill. The opposition must prefer legislation which is really window dressing. In this government we do not like that kind of legislation. We write legislation that has some teeth in it, such as this bill, and then opposition members get up and move amendments which would remove all those teeth. I listened to them and watched them with a great deal of puzzlement.

Let me say why I cannot accept this amendment. As I say, it would destroy the very purpose of this bill which is intended to provide and assure some uniformity of packaging and labelling requirements by replacing a very great range and variety of regulations and provisions now scattered throughout some 12 or 15 different federal labelling acts, let alone all we may have in the provincial field. In addition, it would restrict the impact of this bill to certain importations to Canada and goods of inter-provincial trade.

The bill, as now designed, proposes to bring about an improvement in the field of packaging and labelling of all kinds of consumer goods, regardless of whether they are imports or enter interprovincial trade. We are suggesting here that the consumer is entitled to full information in respect of the packaging and labelling of all goods he buys. It does not matter whether they are imported or of domestic manufacturer, and it does not matter whether they enter interprovincial trade. Surely, the Canadian consumer is entitled to basic consumer rights under this kind of legislation. This measure is designed under the authority of criminal law and the federal power to prevent deception, confusion and manipulation. Surely, the consumer is entitled to protection against deception, manipulation and trickery, whether it be at the level of a domestic product, an imported product, or a product that enters the field of inter-provincial trade.

Surely, that is something basic to which the Canadian consumer is entitled, regardless of where he lives or what he is buying. Surely, he is entitled to protection against deceptive and misleading statements, trickery and manipulation. This is why we cannot accept this amendment. This is why I do not understand my friends opposite who get up and make great speeches to the effect that the consumer must be protected, then move amendments such as the amendment moved by the hon. member which would completely destroy this legislation. As I have said time after time, this legislation is designed as an omnibus packaging bill to encompass the various products and goods under federal departments of government. This can be done by the adoption of sovereign legislation over-riding other laws, and legislation. To do otherwise might have the effect of destroying the usefulness of this measure.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Basford: Later, Mr. Speaker. There was some scuffling among witnesses who appeared before the committee, some of whom suggested we should not have clause 3 of the bill and that it should be amended as suggested by the hon. member. In this regard, I should like to quote from a brief presented to the committee by Dr. Ziegel. Hon. members know that Dr. Ziegel is one of the leading consumer lawyers in Canada. I should like to quote this sentence from the brief he submitted to the committee:

> Where several Acts apply to a given subject matter, it is standard drafting technique to provide that, in the case of conflict, the later Act, which is the Act before the Committee, shall prevail over the earlier ones. That being so it is equally logical to provide that the later regulations passed under this packaging, labelling Act shall have precedence over the earlier ones. The alternative would be to require a time-consuming amendment of all the previous regulations.

Dr. Ziegel went on to state:

> I foresee none of the dreadful consequences which the critics allege or any threat to the principle of Parliamentary sovereignty in Section 3.

The allegation was that clause 3 made this consumer packaging and labelling bill the primary measure overriding all other provisions and regulations. It was suggested that this was a terrible thing to do. I have quoted Dr. Ziegel who said that this is a very proper thing to do.

Let me quote what I suggested to the committee which, I might add, supported me in this:

> One Act and one set of regulations has to have priority and precedence over the other, and what is before the Committee is, shall this Act, the later Act, the more modern Act, the most recent Act, have the precedence or shall some old Act have the precedence and the priority?

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister permit a question now?

Mr. Basford: We determined that this measure should have priority in order that we might establish Canadian uniformity in co-ordinating standards of packaging and labelling in respect of all products of a consumer nature. I attempted to make this clear to the committee. This is going to require extensive co-ordination with other government departments and with provinces as well as those in the private sector.

I want to reiterate the assurance I gave the committee regarding the understanding that this co-ordination will be forthcoming. We will be consulting with those in the private sector to ensure that various packaging regulations are as consistent as possible. The hon. member for St. John's East wanted to ask a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has indicated he wants to ask a question. He can do so if there is unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: If we accept the submission of Dr. Ziegel, why not bring in an omnibus bill, for which this government is becoming famous? This would have the effect of repealing the 15 statutes which already relate to these various things covered by the bill, thereby disposing of what is becoming a proliferation of legislation with the effect of confusing the consumer and the manufacturer?

Mr. Basford: I thought I had got that point across to the member at the committee hearings when dealing with precisely what he suggests. This bill is designed to establish a common uniform standard with respect to a number of things which are important to the consumer in terms of packaging and labelling practice, such as the declaration of net quantity. There is no reason why you should have 10 different regulations as to how net quantity is determined, whether it be in respect of a can of tomato soup, a box of soap or a pair of socks. Surely, it is possible to establish one uniform system for that kind of a declaration. Surely there is one procedure which could be applicable to misleading labelling and untrue or misleading statements. In special acts there must be special regulations which relate to specialty products. I have in mind, for example, pesticides. We must have special provision which relate to pesticides. I can think of fishing regulations. Obviously, fish is a particular kind of product and we must have special regulations which apply above and beyond the common and uniform manufacturing provisions. That is why we have not repealed all the other Acts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Chair put the question before calling it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment moved by Mr. Howe, seconded by Mr. Hales, in respect of Bill C-180.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment? Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Howe) negatived.

REQUEST FOR FREE DRUGS TO WELFARE RECIPIENTS AND GRADED ASSISTANCE TO OTHERS IN MEETING DRUG COSTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the provision of free drugs for all persons in receipt of social services and for graded payments for those on limited incomes who are now covered by Medicare.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I present this motion to the House today because of the disparity which exists in respect of illness in relation to the older age groups which is so apparent today. This is due to the increasing age of our population which has resulted from the control and limitation of disease. I might illustrate my point by placing some figures on the record. In the year 1 A.D. the population world wide was 250 millon people. By the time the first count was taken in the middle of the 17th century the population had doubled. The population had doubled again by 1800. According to "World Population" by Carr-Saunders, in 1650 the world population was 465 million, by 1750 was 660 million, by 1800 was 836 million, by 1850 was 1,098 million, by 1900 was 1,551 million, by 1933 was 2,057 million, by 1960 was 3 billion and at the end of this century will be between six billion and seven billion.

This will mean that continually there will be a great many more people in the older age groups than at present. Since there are many, many more people in the age group of 65 years, and since these people suffer many illnesses and require more operations than the younger group, the hospitalization figures for this age group are approximately four times what they are for the age group of 35 years. These people require many more drugs in their pursuit of life. I am pleading the case of these people, as well as those who are on low-income, who for one reason or another are unable to purchase the drugs they need.

Mr. McCleave: A great humanitarian.

Mr. Rynard: It is for those people I plead today. There has been a great leap ahead in my profession, and in the field of science, which has contributed to the fact that there are now many more people who reach age 65. In the year 1900, the average age at time of death was 40 years; that was the actual lifespan. Today, the average age at death is around 70. This change has resulted from the introduction of vaccines, serums and new drugs. I could go over the picture from the time of the discovery of the diphtheria anti-toxin, the discovery of the cause and treatment of typhoid fever, as well as the discovery of the treatment of diabetes and pernicious anaemia. We had the sulphas, the penicillins and the golden drugs of the antibiotic age. Many of these were discovered in the past 20 or 30 years. It is a fact that in 1900, in the age group from 1 to 35 years, the common cause of death was infections and infectious diseases. That included, as I say, anything from diphtheria to scarlet fever, pneumonia and other infectious diseases which cut down these people before they reached 35 years of age.

With the discovery of insulin, as we all know in Toronto, diabetics were able to lead somewhat more normal lives. They were able to re-enter the work force. The same thing applies to the treatment of pneumonia. Where the illness once required many weeks or months of treatment, now is it a matter of days before a patient is back to work. Economically this has meant a saving of millions and millions of dollars. I wish to emphasize this point. By adopting the measure I am suggesting, we would not be giving these people anything. The money has been saved many times over by the use of these drugs. In many cases the breadwinner of a family is able to continue his work and rejoin his family. It is truly a wonderful picture. Today most of the deaths occurring in the age group between 1 and 35 are the result of accidents.

Then, we have the geriatric diseases which commence at age 35—gradual degeneration, hardening of the arteries, diseases of the cardio-vascular system, diseases of the chest such as emphysema, bronchitis and other respiratory diseases which are affected of course by pollution, one of the great problems we have today. Many of our older people have these diseases and there is a mistaken idea abroad that the Canada Assistance Plan is supposed to help take care of the situation. It does help in some cases, but many are left untouched. The answer I have been given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is that the Canada Assistance Plan will do the job. In practice, however, it does not do what it should, unless one has sufficient time to wait for it to become operational and to cut through all the red tape. It is an inadequate program because it is cost-shared with the municipalities and provinces. Great gaps are created in the funding of this program, particularly in those provinces which have inadequate financial resources. In the municipalities, the situation can be even worse. They have limited tax resources and with the crisis in respect of welfare this past year, the municipalities have been taxed beyond their limits.

We must remember there are two levels of assistance, particularly in my province of Ontario. The first involves the basic requirements for food, shelter and clothing. The second is listed as "other items". Health care, including drugs, falls in this category. So that is the reason, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Canada Assistance Plan does not, in many cases, cover those people at all. It is discretionary and it allows for a wide diversity of approach by the provinces to this problem. In other words, it is a hodgepodge of services, varying in the same provinces and from province to province. It follows that it is most difficult for people in short term need to obtain the necessary drugs because they are needed right away. Some people might say that if the patient cannot obtain the health care he needs, he can always appeal. Somebody on the government side told me this the other day. The patient can always appeal under the Canada Assistance Plan. But some provinces have no appeal provisions dealing with health care services and drugs, and that applies to my province of Ontario. In Ontario, drugs and dressings are provided on a discretionary basis by the municipalities. They do not have to do it if their budget is tight.

Long term recipients of welfare benefits must apply to the municipality for aid. Supplementary aid is normally paid in cash to those who have long, recurring needs. Indeed, the whole health care field has many areas for which there is no coverage for those in need, except for two public hospitals and 32 other private hospitals which accept Ontario hospital cards. Let us take, for instance, the case of patients who have been in an active treatment hospital. They have been covered by national hospitalization but their active treatment days are over. They must leave the hospital and go to a chronic care home since they are unable to look after themselves, but there is no hospitalization card for this. In effect, we only have active treatment hospital coverage except, as stated previously, in the province of Ontario. Other provinces have varying degrees of coverage. I have seen many of those people forced to leave an active treatment centre, many of them in the sunset of their lives. Many of them have lost their friends through death and have to face a heartrending future with little or no funds.

Inflation and erosion have destroyed what to many of them seemed adequate savings at the time. They lived in a quieter world than we do, and to some death would be welcome. Many of them, with the stark tragedy of their helplessness facing them, become disoriented mentally, and this is a real tragedy. These are the victims of the cruelty of both national hospitalization and national medicare. But the federal government brought both of them into being, and it is their responsibility to see that those programs are made effective so that the provinces can participate on a fifty-fifty basis. It is the responsibility of the federal government to cost-share these programs and to ensure that the standard of health care is universal across Canada, that it is the same in the Maritimes, in British Columbia, and in Ontario. It is neither fair nor honest to treat the senior citizens of this land with such cruelty when they are unable to help themselves, and yet it is they who gave us this land in a better moral and spiritual state than we could return it to them today.

I would like to dwell for a minute on the number of old people and on their situation. There are approximately 665,000 people between the ages of 65 and 69, of whom only a third have a taxable income. There are nearly 1,100,000 of those over 70, of whom one fourth have a taxable income. Of the single old age pensioners, 70 per cent have $1,300 or less income, and two thirds of the married old age pensioners have incomes of less than $4,000. Old people are in a peculiar position, particularly when the amended old age security measure redistributed poverty among the aged. I think it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who coined that phrase. Improved benefits for some retired persons will be paid at the expense of other retired people.

People who are on a low wage scale have been hurt by present day inflation, and last December we told a group of old age pensioners that in the future they will no longer be able to enjoy the 2 per cent escalation for the cost of living to which they had been entitled. These are the cruel facts of life. For nearly 20 years they have been led to believe that this pension was their basic right. They were paying taxes each year for this pension, as we do under the Canada Pension Plan, but no one ever thought that the government would be capable of committing what amounts to theft. This is one of the reasons old age pensioners, those on social security and those on low incomes, have great difficulty in paying their drug accounts.

Many of those older people develop more than one disease. They often have coronary disease, diabetes, respiratory diseases, and these require the judicious use of many drugs which are costly. In other words, when a person reaches the age of 65 or over his organs begin to wear out. He may find that his cardiovascular system, his cerebral vessels, his chest and his lungs start to deteriorate. These people may have three or four of these diseases which require treatment. The cost of drugs may well amount to $30 a month per person. I could cite many such cases to the House if I had more time. If both husband and wife have chronic diseases, the drug cost surpasses $30 a month. Many thousands of people are kept out of hospital by the judicious use of drugs, thus saving the taxpayers millions of dollars.

This also applies to the treatment of mental disease. Many people are working today who would be confined to mental institutions if it were not for the judicious use of tranquilizers. The cost of all those drugs has largely been borne by the patients to the benefit of the taxpayer of Canada. Without the drugs the patient would be in hospital a great deal of the time and thus would require nursing care or home care. We all know what a problem that is today with hospital costs about 100 per cent higher than they were eight or nine years ago. We are greatly concerned about this now, and this is why I say that the judicious use of drugs will cut down the need for hospital care.

It does not seem fair to ask the old age pensioners and those on low incomes to pay for the drugs they need and which, in some cases, they do without because of lack of funds. That is the sad part. Once they do without those drugs they are potential hospital cases and then they cost us thousands of dollars. This is the crux of the matter and this is what I want you to remember. Even if we are motivated selfishly, we will buy those drugs because they will keep these people out of hospitals and that will reduce our taxes.

Let us not be penny wise and pound foolish. There are thousands of people across Canada who often pay high rents. I know of two people, whose cases were described in the press, who were paying $80 a month for one room. This was more than one third of their combined pension. I have known of doctors who have scrounged around their offices to see if they could get samples of antibiotics for one of those elderly patients who needed them. I know of druggists who have done the same thing to try to help those people. What do these people do when they need the next batch of drugs?

The crux of the problem goes deep. The federal government brought in a national medicare plan which was supposed to provide full medical, surgical and pharmaceutical treatment. If anybody doubts that let him get up and say so. That legislation was based on the Hall Commission Report. Here is what that report had to say on the question of drugs, at page 240, of volume 1:

> Effective and judicious use of drugs has made it possible not only to improve the health of the nation but also to raise the economic benefits resulting from the provision of health services. The use of many of the newer drugs by physicians facilitates their patients' recovery—

Let me tell you that this cuts down on the number of visits the doctor makes. The cost of the physician under OHSIP today is becoming increasingly important.

> —and in some instances avoids or minimizes the effect of serious diseases. Improvement in the state of health of the nation meant increases in the productivity of the working force.

This is one of the main points I am making. Some of these people keep on working, even with chronic diseases.

> Persons released from hospital care sooner because of new or improved drug therapy meant saving costly hospital bed days, a welcome economy in the light of rapidly increasing costs of hospital care.

This is what I have pointed out previously.

> Even more important than the economic advantages are the numerous benefits to Canadians in reducing or preventing human suffering. Furthermore, drugs have proven to be an invaluable weapon in the arsenal of the medical profession in its fight against disease and emotional disorder. Advances in drug in the last two decades have been particularly spectacular. Most of the progress made has taken place in such industrial advanced countries as the United States and the United Kingdom. Canadians have shared in this progress. The dynamics of progress in the drug field are illustrated by estimates which indicate that 90 per cent of the drugs prescribed in 1960 were introduced in the previous two decades; 40 per cent could not have been prescribed in 1954.

We live in a very fortunate age.

> Expenditures on drugs place almost as heavy a burden on the average Canadian family as paying medical bills. In 1961, for example, expenditure on physicians' services amounted to $383 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the wish of the House that the hon. member shall continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for their courtesy. I continue to quote from the Hall Commission Report:

> In 1961, for example, expenditures on physicians' services amounted to $383 million as against $364 million spent on prescribed and non-prescribed drugs. In effect then, drug expenditures are equivalent to 95 per cent of expenditures on physician services. Outlay on prescribed drugs is estimated at approximately $164 million in 1961, equivalent to about 43 per cent of medical services ... Comparing again the period 1953 to 1961, the increases were 115 per cent for physicians' services and 81 per cent for pharmaceutical purchases.

The Hall Commission Report further pointed out that:

One extra day in hospital would cost more than the equivalent of four weeks supply of drugs and dressings.

Hall further concluded that:

Prescribed drugs must be included as a benefit of a comprehensive health care program for Canada.

I think that clinches the argument that we have been very tardy in not covering these people. I always feel that maybe half a loaf is better than none. Hall says this service must cover everybody. I would be happy if it covered those who need it, those who seek help, those in respect of whom it would be economic sense to pay for their drugs. We cannot afford, as a nation, to furnish a doctor and not furnish the rest of the treatment. A doctor sees a patient; he prescribes a life-saving antibiotic, but the patient may not have the money to pay for that drug. Just recently I saw a man who had been told to get certain drugs but could not afford them. Three weeks later he was admitted to hospital, where he is now fighting for his life. The turning point of his illness could come on Tuesday, and I will be phoning then to see what the situation is. It is a very interesting case of a person who could not afford the drugs that were prescribed for him. As a nation, we cannot afford that kind of thing.

Today we have people in white collar jobs still able to work at full capacity because of certain drugs. We have people in labouring jobs who are able to keep on working because of antibiotics, because of the heart medicines and the cardiovascular treatments we have developed. I cite the case of one man working in a factory in the city of Orillia. After he returns from work he has dinner, goes to bed and stays there until the following morning. For the past ten years he has been able to work because he take the medication that was prescribed for him, and rests as much as possible. He stays in bed all day Saturday and Sunday, and on Monday is ready for work again. By gosh, that fellow deserves a break and a pat on the back.

I ask for a display of the quality of mercy. I ask that the recommendations in the Hall Commission Report be implemented. I ask that we complete the treatment. We already pay the doctor, so let us now pay the drug costs of those unable to meet them. If hon. members agree to this it will be a soul-satisfying experience for them, knowing they are doing their duty by supporting a proposal that makes economic sense for the nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I listened compassionately to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) on the motion he introduced in the House.

[Mr. Rynard.]

He outlined an interesting picture of the present situation of medicine in Canada, and he also dealt with all the problems involved in the technical and scientific development of medicine in 1971.

I am sure that he introduced that motion in the best intentions in the world, which illustrates his concern for the welfare of the less fortunate members of society. However, I must point out that, contrary to what the motion might lead people to believe, the federal government has not yet made any commitment in connection with the payment of drugs used by the poor. And I would have hoped that the hon. member would have taken the trouble to look more closely than he did perhaps at the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan passed by the House in 1964. As he has often pointed out in his remarks some provinces may not have done their duty as far as the Plan is concerned, or used wisely the subsidies made available to them precisely for the type of services the member for Simcoe North has mentioned.

Once again the constitutional aspect of the health matters must be brought to mind. Must health services in Canada look like an incomprehensible mosaic? The central government must ensure the coordination of all health organizations.

To go back to the motion, it could have been divided into two parts. The first could urge the government to take steps to ensure free drugs to social welfare recipients. The proposal is simply inconceivable, considering that under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government, as I said earlier, has already made appropriate provisions that do not interfere with the prerogatives of the provinces of which I shall try to give a detailed description.

If the hon. member for Simcoe North had made more thorough research, he would not have included the proposal in his motion. Instead he would have submitted his grievances to provincial governments that did not see fit to take advantage of the generous assistance they can obtain under the Canada Assistance Plan. I insist on this—because it is a vital point—the matter should come under the Canada Assistance Plan. Perhaps the provinces still believe today that it is unadvisable to draw from the apparently inexhaustible federal funds in the health field and in another important one, that is the Canada Assistance Plan, thanks to which those who suffer from poor health and who cannot be covered by another system can receive all kinds of treatments.

In the second part of the motion, it is urgently requested that progressive assistance be granted to persons with limited means who are covered by medicare.

Incidently, I am pleased to see that the hon. member appreciates medicare enough to be willing to extend it to cover the paramedical needs of small wage-earners, and all the more so since the hon. member is a physician. This is auspicious for the medical assistance plan.

I might add, as a member of Parliament and as a doctor, since we have several things in common, that I regret to see him sitting on the other side. Nevertheless, if the hon. member had thought a little more before drafting his motion, if he had taken care to consider the way through which provincial governments have exercised their right of option under the Medicare plan, including what relates to methods of financing provincial plans, he would have found immediately to what extent this part of his motion is unnecessary since certain provincial plans do not require contributions from the insured. Partial or total assistance is required to pay for these contributions in the case of those insured whose income is low, only in provinces where the payment of contributions is required.

Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, for instance, do not finance their health insurance plans through premiums. I therefore take it that the hon. member was referring only to the situation which prevails in Ontario and was not taking into account the funding system of the other provinces when he drafted his motion. In fact, Ontario does not participate in Medicare: hers is more of a prepaid medical insurance plan and I hope that some day it will be possible to put things in order with regard to the famous OHSIP.

When the government passed the Canada Assistance Act in 1966, it was meant to be an important step in the organization of a complete social assistance scheme designed to complement other income security measures. As everyone knows, the Canada Assistance Plan provides for agreements with the provinces, under which the federal government pays 50 per cent of the costs of assistance granted by the provinces to persons in need.

Under this plan, the federal government agrees to share the costs incurred by the provinces for the care given to needy Canadians, when such expenses are not already covered by other cost-sharing programs, such as the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Plan established in 1958 and the Medical Care Plan adopted in 1968.

Services which the federal government will recognize under the Canada Assistance Plan are varied and may include nursing, optical, dental, pharmaceutical, orthopedic care and others. The federal government reimburses the provinces and municipalities for 50 per cent of such services. The sharing, if it occurs, of the other 50 per cent of the costs of such services is provided for under a provincial act applicable to a province and to a municipality in this matter.

The only condition imposed on provinces for providing such services under the Canada Assistance Plan is this: those services must be provided according to the needs of the individuals after their financial obligations, their income and their resources have been assessed.

However I must stress the fact that it is entirely up to a province to decide whether the reimbursement of drugs will be included or not in a provincial assistance plan under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I might say also that in a province like Ontario, where municipalities play an important part in providing welfare services, it is up to them to decide whether they will help the interested people to buy drugs.

I think that this is the key to the problem. Provinces and municipalities have forgotten the high cost of drugs, while they were aware of the existence of a fund from which they could draw money in order to pay for half the cost of drugs which were most needed.

As for the problems mentioned by the hon. member, it is certain that if an individual falls ill, he needs medicine because what can a doctor do if it is impossible for him not only to nurse his patient but also to prescribe the necessary drugs to cure him? There again, the provinces, which are very jealous of their juridictions, be able to draw upon funds made available to them.

The Canada Assistance Plan, as someone said a moment ago, recognizes the primacy of the provinces' constitutional responsibility in respect of welfare, by giving them the margin of decision mentioned above as far as the extent of care that provincial assistance plans can guarantee. It does not disregard the daily difficulties which low income families have to face when they must, for instance, pay a high price for drugs. If a provincial government wishes it, it may decree that some families need help in a special field, as that of large purchases of drugs, and if the assistance provided for is based on the assessment of needs, pursuant to the agreement signed by the federal and the interested provincial governments, and as is required by this program, the federal government will reimburse the provincial government 50 per cent of the cost of drugs supplied.

In other words, a provincial government is entitled to include in its financial assistance program the cost of drugs according to an assessment of needs without beneficiaries receiving any other type of social assistance. However, by and large, the provinces usually only supply drugs, under their own social assistance plans, to needy persons already receiving some other form of social assistance.

All the provinces have signed agreements with the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan. For instance, the Quebec Public Assistance Plan has been recognized by the law on cost-sharing arrangements and temporary agreements. However, I must emphasize that responsibility for the establishment of provincial plans rests with each province. It is assumed that provincial governments are sufficiently aware of the needs of their citizens in this field.

I therefore consider that the federal government is making an ample contribution by undertaking, under the Canada Assistance Plan, to reimburse up to 50 per cent of the cost of drugs that certain individuals may require, based on an assessment of treatment. I would add that it can go no further than this and that it is up to the provinces to make their own decision as to whether they want to avail themselves of the opportunities offered through this federal financial assistance.

Because of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan, I have pointed out how they applied to the subject matter which we are now discussing. I believe that the first part of the hon. member's motion to the effect that in the opinion of this House the government should immediately consider taking action with respect to providing drugs free of charge to those in receipt of social assistance, is entirely justifiable.

Indeed, this is the type of "pharmaceutical" assistance in a general sense which, as I have already mentioned, is made available under the provinces' social assistance plans to whoever receives other forms of assistance. However, the provinces do not avail themselves fully of the opportunity which is theirs under the Canada Assistance Plan, to provide assistance to the less needy which are not eligible to the full assistance allowances and who may need just a little help, as well as to those individuals who generally are self-sufficient but unable to afford significant purchases of drugs.

This is the responsibility that the government was to discharge and has discharged, specifically as regards the motion put forward by the hon. member. There is no doubt that, with respect to the second part of the motion, namely the increase in welfare recipients benefits and payment terms for those covered by Medicare and with limited earnings, we should enact a legislation respecting the establishment of a plan we might call "Pharmacare". In this area, the provinces are on the ball and should pass legislation shortly so that there may be better medical care since, as I said a few moments ago, taking care of patients is fine indeed but without drugs, little can be achieved.

It is regretable that a modern doctor cannot provide his patients with drugs so that their health is not affected.

The hon. member for Simcoe North mentioned the fact that this injustice gives rise to quite a number of problems and I am sure that the provinces will eventually wake up and assist those people who, even though they are not in need, can be considered as "marginal". They have been of service to their country but in the twilight of their life they do not enjoy adequate means of subsistance.

These people must be able to see a doctor, to afford health care and drugs. As pointed out by the hon. member for Simcoe North, senior citizens deserve much because they have been paying taxes and serving our people all their lives long. Some of them have been on the battlegrounds to help preserve our freedom. Indeed, all governments have endeavoured to maintain in this world the freedom we all expect.

We may have, in the long run, to adjust our policies so that, as far as health is concerned, elder people who cannot afford the cost of health care and drugs do not have to suffer from their situation.

We have partially corrected this situation with regard to Medicare and I hope that in the course of future federal-provincial conferences, provincial governments will come up with something constructive with regard to the Pharmacare plan so that every Canadian will be able to enjoy a better way of life and that those persons who have fought for their country will be able to spend the rest of their lives serenely in Canada.

I witnessed too much suffering, I saw too many people at the mercy of money and who could not get the medicine necessary to their survival. Some people died not because of lack of care, but maybe because of the lack of medicine they should have had at the start of their illness.

I am not in favour of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe North, for the simple reason, as I have said before, that part of the act would be entirely different, as we cannot, according to the Medical Care Act, change anything without consulting the provinces, after which it might be advisable to think about an agency named Pharmacare. As to the first part of the motion, the hon. member knows very well, with his great heart, that he should have stated it before the provincial representatives, who are a little remote from the whole thing at the moment.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion I wish to say how much we appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). His sincerity, common sense and humanity were never more evident than when he spoke of the very great need of providing free drugs for people on social assistance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: He spoke of cases of human beings in real need about which he knew. Hon. members know only too well what these days, weeks and months of unemployment, inflation and rising living costs have done to erode the incomes of people on old age security and families faced with unemployment trying to get along for an extended period of time.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) referred to the federal government as being a co-ordinating government. I do not think he can get out from under as easily as that. True, it is a co-ordinating government, but the federal government is a tax collecting government; it collects the big revenues. The hon. member should not be allowed to forget that the Hall report recommended, after careful study, that there should be a medicare system which included provision of prescription drugs. In addition, the Senate Committee on Aging recommended as follows:

> That a nationwide universal health service program be instituted to provide a comprehensive range of services including medical care, dental care, home care, prescription drugs and prosthetic appliances and that if staging is required in the introduction of all or any part of this program, older people be given special consideration.

We are not talking about some mythical time when the provincial governments get together, lay down their arms and say war shall be no more. The need exists now, before these elderly people are taken off this earth by natural events. I do not believe the hon. member who spoke for the government should be complacent about this issue. I wish to quote some figures from my own province to show how widespread is this problem. British Columbia is not the worst off of the provinces, either; there are provinces whose spokesmen could make an even more desperate case.

In British Columbia today the total number of old age security recipients is 200,368. In British Columbia the only way in which to become eligible for a medical card allowing free prescription drugs is to be in receipt of a provincial supplement. Of the 200,368 people who receive old age security payments in the province, only 14,000 are in possession of a medical card entitling them to free prescription drugs. What about all the other people who are on a frozen $80 basis? They saw the purchasing power of their incomes decline even before the changes of last December.

I have received letters from elderly people who simply cannot afford to buy the drugs they need. I have seen elderly people walk up to counters at which drugs are dispensed in our large stores, inquire about the cost of the drugs they need and then turn sadly away because they could not afford to pay for them.

Answering a question on February 11, the minister of welfare in British Columbia said there are 48,535 people in receipt of social assistance benefits who are classed as unemployed employables. These do not qualify to receive a medical card, and therefore they cannot get prescription drugs free. This is a large figure and behind it stands families who need drugs and who are unable to get them. I do not think Ottawa should be allowed to get from under when the Hall Commission, the Senate Committee on Aging and a great many other inquiries of both a public and private character have made recommendations on lines which would meet this problem.

I have no intention of talking out this resolution. I quarrel with it on only one aspect—the sliding scale. I think the time has come to include these prescriptions under medicare, and in the meantime to give special consideration to the needs of those in receipt of social assistance.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me the hon. lady has been preaching to the converted. Her speech might better have been made in the province of British Columbia, which seems to have been failing its people in the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan.

We were all impressed by the amount of research which the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) put into the making of his presentation. A lawyer who follows a couple of doctors is somewhat at a disadvantage. All lawyers hold doctors in awe. I was bound to note that both those hon. members seemed to agree that the need existed; the question was only how one could best set about meeting it. I do not think the federal government can be faulted. Notwithstanding the limitations placed upon it, it has been endeavouring to find ways and means of assisting the provinces to do the things they should be doing. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) made her stand as she did. Her representations might have been better made in Vancouver so that the ears of Premier Bennett would have heard it.

In the course of my research I have found that most social assistance recipients are eligible for medical benefits under programs of the provincial or local governments, and these programs are supported by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan operating within the purview of the Constitution. Since 1966 the Canada Assistance Plan has provided for the sharing of health costs with the provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. The debate just completed shows once again that hon. members do care.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PROHIBITIONS, LABELS, STANDARDIZATION, INSPECTION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved motion No. 2:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by adding immediately after clause 3 the following:

"4. Where the Governor in Council is of the opinion that practices or manner of marking price and quantity of a product on a container are likely to lead to deception of the consumer on the value of the product, on the recommendation of the minister, the Governor in Council may prohibit the sale of such products as may be prescribed unless such products are marked with the unit price in accordance with the regulations."

and by renumbering the clauses following accordingly.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I spoke on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) and pointed out there were certain phases of this legislation we would definitely support. Even though we might be worried about certain aspects, we felt the legislation was good and should be supported. However, there are other phases in regard to which we do not feel the legislation goes far enough to protect the consumer.

It should be borne in mind that the general purpose of this bill is to protect the consumer from deception in regard to packaging and labelling of products. As a matter of fact, the minister with great enthusiasm this afternoon said that surely the Canadian consumer was entitled to be protected against such deception. I very firmly believe that the Canadian consumer is entitled to be protected against deception in regard to packaging and labelling, and this the bill will provide in a number of ways. First of all, it gives the minister power to take various steps that will eliminate the undue proliferation of various shapes and sizes of packages, as well as prohibit such gimmicks as "cents off" and the use of peculiar terms like "giant size", "jumbo size", and other deceptive terms leading to false labelling in a number of ways.

We thoroughly agree with such provisions and hope they will be enforced. However, to our mind the bill will not prevent deception in one very important area; that is to say, it will not enable the consumer to avoid being deceived in regard to which package is the best value for the money. In committee we made reference to experiments conducted in the United States with experienced women shoppers who were invited to see whether they could pick from a number of items what in their judgment was the best value for money. These experiments decisively proved over the course of a number of years that the women were deceived in more than half of the choices they made, able and experienced though they were.

In our committee the members of this group conducted an experiment one day which proved precisely the same thing, though on a much smaller scale. We had three products with us, three sizes of the same brand of bottled ketchup, three sizes of Rice Crispies and three packages of Arctic Power. We told the head of the grocery manufacturers association the price of each bottle of ketchup which was printed on the label, the size of each bottle, that is the number of fluid ounces it contained. We then invited him to say which bottle he thought gave the shopper best value for money. He was unable to pass that tests, and said so.

Then we did the same thing with the Rice Crispies. We told him the price on the package and the weight of the contents, but he was unable to say which gave best value for money. Although he did guess the third product correctly, we proved in committee that an experienced and able shopper was unable consistently to determine the best value for money. Without the aid of pencil and paper, computer or slide-rule she was quite unable to determine which product gave best value for money. In other words, she was deceived by a combination of quantity and price. This deception remains in the marketplace, and will still remain after this legislation is passed unless the minister is disposed to change his mind at this eleventh hour and confer a benefit on the consumer by so doing.

There is only one way to prevent this kind of deception, and that is by unit pricing. We should include in the bill the provision that every package must display the price of the package, the total amount of the product in the package and the price per unit, whether it be per pound, per quart, or whatever the relevant unit may be.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

This does not have to be done, as the minister knows very well, in respect of anything like all the packages on the shelves, but there are certain types of packages where unit pricing is absolutely essential if the consumer is not to be deceived.

• (8:10 p.m.)

We ran into some resistance from people, particularly those in the retail trade, to the idea of unit pricing. Manufacturers were really not opposed in principle to it, but retailers did express opposition. Quite frankly, I felt that their opposition to unit pricing did not contribute to assisting consumers to find the best value in the marketplace. Unit pricing was recommended in the Batten report after a study of grocery prices on the Prairies, as reported in 1968. It was recommended as a very good method to help the consumer. It was also recommended by consumer reports in the United States and it is being tried out in the supermarkets of that country to the south. It is being tried out in at least one grocery chain in Ontario. It is also being used widely across Canada in respect of certain items in supermarkets.

For example, when we buy packages of cheese or meat we find on them the exact weight, the total price and the price per pound. It makes little difference what the shape of the piece of meat under the cellophane is, what the shape of the piece of cheese is or the contents of either, because the unit price is marked there. The consumer is therefore well informed and cannot be deceived as to the value she is receiving for her money.

Why will the minister not accept the principle of unit prices? This afternoon he quoted with great enthusiasm the words of Dr. Jacob Ziegel in respect of another matter. In a moment I intend to quote that same authority to him in another context. I should like to say, first, that the minister's objections to unit pricing seem to boil down to only two. First of all, he was uncertain about the cost of putting unit pricing into effect.

This was the main objection of the retailers when they voiced their opinion; they said it would raise the price of items to the consumer. Let me point out in that regard that no matter what price the consumer is paying for the package. I would be very doubtful whether the additional cost of putting a unit price on the package would come anywhere near the price the consumer pays today as a result of being bamboozled, deceived and completely bewildered by the juggling of prices and quantities. This is the trap she must face when trying to decide the best value.

The minister can determine those products in respect of which it would be beneficial to have unit pricing. This decision would be within the discretion of the minister and would involve only certain lines of products. I believe the consumer would be well advised to pay any additional costs caused by unit pricing, knowing exactly when she is getting the best value instead of going into this blindfolded because she does not have a slide-rule, computer or something else with her. I think this is an objection which can be very readily and sufficiently answered. I am sure it can be thrown out of court easily.

The other objection which I think should be dealt with is that the minister appears to draw a very neat line between manufacturing and retail levels when it comes to unit pricing. When dealing with this matter in committee he suggested that we could not apply unit pricing at the manufacturing level because that would contravene legislation in respect of resale price maintenance. He is quite correct in this statement, but we suggest that unit pricing should be instituted at the retail level. The minister at once says that we cannot do anything at the retail level because that falls within provincial jurisdiction and we cannot interfere through federal legislation.

If this is the fact, the minister is on very shaky and slippery ground in respect of the legislation we are now in the process of passing. Under this legislation his inspectors can go into a retail establishment and hold up the sale of goods which they suspect are not being labelled correctly. They can keep these goods out of circulation until such time as their labels are brought into conformity with the legislation. If the minister claims to be unable under this legislation to deal with the retail trade yet he can deal with the retail trade to the extent of keeping goods from being sold until their labels conform with this legislation, then I maintain the minister could very well take a chance on asking the retail trade to put unit pricing labels on packages where he considers it necessary in order to avoid deceiving the consumer. I think a very good case can be made in this regard.

If the minister is correct in saying he cannot do anything at the retail level because this falls within provincial jurisdiction, what does he mean by introducing the term "dealer" in this legislation and under it defining a manufacturer and a retailer? If a retailer is brought under this legislation, as he is in various contexts, then I maintain that the minister, having this power to interfere with the retailer, also has the power to do so in respect of unit prices.

I now come to my reference to Professor Ziegel whom the minister quoted so enthusiastically this afternoon. In a letter which was addressed to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, dated February 12, 1971, Dr. Ziegel of York University, Osgoode Law School, said this under the heading "Constitutional Aspects of Unit Pricing":

> In giving evidence before your committee on January 14th last, the Honourable Ron Basford left the impression that the federal government lacks the constitutional power to impose unit pricing at the retail level. I do not know the source of the minister's opinion but it seems to me to be open to serious question. I incline to the view that if the present provisions of Bill C-180 are intra vires then a provision empowering the Governor in Council to impose unit price requirements for all or some commodities offered for retail sale to prevent the deception of consumers would also be constitutional.

He goes on to say:

> The criminal law power has been held to justify the federal Food and Drugs Act and, presumably, it is also the basis upon which the federal government would seek to justify much of the other recent federal consumer protection legislation such as the Textile Labelling Act, the Hazardous Products Act and, to a lesser extent, the Motor Vehicles Safety Act.

I would point out to the minister that the foundation of Bill C-180 is the criminal law of Canada. I would also point out that the whole-constitutionality of this bill rests on the criminal law of Canada. The criminal law which the minister is invoking has jurisdiction over deception in all its forms. Deception in all its forms is a criminal offence and therefore is a federal responsibility. If without unit pricing certain types of packages cannot be displayed on the shelves without the deception of the consumer being inherent in their display, then I maintain the minister not only has the authority but also the responsibility to adopt unit pricing as a means of preventing the deception of the consumer.

I think it is just as much the minister's function to protect the consumer in respect of unit pricing as it is to protect the consumer in respect of deceptive sizes, weights, deceptive labelling, and so on. Furthermore, I have a suspicion that if the minister wished to do so he could find ways and means to do this, because he has already found ways and means to do things which Professor Ziegel considers to be on an equal footing. He found ways and means to justify the Hazardous Products Act, the Textile Labelling Act and the Motor Vehicles Safety Act.

Even if the minister should consider it a serious gamble to bring in such legislation, he has taken a similar gamble before. I have not heard that the other legislation in respect of which he has taken the gamble has been questioned. I have no doubt that if its constitutionality should be brought into question, the minister would be the first to gather together a strong battery of legal talent and go after it with all the force of the Department of Justice behind him. I say to the minister that I for one do not share his opinion, and I might add that my opinion is shared by persons other than Professor Ziegel.

I do not think there is any more gamble in bringing in unit prices than there was in respect of many other pieces of legislation. This is in direct line with the other provisions in the bill. If unit pricing is not within the minister's power, then neither is Bill C-180. I wish the minister would get off the fence and let us know whether he is on the side of the consumer or against the consumer in respect of this legislation.

Furthermore, I urge the minister to bring in unit pricing now, and if a case should be brought against it he should be willing to defend it just as he would any other provision in the bill. If, on the other hand, the minister feels he cannot take this gamble—and he has already proven he is a good gambler—I would ask him to be willing to test this legislation before the Supreme Court to see whether or not he could bring in an amendment to the legislation to this effect—because I am convinced such legislation is needed for the protection of the Canadian consumer.

In many ways this legislation is very good. We in this group do not begrudge the minister the wide discretionary powers in this bill, because we have seen legislation the minister has passed which is genuinely useful to the consumer. I should like to see him go further in certain directions which we will bring in later. But in the meantime I urge him to consider this amendment. In conclusion, I should like to again read the amendment. We are proposing a new clause 4 in Bill C-180, which would read as follows:

> Where the Governor in Council is of the opinion that practices or manner of marking price and quantity of a product on a container are likely to lead to deception of the consumer on the value of the product, on the recommendation of the Minister, the Governor in Council may prohibit the sale of such products as may be prescribed unless such products are marked with the unit price in accordance with the regulations.

This wording is wide open. If the minister should want to try out unit pricing with regard to only a few items which are deceptive beyond any shadow of doubt, let him try it. But I urge him to give himself these discretionary powers so that he will not find it necessary to come back to the House to have them incorporated in this legislation in a relatively short space of time. I urge him to do this so that the bill will provide genuine protection to the consumer in the matter of packaging and labelling.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words concerning the amendment brought before the House by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I believe she is sincere in respect of what she wants to do, but I suggest that what she has in mind is impractical and would be very costly if made operative. She has in mind that if a ten-ounce package of soap, for example, is priced at 50 cents, it should have "5 cents per ounce" written on the container. The best argument I can think of against this is that if this idea were a good one, those who use the marketplace to sell their products would adopt it smartly. If it would sell more goods more quickly and if bigger profits could be captured, those in the marketplace would adopt this suggestion very quickly. So I do not think we need consider putting it in the form of legislation.

I believe, also, we should consider the great cost to the consumer of accepting such an amendment. I can think of the situation where a retailer or dealer might have 50 or 100 cases of an item which he intends to put on the shelf at a reduced price because it is not moving. Then perhaps he would be told that according to this amendment he would have to mark the unit price on each item, and because of this he might decide that it is not worth the trouble. If this legislation were in force, the government inspector could come in and say that the labels were not properly marked and the dealer might decide that rather than going to the trouble of making all the changes, he would not put the item on as a special but would leave it at the regular price. I believe the hon. member has overlooked this practical aspect of her amendment. I would simply say again that if it should be a good thing to do, the people in the marketplace would adopt unit pricing.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). The purpose of the amendment is an attempt to establish the basic principle of the unit price.

While we recognize there are circumstances under which this might not be possible, we believe it is important that it be established as a principle by the federal government in a number of different ways, depending on which might be the most practical. Our concern is that the minister accept this principle as being worth while in protecting the consumer.

Questions have been raised about the legality of doing this. It has been suggested that the combines legislation might not permit such pricing. There might be circumstances in which this would be true. I think one of the ways of getting around that problem is to make provision that there be a space set aside on the package for the total price and the price per unit. This would enable the retailer himself to put on the price per unit and would take care of situations wherein the price is different in one establishment as against another. One might argue that the retailer is perfectly capable of doing that now, and this is true.

The importance of what I am suggesting, and the reason I feel it should be done under this legislation, is that it in fact would be an indication from the federal government to everyone at the retail level that we consider this practice to be of major importance and a good move in terms of assisting the consumer. I think such a provision in the legislation, such a position taken by the federal government, would move the retailer more rapidly in the direction of unit pricing than might otherwise be the case.

Surely, if the minister feels that there are circumstances under which he cannot get the legislation through on the basis of insisting on unit pricing at the factory level, I cannot see that he would have any reason to argue against making provision for leaving space on the label of the package for this purpose. The retailer has to stamp the price on the package; this is common practice. He could easily design a stamp—I am sure that if such a stamp has not been designed, it could be done—so that the price of the package would be set on one line and the price per ounce or gram on a lower line. With one stamp he would accomplish both purposes; he would give the total price of the product as well as the unit price. This would go a great distance toward helping the consumer.

I think all of us at one time or another have been confronted by consumers who have explained the difficulty they have in trying to assess what is the best buy and the best value. I am afraid I am not quite as sanguine as the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) about believing that if the marketplace thought it were good, it would do it. One of the reasons most of us are here is that the marketplace needs some assistance in moving in the right direction from time to time, otherwise we could abdicate all our responsibility to the marketplace.

I do not think the hon. member for Wellington is really saying that his suggestion would be a great help. The bill that we are discussing is obviously an attempt to correct many of the deficiencies that we think exist in the marketplace. Therefore, I hope that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), who can occasionally be a reasonable man, will recognize the validity of this amendment and what it is trying to do. It is trying to further consumer education and assist the harassed consumer in making a value judgment which the marketplace more often obscures than enlightens.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that unit pricing will one day come into effect in this country. We heard evidence during the exhaustive study of this bill in committee in support of unit pricing. We heard the questions and comments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), who moved this amendment, and others. We also heard very substantial evidence against unit pricing at this time.

Nobody in his right mind would be against unit pricing per se. It is a very desirable goal, a very worth-while and indeed necessary objective to strive for. But I think from the evidence that we heard during our examination of this bill in committee, including that of the minister who will have responsibility for administering this legislation, I am led to the conclusion, as are the majority of the members of the committee, that unit pricing—as worthwhile and necessary an objective as it may be—is not practical at this time. I shall not go into the constitutional aspect of the question, although it was raised in the committee, but there is one important aspect which I think is worthy of mention.

The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) said that it would be a very simple matter to provide space on packages for unit pricing. Nobody would disagree with that. If this were the law, manufacturers could comply with it with very little effort and relatively modest additional cost. But the problem arises at the retail level, because the retailer has ultimate responsibility. Bearing in mind the many thousands of items that are handled by supermarkets and grocery retailers in Canada, one can readily grasp how thoroughly impractical it would be at present to force retailers to stamp on each individual item, each can, container or package the unit price of the product. It would be a nightmare for the retailer. One of the objects of the bill is to reduce the proliferation of sizes of packages on the market. If we succeed in doing that we will get much closer to the day when we can have unit pricing in Canada. But until we arrive at that stage, I submit that unit pricing is totally impractical, desirable though it may be.

Indeed, this amendment is very typical of the type that we are used to getting from our friends in the NDP. It is what I would call a "motherhood" amendment, where they place us in the position of speaking against motherhood—in this case motherhood being unit pricing. Everyone in Canada knows that unit pricing is desirable. All of us have had experience at one time or another of going to the supermarket and making the necessary purchases for the family. We have had the problem of wrestling with the price of an article when there is a proliferation of sizes and containers of that item on the supermarket shelf. But to suggest that the average consumer enter a supermarket with a slide-rule and start computing the unit cost of a can of foodstuffs is to my mind not reasonable.

Evidence has been placed before the committee to support the case for unit pricing. I am sure that some of this evidence will be presented to the House, if not in a speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, then in one of the speeches made by her colleagues. Nobody can quarrel with the case put forward on the evidence that has been presented. What I suggest is unit pricing some time in the future, but unit pricing now is not practical. I subscribe to the arguments presented in the committee by the minister, arguments that I am sure he will very eloquently present to this House, showing why it is not practical at this particular time.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, desirable though it may be to have unit pricing in Canada, until we arrive at a stage where we can reduce the proliferation of sizes and until we can clear up the confusion that already exists in the minds of consumers with respect to this proliferation, I submit that unit pricing at this time is not practical, and desirable though it may be we cannot support the amendment.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole matter concerning this amendment and the question of unit pricing was gone into at very great length in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which examined this bill. I think there were three or four meetings of the committee at which the question of unit pricing came up. I made it clear in the committee and in the House during debate on second reading, that of course in so far as unit pricing made comparability of products easier for the consumer, in so far as it provided the consumer with full and accurate information, both pricewise and otherwise as to the products that the consumer was buying, then unit pricing was a good thing.

It indicated that we in the department and I as the minister had certainly not been unaware of the developments that had been going on in Canada and the United States with regard to studies of unit pricing, their implications, the cost of unit pricing, whether or not in fact they were used by consumers, whether or not in fact consumers took into account the unit pricing of products and what products were suitable for pricing. All of these were experiments conducted in this country and in the United States, of which we were aware and on which we maintained a watching brief, if I may put it that way. We sent officials of the department to observe and participate in studies being conducted in New York by the department of consumer affairs there, and in Washington where one of the leading chains was conducting certain studies.

Our problem here is one we went into very fully in the committee, that in the view of the law officers of the Crown there are some difficulties constitutionally with regard to the amendment now before the House. The constitutional aspects were discussed at quite some length in the committee. All I can say is that this is a bill put forward with the advice of the law officers of the Crown as a constitutional bill, fully within the valid and proper authority of the federal Parliament and federal government, and I would not want to jeopardize it by an amendment changing the bill which may impugne or bring into question its constitutionality. That would be a disastrous thing to do. I have to take, as does the government, constitutional advice from the law officers of the Crown and not from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I have all the respect in the world for her, but she is not the person from whom I have to take constitutional advice and legal advice.

May I say, however, that there are in the bill two provisions which I think deal with this question. One is clause 11, which deals with standardization of packaging. Surely to the extent that packages are standardized, to the extent that one becomes comparable with another there is no need for unit pricing. The example I would submit here is that of dairy products which are already sold in standardized packages. For example, butter is sold in quarter-pound, half-pound and one-pound packages. There is no need for unit pricing in the sale of butter. No one needs to see on a package of butter what the price per ounce is, because it is sold by way of standardized packages controlled by regulation.

Clause 11 of the bill also provides that where there is undue proliferation, where there are so many packages that it is confusing to the consumer, we may take action to standardize the number of packages and the size and shape of packages relating to any particular product line. To the extent that packages are standardized pursuant to clause 11, the need for unit pricing covering those products is removed.

The second matter is an amendment made in the committee at my suggestion and my urging. It is the new clause 12 which provides, if I might read it because it was not before the House on second reading:

> The minister may conduct research and studies relating or incidental to the packaging and labelling of any prepackaged product including matters relating or incidental to unit price marking, date and storage marking and the shapes and sizes of containers.
> (2) The minister may, in carrying out any research or studies pursuant to subsection (1), consult with or seek the advice of any department or agency of any government, any dealers or any organization of dealers or any organization in Canada of consumers.

So pursuant to that amendment we can carry on research directed toward this question of unit pricing. For example, we can provide the initiative, the impetus and the leadership that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) spoke of and which I think is so essential. There are some problems in unit pricing, but there is no reason why leading chain stores in Canada, engaged in the sale of food products, could not themselves voluntarily undertake, both on an experimental basis and as a pilot project, the unit pricing of the products within their chain store outlets.

It seems to me that there are 30 to 40 commonly used food products that compose most of the food dollar of an average Canadian family which could very easily be shown by way of unit pricing by the leading chain stores. In fact this evening, as I did in the committee the other day, I call upon them to engage in a voluntary way in this practice to see the extent to which consumers use it, to see to what extent there are problems associated with it, if any. I say, let the chains engage in this. Certainly under this new clause we will be engaging in studies of unit pricing. We will be calling on the chains, pursuant to our studies, to mark their products by way of unit pricing in order to see how the system works. I say in conclusion on this point that to the extent standardization takes place under clause 11 and to the extent action is taken pursuant to clause 12, I think the amendment before us is unnecessary.

The last comment I want to make deals with one that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway made. I think she was possibly being a little rhetorical at that point in her remarks because she urged me as the minister to get off the fence on the question of consumer protection. I take some offence, some objection to that remark, but I think she was being more rhetorical than anything else. I think my record as minister and the record of the department are such that we have fully demonstrated over the past two years that we have decided which side of the fence we are on.

Here I refer to such things as the Hazardous Products Act, which is the finest consumer product safety legislation in the world, the amendment to the Bills of Exchange Act which came into effect last November 1, and the drugs bill which we put through the House against the strongest and best organized lobby that many in this Parliament had every seen organized. I refer also to the action we are taking against misleading advertising. Both small advertisers and some of the leading companies in Canada have been charged and convicted of misleading advertising for the first time in the history of this country.

I think this kind of record, on behalf of the consumers, by myself and by my department surely answer the question. We know which side of the fence we are on. We are acting, as this bill is designed to act, for the protection of the Canadian consumer. I can only assume that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was being quite rhetorical in her comment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: You went so fast we didn't have time to tune up the fiddle to go along with all that.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to prevent, inhibit and stop any kind of advertising, packaging or labelling that misleads or deceives. There is no argument from any corner of the House about that objective; all parties are in agreement with it.

What the bill says implicitly and what the minister has said is that the consumer has the right to know. The amendment proposed by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) provides that not only must the consumer have the right to know, but that he or she must have the right to be able to know. That the consumer shall have access to information is implicit in this bill. We wish to rectify what we think is a shortcoming in an otherwise good piece of legislation. The Minister invited members of Parliament to comment, saying that we should not worry very much about those areas in which the bill might go too far.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I, at least, accepted the minister's invitation to worry more about the bill and we are pointing out an area in which this legislation does not go far enough. We have tried to accommodate the minister and we are suggesting an area that we think ought to be included in this legislation, to make it go further than even he might have thought possible.

I think that two areas have been omitted from this bill, one being that the consumer has the right to be able to know. Unit pricing is one of the tools which the consumer can use in order to know the value of what he is buying, on the basis of per ounce, per pound, per package or any other measure by which the product is sold. I admit at the outset that I want to do all I can to calm the fears and fairly mild objections of my good friends and colleagues, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

We tried to make our point in committee. We are not suggesting for a moment that this amendment would apply to all products. Actually, it would be impossible to apply unit prices to every one of the tens of thousands of commodities found on the shelves of retail outlets in Canada. Nobody is suggesting that the minister shall do this, because the amendment specifically says "the minister may". I have enough confidence even in a member of the Liberal government to take my chances on the good judgment and good sense of a minister of the Crown and his officials in selecting those commodities and products to which unit pricing can easily and quickly be applied, because I think they will do it, if for no other reason, to see how well this provision works and of how much use it will be to Mrs. Jane Consumer.

Just prescribing the size of packages or reducing the number of package sizes by itself will not prevent the deception or the misleading of the consumer. Those, in part, are objectives that the minister says he wishes to achieve. For that reason we plead with the minister to accept a provision in the bill saying that unit prices may be applied by the minister on any one or more of a given number of products that he and his officials may select, once products have been standardized in terms of packages or the quantities in each package.

Prices in themselves can still mislead consumers, either deliberately or accidentally. For instance, say a uniform package size for 20 ounces of anything is brought in: if the marked price is 97 cents, Mrs. Jane Consumer will immediately have to compute the price of the product per ounce. As I said, standardization of containers will not solve the problem, no matter if different manufacturers use the same size of containers, because consumers would still need to compare the prices of similar products put out by different manufacturers if the prices for products in similar sized containers varied. Without a unit price there is no basis for comparing prices for the same product in containers of different sizes. For instances, is the large size cheaper than the medium size, or is the medium size cheaper than the small size?

I wish to cite an example to illustrate my point. I should like the permission of the House to have appended to Hansard a table. I will not take the time of the House in reading it. I do not know what procedure I ought to follow, but I should like to have this table included with my remarks in Hansard. May I ask permission of the House to do that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that it is not the practice of the House to do so. I ask for the assistance of hon. members. Perhaps if the table is identified, hon. members can give their unanimous consent to having it included; or the hon. member could read it as part of his speech. In any event, the hon. member will need the consent of the House to implement his suggestion.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I think your suggestion is very worth while. Perhaps the hon. member ought to identify the table which he wishes to read, so that we will not be setting a precedent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): There will also be difficulties for the translators, and so on. Unless the table is overly long, I suggest the hon. member might read it and identify it; otherwise his action will give rise to a precedent—although I hasten to add that this would not be the first time that I have departed from precedent.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to read the whole table to the House. I am quite prepared to identify it.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if it would expedite the business of the House—we are concerned about this bill because it has been outstanding a long time—perhaps the hon. member could read one line from the table and, having identified it, say that the rest of the table covers others sizes.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be highly advisable to follow the hon. member's suggestion. Perhaps we ought to have an indication of what the table includes. I understand it is not customary in the House to table material of this nature, and if we did so we might set a precedent which would not be in line with our previous practice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It would not be out of order if the hon. member were to identify the table and read whatever he thinks is necessary from it.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to bring forward evidence to support the case that standardizing packages by itself will not be sufficient in providing the consumer with information to which he has a right. He must also have the right of being able to know. I have a table of prices taken at Shoppers City on Wednesday, February 24, 1971. The table illustrates sizes of cans of beans. The example refers to 4½-ounce, 8-ounce, 14-ounce, 19-ounce, 28-ounce and 48-ounce sizes and gives marked prices as well as unit prices for Clark's canned beans. Similarly, it illustrates marked prices and unit prices for Libby's canned baked beans.

Mr. Speaker, all per unit prices of Libby's beans are higher than Clark's, except the 28-ounce size which, significantly, is cheaper per unit than almost all other sizes. In addition, the 19-ounce size of Clark's beans, which was on special for 22 cents, or 1.16 cents per ounce, is dangerously close to the price of the 28-ounce can of Libby's beans, which is priced at 33 cents, or 1.18 cents per ounce. The combination of prices and sizes given in the example, which is part of the table that I hope will be included in Hansard, shows how difficult it is for the consumer to compare prices. The example includes only two of several different brands that are available. Surely this example is a prime candidate for unit prices.

As I said earlier, we do not ask nor suggest—neither does the amendment suggest that the minister would have to immediately go out and require by regulation that every retailer put the unit price on every product on his shelves. Of course he would not do that. In fact, if this provision were in the legislation it would be up to the minister to decide whether to use it. If he did decide to use it in the case of even one product, he would do this in consultation and with the consent of the manufacturer or producer of that product. This would be done for no other reason than to determine whether it would improve the sale of that product, whether it was of use to the consumer and, more important, whether it was constitutional.

I believed the minister, as did the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, when he stated to the committee that he was as much in favour and sympathy with unit prices as anyone else. I accepted and believed that. He may think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was using rhetoric. He may think I am also doing that. I do not care. It is about time the minister started acting instead of just talking. If unit prices are unconstitutional, then this whole damn piece of legislation is unconstitutional. Under the definition of "dealer" retailers are included. They are totally under provincial jurisdiction. To suggest that the minister can order an inspection of retailers' labels and packages, have jurisdiction over them and not be able to inspect them for unit prices just does not wash.

In his remarks the minister quoted Professor Ziegel as an authority. Surely we can safely assume that Professor Ziegel is also an authority on prices, whether at the manufacturer, wholesaler or retail level. I wish to quote from Professor Ziegel's letter of February 12. The minister has a copy of it. I quote as follows:

> In giving evidence before your committee on January 14th last, the Honourable Ron Basford left the impression that the federal government lacks the constitutional power to impose unit pricing at the retail level.

He continues:

> While I can see the significance of the difference in the context of anti-combines legislation I have some difficulty in following the distinction from the constitutional point of view.

Later in his letter he says:

> It might be relevant if the federal government sought to rest its jurisdiction on the trade and commerce power in section 91(2) of the B.N.A. Act but, to the best of my knowledge, the distinction has never been applied with respect to the exercise of the criminal law power under section 91(27) or the weights and measures power. In any event, the minister is mistaken in suggesting that Bill C-180 only applies to manufacturers and wholesalers since the bill applies to a "dealer" and dealer is defined in section 2(d) as including a person who is a retailer.

We contend that the minister's worries about the constitutional aspects of this amendment are unjustified and unfounded. They have been refuted by constitutional and legal experts who have a reputation in this field. I do not pretend to have such a reputation. I quote the experts in support of my request to the minister to accept this amendment.

The hon. member for Wellington was worried about the manufacturers, processors, wholesalers and retailers who would have a lot of work and trouble marking packages. I accept the hon. member's genuine concern about the problems that a manufacturer, processor and, particularly, a retailer might have if it were necessary to mark every package. However, as I said at the outset, the amendment does not ask, nor do we suggest that every product be amenable to unit pricing, nor is it necessary to have unit pricing on every package. I wish the hon. member for Wellington would quit having such unfounded worries about the wholesaler and retailer and would worry more about the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: If it can be shown to be profitable to put unit prices on selected products, which the minister can insist on under the regulations of this bill, the wholesalers and retailers will do it. They will do it if it is profitable or if it makes the consumer feel more kindly toward them. Retailers have to mark every product that now goes on their shelves. All they would need is a little larger rubber stamp. They already spend many hours during the night marking every package and can that goes on the shelves. To suggest that it would be impossible to mark the unit price on each package or can on the shelves just does not wash.

Some products lend themselves to unit prices, some do not. In consultation with the manufacturers, the minister and his officials could select those products which are amenable to unit pricing. The constitutional argument is not credible. Those who want to act like Arab sheiks in their own little province or region say it is unconstitutional or constitutes interference. Many other aspects of this bill could in fact fall into the same category.

One of the minister's colleagues said in committee that he would like to argue with the minister about the constitutionality of the bill. Under the provisions of the BNA Act the minister can accept this amendment. At his discretion, with the Governor in Council he could select products that were able to be unit priced in order to give the consumer the right to know the value per ounce or pound that he is getting for his money. Whether it be canned peas, ketchup or anything else, once containers are standardized, proliferation is prevented and there is uniformity of the number of ounces or other form of measurement for a container, prices can still be used to deceive. Commodities can be priced at two for 79 cents, four for 86 cents or any other screwball amount that a retailer or advertiser may choose in order to persuade people to buy a product, not because of value per ounce but because they give the impression that they represent greater value per ounce or pound.

There was a great deal of discussion in the committee and since about the validity of attempting this in this bill. I believe the minister would like to have this provision in this bill and use it on occasion. The minister seems to profess that what his department is doing leads all countries of the world. If he really means that, he will accept this amendment; he will try it with one or more products that he, his officials, the manufacturers—and processors have discussed and agreed upon as test cases.

If the minister continues to suggest that if he accepts the amendment and the courts throw it out, this would throw out all his legislation, he should have thought twice about bringing in this legislation in the first place. I do not believe this is the case. The minister should want to find out. If he does not want to find out, it is time he changed his mind, because I cannot follow the logic of his argument.

If this amendment is accepted by the government, and the courts after the test case throw it out, it seems to me the minister has lost no ground; he has the rest of the legislation to use for the benefit of consumers. If the courts throw out the whole bill on constitutional grounds, the minister cannot expect anyone in the House to believe that this one, little amendment would make the bill unconstitutional. Even an ignorant Prairie boy like me, who has spent most of his life jumping through the stubble is not going to believe that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is just a poor, ignorant Prairie boy! Let him go on.

An hon. Member: Jumping over the stubble.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? All those in favor will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members : Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the motion No. 2 stands deferred.

The next motion for the House to consider is motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) as follows:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale and importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by adding immediately after clause (9) the following:

"10. No dealer shall sell, import or advertise any product that has not been stored or maintained in accordance with the labels required pursuant to subparagraph (iv) of section 11."

Mrs. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw to your attention the fact that I believe you read the wrong amendment? We have two amendments, the first one and then the second one which you read. I do not know whether the House would wish to take the two together or not.

Mr. McGrath: On the point of order, it seems to me that amendment No. 3 is automatically ruled out by the fact that amendment No. 2 was negatived upon division. It is a consequential amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But amendment No. 2 has not yet been voted upon.

Mr. McGrath: I apologize. We have not voted upon amendment No. 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The division on amendment No. 2 was deferred under the appropriate Standing Order. I apologize to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway; I did not follow her point of order.

Mrs. MacInnis: I wanted to draw attention to the fact that Your Honour read the wrong amendment. The amendment which should now be discussed is as follows:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by adding immediately after subparagraph (ii) of subclause (b) of clause 10 the following—

That is amendment No. 4.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member suggesting that the amendment now before the House should be deferred for consideration later? My understanding is that the amendment the House now has under consideration would logically follow the amendment the vote on which was just deferred and would come before the one mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Basford: Your Honour, it appears to me that these two amendments are closely related. Perhaps the House would agree to deal with both of them together.

Mrs. MacInnis: Would it be in accordance with the wish of the House that we discuss the two amendments together? They stand or fall together. It would save a good deal of time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the House is agreeable, amendments Nos. 3 and 4 will be debated together, and if a vote is required the two amendments will be voted on in the one vote. Is that the understanding?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the first amendment is to empower the minister to require that the conditions of storage and maintenance of certain products be printed on the package along with the dates upon which they might not be sold for consumption or should not be used. The purpose of the second amendment is to prohibit dealers from not following the instructions the minister has required to be placed on the labels. The basic argument for doing this is obvious. Many stores do not enjoy good inventory management, so some products remain on the shelves beyond their useful or safe life. Perishable products come into this category, and I understand that certain photographic products have a limited useful life.

This provision is to make sure that the consumer has the right to receive certain goods in proper condition. We heard a lot of evidence on this aspect in committee. I was particularly impressed by the evidence given in connection with frozen foods. You can buy frozen foods in a store. We were told by some of the manufacturers that although there are regulations making them keep the temperature at a certain figure, there is nothing to compel retail establishments to ensure that safe temperatures are maintained.

Many housewives have not much notion of what temperatures they should maintain when they get frozen articles home; they do not know whether they should keep them in the freezer compartment of the refrigerator or whether it is sufficient to keep them in the ordinary compartments. We think it is important that when frozen or perishable foods reach the store the consumer knows that they have been kept at safe temperatures and that they have been stored in the proper manner.

Some time ago, the minister will remember, there was an incident in Vancouver involving frozen chickens. There was every evidence that these chickens had been allowed to thaw out in the store and had then been refrozen. This is a very dangerous practice, quite apart from the aesthetic value of the product when you buy it, and housewives are justified in their concern.

We feel that regulations should be passed providing that there be printed on the product the date beyond which the product should not be sold, as well as showing at what temperature the product should be stored in order to keep it in good condition. We were told by one consumers' association representative from the province of Quebec that certain seals that change colour when temperature is lowered beyond the safe point can be affixed to such products.

I know the minister is of the view that the amendment he made in committee looks after this matter. The minister added the word "age" to clause 10 (b)(iii) in the belief that this looked after the problem. However, in our view it does no such thing. As the bill now stands, even though a product had been in a store longer than the date on the package, a dealer could still sell it in spite of the provision in clause 10 (b)(iii). I suggest what we need is not tokenism of this kind but genuine protection.

I have no desire to make a long speech on this amendment. May I simply say that my colleague from Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) brought to the attention of the committee the fact that in Manitoba consumers are greatly concerned about this problem, as they are in British Columbia. In a day when so many foodstuffs are perishable we feel it is very important they should bear some sort of expiry date beyond which they should not be sold. Of course, if they were stamped with the date they were sent from the factory, everybody would rush to buy the freshest product, which would mean the other products in stock would not be sold. But so long as our consumers know that the product is within the expiry date on the package they will have no worries of this kind.

Some members of the official opposition said that they thought this sort of thing was overprotecting the consumer. I do not believe that is so. I believe the consumer has the right to know the exact state and condition of the goods she purchases from the store. She has the right to know that it has been stored in a proper manner, and she has the right to be told how to store it at home until the decides to serve the product to her family. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest we accept both of these amendments.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has said what I wanted to say, but I disagree with her conclusions. I think the question of age labelling and date stamping of perishable foodstuffs is an important one, but in my view it is already covered by clause 10 of the bill as originally drawn. However, in order to put to rest any difficulty in interpretation that there may have been, as a result of representations from the province of Manitoba that age dating and date coding be covered in the bill we moved an amendment in the committee to clause 10. The pertinent part of the clause reads as follows:

> Each label containing a declaration of net quantity of the prepackaged product to which it is applied shall . . .
> (b) in such form and manner and in such circumstances as may be prescribed show . . .

(iii) such information respecting the nature, quality, age, size, material content, composition, geographic origin, performance, use or method of manufacture or production of the prepackaged product as may be prescribed.

It is my view that whatever is properly required to be done in line with the suggestions that have been made about date stamping, age stamping, care labelling and storage labelling, if it is within the purview of this act, can be done in accordance with clause 10 (b)(iii) which refers to the nature of the goods, the quality of the goods, the age of the goods, the material content, performance, use or method of manufacture or production. In my view this covers completely and adequately all information that is required to be on the label and which would be useful to consumers in relation to age or care of the product.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was agreed that motions Nos. 3 and 4 would be debated together. Perhaps for the record the Chair should put motion No. 4 which I neglected to do at the time of the agreement. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) moves motion No. 4:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by adding immediately after sub-paragraph (iii) of sub-clause (b) of clause 10 the following:

"(iv) the date beyond which the prepackaged product should not be used or may not be sold for consumption and such information respecting the conditions required for storage and maintenance, including temperature, as may be prescribed."

It is the understanding of the Chair that it was agreed that motions Nos. 3 and 4 would be put together on the one vote and that motion No. 4 would follow motion No. 3 as to the result. If that is the understanding, I will put the question to the House. All those in favour of motion No. 3 will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75 (11), a recorded division on motions Nos. 3 and 4 stands deferred.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre) moved:

That Bill C-180, an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by adding immediately after sub-clause 2 of clause 11 the following:

"(3) Where the Governor in Council is of the opinion that the quantity of product in a container is an amount, by virtue of it be a fractional quantity or an odd number or any other reason, that is likely to contribute to the deception of the consumer as to the value of the product, the Governor in Council may on the recommendation of the minister make regulations respecting the quantity of product that may be placed in a container."

He said: Mr. Speaker, whether or not the minister has a change of heart and decides, even though he may be alone on his side, to support motion No. 2, it seems to me that motion No. 5 is a useful and necessary one. The purpose of the amendment is to give the minister power to require that the quantity of a product in a container be a simple amount, so that simple people like me in a shopping centre can readily compute the cost of an ounce. The number of ounces should be readily divisible by the price, the price by the ounces, or whatever the measure is. As the bill now stands, the minister may limit the number of different sized containers the industry uses for a similar product but he cannot specify the exact size of the containers or the quantity the containers may contain.

As a result, toothpaste manufacturers—this is probably the most horrendous example—can have three sizes, small, medium and large. They can have small, regular or family sizes. But I defy the minister or anybody else to figure out what these sizes mean. In conformity with the measure before us, these companies will be allowed to sell containers containing amounts such as $2\frac{3}{8}$ grams or ounces, 5-3/18 grams or ounces or 9-7/32 grams or ounces. As long as manufacturers use the same sized tubes they will satisfy the provisions of the bill. If the minister allows small, regular, family, giant, large or economy—whatever handles the manufacturers put on them—as standard sizes, the manufacturers will put screwball amounts in them and not even consumers of the highest intellect will be able to stand in front of a shelf and decide what is the best value per ounce or gram, per tube or anything else.

All we are suggesting in this amendment is that in addition to the authority the minister will have under the bill to prevent proliferation of size, the kinds of containers or the advertising that is put on labels, such as giant, economy, new, or new-new—it would not matter if it were New Democratic if they used the term in that sense —he shall have authority to specify quantities, in the various numbers and sizes of containers, which are easily divisible by the price, or vice versa.

According to some witnesses who appeared before the committee there is technical constraint on the number of products and the amounts that may go into a package. Witnesses on behalf of the manufacturers and others suggested this is the fact. They suggested that one would have to turn the spigot off a little sooner or a little later in order to get a measurable amount of product into a package or container. I cannot conceive of one product that could not be put into a package or container in an amount that would suit the best interests of the consumer, although perhaps not the best interest of the manufacturer or packager.

Surely there is no other reason for these screwball sizes, weights and measures of products in containers and packages than to deceive the consumer. When the minister indicates that he does not want authority in the legislation to prevent this happening, he negates some of the fine purposes and objectives he outlined in the committee and again today. This type of thing undoubtedly results in manufacturers smuggling price increases through by reducing the quantity by imperceptible amounts. In this way they make it impossible for the consumer to determine the value that he is getting for his money. Surely the minister, before anyone in this House, would want to put a stop to this practice. The committee dealt with this matter and we tried as hard as we could to persuade the minister. He sounded encouraging for a while.

For a few minutes let me review some of the things stated at the committee hearings. We made the point in our efforts to persuade the minister that provision should be made for unit pricing. We all recognized that even if we had unit pricing it could not be applied to all products. No one suggests that this could be done. Many products, packages and containers are not suitable for this kind of action. In order to take care of products and packages not suitable for unit pricing, we submitted then, as we submit now, that the minister should be given authority in the bill to regulate the amounts which go into containers and packages. I have in mind amounts that are comprehensible and easily divided into or by the price. The minister requires this kind of amendment in conjunction with unit pricing. There is nothing mandatory in the amendment; it leaves the minister with discretion to make such regulations.

I fully expect that the minister will meet with consumer and manufacturing associations as well as the producers and packagers of various products. In the majority of cases I suspect that they would agree upon the products which the minister should proclaim as being subject to regulation through the Governor in Council. With this kind of authority the minister does not need to use a big stick; he would receive that co-operation and help which is long overdue.

The president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, when testifying before the committee had the unmitigated gall to tell the minister to his face that his association had infinitely more knowledge of what the consumer wants than the minister, his government or Parliament. That suggestion, if nothing else, should have obtained some reaction from the minister. I was going to suggest it should have raised the hair on the back of his neck, but I will forget about that suggestion and forget about it as it applies to me. This is the kind of arrogant attitude taken by the manufacturers who place their products in packages and tubes in cornball amounts. For this reason it seems to me that the minister should almost be on his knees begging his colleagues to accept this amendment.

I have tried to be lighthearted in the way I have presented my argument, but I am not lighthearted in the seriousness with which I approach it. We cannot see anything in the present legislation which would allow the minister to prevent the kind of things that happen in respect of tubes of toothpaste, breakfast cereals, detergents and other goods. It seems peculiar to us that when one is buying Kellogg's Rice Crispies the three sizes contain 9 ounces, 13 ounces or 17 ounces. It is very strange that each size is one ounce more than half a pound, three-quarters of a pound and one pound. Can this be for any other reason than to deceive the consumer? Is it for no other reason than to make it almost impossible for Mrs. Jane Consumer to divide the number of ounces into the price and arrive at the value per ounce? There can be no reason for these quantities being put into packages other than to deceive and mislead.

Surely the minister most of all, if he wants to put his action where his mouth is, will want to accept this amendment. I know he has reiterated the constitutional argument put up in the committee. Surely that argument has been shot down in flames long before this. I ask the minister to reconsider this question and accept the amendment, if for no other reason than to jar some of the bureaucrats, particularly in the Department of Justice or a better reason to try to co-operate and consult with the consumers and manufacturers in respect of putting on the shelves of stores packages containing quantities which are comprehensible to Mrs. Jane Consumer.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, this really is the same discussion we had a little while ago on motion No. 2 in respect to adding a new clause 4. The same considerations and arguments apply to motion No. 5 as apply to motion No. 2. In so far as the last part of this amendment deals with the quantity in a package, it would seem to me the question of functional and non-functional slack fill, as it is called in the trade, is completely dealt with in clause 9 of the bill which provides:

> No dealer shall sell, import into Canada or advertise any prepackaged product that is packaged in a container that has been manufactured, constructed or filled, or that is displayed in such a manner that a consumer might reasonably be misled with respect to the quality or quantity of the product.

So in so far as it is a question of a huge package only partially filled with a product, and therefore deceptive because people would think that from its size they were getting a larger quantity than they are, surely that is dealt with by clause 9. In so far as the amendment deals with the unit price, it would seem to me we discussed that matter earlier tonight, and so far as it can be dealt with under this legislation it is dealt with in clause 11 which was in the bill to begin with, and in clause 12 which was introduced during the committee hearings. Therefore, it seems to me this amendment should be defeated.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, there is a case to be made for the amendment moved by my hon. friend the member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I should add, however, that in our view, as the minister has just said, this question is very clearly covered in clause 9 of the bill. We do not want to take up the time of the House in dealing with amendments which are superfluous and do nothing to improve the legislation. As the minister has said, this matter is covered very clearly in clause 9. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) may say something to contradict that and contribute new argument.

However, there is no doubt there is a case to be made for the substance of the amendment moved by the hon. member. During the course of his remarks he referred to misleading and confusing sizes and mentioned toothpaste as a very graphic example. This was illustrated in the evidence presented to the committee. He also referred to the container sizes of cereals. The evidence to support the need for regulation in this area stems from the complete confusion which exists in the minds of consumers as a consequence of the terms used in advertising products in Canada. For example, in relation to toothpaste we now have regular size, giant size, family size, super size, and so on. The same thing applies to the packaging of cereals and the packaging of detergents, just to mention two others. I am sure other examples could be brought to mind.

However, Mr. Speaker, I believe the case is very clearly covered by clause 9 and I do not think it would improve the legislation in any way if the House were to accept this amendment. Consequently, even though we support the principle, we regret we are unable to support the substance of the amendment.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, when I mentioned a few moments ago perishable products, I did not have in mind red herrings. When the minister spoke about slack fill in connection with the proposal of my colleague from Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) this is exactly what he was producing, a red herring without regard to age, temperature, storage, condition or anything else, because what my colleague had to say did not have anything to do with slack fill. He was proposing a way in which to cut down on these weird sizes. It should be just as easy to make a package which would contain 16 ounces as one which would contain 17 ounces. There would still be a problem in respect of slack fill in either case.

What my colleague is proposing is that since we now have the ordinary Canadian units of measurement and are now getting ready for the metric system, we should either produce packages in multiples of inches or ounces or get ready to produce them in units of the metric system and not produce cans of 17 ounces or 19 ounces. I believe the case for the amendment has been made. I think the consumers' association is very much aware of the need for having standard packages without the use of fractional weights.

I should like to conclude tonight by referring to a letter from a correspondent in Vanier City. I believe my colleague from Regina-Lake Centre mentioned the need to consider the problems and ideas of Jane Canuck. I realize that Jane Canuck is not in this House tonight in the numbers she should be. However, I have this letter from one Jane Canuck in Vanier City and I think it might help the minister understand what my colleague has in mind in respect of his amendment if I read it. She says:

> One aspect that dœsn't seem to have been touched on is the matter of convenience. When following a recipe that calls for one standard pound of a food, it's a bit unnerving to find that your container has only 12 or 14 ozs. To make up the difference you would have to buy a second one, or alter every other ingredient (for instance, 12/16—or 3/4 of an egg!). I'm sure you get the picture!

We have heard from some members of the official opposition about the convenience of manufacturers. We have heard about the marketplace and that these things would be done by the dealers in the marketplace if they found it profitable to do so. But I believe my friend from Vanier City is correct and that there has not been too much said about the convenience or even the sanity of the consumer in trying to decipher these odd sizes. This lady baked a cake and presumably found that when the recipe called for a standard pound of some ingredient she had a package that contained only 12 ounces or 14 ounces of the ingredient. So she did not know whether she should get a second full pound package or try to divide the egg or whatever else was called for.

I think it is time we began to consider our legislation from the standpoint of the convenience of the consumer who has to go out to the market, buy the products, bring them home, store them and prepare them for the family. The sooner we get a few more Jane Canucks in the House, the sooner we shall get a little more intelligence on the part of John Canucks who have not had to wrestle with these problems.

The amendment of my colleague arises directly from the situation that this woman in Vanier City is envisaging. We should stop our traditional thinking as to whether or not it will be handy for the manufacturers to make alterations. We should start thinking about the needs of consumers. The consumers of this country have just begun to find their voice. It is a little timid and squeaky as yet, but we can encourage the minister to speak up more strongly for their needs. He has made a pretty fair start, but he is timorous and he needs encouragement. Let him take another look at this amendment, which is really an excellent one and would do much to help the consumer recognize deceptive packaging when she sees it.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief comment on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I think that perhaps the political environment in which he lives brings into suspicion everything that is done by manufacturers and makes him suspect that it is done with malice aforethought; that these odd numbers of ounces in cornflakes, for example, such as 9, 13 and 17, are there to confuse and confound the housewife so that unfair advantage can be taken of her in some mysterious way.

I do not think it is anything as malicious as that. I think it is probably just a tradition. It may be that the original Mr. Kellogg who invented cornflakes was a baker, and to be generous he threw in an extra ounce with every half-pound, three-quarter pound and pound of cornflakes, the same as it had been their tradition to throw in an extra bun with a dozen to make it a baker's dozen. Nevertheless, I think it is reasonable that container sizes should be not only in round figures, eliminating fractions, but that amounts should be easily divisible by two, three and five. Therefore, I think that the amendment of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has some merit.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I wonder if the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) would answer a question. I was interested in the hon. member's suggestion that the baker's dozen prevails in the case of Kellogg's cornflakes. I was in Prince Edward Island a year ago and I am wondering if the same thing would apply to Malpeque oysters which one buys in Charlottetown.

Mr. MacLean: Yes, I think it would, in the case of the hon. member.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, there are many commendable features in this amendment, but I think the minister summed it up very well when he said that clause 9 takes good care of this point. For that reason I would not support the amendment. But I would like to refute some things that have been said tonight. I think that my good friends to the left are overlooking one thing. I would like them to think about the fact that by stopping the abuses, a very small number of them, we may kill the free market. I think it would be a sad situation if the free market were killed by our introducing legislation just to take care of a few abuses. My friend, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), wants to standardize packages in his amendment.

Mr. Benjamin: No quantities.

Mr. Hales: Yes, quantities and packages. If you want to do this, the manufacturer and the processor will tell you, as they told us in committee that you must be prepared to pay more for the product. So this piece of legislation will cost Mrs. Consumer more money all along the line. I put the following question to every processor that appeared before the committee: If you bring in a standardized package and you do what the legislation calls for, will it cost the consumer more money? In every case the answer was yes. So with all the window-dressing and great noise about this legislation, it will cost Mrs. Consumer more money; there is no doubt about it.

Let us say that a box is 8½ inches by 2¾ inches by 12½ inches. That is a standard box. Let us say that you put cornflakes in one box, grape nuts in another and puffed wheat in the third. You will then have 16 ounces of cornflakes, 3 pounds 15 ounces of grape nuts and 9 ounces of puffed wheat. So you will have a greater proliferation of fractional weights than we have now. If you put 12 ounces of each of these products in a package you will have three sizes of boxes, one that will be very small, another medium and the third a tall one. So the density of the product which goes into a standard box creates a real problem and a proliferation of odd ounces. It will add to the cost, because when a cereal manufacturer has a packaging machine which can run three boxes through, the small, the medium and the large, and he runs the cornflakes through, this is one operation; but if you want the boxes to be standardized, as this amendment proposes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—BANKRUPTCY—MEASURES TO FORESTALL FURTHER BUSINESS FAILURES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on February 3, which now seems a long time ago, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) about the very depressing statistics released by Dun and Bradstreet a short time earlier. The Canadian Press, in the Journal Pioneer of January 30, set out in some detail the further chapter in what is becoming a familiar economic threnody in this country. It reads as follows:

MANY BUSINESSES FAIL

More than 2,200 businesses failed in Canada during 1970 compared with 1,861 the year before, a recent survey shows.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Dun and Bradstreet of Canada Ltd., Toronto, said Quebec led with 1,155 failures compared with 944 a year earlier.

Liabilities totalled $264,894,000 compared with $145,701,000 in 1969.

In Ontario, there were 797 failures compared with 618 a year earlier.

On these dismal and dreary statistics there seems to be no device whereby seasonal adjustment can be integrated. It is sad to relate that so many visionary aspects of the once proudly hailed just society emerged as dreary, dark realities. With an unemployment rate growing to painful and disgraceful proportions we have a blighting of economic opportunities for our young people in and out of university. Further takeovers of Canadian businesses both at home and abroad, now that Guyana has closed in on one of our important business establishments without much more than a slight flickering eyebrow from the Canadian government, are situations which should cause us concern.

Slump, decline, pessimism are too often the hallmarks of our present economic state. Not surprising then, sir, that cold, hard statistics like those just quoted give the dimensions of the economic mess created by a government whose judgment on fiscal matters has been proven profoundly wrong and painfully inadequate. I invite the parliamentary secretary or whoever will be responding to me to reflect carefully, coldly and thoughtfully upon these statistics which I regard, and which most thoughtful economists and businessmen regard, as yet another indicator that all is not well in this land.

More than that, I ask him and the party now in power to use what influence he and they have upon the government to re-think, to readjust and sensibly and sensitively to react to the many warnings of greater ills yet to come, and may we not wait until we have upon us a depression rather than a recession before the government shows some awareness of the fact that all is not well in this land, in economic terms.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, business failures occur for many reasons. Markets sometimes do not grow in accordance with expectations. Costs sometimes rise at a time when prices cannot be raised sufficiently to cover the increased costs. Loss of sales due to industrial disputes can result in serious difficulties for the businessman; and 1970 was, of course, marked by a series of such disputes across the country. Also, at times of high interest rates and limited liquidity in the economy, the difficulty of financing liabilities and the high cost of carrying large inventories when sales slow down can result in business failure. All these considerations were important in 1970.

The government has neither been unaware of nor unsympathetic to these problems. The measures taken by the government since last March have been frequently catalogued in this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Particularly important factors in this regard were the growth of the money supply at a much increased rate in the second quarter, and the easing of interest rates. By midsummer the availability and cost of finance were improving for the businessman.

An analysis of the month by month trend in failures shows that the greater part of the increase over 1969 in business failures occurred between February and July. The picture changed sharply in the third quarter, and it is interesting to note that the number of failures began to fall in the third quarter at a time when they usually begin a seasonal increase.

GRAIN—ALLEGED SLOWDOWN IN MOVEMENT TO VANCOUVER BECAUSE OF LABOUR PROBLEMS—ADVANCE NOTICE OF GRADES REQUIRED

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on February 22 I directed the following question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey):

> In view of the observation made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday on the program "Question Period" to the effect that there was some slowdown in the movement of grain to Vancouver during the period when a couple of sporadic labour problems led to difficulties, can the minister inform the House where the slowdowns occurred and for how long the flow of grain was slowed down?

At that time the Minister of Labour said he could not answer the question because he had not had notice of it. I then directed a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who is in charge of the Wheat Board, as follows:

> In view of the fact that grain movement to Vancouver was slowed down for only two days, can the minister inform the House how much advance notice is required to meet our commitments for specific grades of grain bound for export?

The minister said that he must have missed something at the beginning of the question and wanted me to repeat it, but Mr. Speaker said, "Order, please". Following that I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on February 25, 1971, following question as reported at page 51 of report No. 2:

> It was suggested that there had been some type of slowdown and tie-up and that the railroads had contributed to this situation. Have you had any contact with the railroads, both the CN and the CP, as to any tie-up in the movement of cars—any appreciable tie-up for the movement of grain to the coast?

The Minister of Transport answered in part:

> No. Indeed, in recent months the general reporting has been what I would describe as fairly satisfactory.

A little further on I asked:

> Would it follow that possibly the Wheat Board themselves did not have the right type of grain out there?

I meant the coast.

> If you are suggesting that there was no tie-up in the pipeline in the movement of grain to the coast, then there must be some reason behind it all if this grain was not available. I am pleased to hear at least that there is no tie-up so far as the rail operation is concerned.

The minister replied:

> Nothing untoward of which I am aware other than the normal kind of problem which exists perenially—a shortage of cars at certain locations.

I am glad to see the minister in charge of the Wheat Board here this evening to answer our questions. The most important question to be answered is: How much advance notice is required if we are to meet our commitments for specific grades of grain bound for export? If ships were delayed one month, as the minister suggested in the House, the Wheat Board had an extra month at least in which to place grain in position at Vancouver for export to whatever countries need it.

Of course, we can ask the minister what caused these delays over and above what he suggested on the television program. Did they result from sporadic labour disputes, from a lack of boxcars spotted at country elevators, or from mishaps between origin and destination? Could there possibly be some lack of co-operation between the Wheat Board and railway companies concerned, as well as those people who are buying the grain? Could there be lack of co-operation in placing that grain in export locations?

I suggest that if the minister wants the co-operation of all parties involved he will give in this House answers which are credible. I hope he will answer some of the questions that have been asked in this House in order that there may be that degree of co-operation which I am sure the minister wishes to receive.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that there was no chance to have the question repeated on the earlier occasion when it was asked, and I therefore could not discover what the hon. member had been talking about at that time. My problem at that time was that he had referred to a couple of days of delays. It turns out that he was referring to problems caused by landslides, and so on, which resulted in temporary difficulties.

That fact is that over the whole of the winter, from the fall onward, there were with respect to the CNR some sporadic slowdowns and labour problems which, as the Wheat Board reported to me, amounted in total to approximately one week's loss in cars arriving in Vancouver. We did not at that time make a great deal of this and I do not make much of it now, because that would involve our getting into the labour problem. That is why I talked quietly to my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). We do not, unless we feel that the crisis requires special intervention, involve my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson).

These slowdowns occurred. The hon. member asks how long it takes for grain to be brought to Vancouver when the Wheat Board knows about a ship. The Wheat Board tells me that it takes about three weeks to undertake a program of grain movement from the country to Vancouver. Of course, this is normally done well in advance of the shipping arriving, as the hon. member suggests. When ships arrive in bunches, that is a sign of peak deliveries being made. There are delays in shipping, partly because of delays in ports abroad, and this leads to congestion from time to time.

The important thing is that the February loadings out of Vancouver were at approximately record levels. It looks as though in March we will again have approximately record levels of loadings of ships. The number of ships waiting at this moment is six, with eight vessels loading. The amount of grain in store in Vancouver has again been built up. There are again signs of labour problems which give me great concern. This time the CPR is showing some signs of difficulties. I am concerned about them. This could cause a slowdown at any time.

Mr. Skoberg: Where?

Mr. Lang: This is at the yards in Vancouver. It has not yet impeded us but we are disturbed a great deal. So far it is working very well. The block system is working very well. The co-ordinators at Vancouver and Thunder Bay are also working very well. We are arriving at record levels. The ships are there in decreasing numbers every day. I should draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that our exports of grain are at levels which mean an increased flow of cash to the Prairie farmers.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

HEALTH—CYCLAMATES—COMPENSATION TO FOOD PROCESSORS FOR LOSSES CAUSED BY BAN

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my interest in this matter was initially motivated by the effect of the cyclamates ban in October, 1969, on a relatively small Canadian food packer in my constituency. This was my initial concern. I will return to this point later.

It seems that the cyclamates question and their precipitous banning brings into focus the whole question of food additives. It is not simply a question of dietary foods and the use of artificial sweeteners for diabetics and weight-watchers; it includes the use of food additives in general in our highly technological and contemporary food industry. Additives of various chemicals are being used with increasing intensity for a variety of reasons. They are used to maintain colour in meats, add flavour, preserve a fresh appearance, bleach, and a host of other reasons. All these reasons have encouraged competitive manufacturers. They have been given the green light for these additives by the Food and Drug Directorate to intensify the inclusion of additives because of the interest of the consumers for convenience foods and other kinds of foods.

The cyclamates case is typical and symbolic because in order to meet import competition from the United States processors began to employ cyclohexysulphamic salts in diet foods, canned goods, cookies, jams, jellies, etc. They have been doing this for the past 20 years. It should be pointed out that processors who used cyclamates until the announced ban in October, 1969, had fully and completely followed the government's regulations in the use of these additives. For one small industry in my constituency, the loss was in excess of $50,000 because of the ban by the minister. Multiply the cost to processors across Canada and we get an idea of the intensity of the problem, especially when the axe falls, as it did, without warning.

I wish to emphatically point out that I hold no brief for any compromise with public safety. However, the ban came about after these processors, operating under the food and drug regulations, had already completed their pack for the year. What happened to cyclamates can happen in the case of other additives. It is only a question of time as to when and where the ban will strike next.

The government was, and is, prepared to compensate swordfishermen if it is found that their catches contain dangerous amounts of mercury. What is it prepared to do for the law-abiding processors? From the indications of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), they are prepared to absolutely nothing; the processors must take the loss. We should be looking toward the day when there will be some form of compensation to soften such blows in the future. We have had cyclamates and other things banned, and undoubtedly there will be more additives condemned in the future. Hon. members may know that the United States, which started all this controversy, has now reversed its decision on the cyclamates ban. It is interesting to compare what has happened in the United States with what has not happened here in Canada.

Incidentally, it has been reported to me that an enterprising promoter in this city cleaned up $60,000 this fall, after the August 31 deadline—which the producers wanted extended—buying cyclamates at distress prices from Ottawa supermarkets and reselling them to—would you believe it—the three Ottawa hospitals. Cyclamates are still on the market, inadequately labelled, not marked as dangerous and available without prescription for anyone to buy. I have some here to prove it.

In conclusion, there are some interesting questions which we should consider. First, how are we in future to be sure that tablets, liquids and powders available as non-prescription drugs to meet the special needs of people such as diabetics will be diluted to the proper strength so as not to be dangerous. Many of those who use these preparations are old people whose eyesight is no longer good. How can we be sure they will get these preparations in the proper strength and not run the risk of taking overdoses of cyclamate?

I am sure the minister's intentions were beyond question, but he goofed. I have no hesitancy in saying he will goof again if he fails to develop a proper mechanism and policy for dealing with additives.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to comment on the proposal that the government should compensate food manufacturers for losses sustained when the use of cyclamates in food was banned, but before doing so I would like to give a short summary of the action taken by the government in regard to this matter.

The few hon. members left in the House will recall that on October 21, 1969, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) announced that while no evidence existed to suggest that the use of cyclamates caused cancer in humans, the feeding of high levels of cyclamates to rats produced bladder tumours. After consultation with his scientific advisers, the minister decided to phase out the use of cyclamates as an artificial sweetener in foods. This was achieved over a period of approximately a year. Dietetic canned fruits containing cyclamates, the last class of foods to be removed from the market, were permitted to be sold until September 1, 1970. In making this decision the minister was faced with a potential hazard to the health of the Canadian people. It was therefore necessary to take this action for the protection of the public health. I think all hon. member will agree that health considerations must take precedence over economic factors.

I should like to point out that no food manufacturer is required to use a specific food additive in this product. That decision must be made by the food manufacturer taking all factors into consideration, including the possible risk that the food additive might be subsequently considered hazardous in view of additional scientific data. The government considers this to be a normal business risk faced by any manufacturer.

In summary, the following factors must be considered. Firstly, the decision to phase-out the use of cyclamates in foods was taken to protect the Canadian public from a potential health hazard. Under such circumstances, health considerations must take precedence over economic factors. Secondly, food manufacturers were not required to use cyclamates in their products. Under these circumstances, and after careful consideration, the government has decided that the food industry cannot be compensated for losses incurred owing to the withdrawal of cyclamates from food use.

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware whether my intervention has served any useful purpose tonight, but I am under the impression that we are witnessing a complete breakdown of our parliamentary system as a result of tonight's exercise in futility, a late show which is sheer madness. I hope a stop will soon be put to this.

MANPOWER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words to the House about the steps which the government has undertaken in order to provide this summer a program of student employment and activities. Hon. members may know that the number of university and high school students released from studies this summer will number more than 1,800,000. This represents an increase of close to 100,000 over the summer of 1970. Some of these persons will be seeking jobs; many of the rest will be in search of other equally meaningful summer activities. It is in the national interest that the wishes of as many persons as possible in each category be accommodated.

Few countries in the world are able to encourage students at the secondary and post-secondary levels to assume part of the cost of their own education by means of earnings from part-time or seasonal employment. Canada is one of them. Yet even in this country the economy has not always been able to accommodate all of those who would like to work. The advantages of summer employment are so obvious, however, in terms of self-support, of broadening of outlook, of acquisition of new skills and experience, that every effort to assist on the part of governments and business is justified. There is equal justification for assistance to students who do not seek work but who are nevertheless desirous of occupying their summer vacations in an otherwise rewarding and worthwhile fashion. The talents and energies of all these young people can contribute much to Canada during the summer months if properly utilized.

However desirable the goal of summer employment for students may be, it must not be pursued in a fashion that reduces the opportunities of employment for those persons who are in or are entering the permanent Canadian labour force. Ideally, one of the results of properly designed programs of summer employment and student activity should be the avoidance of competition for permanent jobs with adults. The programs which the government proposes, and in which it needs and is seeking the co-operation of other levels of government and the private sector, have been drawn up with this in mind. They are aimed at the provision of summer jobs or summer occupations for students. Every effort is being made to avoid competition for jobs between students and permanent members of the labour force.

Such a task is a difficult one in any summer. This year, however, job opportunities will not reach their peak until the summer months while the influx into the labour market of some hundreds of thousands of students will take place during the spring months.

[Translation]

The federal government accepts its obligation, as a major employer, to provide as many temporary jobs as possible within the public service. It is also encouraging actively other employers, in both the public and private sectors, to employ students for the summer months. Both government and industry recognize at the same time another requirement, however. It is to avoid "make-work" activities which contribute little to the national wellbeing either now or in the future. Employment opportunities—whether permanent or temporary—must either contribute to present productivity or serve to upgrade our future labour force and so contribute to an increase of productivity and output in years to come.

Student Summer Employment

In addition to providing summer employment, the government will operate again this year the special Student Employment Centres which were so successful last year. These centres are operated by a staff composed almost entirely of students. More than 100 such centres will be in operation.

I have spoken so far, Mr. Speaker, of summer employment. I should like now to turn to the other portion of the federal government program, that part which assists students in non-employment activities. Some effort should be made by both government and non-governmental organizations to assist those students not wishing to work or not able to work to gain from their summer activities, be these in the form of travel, study, or voluntary occupations. The federal government will again this year encourage and facilitate youth travel and study. It will do so by providing assistance to communities that wish to organize and operate hostels, and by adding a series of roadside service kiosks to provide information and assistance to travelling students.

The government believes that there is a positive and beneficial value in travel by young Canadians. National unity is a product of national understanding and national pride. Never in our history has there been the same opportunity for mobility of young people as now exists. With or without help, young people will be travelling this summer. We should help to make their experience more worthwhile.

[English]

The government believes as well that youth is sincere in its efforts to improve society and that young people are anxious to work and to engage in activities which are intended to make Canada a better place in which to live. The government proposes therefore to encourage young persons to direct their energy, their imagination and their altruism into projects which are beneficial to the entire community. The opportunities for youth program will combine the resources of the government with the resourcefulness of youth. We are saying, in effect, to the youth of Canada that we are impressed by their desire to fight pollution; that we believe they are well motivated in their concern for the disadvantaged; that we have confidence in their value system. We are also saying that we intend to challenge them to see if they have the stamina and self-discipline to follow through on their criticism and advice.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the government expects a valuable return on the resources it will allocate this summer, and it believes that other governments, private organizations and businesses hold out the same expectation. There is work to be done; there are tasks to be performed; there are experiences to be gained. There is a whole country to be explored. There is a generation desirous of improving the world in which it finds itself. This summer will challenge us all to accomplish these ends.

The federal government proposes to spend some $57.8 million this summer in support of these activities. This sum has been allocated to nine separate categories of programs involving several departments. Rather than burden the House at this time with details of each of these programs, I have requested the responsible ministers to make the information available to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and to the leaders of the other parties. This has been done.

The total summer program is the product of close consultation with the provinces, and with the private sector. Responsibility for continued co-ordination will rest with the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier).

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the first thought that will come to the mind of anyone who examines the programs announced by the various ministers today is: What possible reason could there have been for the delay in announcing these programs? The Department of Manpower and Immigration expects that some 990,000 students will be seeking employment, or 50,000 more than last year. According to the Prime Minister's figures, there will be some 800,000 additional students who will not, for some reason, seek work. This makes a total of approximately 1,800,000 students. It is a reasonable assumption that there would be many more than 990,000 students seeking work this summer if they thought they had any chance of finding employment.

It is asserted in the statement by the minister that this program will assist as many as 500,000 students. I say as forcefully as I can that this is absurd puffery of the worst sort. There are only two programs which are in any sense new. One is called "Opportunities for Youth" and the other involves some 600 scholarships for university athletes. The other programs are simply the same as or extensions of programs in existence in previous years.

The program called "Opportunities for Youth" involves the provision of $15 million in grants to local or community organizations which between now and the proper time will produce plans and projects acceptable to the Department of the Secretary of State. Imagine producing that kind of suggestion in the middle of March to be applied this summer.

The government is trying to use catch phrases and clichés like "meaningful" to package what is really a non-program. In its Opportunities for Youth program, for example, the government has developed no program at all. Instead, in a last minute panic it has tried to dump the whole responsibility on the municipalities and local agencies. The government evidently feels it can get away with passing the buck if it passes the bucks at the same time. If one assumes that this $15 million program involves $500 per student or $1,000 per student, one can quickly calculate how many jobs are involved. In addition, there are about 2,000 jobs in the Department of National Health and Welfare, some jobs in the Public Service Commission, and 10,000 to 12,000 jobs in the reserve forces under the Department of National Defence. This is the extent of the additional employment program announced by the ministers today. The rest of the program relates to assistance for travel, a certain amount of training and that sort of thing.

In his statement the Prime Minister speaks about the importance of creating job opportunities and says that "every effort to assist on the part of governments and business is justified." He goes on to say that "there is equal justification for assistance to students who do not seek work but who are nevertheless desirous of occupying their summer vacations in an otherwise rewarding and worthwhile fashion." I would agree there is justification for assisting those students who wish to spend their time in travel, improving themselves and seeing the country. I think this is important. But I cannot agree that it is equally as important as providing job opportunities for students who need to earn money in order to remain in school or university.

It is very clear from looking at the material handed out by the Department of Manpower that it is private industry that will have to provide the great mass of jobs for students this summer as was the case last summer. It is very clear that no effective program has been announced even at this date to really encourage the expansion of employment by private industry. It is equally apparent to all of us that the main reason so many students will have such terrible difficulty obtaining employment or will fail to obtain employment this summer is the slack that exists in the economy which is the result of the government's slowing down of the economy and its glib and smug acceptance of the amount of unemployment that exists in Canada today. The prospects faced by these students this summer underline the need for more rapid expansion in the economy not only for the benefit of students but for all youth and all unemployed. The government has neglected its responsibilities and added to this neglect by delaying even this announcement until the middle of March.

I conclude my few remarks by reading what the Prime Minister said to the students in the course of his remarks:

> There is work to be done; there are tasks to be performed; there are experiences to be gained. There is a whole country to be explored. There is a generation desirous of improving the world in which it finds itself.

I simply ask the government, why does it not give the kids a chance to do it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister comes into the House today and makes a statement. Arrangements have already been made for a group of four or five cabinet ministers to flesh out the supposed details later this afternoon in a press conference. I hope that the members of the press who attend that conference and the public outside this chamber will keep in mind that the 990,000 students who the Minister of Manpower and Immigration says will be looking for work this summer will be joining the more than 700,000 people who are looking for work at the present time, and that a very large percentage of these people are looking for work because of the policy of slowing down the economy deliberately adopted by this government a year and a half ago.

Student Summer Employment

What does the Prime Minister say? He says that the government will provide $15 million for employment programs for students, which is a very good objective. He says that the money will be provided to between 4,000 and 5,000 voluntary organizations which are asked today, on March 16, to come forward with ideas to put students to work, not make-work programs but programs that will provide useful work. In five weeks a very large number of university students will be finishing their university terms and a month later high school students will be entering the job market. These voluntary organizations have been given between five and eight weeks to develop meaningful projects. Nothing could be more ridiculous than to expect that really useful projects will be developed in that time. I am not critical of the voluntary organizations nor am I critical of the students who will be hired, but I say to the Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State that when this summer is over we will find that a good deal of the money went for the same kind of useless projects which we saw operated by the Company of Young Canadians, and the blame will not rest with the voluntary organizations nor the students but with the government.

Why did the government have to wait until March to announce this program? They knew what happened last year. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said in his statement that 940,000 students were looking for work last year and there will be 50,000 more this year. We know from the figures which the minister gave us at the end of last year that 50 per cent of the students who looked for work last year did not get work for more than half the time for which they were available for work. Surely the government should have started last September to work out the kind of programs which they have announced today.

The Prime Minister said there had been close consultation with the provinces. I know of one province at least where the first official announcement to the province of this program was in a telephone call to the premier last week. If that is close co-operation, I do not know what co-operation means. So I say that to a large extent the employment program will be meaningless.

I want to deal now with the travel program which is divided into two parts. The first is the hostel program. That is a very useful program because a large number of students who cannot get work will be moving across the country. We see more of this every year, and it is good for the federal government and the provinces to co-operate in providing facilities where these students can stay in the cities they visit. I approve of that.

I want to say something about the other part of the program, the $3,750,000 which is being provided for young people with respect to two projects in Canada and two projects overseas. I am all in favour of students having the opportunity to broaden their experience, but what kind of students are going to be able to spend a substantial part of the summer travelling, partly at their own expense and partly at the expense of the government of Canada, the people of Canada? The students who can avail themselves of that kind of program are those who come from middle and upper income families. They are students who do not have to worry about getting a job and earning some money this summer so they can go back to school or university in September. I object to a program which is primarily designed to subsidize those who already have the most in this country.

Having been so critical of what the Prime Minister has announced today, following the quick study I have been able to make of the announcement I want to commend the government and the Department of National Health and Welfare for the programs which will come under that department. The program to involve 700 students in the study of drug abuse seems to me to be an extremely useful one. Another useful program is that which provides clinics for training athletic coaches. For too long Canada has lagged in its ability to produce athletes of a high calibre. Projects of this kind should be commended.

The whole idea of doing something for students this summer is one which every member of the House can support, but I want to close by again saying that in my view the bulk of the value which could have been obtained from this kind of program will be lost because the government waited until the middle of March to announce it instead of making plans and announcing them to the provinces, the cities and the voluntary agencies last September or October.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister has just said that 1,800,000 students will enter the labour market during the summer months.

I feel that the action taken by the government at the present time is nothing but a poultice on a wooden leg. It will not solve the problem.

Our young people, who constitute our Canadian population of tomorrow to use the right hon. Prime Minister's words, expect something more. Already late in 1971 for settling the problems facing our students, the government merely states that it will create 500,000 peacetime jobs for our young people, while 1,300,000 of them will be left in the cold.

If a world war broke out tomorrow morning, all students would find jobs immediately because they would be called up, we would clothe them, house them, feed them and pay them. The $57,800,000 would not even be mentioned. That is what staggers me. In wartime, on the pretext of saving civilization, millions are not taken into account, the government spends money. However, in peacetime, to help the young adapt to our society, the government talks about $57 million. It mocks the people, to their faces. That is what the present program boils down to.

We shall not oppose, of course, the assistance that may be granted to students during the summer months. However, we feel that a long-term program is required. We suggest the payment of an advance salary to students, which would enable them to adapt to society and prepare their future in Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT AUTHORITY FOR ACQUISITION OF CONTROLLING INTEREST IN HOME OIL COMPANY—RETENTION OF CONTROL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the government's acquisition of a controlling interest in Cygnus Corporation and thereby in Home Oil Company. Does the government intend to introduce legislation with regard to the acquisition of these shares or does the government consider it now has the necessary authority to acquire the shares and, if so, would the Prime Minister indicate what that authority is?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced to the House the other day what I can only repeat now, namely, that the negotiations have been undertaken. There is nothing new to report since the minister spoke to the House, I believe last Friday, and we do not think it is in the public interest now to say in which way this acquisition will proceed, if indeed it does proceed.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister to indicate for the information of the House and the people of the country whether the government feels it has the necessary legal authority at the present time to make this acquisition and, if so, what the authority is, or whether the government intends to introduce legislation? I respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister, Sir, that there is no conceivable reason in the public interest why he cannot give that information to the House, if he has it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the question has to do with this particular transaction my answer can only be the previous one, but if the Leader of the Opposition is asking me for some kind of opinion on whether the government of Canada, by contract, can purchase something, the answer is that it can, but subject as always to the appropriation of the money by this House or to what other procedure is needed, either legislation or estimates. The government of Canada is not prohibited by law from buying an interest in this kind of company, if this is what the Leader of the Opposition is asking. If such an undertaking is proceeded with, of course we will have to come to the House in one way or another for funds to proceed with such appropriation.

Mr. Stanfield: I thank the Prime Minister for indicating to the House that if this transaction is completed the government will be coming to the House for the necessary authorization, at least in terms of money. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to retain the controlling interest in the company if it completes the transaction or whether it intends to resell under terms which would ensure the retention of control in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: You will recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the question as asked is hypothetical. The Leader of the Opposition is asking me to state what the government would do if this deal were proceeded with. At this time there is nothing in the direction of a concluded deal on which I can report to the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am simply trying to find out what the policy of the government is but there apparently isn't one.

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question related to one asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. Is it the view of the government that the government of Canada can acquire a corporation for purposes other than those specifically assigned to it in the constitution?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member realizes that the question he has asked is defective in at least two ways. He is asking, according to my way of thinking, for a legal opinion. In the second place, he is inviting the government to express an opinion. On both grounds the question is out of order. Nevertheless, if the hon. member thinks his question can be phrased in some way which would make it acceptable from a procedural standpoint he might attempt to do it now.

Mr. Baldwin: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I was following the line taken by my hon. friend. I will put it this way: can the government acquire corporations for purposes other than those specifically assigned to it under the constitution?

Mr. Trudeau: That is obviously a request for a legal opinion. In order to give advice on that I would have to know whether the hon. member has in mind acquisition by way of expropriation or acquisition by way of voluntary purchase.

ALLEGED INCONSISTENCY OF GOVERNMENT ACTIONS RESPECTING DENISON MINES AND HOME OIL

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman could explain briefly to the House why the government is proceeding to purchase share control of Home Oil Company when in the case of Denison it simply passed legislation prohibiting the sale to foreign ownership? Is there a specific reason for this change?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The distinction has been made on several occasions both in and out of this House and again by myself yesterday, Mr. Speaker. Under the British North America Act the government has jurisdiction over the uranium industry but it does not have the equivalent type of jurisdiction over other resources such as the petroleum industry, and that is one of the reasons why we are acting in this way.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in view of the answer he has just given and in view of the answer he gave to me yesterday on this question when, as found at page 4245 of Hansard, he said:

> In the case of uranium, the federal government had jurisdiction under the constitution to intervene directly.

Was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources expressing the view of the government on September 18 when he said in the second paragraph of his press release headed "Control of Foreign Ownership of Canadian Uranium Properties and Facilities":

> It was proposed, the minister said, to bring into force regulations under the Atomic Energy Control Act for the carrying out of government policy with respect to the control of foreign ownership of Canadian uranium properties and facilities, but legal counsel now advise that some of the provisions which will be required by government will necessitate legislation rather than regulations. Accordingly, the government is preparing legislation to be introduced to Parliament during the forthcoming session, but it will take some additional time—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member is coming to the question. I realize he is inviting an opinion from the right hon. Prime Minister as to whether a statement made is government policy, but the statement quoted by the hon. member should not be too long. I hope he will come to the question soon.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I had finished my quotation. My question to the Prime Minister is: He said one thing yesterday, that the government had jurisdiction, and the minister on September 18 said the government thought it had but found it did not have the jurisdiction it needed and therefore must pass legislation, which legislation has not been presented to the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had the floor for quite some time. The question period is only 40 minutes long. We will be running short of time.

Mr. Hees: My question is, how does the Prime Minister reconcile these two completely opposite points of view?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is very simple, and I think what the minister said confirms what I said. If the government intends to pass legislation it is quite obvious that the government considers it has jurisdiction, and that is exactly what I said. The federal government has jurisdiction over this area and that is why we will be in a position to present legislation to the House. If we did not have jurisdiction we would not be able to present legislation. It would be presented in some provincial House.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings for one brief supplementary, but in fairness to other members we have to go on to other questions. We have spent more than ten minutes on the first question and in my view that is unfair to other members.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister has said that the government had jurisdiction. There is no jurisdiction under the Atomic Energy Control Act to prohibit the sale of uranium. The government does not have jurisdiction now, nor did it have a year ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—STATEMENT RESPECTING PROVISION OF RIGHT OF WAY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister who has now had a week to study the speech made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Dallas, Texas, on March 9. When I asked a question a week ago the Prime Minister had not had a chance to read the speech. Since the Prime Minister was worried about distortion the other day, perhaps I had better read the relevant sentence:

> In other words, if it is felt desirable to build an oil pipeline from Prudhoe Bay direct to the mid-continent market then a right of way through Canada I am sure can, and will, be made available.

Does this mean that the minister was speaking on behalf of the Canadian government and that the Canadian government is now saying, without any preconditions, that a right of way will be made available for the building of both oil and gas pipelines through Canada from Alaska to the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Obviously the answer is no, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is asking if this will be done without any preconditions. The quotation he just read to the House contained the words "if it is desirable". Surely this is the whole phrase on which the case rests. If it is desirable in terms of public policy and in terms of government decision, a way can be found to do it. There is no problem here that I can see.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, since two ministers have now issued invitations making it clear to the United States that the government would favour the building of an oil pipeline through Canada, may I ask the Prime Minister if he will undertake to give either of the give-away twins an opportunity to make a statement to the House so that we may be fully aware of what commitments the Canadian government has made, what the conditions are and when the ecological studies with respect to a pipeline through Canada will be completed?

Mr. Boulanger: Where were you on Friday? We were all day on that subject.

Mr. Trudeau: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise of the question, that there has been a firm indication to United States interests to build a pipeline. The minister said quite clearly that if it were in the Canadian interest, if it were desirable to have such a pipeline built we would make the conditions available whereby it could be built. This is not a clear invitation. This is an indication that there is a route there, that it can be considered and that we are looking at the various conditions under which it would be beneficial to Canada.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—WITHHOLDING OF COMMITMENT UNTIL STUDIES COMPLETED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since his statement said nothing about whether it was in Canada's interests but simply said that a right of way could and would be made available—

Mr. Trudeau: "If".

Mr. Douglas: —I want to ask the minister whether he is having discussions this week with representatives of the 17 companies comprising Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Research Limited. In view of the fact that Mr. E. C. Hurd, president of this group, has said that studies will not be completed for some three years, does the minister intend to delay making any firm commitment until these studies have been completed and also the studies by his own department?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we had a debate on that matter on Friday and I spoke very clearly to the House about the situation. We said to the Americans what is obvious, that there is a route there that we can use if they accept the conditions that we have laid down about it, that it is going to be a common carrier, that it is going to protect the ecology, that it will have to give employment to the native people and so on. I think that this policy is in the best interests of Canadians. It was made public last August, so I am quite surprised that the hon. member has not checked it.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—OPPORTUNITY FOR CANADIANS TO INVEST IN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Canada prefers the Mackenzie valley route, does the government have any plans which would enable Canadians to invest in such a pipeline development? Are any specific plans now laid out which will enable Canadians to invest in this pipeline development should it come down the Mackenzie valley?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no specific plans.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN MAIL RATES TO OFFSET DECREASE IN VOLUME

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office.

Since the last increase in postal rates has brought about the folding up of several magazines and generally resulted in a decrease in the volume of mail, could the minister indicate whether his department is presently considering the possibility of further increasing postal rates in order to offset the deficit resulting from the reduced volume of mail?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the decrease in volume did not necessarily result from the rates increase, but we are considering the possibility of further increasing postal rates.

INDUSTRY

CANADAIR—MEASURES TO RELIEVE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES AND MAINTAIN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will put it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Canadair of Montreal has revealed its financial difficulties and threatens to lay off 6,000 workers, could the right hon. Prime Minister inform us whether his government intends to take immediate steps likely to alleviate the situation, such as the purchase of CL-215 aircraft.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department is making every effort to help Canadair, for example, in the international field, promote the sale of CL-215 aircraft. My department is also trying to secure for the company sub-contracts from the United States and is also helping in the areas of research and development.

The Minister of Transport is, for his part, engaged in developing a reorganization program which would apply to the Canadian aircraft industry as a whole, in regard to short take-off and landing.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Is he doing his best to prevent, by means of temporary contracts or agreements, the dismissal of the 6,000 Canadair employees involved?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend is aware of the situation of the aircraft industry in Canada, the United States and the rest of the world, he knows that the industry is encountering great difficulties at the present time because of cuts in the defence budgets of several countries, particularly Canada and the United States.

I therefore feel that expecting the company to continue operations at a wartime employment level would be unrealistic.

Mr. Valade: In view of the importance of the matter, Mr. Speaker, I feel the minister should reply to my question. Does the government intend to purchase CL-215 amphibian aircraft, which have already been purchased by other countries to combat forest fires?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, that question is under consideration, but it is well known that it involves real difficulties. Some provinces, among which Quebec, have already got those planes. Were the government of Canada to buy some, the fact that a province is already equipped would raise problems, and it might also happen that when fires would have to be fought in Newfoundland, the planes would be in British Columbia.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED USE OF FUNDS ALLOCATED FOR SUBSIDIZED HOUSING TO SUPPORT LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is directed to the minister responsible for housing. I will drawl the question while he is returning to his seat. Will the government redirect a large portion of the funds allocated for subsidized housing to support lower interest rates on housing for ownership as suggested to the minister today by the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the large amounts of money available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are, of course, capital funds. There would be some difficulty in applying capital funds to what is basically an expenditure program. Nevertheless we are, and have been for some time, examining the proposal. If there is a decision made, I will announce it to the House.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED LOW-COST INNOVATIVE PILOT PROJECT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister in respect of the request of the Housing and Urban Development Association for his support for a 100-acre, low-cost, innovative pilot housing project. Is the minister prepared to support their request?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The National House Builders Association is now the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada. Last year they came to us with a proposal in principle. It was not possible to entertain it at that time. I have not seen any details. I was told this morning that they have received an enthusiastic response from a municipality and provincial government. I invited them to send us the details so that we can examine them. Generally speaking, we would be receptive to examining them, but I am in no position to make a decision at this time because I have not seen them yet.

EFFECT OF FLUCTUATING INTEREST RATES ON STARTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I have a supplementary question with regard to the report that many builders are withholding their building programs because of the wide fluctuation of interest rates. Would the minister consider stabilizing interest rates for a period of six months or a year so that builders can proceed with their building programs? As a further supplementary, will the minister consider making some of the interest rates more especially with regard to CMHC loans, dependent on income, in other words, interest geared to income?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the last portion of the question was wrapped up in the answer I gave a moment ago. With regard to the builders holding off for a stabilization of interest rates, I inquired of the house builders this morning if this was the case to any marked degree. They said this is not the case. As far as my ability to stabilize interest rates for six months or a year is concerned, it is a very interesting proposition, but I do not really subscribe to it at the present time.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO GRANT TO LA LIGUE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME

Mr. David Lewis (York South): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is in connection with the answers he gave with regard to a pipeline through Canada from Alaska to United States. The minister referred to a condition regarding the ecological consequences of the pipeline. Is research on the question of the ecological consequences of building a pipeline completed, what organization is the minister depending on for such research, and if he has any report is he prepared to table it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, exactly two years ago, my own department as well as other departments and the private sector undertook some research work on the possible effects on the tundra of pipeline construction. A few days ago, I even told the House that such research would be extended for another summer season before we came to a final conclusion. On many occasions, I stated that such a final conclusion could in my opinion be arrived at before the end of 1971 at the latest. The sooner the better, but I have repeatedly said that we intended to take up all the time we needed and only when we have in hand all the information made available by the government officials and by the private companies will we able to make a meaningful decision.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Is he sure that the research will bring about a satisfactory solution to this issue?

Mr. Chrétien: I said, Mr. Speaker, that if man is able to send another man to the moon, he would probably be able to build a pipeline in the North without destroying the ecological balance. I can also say that the experiments made in the last two years lead us to believe that that will be possible.

In view of a request made a fortnight ago by Mr. Jacques Hébert, representative of the Quebec chapter of the Civil Liberties Union, for financial support from the federal government, and since the Secretary of State is supposed to be studying this request since then, could the Prime Minister say whether the government has agreed to subsidize this organization and for which purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Secretary of State has indeed received a request in these general terms and that he is considering it. Unfortunately, I cannot tell the House which decision he has reached, but I am satisfied that if the hon. member asks this question of the minister upon his return, he will obtain an answer.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs described Canada's action in extending a $14 million interest-free loan for 50 years to eastern African countries for the purchase of railway locomotives as a bold experiment in international co-operation. Will the Minister of Transport approach the Secretary of State for External Affairs and suggest that we pursue a bold experiment in national co-operation by making interest-free loans to Canadian railway companies in order that we may enjoy railway passenger services in Canada, particularly in the area of Owen Sound where not one train is running?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): To my knowledge the report has not been received. I shall make inquiries and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Rose: Since there has been more than a year's delay in bringing about a settlement between the railway companies and this union, has the minister or any member of the government considered initiating changes in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in order that delays may be eliminated or shortened in the future?

Mr. Jamieson: This is properly a matter for the Minister of Labour, but my colleague has indicated to the House on a number of occasions that he is proposing amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and no doubt these will be coming forward in due course.

In other words, will French trawlers refrain from fishing within our 12-mile fishing limit?

Hon. Since then, the French Ambassador has termed it a reservation, so I now report that a reservation has been expressed by the French government.

Is the minister now ready to reply?

[Translation]

Hon. However, we are taking the necessary steps so that the number of jobs for students will not be decreased at Fort Garry.

TOTAL SHIP CAPACITY, CAPE TORMENTINE-BORDEN FERRY SERVICE—NUMBER OF CREW

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he assure the House that the total capacity of ships made available for the Cape Tormentine-Borden ferry service this year will be at least as great as the total capacity in operation last year, and will the total number of crew be approximately the same?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): In reply to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I can certainly give that assurance. In point of fact, it is my assessment that there will be an increase in capacity—that is our intention—with regard to passengers and automobiles. In so far as the crews are concerned, I have no doubt that since we are adding two additional vessels to the east coast ferry fleet there will be employment for at least the same number of people as previously. There is a question about which I have asked the CNR to advise me as soon as possible with regard to the disposition of those crews relative to where the ships themselves are going to be used during the summer.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister assure me, on the assumption that only one of the ferries in operation there this summer will be capable of carrying railway cars, that there will be another ferry available as a reserve which can be quickly brought into service if necessary?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance. The proposal—and I emphasize, as I have on previous occasions, that at the moment it is only a proposal—would be to locate the rail-car ferry service in such a way that under normal circumstances it can serve on the gulf crossing but would be readily available, in the event that the Abegweit were to have problems on the Prince Edward Island service, to be diverted to P.E.I. within a matter of a very few hours.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the recent ruling of the Manitoba Court of Appeal that persons within a province may receive for consumption or resale agricultural products from outside the province free from any regulation, direction or control by a provincial marketing board—an important interpretation of section 121 of the British North America Act—would the Prime Minister take steps to instruct the Minister of Justice to refer this whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised with me yesterday, I believe, by the Minister of Agriculture who is discussing it with the Minister of Justice. The question is presently being studied. It certainly points to the correctness of the line that we have taken at the federal level, that these problems can be settled only by a measure of federal-provincial co-operation.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Crowfoot has a supplementary to his previous question.

Mr. Horner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. If the Manitoba government takes the position that it should take this question to the Supreme Court, are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice prepared to assist in determining the exact interpretation, for the good of all provinces, of section 121 of the British North America Act?

I should like to ask the minister whether that preliminary inquiry has been concluded and, if so, what was the result? If it has not been concluded, when does he expect to receive a report from the commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, it has not been received and I do not have information as to when it will be. I am sure it will be completed as soon as the commission can do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this is the kind of question that might be considered at the time of adjournment. I realize the hon. member's question is one of importance, but I am wondering whether it should not ordinarily be placed on the order paper or, if there is urgency, considered at the time of adjournment. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO APPLY SOCIAL CREDIT MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) moved:

That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pleasure that I have the honour to move the censure motion of the Ralliement Créditiste now before the House, and which reads as follows:

That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

As we move this motion, we have no intention of wasting the time of the House, and we do not feel that we are. During the present session or during the preceding ones, the House was not called upon to discuss bills designed to put an end to the present economic and financial disorder.

Unfortunately the government refused to leave the beaten path and preferred to rely on traditional policies which give no results.

The government was satisfied with offering measures which, until now, failed everywhere else in the world. If the economic situation is so mixed up at present in Canada, inflation is to blame; if there is unemployment at the same time, the Ralliement créditiste is certainly not to blame, it is not because the Social Credit monetary proposals were put into effect. On the contrary, it is because conventional policies once again show their failure. Once again we renew our attempt because we want to awaken the members of the government and of other parties to the policies we promote and to the means we would use if we were sitting in place of the present government.

Before coming to the heart of the matter and proving the failure of the government policy and the reasons for its failure, I should like to call attention to the remarks of those who claim that the failure of Social Credit is a foregone conclusion, that it has been judged, and that economists are content to grant it divided attention. That is precisely the case, Mr. Speaker: Social Credit has been judged and condemned without a fair trial. Those who state its policy are listened to only absent-mindedly. That is the truth of the matter.

With regard to what economists think of it, here is what one of them has to say. Mr. Hutchison, professor of political economy at Birmingham University, wrote this in a book published in London in 1964.

The study deals with the role of the judgments passed by economists on its value, and on the narrow-mindedness they reveal in these judgments, either because of the ideologies they have espoused, their political or social commitments, the selection of biased facts, unverified propositions and finally because of their differences as to the means to reach the ends. I quote from Mr. Hutchison:

If sciences—i.e. positive sciences—follow a straight line, economic sciences follow a spiral. With positive sciences, discoveries add to knowledge. When new truths are revealed past errors are rejected into oblivion. But with economics, we are going around in circles: every generation discovers the same errors as fast as it absorbs new ideas. The reason may lie not in economics themselves but with economists. When young we—the economists—take up theoretical positions and we spend the rest of our lives selecting facts to confirm them.

Thus speaks a modern economist about the so-called economic sciences.

Economics are prejudiced, biased, they spend their time digg ng up facts, disclosing some, hiding others, in order to preserve their status in the universities, get their degrees and maintain their own prestige.

After this digression, I come back to the motion read a few minutes ago to show that Social Credit monetary proposals would bring satisfactory solutions to our economic problems.

What are those problems? Judging from the crest-fallen appearance of government members, they have a great number of problems but no solutions. This is why they are sad, cheerless and have such mournful faces.

Obviously, we are not going to enumerate all those problems. It would be too long, too boring, and I have no desire to rub it in. But still, some of them seem to take it more seriously than others and they ask for special attention and they may even require the members of the government to undertake research work to solicit opinions, to seek advice, as we heard it said the other day by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) concerning his white paper on taxation.

• (3:30 p.m.)

First of all, we must face the problems of inflation, and of price increases. The government says that inflation no longer prevails and that our economy must be expanded. Still, this is surely not the opinion of the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada who claims that inflation is still prevailing, and who has recently been critical of the government for its attempts at letting loose the economy with the means at its disposal. This is also not the opinion of the officials of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics who have just disclosed that in February 1971, the increase in prices has not stopped and the general consumer price index has gone up by .5 in February 1971.

Neither is it the opinion of the consumers who note a spiral in the price of food, clothes, rents and transportation.

There is also the problem of the 500,000 registered unemployed Canadians in addition to those whom statistics do not take into account since they are "seasonally adjusted" unemployed, ghost unemployed, who only disturb official figures and the rosy dreams of the ministers.

There is also a growing misery which stems from unemployment. More than 1,000,000 Canadians are unemployed which means that their families are deprived of the necessities of life because they are short of money though there is no shortage of goods. Is there a shortage of wheat to make bread? Of milk to feed families and meet children needs? Of cream to make butter which is no more to be found on Canadian tables, because we make do with 25 cents a pound margarine? Is there a shortage of poultry? Of hens so that eggs are scarcely used in Canadian fares? Is there a storage of eggs so that chicken are seldom eaten by the families of the unemployed? No, Mr. Speaker, there is no shortage of wheat to make bread, but the government pays farmers to lay their lands fallow and produce a little less. No, there is no shortage of milk, but the government refuses to subsidize farmers alleging that they produce too much milk, cream and butter. No, Mr. Speaker, we have no egg shortage in Canada, because Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and the western provinces take all steps to prevent entrance of eggs from other provinces. It has become a problem because there is a surplus. It sometimes leads to violent discussions.

Nor do we have a shortage of apples. In fact, Canadian applesauce producers complain that applesauce from South Africa competes with their own production. Nor is there a shortage of textile products for clothing Canadian families. There is no shortage of footwear for Canadian citizens' feet. Textile mills are closing down, dismissing their employees, lacking a market for their production. Shoe manufacturers complain that Italian, Czechoslovak and Indian shoes come into Canada. Is there a shortage of furniture to give Canadian homes the modern touch? Is there a shortage of wood, of building materials? Is there a shortage of labour for erecting buildings, factories and plants, for housing families and providing jobs for Canadian workers? No, Mr. Speaker. We have plenty of all that. There are also more than 750,000 people who do not produce anything, who would like to receive a salary in exchange for labour, in order to be able to buy the goods and services they need and for which their wives and children are calling.

How does the government react to these problems? It is never still and pretends to be doing something. Ministers make statements, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) wants to sell as much as possible to foreign countries so that foreigners may have better food, better clothing, better housing and better health, and in the meantime he forgets that thereby prices are rising in Canada, that thereby inflation is spreading whereas our people are hungry, go about in rags and line in substandard housing. That is what the government is doing with its tools in the present system.

What else does the government do? What steps does it take to correct the situation? Two things: First of all, it is not a bit shy about levying taxes, thus adding to the fiscal burden of Canadians and reducing their purchasing power. Government officials do not seem to be unemployed and supply the matter for the publication of white papers, red papers and finally blue books. The whole thing began with the white papers on the Constitution, as if a new constitution was needed for Canadians to eat all they want.

Then, the white paper on taxation was published, which quickly became the red paper, because the proposals it contains, specially with regard to the Canada Development Corporation, lead to individual dispossession and state control over all businesses, on the savings of citizens, in order to establish public concerns, government enterprises, which will finance themselves with the compulsory savings of citizens, through taxes, invested by the government in order to implement the theories of Mr. J. M. Keynes, that is a collectivist economy. That is where we are led by the proposals contained in the white paper on tax reform.

A white paper on unemployment insurance was introduced: that was a great discovery. A white paper on income security was also presented. Those are not legislation, the ministers repeatedly say, but merely working papers, proposals put before the Canadian people, in order to get their opinion, advice, suggestions.

Constitutional matters have been discussed in this House and all over the country at least since 1940, when Ottawa wanted to force the hand of the provinces in order to snatch from them the sole power of taxation which they were in a position to exercise. The question of unemployment and of unemployment insurance has been discussed in the country since 1944 when the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed. The question of taxation also goes back to 1940 when Ottawa took away from the provinces, as I have just said, their taxation rights.

The question of guaranteed income has also been discussed in this chamber since 1944 when the Créditistes entered Parliament, where they made themselves the champions of guaranteed minimum income for everyone, where they pushed the government to pass family allowances legislation, where they urged the government to increase old age pensions. Therefore, there is nothing new in the proposals of the government which is really short of solutions. It says to us: Advise us! Give us some suggestions! We are ready to co-operate with them, but on condition that they leave the beaten paths, that they at least listen to our suggestions and apply the ones we offer.

All too often, unfortunately, the Social Credit's opponents propose arguments such as: if the Socred doctrine is so good, how come it has never been put to the test in another country? To this I could reply: if the telephone is such a good means of communication, how come it has ever been tried before the XIXth century? The man who invented the telephone did not argue: nobody ever tried it before, therefore I have no right to do it since it has not yet been put to the test somewhere else.

Today, no one denies that the telephone is very useful. It takes only a fraction of a minute to place a call anywhere in Canada and this is very useful. It has been invented by Mr. Bell, a very good man, a chemist, a researcher who came up with the most precious means of communication.

Why is it that Russia did not first start a telephone service on its territory before anyone else? It could have been argued likewise here in America: Russia did not do it, it must not be done here either.

That is a somewhat disturbing line of reasoning, but that is what people do in connection with the theories of Major Douglas at this moment. Why can Canadians innovate in the areas of science, communications and so on, and cannot do so in the field of finance?

Had the firm which produced the first lunar module which landed on the moon reasoned like the opponents of Social Credit on the grounds that it had never been done elsewhere, no device would have reached the moon.

Had Mr. Armstrong reasoned like certain opponents of Social Credit, he who was the first man to set foot on the moon would never have gone. Yet, he went.

Let us be logical. Canadians must be more than a bunch of sheep. We have proved in the past that we could be ourselves, that we could innovate in several fields. Let us prove mankind that we are also capable of leaving the beaten paths, in the field of finance in the public sector, by reforming our financial system so as to modernize it and enable it to serve a society grown modern in the area of production.

Let us apply the following saying: fast and increasingly easy production, fast and easier profits, to allow that abundant and easy production to achieve its end, that is consumption, to meet the needs of all mankind and not only those of a few.

Everyday, men who live in society need a large number of goods and services. In exchange for their work, they receive some money to look after their needs. They give money, coins or bank notes which are instruments of exchange. Although work is the essential factor, we cannot either deny the prime role also played by finance. It gives impetus to the economic life.

To ensure the proper operation of a mechanism, its various parts must be synchronized in order to obtain the desired performance. If automobile manufacturers had modernized their motors by adding cylinders to make them more powerful and if they had persisted in using the same carburetor as the one used on automobiles 60 years ago, surely the distribution of fuel would not be sufficient enough to enable cylinders to operate fully and instead of travelling at 80 miles per hour, a car would only travel at 50.

So, the manufacturers have decided to modernize everything, to change the carburetor in order that there would be enough fuel in every cylinder, to get a maximum output. Motorists nowadays are pleased to find that there are carburetors which respond to the wish of the driver when he steps on the gas pedal.

Mr. Speaker, the same logic applies to our economic system whose production capacity has been exceptionally increased. However, we have failed to modernize our financial system so as to enable a distribution of goods in sufficient quantity in all households in order to satisfy the basic needs of everyone. There is the flaw of our system and we should not be stubborn and maintain it.

The Minister of Finance and those who reject the Social Credit proposals as outlined by Major Douglas might find it interesting to read over again the latter's testimonies before the finance committee here in Ottawa and they would realize that his predictions were right.

It is urgent to change our way of financing the public sector in order to leave to the private sector the monies necessary for more economical operations so that it can meet competition on the world market. This change would also have the consequence of leaving to Canadians a greater share of their income which would increase their purchasing power. That is the core of the problem: insufficient purchasing power in the hands of most Canadians. Social Credit proposes a solution to this problem.

The purpose of the economic life must be human and social if it is to be morally sound. Our economic life must be consumer oriented, because the consumer group includes all human beings. Riches exist for consumer democracy, and not only for producer aristocracy or for the financiers' "Sanhedrin". Consumption must be the true object of production. Without consumption, production has no reason for being. A system that makes fruitfulness of money the main purpose of production is unhealthy, illogical and inhuman, and it is high time that it be changed.

A society will survive if its members are convinced that they can more easily attain their objectives through joint action. Surely they are all looking for a maximum of security, through the ability to satisfy their needs, and for a maximum of freedom.

Abundance for all, a principle which should no longer have to be proven, should mean economic security for the individual. The very small amount of work required of man to ensure such abundance should mean that the individual is assured of leisure time, of economic freedom, etc. Now, God knows what grimaces the words security and liberty bring to our faces. Economic insecurity is almost general. Destitution is the lot of a multitude of human beings, and everywhere, we witness a multiplication of laws aimed at restricting individual freedom. The individual can no longer develop; being no longer able to identify himself, he is ready to surrender submissively to the systems which fail to recognize him.

A study of the monetary machinery reveals that the control and issue of money are in the hands of a private, highly centralized monopoly.

This is a deficiency, because the basis of all financial credit is real credit, and this real credit belongs to the people, that is to the capacity for agriculture, industry and transport to deliver goods where and when they are required. This real credit is common in essense since it cannot exist without a structured society, a fully operating industry, a consuming public and a government ensuring law and order. The end pursued in the monetization of Social Credit, society's credit, influences the rights of individuals and their mutual relations. The control of this end by the individuals represents on their part an usurpation of the state's function and on the part of the government that gives us this function or fails to take it back, a treason of its mandate and the enslavement of its citizens to the will and fancy of a few tyrants.

Here is what was said a few years ago by Charlie Chaplin, a kindhearted and thoughtful man, who has pondered over human problems. I shall quote him to show how little things have changed since then, and how right we are today, in repeating his words and in trying to readjust our position, in order that the individual may enjoy freedom in moral law and democracy. Here is what Mr. Chaplin said, and I quote:

> We want to help one another and human beings are made just for that. We want to live with the happiness of one another . . . and not with misery. We do not want to hate and despise one another. There is room for all of us in this world. Our good planet is plentiful and can provide for the needs of all. The road of life may be free and bright but we have lost our way.

The government is looking for solutions to the problems facing us. We have solutions to propose. The government is looking for advice, suggestions. We are offering him Social Credit solutions. First: The government wants to solve the problem of prices and costs, that are disproportionate to the purchasing power. We suggest one way of balancing prices and costs to obtain the best of purchasing power, and that is the compensated discount.

Second: Then the government wonders how it can provide the necessary funds to guarantee a minimum income to all Canadians and thus protect them against poverty. The Ralliement Créditiste has suggested the establishment of a national dividend.

Third: The government is seeking means to restart the economy in order to finance production, reopen plants, create new products and insure that the Canadian economy will remain in Canadian hands. The Ralliement Créditiste has a solution to offer.

Fourth: The government wonders how to obtain the necessary funds to finance social development and facilities in the country, the provinces and municipalities. The Ralliement Créditiste has come up with a solution.

These are the solutions which other Créditistes will submit to the House if they are offered an opportunity to do so and if this opposition day is truly what the spirit and the wording of the Standing Orders intend it to be—a day for the Ralliement Créditiste.

• (3:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I have a great deal of respect for him, but unfortunately I am not always able to follow the arguments he presents. I sit close to him and he is such a forceful orator that the power of his words disrupts my translation equipment, so I must apologize for not catching everything he said.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Thumbing through the record I note that at one time the Liberal party, which now forms the government, opted for debt free money. I go back to November 5, 1962, where, as recorded at page 1290, of Hansard for that date, the following subamendment was proposed:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "and replaced with a policy of debt-free money and constructive proposals to foster balanced domestic economy and balanced international trade."

It is interesting to recall that all the financial experts presently in the government supported that subamendment. There was the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson); the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray); the Chairman of our Finance Committee, Mr. Clermont, and I could go through the whole list. There was Mr. Badanai, Mr. Beer, Mr. Drury, Mr. Dubé, Mr. Hellyer, Mr. Honey, Mr. Lachance, Mr. Laing, Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), Mr. McNulty, Mr. Otto, Mr. Munro, Mr. Whelan, and Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton). All these gentlemen voted for debt free money. That policy might have put them in trouble, but it could not have put them in much more trouble than they have put themselves.

I should like to refer to an article in the Financial Times of March 15, written by Bogdan Kipling and Bruce Little, headed "The Painful Problem of Canada's Too-Strong Dollar," in which they identify the financial problems facing the government. I quote:

> The finance minister and the governor of the Bank of Canada can let the dollar go above par—perhaps as high as $1.05 (U.S.) —and seriously damage some of Canada's most sensitive industries or they can take one of several dangerous steps to keep it down.
> Either way, there will be serious implications for Canada's long-term economic policies.

The authors go through all the options. They speak of the "misfortunes of Canada's trading partners," and say that there appears to be an over-abundance of riches with our accelerating dollar. This has caused many problems.

> Eventually, it may be the value of the Canadian dollar, not the cost of producing Canadian goods, that could drive our exports out of world markets.

The article continues:

> Some government experts fear that the high exchange rate will start to produce significant loss of jobs within the next couple of months—
> No matter how it twists or turns, the government is facing the prospect of a steadily appreciating dollar. But the key point is that such a dollar depresses the Canadian economy at a time when unemployment is high and worse appears to be in store.

The conclusion is as follows:

> Quite simply, Ottawa is boxed in. To make it worse, it has very little way of knowing precisely why the dollar is so strong.

Speculative short-term movements are one thing. The general movement of money out of the United States is another. Such factors may be temporary and can be fought accordingly.

I suggest that our current financial dilemma is well outlined in that article. At the conclusion of my speech I intend to present an amendment, but first I wish to speak on the motion in an endeavour to bring to its consideration a workable alternative to the non-workable socialistic measures which are being advocated from nearly every quarter of this House, and I would say particularly with the greatest persistence and vigour by the government party. The great dilemma facing Canadians is the lack of effective and clear alternatives to our basic economic and social problems. Each party in the House is pressing socialist aims in varying degrees as a panacea. Fortunately, Canadians have always rejected socialism as a national alternative. Whenever an election occurred the alternative of socialism was almost completely rejected.

Unfortunately, the present government party came into power masquerading as Liberals. I am in complete agreement with that growing body of concerned Canadians who believe that if the government's taxation proposals, as outlined in its white paper on taxation, are implemented the ownership of private property in this country will quickly become a thing of the past. I think every member of this House should recall a judgment given by that great American jurist, Oliver Wendell Holmes, when he stated that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." It has become a convenient and dishonest tactic for the government and other socialist sympathizers to attempt to convince the people of this country that our economic and other ills have come about from exploitation of our workers by that segment of our society which has provided the capital input for our economy.

Perhaps most hon. members of the House are not familiar with the economic philosophy of a man named Kelso, a man I believe will eventually become the fourth member of the greatest group of social and economic philosophers known to the western world, the others being Ricardo, Marx and Smith. Mr. Kelso, an American corporate lawyer who presently practices in San Francisco, believes that current economic thinking has overstressed the role of labour in the production of wealth by negating the second factor in its production, which is capital. He illustrates a fundamental dilemma in the American economic system by pointing out that approximately 5 per cent of the population owns the capital that produces 90 per cent of its wealth. Since capital is property, and since it is a basic tenet of our common law that one who owns property is entitled to all benefits which flow from it, it become most evident that the overwhelming proportion of workers in the United States do not benefit under this system because they are not the owners of property. In his theories, Kelso is referring to economic property, which is most customarily possessed in the form of shares or bonds in companies.

The dilemma facing Canadians in this situation is aggravated by the fact that the preponderance of our secondary industries are foreign-owned and, of course, controlled, so much of the wealth which flows from them finds its way outside our country. At this point, it might be a great temptation for our socialist-thinking friends to claim that they have the solution for redistributing the benefits of ownership through our society by imposing taxation measures which take from those who own and give to those who do not. I prefer to think of this as the dependency syndrome in which the government seeks incessantly to encourage our citizenry to believe that they have a right to expect the government to provide for their needs from birth until death.

This same attitude on means of distribution is one which encourages government patronage and can lead to various forms of inequality. There is, I think, a certain attraction to this business of the government distributing to each according to his need in times when our economy is facing serious difficulties, such as it is at present and will likely continue to do for a good many months, if not years. This has already been indicated by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, although I must admit that he made this appraisal at the cost of some considerable embarrassment to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Perhaps the minister felt that, out of gratitude for his appointment the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission ought not to say anything which detracted from the government's wishful thinking that inflation has been ended, that the country is turning the corner on unemployment and that a new era of sweetness and light is on the near horizon.

This House, Mr. Speaker, has heard members of every party refer at one time or another to automation and the leisure time which will result therefrom. It is also, I trust, apparent to the House that our industry is becoming more and more capital-intensive and less and less labour-intensive. In short, as these past months have borne out rather cruelly for tens of thousands of Canadian workers, machines and not people are producing a relentlessly increasing proportion of our goods and services. When one considers the degrading and dehumanizing tasks which so many Canadians are required to perform in order to earn their living, I think we must in conscience ask ourselves if the concept of full employment is either necessary, desirable or possible. This is true when we look at the number of make-work projects which are currently in existence, when we look at the feather-bedding in industry and at the many current projects in which machines can actually take the place of men. Only ten years ago I can remember some of our major Canadian producers saying "Every man who walks in in the morning is costing us $25; he can be replaced". Today, we are creating jobs but I suggest that a lot of the jobs are unrealistic. There would probably be one-third more unemployment in the nation today if this aspect of make-work projects were removed.

It is surely apparent that the government's solution to the problems of unemployment rests in massive welfare programs. When we look at the unemployment insurance bill which is presently before the House we see that it is nothing short of a welfare measure in which the dignity of the individual is not only compromised, but in which his basic needs and aspirations cannot be realized without a burden of taxation upon the productive elements of our society of such a staggering nature that industry will simply not be able to carry the burden.

The philosophy of Louis O. Kelso is that property produces wealth, and since wealth is in so many ways intertwined with personal freedom, dignity and opportunities for self-development, the acquisition of property by the broadest possible number of workers becomes a matter of social and economic necessity. Without such an alternative, workers become dependent upon the largesse of a massive bureaucracy administering socialistic programs of the kind which have taken such a destructive toll of once-great nations like Great Britain.

Anybody who watched television last weekend may have seen a program which illustrated the complete breakdown in Great Britain and the resultant unemployment. This situation is largely due to the attitude of the people and the socialistic measures that have been brought to bear over the last years. The basis of Kelso's economic theory is that everyone should be able to purchase a share in the ownership of the wealth-producing capital instruments in society so that he may then receive, in proportion to his labour and property contribution, his share of the wealth produced. I wish to emphasize at this point that when I speak of each citizen in our society owning a portion of the capital means of production, I am offering this as a clear alternative to what others think is really the same process whereby in socialist countries, the state, supposedly in the name of every individual, owns the means of production. When the state owns the means of production, then it also controls the distribution of the wealth which flows from that ownership. I earnestly hope that the examples of the production of wealth in existing socialist states are such as to discourage us from considering further this type of social arrangement as a desirable one for Canadians.

I might say that we have gone far down this road when 35 per cent of our total product is now taken in the form of taxes. I compare this with Japan where 16 per cent of the wealth is taken and even with Australia, which is comparatively socialist, where only 21 per cent of the total wealth is taken by the state.

In summarizing the essence of the economics of Mr. Kelso, I wish to quote the following from an article on him which appeared in Time magazine of June 29, 1970. This article, refers to the plan that he proposes for enabling the workers to become shareholders in industry, and it reads:

> The plan might begin by helping the poor and unemployed. An eligible borrower would go to a bank and obtain, for example, $4,000 a year for five years (or $20,000 all together) to buy stock in corporations. The bank, protected against loss by the government insurance, would put the money in escrow; a trust officer would buy a diversified portfolio of dividend-paying shares. Kelso figures that the stocks would ultimately pay for themselves through dividends. Thus, the borrower could pay off the loan, then own the stocks outright and enjoy a dividend income from $20,000 of capital.

[Mr. Downey.]

> At present, a $20,000 portfolio of highgrade stocks generally pays about $1,000 a year, or 5 per cent in dividends. But Kelsonian economics calls for a return of at least 20 per cent, or $4,000 a year—a level that Kelso figures could take five million families off the welfare rolls in five years. To increase the dividend payout, Kelso would gradually abolish corporate income taxes and require companies to distribute all of their earnings to stockholders. Kelso maintains that the government's revenue loss would be temporary and bearable. One reason is that rising personal income tax collections would greatly offset the gradual decline in corporate tax take. He also foresees a decline in government expenditure for welfare and make-work activities—subsidies for uneconomic farms, dubious construction and military projects—that, by his estimate, now occupy one-third of the U.S. labour force.

The economic theories of Louis O. Kelso are beyond summarizing properly in the time at my disposal. I do, however, urge all thoughtful members of the House to study these books: "The Capitalist Manifesto" and "The Two Factor Theory: The Economics of Reality", brought out several years ago. These works explain at length why and how we can free ourselves from the suffocation of socialism, allegedly the only alternative to the worst features of a capitalist, free-enterprise society.

• (4:10 p.m.)

In an article in the American Bar Association Journal of February, 1960, Louis O. Kelso wrote:

> The abandonment of the goal of full employment and the setting of the goal of full participation in the production of wealth, either through the ownership and exercise of labour or the ownership and wise husbanding of capital, as the state of technological change dictates, is, I am sure, the one possibility open to us to avoid the collectivization of our economy, and the disappearance of freedom from our society.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the following amendment:

> That all the words after "House" be deleted and the following substituted:
> —blames the government for not adopting fiscal and monetary policies designed to effectively bring about full expansion of the economy with minimum inflation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has some doubts about the acceptability of the amendment from a procedural standpoint. I would be pleased to hear from hon. members if they wish to be of assistance. Hon. members may be able to convince me otherwise, because I have an open mind on the matter, but it seems to me that we must start from the proposition that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has moved a motion, as his group is entited to do under the particular proceedings today. I quote his motion:

> That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

The motion regrets the failure of the government to apply a particular policy. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) seems to substitute another philosophy or policy for the one moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse. Without accepting the proposed amendment as being procedurally correct, I will just refer to it. It "blames the government for not adopting fiscal and monetary policies designed to effectively bring about full expansion of the economy with minimum inflation". It seems to the Chair that this is really not an amendment to the motion.

I think the amendment would have to follow the stream, if I may use that expression, of the main motion, because, it would be unfair to the hon. member who moved the motion if the amendment enlarged the debate to the point that there was no focus on the motion. These are my preliminary thoughts. If hon. members would like to assist me on the procedural problem, I would be pleased to hear from them.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed to the Chair, in my opinion, is of such a nature as to replace completely the motion I had the honour to move.

If our parliamentary system really respects, as I believe the rights of all hon. members, simple judgment tells us that another member should not be permitted to propose an amendment that nearly wipes out the whole motion, leaving only three words: "That this House".

I am quite ready to believe that this was done in fun, but we are not here to amuse ourselves but to work seriously and study proposed, existing and known solutions. They are trying to take advantage of the day which is allotted to us, in a democratic manner to explain to the House these resolutions which might help the government to settle the problems. This system is indeed not perfect. Nothing is perfect on earth but, at least, we believe that these proposals are logical and serious.

As far as I am concerned, I consider that the amendment as presented should not be accepted for the reasons I have just mentioned because it does away with the real sense of the motion that I had the honour to move.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I support the position that Your Honour has taken, even though thus far you have taken it only tentatively. I hope that Your Honour will rule the proposed amendment out of order so that the debate can continue on the subject that was put down. We should recognize, in all fairness, that this day having been allotted by agreement amongst the opposition parties to our friends of the Ralliement Creditiste, it should not be possible for one of the other parties to take back the day in this way.

I have been able to put my finger on a couple of citations that are on our side of the case. Citation 205(1) at page 174 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition reads:

> It is the practice in the United Kingdom House of Commons that an amendment to a proposed amendment (called a sub-amendment in Canada) cannot be moved if it proposes to leave out all the words of such proposed amendment. In such a case the first amendment must be negatived. This rule is now accepted in Canada.

I realize that the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) does not strike out all the words of the main motion, but does strike out all but the first one or two, so the effect is the same. The reference in Citation 402(3) at page 284 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition is also helpful. It is true that this refers to proceedings in committee on clauses of a bill but I think the principle is sound. I quote:

> It is irregular to propose to leave out all the words from "That" to the end of a clause in order to substitute other words, as such an amendment is in the nature of a new clause.

What the hon. member for Battle River is trying to do by this amendment is to offer a substantive motion, a different proposition altogether, that should appear before us only by notice. We have the right to have notice on these opposition days. This must be done the day before the debate takes place. Yesterday, we were given notice of the subject that was laid down by our friends of the Ralliement Creditiste. In all fairness, I think it should stand that way.

I realize that there will be no vote on this, so there is no serious effect as far as the speeches are concerned. The subject is pretty wide. However, even in that connection I point out that if there were a vote at some stage of the proceedings, and if the proposed amendment was allowed to stand, it could be voted on and defeated, with the result that we could then get back to the main motion. If this amendment were allowed that would not happen, for technically we would spend the whole day on the amendment presented by the hon. member for Battle River. I am not taking sides at this moment on the question of Social Credit monetary theory or of Conservative monetary theory, though perhaps either would be better than what we are getting from the government on the other side of the House. It does seem to me, though, that bearing in mind the rules of procedure as well as those of ordinary fair play, the motion should not be amended in this way. I am not saying that all amendments on opposition days are out of order; an amendment which would qualify or add to a motion before the House might well be allowed. Nevertheless, I think an amendment which would strike out completely what has been set down and propose something else altogether is not in keeping with the rules of procedure or the rules of fair play.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Downey: Might I say, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my intention to be facetious or to take the motion put forward by the hon. member for Bellechasse lightly. I realize it is doubtful whether, in a procedural wrangle, my words will be given as much weight as those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I will simply say that my purpose was to clarify a situation which, it seemed to me, was a little on the nebulous side, in order that we might all participate more fully in the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the remarks of the previous speakers and I also read the amendment. There is no doubt that the object of this amendment is simply to eliminate the main motion, which is certainly not a show of fair play.

It would mean that all speeches would be related to the amendment rather than the main motion and I believe as do the previous speakers that this amendment should be rejected.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would like to thank hon. members for their contributions and assistance on the procedural point. Is the hon. member for Battle River rising on a point of order?

Mr. Downey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the House is in agreement I shall be pleased to withdraw the amendment in my name.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the hon. member rose, I was about to make a ruling which may or may not be helpful. In any event, I appreciate the hon. member's gesture. Perhaps, though, I should put on record in Hansard my thoughts as to the admissibility of the amendment. I think I should confirm my first reaction to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Battle River; hon. members who have spoken in the procedural debate have fortified me in this respect. It does seem to me that what we are considering here is something more than an amendment; it does more than qualify or amend the motion moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse inasmuch as it provides the basis for an entirely different debate. On this ground alone, it would have to be ruled out of order.

Moreover, as hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Bellechasse, have mentioned, it does seem that when, under our rules, opposition parties agree as to the election of a subject on a particular day, the spirit of fair play would require that the day should not be taken away by means of an amendment.

I might also say—and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned this in his helpful argument—and it seems to me that the provision in our Standing Orders requiring notice would be useless or, at best, irrelevant, if, one group having given notice, the motion were to be amended so as to make it possible to deal with an entirely new aspect of the matter. I am not being critical of any amendments, but I am excluding the validity of an amendment which does entirely reverse the argument, or the stream of the motion. I am sure effect must be given to the Standing Order which requires that notice be given. For those reasons I must rule the amendment out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious to me that the motion which is the subject of today's debate raised various responses in the mind of some hon. members.

That can be explained easily enough. A good number of members seem pleased with the present system and do not suffer too many inconveniences through it, at least not enough to be convinced that it would be a good thing to change it. Some already have strong views as to the kind of system they would like.

I wish to point out that I respect their opinion and add that everybody has a right to his own opinion provided it does not distort truth. The object of this motion, which I am pleased to support, is to direct the debate towards an understanding of present economic problems, in trying to forget our differences on party interests and in examining facts in an objective way.

All hon. members will agree that all kinds of goods are plentiful in Canada. At times, we hinder production through the enactment of restrictive pieces of legislation, like those which control milk quotas and restrict wheat acreage.

Finally, the Canadian people are paying several million dollars to get less bread and milk. Such a restrictive policy applies at a time when 25 per cent of Canadian families are short of bread, milk and other food products essential to public health, when they only want to live decently in a country endowed by nature of all the resources likely to provide each and everyone with freedom and security.

The picture is already gloomy enough without a host of unemployed reading newspaper and other ads for jobs, trying to remain calm, while explaining to their wives and children what is going on.

As representatives of people a quarter of whom are facing unemployment, hunger and hardship, we have no right to expect that a solution to these problems will crop up automatically, as a result of favourable circumstances.

If we are unable to improve the condition of those thousands of poor people in a country where resources are plentiful, we are not qualified to represent them and we should at least be honest enough to recognize this fact.

I assume that the various means that were tentatively applied to ensure a more equitable distribution of goods have been tried earnestly and in all good faith, but we all find that the results fall short of expectations. One must be under the spell of ominous influences or be short-sighted to refuse to change position. Eventually we shall have to ask ourselves who is responsible for the rowdy demonstrations that are staged occasionally. To all those who want to hear the voice of moderates, I might say that today's extremists are, in several cases, yesterday's moderates who have lost patience.

Under those circumstances, the members of the Ralliement créditiste are proposing an economic formula for the distribution of property and suggesting a basic reform of our monetary system. According to true philosophic principles, we believe it is more important to try and do good than fight evil.

Social Credit is the result of findings and analyses made by a competent engineer. Major Douglas was able to find the evils in the administration of the present capitalist system. From this he drew conclusions and indicated how to correct the flaws of the system. When he found that the production capability was the result of inventions and of technical improvements which would never have occurred without life in society, he endeavoured to find a way to distribute the already existing products.

To get a proper idea of what would become of human relations in the economic life, in the social and political areas, they must be studied under an economic climate free from tyranny and financial nonsense.

During the week of the anniversary of the death of a great man, Abraham Lincoln, I read the editorial of April 29, 1970, of the CFCM-TV station which was entitled "Something to think about". In fact, Abraham Lincoln, has great achievements to his credit, and the role he played in American history has proved decisive. Among the famous words we owe him are the following, which invite to reflection:

> Prosperity cannot be created by discouraging savings. The weak cannot be strengthened by weakening the strong. The worker cannot be assisted by destroying his employer. Fraternity cannot be promoted by inciting the hatred between classes and the poor cannot be helped by destroying the rich. His security cannot be supported with borrowed money. Troubles cannot be avoided by spending more than is earned. Will and courage cannot be fostered by depriving a man of his initiative and independence. A man cannot be assisted in a lasting manner by doing in his place what he should himself do.

This advice was given over 100 years ago and although it may seem a bit old-fashioned today, it has not lost any of its substance. There is nothing older than universal truth and nothing more up-to-date either.

Whoever has studied the history of the U.S. knows that no less than Abraham Lincoln himself was dominated by bankers who were using their credit with the masses to issue currency to control public authorities. Lincoln challenged them and issued money—known as Lincoln greenbacks—against the nation's credit. The Harvard Circular—a banking publication wrote on this occasion:

> Greenbacks should not be allowed to be used as legal tender because we have no control over this form of currency. But we can control debentures and, by this means, we can control bank issue. Bankers were able to bring enough pressure to bear on congressmen to pass the National Banking Act of 1863, over the objections of their archenemy Abraham Lincoln.
> When the act was passed, the Rothschild brothers wrote, on June 25th, 1963, as follows: "This act gives the National Bank almost complete control over the nation's finances. The few people who understand the system will either be interested in its profits or be so dependent upon its favours, that they will not oppose it ... the majority of the people, mentally unable to understand it, will bear the burden without complaining, and perhaps without even suspecting that this system works against them."

In spite of all objections, Lincoln fought throughout his life to establish a financial system that reflected the economic reality. Unfortunately, he did not have the opportunity of attaining his goal, and history relates the tragedy of April 14th, 1865.

I could continue to mention some of the events that took place during the administration of the President of the United States, John Kennedy, but I will bring my remarks to a close by adding, basing myself on history, that Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, McFadden and Kennedy were also right. All were great patriots who fought to make the financial system more flexible, since it was greatly prejudicial to the American nation.

Franklin Roosevelt himself stated the following in his inaugural address during the 1929 depression and I quote:

> We have not been devastated as a result of some invasion, abundance is within our reach, but we cannot use those assets in spite of their abundance.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) pointed out that economists have conflicting views and that their prejudices are due to their training, their preconceived ideas or their political and social undertakings.

All those who have some notion of political economy are struck by the contradictions, the divergent theories made public by economists, even those who are world famous.

• (4:40 p.m.)

If you go as far back as the great philosophers of Ancient Greece, you find for the first time in Plato the beginning of a coherent economic philosophy, where he has imagined the integral communist society, in which all citizens would be on an equal footing.

Some 50 years laters, that is approximately 350 years B.C., Aristotle declared war on this communism as well as on the equalitarian policy proposed by Plato, because, in his opinion, common ownership is a source of division and quarrels, and deprives the citizens of the legitimate enjoyment of personal property.

It is only in the Middle Age that the teachings of St. Thomas of Aquinas came out as a justification of private property and a condemnation of communism and socialism.

Later many economists proposed free trade while protectionists insisted on high customs tariffs in order to protect national industries. These differences go two centuries back and are not over yet, countries being at times free traders and at times protectionists, according to their immediate interests. It cannot therefore be asserted that there exists in these matters a theory which is sure and recognized by all.

Two thousand years after Plato, the socialist thought surfaced again with the advent of its main theoretician and propagandist, Karl Marx, and his followers.

Today the world is divided between socialism and capitalism, of various shades, according to the degree in which government interferes with the citizens' business and the managing of the national economy.

Therefore, one may conclude that no existing economic doctrine deserves a special place and is completely superior to the others, and no more so are the economists who advise the government at the present time or those who were its advisers two, three or five years ago.

Evidence of this is to be found in the statements made by the hon. senator Lamontagne, former minister in the Pearson cabinet and main economic adviser of the latter.

At the annual meeting of the Canadian Corporate Management Company, held in March 1970, Senator Lamontagne had this to say about this liberal government's policy to control inflation:

In his last budget statement, the Minister of Finance admitted that the Canadian economy during the 1970-71 fiscal year would "carry on at a slower pace than in 1970 with respect to its total capacity".

Mr. Benson then added:

"If we are to be concerned only about the pressure of the total demand on our productive capacity and our markets, no further action would be required". But immediately he made known his plan to restrict consumer credit thereby hitting the poorer citizens harder and weakening still more the sector of our economy which is the weakest, that is the durable goods sector.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada was of the same opinion when he wrote in his report that:

"The restrictive measures are not intended to slow down the economic progress for its own sake but they are taken as means of lessening the price and cost increases for the purpose of establishing economic expansion on a sound basis".

These statements and others of the same category made in the United States, for instance by Arthur Burns, lead me to question the philosophy which was accepted during the post-war years in relation with the implications of fiscal and monetary policies in the fight against inflation. I suggest we are witnessing in this field, here and in several other western countries, including perhaps the United States, the worst aberration since the depression that hit the world in the thirties.

According to the Créditistes, the point is to move surplus goods towards the consumers.

Since there is a national inventory level, it is obvious that an efficient demand from the consumers would provide the kind of economy we want, that is one which would use all the modern methods of production and which, at the same time, would offer job opportunities to all those who are both able and anxious to work.

Let us assume therefore that, through some device, we could obtain this effective demand. What would happen? The goods which are presently held up in stores and warehouses would come out and, in the market society we are familiar with, dealers would pass orders on to wholesale dealers and the latter to manufacturers, which would stimulate economy, speed up production and make jobs available to thousands of unemployed, while the consumers might satisfy their needs.

Therefore, we proposed the following changes to the existing banking system: (a) that the available funds be scientifically controlled and determined by the national inventory of stock of saleable production, which would be computed in a scientific way and at regular intervals according to needs; (b) that the Bank of Canada become the only creator of all supplementary available funds Canada might need; (c) that all available funds created by the Bank of Canada be channelled through a national credit account; (d) that all amounts in the national credit account be allocated to satisfy the people's needs, according to its will as expressed by its representatives in this chamber.

This is, Mr. Speaker, how the Ralliement Créditiste would achieve by various means of distribution better living for all Canadians without destroying personal initiative, without infringing upon the freedom of any citizen, without intervening directly in the production of wealth.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, this seems like a day to deal with financial matters and to make some suggestions about monetary policy. Since we are considering some special projects in relation to the whole question of organizing our monetary system, I should like to put some suggestions to the House. I am rather pleased to see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in attendance, as he might be interested in these ideas. He might even propose some of them to his colleagues.

Let me suggest that the House give consideration to a column written by Mr. Douglas Fullerton for the Toronto Star in 1967, and which carried the heading "Let's buy out these U.S. Giants". We, in Canada, are very much concerned about the takeover of our economy. What is of even greater concern, now that the evidence is before us, is that this takeover has been accomplished with the use of our own money. Let us turn the tables and buy out United States companies with their own money. This is the suggestion I should like to put forward. Let us not condemn the people of the United States for competing with our industries. Let us not feel sorry for ourselves because of these takeovers. Let us learn from this experience, and profit from the examples which are before us. The United States people have taken over certain corporations in such a graceful way that we cannot be anything but encouraged. Perhaps we can do the same thing.

Perhaps as Arnold Toynbee said, when faced with this challenge of survival, we have to run the risk of accepting responsibility, and from the edges of diversity we draw victory, or something along that line. How do we do this? When looking across the aisle, I see that the President of the Treasury Board has already got the idea of how to do it. Very likely he has even thought of this himself on occasion but perhaps has not worked up enough courage to put it to the Cabinet as a government proposal. Perhaps we should encourage him along these lines.

The suggestion that Mr. Fullerton made in his article was that we should use our reserve funds instead of sterilizing them in U.S. government securities, as we are now doing. He suggested we should use these reserve funds to buy equities in United States corporations which are buying into the Canadian market. He suggests that we should forget about the branch plants these companies have here because these are small potatoes. We should go to the head offices and buy them out. Let us take over control of the head offices of these United States corporations. In this way, we can indirectly control the effect they have on our economy. This is not as far out an idea as it may seem. The fact that no one has undertaken this approach does not mean it is impossible. Surely, Americans would not be critical of our taking over their corporations, in view of their record of taking over our corporations. We should use their arguments to justify the taking over of their corporations to our own advantage.

We could persuade them, with the same arguments, that what we are doing is in the national interests of the United States. At the moment, we have about $4 billion in our foreign exchange fund. That is a very sizable amount. We could use this money to increase our foreign investment in United States companies. We should learn from U.S. experience in Canada, because this is how they have been buying us out. We could very well borrow from United States money markets, as the U.S. has done in Canada. We could be backed up by U.S. capital for this purpose. We could also provide incentives to Canadians to invest in United States holdings. We could make these equities available to corporations such as the Canada Development Corporation. With little difficulty we could make such investment worthwhile to Canadians.

Since we are to have a Canada Development Corporation, we could use it as our investment instrument. I realize this is not what the government had in mind for the CDC. It hopes the CDC will simply be put on the market and quietly disappear from the Canadian conscience as just another corporation. But I believe a much better role could be designed for the CDC. This is one of the roles. Let us look at some of the suggestions or examples Mr. Fullerton gave in his article. The article was written in 1967 when our foreign exchange reserves were about half what they are now. I quote:

> Suppose, for example, we had sold $500 million in gold from our reserves in 1945 and put the money into General Motors Common stock, reinvesting the dividends since. The original stock would now be worth $3,500 million, but reinvestment of the dividends would have more than doubled this figure.
> In fact, we would now own one-third or more of General Motors stock, effective voting control (disregarding the effect our buying might have had on the price of the stock). Or take Chrysler—even as late as 1955 we could have bought control of it with $200 to $300 million.

He then makes some suggestions concerning how we would spend $3 billion or $4 billion in buying American equities. He is talking about 50 per cent ownership in these corporations. I realize the figures would be somewhat different today because this was three years ago, but in essence I believe the general study is just as valid today and will serve as an indication of what is possible. He says:

> So there we have a pot of $3,000 to $4,000 million. What stocks do we aim at? To stretch the money farthest we could do well to shoot at secondary companies in each industry, not No. 1. Everyone can make his own shopping list and here's a possible one:

Automobiles—Chrysler	800
Banks—First National City Bank (who else?)	800
Computers—Honeywell	500
Electric—Westinghouse	900
Chemicals—Merck	1,200

This would give us a 50 per cent control of these companies. Very often we would not require a 50 per cent investment because we could probably obtain control for far less than that. The other day I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) whether he was giving any consideration to changing the Canadian law about eligible assets in the exchange fund. At the moment, the exchange fund is very restricted concerning the type of assets which may be held. The minister's reply was that under the law of course he could only hold certain things and would need parliamentary approval to change that situation. I for one, and I believe others in this House, would be quite happy to see the Minister of Finance ask for parliamentary approval to permit him to hold other than United States treasury bills, as he is permitted to do now, in order to obtain greater flexibility. The exchange fund fluctuates from time to time. The question is, what happens if you need more or less money when your funds are invested in common stocks which you cannot liquidate immediately. I think the answer is obvious. Since we are talking about blue chip stocks, surely the banks, which are willing to lend money to foreign corporations in Canada, would not be averse to lending money to the government against the stocks it held in foreign corporations. I think that could be arranged in a way that would not be unsatisfactory.

From the United States point of view, in many ways this procedure would help their balance of payments position. There would be foreign capital coming into the United States at a time when the United States is quite concerned about its balance of payments. The result would be rather good for that country. I do not mind at all helping the United States in this way since it has helped us. I believe the kind of debate in which we are engaged today lends itself to some of these original suggestions. I make them in the hope that the President of the Treasury Board will take a very serious look at them and consider that we do have a rare opportunity, if he wishes to use his imagination, to make a rather unique attack on foreign ownership, not only in Canada but in United States as well.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, the motion proposed by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) gives me the opportunity to criticize the economic policy of the Liberal administration.

I am glad to use the few minutes at my disposal to criticize the present government's lack of a definite policy which is responsible for the stagnation we encounter at present.

Mr. Speaker, in a study entitled "Performance and Potential mid-1950's to mid-1970's", the Economic Council of Canada has defined what should be the economic objectives of the nation. Here are these objectives:

(a) full employment—3.8 per cent unemployment;

(b) a high level of annual growth—an increase of 4½ per cent of the gross national product;

(c) reasonable price stability—an annual growth rate of 2 per cent in price increases;

(d) a viable balance of payments, i.e. a balance of payments where foreign exchange funds would not be submitted to undue fluctuations (for a set rate of exchange);

(e) an equitable distribution of ever-increasing incomes.

• (5:00 p.m.)

It is important to point out that the Trudeau government has never questioned the validity of these objectives. We should therefore take for granted that such objectives as defined by the Economic Council are also those of the government.

The Canadian economy has three very specific characteristics:

a) wide regional disparities.

b) a great dependence upon foreign trade;

c) a great dependence upon one trading partner.

An economic policy which would not take into account this reality is doomed. The Progressive Conservative party must promote unequivocally those objectives. My leader (Mr. Stanfield) has mentioned that many a time in the House and outside the House. Since these objectives are consistent, they can be achieved simultaneously.

The Trudeau government first tried to come to grips with inflation, then with unemployment and finally with economic growth. That approach was basically wrong. It implies that the government considers those economic objectives to be separate and therefore to be achieved separately.

We would be justified in claiming that these are the views of the present government and in charging it with incompetence in the management of Canada's economic affairs.

What are the weaknesses of the present government's economic policy? The Trudeau government has shown an incredible lack of imagination in the application of its economic policy. This lack of imagination has been evident in the fight against inflation; this government has deliberately and stubbornly increased unemployment to such an extent that in the province of Quebec, for instance, the unemployment rate exceeds 10 per cent. Canadians have been forced into a choice between giving a job to every citizen able and willing to work and controlling prices. And even then, Mr. Speaker, we have not reached the degree of price stabilization which had been advertised by the government.

More concerned with elections than the welfare of Canadians, the Trudeau government has finally decided to fight unemployment, now that it is about to call new elections.

What are the weaknesses of the present government? First, it has been unable to lick inflation or to bring prices down because it has developed institutions and policies geared to long term price stability. Price stabilization brought about a loss of potential and an increase in unemployment, which are both unacceptable.

Secondly, the Prices and Incomes Commission has used the workers as scapegoats to justify the government's policy.

Thirdly, the government has created a succession of upswings and downturns instead of preparing a consistent policy of economic growth.

The economic policy of this government is devoid of imagination, outmoded and unable to prevent an economic slowdown or bring about an economic upsurge. One cannot deny that the economy is given a new impetus but one may question its timing and quality.

The main argument that can be put forward is that the government is certainly not the best architect of our future prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, we may question the projection, namely when will that new impetus be given to our economy. The Minister of Finance maintains that it will happen during the second half of 1971. It is the general belief that it will occur much later, contrary to the predictions of the Minister of Finance.

Secondly, we also have reservations as to the quality of that economic upswing. There is no guarantee that it will not be accompanied by a new inflationary thrust. This government has failed to establish any institution or policy likely to ensure that prosperity will not be accompanied by inflation. Therefore, if the quality of the economic upswing is being questioned, the part played by the government must also give rise to doubts.

Any Canadian likes to be sure of getting a real income increase, a decent home for his family and reasonable employment stability.

It is unfortunate that the government managed the economy in such a way that all citizens suffer from it.

We are often asked what we would do if we were the government and if our party was at the helm.

We have often listed the steps the government should take, but our suggestions, as well as those of government members, have always been ignored. At the risk of seeing the few suggestions I have to make ignored once more, I will make them again in the hope that the government will finally understand them.

Mr. Speaker, a government headed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would try to restore the economic situation which the Canadian people deserve.

A Progressive Conservative government headed by my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, would strive first of all to increase our productivity. An increased productivity is the basis of a balanced economic cycle. When productivity fails to increase, salaries go up. The war on profits and prices, waged by businessmen, workers, and the government would restore a sound economical climate in Canada.

A Progressive Conservative government would set up a federal body whose only task would be to consider and submit recommendations on how to achieve better results.

By its poor administration of its economic policy this government has reduced our business potential. Improved productivity means higher salaries and profits and better consumer products.

Such conditions would place Canada in a much stronger position on the international scene and allow the Canadian people to buy more foreign goods with less Canadian money. An increased productivity would allow us to consider many economic alternatives; increased revenues would enable us to support the cost of an even more progressive social legislation.

We know that family heads have constantly increasing difficulties, and that with a better economic climate the government would be in a better position to face its responsibilities in that respect.

A Progressive Conservative government would endeavour to establish institutions and policies likely to minimize unemployment and inflation. We suggest a body similar to the Prices and Incomes Commission, but somewhat improved. Under this government, the Prices and Incomes Commission was essentially anti-inflationary. Under a Progressive Conservative government, the Commission would be a government body pursuing anti-inflationary policies.

Under this government, the only contribution of the Commission was the 6 per cent limit imposed on salary increases. Under a Progressive Conservative government, the Commission would recommend means to achieve that objective to government, industry and labour unions.

That way of dealing with the problem is altogether different and more efficient than the one taken by this government. The Commission should set itself not to know where there is an increase in prices, but rather how to control them.

That is the importance of the work of a commission, if we are actually willing to obtain encouraging results which could be beneficial to the people. When establishing the Prices and Incomes Commission, the government failed to define adequate terms of reference. That Commission could not discharge completely its terms of reference because it did not have all the necessary powers.

We suggest that a regional fiscal and monetary policy materially accompanies the management of the economy of the federal government without at the same time having disastrous effects on the different areas of Canada.

Under this government, economic decisions are taken as if Canada were an homogeneous economic entity, which indeed is not the case. Canada comprises not one but five economic regions, with different potential, economic and cultural aspirations.

As long as the necessary measures are not taken to make allowance for those differences in potential and aspirations, any commission entrusted with solving problems will work in a vacuum and fail to achieve concrete results.

In view of the present economic uneasiness and of the slow economic recovery, again we propose a tax reduction; secondly, the fiscal reform needed to meet current obligations, better distribution of taxation, stabilization of the dollar, establishment of a survey on productivity in order to know exactly what the possibilities are in this field and, finally, establishment of a comprehensive housing policy.

Construction is one of the main economic activities in all areas of the country. We support the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada that the government undertake a study on this industry, a provincial and federal review of the responsibilities of the various levels of government in this field. We would suggest that special attention be given to the various techniques liable to increase productivity in the construction field.

We are cognizant with the ill-effects of the 11 per cent tax on building materials. We propose that this tax be eliminated in order to boost construction, and also that a comprehensive system be established to enable the government to report and proceed with short-term economic projections.

In 1964, the Economic Council of Canada was created for the purpose of making long-term economic projections. We would vest upon a revamped Prices and Incomes Commission the responsibility of effecting short-term economic projections. It is important to establish a long-term policy, but what we need now is a short-term policy likely to solve current problems, and should the government heed the advice of the opposition, I am satisfied that its work will be more efficient and more in line with the aspirations of the whole population of Canada.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO APPLY SOCIAL CREDIT MONETARY POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) have outlined the present situation. According to their statements, an impressive quantity of products now find no markets because consumers cannot afford to buy them.

We know that stocks of finished or semi-finished products remaining on the shelves in stores and warehouses, or even raw materials, in effect paralyse production since owners only operate plants when there are prospects of selling their products or of making profits. We know that the total amount of unsold products can be easily surveyed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. We know also that such stocks are for our country an asset to be likened to Canada's real credit, which is to provide the citizens and the whole population with a sufficient quantity of the goods and the services they would expect from a well organized society.

We laid down the principle that this real credit must be issued by the central bank, namely the Bank of Canada, and deposited in a national credit account belonging to all Canadian citizens.

It remains to be seen how these real credits will be assigned proportionately to each individual.

The Ralliement créditiste proposes some means to effect the distribution of those credits, means that reflect the actual credits equal in value to the total inventories at the end of a given period in a production cycle.

Let us assume that at the end of a year, the total inventory of these unsold goods amounts to $10 billion and that the people asked their representatives to proceed to the distribution of these surpluses. According to the requests made to the people's representatives by their constituents and according to the needs of the people, the legislators can distribute equitably these goods and riches through various means.

The first solution is certainly one which would enable families and all those who live under the poverty line to obtain part of the wealth, in order to get out of destitution and poverty and to enjoy such goods and services as the Canadian production is able to provide for them.

On several occasions, government members have voted against the principle of establishing a destitution and poverty line and of paying to each individual and family what they lack in income in order to ensure them a decent minimum under the form of guaranteed minimum income, through the negative income tax formula. In the white paper on social security, on the contrary, ill-assorted and complex formulas are suggested which will result mainly in increasing red tape, circulation of forms, investigations of all kinds without concern for the families who already are living beyond the poverty level.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

A government of the Ralliement Créditiste party would definitely not hesitate to implement such a policy and one of the first measures it would pass would be to abolish all income tax in the case of single persons having an income of less than $2,000 and in the care of married people having an income of less than $4,000, and to supplement by means of corresponding allowances individual incomes below these two figures.

Another measure which is easily applicable and ardently desired by the population would be to increase the amounts paid to pensioners. Considering present production and the unused production facilities, it would not be too much to pay immediately a minimum of $150 per month to every person 65 years of age or over and to his or her spouse, even if the latter has not yet reached that age.

Those are the measures urgently needed to improve the social allowance program.

As for long-term measures, the Ralliement Créditiste suggests the payment of a national dividend to everyone, as well as the price-adjustment formula, that is the compensated discount or, if you prefer, a negative sales tax.

The main feature of the Ralliement's program is surely the payment of a national dividend to each citizen from the cradle to the grave, in addition to what he or she earns.

First of all, what is a dividend? In industry, it is that part of the profits which is distributed to shareholders, according to the financial success of the undertaking and to each shareholder's investment.

What is a national dividend? It is that part of the abundant Canadian production that would be distributed to all Canadian citizens.

It is said that Canada is wealthy and prosperous. This wealth and this prosperity must benefit all its citizens because they are members of Canadian society.

This dividend would consist in a monthly issue of new credits distributed to each Canadian citizen, for the simple reason that he is a person and therefore an integral part of Canadian society.

Not only does this dividend represent for the Créditistes a means of distributing production that does not go into salaries, but it also responds to a right held by each Canadian citizen.

Each citizen holds a right on common natural resources, as for example, waterfalls which are today important power factors; forests, which are a source of immense riches; transportation means which encourage communications and trade.

Secondly, each citizen holds a right on the proceeds of common production factors.

The advocates of the so-called liberal economy, just as those of socialism and communism, are completely ignorant of these common production factors.

To quote but one example, we could mention the present organization of work and production. As engineer-economist Douglas explains it, where one individual tries to lift a 500 pound load and does not manage to do it, five persons can combine their forces and manage to accomplish this feat. The benefits that are derived from this social organization must not and should not belong to one individual or group in particular, but to society as a whole. So, benefits derived from the organization of society must be distributed in a social manner, and the Créditistes believe that social dividends are the ideal way to achieve this distribution.

Each citizen is also entitled to share in the yield of the common inheritance, public property, applied science, great inventions, knowledge increased and passed on from generation to generation which is nowadays a prevalent factor of production. The yield of that real work must belong to each and all and the social dividend is the most efficient means to assure its distribution.

Under a Créditiste system, there would no longer be as today, a single means of distribution, but two sources of individual income. The first of these sources is wages and profit as a reward for the direct participation of individuals in production. Of course, that source of income, through wages and profit, would decrease as automation and cybernetics gradually remove the need for manpower in production. The second source of income is the social dividend, as the result of collective work. This source of income would grow in inverse ratio to the decreasing human factor involved in the production of goods arriving on the market place.

Any financial reform that does not take prices into account is bound to fail, engineer-economist Douglas tells us. That is easy to understand. Government members often speak of inflation. We recognize that inflation can become a real threat under the present system, but we deny that it would be, if we applied, in its integrity, a créditiste regime such as the one we propose.

Why increase the monetary units in the hands of the consumer if at the same time the cost of goods increases in the same proportion?

Those are the reasons why, in our present economy, any increase in the income of the individual that is reflected in the cost of the goods produced or sold can only result in higher prices.

Whether it be an increase in the profits of the businessman, an increase in the rates of interest, or the workers' wages, or in taxes of all kinds, they all add to the prices and ultimately result in a higher price for consumer goods.

• (5:30 p.m.)

That is why the Créditistes suggest a means to adjust prices and respect the producers' freedom to set their prices within reasonable limits. We claim that the producer must keep on setting the prices of goods and services all by himself. On the other hand, however, the producer has no right to set the conditions under which the consumer shall gain access to these products. In other words, the producer shall be paid his own selling price, but it is none of his business whether the amount he requires or receives for his production has been paid in full by the consumer or if a given percentage of his sales is being paid out of new credits issued by a recognized institution.

This price adjustment could be carried out every year or every half-year or even every quarter. It would be similar to a discount and the opposite of a sales tax.

Such a discount would be made good to the retailer by an equivalent credit issued in the amount of the discount shown on the invoice as having been granted to the consumer. Accordingly, the producer would be paid his own selling price, whereas the consumer could obtain the whole production at merely a fraction of the prices shown on the tags, that is the true consumer price.

How would this discount rate be figured out? After what was missing in the purchasing power taken as a whole, after deduction of the amounts paid in welfare allowances from sources other than taxes, and also of the amounts paid as social dividends.

For instance, let us assume that all prices for goods available amount to $80 billion and that during a given manufacturing period, the Canadian people have bought only $60 billion worth of products, the National Credit Board would then set the discount rate at 25 per cent for the following production period.

This price adjustment method would operate automatically according to the calculations of the accountants in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the National Credit Board. Therefore, we would automatically avoid inflation and deflation.

In conclusion, I might say that these measures would entail some negative effects: they would eliminate financial dictatorship, any encroachment on private property rights, the threat of any social disturbance and all desire to revolt among the people.

But the positive aspects would be much more important: the implementation of the Social Credit policy would permit the production of enough goods to meet the needs, would transfer the goods to consumers' homes. It would thus enable the economy to reach its end, which is to meet human needs. That would be something new and unheard of in the world.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the motion introduced by my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and supported by my colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) does not seem to raise much interest in this House. As a matter of fact, the motion says:

> That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

I have seldom met with such complete silence. The Liberals, who are in power, say nothing, probably because they have nothing to say. Maybe they intend to support our proposals? On the Progressive Conservative side, two speakers dealt with everything except the motion itself and the same thing can be said of the representative of the New Democratic Party who spoke earlier.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

Mr. Speaker, almost everything has been tried in Canada. To fight inflation, we have resorted to high rates of interest and therefore created unemployment. So it has been necessary to decrease the interest rate but this does not solve the problem.

There are more unemployed in Canada this year than last year and they are almost as numerous as in 1962 and 1963 when the Progressive Conservative government was defeated. The government has absolutely nothing to propose to solve this problem.

I am not astonished at this muteness but I am surprised by the fact that no short or long term viable solution is put forward that would give Canada an economic and social system acceptable to the whole population.

In 1931, a famous pope stated in the Encyclical Quadragesimo Anno:

> Economy will be soundly constituted and will truly reach its goal only when it will provide to each and every one a share of the products that nature and industry can produce and this share will be sufficient to give to all at least a fair living.

There is no question of perpetual misery but of guaranteeing "to all at least a fair living." In short, people are asking for decent housing, food and medical care whenever necessary, that is to live like human beings. That is what is honest affluence. That does not mean that everybody will be rich, but that all will enjoy at least minimum affluence to lead a normal life.

Why do the Créditistes blame the government for not having accepted the monetary proposals of Social Credit? It is because the leaders, Grits or Tories, have always tried to ridicule Social Credit. It was feared that it would create inflation, and yet, inflation has been made to reign.

Others spend their time asking us where Social Credit has been applied. Nowhere. It is for that reason that everything goes wrong everywhere in the world. Why? Because monetary matters interest nobody except the Créditistes. They are the only ones who are concerned with them.

Others will say: Well, Social Credit has not been applied. If so, it is because it is not good. We have proof to the contrary when the effects of the present monetary system are studied. It is a complete failure.

• (5:40 p.m.)

If we look at the national budget, we note that 13 per cent is allocated to the public debt and this amounts to $1,945 million. Nobody is making a stand against the shameful exploitation of Canadians by a handful of financiers who control them and rule the roost.

We heard some economists criticize social credit and others praise it. Those who dislike social credit only agree on one point: they are dead against it!

As for solutions, there are not two economists who come up with the same thing. This is why when I am asked where have all the economists gone, I answer that I prefer not to see them because I do not want to be involved with these guys. They always come up with different solutions.

[Mr. Caouette.]

In university, both Samuelson and Keynes are taught, yet one says the opposite of the other. And now we have another economist, Kelso, who wants to make every worker a shareholder in industries, for the development of Canada. Let us see how. These shareholders would be forced to borrow from chartered banks and would deposit their loans as collateral to buy shares in various Canadian ventures.

Thus, they will still be controlled by the same bankers, by the same monetary system; they will pay interest on their loans to become fictitious shareholders of companies for a time set by the financial system, by the banking system.

What about those who do not work? Will the banks lend them money to enable them to buy shares in various Canadian companies? Therefore, Kelso is just another guy who dreams in technicolor. He is not concerned with lightening the worker's, the farmer's or the miner's burden, but rather with concentrating, and further strengthening the control of financial and banking institutions over the economy and the economic life of the Canadian people.

We have been advocating the same thing for years—like maybe preaching in the desert. We say we must go along with the Canadian production and not according to the will of one individual or to the fancies of a political party, but to the true and genuine Canadian reality. Let us distribute to all Canadians, over and above their salaries and present incomes, a national dividend which would add to their purchasing power and enable them to acquire the products and services which they need.

This dividend is being laughed at but still other kinds of dividends are being distributed lavishly to other countries and nobody objects. Would it not be just as good in Canada? If the Bank of Canada were to grant interest-free loans to the provinces according to their needs, the conflicts they have to face would no more exist.

One would hear less about separatism and differences whose basis is only financial after all. If one asks Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec, Premier Bennett of British Columbia, Premier Strom of Alberta or the new Premier of Ontario or the New Democratic Premier of Manitoba what is the issue when they come to Ottawa, they answer that they come to ask for money, for a bigger share of the tax base. This tax base is too small because its size is determined by the financial system.

It is up to Canadians to determine the extent of Canada's development, its standard of living, through their work, their ambition, their intuition, their imagination. They develop Canada, yet they do not benefit thereby because thieves prevent their doing so. When I say thieves, I have weighed my words—that is what they are. There are people who do not understand that interest-free loans could be granted to our provinces, our municipalities and our school boards. Municipalities are left to put bonds on the market, paying 12, 15 and 17 per cent interest. The province of Quebec recently paid 9 per cent, besides the commissions to the brokerage firms.

Provinces must pay 10, 11 or 12 per cent; but the federal government is not moved. The Prime Minister of Quebec is in New York just now, kneeling before American financiers, asking them for new investments in the province of Quebec. There are 250,000 unemployed, intelligent, industrious and courageous, people who are left without anything to do. The Prime Minister goes to New York to kneel before financiers and ask them for new credits in order to create jobs for our people, while all the time it is becoming more and more obvious we could use credits from the Bank of Canada, without operating the money printing machines. These credits would be used for financing the province of Quebec, which wants to develop, as well as the other provinces. We shall then realize unity in Canada because the identity of each province will be respected. This is what is lacking presently.

British Columbia is told that it will be more heavily taxed in order to help a poorer province. Money is taken from those who have some and given to those who have none. A fine solution! It is the same thing in Russia, in Czechoslovakia, etc. Such are their policies. We witness the same thing in Canada, a free country. Some citizens have not yet understood anything in that. When we speak about the public sector, people say: So, we will have socialism. Everyone will be nationalized. There is no nationalization. As for the private sector, we leave it to private enterprise, and private enterprise financiers, if they have any capital, will be able to use it to expand their operations. At the present time, through taxes, the government takes money from private enterprise to finance the public sector. So, private enterprise is deprived of that much credit; the Canadian economy is paralysed because of excessive taxation, because of new taxes, such as that on which we voted yesterday. The 3 per cent temporary tax exists since 1968. It was to apply for one year. We shall again be asked to pass it next year. Some people do not differentiate between private enterprise and the public sector. As far as the public sector is concerned, I believe that even Liberals admit that our attitude is rather consistent. Recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was away on a trip—it was before his honeymoon—and he granted $8.5 million worth of interest-free loans for a period of fifty years with ten years of grace, which makes sixty years. The Prime Minister will be 112 years old when those countries start paying back minus interest. In the meantime we are merely told that these nations with our credits will buy our products and that this will create jobs.

As if such credits, granted to municipalities, school boards, provinces, would not create employment in this country, for our people.

I repeat that we have no objection against assisting underdeveloped countries, but there are underdeveloped municipalities in Canada, in Gaspé, for instance, where people are forced to leave small parishes where they were born 60, 70 or 75 years ago. They are told, today, that they must move, if they want the government to assist them. They are being moved, these are small communities where they have known misery for too many years. We are aware of it, and we say so. Why not help these small municipalities or these areas in the same way that we help other countries, India, Pakistan, African countries, Central or Latin American countries, Malaysia, Ceylon, etc.

If interest free loans are good enough for those countries, why should they not be so for us in Canada?

Recently, in connection with the public sector, an alderman of the city of Hull, who represents the Tétreault ward, moved that the municipality should ask the government for authorization to apply for interest-free loans to the Bank of Canada. Mr. Villeneuve said the following:

> I do not want our citizens to pay for an out-of-date, archaic and obsolete financial system.

Mr. Villeneuve was right. He explained that if the central government could lend money without interest for periods of over 50 years—$420 million to other countries—he did not see why it could not make the necessary funds available to municipalities on the same terms. A newspaper reported as follows:

> The argument of Mr. Villeneuve was disputed, very much so. But what would happen if the Bank of Canada should decide to print money and grant interest-free loans to every municipality?

Granting loans to all the countries of the world is something the man who raised the matter understands. But granting a loan to the city of Hull, the citizen from the Tétreault ward does not understand that. People are being eaten alive by rats, along the shores of the Ottawa river. That he understands, but interest-free loans to pull them out of the financial stagnation in which they are, that the man from the Tétreault ward, in Hull, on the other side of the river does not understand.

I continue my quotation:

> —"It would not work," exclaimed one taxpayer. "That business is ridiculous", said another. The municipal political arena is not the place to uphold your political arguments, federal or provincial—

That is from another citizen. It is not a place where you can talk about provincial or federal government. For the city of Hull, it is quite right to suck both the federal and the provincial milk; the citizens admit it is normal procedure. That is from a citizen from the Tétreault ward in Hull. I do happen to live in Hull myself. I have not yet been able to convince them all. I could read it this week in Le Droit. Another one states: "Let's stop thinking about it, it will not work".

In Hull, the tax rate has just been raised by 4 mills. The citizens of Hull can understand this. I do not know if one of them is intelligent enough, if I knew one, I would name him. Let us carefully listen to them. To avoid the 4 mills increase which would somehow shake up the citizens in the Tétreault ward and elsewhere in Hull, he suggests:

> Why not increase the tax rate gradually? It seems to me more reasonable to raise the rate by 1 mill every year.

Within four years, the increase would still be of 4 mills; it would have been easier. This is understandable.

I know a story about a frog being thrown into boiling water, and it illustrates my point quite clearly. There is a way, according to that idiot, to make the frog accept everything. Let us put the frog in a pail of cold water and then heat it slowly. The water gets hot gradually, and the frog gets used to it and suddenly dies; the water is boiling hot, the frog is cooked without having been aware of it. Everything went well, it is more acceptable that way. Can you imagine the number of frogs in Hull! The minister understands, he is laughing.

Such a system cannot generate anything else than what we are witnessing at the present time. Last night, in Sherbrooke, there was a meeting on the Canadian Constitution, attended by 500 young French Canadians, by Liberal members, the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Gervais), the member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), the member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin). Other members of the Progressive Conservative party were there, I think. Most of them took a good verbal beating. They have not the slightest consideration for federalism. "Go back to Ottawa, we do not want to see you any more. Do not come here to sing us songs." This happened in Sherbrooke last night. Tomorrow it will be in Vancouver, then in Toronto and perhaps later in my constituency of Abitibi.

It is time for the government to think of something else besides imposing taxes or of using poultices on wooden legs. The main uneasiness is not lack of courage on the part of Canadians but lack of money in wallets. That is the sensitive spot. The municipalities, the school boards, the provinces, the individuals, the families, the Canadian government are all at grips with the financial system. Instead of correcting what can still be corrected, useless meetings are arranged such as that of last night in Sherbrooke.

Our proposals may still cause in any people to laugh. It might be too late when their merit is recognized. I hope that the government, while it is still time, will be afraid to assume its responsibilities. The Canadian people will support it, but the young people are now ready to blow up everything in Canada. Let us give them the opportunity to integrate into a society where they will feel like human beings, and then, money will serve the human being. The human being will no longer serve money, as is the case under the present system, one of legalized theft, controlled by a few Canadian bankers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

[Mr. Caouette.]

[English]

Since this is the vigil of St. Patrick, with sober thoughts and friendly feelings I want to offer this old Irish prayer:

May the road rise to meet you,
May the wind be always at your back;
May the sunshine warm up your face,
May the rain fall soft upon your field;
And may you be a long time in Heaven,
Before the devil knows you're dead.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, in view of the constantly growing needs of the majority of Canadians, I am glad to support the motion under study, moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). As this motion recommends the use of a formula or tool which would promote a more flexible administration, more in line with the possibilities of our country, I hope that it will also be supported by all those who were elected to this Parliament to serve the interests of their constituents. A Progressive Conservative member, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard), suggested this afternoon a better distribution of taxation. I want to thank and congratulate him for his praiseworthy effort which certainly had value during the war and the years following. However, our experience in this area leads us to believe that in peacetime, the tax base assessment is inadequate. That is the reason why the Créditistes propose, rather than an assessment, an expansion of the tax base according to the needs of each member of the great Canadian family. Today, individuals, families, communities and nations must run their business and whatever exists must be managed according to a widely-accepted formula: revenues are the sum total of profits and expenditures. All accountants and professional managers know that. Also everybody knows from experience that nothing will run smoothly when deficits keep piling up. Deficits breed debts, debts call for interests, interests increase fixed charges for administrations with deficits, so this all boils down to a never-ending and hopeless vicious circle.

This is true of nations, societies, families and individuals.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Nations represent mankind; they represent all human beings on earth, living precariously from the resources created by the supreme master of the Universe.

It may be that here, in this Parliament, we are not responsible for the fate of the whole of mankind, but we must assume the administrative responsibility for 21 million Canadians.

God has put everything in nature, too much for all, but enough for any one of us. In Canada, particularly, we are in a state of overaffluence; our output for 1971 will reach $90 billion; the per capita output is thus $4,200, namely $21,000 for every household of five persons, or $350 per month per person or $1,750 per month for every household.

Then, with such a production, we would have no reason to complain. It is not production which is lacking, it is distribution between citizens who are entitled to that production and who do not benefit from it because of poor management on the part of responsible citizens.

I believe that the Canadian government must prove that it intends to discharge its responsibilities by all possible means and, among the means available to the Canadian government is the financing of public capital through advances of credit without interest, and through the Bank of Canada, without depriving anybody of anything, without bringing the economic life to a stop, without inducing either inflation or deflation. We anticipate that that measure would greatly contribute to improve the standard of living of all Canadians. This, it is easy to see, would lead to a decrease in the taxes the government now levies to pay the interest on the public debt or its loans, and to an increase in the amount of money now available to the consumer to buy the goods he needs.

At this point in the debate, though the Ralliement créditiste does not have the support of many members as far as the adoption of a national dividend is concerned, it does have the support of many members who favour the creation of new credits, interest-free, to finance public capital.

In his book Demain c'est l'an 2000, Gaston Bardet, professor of applied economics at the University of Brussels, after a thorough study of the banking system, and the survey made in Great Britain by the MacMillan commission, as well as those made in Canada in 1939 by the House of Commons committee on banking and commerce, reaches the following conclusions:

> Therefore, there are two possible methods of financing and they are totally incompatible: the first being provided by savings, or surplus money, the other being projected ahead. As far as the former is concerned, he says, in relation with private production, self-regulation must be provided by the supply of existing capital, (and on this point, by the way, we are not in agreement with Mr. Bardet) and where the latter is concerned, self-regulation must be provided by the most positive primary needs.
> Hence, bank financing is quite appropriate where a country's capital expenditures are concerned and then the whole country benefits. Wherever over-production is not to be feared, it is demand that determines the issue. Then, in this instance, the requirements in the fields of housing, road-building, bridges, hospitals, schools, forests, become the regulating factors of the anticipated scriptural money.
> There again, adds Mr. Bardet, we are dealing with consumer and no longer with producer loans. Interest then is out of the question. The country, the community, cannot practise usury.

Another economist has considered the problem of government financing, and he came to the conclusions drawn by the Créditistes a long time ago, that is financing public capital by new credit free of interest.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

This proposition is explained in a book entitled: "The Challenge of Abundance" by Mr. Robert Théobald, and this book can be found in the Parliamentary Library.

In this respect Mr. Théobald writes:

> A government may use three means in order to get the funds it needs to meet its obligations. Firstly it can tax the citizens and the institutions in order to get their money. Secondly it can borrow money from the people and from institutions and pay an interest on it.
>
> In the third place, it can just create money and use the funds created for its purchases. What everyone agreed on before 1936 is that the government should never create money. Opposition to the creation of money was based on the belief that the demand for goods should always be equal to the supply, so long as the government did not intervene in the economy. Keynes destroyed that belief when he showed that there was no certainty that the demand was always equal to the supply in affluent countries—
> There are many methods for closing the gap between supply and demand. The level of supply could be brought down without great effect on demand by reducing the number of working hours for the same salary. Demand could be increased by telling the population that more goods are required in order to live a decent life and enjoy a better standard of living.
>
> The government could simply make up the difference between actual and potential production by building new schools, demolishing slums and controlling pollution, because one could find there unused resources in the economy. The government would not have to raise money by levying taxes or borrowing.
> Money could be merely created, the additional funds would not cause inflation because, by definition, there would not be any shortage of products.

This is the evidence given by American economist Robert Théobald who feels that it is possible to democratize money and use new credits without interest for the social development and equipment of the country.

Moreover, I want to point out the views of a renown British engineer whose opinions are raising great interest in England. No. 5 of Volume 183, Part I of the 1968-69 Proceedings of England's Institution of Mechanical Engineers reproduces the integral text of a lecture given to the members of this organization by Mr. Anthony Vickers, with the abovementioned title.

In this study, Mr. Vickers, who was heartily applauded and whose comments were the subject of discussions among the members of the Institution, dealt first of all with the technological development, the hopes it awakens from the economic development point of view. Then, in the second part of his address, he talked about the means of financing social development. This is how he concluded this part of his lecture:

> A first requirement of education is to make everybody able to understand the simple facts and the functions of money (coins, bank notes, and bank credit) under its various forms. This does not mean endless studies about economic and monetary policies. It means that everybody should be able to understand that:
> (1) Money is a medium of exchange or a method of payment and, in itself, it has no value and does not cost anything.
> (2) The control and regularization of the quantity of money required must be greatly improved in order to meet technological advances and the changes due to a capital-intensive industry.

In the last part of his address, the author explains how it would be possible, within the limits of a total employment economy, to endow Great Britain with social assets that cannot be achieved at the present time owing to lack of money or credit.

He continued:

For a great number of years, seven dam projects have been under consideration in the United Kingdom, designed to increase water resources, enlarge the British heritage, improve navigation and port facilities and in certain cases build power plants and improve the road system.

All these projects would result in important assets for the population and besides would create a great number of jobs. Such projects would cost hundreds of millions of pounds, but the cost of producing such credits would be very small. Is this not a case where one should do what Keynes advocated so strongly: "To make financially possible what is physically feasable."

As a first step, it would be necessary to establish a National Financing Corporation to provide the credits required to create assets for the benefit of society. Thus work would be provided as long as resources would permit. In a free society, in peacetime, over-abundant manpower cannot be directed to different occupations, but with education, retraining, good wages, decent housing, it can certainly be attracted to other jobs, bearing in mind that the GNP may be increased yearly by at least 600 million pounds.

Never before has our capacity for production, transportation and communications been so great; however the admonishments from the government to tighten our belts are unavoidably followed by limitations imposed by producers in various ways. History, of course, will tell us that taxes have been too heavy and complicated and, although this is not the object of this lecture to discuss tax problems and their basic objectives, it remains nevertheless that technological progress requires an expansion of the economy if we wish to reach full employment.

This is why we suggest that for what we call capital funds that do not bring profits, a National Financing Corporation must be developed to meet those needs. This would require specific terms of reference to avoid a conflict with the various financial organizations already serving the private sector of the economy which is based on profits— The National Financing Corporation which is one of the most important factors of governmental policies would however provide a considerable share of the money or funds now levied through taxation. In spite of the present high rates, taxation is unable to use unemployed resources to build, for example, a modern road system and in addition, it adds a tremendous burden to the costs which the community must pay in the form of interests.

Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) stated to the house that he would very much like to be able to finance the construction of a Canadian pipeline in the Mackenzie valley, but that because "he was not a Créditiste, he did not know how to print money."

If the minister does not know how money and credit are created, he should see his banker who, if he is the least bit clever and honest, will tell him how the banking system creates credit out of nothing. And if his banker does not know, than I shall merely send him the extremely instructive booklet published by the Royal Bank of Canada entitled How the Canadian Money Supply is Affected by Various Banking and Financial Transactions and Developments. If he does not understand after having read it, then we can introduce him to members of the party who will be in a position to explain that to him clearly and accurately. Thus he will learn that whatever is physically desirable must be made financially possible, and that through a financial system consistent with the facts, financial problems would not exist, if there is no production problem.

[Mr. Godin.]

As Marquess Serra writes in his book entitled "Economic Chaos and The Coming Revolution", there is no trick to evaluating in dollars the use of materials, natural resources and technical processes. And there is no trick either to creating purely monetary means, therefore the credit to facilitate the exchanges of various services, which will make the plans come true.

In this age of technology, here is a technique to be developed. And we can do it as soon as we decide. It is a matter of decision, that is all. The money is there, the products are there, the tools are there. All we have to do, is decide.

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The Governor General of Canada thus ended his speech at the opening of this session on October 8, 1970.

If we analyse the travels of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of other members of the government such as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to distribute around the world our wealth and help the underdeveloped countries through gifts of food and interest free loans for periods of 50 to 60 years, we realize that the prayer of the Governor General of Canada has been answered. It is obvious that Providence has guided our political leaders to the benefit of foreign countries.

I will repeat the prayer of the Governor General:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

Because I am only a representative, I hope that this prayer will be answered at 50 per cent, so that our government might forget for a time the ills of the whole world and limit itself to taking the necessary measures to meet the needs which exist presently within the borders of our country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the long familiar motion brought before the House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply the Social Credit monetary policy.

Such a policy was stated for the first time by a British engineer, Major Douglas, in a book published in 1920 and entitled "Economic Democracy".

It is significant that during the half-century that followed, no government of any country in the world endorsed the Social Credit doctrine. It is also significant that the two provincial governments in Canada headed by parties that still go under the Social Credit label, only pay lip-service, if that, to the Social Credit theories.

While the Social Credit party is no longer represented in its original form in the House and no longer exists as a party on the federal level, Social Credit theories are still being advocated by only one group, the Ralliement créditiste.

The Social Credit doctrine is only one of the numerous theories put forward in the last hundred years or so, as an ultimate answer to the undoubtedly serious defects in the working of our economic system. No wonder that according to many such theories, all our economic problems would be solved simply through the adoption of one form or other of monetary system.

In the United States, for instance, William Jennings Bryan severely criticized the gold-standard that prevailed then. As a remedy to the real defects of the gold-standard, he suggested the establishment of a parallel system of silver-standard.

Like Bryan, Mr. Speaker, Major Douglas perceived a defect in the economic system of that time, namely that there was no machinery to allow, in a more substantial way, the creation of an adequate demand for the goods and services that the nation can produce.

However, it is quite true that to find out about the existence of a problem is one thing and that to apply an adequate solution is another. As I said before, no country in the world has ever considered that Social Credit theories could bring about a practical solution.

As pointed out by a well-known economist, Alvin Hansen, in his book entitled Full Recovery or Stagnation, Social Credit authors, as those of all other cure-all doctrines, have ignored a most important fact of life, namely that no economic device, whatever its nature, can be grafted to the economic machine to make it work smoothly forever.

Over the last 50 years, after Major Douglas had for the first time outlined his theories, the nations of the western world have worked out a number of interrelated policies and programs offering much wider possibilities as concerns maintenance of a balance between supply and demand for goods and services.

Each year billions of dollars are made available to Canadians through a great range of social welfare programs, which do contribute largely to the maintenance of our purchasing power. Notable progress has been achieved allowing recourse to fiscal and monetary measures to maintain a marked increase in production, employment level and real income.

• (8:30 p.m.)

The main problem, still unresolved and, besides, totally ignored by the Social Credit theory, is to maintain a sustained rate of increase for our economy. As emphasized by the Economic Council in its last report, the most notorious economic failure of the sixties, throughout the world, and which constitutes a major political problem yet to be solved, has been the inability to achieve an acceptable reconciliation between a high level of employment and a relative price stability.

As noted by the Economic Council, the solution of this problem will constitute a most difficult challenge and is not one of those problems which can be dealt with so-called "right" political decisions.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

Although the theories of the Social Credit are almost unknown today, those who keep on advocating them are not the only ones to believe that our increasingly complex economic problems can be solved by a few so-called "right" political decisions, to use the Economical Council's own words.

Quite recently, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party stated in the House that the longest and most tenacious period of inflation in modern times which continues to affect other western countries could be checked by a mere appeal to voluntary restraints on prices and incomes. Although such restraints would no doubt supplement further political measures, as the government itself stated, the Progressive Conservative party has kept insisting on this magic solution to the whole inflation problem quite a long time after it had become obvious that all the sectors of the economy were not prepared to accept voluntary restraints.

Over the last few months, the Conservative members have been suggesting a similarly simplistic solution to this problem, a sharp but stable economical growth. They have suggested a one billion dollar or more tax reduction and have proposed a substantial increase in government expenditures while omitting to state the amount of such an increase. They have wholeheartedly elected to ignore the serious problems that such an approach could bring about in the future either by giving rise to further inflationnary pressures, or through an upwards pressure on interest rates and the Canadian dollar rate of exchange and, finally, by exposing the Canadian economy to the risks of another recession.

Last month, the Progressive Conservative and New Democratic parties as well as the Ralliement Créditiste have censured, in a joint statement, the economic policies followed by the government, to ward off the inflationnary pressures which threaten our economy and to put it back on the way to a strong and stable growth.

However, Mr. Speaker, I see that the Tories and the NDPers are endorsing, in some way, the government's view on the usefulness and the opportunity of the Créditiste doctrine, namely that this doctrine is nothing more than a doctrine and moreover, an idealistic and unenforceable theory. And almost everybody agrees on that point. But at the same time, Mr. Chairman, I think it is regretable that these two parties chose to do nothing during this debate but hide between proposals varied as well as contradictory.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I think that the House of Commons must vote against the Créditiste motion.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Valade: Since the Minister stated that the Progressive Conservative position was contradictory because it supported the Créditiste proposals, could he explain why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) backed down in this very Chamber with regard to his White Paper on Tax Reform?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, this White Paper was tabled as a vehicle for discussion. It was only after discussing those ideas that the government said it would introduce a bill. It was its intention from the beginning. It is regrettable that our Progressive Conservative colleague missed this basic point.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I should like to take the opportunity on this opposition day, Mr. Speaker, to state certain views concerning the motion proposed by the Ralliement Créditiste. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the Revenue Minister on his excellent French. I should like to take this opportunity to discuss a few points concerning the motion, but with some reservations. I am not convinced that a Créditiste policy would be the best solution, but I should like to congratulate, all the same, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I heard this afternoon, his splendid speech, delivered in his usual simple way. Knowing well the hon. member for Bellechasse, I know his honesty. I feel I must congratulate him on his speech and the ideas which he advocates in this House. I would even go as far as to say that if all members were as honest and simple as he is, the House would fare much better. Honesty based on such simplicity would result in far more realistic and human ideas and policies. The same could not be said of the leader of the Ralliement Creditiste (Mr. Caouette) who from time to time is more apt to indulge in politics than to advocate truly meaningful and progressive ideas. In any case, I congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) on his honesty and his excellent speech.

Production, distribution, consumption and purchasing power have all been mentioned. Obviously, Canada today is not lacking in production. Obviously also, distribution is possible, considering that the average citizen lacks an adequate purchasing power, or income. The consumer is hampered by this lack of purchasing power, even though there is an overproduction which could be consumed through greater purchasing power. The present situation is the result of policies laid out and promoted by this government. We could blame former governments, but we would be wrong in doing so because if we were always blaming those who have built this country, those who have done their utmost, we would be wasting our time. I think we must analyse in depth the present situation. A Liberal government has been in power in Canada since 1968. I know that the Canadian people expect a great deal from this government, taking into account a very commendable promise called the just society. As everyone else I believed in this just society. I thought that once elected, I could participate in this just society by supporting good measures and, obviously, by protesting against bad ones, because that is the role of the Opposition. However, to curb inflation, unemployment was allowed to develop, which is disastrous and harmful. In spite of inflation, we nevertheless witnessed an increase in prices, and this increase has certainly been harmful to consumers. And yet, we experienced inflation, to arrive at this unacceptable unemployment situation.

Not so long ago, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that he had succeeded in checking inflation, and that from now on, he was to come to grips with unemployment.

We all know how embarrassing such a situation is for us and how painful it is in certain parts of the country, in the province of Quebec especially, and in other regions.

Apparently, the main effort was to increase welfare allowances. I think it was essential and vital to create new jobs, to make available additional capital for research which would have led to the manufacture of new products and consequently to the establishment of new industries which would have been viable in the long run.

Efforts were also made to make available substantial amounts for the establishment of new industries but, unfortunately, nothing was done to solve the problems of those already existing. And that is what really matters.

Almost every day, industries of long standing announce that they will shut down owing to certain difficulties, including imports. Has this government done enough to put a stop to competitive imports? Has it seriously studied the possibility of restricting such imports? It has certainly been normal that we import certain products, but have we conducted enough studies in order to limit imports of a given product since Canada is today in a position to produce it? I do not think we have done enough in this respect.

Such endeavours in favour of investments in new industries is a good thing in principle, but it seems to me that we have forgotten to trouble ourselves about the preservation of existing industries.

How could we forget to discuss the financial problems of the municipalities and the provinces? We must discuss in the House the financial situation of the municipalities and the provinces. We certainly want our municipalities and provinces to have the financial means to expand further.

In Quebec we had the quiet revolution which made it possible to launch a number of programs. To a certain extent those new programs caused indebtness.

Clearly the effects were by and large the same at municipal levels; since they need additional services in order to face today's needs and want new industries, municipalities should get up a series of projects likely to supply them with an infrastructure, taking into consideration the prospect of new industries.

Today, municipalities and the population in general are being blamed for not having developed enough projects or established adequate protection against pollution.

How can these municipalities possibly build water treatment plants, in view of the present indebtedness?

The motion before the House is such as to suggest to the government the application of a Social Credit policy aimed at issuing supplementary dollars as well as certain dividends. There are some reservations to make in this connection. We must—and in this I concur with the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray))—guard ourselves against the possibility of greater inflation.

In any case, in view of the financial position of the municipalities and provinces, I am wondering how we can extricate ourselves if the federal government does not make enough efforts to grant certain supplementary credits in order to allow provinces and municipalities to honour commitments which are imminent and necessary.

Of course municipalities are always interested in urgent projects. Is it financially possible for those municipalities and those provinces to keep on providing their own administration at the rate which we have known the last ten years? I think not.

It is obvious that the issue of supplementary credits is necessary. How could those municipalities and those provinces continue to get into debt at an interest rate as high as that prevailing today. I wonder whether the government should not consider issuing supplementary credits, but at a reasonable minimum rate which would allow those municipalities to go on with projects for which there is an overwhelming need.

Otherwise, I wonder how these municipalities or provinces will be able to keep growing and thus to set up the public services and utilities necessary to attract industry.

Obviously, the government has not considered the possibility of extending new credits at reasonable interest rates. All too often, the government has issued new lines of credit with interest rates so high that local governments are put in an awkward position. I urge the government to consider this possibility.

We in the opposition can easily criticize. I would not want to limit myself to criticizing the government, to saying that it has not done anything: it would not be honest. Today, one must ask whether the government has done enough, whether it can do better and whether those who criticize it could do better.

That is the role of the opposition. Starting from that consideration, and being conscious of my role in this House, I should not want to limit myself to criticizing the government; I urge it to consider the possibility of creating additional credit, at reasonable rates; by that, I do not mean that it should blindly endorse the monetary policy of the social credit party, because I have serious reservations about it.

I make as many reservations about the efforts of the government during the past three years. As a result of those considerations, I wonder if I am not entitled—and I should at least be—to ask the government to examine the possibility of granting supplementary funds for carrying out certain projects which are obviously essential in the public utility field.

I do not ask that funds be granted to individuals at high interest rates, but I think that it is extremely important to provide more money to municipalities and provinces for public utilities and large scale projects, taking into account their direct relation with the public sector.

• (8:50 p.m.)

We have asked the government many times to arrange easy credit for housing, an important sector which represents, I believe, from 30 to 33 per cent of the labour force in Canada. The government made some effort, I must admit, to grant credits with regard to housing.

Labourers, people of the middle class, should be allowed to become home owners, taking into account the interest rates, taxes on materials and property taxes.

We have asked many times for the repeal of the tax on building materials, which would be an interesting move for those who want to become owners.

I know that the government should normally study this. Unions interested in construction have made requests which are rather hard to accept.

With respect to construction, the government should call together all the representatives in this field and enter into arrangements with them at both the government and the union levels. The government must have at its disposal substantially large credits for construction, in Canada, because of the heavy demand. Union representatives must also accept some measure of compromise. It is up to the government to prove that it is willing to promote construction and it is up to the unions to prove that they are willing to compromise, because of the capital which the government would be ready to invest.

It could be that an agreement could be reached between the unions, all those involved in construction, and the government as regards salary and price stability. The government should abolish the tax on building materials and make funds available at acceptable interest rates. It did not see fit to do so, and I sincerely believe that the government would serve the best interests of the Canadian people if it did. I would recommend to all those interested in the construction sector to compromise for 3 or 5 years, if we are to have long-term building. The government should take this suggestion into consideration.

I would like to mention that we have to define the policy which the government should normally adopt. This afternoon, the policy to help students find summer employment was introduced. This announcement made us realize that only part of the students will be getting a job this summer at a cost of approximately $50 million. This represents only 50 per cent of the students who will be on holidays this summer.

During the last Liberal convention held in Quebec City, the young, aware of their needs, voted in favour of a resolution asking for the establishment of a civil service. I had thought of a disciplinary civil service. Perhaps it was too severe. This civil service was referred to as a service that could provide work for students. This resolution which was passed is an excellent one, I am not against saying it, but I thought a few months ago—and I said so in this House—that the establishment of a policy for students was an obvious necessity. It seems that the government has no intention of following this up. I can understand the frustration of the young before the attitude of the government. There is a desire to provide against this resolution which is wrong. This service would make it possible to remedy the situation. The establishment of a civil service on a national scale would have created thousands of job opportunities. And if I understand the meaning of the resolution that was passed, the public service could have found a job for all students, provided they had applied for one. But we would then have given proper guidance to these young people who wonder to what extent members of the House are responsible.

By giving a positive answer to such a resolution, we would have proved to these young people that the members of the House are aware of their problems and want them to become actively involved in society. We would have enabled them to accept responsibility and to earn a salary which would have made it possible for them to continue their studies without always relying on a scholarship which often comes too late, or on the financial assistance of their parents which is often inadequate, and that is justified.

I wonder to what extent the government has exerted itself and has shown its awareness of the needs of those students. With the future of Canada in mind, it is very important, I think, to give some responsibility to each student and a salary that will enable him to continue his studies.

I also wish, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I am sorry to have to tell the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened to the speeches by the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) and a member of the official opposition who has, to my immense surprise, congratulated the hon. member for Bellechasse. It is a rather rare occurrence for a member to congratulate a group because he would generally be expected to attack the leader of the party. The ideas expressed today by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and upheld in this House are exactly the same as the ones so often outlined here by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste.

They are also exactly the same as those expressed here for the last 36 years. When Social Credit was discussed in this House, whether by Social Credit members from western Canada or by the Ralliement Créditiste from the province of Quebec, the principles have remained the same.

And the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) approved our plans to grant credits to the population in different sectors of the economy, but he did not tell us where he would get those credits. That is what we would very much like to know, where to get them? From the pockets of citizens who are already broke, already over-taxed?

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. La Salle: From the Bank of Canada!

Mr. Rondeau: I would have liked the hon. member for Joliette to tell us while he had the floor and to repeat it in the House.

Mr. La Salle: From the Bank of Canada!

Mr. Rondeau: We have a solution to offer. We say credits should be obtained from the Bank of Canada, and we are always consistent with our proposals.

Mr. Speaker, it is amusing for us, members of the Ralliement Créditiste to hear some members discussing something they know nothing about.

We soon find that they have never studied it. Some of them, I agree, know better, but their political ties prevent them from airing their knowledge. I know some Liberal members, among others, who are quite familiar with the working of finance, of the banking system in Canada.

They remind me, when they talk about Social Credit, of those three individuals who, one day, were standing, blind-folded, in front of an elephant in the Granby zoo. One was near the leg of an elephant and tried to guess where he was. When he touched the leg, he thought he was in a temple near a column.

Another individual who was feeling its body thought he was in a warehouse and was touching some kind of a barrel. A third individual who touched the elephant trunk thought he was holding a cable.

When I hear the members opposite, they remind me of people who are blind in the economic field. From time to time, they say: We have encouraged employment. Later they add: We must fight inflation, or still: We must raise or control prices or establish a price control board. We are only presented in this House with temporary solutions, fumbling solutions, by people who move in darkness, with their eyes shut, and who go blindly in the economic field.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has spoken tonight on the motion under consideration on behalf of the government. I would have hoped that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would have been in the House to give us his reply, for we know very well that the Minister of National Revenue has but one thing in mind, to tax and to "pump" money out of the pocket of citizens to feed the Treasury.

The Minister of Finance also has always another thing in mind, namely get the people into debt. Those are the only two sources of revenue that this government and the preceding ones have known.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue has, as in some other circumstances, raised the scarecrow of inflation. He made me think of a waterworks comptroller who, afraid of flooding the city, would close the water mains and let the city burn.

Mr. Speaker, for fear of inflation in Canada, the Canadans are kept broke, taxed and in debt. Yesterday we extended for another year the so-called social development tax, something which had already been done previously. It is not with a Minister of National Revenue such as the one we have today that Canada will innovate; as always we shall be followers. We shall remain a home for subsidiaries from foreign countries that from time to time offer us a few millions so that our economy can keep on going.

And yet it would be easy for Canada to be a model and affluent country.

Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue is more aware than anybody in the House that a group of people control finance. He knows that those people are interested in having man exploited by man and it seems to us that he blamed the governments of Alberta and British Columbia among others because, so he says, they did not apply the Social Credit doctrine.

He should have said also that it was his own party, today's government, which in 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939 prevented Alberta from implementing at least seven private bills, that were about to be introduced in the provincial legislature. Those bills were rejected by the government in power at the present time so as to prevent the Social Credit government of Alberta from implementing the Social Credit principles.

If Social Credit is so dangerous, if it is such an utopia, if it is so stupid, why was not in 1935 and in 1939, the then Premier of Alberta, the Hon. William Eberhart, allowed to apply the Social Credit principles? Higher institutions in Canada were used to declare ultra vires seven bills of the Alberta legislature, that had in its statutes and bills the power to eliminate economic and financial slavery in the province. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Revenue was still harping on the same string when he told us that millions of dollars are granted every year to the Canadian people as social welfare, to stimulate our economy.

Mr. Speaker, those millions which, according to him, are paid out for social welfare in order to stimulate the economy do not stimulate many things for those same millions are taken away beforehand from individuals who still work in order to put them in the pocket of those who cannot work. The Minister of Revenue proved once more tonight that he wants to stay within the system. Perhaps he has personal reasons for that. In fact, one thing strikes us everywhere in the world, it is that it is in the interest of the exploiters who live off the system to maintain it and not to change it.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) this afternoon introduced before the House a non-confidence motion against the government for failing to apply the Social Credit monetary policy. Since 1935, as I said a moment ago, the hon. members sitting here under the Social Credit banner have repeatedly offered concrete financial solutions which would have allowed the present government as well as its predecessor to settle once and for all the financial problem of Canada, which stands at the root of all other economic problems encountered in this country.

For 36 years now, the Social Credit monetary policy has been outlined in this House. I suggest that if the government in its wisdom has not seen fit to apply the Social Credit policy on a 100 per cent basis, it could at least have applied some of our recommendations and watched the results. If Social Credit is that much unworthy, as some ignoramuses delight in repeating, I think the government could have tried to apply one or two of its proposals in order to verify to which fiasco they would lead. But no, Mr. Speaker, Canadian and foreign financiers will never allow the political party they have themselves financed to test one or two proposals from the Social Credit for that would be the beginning of the end of their control on governments, individuals and the economy. But that would be also be the beginning of the end of the hardship experienced by the Canadian people amid abundance. But that would also be putting an end to exploitation of man by man.

Before coming to the heart of my remarks, I should like to read part of an article published today by the newspaper La Presse and signed by Claude Beauchamp, under the title:

"Beggars on a plane"

When I was young, I knew all kinds of beggars: on bicycles, on foot, in cars. But in 1971, there are modern beggars. I quote the newspaper article I have in hand:

> Mr. Robert Bourassa starts today his second pilgrimage to New York since his election as premier of Quebec, now nearly eleven months ago. An unusual thing, the premier leaves in a very quiet way. He probably wants to avoid creating false hopes because of a trip from which, undoubtedly, no concrete or immediate results can be expected.
> Today, Mr. Bourassa goes to New York to reassure American investors. Each time the Quebec premier went to New York, it was for the purpose of reassuring, reassuring again and again. In other words, he comes to New York as a "panhandler", a "beggar", a timorous person!

It is always with the same self-consciousness, the same lack of confidence, the same negative attitude that this annual trek is made to the American financiers. Unfortunately, they are the real masters of our economy.

During the electoral campaign, they are very interested in maintaining the same system and in order to do so they see to it that the political organizations which are prepared to support them have the money to pursue their activities.

How humiliating it must be to be the premier of a province as rich as Quebec and act as a modern panhandler. It must also be humiliating to the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister of Canada and having to kowtow to Canadian or more often American businessmen. What would we do, where and how could we run this country if we did not have all those American dollars and if we were not getting deeper and deeper into debt as we develop?

This is one of the stupidities of our governments, of our politicians and of the present system. And we, Creditistes, cannot accept such stupidities. Canada borrows money elsewhere at high interest rates and we lend it back interest-free to other countries. Would any businessman who thinks he is bright accept such a situation?

However, we find that with the workings of logic and the pressure of time, some minds open up. We are told that we are right and our theories are taken up again.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

I would like to read a telegram which was sent to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) on March 14, that is two days ago. It reads as follows:

• (9:10 p.m.)

[English]

Parliament Buildings, Ottawa

It seems to me the Canadian people have had a bellyfull of you chaps jetting around the world spending and offering millions of our tax dollars in foreign aid while we who pay the freight have a tough time watching unemployment take its toll in our have-not areas. It is time you called Mr. Sharp home and call off these Santa Claus junkets by diverting some of these millions to give us back our railways and putting our people back to work. I have a sure-fire plan if you will direct your people to study it for a crash program. As far as we are concerned the honeymoon is over and its time for action for Canadians, not Africa or Timbuctu. If I am wrong, let me know because I speak for a lot of Canadians awaiting your reply.

Respectfully
Eddie Sargent, M.P.P. Grey-Bruce

[Translation]

This shows that not only the Créditistes are shocked by the attitude of our Prime Minister who travels around the world offering money free of interest.

But when it is suggested to apply the same principle to municipalities, they laugh and find it funny. Well, we ask for the same thing as the Liberal member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), we ask that the foreign aid to Africa and underdeveloped countries of the world be also applied to Granby or to any other city, municipality, school board or provincial government. At present, the Quebec premier must go begging to New York, begging for dollars in order to develop the province of Quebec and to mortgage at the same time our development.

Speaking of the current method of presenting the minister of Finance's budgets and of what we feel would be required in order that this presentation be made more comprehensible, more efficient and more normal, what strikes me, when I read the budget documents submitted each year and see the amounts allocated to each item, each year, is that both the "national debt" and the interests on it are going up.

In 1867, Canada's national debt was only $75 million; it increased five times before World War I to more than $314 million. After World War I, the debt jumped to $1,2 billion and increased five-fold in six years.

Then we went through the depression and World War II. In 1945 the national debt amounted to more than $11 billion. From 1945 to 1960 it increased by about $1 billion reaching a total of $12 billion 89 million. From 1960 to 1968 it increased by more than $4 billion to exceed $16 billion in 1968.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, considering the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, we can expect another increase in the national debt of more than $1 billion. It is more striking to read the ever growing amounts that taxpayers are asked to pay each year for servicing the public debt.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: I am grateful to my colleagues for granting me this permission.

In 1969-70, real expenditures under the public debt item were $1,709,938,172. In 1970-71, expenditures under the same item amounted to $1,862,400,000 and finally for the year 1971-72, the hon. Minister of Finance expects expenditures, in interest alone on the public debt, of some $1,988,000,000.

If there are approximately 20 million Canadians, this represents about $100 a year for each one of them. Now, it is to be remembered that in 1945, that is after the Second World War, the per capita interest on the public debt amounted to $26.42 as compared with $42.17 in 1960.

Twelve years later, that is in 1972, every Canadian will have to disburse almost $100 to this effect.

These are the results of the financial system of which the present government and the preceding ones is and have been the faithful servants.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Although there are some who claim that this is good, such as Alexander Hamilton, the spokesman for international bankers and, more so, for the conservative party of American federalists, who said that a public debt is of national benefit because it enables businessmen, financiers and bankers to make investments that are without risk, others state—and I have heard the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) repeat it—that a national debt is not harmful for the country, because Canadians owe this money to one another and because the money required to pay the cost of such debt is taken in one pocket and placed in another.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion should know that those pockets do not usually belong to the same taxpayers.

We have in the past asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to say who were the government bondholders, to give us the names and addresses of the country's creditors. He has not been able to do so or else he did not want to. If he had, we could have seen that the people who in Canada draw interests on the public debt, who will get something out of the $2 billion or so, that Canadians will pay in 1972, do not belong to the category of the have-nots. Far from it, the ones who pocket these interests already enjoy considerable incomes. The major part of these interests will merely go to increase the bankers' dividends.

It is therefore in order to conclude that public debts are repressive and punitive measures, because they hurt mostly low-income people, those who only draw a small income and must contribute about 15 per cent of their taxes to the payment of the national debt.

Therefore, it is time to come back to sounder financial conceptions, and to the introduction of budgets more in keeping with the realities that they should reflect.

What is, indeed, the main function of a minister of Finance? Presently, the Minister of Finance sets down the budget of the nation, figures out the expenditures and the taxes that he has to collect to cover them. If the public seems too heavily taxed, as it is the case concerning the white paper, the Minister of Finance decides either to cut down expenditures on certain items, or to contract new loans which are reflected by a further increase of the public debt.

At the present time, public finances are divided in receipts and expenditures and lead each year to a balance or to a running into debt which means that with the years, as I said a while ago, the Canadian debt is increasing.

The Minister of Finance and his predecessor (Mr. Sharp) did not act otherwise. The Ministers of Finance of previous governments had done the same thing, not a single one acts otherwise and not a single political party thinks otherwise, except the Ralliement Créditiste. We agree on one point: The Minister of Finance must introduce a budget showing the receipts and expenditures for the year, but there is more than a mere recording of figures under the column "expenditures and receipts."

A Minister of Finance under a Créditiste government would also submit a balance sheet of Canadian assets and liabilities, a statement indicating the enrichment and another showing the impoverishment of Canada.

For that purpose, a Créditiste government would establish a national credit board which would have to record in the assets column, any increase in wealth in Canada. A bridge built in Canada by Canadians would be an enrichment which should appear in the assets statement.

The construction of a road, a seaway, a hospital or a school, all new public services offered the people of Canada must appear among the assets of the country.

At the present time, I challenge the government and the Minister of Finance to show them to me in the budgets he introduced. I dare him to show me where those additions to the assets of Canada, that new Canadian wealth, are to be found.

In the same trend of thought, the new plants built in Canada, the increase in the Canadian population, should be taken into account. It is said that the human capital is our greatest wealth. Where is mention made of it on the books, under the assets of the country? Nowhere.

Also, more than 300,000 new graduates will enter the labour market this year. That is a sure asset, that is a source of wealth, because those new workers, better educated than their elders, will use their energies, their mind and their knowledge to ensure a greater and better production. That is a very important asset for this country.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

Each year the assets should increase, but nothing of the kind appears at present in the budgetary papers which the present Minister of Finance, or previous ministers of finance table each year.

For instance, which agency sees to it that the financial credit reflects the increase in real credit? Who anticipates the increase in financial credit, in the face of the increase in real values? The increase in financial credit is done haphazardly, hit or miss, according to the fancy of bankers, sole creators of credit in Canada under the present system.

If production increases, who makes sure that the purchasing power increases accordingly? Which government agency makes sure that the amount of money in circulation increases in the same proportion so as to balance the higher output produced by Canadians? The Minister of Finance does not care about an increase in productivity due to new factories, new workers, new brains. No government, no political party, whether or not in the opposition, ever proposed that the positive assets of Canada be made to benefit Canadians.

Everything is left to chance. The governments, the various ministers of finance have never been concerned with controlling the money supply according to our assets or liabilities or our yearly increase in depreciation and in output. The governments let the entrepreneurs and finance ministers settle their accounts with the bankers when money gets scarce.

Chartered banks, private interests are those who decide to increase or reduce the money supply according to production. The bankers are the ones who decide also that all that money will have to come out of the consumers' or taxpayers' pockets, through higher taxes or interests.

Any increase in wealth is thus checked and restrained, penalized and taxed. Farmers, industrialists and all governments must comply with the wishes and the terms of bankers. But what would a Créditiste government do? According to the monetary system of the Social Credit, the best thing to do is to fill such a gap through the establishment of an accounting method geared to the requirements of our country. Should the production capacity increase, the national credit account should show it under assets. Any depreciation, any wearing out, any loss, any destruction, should be entered under liabilities.

The difference should normally be reflected by a net increase in wealth to which must correspond an issue of money which would enable the country to profit by it.

This may not seem like much.

But if in 1929 we had used such an accounting method to adjust money to reality, people would not have starved before heaps of products. If in 1971, we used this accounting method, we would not have about one million unemployed to reflect our paralyzed production because we are short of money in spite of affluence.

What is the Minister of Finance asking himself when preparing his budget? What does the country want, what can the country pay? He starts by asking himself the second question if he wants to balance his budget. Under a Créditiste system, what would the Minister of Finance ask himself? He would ask himself two questions. What does the country want? Whan can Canada supply, not in terms of money or taxes, but in terms of men, labour, resources and techniques?

• (9:30 p.m.)

Who are those and what are the materials the country can do without in the production of food and clothing, in the construction of roads, bridges and hospitals?

If the government decides to build the pipeline along the Mackenzie, the workers and businesses engaged in this project will produce neither food nor clothing. Other people will have to provide them in their stead, to produce food for those employed in the construction of the pipeline as well as for themselves.

The problem is to know whether, under a Social Credit government, the country would be physically able to construct the pipeline without prejudice to the production of consumer goods. Money has nothing to do with that, nor does the bankers' will. Under the Social Credit system there would still exist physical problems, but no longer monetary problems, since money should reflect the real facts and be connected with them.

A Social Credit budget would be based on the hierarchy of the public services required and possibly available, and there would be no question of taxes, for government expenses have nothing to do with taxes. Then, it would provide for the cases where excess money would have to be withdrawn, but it would not impose taxes simply to balance the budget. Taxes have nothing to do with expenditures. The basis of the Social Credit budget would be what the country can provide in the form of public or private services, and the financing problem would be set aside, for finance must be managed as the needs appear, within the physical limits of the country's possibilities.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), has tabled the following motion:

That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy.

I congratulate them heartily because it is a rather sorry sight to find that the government not only does not innovate, but also keeps repeating the mistakes of preceding governments. This is why we propose that they apply or at least study honestly the open and earnest position of the Social Credit, but in vain because our advice falls on barren land; at the sight of members laughing, we wonder if that is the only thing they can do.

However, this is a definite proposal, in the sense that we suggest again to the government to study first the Créditiste proposals before rejecting them out of hand.

The present liberal government believed, at the last election, that it had appropriate solutions to the various problems of the Canadian people, and that they are more themselves who said that, but publicity, the power of money.

Mr. Speaker, the government must recognize today its failure in this respect. Successive governments, both Grits and Tories, never wanted to admit that the basic problem which is the direct source of all others was the financial problem. Instead of recognizing it and trying to tackle it, they focus their policies on secondary problems which in fact prove that they are unaware of the real problems of the Canadian people, and that they are more interested in protecting their party than in bringing new and effective solutions. We saw a proof of that when a good Grit and a good Tory, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) and the member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) had a heated exchange.

To realize the ineffectiveness of this administration, one has only to recall the countless white papers and royal commissions which cost millions of dollars and give nothing to the population. Those are the solutions offered to us. We, of the Ralliement Creditiste, are most anxious to get action from the government.

The solutions suggested by the Créditistes all have economic balance as a common denominator, as determined by the constant balance that should exist between the production forces on the one hand and the consumer forces on the other. In suggesting practical and specific legislation, Social Credit tends to accelerate the economic process involving both these major lines of force while enabling the human individual to fully enjoy its role as a producer or as a consumer, in complete freedom, and security, assured of a guaranteed minimum income as the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) said a while ago.

To achieve that we propose as a basic rule a debt-free monetary and credit system through realistic monetary and fiscal proposals to encourage the balance of our internal economy and of our foreign trade.

The successive Liberal and Conservative governments have all advocated the same monetary and fiscal solutions for the same economic and financial problems. You may recall for instance the famous period of austerity imposed on us by the Conservative government under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who was Prime Minister in 1962.

As the Liberals of Mr. Pearson were then in the opposition, they proposed, as you will see at page 1348 of Hansard of November 6, 1962, the following motion blaming the Conservative government, and I quote:

This House is of the opinion that the emergency austerity program of tariff surcharges and tight money introduced on June 24 of this year should be stopped at once.

That was Mr. Pearson, Mr. Speaker, blaming Mr. Diefenbaker.

The Progressive Conservatives, it will be remembered, had formulated and adopted on June 24, 1962 a policy of credit restrictions. They said: tighten your belts, because of inflationary pressures. This galloping inflation must be checked.

Progressive Conservatives, in their effort to prevent galloping inflation, prevented Canadians from eating and living decently and from freely fulfilling themselves, although our country abounds in resources.

The Progressive Conservatives' credit restriction policy, completely failed and the fight against inflation, waged by means of inadequate fiscal and monetary means, brought about a real unemployment crisis.

The Progressive Conservatives were defeated and the Liberals took over. The car did not work any more. Instead of repairing the motor, they were satisfied with changing the fuel, and the driver. As a result, nothing changed and the car still did not run. It is always the same thing. The same causes produce the same effects, as the saying goes, and thus, they refuse to consider new proposals.

Let us continue this short lecture on Canadian history, because it is very interesting. Thus it is that the actual Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) immediately following his election whose success was due not to the solutions proposed, but rather to well-filled coffers and a well orchestrated publicity, attacked inflation head on.

• (9:40 p.m.)

We must check inflation, he said. He therefore took steps to put a restraint on credit by raising tariff rates, for instance, and allowing a spectacular increase in interest rates.

This is exactly what the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) the Prime Minister of the time did, and in 1962, the right hon. Mr. Pearson put the blame on the Conservatives for this action. All this was intended to collect votes, of course.

Mr. Speaker, the result of this is that one fine morning the right hon. Prime Minister will get up and say: Inflation is no longer gaining ground, it has been curbed. Then we will wake up and, once more, find unemployment. So we will start studying unemployment rates only to note that we are the prey to an amazing unemployment crisis. It is exactly what happened after the famous fight against inflation during the former conservative administration. The more it changes, the more it is the same!

Mr. Speaker, I would say that there is deliberate ill-will. The liberals will claim that this is false, but I will prove to them tonight that they are mistaken and that they mislead the public.

As a matter of fact, on November 6, 1962, because of the ridiculous measures adopted by the Progressive Conservative government to solve the economic problem and because of the stupid political play for votes by the liberals who were blaming the Conservatives for doing what they themselves had done previously, the Créditistes rose to move an amendment to the amendment which read as follows, and I quote:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "and replaced with a policy of debt free money and constructive proposals to foster balanced domestic economy and balanced international trade."

In other words, that was what we are proposing today. And tomorrow when the speeches of our hon. colleagues are read, it will be found that all have repeated the same thing.

In 1962, Créditistes were demanding, as today, a comprehensive monetary reform and were offering the progressive conservative government then in office solutions to the financial problems of those days.

Mr. Speaker, it would at this time be interesting to look into the way the Liberals voted on this Créditiste motion in 1962. They supported it. Among the Liberals who voted for the créditiste amendment to the amendment, there were the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard), the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), Senator Martin, former Prime Minister Pearson, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Sauvé and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). There were also many other members who voted in favour of the Créditiste amendment which requested the replacement of the present system of indebtedness by a debt free monetary system. That was the Créditiste amendment.

It provided for an in depth monetary reform through which the present monetary system of indebtedness would be replaced by a policy of debt free money, with a view to balancing the forces of production and consumption and thus allowing every Canadian citizen to play his full role in the economic system.

At that time, the liberals voted for—

Mr. Béchard: Where is that?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will find the reference on page 1348 of Hansard for November 6, 1962—

Mr. Béchard: That does not mean anything.

Mr. Fortin: It means that the liberals, at that time, voted for returning the control of money and credit to the Bank of Canada and thus have money serve the Canadian people.

Mr. Béchard: That is not true.

Mr. Fortin: But were they really interested in that fundamental reform, or did they merely want to overthrow the progressive conservative government and take over the power? Furthermore, the protests of the hon. member opposite prove it.

That is hypocrisy, or else simply, dishonesty towards the people.

Today, the Liberals laugh at the Créditiste proposals and refuse to consider them. It is sheer inconsistency which shows that they are only interested in governing at the expense of the Canadian people who are finally the ones who suffer.

Loans were not first granted to foreign countries by the Liberals but by the Conservatives and they continued to do so. Thus Liberals and Conservatives have never done anything to finance the public sector, as requested.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

Hundreds of million dollars are granted to foreign countries, but Canadians are told that it is impossible to grant them any money. Recently, during the question period, I asked the Prime Minister—

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, when I have completed my remarks, I will gladly answer all questions. I will give time to the hon. member to prepare his question, it will be better.

Last week, I asked the Prime Minister whether he intended to grant interest free loans to the provinces and municipalities to finance the public sector, as he did for India, where he just happened to leave behind $201 millions to be paid back without interest over a period of 50 years.

He stood up and replied that such small amounts could not be granted to the provinces and municipalities. That is rather a serious answer, which indicates again that one is not there to manage the assets of the people, but the power, on the grounds that others would not do better.

Mr. Speaker, this is an upside down system placed under the leadership of the most "upside down" people you can find.

Mr. Béchard: This is Caouette, spit and image.

Mr. Fortin: It is an honor, thank you. For instance, Tories or Grits, when in office, will grant millions in loans, but not to Canadians.

As a result, Canadians have to live in poverty in an overaffluent country. This is why we blame the government; because it did not apply Social Credit monetary proposals, although the Grits did support them on November 6, 1962 while they were in the opposition.

This, I repeat, shows their poor reliability and their lack of competence in managing public affairs.

The Canadian people are anxious to know what solutions such governments propose, and as long as we have to put up with reform on paper, that is with white papers and reports from royal commissions of inquiry, and as my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) said, as long as we act as beggars, hardship will keep growing in Canada.

I am now ready to listen to the question of my colleague, whom I hope, is not himself a beggar of the kind that was known in the past in Quebec and Ottawa.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member now has enough time to reply to my question. I will put to him the question I intended to ask when I interrupted him.

He appeared to criticize the loans and gifts granted by Canada to underdeveloped countries.

Does the hon. member object to Canada helping underdeveloped countries?

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to my hon. colleague for that question. I thank him for having given me written notice of his question, thus allowing me to prepare the reply I have before me.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Ralliement Créditiste in the House at the present time, as well as those who have preceded us—

Mr. Béchard: Please reply.

Mr. Fortin: —have always favoured interest-free loans to other countries. Besides, Mr. Speaker, they are part of the monetary policy put forward by Social Credit: provide money to serve people, to serve human beings, whatever their race or language, for we make no distinctions. In 1950, Canada deposited with the International Monetary Fund the interest-free amount of $245,400,000, and with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development the amount of $53,506,500, to be paid back in 50 years, with 10 years' grace. If the same favour were granted to Quebec, to other provinces or municipalities, today, the country could be developed.

I now ask a question of the hon. member. If he thinks these loans are desirable for foreigners, why not for Canadians?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes have the knack of answering without saying anything. I asked for an answer and I am given a speech on Social Credit.

Would the honourable member tell me which item of the Social Credit program provides—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat, please. The parliamentary secretary had the floor for the purpose of asking a question. If he would ask his question, I think the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) would be prepared to reply to it.

• (9:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, we find once more how minds can be distorted. We are in favour of loans to foreign countries but we want loans to be made available to Canadians. I hope it is clear enough for my "dumb" colleague.

An hon. Member: It is temporary.

Mr. Fortin: I hope for him it is temporary but that could be fixed.

Anyway, I am sorry to have lost my temper. When we try to suggest solutions, that is the kind of answer we get. Anyway, I have conducted a study which lead me to conclude that Canadians are now in debt for over 13 billion dollars with finance companies, banks and private lenders.

Canada's debt is overwhelming and to finance it, we are about to borrow from foreigners at high interest rates to pay the interests on our debt and not to pay it off.

That is how Canada's debt and Canadians' debts increase and how our purchasing power is being reduced. In fact, in order to repay these loans, Canadians must, of course, pay more taxes.

This is why this policy of loans without interest is basic since it would promote our economic growth, the development of the public sector and of provincial and local governments out of public funds made available by the Bank of Canada and loans without interest, to ensure the continuous, progressive development of Canada. That is what we want and I hope those proposals will be studied fairly by the members opposite so that we may get out of the beaten track, break up new ground and finally act upon them.

It is important to put order in the present administration. In conclusion, I point out that the gross national product in Canada, in October 1970, was $84.1 billion. The three levels of government spent $30.9 billion or 38 per cent of the total. In 1967, the three levels of government spent only 35 per cent of the gross national product.

Within three years, the total expenditures of the three levels of government increased by 47 per cent. Where did they get the money? In the taxpayers' pockets.

Let us see now whether the money supply went up. Mr. Speaker...

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prevent my friend from going on with his explanations, but he was asked to answer a question, I realize that he has been speaking for 15 minutes. If his time is up, Mr. Speaker, you should recognize another member. I am ready to speak if you allow me.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The understanding of the Chair is that the hon. member's time has not elapsed. If I am in error in this respect, I stand to be corrected. However, I have not yet received advice that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member sat down, having said he had concluded his remarks, and was ready to accept a question from the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard). I raised the point of order because he had finished his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is aware that the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) said this during the course of his remarks, but often hon. members say they are about to conclude their remarks when in fact they are not. The Chair must be guided by the time allotted to hon. members, and I have not yet been advised that the hon. member's time has expired.

Social Credit Monetary Policy

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I said before, the gross national product has increased constantly and, on the other hand, in December 1970, the money supply was totalling 32,081 million dollars.

We can see the lack of balance between the forces of production on the one hand the forces of consumption on the other.

This is the reason why the debts of Canadians, of municipalities and of provinces continue to increase. This is also why we blame the government for not having seen fit to apply social credit.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I am advised that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I only have three minutes left to answer those ridiculous and childish charges raised as a result of the motion which very seriously implied that this government should adopt a monetary policy in line with Créditiste theories.

Mr. Speaker, I only have three minutes left and the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) should put an end to his antics.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The opening remarks of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) have absolutely no connection with the motion which reads as follows:

> That this House regrets that the government has not seen fit to apply Social Credit monetary policy——because its administration is an economic failure.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie has very limited time at his disposal. With respect, it seems to the Chair that the debate has been rather wide-ranging on this motion and I hope hon. members will allow the hon. member for Sainte-Marie to be heard.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your—

Some hon. Members: Oh! oh!

Mr. Valade: I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of the House it is forbidden to an hon. member to cause disorder in the House—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hope the House will allow the hon. member for Sainte-Marie to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is an old, Liberal trick.

Mr. Valade: It is an old, Liberal trick—yet these are the people who have condemned the Conservatives and the Liberals for avoiding the issue.

Mr. Bell: The Liberals voted for them at one time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have just proved by my remarks that the statements of the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) that we are a great country which should respect the two founding groups are still valid. The hon. member for Témiscamingue outlined for the House his concept of a new federalism, which he commended. His party has just dared me to speak in the House otherwise than in French, an attitude which proves the hypocrisy of the Créditistes in this House while their leader claims to be the great champion of civil liberties, of the great democratic freedom of Parliament. He is the one—

Mr. Rondeau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair understands the hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I point out that it is ten o'clock sharp.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR CANADA—SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVE INDIAN GIRLS AS STEWARDESSES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) indicated, in answer to a question prior to a supplementary put by me, that there was no racial discrimination in the hiring policies of the Department of Transport. I think the question originally had to do with the hiring of native people. I was prompted to ask the supplementary question, requesting the minister to use the influence of his office to see that no discrimination was practised by carriers and other agencies that come under his jurisdiction.

Like other hon. members who represent western constituencies, it is natural that I travel across Canada frequently, and since I am not yet blind nor, I hope, senile I have often had occasion to observe air hostesses. I do not imagine I am unique in that masculine pastime. I refer to air hostesses, stewardesses—in particular, those employed by Air Canada. I have seen and heard, and gathered from their speech patterns, girls who obviously were born in Britain, some who sounded as if they were born in Germany, certainly a number of French-Canadian girls, West Indian girls, Chinese-Canadian girls and Canadian born girls of Caucasian origin.

• (10:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Any from Port Moody?

Mr. Rose: Not so far. But in all my travels I have yet to see a stewardess who looks as if she is of Indian or Eskimo ancestry.

An hon. Member: Or Métis?

Mr. Rose: Or Métis. I have asked myself, why is this? Surely a responsible Crown corporation such as Air Canada would not countenance something as pernicious as racial discrimination in its hiring policies. However, I have not seen any representatives of the indigenous peoples working in the capacity of air hostess.

If we rule out the possibility of racial discrimination—and I certainly rule that out as an overt practice—what are the other possible explanations? It may be said that one is that young, native, indigenous women are not interested in this occupation—but that would be strange, and most unlikely, because this occupation is one of the most attractive and is considered glamorous by many young women. It is therefore sought by young women. I know that a number of bush airlines employ young Eskimo and native men as pilots, so clearly indigenous people are not averse to flying.

Another explanation is that it is possible—indeed, it may be probable—that far too few of our young, native women can meet the entrance qualifications because of a long and tragic history of cultural collapse and sociological chaos. This has resulted from an educational system that is inadequate and has failed to prepare these young women to meet the entrance standards required by airlines.

It is because of the sociological chaos and cultural collapse that I raise this matter tonight. I think that the airlines should, as a matter of policy, actively recruit native Indian and Eskimo girls for stewardess positions. There are between 250,000 and 300,000 indigenous people in this country, and I believe that they are grossly underrepresented in positions of this kind, just as I believe that native Indians and Eskimos are grossly underrepresented in our secondary schools and colleges. It is time we did something to correct this situation.

I know that one or two natives were hired by Air Canada as long ago as 1965, and I believe that PWA also has a policy of hiring young, indigenous people. But I think there should be far more of these hirings, even if we have to lower the educational requirements. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because we constantly see cases where kids have gone back to college without having to surmount the prerequisite academic hurdles that most of us were required to surmount, and they have done very well. I think we will find that our native peoples will do very well in this field.

I think it is time we started discriminating in favour of our native peoples. For hundreds of years we have discriminated against them. I think that in this country we are becoming more enlightened: we recognize that there are minorities. In the case of Francophones who have been underrepresented in the federal public service, the government has introduced a policy which will try to correct this situation. My party and I support these programs.

I should like to see young, native males and females enter occupations for which I think they would be well suited. For instance, they could embark upon all kinds of tourist-oriented occupations. At present many tourist kiosks across the country employ high school students in the summer. In British Columbia we employ them as tourist guides on the ferries of Mr. Bennett's "navy". Why could not some of these positions be held open for native peoples? I do not think there are enough native people in such positions.

I should like to see far more attention paid to providing native peoples with an opportunity to enter the attractive and, let us say, "status" positions—because they have been excluded from them in the past. I hope there will be more job opportunities for them in fields in which they can make a worthwhile contribution. Let me emphasize that I do not think they should be singled out and become part of the advertising or promotional campaign of any company. Nevertheless, I think that if given a chance to do a job they will be proud of, they will work hard and acquit themselves admirably.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond this evening to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), and in so doing to express without reservation the concurrence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and, I am sure, the entire government in promoting employment policies that are non-discriminatory.

We are discussing a subject with regard to which I can only say that everything possible is being done to ensure that no person or group of persons is discriminated against in this country. Sometimes in carrying out policies problems can arise with personalities, but action always is taken promptly to rectify any unfair or unjust practices.

In the case of Air Canada, their policy on hiring stewardesses is well known. Ethnic origin is not a determining factor. There are certain educational qualifications, certain physical qualifications and in some cases language requirements which must be met by an applicant. Provided these qualifications are satisfied, selection is on the basis of merit without regard to any question of racial background.

In extending these assurances to the hon. member I add that if he has any additional suggestions in mind which would benefit either Air Canada or the Department of Transport, I would be only too pleased to take them up with the appropriate authorities. Air Canada officials will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in several weeks' time and the hon. member will have plenty of opportunity to ask detailed questions at this forum.

STATUS OF WOMEN—DESIGNATION OF MINISTER TO STUDY COMMISSION REPORT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be ladies' night. A month ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if, in view of the great interest being shown by women's organizations across the country, he could name the date when someone in the cabinet would be designated to be in charge of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and its implementation. Agile as usual, the Prime Minister replied that he was surprised at my suggestion that we downgrade the report to the level of one minister, adding:

> I say the full cabinet is concerned with it.

Having learned from my childhood that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, I was not impressed with this reply, particularly when I recalled what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said earlier. Cornered some time ago by newsmen and asked which minister would most likely be chosen, he laughed and said he did not know if any of them would be keen to take on the job.

I was impressed, however, when the Prime Minister made the status of women the subject of his address to the Liberal party's fund raising dinner in Toronto on March 3. He indicated that progress toward equality had been made by women since 1912, when Sir Rodmond Roblin, then Premier of Manitoba, complained that he was "opposed by all the short-haired women and all the long-haired men in the province". The Prime Minister could have added that when the women of Manitoba sent a delegation to him to ask for the vote, he called them "hyenas in petticoats". We have come a long way since then, but there is still a long way to go before women can reach true equality with men in the work place, the home, the legislative halls and the community.

The Prime Minister has taken certain, very useful first steps by establishing an interdepartmental committee to examine the recommendations of the status of women report and a co-ordinator who is a very able woman. However, in my opinion that is not enough. If the report is being taken seriously by the government, and if its findings are to be given high legislative priority, there must be someone at cabinet level to push them and work for their implementation. Hints have been made at cabinet level that something of that kind may be forthcoming. Speaking in the debate on the status of women report, initiated in this House by the New Democratic Party on March 9, the minister in charge of housing said:

I might go so far as to say that if our friends in the opposition will help us get through the government reorganization bill, it might even happen that the minister chosen to handle this subject will be appointed.

A brand new minister to handle the status of women report? Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs was right—and none of the existing ministers are brave enough to take on the job.

Mr. Benjamin: Barney will do it.

Mrs. MacInnis: Several federal by-elections will soon be held. Perhaps the Prime Minister has it in mind to run a woman in a safe seat—if he can find one—and then appoint her as a minister; who knows? The important thing is to appoint a minister who will make a start. Even a man will do, if he is competent. What is important is to get going on some of the most urgent recommendations of the report.

• (10:10 p.m.)

As the minister in charge of housing observed recently, we cannot research for ever; we have to move, even if still somewhat crudely, in some direction. Once again I ask the Prime Minister to tell us when we may expect to see a minister charged with getting the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women out of the pages of the report and into legislative action.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to engage in this somewhat informal debate with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). She has already referred to the remarks of the minister responsible for housing. I should like to quote from his statement as reported in Hansard for March 9, page 4097, as follows:

The recommendations of this royal commission directly affect the programs of 25 federal departments. Actions on the recommendations can easily be counter-productive, tending perhaps to cancel each other out if they are not very carefully co-ordinated. This government wants action, as the priority pledge of the Prime Minister indicates, but it does not want a mish-mash. So there has been established a central co-ordinating function within the Privy Council office. I might go so far as to say that if our friends in the opposition will help us get through the government re-organization bill it might even happen that the minister chosen to handle this subject will be appointed. In the meantime, an interdepartmental committee is being established to examine all the recommendations and to draft policy suggestions for the cabinet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now give us your answer.

Mr. Danson: Aside from the rhetoric which may be generated on this subject, if we review the legislation, the policies and the appointments made by this government and take into account the high priority which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave to this issue in the speech to which the hon. member referred, together with the fact that he followed this up with such decisive action, the situation is indeed encouraging. I would gladly settle for equal rights with women. The Prime Minister is, of course, having this experience himself at the present time. Whether the minister envisaged by the hon. lady is male or female really does not matter, as she herself said. It is a question of sensitivity and awareness of what ought to be done. Otherwise, it becomes a form of discrimination in itself.

Those of us who were present on a memorable occasion not long ago heard a speech which was a milestone in the history of the government of Canada. I could not help but be moved by the words of the Prime Minister in Toronto that night. Our actions to date, and those which are to come, besides, of course, the deep commitment made by the Prime Minister only the following day, indicate the thrust of the government and the tidings of good things to come.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—MARK TEN CIGARETTE COUPON PROMOTION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago on the Orders of the Day I attempted to raise a question with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) having to do with what seems to be an incredible deal put over by a cigarette company, Mark Ten Cigarettes. Under the terms of this deal, Mark Ten Cigarettes undertook to provide any person who smoked a pack of their cigarettes a day, saved one coupon from each pack and turned them in to the company, with a colour-television set.

The incredible part of this deal, to me, is that according to my figures it would take no less than 243 years for a smoker who smoked one pack per day and followed the other instructions to acquire a colour-television set. I realize that the intention of the cigarette company is to encourage people to get together, smoke as hard as they can and get as many coupons out of the packets as possible so that they can be turned in. But even if ten people got together, it would take them 24 years at that rate to get a colour-television set. To me this seemed to be a matter that would surely interest the Minister of Justice—if there is any justice—in regard to the Criminal Code and its broad sections. I was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker at the time, but I welcome the opportunity to say a few words tonight and put the question again.

I have spoken so far only in regard to the length of time that the Mark Ten cigarette couponeering deal would take a person to get a television set by smoking their cigarettes, but I might mention it would also take about $50,000 worth of cigarette packages to qualify for a set. I will not say anything at the moment—though I have in the past and probably will in the future—about the impairment to health that would follow the smoking of so many cigarettes. We are told that the smoking of 88,000 packages, either individually or shared between 10 or 20 people, would do much to promote lung cancer, heart trouble, emphysema and bronchitis.

It is no secret that cigarette smoking has been condemned by our health and welfare department and the equivalent departments of other countries as the greatest disease-breeder known. Although my question was ruled out of order at the time I raised it, I am thankful that the Canadian Press saw fit to put it across the country. I have received a great many responses as a result of the publicity given my question.

I come back to this point. I should like a representative of the government to say whether the Minister of Justice intends to look into the promotion put forward by Mark Ten Cigarettes with a view to ascertaining whether this is a matter that concerns the minister under the Criminal Code, or whether he would at least refer the matter to the attention of his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford).

In conclusion, I am sure I am right in suggesting that the Mark Ten Cigarette Company, and perhaps others, knowing very well that the day is very close when the government will finally introduce legislation to phase out cigarette advertising and couponeering, are seeking the opportunity of hooking as many people as possible and making them as addicted to smoking as they can before cigarette advertising is prohibited. I should like a representative of the government to state what is the position of the government in this regard.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister's views on the use of promotional gimmicks are well known to members of the House and the public in general. The government has laid charges recently in a number of cases involving advertising and promotion through games, contests and other devices, under the misleading advertising provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. Two companies, including one cigarette company, have been convicted. We have four cases involving games and contests before the courts at the present time. We will, of course, examine this promotion, which involves premiums, to see whether it contravenes the Combines Investigation Act. Hon. members can be assured that we will take whatever action the existing law allows.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND CO-CHAIRMEN OF COMMISSION

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, last week in response to a request from the hon. member for Edmonton West I undertook to table correspondence between myself and the co-chairmen of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. Under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I should like to fulfil that undertaking, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

PROPOSED UNITED KINGDOM AGRICULTURAL IMPORT LEVY SYSTEM—STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITAIN

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the government of the United Kingdom announced last October that they were planning to introduce a new system of import levies on certain agricultural products, particularly cereals. The United Kingdom indicated that the purpose of this move is to reduce the dependence of British farmers on support payments from the treasury and to pave the way for adaptation of the British agricultural system to the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community if Britain is successful in the negotiations for membership in the Common Market.

Of special concern to Canada was the British intention to include products such as wheat, barley and flour under the new levy system and the impact this might have on our traditional exports of these cereals to Britain. The Canadian government, therefore, immediately expressed its concern about this to the British authorities in the strongest terms. Intensive consultations were held with the United Kingdom at both the ministerial and official levels. The subject was discussed with British Prime Minister Heath during his visit to Ottawa last December and with Mr. Rippon, the British minister responsible for the negotiations with the EEC, when he was here earlier this month. Discussions with the British were continued last week in London by a Canadian delegation consisting of officials of government departments and the Canadian Wheat Board.

The British government have made it clear that they intend to proceed with introduction of the general levy system effective July 1, 1971. They asked the major suppliers, Canada, the United States, Australia and Argentina, to enter into agreements with them under which we would temporarily suspend our rights to bindings in the British tariff on the products concerned. It would have been open to Canada and the other major supplying countries to decline to enter into such agreements. Britain would then have been obliged to negotiate its way out of its contractual commitments by offering compensation to Canada and the other supplying countries or, if it was unable or unwilling to provide adequate compensation, to acquiesce in the withdrawal of concessions enjoyed by British goods in our markets. However, this would have been of no assistance to the agricultural interests affected by the British scheme. Therefore, while keeping this possibility in reserve, we and the other major suppliers decided it was more advantageous to seek improvements in the mechanics of the British levy system which would lessen its trade impact and to explore the terms and conditions which we could obtain in return for a temporary suspension of our contractual rights.

As a result of these discussions we have now obtained firm undertakings from Britain to make important changes in the operation of their scheme as it affects Canadian interests. We have also obtained categorical assurances that the British objective will be to avoid disruption of existing patterns of trade with Canada, including the level of imports, and that Britain will consult with us on all aspects of the implementation of their new policy. Furthermore, the British government has agreed to reduce the average increases in their "minimum import prices" from the levels they had originally proposed to an average of £ 3½ in the crop year 1971-72 and £ 6, over the present level, in the period from July 1 to December 31, 1972.

In the light of, and of course contingent on, these undertakings the Canadian government has now indicated to the British government that it will not at this time exercise its contractual rights by virtue of tariff bindings under the GATT and bilateral agreements. It is understood that these rights, however, remain unimpaired. Moreover, the agreement we have negotiated with Britain may be terminated on three months' notice.

The following are the specific changes in the operation of the levy scheme which the British government has agreed to make as a result of the consultations with Canada:

(a) incorporation of Canadian wheat grades in the schedule of threshold prices on a more favourable basis than originally proposed including alterations in the schedule to take full account of the new Canadian grading system;

(b) separate category for selected malting barley so that any levy on this product will not be set by lower priced feed barley;

(c) separate category for denatured feed wheat so that any levy on milling grades would not be based on low prices of feed wheat;

(d) separate category for flour for animal feeding purposes in order to avoid the possibility that any levy on baking flour would be based on low-priced feed flour.

Despite these important improvements and the assurances we have received, the Canadian government has indicated to the U.K. that the move to a levy system in a sector of trade which is so important to Canada is a matter of serious concern. This relates not only to the possible direct impact for Canadian trade but also to the implications for efforts to liberalize international trade in agricultural products and minimize adverse effects of EEC enlargement on outside suppliers of farm products. We shall, therefore, be keeping the developments of our cereals trade with Britain under close review in the light of the undertakings we have obtained.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, on a first glance at the statement one must come to the conclusion that the ramifications of Britain's entry into the European Common Market will be very great. Thus it would seem logical that there should be a great deal of consultation between the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom in which all sectors of the Canadian economy must be involved. Those concerned with agricultural products, as well as those concerned with other commodities, must be given full information at all times. Certainly one would want to have the views of the opposition parties in the House. To this end I suggest that an item in the estimates might be brought before the House in order that this matter may be fully debated and members of the opposition may have an opportunity to put forward their views. This should be done so that, without any intention of hindering Britain in its efforts, Canadians may fully appreciate some of the problems facing that country and so that we may have the opportunity to present our views as to the approach we think should be taken by Canada.

I note that, according to a survey taken in Britain, approximately 70 per cent of the people there are not interested in Britain entering the European Common Market at the moment. This percentage may change as a result of negotiation. In view of the fact that we are willing to co-operate with Great Britain by relaxing some of our existing agreements in order to facilitate her negotiations, I hope Britain will be mindful of our position. Should she become a partner in the European Common Market, I hope her influence will be such that some of the existing barriers to trade will be broken down. I refer particularly to the use of subsidies by European Common Market countries, some of which are greater than the total price we receive for our products at the moment.

Without making further comment, I hope that the government will provide additional information later and give hon. members the fullest opportunity to explore the possible ramifications of this latest move.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the whole trade picture for grain is still going to be kept under review, that there is a possibility of returning to the tariff system from the levy system, and that negotiations may continue simply underwrites the uncertainty that we face in this very important area of trade. This flows directly from the failure of the Kennedy Round and the GATT negotiations to reach a satisfactory agreement with the Common Market on trade in farm products, cereal grains in particular. This is the fundamental point. Britain is merely adjusting to these circumstances. We are trying to adjust our trade to what Britain is doing.

The volume of our wheat sales to England has declined steadily in recent years. We have no assurance from the minister that this trend will not continue. We have no assurance from him that as a result of these lengthy negotiations we can be sure of an open entry to the British market and of not only maintaining our present trade in grain but increasing it.

It is time that the government made a clear statement to the House as to the position we are going to occupy with regard to cereal grains and whether we can expect to maintain our present volume of exports to England and to the Common Market. I wonder whether the government has explored the possibility of an associate status for Canada or are we going to find ourselves increasingly shut out of the Common Market? Are we going to lose access to that important market on an increasing scale?

The government should clarify its policy on this matter and also clarify how we are going to maintain our markets. We want answers. The report on the negotiations which the minister has just made to the House does not answer these very important questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I also believe that more information should be given to the House when there are changes in the field of exports or imports. We are convinced, however, that agriculture remains the basis of the economic structure of any society, including ours.

We must admit that the economic situation is changing around the world. With regard to exports and imports, we have noted that, for several years now, India and other countries, who sued to purchase part of our wheat production, have become exporting countries.

We understand that circumstances change, and that we must adapt to them, but nevertheless the minister in charge of wheat or grain sales to other countries should always keep the House well informed of the situation facing our wheat and grain producers.

I urge the minister to keep us in future more promptly informed of such matters than he does at present.

In any case, we hope our trade with England and other countries increases in such a way as to permit us adequately to promote Canadian agriculture.

INDUSTRY

LAYOFFS AT CANADAIR—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I intend to request the unanimous consent of the House to bring forward a motion regarding an urgent matter.

The urgency of the situation is clearly established by the developments which have been reported by the spokesmen of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, that is that the situation at Canadair has never been so critical; that this company, which had on its payroll 10,000 workers in 1968, employs presently a mere 4,000; that a committee of reclassification forecasts that in December, the workers will be reduced to less than 1,900; that in spite of a slowdown in the aerospace industry in North America, the situation is more critical at Canadair than anywhere else; that this situation is the direct result of the inaction and lack of planning of this government as well as the lack of a comprehensive Canadian policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to remind him of the provisions of Standing Order 43. The hon. member knows that under that Standing Order, he cannot raise an argument or make a statement as if his motion had been accepted and put to the House.

The spirit and letter of Standing Order 43 require that the hon. member should state as briefly as possible the reason why he wishes to put that motion and point out the urgency of the situation without indicating the substance of the argument on which he bases the motion itself.

This in my view is the only way to progress and study such motions. I am sure that the hon. member will want to consider the suggestions I am now making.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly follow your directives. I was referring to Standing Order 43 which provides that a member who takes the initiative—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not inviting the hon. member to rise on a point of order, but I am simply reminding him of the provisions of Standing Order 43 as well as of the practice which has developed over the years. By the way, Standing Order 43 provides that hon. members who wish to introduce a motion under its terms must do so as briefly as possible.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I was precisely trying to explain to this House the state of emergency which exists presently at Canadair as an immediate result of the government policy in the aero-astronautical field. In fact, I was trying rather to clarify the urgency of the situation, because of the unemployment that it is causing and to expound the reasons behind the motion that I intend to introduce.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say that I want to stand by your ruling. This state of emergency is due to the fact that the government does not propose any short term solution as, for instance, the purchase of the CL-215 aircraft in order to prevent the impending layoff of 2,000 Canadair employees. The unemployment which threatens the employees of this industry is ascribable to the lack of long term government policy in the establishment of a policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must once more call the hon. member to order. If the terms of his motion are not pursuant to the Standing Order, it will not even be possible to put the motion to the House. The hon. member may move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. Therefore, I would invite him to explain as quickly as possible the motion he intends to move.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, in view of the disastrous situation of the economy and, in particular, of the employment situation in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the Committee on Regional Development be required to consider without delay the economic difficulties in which Canadair of Montreal finds itself at this time, and recommend to the government immediate measures to be taken in order to palliate massive layoffs in this industry.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the hon. member's motion—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OPPORTUNITY FOR CANADIANS TO INVEST IN MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter concerns the desire of the Canadian people to be given the opportunity to invest in Canadian developments and the failure of the government to take cognizance of this fact while giving lip service to economic nationalism—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. I think this is a clear abuse of the Standing Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have to bring this to the attention of the House. I have previously brought to the attention of other hon. members the fact that Standing Order 43 is a very special Standing Order and, until recently, was rarely used. A change was made in our procedures relating to Standing Order 26, and following that, Standing Order 43 has been used by hon. members in place of Standing Order 26. But I point out that Standing Order 43 has a very limited application.

I suggest to the hon. member for Athabasca and to the House in general that Standing Order 43 does not provide an opportunity for debate. It does not make it possible for any member of the House, for someone representing another party, to comment on the statements which are being made in support of such motion. In the circumstances I suggest that it is entirely out of order and contrary not only to the spirit but also to the letter of the Standing Order to make a lengthy statement in support of a proposed motion. All an hon. member can do is to follow the prescription of Standing Order 43 and explain why there is urgency that the motion proposed for consideration under the terms of Standing Order 43 should be received by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Yewchuk: I apologize to you, Sir, if I have not worded it properly but I was trying to explain as briefly as I could the reason for the motion. I hope I will have the opportunity to utter another sentence or two. If you will bear with me I will continue for a minute or two.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: I was referring to economic nationalism—

Mr. Basford: Who is abusing Parliament now?

Mr. Yewchuk: Quiet, Curly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: The urgency in this matter arises out of the fact that Canadians may be deprived of one of the greatest opportunities to invest in their own country that may present itself in the immediately foreseeable future. I refer to the Mackenzie valley pipeline which is being proposed by the government and the construction of which, according to the government's statements, is to be carried out by foreign interests.

I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the establishment of a mechanism which would allow Canadians to invest in this pipeline. The answer was in the negative on both occasions. I am therefore asking the unanimous consent of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas):

That the question of the creation of a mechanism through which Canadians will be given an opportunity to invest in the proposed Mackenzie valley pipeline be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for consideration and report.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member, which requires unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

TARAS SHEVCHENKO—SAINT PATRICK

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is coincidental that the month of March is set aside for the observances of two great people, first, to honour Taras Shevchenko, Ukraine's great bard and universally acclaimed champion of freedom. Shevchenko is admired as much for his poetry as he is revered for his undaunted spirit and devotion to freedom, truth and justice. Thousands of Ukrainians, young and old in Canada will take part in special programs and concerts dedicated to the memory of the man most strongly identified with the ideals and aspirations of the Ukrainian people.

It is today, too, that we celebrate St. Patrick's Day, a great day for the Irish and for those who are not Irish but wish to be Irish. With your consent, Mr. Speaker, and with the consent of the House I would like to present a little token of kindness, to match his tie, to "O'Trudeau" from "O'Paproski" from the cockles of me heart.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Put it on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation having been made and the hat worn I should like to suggest to hon. members that there must be some Standing Order which is being offended either by the hon. member presenting the hat or the right hon. gentleman wearing it at this time.

Mr. Hees: You are allowed to wear it. The rules of the House say you are allowed to wear it.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I believe that under the Standing Orders there is still room for a hat in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*AIR CANADA—FREE TRAVEL FOR PERSONNEL

Question No. 719—Mr. Orlikow:

In view of Air Canada's desire to economize wherever possible and to run the system as efficiently as possible, did Air Canada recently decide that employees and their wives in certain management levels may now travel as free riders on a confirmed reservation basis even though the seats they occupy may be needed for fare paying passengers and, if so, for what reason?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Air Canada advises as follows: At the beginning of the year, the Company rearranged its pass procedures slightly, to provide more efficient arrangements for movement of company personnel travelling on business, including in certain cases, right to make a reservation in economy, subject, however, to deplanement if the space is needed for a revenue passenger. No substantial change was made in regard to the position of senior management in this respect, other than the development of a new built-in identification code to assist local agents in determining company personnel for deplanement if space is needed for revenue passengers.

SNOWMOBILE NOISE POLLUTION CONTROLS

Question No. 803—Mr. Hales:

Is the government presently considering adoption of noise pollution controls, other than those for snowmobiles mentioned on January 19, 1971, at page 2538 of Hansard and, if so, for each set of controls (a) what is the purpose of the controls (b) what department is involved in drafting the controls (c) when are the controls expected to be announced?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The government is considering safety standards to establish maximum noise levels in vehicles such as buses and trucks. (a) The purpose of this noise standard will be to protect drivers, passengers and people in the proximity of roadways from health impairment due to noise pollution. (b) The Road and Motor Vehicle Traffic Safety Branch of the Department of Transport is drafting amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Regulations with the assistance of the Department of Justice. (c) Regulations in the United Kingdom and California and those of the Economic Commission for Europe are presently being reviewed. It is too early to estimate when they might be issued because of serious implications related to the power to weight ratio and safety on the road.

PUBLIC SERVICE—UNIFORMED OFFICERS

Question No. 834—Mr. Mather:

Are there any uniformed officers in the Public Service whose responsibilities encompass the enforcement and/or administration of a variety of laws or regulations similar to the responsibilities of Customs Officers but excluding Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, if so (a) who are such officers (b) what laws or regulations fall within the scope of their activities?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed as follows: Yes. The Department of Agriculture: (a) Officers of the Plant Protection Division are located at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. (b) Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Note: Officers of the Health of Animals Branch are located at the Ports of Halifax, Saint John, Montreal and Vancouver. While they are not in the full meaning of the term "uniformed officers", they customarily wear a uniform cap when performing their duties. Their responsibilities in enforcement and administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Regulations, and the Meat Inspection Regulations with regard to restricted commodities entering the country bear some similarity to the responsibility of Customs Officers.

The Department of Fisheries and Forestry: (a) Fishery Officers; Fishery Wardens; Ship's Officers in the marine service of the Department. (b) Fisheries Act and Regulations; Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act; North Pacific Halibut Fishery Convention Act; North Pacific Fisheries Convention Act; Fish Inspection Act and Regulations; Coastal Fisheries Protection Act; Whaling Convention Act; Territorial Sea Fishing Zones Act; Pacific Fur Seals Convention Act; Pacific Salmon Fisheries Convention Act; Navigable Waters Protection Act.

The Department of Manpower and Immigration: (a) Immigration Officers at Ports of Entry; (b) Immigration Act and Regulations.

HARBOUR FACILITIES

Question No. 855—Mr. Blouin:

Since 1967, how much money has the government spent on new harbour facilities and improvements of existing wharves, including the building of sheds and related facilities in (a) Montreal (b) Quebec City (c) St. John (d) Halifax (e) Vancouver (f) Baie Comeau (g) Sept-Îles?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Department of Public Works advises as follows: (a) Montreal, nil; (b) Quebec City, nil; (c) Saint John (Ferry), $4,866,269.30 by Ministry of Transport funds; Main Channel, $159,878; (d) Halifax, Quay Wall, $439,690 by D.N.D. funds; (e) Vancouver—First Narrows, $2,575,402; (f) Baie Comeau, $289,709; (g) Sept-Iles, $304,848. The National Harbours Board advises as follows: (a) $9,283,619; (b) $7,475,100; (c) $2,071,368; (d) $13,764,831; (e) $13,951,221. The Department of Transport advises as follows: (f) $289,709; (g) $304,898.

COMMERCIAL VALUE OF STORED BUTTER

Question No. 871—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): (Supplementary)

What was the commercial value of stored butter on (a) January 31, 1970 (b) January 31, 1971?

[Translation]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): According to Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures, creamery butter in storage on: (a) January 31, 1970 totalled 83,351,000 pounds; (b) January 31, 1971 totalled 81,745,000 pounds. The commercial value of creamery butter in both 1970 and 1971 was the support price of butter by the Canadian Dairy Commission—65 cents per pound. The agreements specify wood utilization standards and there is also provision requiring approval of annual operating plans. ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANPOWER

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—FORECAST OF JOBS IN PRIVATE SECTOR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State with regard to the program entitled "Opportunities for Youth". The Secretary of State is supposed to be here today. He may very well have an excuse but if he has not I would have sought one myself rather than try to explain this program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In his absence I would direct the question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. The minister has given an estimate of some 600,000 students to be employed in the private sector as against some 730,000 students employed in the private sector last year. I should like to ask the minister how he proposes to make up this difference, especially since there will be substantially more students seeking employment this year than last?

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is referring to a couple of different sets of figures, and I would have to go into the whole conversation I had with the reporter to explain to him.

An hon. Member: Don't be shy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration give his forecast of the number of students who in his estimation will be employed by the private sector during the coming vacation season?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the conversation was about the mathematics applied to last year's figures as that would lead to certain mathematical conclusions this year. I will be glad to supply a scratch sheet with that information on it for the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: I did not ask the minister about any conversation he had outside the House, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister again for his forecast as to the employment of students in the private sector this year. This is no joke, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I was only trying to refer to the difficulty of starting a question with figures that do not themselves have any basis in fact.

An hon. Member: You are used to that.

Mr. Lang: It is not possible to make any very precise calculations on matters like this which depend upon so many variables that have to be taken into consideration. Therefore there is no precise forecast. All one can do is to take the situation for one or two previous years, compare the situation this year and try to weigh the variables and reach a conclusion based on those factors.

Mr. Stanfield: I might ask the minister whether he will agree with me that the prospects for students under this program are very grim indeed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is obviously argumentative.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR JUDGING APPLICATIONS UNDER OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH SCHEME

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us whether the criteria which will be employed in judging grant applications under the opportunities for youth scheme will be made public in the near future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would expect so.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR OVERSEAS JOBS FOR POST-SECONDARY STUDENTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the 3,200 overseas jobs that are being provided by his department for post-secondary students be made available according to need as well as language skills?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a program which has resulted from negotiations with a number of countries. The procedure for final selection rests in the hands of the host countries. I am not certain that in every case need will be taken into consideration.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—REDUCTION OF TUITION FEES, MORATORIUM ON REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that tens of thousands of students will get less than eight weeks of work this summer, is the government considering assisting the provinces in reducing tuition fees?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, under our assistance to the provinces for post-secondary education we are paying 50 per cent of the costs. We are not in a position, of course, to decide for the provinces whether they will have a different set of term systems than they now have.

Mr. Carter: Is the government going to introduce amendments to the student loan legislation and declare a moratorium on the repayment of such loans?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question. The provinces meet with the federal government each year to discuss the terms of the student loan program. Also, there are provisions within the student loan program to make such postponement if postponement is necessary.

[Translation]

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I wish to direct to the Prime Minister.

Would he tell us whether he intends to open discussions with provincial government officials for the purpose of achieving a global solution to the summer student employment problem so that the federal and provincial governments may join forces, efforts and resources and settle this matter once and for all?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will point out the fact that such consultations were held during the weeks which preceded the announcement by the federal government. The Secretary of State is at present in one of the provincial capitals for the purpose of discussing the implementation of these measures.

It is obvious that we cannot do much more than consult with the provinces since, as the hon. member knows well, in this field of education we have no powers whatsoever to reorganize the academic year in such a way that students would study the whole year round instead of coming out every summer and invading the labour market for three or four months.

[English]

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—ASSISTANCE FOR MARRIED STUDENTS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. With reference to the right hon. gentleman's announcement yesterday concerning the program of student employment and activities, may I ask whether the government intends to initiate programs for married students which will provide income and adequate savings so they may resume their studies in the fall?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not envisaging at this time making any announcements additional to the ones we made yesterday.

Mr. Muir: I realize that the right hon. gentleman's experience as far as marital responsibilities are concerned is quite limited, but would he not agree that some action should be taken to assist married students who would like to return to their studies in the fall and who have the added expense of a wife?

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—INCENTIVES TO PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since, in the final analysis, private industry will be the big employer of students in the summer, is the Prime Minister considering any special tax incentives to private industry to encourage the employment of such students?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister heard my question.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, he did, but he is not considering it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I heard it, Mr. Speaker, and the answer is no.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED REPEGGING OF DOLLAR TO ASSIST FOREST INDUSTRY TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In order to assist the forest industry to hire more students this summer, is the government going to repeg the Canadian dollar at a level consistent with expanding the exports of that industry?

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—REFUSAL OF GRANT TO McGILL STUDENT ENTREPRENEURIAL AGENCY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the non-program announced yesterday by the government, can the minister explain why he refused a grant of money to the McGill Student Entrepreneurial Agency Incorporated, a non-profit, self-help organization which over the past two years has provided or found jobs for over 500 students?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, basically and specifically, because the program was not eligible for grants. Of course, if any of the programs of this organization are eligible for support under the job opportunities program, it can apply in connection with those projects.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask why the program was not forwarded to the Secretary of State for his consideration?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the applicants can submit their own direct applications. The application which we were considering was probably not one of those that was suitable for the program. In any case, it would be parts of projects upon which they might be working which might be more eligible.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS UNDER INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAM

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I divert a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I also seek clarification of a point in the minister's news release yesterday on the international student summer employment exchange program between Canada and some ten other countries. On page 2 of appendix B there is the statement that students may apply at any Canada Manpower Centre prior to March 31, 1971, which is only 13 or 14 days from now. It says that they may apply. Does it mean they must apply before that date? Is there a deadline for applications under this program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Their applications are to be in by that date. The posters have been up for some days in all universities and in other places all across the country, and early applications are requested.

Mr. Rose: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that there are five or six hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries about this matter. I suggest to hon. members that very soon we should change the subject. For the moment the hon. member for Fraser Valley West has the floor.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to reconsider because two weeks is hardly sufficient time for people to make their plans and apply for this kind of program.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of a representation.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the questions regarding aid for students. Will there be any provision for aid to their worthy contemporaries, the thousands of unemployed and unskilled young people who are not in school or college?

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY TO PERSONS IN REMOTE COMMUNITIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the youth programs announced by the Prime Minister will be more easily available to young persons in large cities and in the central region of Canada, will he consider the referral of the subject to a standing committee so that the ministers and staffs involved can appear to define clearly the various aspects of the program in order that all Canadians, especially those in remote and isolated communities, will be able to take advantage of those programs that have been previously denied to them and thereby enjoy equal opportunity?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will consider if anything can be done along this line.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—JOBS AVAILABLE IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board who reports to the House for the Public Service Commission. I should like to know approximately how many vacancies will exist in the Public Service for students this summer and what proportion of these will be in the national capital region?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not have those figures at hand but I will obtain them for the hon. member.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. member. There is apparently a new and last supplementary question on a certain subject, and I will soon recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[English]

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): I have a supplementary for the President of the Treasury Board. I should like to ask the minister whether students, particularly those coming from western Canada, who wish to work in the Public Service of Canada in the national capital, will be at any disadvantage if they are not bilingual?

Mr. Drury: The answer, quite unequivocally, is no.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, here is the question I want to put to the Prime Minister.

Since journalists and commentators, who know practically everything, have been telling us for close to a month that there will be a general election this autumn in Canada, can the Prime Minister confirm or deny those rumours?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not at this time in a position to give a specific reply. I must, however, say that the rumour, as far as I know, comes primarily from opposition members seeking in this way to justify their dilatory tactics in parliamentary debates. (Applause)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON APPEAL FOR PEACE IN LAOS BY INTERNATIONAL CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is for the Prime Minister. It arises out of reports that the representative of India on the International Control Commission has invited the Polish and the Canadian representatives to join in a public appeal for peace in Laos and that the Polish representative has agreed but the Canadian government has rejected the invitation. Has Canada rejected an invitation to participate in this appeal and, if so, why?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has not rejected the proposal, simply because it has not yet been formally submitted to the Commission.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether an invitation has been received and whether the Canadian government has indicated it is prepared to join in this appeal for peace in Laos? How soon may we expect some statement in view of the fact that the press reports which have gone around the world indicate that Canada is the only member of the Control Commission which has not agreed to join this appeal?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that Canada has already made known its position. Canada had made a concrete proposal. Now, the representatives of India have put forward another proposal. The Canadian government feels that it has some merits, but that it cannot replace the action which the International Control Commission may take, and which might be much more efficient than the suggestion of India.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: I am quite aware of the proposal which the Canadian government made. I am still asking why Canada has not joined with India and Poland in a public appeal for peace in Laos. The fact that the Canadian proposal has not been adopted is not the question at issue. I am asking the parliamentary secretary a direct question: why has Canada not joined with the other two members of the International Control Commission in supporting a public appeal for peace in Laos?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that, quite a long time ago already, Canada has clearly stated its views in favour of peace in that part of the world.

RESEARCH

MEASURES TO OFFSET LACK OF GROWTH

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the statement by the chairman of the Science Council of Canada that research and development have not grown in Canada for two years and may be headed for a sharp decline in 1971, is the government planning to adopt measures in the near future to correct this situation so that production, which generates employment and depends heavily on industrial research for its forward momentum, will not continue to be adversely affected?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe the reference by the chairman of the Science Council was to research in industry. As the hon. member knows, the government is presently trying to reorganize itself in a way which will enable it to deal with this subject more comprehensively. As soon as the House sees fit to pass the government reorganization bill we shall consider the appointment of a minister to deal with science matters.

Mr. Hees: In view of the fact that no new laboratories have been opened in the past two years, while six have closed down, will the Prime Minister personally interest himself in this vitally important matter since it is something which can influence the production of jobs very effectively in the future?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the hon. member will agree that if we had a minister who could devote his whole time to this subject it would be even preferable to my showing a special interest in it. This is why I appeal to the opposition to facilitate the passage of the government reorganization bill.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Since the Prime Minister refuses to look into this matter personally—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —will he take his head out of the sand—

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

PROPOSED MINISTRIES OF STATE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising from the fact that we now have some indication of what the right hon. gentleman would propose. Will he undertake to tell us, when the appropriate stage of the reorganization bill is reached in committee of the whole House, what other ministries of state, in addition to science, he proposes to set up in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Indication has already been given that we would wish to have a minister of state designated for the purpose of looking at housing and urban affairs. That is one other area. We have also indicated that through this bill we would be able to appoint a minister responsible for the whole sphere of the environment. That is another area. I do not know whether the hon. member wants me to spell out in advance what ministers without portfolio or ministers of state would be assigned to various fields, but obviously I cannot foretell which areas might have to be covered by special ministers in the future. I have just mentioned two and it seems to me this clearly indicates the urgency attached to the passing of this bill by the House.

Mr. McCleave: My question to the Prime Minister was concerned with the setting up of ministries which would be assigned specific responsibilities. Provision for the establishment of a ministry of the environment is already set out in the legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the Prime Minister consider appointing a minister of state for unemployment?

CITIZENSHIP

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CHARGES BY ALEX BANDY OF FALSEHOOD, DECEPTION AND INEFFICIENCY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of citizenship. Would the minister make a full report to the House on motions in connection with the charges of falsehood, deception and inefficiency in the citizenship branch made by its employee, Mr. Alex Bandy of Vancouver?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): The hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss this matter in the committee in the course of the examination of the estimates of the citizenship branch. In the meantime, I can only say we have taken the advice of Mr. Bandy as to the worth of his services.

Mrs. MacInnis: Can the minister assure the House that citizenship participation in his department means more than just low-income citizenship groups being analysed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ALLEGED REPORT PREPARED BY ALEX BANDY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister whether he will table in the House the report which the parliamentary secretary stated Mr. Bandy was being retained to complete?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I am not sure to what report the hon. gentleman is referring. It was explained in the House that he was gathering documentation on poverty groups in British Columbia. If the hon. gentleman would like to attend the committee examining the estimates I would be glad to respond to questions on that subject.

Mr. Stanfield: The parliamentary secretary stated in the House that this gentleman was being kept on until he had completed his report. I am asking the minister whether he is prepared to table the report which the gentleman in question says he was never asked to write?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into exactly what form the report took, but I would be glad to consider that.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that the government had taken Mr. Bandy's estimate of his worth at its face value. Is he also prepared to take Mr. Bandy's word as to the worth of the department and the waste of public money?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY AS TO ELIMINATION OF OATH AND SWEARING OF ALLEGIANCE

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I would ask the minister to tell us, before we deal with the estimates of his department, whether or not a directive has been issued which would basically alter the citizenship court procedure to the extent of eliminating the oath of citizenship and the swearing of allegiance to the Crown?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister with Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH

SHORTAGE OF DOCTORS—DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON KEEPING MEDICAL SCHOOLS OPEN ALL YEAR

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a continuing question having to do with the acute shortage of doctors, particularly general practitioners. Can the minister tell the House whether the government is discussing with the provinces the possibility of keeping the medical faculties open all year round, thus allowing for maximum use of equipment while at the same time reducing the length of time required to get a degree in medicine?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Simcoe North for giving me notice of his question. He is aware that this is a matter falling within provincial jurisdiction. Our department would be generally in favour of the concept, and if the hon. member would like to correspond with the provincial ministers on the matter we would welcome it.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to ask the minister whether the federal government will participate by helping to finance any joint program of enrolment of medical students.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, under our medicare legislation and the health grants provisions, we are already assisting in this regard. If certain provinces wish to get this type of program under way we would be pleased to consider any ways in which we could help.

MANPOWER

QUEBEC—MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG THOSE UNDER 25

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that 42 per cent of the unemployed in the province of Quebec are under 25 years of age and that nothing is being done to solve this problem, would the minister tell us if special measures will be taken to find work for these young people?

[English]

Hon Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, quite a number of the regular measures that the government has taken with regard to the total employment situation, and also the special ones announced in the last couple of days, are weighted in the direction of those parts of the country where unemployment is highest. They should, therefore, be of direct benefit to the groups the hon. member mentions.

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF RESEARCH STUDIES—SETTLEMENT OF INDIAN AND ESKIMO LAND CLAIMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but he has left the House. Perhaps I could direct it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who could take it as notice if he cannot answer it and pass it on to his confrere. In view of the great concern over the ecological impact of the proposed oil pipeline down the Mackenzie River valley, would the minister table all the research studies that have been undertaken on the matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will consider that suggestion. In the very comprehensive debate last Friday, I outlined in great detail the research that had been done by various agencies, both governmental and extragovernmental, as well as in the private sector and by universities, which I thought would be helpful to the House and the country. However, I will consider the suggestion of the hon. member regarding the tabling of the specific studies.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a supplementary question. Perhaps this could be taken as notice for the attention of the minister of northern affairs. Could the minister give the House an assurance that the land claims of the Indian and Eskimo population of the territories arising from this project, as well as the claims under Treaties 8 and 11, will be settled by negotiation and consultation with these first Canadians as an integral part of the whole project?

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN BECAUSE OF BAN ON SALE—CLOSURE OF SALTFISH PROCESSSING PLANTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the number of swordfishermen presently unemployed in Atlantic Canada because of the ban on the sale of swordfish to the United States, has the minister decided on a program to assist these fishermen and, if so, when can we expect the details of this program to be announced?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be receiving the report of a joint federal-provincial task force on this problem next week.

Mr. Crouse: Since the shortage of codfish has brought about the closing of two large saltfish processors in Nova Scotia, has the minister investigated alternative programs which may be implemented to utilize the facilities in these two large plants, thereby alleviating some of the unemployment that their closing has created?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST IN STABILIZING SILVER PRICES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the request made recently by Mexico and Peru for Canada's help in stabilizing world silver prices, has Canada replied to this request and what action does the government intend to take to help achieve more reasonable prices for silver producers in Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): May I please take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

NEGOTIATIONS WITH CANADA PENSION PLAN ADMINISTRATION RESPECTING RETIREMENT SCHEME

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have there been any negotiations to the minister's knowledge between the authorities of the Canada Pension Plan and the crown company Devco with respect to the phase-in, phase-out retirement scheme that they have adopted?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but in any event the Canada Pension Plan would apply to these men if they have been making contributions. Any other private arrangements that they have would be strictly their own private concern.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I did not want the minister to try to interpret what is going on. Since the Canada Pension Plan has been promoted as a universal scheme, I ask the minister the direct question: Does he feel that and Crown company, or any company for that matter, can fool around with the Canada Pension Plan which is available to all wage earners in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister to express an opinion.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS—COMPLAINT UNDER ANTI-COMBINES LAW

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a complaint under section 32 of the anti-combines legislation by six people who have complained that the charges of the banks on cheques are in contravention of that section? Will the minister see that this complaint is expedited by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was told that six people were intending to lodge such a complaint. Whether or not it has been received, I have not yet had notice of it. However, as I pointed out in the House the other day such action by the banks is not covered, as I understand the law, by the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the minister check to see whether such a complaint has been received and what has been the decision of his advisers on the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister ask the chartered banks of Canada to withhold implementing the increase in charges until a decision has been reached?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, banking services and financial services are not covered, nor are any other services, by the Combines Investigation Act. The Economic Council of Canada recommended that financial services be covered by the Combines Investigation Act, and the banks have been acting in such a way recently, I think, as to probably convince the public that they should be covered.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will realize that there are only a few minutes left before the expiration of the question period. If there are too many supplementaries to each question, we will run short of time.

Mr. Hales: May I address my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister prevail upon the chartered banks of Canada to withhold this new charge?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, business decisions within the banking system are a matter for the banks, not for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister inform the House when the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, referred to in the Speech from the Throne, will be available to members for study?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we have been working very hard on revising the Combines Investigation Act and I hope the amendments will be introduced at the earliest possible moment, as soon as they are ready for introduction.

MANPOWER

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—TYPE OF ORGANIZATION TO PARTICIPATE IN OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH SCHEME

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State might be able to answer my question which relates to the participation of local associations and organizations in the opportunities for youth programs. It is contemplated that these should be established community associations or local associations, or is it contemplated that these will be local associations of students which will take part in this program?

Mr. Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that it will probably include both.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the parliamentary secretary indicate what will be required of the local associations by way of financial participation, and will he assure the House that guidelines and full information will be issued in respect of how associations can qualify for participation in this program, immediately and without any further delay, supplementing the very vague references in the publicity so far?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, without accepting all the comments the Leader of the Opposition makes about the program, I think the point he makes is valid. It is our intention that not only full information but criteria will be provided.

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. What progress has the government made with the United States government in its efforts to stop the flooding of Canadian territory in the Skagit River Valley?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we are continuing discussions. We were discussing this matter with the United States administration yesterday.

Mr. Harding: Is the government officially opposing the application by the Seattle City Light Company at the United States hearings on the Skagit taking place this week in Seattle?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe it is normal practice for the government of Canada to appear before semi-judicial bodies of that kind in another country.

AGRICULTURE

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH GROUP FROM WESTERN CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It arises from a reply he gave last Monday when he stated he would be prepared to give detailed consideration to regional requests to take the reference to hogs and cattle out of Bill C-176, provided the request did not come from myself. Is the Prime Minister prepared to meet with a small non-political group representing western Canada so they may put forward western Canada's requests in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there is something that cannot be decided or agreed upon between the Minister of Agriculture and this group, I will meet them, but I think it would be normal practice for them to meet with the Minister of Agriculture to see if their problem can be understood and tackled at that level.

Mr. Horner: I have a supplementary question. It relates to the fact that this bill has been in the mill for exactly a year today.

An hon. Member: Who has been holding it up?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, this is rather good evidence that there has been a stalemate between the Minister of Agriculture and the representatives of this region of western Canada. That is why I personally request the Prime Minister to hear the views of this non-political representative group from that region of Canada.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to my colleague, the Minister of Finance. It relates to the increased service charges that banks have now adopted. First of all, if a merchant imposes an extra service charge and collaborates with another merchant across the street it is called retail price maintenance. I wonder whether there is any retail price maintenance involved when the banks increase their service charges in this way and affect all citizens of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated, the Combines Investigation Act does not cover services whether it be bank or other services. Perhaps it will in the future.

PROPOSED USE OF NUCLEAR SUBMARINES TO CARRY ALASKA OIL UNDER POLAR ICE CAP TO EASTERN SEABOARD—TRANS-SHIPMENT FACILITIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It relates to the announcement by General Dynamics concerning a proposed plan for nuclear-powered submarines to carry oil under the polar ice cap. Since this will require trans-shipment facilities, has the minister's department undertaken a study with a view to having trans-shipment facilities on Canada's east coast in light of this proposal for the movement of Alaska oil down to the eastern seaboard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In addition to General Dynamics there is one other firm at least that has designed a so-called polar submarine. We have undertaken studies on both of them and these are now in the process of being evaluated. The question of trans-shipment points and related matters form part of this study. I might say that one of the reasons for referring polar ice programs to a special committee of the House was so that members could hear witnesses from groups such as these, and it might be helpful to bring them here.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANADIAN PITTSBURGH INDUSTRIES LIMITED—MEASURES TO PREVENT TRANSFER FROM QUEBEC TO ONTARIO

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the concern of the employees of the Canadian Pittsburgh Industries Limited in Montreal, I should like to ask whether he has met the directors of this company, and whether his department is making efforts in order to urge that industry to carry on with its operations in Montreal?

[Mr. Benson.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have not met anybody. That company has decided to move into Ontario. It has been said publicly that this was because of a grant from my department. That is not so. My department has not given any grant to the company. The Ontario part of that firm did receive a grant, in 1966, I believe, and that has nothing to do with what is happening in Montreal presently.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—PUBLIC SERVICE JOB OPPORTUNITIES STILL OPEN

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin. It relates to yesterday's announcement by the Public Service Commission concerning summer employment for students. Can the President of the Treasury Board say what percentage of the job opportunities are still open? I ask this question because I understand that a majority of the positions have already been filled, and the information in the press release may be misleading.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will ascertain from the Public Service Commission what the number is and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The allotted time for the question period expired a few minutes ago, but if there is unanimous consent on the part of hon. members to allow the hon. member for Middlesex to ask a supplementary question I have no objection.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS—INVESTIGATION BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wondering whether the Minister of Finance could prevail on the Governor of the Bank of Canada to investigate the increase in service charges by the banks and ascertain whether it is necessary in view of the huge profits they are making to the detriment of the citizens of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is nice that hon. members opposite should urge you to recognize more members on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has the floor for the purpose of replying to the hon. member's supplementary question.

Mr. Benson: I was attempting to do that. If Mr. Speaker recognized more members on this side of the House we would get more intelligent questions. The answer to the question is that I do not think it is within the power of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know it may be embarrassing to the Chair, but the Minister of Finance has just reflected on the Chair and the decorum of the House. He should not do that.

Mr. Benson: If I have, Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I still think it was a good suggestion.

Mr. Hees: Apologize to the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Simpson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have been endeavouring to catch Your Honour's eye since the start of the question period. In view of the minister's reply to a question yesterday, I feel that my question requires an answer today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member is not the only one who sought the recognition of the Chair. If all hon. members seek to be recognized during the question period, obviously some will not have the opportunity to do so. I bring to the attention of hon. members that when we have three, four, five or six supplementaries to a question, this is the end result. Hon. members do not have an opportunity to ask their questions. The hon. member has suggested to the Chair and the House that he has a very urgent question to ask. The Chair has no objection if the House will allow the member to ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that there does not appear to be agreement. I will undertake to recognize the hon. member immediately at the beginning of the question period tomorrow.

Mr. Simpson: Further to the point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the roster system the question will not be applicable tomorrow because the minister will not be here.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PROHIBITIONS, LABELS, STANDARDIZATION, INSPECTION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, March 15, consideration of Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question on motion No. 5 (Mr. Benjamin)?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(2) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I move

That Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, be amended by deleting clause 19 thereof and substituting therefor:

"19. A copy of each regulation or amendment to a regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make under section 11 or 18 shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and in at least one leading news publication in each province not less than once and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded thereafter to consumers, dealers and other interested persons to make representations with respect thereto."

The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is to ensure that the regulations which the minister will have power to set up under the terms of this bill will receive the widest possible dissemination across the country and that consumer groups, individual consumers, manufacturers and small businessmen will have an opportunity before the regulations are officially promulgated to make their views known to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the government.

Under clause 19 of the bill as it is now worded, all the minister has to do after the regulations have been set up is to have them published in the Canada Gazette. Clause 19 reads:

> A copy of each regulation or amendment to a regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make under section 11 or 18 shall be published in the Canada Gazette and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to consumers, dealers and other interested persons to make representations with respect thereto.

During the examination of this bill in committee, we heard evidence from most of the witnesses who appeared. Many of them were apprehensive about the legislation because of the wide discretionary powers that the bill gives to the minister. They were concerned that the regulations which would be made under the bill would not contain the proper safeguards to protect their rights. This is a justifiable misgiving, not only from the point of view of protecting the rights of Canadians who are manufacturing, whether they are small businessmen producing canned fruit or vegetables in Ontario or big conglomerates such as General Foods, but also because Canadian consumers will be affected by this bill. They have a right to know what these regulations will be. They have a right, either through consumers' associations or as individuals, to express their views on the proposed regulations to the minister and the government. If the minister does not accept my amendment, they will be denied that opportunity because the Canada Gazette does not have the widest possible circulation in Canada. As a matter of fact, the Canada Gazette is only read by politicians, senior civil servants and people who are directly involved in government at the federal, provincial and municipal levels.

What is wrong with the suggestion that the regulations be advertised in the leading newspaper of each province? This would give most people a chance to see what the government proposes to do with the power that Parliament will give it under this act. They will have this opportunity if the proposed regulations are advertised in the leading newspaper of each province. They will have an opportunity then to make their own recommendations known to the government, to protest to the government if that is necessary, or to indicate that the government has, in fact, not gone far enough to protect the consumer. I think it is worth noting that the total circulation of the Canada Gazette is less than 3,000. It has a very limited and exclusive readership which would not include the average consumer. Perhaps it might be worthwhile to place on the record a breakdown of the distribution of the Canada Gazette by provinces, in addition to the circulation of the leading newspapers in each of our 10 provinces.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In the province of British Columbia, the Canada Gazette enjoys a circulation of 114. Surely, the minister would want to have his regulations read by more people than the 114 in his province who read the Canada Gazette. I suggest to him that the way to do that would be to advertise the regulations in the Vancouver Sun, which has a circulation in excess of 210,000.

Mr. Basford: They would probably get it all wrong.

Mr. McGrath: In the province of Alberta, the Canada Gazette enjoys a circulation of 125, whereas the Edmonton Journal, the leading newspaper of that province, has a circulation of 147,000. In the province of Saskatchewan, the Canada Gazette has a circulation of 87, while the Regina Leader Post, the leading newspaper in that province, has a circulation of 60,000. In the province of Manitoba, the Canada Gazette has a circulation of 95, whereas the Winnipeg Free Press, the leading newspaper of that province, has a circulation of 130,000. In the province of Ontario, the Canada Gazette is a best seller by comparison. It enjoys a circulation of 1,362, whereas the Toronto Star, has a circulation of 400,000. In the province of Quebec, the Canada Gazette is not so popular. It has a circulation of 667, whereas the Montreal Star enjoys a circulation of 186,000, and La Presse in Montreal has a circulation of 206,000. In the province of New Brunswick, the Canada Gazette really takes a beating. It enjoys a circulation of 64, whereas the Saint John Telegraph-Journal has a circulation of 29,000. In the province of Nova Scotia, the Canada Gazette has a circulation of 69, whereas the Halifax Chronicle-Herald has a circulation of 68,000. In the province of Prince Edward Island, the Canada Gazette has a circulation of 11; that says something for Prince Edward Island. The Charlottetown Guardian enjoys a circulation of 16,500. In my own province of Newfoundland, the Canada Gazette has a circulation of 74, whereas the St. John's Evening Telegram enjoys a circulation of 46,000. When we get to Labrador, we find that the Canada Gazette has a circulation of only two.

I put these figures on the record to indicate to the House that the minister is defeating the very purpose of section 19 of the bill, which calls for the proposed regulations or amendments to a regulation to be advertised in the Canada Gazette. The reference is to regulations under section 11 of the bill which deals with undue proliferation, standardization, and so on. I ask the minister, is he serious about advertising these regulations, about having the widest dissemination of the regulations and encouraging the widest possible response to them? After all, he is not infallible, nor is the Governor in Council, and even though, hopefully, he will consult with consumer groups, with the Standards Council and with the trade groups, the proposed regulations will probably be lacking in many important aspects. There may be very serious shortcomings which would only be made known through the widest possible publication. It is obvious that they will not get this publicity unless my amendment is accepted.

Advertising in the Canada Gazette is merely a legal technicality. But surely in this particular bill, which comes close to being the minister's consumer's bill of rights and which will affect every single Canadian because we are all consumers, the minister should have departed from the standard, legalistic form of publishing the proposed regulations in the Canada Gazette. Perhaps he will be generous and accept our amendment since this is St. Patrick's Day and the minister may have a little Irish in him. There is some hope for the minister because his mother is Irish. Perhaps on St. Patrick's Day he might be constrained to accept this amendment, knowing in his heart that it will improve this bill which is so dear to him. We all hope this measure will have the desired effect, since it is receiving the support of everyone in the House.

The principle of the bill is good, but the drafting is bad. It was necessary for the government to bring in a number of amendments. In so doing they incorporated many of the ideas that we had proposed. We had proposed eight amendments in the committee. I forget the number of amendments that were submitted by my colleagues in the NDP. Of our eight amendments, four eventually surfaced as government amendments, having been first rejected by the committee. We are pleased with that. We are pleased that we were able to improve the bill. The bill now before the House is a better bill than the one that received second reading last November. Great credit is due the minister that he saw the light and improved the bill. Now he can go one step further and accept this amendment, the purpose of which is to ensure that the people of this country will know exactly what their rights are with respect to this legislation. If there is one fault that the minister and his department have, it is that they bring in laws, amend the existing laws, and bring in new regulations, all of which are designed to protect the consumers across this country but the average consumer knows nothing about them. The minister himself admitted during discussion of his estimates the other day that he had only a very limited advertising budget.

Mr. Basford: It is $600,000.

Mr. McGrath: I think his budget for advertising amendments to the Bills of Exchange Act was $15,000. This amount would not even be sufficient to let the people of my own province know that they have new rights with respect to bills of exchange and with respect to the sale of sales contracts to finance companies. Nobody in Canada knows about the amendments to the Bills of Exchange Act which every member in this House supported. I submit that nobody will know about this legislation. They will not be aware of the regulations which the Governor in Council will be empowered to set up under this bill unless these proposed regulations are first of all advertised widely right across the country. There is only one way to do that, and it is by advertising in the leading newspapers of each of the provinces. I made an offer to the minister, which I repeat here. If his budget is such that he cannot afford to advertise this important legislation, if he cannot give these important proposed regulations the publicity they deserve, then perhaps Parliament can find the money. I think it is important that we do so.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I think the minister should first accept the amendment, should agree with the argument that the proposed regulations should be as widely disseminated as possible, and then he can come back to Parliament. I am sure Parliament will vote him the necessary money. We believe this amendment would strengthen the bill, just as it has already been strengthened by previous amendments, many of them ours, albeit the government took credit for them. We believe this amendment is necessary if the people of Canada are to know of the rights they will enjoy under this legislation. We believe that the widest dissemination is necessary in order that these regulations will be honoured by people who are in the business of manufacturing, processing, packaging and distributing food and food products.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express briefly my support for the amendment. I support it on two bases. First, I think it is a very reasonable and just request that the consumers, the dealers and the processors should be advised of any regulations, or any amendments that are proposed to this new packaging bill. If it is as good as we think it is, why should we hesitate to tell the people about the bill, and about any changes or regulations that are going to be made?

My support for the amendment is also based on another part of this measure. I refer to clause 3(1) which has to do with the application of the bill. Here we have a piece of legislation drafted in such a way that we are incorporating in it one of the most dangerous principles I have ever heard in this House. I bring to the attention of hon. members this clause which reads:

—the provisions of this Act that by the terms of this Act or the regulations are applicable to any product apply notwithstanding any other Act or the Parliament of Canada.

This means that the bill and the regulations will take precedence over any other legislation that we have passed in this House. Who writes and draws up the regulations? Generally, it is public servants who draft regulations. Do you mean to tell me that we are going to allow regulations, drafted by public servants, to take precedence over any other act passed by this Parliament? This clause should not be in the bill.

I would not object if the clause read, "—by the terms of this Act are applicable to any product apply notwithstanding any other Act of the Parliament of Canada." If we allow the regulations made under the provisions of this bill to override any other act of Parliament, then we are creating a serious precedent. It is for this second reason in particular that I support the amendment. It would add weight to and strengthen the bill. If the bill is as good as we think it is, why not tell the people about the amendments and changes that will be made?

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say briefly that we in the New Democratic Party support this amendment, but probably for somewhat different reasons from those given by our good friends to my right. First of all, I should tell the House that this amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is something of a compromise. It is different from the amendment that he originally moved in the committee. In order to make it easier on the minister, and to lessen the costs of his proposal, he is submitting a compromise amendment which would require the advertising of the regulations in one leading newspaper in each province in Canada. I believe he means each territory as well.

I quite agree with what the hon. member said when he spoke to the amendment, namely, that the Canda Gazette is hardly a best seller, and that the subscribers to it in the main will be other government officials. I submit that the subscribers to the Canada Gazette will also be organizations, particularly those of the manufacturers, packagers and the processors of products which the consumers buy. No doubt these organizations subscribe to the Canada Gazette and watch it very closely. Certainly, their legal counsel will do the same thing. In addition, the consumers' associations subscribe to it. We support the amendment because we believe it is important that as many members of the general public as possible should have a chance to see the regulations and, if they wish, make representations.

Clause 19 of the bill requires the minister to publish the regulations in the Canada Gazette, and to afford an opportunity not only to the dealers and their associations but also to consumers to make representations regarding any regulations that are published. We feel that if the minister were at least to publish the regulations in one leading newspaper in each province, a significant number of members of the Canadian public would have a chance to look at them. Then, if they wished, they would have an opportunity to make representations. The argument that this will cost too much money surely is not sufficient to override the interests of the consumer. I know the minister is anxious that the public know as much about the bill as possible. Surely, this is one way in which that can be accomplished. I hope that the amendment will prove acceptable to him, since it does not in any way harm the legislation and does not in any way restrict or prevent him from carrying out all the provisions of the legislation. In fact, it will allow him to proceed even further in informing the general public about the regulations.

If the minister accepts the amendment, I hope that when his officials are preparing the advertisements for insertion in one leading newspaper in each province they see to it that the regulations are printed in a more attractive and readable manner than when they appear in the Canada Gazette. One becomes bored after reading the first line of the Canada Gazette. The regulations should be presented in an attractive form in a daily newspaper. Even if they had to be presented in the same way as a Safeway ad, this would be much better than if they appeared in the small type and legal verbiage associated with the Canada Gazette. I think the hon. member who has submitted the amendment has gone out of his way to reword his original proposal in such a manner as to make it more acceptable to the minister, with some saving of cost. I hope the minister will accept the amendment.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been urged to accept amendment No. 6 proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). There is nothing I would like to do more than accept it, but I am afraid I cannot. I have been urged to accept it for two reasons, with both of which I agree. First, that today is St. Patrick's Day and the hon. member has some Irish blood as have I. My mother was born and brought up in Bandon and Cork, so on this day of the Irish I would like to agree with my friend from Newfoundland and accept this amendment but I am afraid I cannot. The second reason that I have been urged to accept is one with which I can also agree, that we should do everything possible to inform consumers of their rights. I agree with this, the hon. member for St. John's East agrees and so does the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). But this is not the most efficient or economical way of informing consumers, hence my objection to the amendment. The amendment is put forward in the best possible spirit in the world. I endorse that spirit, that desire which we all share to inform consumers of their rights.

As I explained in the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where the bill was examined clause by clause, the cost of this proposal would be considerable. What the amendment calls for is the publication of the regulations passed under this act in the Canada Gazette and one leading newspaper in each province. Apart from the cost of publication in the Canada Gazette, the cost of publication in one newspaper would be extremely high. As an example the publication of the regulations passed under the Hazardous Products Act before Christmas relative to the safety of toys cost in excess of $15,000 for one publication. All that would be published in the legal column of a daily newspaper in one province would be some terribly complicated and legalistically worded regulation which no one would understand and we would spend $16,000 of taxpayers' money. And this would have to go on week after week as we proposed new regulations or amended and changed existing ones.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has a very limited budget. The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the budget in the committee on estimates recently when he supported the suggestion that we should have a larger budget for consumer education. I wish we had a larger budget but even so, this is not the way to spend it. What would be published would not be the regulations but only the proposed regulations. Unlike other acts of this Parliament except one, this act calls for publication of proposed regulations in the Canada Gazette. The bill states that the Governor in Council shall publish proposed regulations and allow people an opportunity to comment on them. At great cost to the taxpayers, all that would be published in the newspapers would be what we proposed to do. Various groups would then comment on them and suggest changes. We would then have to redraw the regulations and publish the final regulations. The amendment calls for publication of proposed regulations only, and this would cause great confusion. There is a better way than this to inform consumers of their rights.

This House has just completed debate on the statutory instruments' bill which arose from a special committee which concerned itself with the whole question of delegated legislation, statutory instruments and the regulation-making power of the government and its agencies. In the published report of the special committee, a whole chapter is devoted to publication, but there is no suggestion of this type of procedure. The committee knew that there was a more efficient and economic way of informing the special interest groups and the general public of their rights, and the effect of regulations being passed, than is set out in this amendment. The special committee sat week after week and month after month studying this question of the regulation-making power of the government, and had they felt that this amendment was the right way to go about things we could take it for granted that it would have been included in their recommendations. Because I think it would cause confusion, because the money spent would not be put to best use and because it has not been recommended by the special committee, I do not think the amendment can be accepted.

The government agrees with the spirit of the amendment of trying to inform consumers of their rights. However, we have already put into the bill a statutory requirement for the minister to publish proposed regulations. This requirement is contained in only one other act of this Parliament. In addition, there is a statutory duty on the minister to receive representations from all interested groups. That is a common statutory right which is usually taken for granted, but in this bill it is spelled out as a specific obligation.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Since the minister has indicated that he will not accept this amendment and since he agrees with the arguments in favour of it, could the minister inform the House how he proposes to circulate or publicize the proposed regulations? Can he tell us how he intends to solicit the response which he hopes to get from consumer groups across the country? That information would be very useful to the House because he is certainly not going to get it from the 2,800 copies of the Canada Gazette circulated in Canada.

Mr. Basford: Before starting to draw any regulation at all, we would notify the people known to be interested in whatever subject we were proposing to cover by way of regulation. For example, if we were dealing with toothpaste tubes or detergent packages or textile labelling, we would notify both the manufacturing and producer groups involved as well as the Consumers' Association of Canada. We would show them some general outline of our proposals and receive their comments, then we would draft regulations and submit them to the Department of Justice. Once they had been drawn and approved as the policy of the government, they would have to be published in the Canada Gazette as proposed regulations. However, long before publication those parties interested in the subject matter of the regulations would have been consulted and would have had an opportunity of making recommendations. Once published, of course, the statutory right to be heard arises. We would have to listen, and we would welcome comment on these regulations.

I think those who are interested in the regulations will experience no difficulty in knowing about them or in being heard. For example, the bill has arisen out of some 50 different recommendations of the Consumers Association of Canada. All of these were detailed recommendations, or detailed resolutions respecting some aspect of packaging and labelling. Most of these people are volunteers. This is not an expensive trade group, with high priced executives, directors, boards, and people who are paid to sit in the gallery of the House of Commons to ascertain what is happening. The Consumers Association is not like that. Nevertheless they, as volunteers, still are able to keep a watch on what is happening in my department, fortunately, and are able to make their input felt with respect to the making of regulations. They have done this effectively, and this bill provides the statutory right for them to do that.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? Since he did not either agree with or refute my argument concerning the regulations, may I ask the minister if it is the intention of those who drafted this bill to provide that the regulations made under the bill will apply notwithstanding any other act of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I did not reply to the hon. member's remarks because I thought they were out of order. They referred to clause 3, with which we are not now dealing. We are dealing with the amendment relating to the publication of regulations. We debated yesterday the provisions relating to clause 3. I quoted at that time from the debate in the committee. I commented on the brief from Dr. Ziegel, the prominent lawyer in this field in Canada, which suggests that clause 3 would not have the effect that the hon. member suggests it may have. Allow me to read clause 3(1):

> Subject to subsection (2) and any regulations made under section 18, the provisions of this Act that by the terms of this Act or the regulations are applicable to any product apply notwithstanding any other Act of the Parliament of Canada.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the wording of clause 3(1) is clear. It provides that this act is the paramount act, and regulations made under this act are the paramount regulations. Since there are prior acts dealing with certain aspects of packaging and labelling, it is not unusual to provide in the latest act to come before Parliament, in this case the one we are considering, that that act and the regulations passed under it will govern and be paramount. That is the issue. That is what the bill provides. The substance of this bill is that this is the paramount legislation. This is to be the principal packaging and labelling legislation, and these are to be the principal regulations in this country. If you changed that, you would destroy the whole purpose of the legislation.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the minister that I brought this question before the House because the amendment we are dealing with deals with advertising regulations. I was not referring to clause 3 specifically. I knew that we had discussed that earlier. I gather from the minister's answer that regulations drafted by employees of the government will apply notwithstanding any other act that this House has passed. In other words, regulations that the minister's department are to draft will override any other act that this Parliament has passed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, that is why we wanted these regulations publicized.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that is not quite correct. It is provided that the regulations will be made by the governor in council, which is not a group of civil servants but the cabinet of this country. The regulations passed normally under clause 3, and pursuant to the provisions of this bill, shall apply notwithstanding any other act of the Parliament of Canada. I think the wording of the legislation is clear.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's reply to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) cleared up something with regard to these regulations about which we were afraid. If my memory serves me right, the minister said that before regulations are made certain interested groups, such as manufacturing groups, retail merchant groups and others who would be involved with the regulations will be called in to discuss the regulations. Was this what the minister indicated when he replied a few minutes ago? If so, it clears up my misunderstanding somewhat regarding clause 18 which has to do with the publication of regulations. I felt that the minister was putting the cart before the horse, because I thought he said that the regulations were to be published in the Canada Gazette and then, after that, interested groups were to be allowed to appear.

I think the minister's reply was clear. I believe he said that, before the regulations are made by the governor in council or anybody in the minister's department, there will be consultation with the people concerned with the product being regulated. I do not think that that is spelled out in the bill, Mr. Speaker. If it is, I have yet to see it. Where does the bill say that the regulations will be published after there has been consultation with these groups? As I say, if my memory serves me right, the minister's reply a few minutes ago indicated that before the governor in council brings in these regulations, consultations will take place with interested parties. I should like to hear the minister repeat that, or tell us where in the bill there is provision for consultations before the governor in council makes these regulations.

Mr. McGrath: The consultations are only permissive. The bill does not say that they are mandatory.

Mr. Howe: That is what I say. On the other hand, if what the minister has said is correct, if the governor in council is to consult with the people concerned before the regulations are made, then that clears up some of our worries. We are also concerned about the matter of the regulations being advertised. The minister will listen to groups, and he may change or amend the regulations after that. However, there is no indication that the regulations will be changed or amended after the consultations. I should like the minister to clear up that matter. Also, is there any definite indication that the people concerned are to be consulted before any regulations are made?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made this clear in committee; however, judging from hon. member's comments and from comments I have seen in the press and in editorial columns, I have not made it clear. Surely, the normal processes by which legislation and regulations are drawn up will apply to this bill and to these regulations just as they apply to other bills and other regulations. The department I head has endeavoured to be assiduous in consulting with those in the private sector who may be affected by the legislation and regulations. It has been assiduous in consulting with manufacturing, producing and consuming groups. We have consulted them as to what our proposed legislation should involve, what it should provide for and what it ought to protect against.

We have followed that procedure also in the drafting of any regulations we have proposed. May I give an example and go back to something I mentioned before, the toy safety regulations which we passed pursuant to the Hazardous Products Act shortly before Christmas. They were a long time in the drafting and resulted from many, many meetings of the committee made up of the Canadian Toy Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Toy Importers Association, the Canadian Consumers Association and the Canadian Toy Testing Council. My officials, in meeting after meeting with that committee, discussed the various hazards that existed in toys available in Canada. We wanted to know the best way to eliminate those hazards. This applies to every piece of legislation we draw up and to every regulation we draw up. The hon. member raises his question on behalf of the manufacturing groups or those who might be affected. I discussed this particular bill, C-180, in its main outlines, with members of the Grocery Products Manufacturers Association more than a year ago, quite apart from the discussions which my officials have held with them. They were presented at that time with a memorandum setting out the kind of bill which the department felt should be introduced, and their comments were invited. What were the pitfalls, what were the difficulties likely to be encountered. That kind of consultation has gone on, and will continue.

The unusual feature of this bill is clause 19 which provides that even after this consultative process has gone on, after we have heard from all the groups which watch what we do in the department and are interested in our activities, after the Governor in Council has reached his conclusion as to the regulations, they must be published in the Gazette as proposed regulations upon which people have a statutory right to comment. If they have a good case, if they can show us we are wrong, we in the government, being sensible people, will change the regulations in such a way as to overcome the objection which has been raised.

I read editorials. I read that our procedure is dictatorial, authoritarian, and so on. The other day, the Financial Times, for example, wrote in connection with the packaging bill that it was proposed the minister should consult with representatives of the manufacturers, of consumer groups, and so on. Then, it added: "Mr. Basford is having none of that." Mr. Speaker, that is totally inaccurate. It is totally wrong, and I am surprised that the Financial Times is not better informed than to write editorials which say something like that. Speeches are made on the rubber chicken circuit to the effect that this department is not interested in consulting with business groups, and so on. That is quite wrong. The doors of my office, or of my department, are open to anyone who wants to talk about what we are doing or the regulations we want to draw up. Whoever says otherwise is lying, either for the purpose of discrediting the consumers' cause or because he is so misinformed, or so outside what is happening that he is not really at the centre of things. Be they members of a consumers' association or of a manufacturers' group, everyone who has something to say will find that my door is open; they are welcome to come in and express their point of view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is a long-winded answer to a very simple question. I think it is unfair of the minister to imply as he did that we voiced this reservation simply out of our concern for the manufacturing industry.

Mr. Basford: I did not say that.

Mr. McGrath: The minister said that. The purpose of my amendment is to ensure that the proposed regulations are read by as many Canadians as possible, by the average consumer. I submit that it is not possible to reach the average Canadian by means of announcement in the Canada Gazette with its relatively small circulation. The consumer has a tremendous stake in this business. We realize that the minister will consult with the manufacturers, with the consumers' associations and with some of the main packagers. We are concerned about consultation with the average consumer.

Mr. Boulanger: You will get it, don't worry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Before I put the next question, I might mention that last Monday it was agreed that a negative vote on motion No. 3 would also dispose of motion No. 4. The House will, therefore, now proceed to motion No. 5.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Basford moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is not our intention to delay this bill, since it has been around for almost four months. It was first introduced in the House on November 2 last year and received first reading, but did not come up for second reading until December 16. Since that time, Sir, it has received very exhaustive and intensive examination in committee. The Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs spent a total of 13 days examining this very important bill clause by clause, and heard 15 witnesses and as many briefs. That, coupled with the two days that the House has spent on report stage and third reading, means that the bill has received a total of 15 days debate and examination. And well it should, Sir, because it is an important bill. It is the most important consumer bill to come before this House. It certainly is the most important piece of consumer legislation to be introduced by this government.

The opposition has a responsibility in respect of government bills, and if the opposition supports the principle of a bill presented by the government it is then incumbent upon the opposition to examine that bill clause by clause, to submit amendments if necesssary, with the intention of trying to improve the bill. Now, we have supported the principle of the bill. We have made this very clear throughout. When the bill first came up for second reading our intentions in this regard were made known, and our intentions were made known during the days when the bill was receiving clause by clause examination in the committee. Since we supported the principle of the bill, we felt that the bill needed improvements.

I think that the minister will be the first to admit that the bill which is now before the House is a vastly different piece of legislation from the one he originally introduced away back on November 2, 1970. It is a better bill. It is a better bill because members of the committee representing all parties examined it very closely clause by clause. It is a better bill because many of the amendments that we moved in committee, although rejected out of hand by the government by the use of its majority on the committee, eventually resurfaced as amendments proposed by government supporters at the instigation of the minister. So, we can take some credit for the fact that the bill now before the House is a vastly improved one. It is a better bill than the one that was originally introduced. Mr. Speaker, we believe that this was our responsibility and we have tried throughout to discharge that responsibility to the best of our ability.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The minister may try to convey the impression, sometimes supported by his colleagues from the NDP, that he is custodian of the rights of the consumer. He cannot say that to this party, Mr. Speaker. Every member of this House had very special responsibilities with regard to consumer rights and no party in this House has been as diligent and aggressive in discharging this responsibility as the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In that respect, Mr. Speaker, we take a back seat to no one, not the minister or his colleagues in the government or our well meaning and well intentioned friends in the NDP. In their more serious moments, I think hon. members in this House will concede this fact. However, we had very strong reservations and doubts about the way the bill was originally drafted. Indeed, we have doubts about some of the clauses of the bill in its present form.

One thing that causes us concern, Mr. Speaker, relates to the regulations which the minister will have the authority to draw under Clause 3. Reservations were expressed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales). It is not that we have reason to doubt the minister's good intentions with respect to carrying out the intent of the bill; it is just that we do not believe the minister is the fountain of all knowledge and we do not believe that the Governor in Council is incapable of making mistakes. In view of the wide powers the minister will have under section 3 to draft regulations, which in some instances will supersede existing acts of Parliament, we believe the minister should give these proposed regulations the widest possible publicity. I submit to you, Sir, that it is not possible to do that under the present provisions of the bill. It is not possible to do that by publishing the proposed regulations in the Canada Gazette which has a very limited distribution, with a circulation of less than 3,000.

We believe that these regulations, which will be conceived by the Governor in Council after consultation with the consumers of Canada, with the Grocery Products Manufacturers' Association and other interested groups with the responsibility for manufacturing, packaging, distribution, will be presented in the Canada Gazette as proposed regulations. But we say because of the wide-ranging powers that the minister will or conceivably can have under these regulations, and because these regulations can supersede existing acts of this Parliament, they should receive the widest possible distribution so that consumer groups, co-operative groups and the average individual in this country who is concerned enough to express an opinion, can do just that. These interested parties should be able to criticize the regulations for their sins of omission or commission but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that they will be denied that opportunity because of the fact publication will be limited to the Canada Gazette.

There are 15 separate statutes presently in existence covering the packaging, labelling and, distribution of food and food products. They range all the way from the Weights and Measures Act, the Fish Inspection Act, the Meat and Canned Foods Act, to the Trademark and the Truth in Labelling Acts. The regulations which the minister has authority to draw up under clause 3 will supersede many of these 15 statutes. That is the concern of the opposition. It is our responsibility to be on guard against what would appear to be the excessive use of power by means of this use of statutory instruments. In other words, Parliament will have no say in the drafting of regulations. We say the people of Canada should have a chance to examine them before they are agreed upon and promulgated in final form. That was our main criticism of the bill.

We support the bill in principle, Mr. Speaker. We have had our innings; we have submitted our amendments in committee and many of them were accepted by the government through the back door as government amendments. We submitted two of these amendments to the House because we felt that they focussed attention on our main concern, the drafting of the bill, notwithstanding what the minister said during debate and without detracting from the bill itself. The bill is ready for third reading and I want to make it clear that we are glad it has been improved by the amendments adopted in committee. It is a better bill because of them.

In supporting the bill, this party wants to reiterate and re-emphasize its position in support of some other protection in the area of packaging and labelling. There is no question that a case can be made for many of the powers which the minister would be receiving under the terms of this bill. There is undue proliferation in sizes and there is misleading labelling on many of the food items which appear on supermarket shelves. The case has been documented and I will not repeat it here. The minister was co-chairman of a Special Joint Committee of the House and Senate on Consumer Credit which went into this problem in detail, and many of its recommendations are incorporated in this bill. The case has also been documented by the Royal Commission on Consumer Problems in the three Prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, under the chairmanship of Judge Mary Batten. The report of this commission is known as the Batten report.

We support the need for some protection. We want to emphasize and reiterate that support by supporting the bill on third reading.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, we, too, approve this legislation as far as it goes, and I suppose the minister expected us to take that position.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Basford: Some day the hon. member may see the light.

Mr. Benjamin: There are approximately 7,000 different prepackaged items at present on shop shelves in Canada. It is estimated that in the next four years there will be between 15,000 and 20,000 prepackaged items on the shop shelves of Canada. In other words, there will be a shoppers' jungle and it will be more difficult for shoppers to make intelligent decisions on the basis of quantity, quality and the value of the articles they purchase. Although I say this is a good bill as far as it goes, may I point out that we, of the New Democratic Party, took the minister at his word when he said in committee that we should worry less about the bill going too far and more about those areas in which the bill might not go far enough. In other words, he invited all hon. members to make certain that there are not areas in the bill that the minister and his officials missed or overlooked, to make sure that there are not loopholes which might be used to deceive or mislead, either intentionally or accidentally.

We took him at his word. We proposed a number of amendments in committee, none of which the minister would accept and all of which would have done even more than the minister proposed. In essence, he argued against the amendments, some of which he felt had merit, but he thought they were unconstitutional. In using that argument the minister is on extremely soft ground, because I submit, as we did earlier in this House and in committee, that if proposals we made to amend, strengthen and enlarge this bill were unconstitutional, then many other areas that the minister has included in this bill are also unconstitutional. For example, we think it is entirely illogical of the minister to require legislation that prevents deception in the area of sizes, shapes of packages or containers and contents on labels, while at the same time relying on the better nature and good ethical practices of those who manufacture, package, process and sell products to determine the matter of pricing. In dealing with the first three areas and ignoring the fourth, we think the minister is being illogical. However, we have half a loaf, and for a starving man that is better than none.

Because the minister has refused to accept amendments that would improve and enlarge the bill, we feel that within one or two years of its coming into operation he will find that some will utilize pricing practices to mislead or deceive, and that they will do this deliberately. Others will do this purely accidentally, but there will be no regulations under this legislation to correct that situation. We shall hear a further outcry from consumers once they become aware of those practices. We predict that after one or two years of experience with this legislation, the minister will regret having refused to accept our amendments regarding the storage and dating of perishable products. Such problems as we presently experience will not be corrected under this legislation.

As my hon. friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) pointed out, the committee heard witnesses from pretty well all organizations involved in the manufacture, packaging, labelling and processing of products. We also heard witnesses from the paper industry, most of whom opposed this legislation. There were a dozen or 15 of such associations appearing before the committee. On the other side of the coin, the Canadian Association of Consumers appeared before the committee in support of the legislation. I would hardly call that an even fight. Thank goodness, to the credit of the minister, as became evident in subsequent questioning, he lined himself up, in the main, on the side of the Canadian Association of Consumers and of consumers generally.

The Grocery Products Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Toilet Goods Manufacturers Association and the Paper and Packaging Manufacturing Association appeared before the committee and, I feel, deliberately exaggerated the intent and purpose of this legislation. In almost every instance, they read a great deal more into the legislation than is contained in it and said that the minister could do more than he can. They tried to mount a scare campaign. They were arrogant. They knew—they did not think—they knew that they knew better than anyone else what the needs, wishes and desires of consumers were. The president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association had the unmitigated gall to say in committee that they, the manufacturers, knew better than anybody else what the needs and desires of the consumers were. What conceit. What arrogance! I should like to think that the minister, as well as members of the committee, got the message loud and clear, because this kind of talk to a committee made up of representatives of the people of Canada should not be accepted.

We have seen more than one example of this kind of arrogance and conceit. The March issue of "Executive" carries a lengthy interview, if one can call it that so with Mr. John C. Lockwood, president of Lever Brothers Ltd. I never saw so many loaded questions in one interview in my life. The more one reads this interview the more one becomes incensed about it and the more becomes disappointed that the minister did not accept some of the amendments we proposed. I predict, in light of the attitude of this gentleman and others like him, that the minister will have a lot of fun, not to say difficulty, in enforcing his law. He will find himself in court at almost every step of the way. There will be a fight over almost every regulation made.

In the article Mr. Lockwood is reported as saying:

> The minister and his people think they know better than we do what the consumer wants, and that's an astonishing situation. After all we have spent years and hundreds of thousands of dollars in market research and have had tremendous exposure of our products to the marketplace.

That is perfectly true. Outfits like Lever Brothers have spent hundreds of thousands on market research and on exposing and selling their products. What is the reputation and history of companies which manufacture and peddle detergents and soaps? They introduce gimmickry, contests and prizes. Packages are partly filled. Packages contain a reduced amount of soap and in them is a tea towel worth less than one tenth of the value of the soap it displaces. Outfits like that have had to face courts because of the type of advertising they have carried on and because of the way they have presented their product to the public. This statement applies whether you are considering tooth paste, soap or what have you. These are the kinds of outfits that act in the manner characterized by Mr. Lockwood. He was asked this question in the interview:

> Do you question whether this group of people know what they're doing; or do you question their motivation for doing it?

The group Mr. Lockwood refers to are, "The minister and his people—pseudo-intellectual characters," all of whom show a form of arrogance that has to be fought. Mr. Lockwood not only questions this group of people, not only questions what they are doing, but also questions their motivation for doing it. I hope that the minister will have an opportunity at some time to have a good discussion with Mr. Lockwood privately. I will even send over a pair of boxing gloves for him to use. Mr. Lockwood does not think they have the necessary data to work on because none of them have much experience with the consumer market and they tend to be influenced by a few letters addressed to Box 99 or a few intellectual friends.

• (5:30 p.m.)

As the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said, we spent dozens hours listening to gentlemen like Mr. Lockwood. People like him got a hearing in greater length and depth, I imagine, than they have ever received before. I shall not take the time of the House to go further into this article, but when we read it we realize what the minister and his department will be up against. If the minister thinks for one moment that he will receive co-operation, advice and help from this outfit he is labouring under a delusion. He can expect a lot more difficulty than he has envisaged so far and he will wish that more of the tools we were proposing for him in our amendments were available before another year is up. This gentleman, Mr. Lockwood, who represents the other side, uses phrases like "galloping Basfordism".

Mr. McGrath: Watch your language.

Mr. Benjamin: I think he gives the minister too much credit. Even the minister, good though his motives are, cannot claim credit for originating the ideas in this legislation. It seems to me expressions of this kind from outfits like Lever Brothers are symptomatic of their real attitude toward the public of Canada. Their attitude is—the public is ignorant, dumb, and a bunch of suckers. To quote the head of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the manufacturers know infinitely more. Such expressions are also symptomatic of their attitude toward Members of Parliament, including members of the other place who, in a joint committee which started this work in 1966, spent months listening to the outcries of consumers across the country; everyone in public life has for 15 years been subject to the complaints and distress of consumers by the tens of thousands. Mr. Lockwood would have us believe that he knows what the consumers want; that he and people like him have been pure in the marketplace; that they have never misled consumers; that their packages are designed to give the consumer a right to choose. But he never tells us what choice the consumer is given. I submit that too often it is a choice between which package or label he would be misled by.

I am glad to hear that the spokesman for the official opposition welcomes this legislation. One is tempted to be unkind, but I will resist that temptation for fear that third reading might not be forthcoming today.

Mr. McGrath: Also it is St. Patrick's day, and I am Irish.

Mr. Benjamin: This has been a long road for the consumer and I will resist any temptation to say things about my friends in the official opposition. If I were to do so, I would have to go back a few years and quote prominent members of the Liberal party who did not think too much fuss need be made about consumer problems. They called people in the NDP and people in the Canadian Association of Consumers economic idiots, who were raising a tempest in a teapot. They concluded that these matters should be left to free enterprise, to the free market. But even they have become converted over the years.

To the minister's credit, his arrival and the arrival of some of his hon. friends in 1965 and later, speeded up this conversion. I hope that after a year or so of experience with this legislation the minister will come to this House with amendments when he finds—I did not say "if", but "when"—there are inadequacies which prevent him doing the job he wants to do. I hope he will not hesitate to persuade his colleagues that further enlargement of this legislation is necessary on the basis of his experience.

We are happy to see this legislation going through Parliament. We wish it went further in its provisions than it does, but we shall be glad to support it on third reading.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): If I might say a word before the debate on third reading is concluded, I should like to acknowledge two speeches which have been made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on behalf of the Conservative party and by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). In acknowledging those speeches, I should like to thank the hon. members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs who spent many days listening to a great range of witnesses from manufacturers associations, consumer organizations and the department in the course of examining the provisions of this bill. Some 23 sittings of the committee were held and the committee heard representations from 13 organizations in addition to hearing from myself and my officials. In addition, of course, the committee had to take account of numerous briefs and submissions from organizations which were not personally represented.

As the hon. member mentioned, a number of amendments were made in committee, including some important amendments. I acknowledge freely the germination of the ideas behind them; some of the points arose from ideas put forward by members of the opposition. I think the bill is a better bill today than it was when it went into committee, because of the suggestions by the government and the opposition, including the hon. member for St. John's East. I think that is not a criticism of me of the bill, or the government and the bill it introduced. Rather, it is to the credit of the parliamentary system and is an indication that Parliament is working. It also gives credit to the government and puts the lie to the allegation that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is always making that we are an arrogant government and do not care about the parliamentary process. As a matter of fact, I am delighted that the hon. member for St. John's East acknowledged that a number of amendments suggested by the official opposition had been accepted by me on behalf of the government. I think it is true that every bill I have introduced has been amended in committee. As I say, that is not a criticism of me or of my bills, but rather a credit to the parliamentary system and the operation of the democratic processes in this country.

I have mentioned this because we have now reached third reading stage and it has been indicated that the bill will have the unanimous support of every member of the House. I think this is significant in view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre in, I think, amusing the House in describing the interview—which I must admit I have not seen—given by the president of Lever Bros., Mr. Lockwood, who was critical of what was going on in the consumer movement.

It seems to me that Mr. Lockwood and his colleagues should take note of the fact that the members of the House of Commons of Canada, duly elected from all parts of Canada, have considered this bill very carefully, have considered it in numerous hearings before its committee, have listened to briefs from manufacturing groups, producer groups and consumer groups, and as a result of all such deliberations have come to the conclusion that the bill is needed and should be supported unanimously by Social Crediters, members of the New Democratic Party, members of the Conservative party and members of the government. If I were John Lockwood, the president of Lever Bros., or Colgate, I would consider this fact a pretty reliable consumer survey of what should be the law of this country. There are those in industry who support and are sympathetic to what the consumer movement is trying to do. I think those who do not fall into this category should take note of what is happening in this House this afternoon.

I also hope that those gentlemen in the other place who form the other part of this Parliament, and who sometimes have not been sympathetic to legislation introduced by the consumer affairs department will take note, not of editorials in the Financial Post or in the Financial Times, but of the fact that this bill is passing the House of Commons this afternoon, and passing unanimously. As a result, I trust they will treat this bill sympathetically when it arrives in the other place.

May I mention with your permission, Mr. Speaker, one other matter. In order to correct a misapprehension that has arisen, I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that in my statement on second reading, in raising the question of bilingual labelling, an error appears at page 2128 of Hansard for December 16, the third line from the bottom of the first column. I inadvertently omitted one line of my statement, and as a result some confusion has been caused with regard to bilingual labelling of imported products. At that time I was announcing that it was government policy to require, as a general practice, that consumer products that are subject to federal legislation be labelled in both official languages. Under the present practice some laws specify either one language or the other; some make no mention of language. Only the Hazardous Products Act and the Food and Drug Act specify labels in both languages.

As I was announcing in December, over the next few years all consumer products subject to federal legislation will progressively have to meet the bilingual labelling requirement, so that as quickly as practical and practicable bilingual labelling shall be mandatory at the point of manufacture. It is recognized that imports may require special attention to ensure that foreign suppliers are aware of the bilingual requirements. So, I want to emphasize that every effort will be made to encourage the earliest implementation of these new rules for imported products in order that they may conform, along with domestic products,—and that was the part left out of my earlier statement—to the five year target date that I announced in December. As I indicated, an interdepartmental committee will establish guidelines to ensure an orderly and efficient transition to this new policy.

I do not want to prolong the debate. I do once again want to thank hon. members for the attention and care they gave the bill during the course of debate both in the House and during the committee hearings. I am particularly grateful for the amendment made by the hon. member for St. John's East in the committee, as well as for those moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and Regina-Lake Centre.

I want to close by saying that some of the amendment suggested, particularly by New Democratic Party members, have been turned down by the House on my recommendation. The reason was I thought they jeopardized the constitutionality of the legislation. Although the members of the New Democratic Party said that that did not matter and that we should try them anyway, the very reason we should not draw legislation that may be attacked in the courts was emphasized today by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, who at two points in his discussion of the amendment mentioned he hoped that the minister would enforce the legislation; that he expected the minister would be in court a great deal with this legislation—I think they are his precise words. He also mentioned he hoped that the minister and the department knew what they would be up against when dealing with the private sector.

It is for the very reason that we do know what we will be up against in some instances, because we know that on occasion we will be in court, as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre said, because we do know there are people we will have to take to court in enforcing this legislation, that we have to draw legislation on the advice of the law officers of the Crown which is constitutional and will stand up in court. This is why we cannot accept some of the amendments that we would have accepted had we not received advice from the law officers of the Crown. As I say, there is no sense in drawing legislation which at the first opportunity will be challenged in court and thrown out.

I conclude with those remarks. It merely remains for me to say that I hope the private sector will take note of the fact that the House of Commons of Canada has unanimously seen the need for the legislation and supported it. I also hope hon. gentlemen in the other place will take note of that fact.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. McGrath: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two p.m.

I am sure the evening recess will allow hon. members to join their Irish colleagues in the traditional observance of the anniversary of their patron saint in a most happy and friendly association. May the good Saint Patrick watch over you.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF DELEGATION OF LEADERS OF CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY OF COUNCIL OF EUROPE

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has the honour and pleasure of drawing the attention of the House to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a delegation of leaders of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe. To many of you, our distinguished visitors need no introduction as you have met them in discussions and on social occasions during the past three days. Some members of the House have also become familiar with the Council of Europe through visits to Strasbourg as members of Canadian parliamentary delegations invited to participate in meetings of their Consultative Assembly.

[Translation]

It is the first time that we have the honour to welcome in our Parliament the members of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe.

The talks we have had with those parliamentarians devoted to the cause of a united Europe, while being members of their own national Parliament, have enabled us to get a more accurate outlook on the wonderful development of Europe today.

[English]

On the basis of the valuable and, I hope, mutually satisfactory experiences of the last few days, I am sure I speak for the whole House in expressing the hope that these exchanges will continue to our mutual benefit.

May I be allowed to bring to the attention of the House the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of another very distinguished group, the newly named premier of the province of Ontario, the Hon. BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

FINAL REPORT OF COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Under Standing Order 43, Mr. Speaker, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a question of vital importance.

It has to do with an announcement by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which, after consideration of subjects dealing with the Supreme Court, Parliament, arts and culture, mass media and political equality, has decided not to make any report on those subjects, report which was to be submitted to the Secretary of State and, through him, to the House. That decision of the Commission is contrary to the instructions of the Governor in Council as formulated in the terms of reference of the Commission as well as to those of the House which has voted the required credits enabling the Commission to carry on its inquiry—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again, I must object to the way the motion is moved by the hon. member. Yesterday I took the liberty of mentioning to the hon. members for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) and for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk), I believe, who were moving a motion under Standing Order 43, that they should limit their remarks to a brief indication of the urgency of the matter.

Under this order, the hon. member cannot express views on the substance of the matter for which he seeks consideration by the House. I therefore invite him to abide not only by the letter but also by the spirit of Standing Order 43.

Mr. La Salle: I was about to finish, Mr. Speaker. In view of the urgency of the matter, I ask the House to agree unanimously to the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates be requested to inquire into the refusal of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism to print and publish its final report, and to report to the House on or before May 31, 1971.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) pursuant to Standing Order 43. A motion of this kind requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to see unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Very briefly, because of the tragic plight of 146,000 Canadians who have been unemployed for four to six months and the fact that 117,000 Canadians have been out of work for more than six months compared with 61,000 a year ago, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the House urge the government to immediately introduce some short-term, though temporary, changes in the Unemployment Insurance and the Canada Assistance plans to help alleviate the immediate and devastating hardship confronting these thousands of Canadians from all walks of life.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. If the hon. member's motion is to be put to the House at this time the unanimous consent of the House would be required. I have to inquire whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, seconded by—may I inquire who the seconder of the motion is?

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the seconder is the vice-chairman of the committee, the former mayor of Toronto. I am afraid I cannot remember his riding.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

An hon. Member: Does he have a voice?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Anderson moved that the second report of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution presented to the House on Friday, March 12, 1971, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works I want to put on the record the request that any hearings that are held by the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution on the west coast of Canada do not in any way involve policies connected with the National Energy Board which reports to our committee.

Mr. Woolliams: What superfluous nonsense!

Mr. Hopkins: It has been the desire of our committee for some time to go to western Canada for hearings with the oil and resource people there, and I think it is very important that this be done. So long as there is no interference with the estimates of the National Energy Board, I am willing to concur in this motion.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will read the motion I believe he will find that that assurance is inherent in it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member had the opportunity to speak when the motion was put. I bring to the attention of the House that this is a debatable motion. Any hon. member who wishes to do so may speak on the motion. I have no intention of course, of provoking a debate on this matter, but from the interventions by hon. members which I heard I gather there was some misunderstanding of the situation. The motion is properly before the House and is debatable and can be voted upon. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich had an opportunity to make a statement when the motion was put. I am prepared to put the motion now unless other hon. members want to take part in the debate.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there will be a time and a place for a debate on this particular issue. We do not think this is the time nor the place. It is quite obvious from the fact that the motion was not unanimously presented by the committee that there should be an opportunity for the committee to review its decision and to decide on the terms of reference. For that reason I wish to move that this debate be adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—FURTHER MEASURES TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Finance who is supposed to be here today. I hope he has not suffered the same unfortunate fate as his white paper on tax reform. Perhaps I can direct the question to the Prime Minister. Is the government now considering further methods to stimulate the economy, such as a reduction in taxation, particularly in view of the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment for the month of February has shown no reduction compared with January, indicating clearly that the economy has not turned the corner that the Minister of Finance has been talking about for a number of months, and can the Prime Minister indicate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the hon. gentleman is coming to his question soon.

Mr. Stanfield: I asked the question to start with, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister whether in view of these facts the government is considering further methods to stimulate the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the premise of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition and therefore I cannot announce any further measures of stimulation now. The premise of his question is that the economy has not turned the corner. On the contrary, all available statistics do indicate that the economy is growing at an accelerated rate since last fall. The gross national product increased at a seasonally adjusted rate of 6.4 per cent in the last quarter of 1971, compared with the long-term average of 4.9 per cent, and the index of industrial production rose sharply by 1.1 per cent in January compared with the normal increase of .5 per cent.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister considered the fact that employment in manufacturing, for example, between January and February rose only at the normal rate? In particular, I would ask him whether or not he is prepared to undertake some measures with respect to those who have been out of work for more than four months in view of the fact that more than a quarter of a million Canadians have now been out of work for more than four months, some 40,000 more than in January and over 100,000 more than in February, 1970?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we deplore this regrettable situation but there again the hard-core unemployment to which the Leader of the Opposition refers has fallen slightly on a—

Mr. Stanfield: On a what?

Mr. Trudeau: —seasonally adjusted basis.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I certainly cannot accept that assertion. In view of the admission of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that his most optimistic forecasts of employment for students this summer will fall well short of the demand and in view of the rate of unemployment for those under 24 years of age exceeding 13 per cent, I ask the Prime Minister again whether the government now proposes to take any additional measures to assist those under 24 years of age who are not students so as to offer them some prospect of obtaining work?

Mr. Lang: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: I should like to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition that in indicating something which he suggests I said he is not stating the facts. I want to bring that to his attention so that matter will be clear.

Mr. Stanfield: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that is not a question of privilege; it is simply an assertion. I repeat my question. In view of the admission of the minister that his most optimistic forecast of student employment will not exceed 900,000 whereas the number seeking employment will reach approximately one million and in view of the rate of unemployment among non-students under the age of 24 exceeding 13 per cent, will the Prime Minister and his government be taking any measures to assist those who are not students to get work?

UNEMPLOYMENT—SEASONALLY ADJUSTED RATE ACCEPTABLE TO GOVERNMENT—MEASURES TO EXPAND ECONOMY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the figures published today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicate that the government's policies have had no effect so far in reducing the number of unemployed, either actual or seasonally adjusted, and in view of the statement of the Prime Minister, as reported in the Toronto Star on February 24 last to a $50 a plate dinner in Montreal that unemployment is something Canadians will just have to learn to live with, I want to ask the Prime Minister if we can now assume that the government is prepared to settle down to a seasonally adjusted rate of 5½ per cent to 6 per cent per year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the Leader of the New Democratic Party is saying that this should be the aim—

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, come on, now.

Mr. Trudeau: —to have a seasonally adjusted rate of 5½ to 6 per cent, we are prepared to consider in what way it can be applicable in Canada.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister is not debating with students now. He is in Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I ask the Prime Minister a direct question. In view of the government's policies not having succeeded in reducing unemployment, does the government intend to further expand the economy in order to reduce unemployment? What steps does the government have in mind at this time in order to accomplish that objective?

An hon. Member: Not just expand the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the Prime Minister to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands but it is a very general question. That member is inviting the Prime Minister to indicate what steps the government will take to achieve such and such an end. Normally this type of question might be replied to by way of a general statement, but the Prime Minister might be allowed to answer briefly the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, I again disagree with the Leader of the New Democratic Party. The steps we have taken are effective, and I have given some indices of that a moment ago. If the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants some more figures I could indicate to him—

An hon. Member: That won't feed the hungry.

Mr. Trudeau: —that exports are remaining at a high level—

Mr. Hees: Exports are down 3½ per cent this year and manufactured products are down 5½ per cent. Don't give us that nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor at the present time. He tried to help the Chair yesterday and I ask him to continue in the same way today. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary.

Mr. Douglas: I was asking the Prime Minister what steps the government is going to take to reduce unemployment. I point out to the Prime Minister that the unemployment figures since the government started its program—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggested to the hon. member that normally this question ought to be replied to by way of a general statement. The right hon. gentleman answered the question to some extent in the way that is ordinarily the procedure on motions. I do not think that a general statement, which would be required in order to answer the hon. member's question, should be made at this time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I will be very succinct. Since the unemployment figures for the month of February this year are 149,000 higher than they were when the government started its expansionary program, may I ask whether the government is satisfied with that figure and if it considers that this is reducing unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF UNIONS AND INDUSTRY TO FIND SOLUTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of present unemployment, and I shall spare you the figures which have been discussed sufficiently, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider calling an emergency meeting of the representatives of all sectors of the economy, namely the unions and the employers, to try to find a solution.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not be averse to that suggestion, if I thought it would be useful; but as I have indicated to the House repeatedly, as the Minister of Finance has done also, since last March the government has taken a series of steps intended to alter the course of the economic policy applied until then. Some time must elapse before those steps can be fully efficient. Naturally, indications of progress must be taken into account; I have just mentioned a few to the House and I feel they are real.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF SALARY TO STUDENTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

In order to help the unemployed to find work and not to interfere with students looking for summer jobs, does the government intend to pay the students an allowance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we already have measures to help students in a less direct way. As we know, loans to students are financed with the money paid by taxpayers to the federal government. In so far as allowances are concerned, I think that the hon. member will acknowledge that it would be rather ticklish for the federal government to intervene directly in the field of education, which comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces. The provinces obviously have the means of changing their academic system if they do not want students to be unemployed in summer. Instead of granting them a special allowance, they could keep them studying all year instead of turning them loose on the labour market. The federal government does not have the power to change the academic year for the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is these long answers by the Prime Minister and other ministers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —which invite the kind of questions Your Honour has ruled out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. Baldwin: I suggest, respectfully, that the Prime Minister should not be allowed to do so, particularly when his answers are misleading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF ACADEMIC YEAR

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister answered clearly enough a question which I trust was sensible, and I would now ask him whether the federal government which has no business in provincial affairs, in the education field, could not suggest to the provinces that they do what he suggested a few moments ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some universities in certain provinces have already considered the matter. I make my answers public in this House; perhaps provincial authorities will take into consideration this suggestion which, after all, is not totally new. This practice is followed in some countries.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As the 782,000 people who are today drawing unemployment insurance are out of work and are willing to work but are unemployed, does the Prime Minister not consider this to be a very serious situation and one that merits the government taking measures to stimulate the economy and overcome this serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is not prepared to allow the Prime Minister to reply to a question which in my view is not in order. It is strictly an argument, not a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Malpeque.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—RENEGOTIATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND DEVELOPMENT PLAN BY FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Has there been any request yet from the government of Prince Edward Island to renegotiate the existing comprehensive development plan agreed upon by the two governments inasmuch as unemployment in Prince Edward Island has now reached more than 11 per cent of the labour force and our economy seems to be contracting rather than expanding?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if such negotiations are under way they would be under way with the minister and not with myself. I can only take notice of the question on his behalf.

RATE OF HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like the Prime Minister to clarify a statement he made. Would he clarify what he meant when he said that the rate of what he called hard-core unemployment had fallen in some seasonally adjusted sense?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The figures I have indicate that the share of hard-core unemployment as a percentage of total unemployment fell on a seasonally adjusted basis in January.

An hon. Member: From what to what?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Since over the last 11 months the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment has varied from a low of 5.6 per cent to a high of 8.2 per cent, can we take it that it is government policy to accept an unemployment rate of 5.5 per cent to 6 per cent for the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question was asked a moment ago.

UNEMPLOYMENT—AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION TO ASSIST THOSE OUT OF WORK MORE THAN SIX MONTHS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Very simply, could I ask the Prime Minister whether, since the hard-core unemployed who have been out of work for more than six months have increased by 92 per cent over the period of one year, there is anything at all that he can tell the House which would be of encouragement to these people in the way of amendments to existing federal legislation which could be of some benefit to them in the immediate future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this stage the debate seems to be on the figures of hard-core unemployment. I want to correct what I said to the Leader of the Opposition a moment ago. The fall in the share of hard-core unemployment was from the month of January to the month of February. There has been a decline from the one month to last month.

An hon. Member: By how much?

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, would the right hon. gentleman now answer my question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Spadina.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. While the right hon. gentleman was correcting the statistics, perhaps he failed to understand my question. It is very simple. Since 61,000 people had been out of work for more than six months one year ago and since 117,000 are now in the same boat, is there anything encouraging which the right hon. gentleman can tell the House in the way of amendments to federal legislation to give these fellow Canadians some hope for the immediate future?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate that this is the type of question that was asked a moment ago. The hon. member is inviting the Prime Minister or a government member to make a statement of a very general nature. That kind of statement should normally be made on motions.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I was simply referring to the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Canada Assistance Plan. I am sure the right hon. gentleman is familiar with those specific bits of legislation. I was hoping for a simple yes or no response.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED EMERGENCY CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In order to get the country's economy going again, is the government considering convening an emergency conference with the provinces to discuss full employment and growth targets for 1971 budgeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Such a conference is not contemplated at this time. I must repeat that I disagree with the premise of the question. I think that all the economic indicators show that the economy is moving.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see that 12 or more hon. members are seeking the floor for the purpose of asking supplementary questions. Hon. members must decide soon whether they want to take up the entire question period with this one subject. I am not sure whether that is what hon. members would want or that it would achieve the purpose intended by hon. members. I suggest also that individual members should not ask too many supplementary questions. If we spend the whole 40 minutes on the one subject and if one hon. member asks too many supplementary questions, we will not get around to all hon. members who seek the floor on the same subject. For the moment the hon. member for Spadina has the floor.

Mr. Ryan: Will the Prime Minister consider a conference of all governments in Canada and all levels of business and labour on growth and productivity planning, for the sake of the country?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO ACQUIRE CONTROLLING INTEREST IN HOME OIL

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister with reference to Home Oil. Can the Prime Minister bring the House up to date on how the negotiations for the purchase of Home Oil are proceeding? Also, when will he be in a position to make an announcement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations have not reached any further stage than what was reported some days ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Consequently I cannot state any date when we will be able to make any final announcement.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

CHALLENGE OF CONSTITUTIONALITY BY FORMER PRESIDENT OF EXCHEQUER COURT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is for the Minister of Justice. What is the present position of the proceedings taken by the government of Canada to prevent the Hon. Joseph Thorson, former member of the Canadian cabinet and former President of the Exchequer Court of Canada, from challenging the languages bill on the grounds that it is unconstitutional?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the matter is before the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked what the present position is. In view of the statements made by the minister and by the Prime Minister when the bill was before the House that the legislation was constitutional and that there was no question about it, why are you trying to prevent a challenge being made as to the constitutionality? Are you afraid of the result?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that question was directed to the Chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker. I am asking the reason why this is being done. I should not have said "you", I should have said "him". May I now get an answer in proper form? What are you afraid of?

Mr. Hees: What is he afraid of?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. "Him" is out of order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES OF STUDENT EMPLOYMENT EUROPE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will he investigate a group called Student Employment Europe which entertained 702 applications from students across Canada for employment in Germany? The two parties involved in Montreal cannot be found. There has been $11 paid by these students, and I understand that applications are still being sent in. In view of the seriousness of the matter to the students affected and the suggestion that there may be something fraudulent, will the Minister of Justice look into the matter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will look into it, Mr. Speaker. It may be that the matter does not fall within the purview of the federal Attorney General. I do not know whether "him" will be allowed to answer the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would very much like to have an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think things are getting a bit confusing. The hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The reason is that the government are afraid of the result.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the minister's colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, became involved and made a statement, as recorded in Hansard, with reference to this matter and at that time promised to give some information and as this is a matter of administration of justice, I think the Minister of Justice should inquire either through the Attorney General of Quebec or on his own behalf. When I used the figure of $11, that was $11 each for the 702 students.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I did say that I was going to look into the matter.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPEAL OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT —PERMANENT LEGISLATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Mr. McCleave: Oh, him.

Mr. Fairweather: It will be an easy question. Now that the premier of Quebec has reassured potential United States investors and the rest of us that political conditions in Quebec have become stabilized, will the government repeal the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act before its expiry date on April 30 next?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I said before, Mr. Speaker, if the government of Quebec were to request such repeal we would have to give it very serious consideration. The premier of that province has not made that request that I know of, even in New York, and he certainly has not made it in Canada.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question. In view of the answer of the Prime Minister, why is he suggesting that permanent legislation be proceeded with along the same lines if he is leaving the whole matter to provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer is that we are not leaving the whole matter to provincial jurisdiction. As the hon. member knows, the War Measures Act and its substitute legislation were under federal jurisdiction. The conditions under which it was invoked did follow from a certain set of circumstances presented to us by the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, circumstances of which we took cognizance.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the previous exchange with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, is the federal government taking any initiative in discussing the subject of the possible withdrawal of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act with the province of Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the subject has been discussed between the premier and myself and perhaps between other ministers from time to time.

GRAIN

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—REQUEST FOR DISTRIBUTION OF TRANSITIONAL PAYMENT TO WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Since the minister has announced that $100 million is to be distributed to western farmers and as this amount is no longer specifically tied to the basic principles of the grain stabilization plan, will the minister take immediate action to distribute this amount of money through an estimate or some other procedure?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are working very hard on the legislation required for the totality of the changes anticipated in the area of the grains industry. This will be a part of that operation. I hope the legislation will be before the House and passed into law very quickly.

Mr. Gleave: Is it not possible for the minister to make this distribution separate and apart from the stabilization plan in view of the fact that it is no longer tied to the stabilization plan through any mathematical equation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is still very much a part of the total proposal which we are putting forward. It seems to me that this is the most appropriate course to follow.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Will the minister still be receptive to any changes in the amended grain receipts stabilization proposal, which he made to the House the other day, prior to introduction of the bill or is this the third and last call?

Mr. Lang: I expect this legislation to be before a committee of the House in due course. Naturally, as is the case with all ministers, I will want to listen to every reasonable suggestion from all sides.

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—SHARING OF COST OF MINIMUM RESERVE—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the commitments of the minister's party in 1963 and 1965 and the subsequent yearly requests by the farm organizations and members of the opposition, is the minister now prepared to agree to the most recent request of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool to add to his proposals a sharing of costs of a minimum reserve of grain and a two-price system?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question of the total position of the agricultural community is one, of course, which is always before us. The particular proposal with regard to storage is one which I believe has some serious technical defects attached to it. I could remind the hon. member that when the elections to which he referred were held the position taken by this party did not gain full support—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. It arises out of a reply the Prime Minister gave me last Tuesday. Has the hon. gentleman decided to refer the whole matter of the interpretation of section 121 of the British North America Act, and the determination placed upon it by the Manitoba Court of Appeal, to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I should like to take a look at the judgment before deciding to do anything.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the Minister of Justice has not yet considered the judgment handed down last Friday, and having regard to the stalemate in the agricultural committee, is he prepared to allow the committee to proceed to examine the estimates of his department and stand the proceedings on the bill until the Minister of Justice has decided whether or not to refer the whole question to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO NEW INITIATIVES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. What action does the government propose to take in view of the failure of the government's regional development policy to create jobs in Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that there are a few serious defects in the question. Perhaps it might be rephrased.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there were a few serious defects. My question is simply this: In view of the alarming rate of 15.2 per cent unemployment in Newfoundland and the failure of the government's regional development policy to create jobs there, what new initiatives can we expect from the government designed to reduce this very critical, high rate of unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure the defects were eliminated from the hon. member's question. It seems to me the question as asked might invite a lengthy reply or perhaps a statement on motions. However, I recognize the importance of the matter and perhaps the Prime Minister or another member of the government might be allowed to reply briefly.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is constantly considering new initiatives and discussing them with the provinces.

Mr. McGrath: Would the government be prepared to consider providing the province of Newfoundland with long-term, interest-free loans similar to those provided to Nigeria and Zambia?

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON REVIEW OF STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the minister's intention to make public the results of the review of the Public Service Staff Relations Act now being conducted under his direction and, if so, when can the House expect a report on this review?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The intention is that the review should lead to certain conclusions by the government on a course of action which may involve legislation. I do not want to name a date by which the results of any such consideration may be presented to the House.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—RELEASE OF MONTHLY FIGURES BY BUREAU OF STATISTICS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate was inquiring about the dates of releases on labour.

I read yesterday in La Presse an article from Mr. Claude Beauchamp who said that the government prescribes time limits to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

I want to make clear that these dates are known as early as the month of December for the following year and made public. Had Mr. Beauchamp consulted his correspondent in Ottawa, he would have known it. The dates are known in advance. For instance, the next release will be on April 15.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE AMENDMENT TO COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council a question. In light of the statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday that the government could do nothing about the increase in bank charges until there had been an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act, would the minister discuss with the other house leaders the possibility of bringing in an immediate amendment confined to this issue alone? I am sure it could be passed very quickly.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to do so. If the hon. member will raise the matter at the next meeting I will deal with it very quickly.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN PRICE OF POWDERED MILK—MEASURES TO ENSURE THAT PRODUCERS BENEFIT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the price of powdered milk was recently increased to 32 cents per hundredweight and since apparently industrial dairy producers will not according to information available, receive this full amount of 32 cents, can the minister tell us whether he knows of any means to have the industrial dairy producers benefit by this quite legitimate increase?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The price paid to the producers by the processors in Ontario and Quebec is, of course, determined by the boards which are set up under provincial legislation. What we did was increase the value of this milk by 32 cents a hundred by increasing the value of the powder by four cents a pound. We hope that most of the benefit, if not all, will be passed on to the producers by the processors increasing the prices they pay, but we do not have any direct control over that aspect.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

As much as the minister I wish this idea would be put in a concrete form but, at present, it is not the case. Then—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would put his supplementary question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Here it is: Does the minister know of any way whereby industrial milk producers could benefit these 32 cents?

[English]

Mr. Olson: I do not know of any legal action we can take. I am sure, though, that the producers who are represented by those who make decisions on these boards could make their wishes known to those boards.

SHOES—MEETING WITH MANUFACTURERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with a question I asked some time ago about the shoe industry. At that time the minister told us he intended to meet with representatives of the industry. He also informed us he was considering some statistical information. I should like to ask whether he has yet held this meeting and whether there is sufficient information at his disposal now to enable him to reach a decision about the future of the shoe industry which presently is in grave distress?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The hon. member is quite right. We are trying to develop statistics which would give us a better idea of the areas in which the penetration of imports is affecting the Canadian shoe industry most seriously. Unfortunately, the statistics have been somewhat delayed, in great part because of lack of information from some members of the industry. I have made a supplementary plea to these gentlemen and I hope it will be successful.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The meeting of welfare ministers is slated for May, Mr. Speaker, not June.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RATE OF HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would agree to make a further correction to an answer he gave me, in addition to the correction he has already made. I refer to his statement that the percentage of hard-core unemployed was a smaller percentage of the total number of unemployed in February than it was in January of this year, whereas in fact the percentage of hard-core unemployment rose from 33.7 per cent of the total unemployed in January to some 39 per cent in February.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think a correction is necessary. I was referring to the seasonally adjusted figures and percentages, a practice which the Leader of the Opposition has himself followed regularly in the summer and fall months of last year.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister to very briefly give the House the seasonally adjusted number of hard-core unemployed for the months of January and February of this year? This is an index which is not available to the rest of us.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It has decreased from 43.2 per cent in January to 41.9 per cent in February.

Mr. Stanfield: What are the figures on the basis of which you give these percentages?

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Gilbert: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Prime Minister to give us his figures—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have recognized the hon. member for Broadview who has already started to ask his question. I will return to the Leader of the Opposition in a moment.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST THAT VAGRANCY SECTION OF CRIMINAL CODE NOT BE USED AGAINST TRAVELLING STUDENTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that many students and other young people will be travelling across Canada this summer in part because of the government's summer program, will the minister consider rescinding the vagrancy section of the Criminal Code or advising municipal authorities not to use this section to harass these travelling students?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot advise provincial Attorneys General or Crown prosecutors how they should carry out the law.

RATE OF HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister give the seasonally adjusted numbers, in thousands of the hard-core unemployed for January and February of this year on which he bases his percentages?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could look up that information, assuming there is such a thing as seasonally adjusted numbers.

Mr. Hees: You said there was.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not have those figures; I do have the percentages.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Hees: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have recognized the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, but I understand the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the Prime Minister's statement in respect of certain unemployment percentages. I should like him to indicate how he can arrive at those percentages without knowing the figures on which they are based? Can we have an answer to this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

MANPOWER

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR JOBS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister indicate to the House and to the students who will be seeking employment under the various government programs this summer what the criteria for employment will be, and can he give some assurance that financial need will be the main criterion?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is the hope of the government that wherever possible these programs will take need into consideration. The hon. member will appreciate, however, that in some areas this may be completely impractical, but wherever it is possible, wherever it is feasible, this will be done.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the minister in connection with operation "summertime". Would the minister tell the House now, in the absence of the Secretary of State and while these two conferences of student editors are being held in Winnipeg and Montreal respecting these plans, what the plans of the government are? Will he elucidate for their benefit?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I certainly will check with my colleague and make that information available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister suggesting that he has not that information available now? Is that his answer? That shows the kind of co-operation we are getting.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INDICATION OF "APPLAUSE" IN OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order pertaining to Hansard for yesterday, March 17. On page 4347 there is a report of a reasonable inquiry by the hon. member for Témiscamingue, to which the Prime Minister replied in a partisan and political manner.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have no quarrel or complaint in this regard. However, after the Prime Minister's response the word "applause" appears in Hansard. This is my point of order. Other speakers were applauded yesterday but the approbation of the House was verbally recorded. At various other intervals in the conduct of the business of the House hon. members applaud, but I have never before seen the word "applause" recorded in print in this manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: The traditional system of reporting in this House, and I have nothing but the highest respect for the reporters, has been the recording of the spoken words, and only that. I ask you to rule, Mr. Speaker, on this recording in yesterday's Hansard, which is evidence to me an attempt is being made to shore up the sagging public image of the Prime Minister in a manner inimical to our parliamentary practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member is well taken. I admit that I do not read everything in Hansard every day, but it seems to me that this is to some extent a novel way of reporting and not a correct way of reporting. My understanding is that Hansard reports only the words of the speaker who has the floor, after having been recognized for that purpose by the Chair. There should be no expression of emotions recorded in Hansard. I should like to look a little more closely at the matter. I feel that the hon. member's point is a legitimate one, and I will look into it very closely. I thank him for drawing the matter to the attention of the Chair.

Is the right hon. Prime Minister rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I only have the French version of Hansard here, Mr. Speaker, but in his statement, the hon. member said that I had answered in a partisan manner. I would like to know to what part of my answer he is referring—

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Translation, translation.

Mr. Trudeau: It does not matter, and for the information of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, the parliamentary reporter is listening. All I said was that the rumour about a general election mentioned by the hon. member for Témiscamingue came from opposition members. I myself heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert talk about a fall election while to my knowledge no minister has said anything about that.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister has suggested that no minister has made reference to an election. The Minister of National Defence is on record some time ago in reference to a coming election in 1972 and he carried it as far as 1973.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A ruling has to be made at some point. The hon. member has raised a matter which is relevant. While making his statement he used some qualifications or adjectives within reference to a reply that had been made by the Prime Minister. This really was not the essence of his grievance. The essence of the grievance was the word reported in Hansard, and I judge that there is a valid point of order in that respect. The other point is really a side issue, and I see no point in pursuing the matter further by way of an extended point of order. The Minister of National Defence is apparently anxious and determined to rise on the point of order. I feel I must rule at the moment that there is no point of order in this respect. If the minister asserts that he has another point of order, of course it is the duty of the Chair to listen to him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a question of privilege, the statement I made to which the hon. member referred was that this Parliament would last for only a finite period. Not only do I say that, but the British North America Act says that as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on his own question of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis: No, on the question of privilege brought up by the Minister of National Defence. I want to thank him for supporting the statement I made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to intervene at this point. We have spent quite a few minutes on what I consider a very spurious point of order. I do not think there is a point of order in respect of this matter and I invite hon. members to return to the business of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on the traditional Thursday afternoon point of order. I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council what the business is to be for the remainder of this week and next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to list the business we intend to call. The first order of business will be the legislation in respect of the textile and clothing board to be followed by the legislation on bail reform, young offenders, government organization, unemployment insurance and the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I might mention that tomorrow is an opposition day and next Thursday is also to be designated as an opposition day

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, may I ask if the order of business for Monday will be a continuation of the order the minister gave today when he named the various items?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ADJUSTMENTS ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I move:

That Bill C-215, an Act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting subclause (1) of clause 3 in lines 6 to 9 at page 2 thereof and substituting therefor:

"(1) There shall be a board to be called the Textile and Clothing Board, consisting of five members to be appointed by the Governor in Council.

(2) The Lieutenant Governor in Council of each province may nominate a person to be appointed under subsection (1) and the Governor in Council shall so appoint four of such persons, or so many of that number as is possible, of whom only one may be a person nominated by any of the Lieutenant Governors in Council of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, only one a person nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Quebec, only one a person nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Ontario, only one a person nominated by any of the Lieutenant Governors in Council of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and only one a person nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of British Columbia."

and by renumbering subsequent subclauses accordingly.

In presenting this amendment, which I hope the minister can accept, I am optimistic that it will bring a measure of equity to all areas of Canada in respect of the functioning of this textile board. Prior to the formation of the textile and clothing board, it has been the duty of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to advise the minister of that department concerning the use to be made of tariffs, quotas and surtaxes. As a result of the make-up of the public service a certain measure of regional representation occurred because the staff was drawn from all parts of Canada. However, this new board, composed only of three members appointed at large by the government, will have the effect of being the decision making body responsible for advising the minister on the conduct of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in applying this protectionist apparatus.

Naturally, this board will be dealing largely with that segment of the industry which feels itself disadvantaged and which will be claiming injury. As a consequence, it is unlikely that the board will be fully in tune with the needs or the other features that go to make up all the decisions that the board must come up with and pass on to the minister. To bring a broader representation to this board, I would suggest, in keeping with the regionalism of our country, that the members be drawn from within the five regions of Canada, namely the Maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the Prairies and British Columbia. I suggest that at any one time four of these regions would have to be represented which in effect would mean that the normal representation might be, for instance, one member from the Maritimes, two members from Quebec, one member from Ontario, one member from the Prairies, and no member from British Columbia. In effect, we could always expect the two central provinces to have three members out of five and I would assume, with over 60 per cent of the textile industry centred in Quebec, this province would have two members indefinitely.

I put forward this amendment because I believe that, in general, government boards composed of a few members drawn from the central part of Canada have worked to the detriment of the peripheral areas. I should like to point out, as an example, that the Canadian Dairy Commission, with three appointed members, has concentrated on the dairy industry in Central Canada, in Ontario and Quebec, to the detriment of the western dairy industry. Now, the western dairy industry is relatively small in relation to the sum total of the dairy industry, of which 85 per cent is concentrated in Quebec and Ontario. The Canadian Dairy Commission originally contained a representative from western Canada. However, this has not been the case for some time. I believe the absence of such a representative has worked a definite hardship on cream producers and users in that part of our country.

Before the creation of the Canadian Dairy Board, the Prairies were cream surplus areas. The policy of the Dairy Commission has, however, made it a cream deficient area. This was done by manipulating the quotas on the basis of a ruling that the small cream shippers were inefficient producers. The bulk of western cream shippers were all small operators and the Dairy Commission cut off their subsidies by means of the quota system, transferring the quotas to central Canada. From a western viewpoint, it is a situation that makes little sense. The western dairy industry is hamstrung through lack of quotas and subsidies, while the western consumer not only helps subsidize Quebec dairy producers but has to pay the cost of bringing Quebec subsidized dairy butter to the west.

So, Mr. Speaker, I believe this amendment, if accepted by the government, would help bring about a more realistic approach to the textile and clothing field which the textile manufacturing industry completely dominates. The proposed textile and clothing board makes little sense because it is in the interests of the textile industry to have most foreign textiles excluded from Canada. We heard from the textile manufacturers themselves who feel their industry is as efficient as any in the world. Indeed, they did not offer much real hope that a textile board would come up with many ideas to make their industry more viable. The industry also pays the highest wages in the western world even compared to the United States, which makes it very obvious that the industry cannot expand beyond its present maximum operation. In order to give a wider representation to the various regions in Canada, and to the various interests in Canada, I believe that this board would have its usefulness and acceptance increased if it were to be enlarged in the manner which I have proposed.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) in respect of the textile bill, Bill C-215, concerning the enlargement of the regional representation on this board to include all parts of Canada. I believe it is very important, at this stage of the country's development, that we establish the principle that all regions shall be equally represented.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The textile industry is, of course, a national industry, but at present 60 per cent of the employment in the industry is located in the province of Quebec, 30 per cent in Ontario, and around 10 per cent is distributed over the rest of Canada. It would seem that any extra protection afforded to the industry will primarily benefit people located in areas where there is a preponderance of the industry. It has become evident from the evidence presented to us, and from the representations of the minister, that this textile bill, if enacted in its present form, will effectively put the control of the textile imports in the hands of the board. It really is a non-tariff barrier situation at which we are looking. No tariffs will be imposed on the import of textiles, but in effect this bill makes a licence to import textiles into Canada a requirement and the granting or withholding of this licence could effectively control imports.

I suggest that in all likelihood the setting up of barriers of this nature could undermine the very good trade relationships that we have with many countries. An item appeared in the Globe and Mail of last Saturday, I believe, in which reference was made to Canada's trade with Korea. It reads:

> Canada exported to Korea $18.8 million of goods last year, including asbestos, wheat, sulphur, pulp, newsprints, etc. Canada's imports from Korea in 1970 amounted to $15.8 million. The most important import items from Korea are sweaters, garments, wigs, footwear, cotton, and synthetic textiles, etc.

This is all very well, but I say that if our trade relations with countries such as Korea break down, the results will be detrimental to the west, more so than to the rest of the country. I have to look at this from a western point of view, because I notice that all our exports to Korea are primarily exports from western Canada such as wheat, sulphur and, to a large degree, pulp. So, I must view with some concern any regulations that would undermine our trade relations with some of these countries.

I feel, as do many, that far too great a degree of attention is being focussed on industry and too much money in general is being funnelled into the province of Quebec in comparison with the rest of Canada. It has been intimated that the textile industry is in a great deal of trouble, but that industry has continued to show a fair growth through the years. In fact, if you read the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce commercial letter, issue No. 6, you will find that in reality it is in a very healthy condition; the growth has been considerable over the last ten years.

If you go back to 1951 and look at the growth that has been evident in the agricultural sector in the same period of time you will see there were 623,000 farms in Canada. In 1961, there were 487,000. In 1966, there were 430,000, and the estimates are that in 1980 there will be only 315,000 farms. Last year, farm receipts were the lowest since 1955. Erosion of the dollar through inflation in the same period of time amounted to something like 45 per cent. So, we are in a very difficult position with regard to farming in this period of time.

I suggest that we should be looking at some of these industries that are really in trouble so far as import restrictions are concerned, the position of which could conceivably be improved in the same way as the textile industry will be under Bill C-215. Before I go over the clippings that I have here in this regard, I suggest that this will be another definite benefit to the one area of Canada that is at present receiving the bulk of the benefits. The Montreal Gazette of October 2 has the following article:

PAYMENTS: QUEBEC GETS 50 PER CENT PLUS

—But although politicians and officials alike remained silent, figures were made available showing that Quebec in the current 1970-71 fiscal year, is getting $437,600,000 of the $803,400,000 total in federal equalization payments.

In the Gazette of February 11, we see the following statement:

Quebec gets the lion's share of the projects withdrawn from the federal public works shelf in December and activated to combat winter unemployment.

Of capital projects with an estimated total cost of $18,488,000, a total of 16 with a valuation of $16,435,000 are located in the province.

That is $16 million out of a total of $18 million. I suggest it is time we all looked at some of the problems in the rest of Canada. I do not think there is anyone here who does not want to help the textile industry if it is really in trouble, but I suggest there are many industries that are in far greater trouble than the textile industry in Canada, and we should be looking in their direction.

One area in which we have a great deal of trouble is the taxation system as it applies to our resource industries. If one really delved into the situation, one would find that one of the major reasons for the proposed Home Oil sale is the tax situation in Canada. In the United States, exploration costs or losses can be written off against income, but we do not have that provision in Canada. This is discouraging the development of many of our resource industries, and is putting them into a very difficult tax situation.

I do not intend to speak at great length on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Dauphin with regard to regional representation on the board, but I wish to mention that at agricultural committee hearings the question of import controls was discussed. The apple industry representatives told us they did not really have any problems in Canada except those caused by imports. Representatives of that industry made this point time and time again. They said they really did not need boards or controls of any kind, except in the area of imports. In fact Mr. Bond, head of the Ontario Apple Marketing Commission, said that his province was the best market in Canada but it was being chipped at and penetrated by every other apple growing country in the world. We also heard strong representations on this point from the British Columbia apple growers and the Maritime apple growers.

[Mr. Downey.]

I appeal to the minister to look at these other areas also, particularly if he is prepared to take measures such as this to protect the textile industry. I admire the minister for protecting his home area industry, but he should look at things on a completely national basis, and particularly at the import problems being experienced by other regions of Canada. For example there is the matter of beef imports from Oceania, from New Zealand and Australia. Last year we had a situation in which Canadians ate beef imported from down under for at least one month out of the 12. Both the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) said the importation of this beef was a necessity. Apparently this meat is roughly equivalent to what we obtain from our canner and cutter cows, but if it had not come into Canada this fact would have been reflected in the price our producers obtained.

There is a need in this country for cheap textiles. Any consumer will agree with that statement. However, if the government is going to protect one industry in this manner I suggest it is establishing quite a precedent, and it must look at many other areas where the problems are probably ten times as great as they are in the textile industry.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the minister was very anxious to get up and make a contribution to this debate. I would urge him to wait a moment because after I am through with him he might have a larger contribution to make. For a couple of years now, I have been very impressed with the status of the minister, with his smile and his confidence. But after reading this bill, and having discussed it at some length both with the minister and with others, I believe his reputation is going to be slightly tarnished. In fact, it will be a lot more tarnished three years from now when the effect of the bill will have become public, and will be acknowledged throughout Canada.

It is obvious that the minister intends to rationalize industry, and for some reason he is under the impression that he is minister of textiles. But he is not minister of textiles; he is Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that department affects everyone who manufactures, who exports, and who imports. But it may be that he wanted to get started on one little bill dealing with textiles because it seems to be the one industry in which rationalization has a great deal going for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member launches on the speech which he has just announced to the House I have to remind him that it is not the whole bill which is before the House at the moment, but a very specific amendment dealing with the number of directors. I appreciate the hon. member may have considerations of a general nature to impart to the House before he comes to the point, but at this stage he cannot make the speech which he might have wanted to make on second reading, or which he may want to make later on third reading.

It is the duty of the Chair to bring to the attention of hon. members that they have to respect the rule of relevancy. The Chair gathered the impression, perhaps wrongly, that the hon. member was proposing to make a rather general contribution to the debate, and that would be out of order. The hon. member would have to wait until third reading stage in order to make such a contribution.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, you just interfered at the moment when I was going to explain how and why my comments would be directly relevant to the amendment. The amendment concerns the appointments to the board. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) indicated that the board should be enlarged to include representatives from all the provinces, and I say to him that it does not much matter how large or how representative the board is if it does not have common sense legislation to deal with in the first place. Without that type of legislation, it does not much matter how efficient and how knowledgeable the board may be. I also wanted to point out that this board will be dealing with the whole subject of rationalization, which is indeed the subject matter of the bill.

As the hon. gentleman who preceded me said, it is impossible for Canada to export $18 million worth of goods to Korea and not expect to import almost an equal amount from Korea. But the relevant question is: what do we export and what do we import? I take it the minister has come to the conclusion that in this field of textiles the board would have to consider whether or not this industry is so important to Canada that imports should be reduced. Through this bill the minister is trying to rationalize the textile industry. He has said, "We will have a board." I ask, where is this board to get its information? It does not matter how large a board is, it must have some research facilities available to it; it must have some expertise, some knowledge. Where is this board to get this expertise?

• (3:40 p.m.)

The board is composed of Dr. Annis, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Campbell. None of the people named to the board have knowledge of the textile industry. The minister said, "They will get the information from my department. We have research facilities, we have market facilities, we have all those things—"

Mr. Pepin: Oh, come on!

Mr. Otto: The minister says, "Come on, now". I ask him specifically, if this board is to have the money to employ private research agencies and its own officers, then are we not setting up another establishment? Why do we need the minister or his department?

Mr. Pepin: What about the inquiries?

Mr. Otto: I will come to the inquiries. They will be directed to the board from people interested. At the present time, that board cannot function unless it has research and administration at its disposal. The minister says that his department will give assistance. I think that what will happen will be that his department will advise the board which, in turn, will advise the minister. Why do we need another staff. There are other reasons, of course. For example, as the minister just said there will be need of a public inquiry but I imagine this could have been done by committees of this House. Nevertheless, that is the method of rationalization. We have a committee or board which will be another step between the department officers and the minister. True, they can get information this way. Naturally, they will investigate and, as the bill states, representations and inquiries will be made to them on which they will have to rule. The board will then require the applicant to put forward a proposal.

If the applicant is in the shirt manufacturing business he will say to the gentlemen that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) wanted on the board, "I want more protection in the sale of shirts, even if they are coloured." The minister is enamoured of coloured shirts and seems to think this is the panacea for all textile problems. The minister will reply, "Suppose we do increase the tariffs, how do we know you will get back any business?" It might not be the most efficient business in Canada and the industry will have to put forward a plan on which the board will rule. Then, the minister may or may not change the law. This might be fine in the type of business that runs without too much interference from the department, but there is an element of rationalization that the minister has not considered. If an industry is told that there is hope for it if it makes some changes, then the co-operation of, not only this department but of other departments will be required. Indeed, the co-operation of a whole bevy of officials will be required to make the industry viable.

For example in the shirt business, and I stay with that because it is the one the minister used to illustrate his point—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member says he is going to stay with the shirt business. I think he should also give some thought to staying with the amendment, which is a very limited one and has nothing to do with what the hon. member calls "rationalization of the textile industry". It proposes that there should be five instead of three directors or members of the board. It is obvious to me that is the limit which should be placed on the debate. I do not want to be too restrictive. I know the matter is an important one and that the hon. member is anxious to put on the record the interesting thoughts which he has for the consideration of the minister. However, I wonder whether this is the right time to make these observations.

My interpretation of the rule of relevancy is that the contributions of hon. members must be limited to what is before the House. What is before the House at the moment is motion to increase the number of directors from three to five. I think if we are to follow the rules closely, we must determine whether it is better to have five directors rather than three. The hon. member knows and understands the bill much better than I do, but this is my understanding. Perhaps he might like to keep this in the back of his mind.

Mr. Horner: I wonder if I might speak on that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The whole question is correctly put as one of rationalization, of bringing in tariff protection for one region of the country. The whole idea of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) is that there should be regional representation on the board so that each region of Canada would be able to consider representations for rationalization. In order to have a viable textile industry—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point is well taken to the extent it refers to regional representation, but I wonder whether rationalization is relevant? The hon. member says yes, but the interpretation of the rule of relevancy left to the Chair and that is not my interpretation. In any event, I do not wish to cause serious difficulty to the hon. member. I do suggest to him, however, that he might try to limit the speech he is making. My suggestion is that he should make two speeches rather than one.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, of course I am at your mercy. It is my contention that the member's amendment dealt with an expansion of the board in order to deal with problems on a regional basis. One of the things the board is going to have to deal with is the rationalization of a particular industry. As the hon. member pointed out, in different areas it may be a different industry. In Toronto, it may be textiles or shirts but in another place it may be something else. For that reason I was going to touch briefly on the shirt business, which is the industry located in that part of the country which I represent.

Another point on which I wish to touch is why the bill does not cover many other industries so that it would have application from coast to coast. I purposely spoke on this amendment because it seemed to me the hon. member wanted a much broader representation in order to cover the various ideas of rationalization. If you feel that I am still out of order, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to come back on third reading.

Before you so kindly put me on the right track, I was dealing with the various aspects of rationalization with which the board will have to deal. I was putting forward an example of what I think the minister wants. It seems to me he wants a board of three members to deal with the textile industry and has chosen people knowledgeable in this field. He may say to them "There may be some hope for you if you can show a plan by which the industry can go ahead and succeed in competition with other countries." This would require the co-operation of other departments because it is not enough to say to a manufacturer, "Let's see what you can do." I think it is more in keeping with rationalization if the minister can say to the manufacturer, "Your chances of succeeding against competition in the shirt business are slim. You would be better advised to go into the manufacture of sails for boats." It is more or less the same business. Possibly $28 million worth of sails are sold in Canada annually. Their manufacture requires special training, special machines, special plants as well as markets. If money were needed, the minister could go to the Industrial Development Bank or the chartered banks and say, "Make money available." Other departments would be involved in enabling this industry to succeed.

However, that is not what the board will be doing. The regional or local board will say one thing: "Shall we pension people off at the age of 54?" That, in essense, is what the bill provides. If the amendment of the hon. member for Dauphin is accepted, the board will still be faced with decisions. It will have to say, "Shall we put in lots of work, take lots of risks, give the minister lots of advice in order to rationalize this industry and make it successful, or shall we consider the provisions of section 21 and say that everybody over the age of 54 can go on welfare." That, in essence, is what all this amounts to.

What will the board do, Mr. Speaker? Obviously, the board will take the easiest course; it will always take that course. If the board deals with the expansion of Canadian industry in that manner then, surely, we can say that this bill will not bring about an expansion of Canadian industry. The only result will be a large welfare program. The government will be introducing the concept of early retirement at the age of 54 under the guise of a textile bill instead of under the guise of an amendment to the unemployment insurance scheme or the old age pension scheme. If we do this for the textile workers, what can we possibly say to the people who work in the television and electronics tube business. They will say, "How is it that the people in the textile business can retire early, at 54, and we cannot? Is there anything sacrosanct about textile workers?" We will have to deal with that problem.

Then, the question will be asked, why cannot we do the same for those who work in the shoe and furniture business, and in just about every other business. No matter how you rationalize it, you will be putting people on welfare. If you say that this is part of a growing economy, then this is entirely beyond me. With all respect, I am sorry that an amendment was not moved to throw out a good portion of the bill. Certainly, I think that the proposed amendment, which would increase the number of board members, would not do much good. It does not much matter whether there are 20 or three representatives on that board because, as long as the essence of the bill is the reduction of opportunity, the shutting down of businesses, it will not do much good.

Hon. Walter G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just preceded me has stolen some of my thunder in some respects; I will not repeat the many excellent points he made. I want to direct my attention quite briefly and specifically to the problem of regionalism that is inherent in the bill. I presume that the minister, who is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and not the minister of protectionism, which would be a better description if we were to interpret his functions as outlined in this bill, is quite concerned about the regional inequity that is implicit in the legislation that is before the House this afternoon. For that reason I should think that he has already accepted the spirit of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). I hope that when he comments on the amendment, he will indicate that it is acceptable in its present form or that he will be willing to put forward a reasonable facsimile thereof.

One of the great problems in promoting industry, trade and commerce in Canada lies in our regional disparities which are the result of our tremendous expanse of geography. It goes without saying that what is good for one part of Canada may be fundamentally bad for another part of Canada. I am sure the minister recognizes that there are very strong overtones of this situation in the legislation that he is putting before the House.

Mr. Pepin: I do not recognize that at all.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister says he does not recognize that. I read a speech that he made recently but I do not have it before me. He made the speech in Montreal in which he interpreted this legislation, apologetically, he said that, normally, he is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and not of protectionism. He came forward with a thesis that, in essence, sounds something like this: protection if necessary but not necessarily protection. No doubt the minister has read some of the comments in that great liberal journal of free trade, the Winnipeg Free Press. I think that newspaper refers to this legislation as "the quintessence of protectionism". It is for that reason that I strongly support the amendment before the House. I am sure the minister will wish to recognize the fundamental principle of regionalism which is provided for in the amendment.

One may disagree about the total number of members on the rationalization board, if I may use that phrase, but I do not think the minister or anybody else in this chamber could argue that there is nothing regionally discriminatory in the legislation. Everyone in Canada is concerned about the problems that have been encountered by the textile industry. The minister surely must recognize the principle of regionalism inherent in the government's regional economic expansion program. The government should be consistent and provide for some such recognition in this legislation.

Not long ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visited the Pacific rim. During the course of that visit, which was intended to expand cordial relationships between Canada and its Pacific partners, the right hon. gentleman went out of his way to point out that Canada is anxious to assist in every way possible the economies of places like Hong Kong, Singapore, Korea and all other countries on the Pacific rim which are deeply involved in the subject matter of this legislation. Most of our cheap textile imports originate from this part of Asia. That is another argument as to why there should be, in season and out of season, some voice on the board which will constantly tell the minister that trade is a two-way street and that while he may be assisting one industry in one part of Canada, he may be making it extremely difficult for industry in other parts. As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) pointed out, this legislation will add to the difficulties that have been almost inherent in the agricultural economy for the past two decades. We have been developing our markets in western Canada in an encouraging way. Our markets for grain include Japan, China and other Asian countries.

As the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) has pointed out, we cannot continue to export raw materials such as grain to Asia unless we are willing to import a reasonable amount. As is the case with all matters of this kind, the spirit of compromise is necessary. The minister recognized this in his speech. I am sure that he is very carefully listening to the observations that have been made in connection with the thoughtful amendment that has been put forward today. He will want to assure that built into the legislation is the recognition of what we often call co-operative federalism so that the economic, industrial and other interests of every part of Canada will be given due consideration.

This is a complex matter. I am sure the minister will recognize this. You cannot specifically legislate for all aspects of the complexities and difficulties faced by the textile industry. I imagine this is why a board is being set up to deal with the ongoing process from day to day, week to week and month to month. It is eminently fair and reasonable that every part of Canada should be recognized on this board so that we will have co-operative federalism and the spirit of compromise that is necessary. I believe the minister is a reasonable man. I hope he will accept this amendment or something similar to it. As the Winnipeg Free Press, another spokesman for the free trading interests of western Canada has emphasized and drawn to the minister's attention, we will then have a situation in this rationalized program that will be in the best interests of all concerned in all parts of Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be relevant to note at the outset whether or not all members of this House are in agreement that this bill represents a step in the right direction in dealing with the problems of the textile and clothing industry. Leaving that aside, we can discuss this amendment, along with the others to be presented, within the context of determining whether they represent an improvement in the bill.

When looking at the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), I must ask whether an increase in the membership of the textile and clothing board from three to five will represent an improvement, taking into account the other considerations put forward. I fail to see how an increase in membership, under the stipulations set out in this amendment, will contribute to a better performance by the board in the job assigned to it by the legislation now under consideration. As a matter of fact, I am mildly surprised that my friends in the Conservative party want to contribute to a proliferation of bureaucracy by increasing the membership of the board from three to five, and increase the staff accordingly. I repeat, I am mildly surprised that my Conservative friends would suggest a step such as this.

Coming to the real issue involved in this amendment, in my view it would be inconsistent with the principles of this bill to insert a clause into it which would force the federal government to name a board on the basis of nominations made by the provinces. This would be inconsistent with the responsibilities which we are asking this board to assume. For that reason, I fail to see how we could support this amendment. Regional concerns have been noted by a number of members who spoke in favour of this amendment. They have advanced this as the principal reason for placing this amendment before the House. I intend to deal with the question of regional concerns at the appropriate time during consideration of this bill, because it is a subject which deserves further consideration.

I fail to see how this change in the structure and composition of the board, as proposed in this amendment, will contribute to a resolution of the concerns that have been expressed by regional interests. None of the amendments propose a change in the structure of the legislation before us. Regardless of whether this or the other amendments are passed, the final responsibility for action will be left in the hands of the federal government. They have to assume final responsibility for whatever actions are decided upon. The board makes recommendations to the federal government. I feel we would be much better off with the kind of board proposed in the bill. I trust that it will take a national viewpoint when dealing with the serious problems of this particular industry.

It has been correctly noted that there are conflicts of interest involving our trade. I intend to deal with this at a later stage, including the whole question of the maintenance and development of this industry in Canada and the employment produced as a result of its existence. The interests of Canada, taking into account all these various factors, would be best served by a board which dealt with problems from a national point of view.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). I am not going to deal with the technical aspects, but rather the principle involved. We have known for a long time that trading is a two-way street. It has often been said that perhaps 80 per cent of our livelihood is obtained through our ability to trade. Trade is a very interesting part of the livelihood of many people in all parts of Canada.

It could be argued by some, I suppose, that this bill is not restrictive of trade, but such an argument will hardly stand up if we examine the measure closely. It is true, the purpose of setting up the board in the first instance is to hear inquiries and complaints. Complaints can be made under the terms of clause 8 in connection with textile imports which could be described as harmful to the Canadian industry or threatening the livelihood of its employees. The board could then take certain steps. It could establish an inquiry, or it could recommend that the importations in question be stopped immediately; it could recommend that they be stopped until the whole question could be studied by a board of inquiry, or it could recommend that certain tariff restrictions or restrictive licensing procedures be instituted.

Does all this really concern regions other than those in which textiles are produced? Let us consider what is really involved here. According to the report of the committee proceedings, No. 15, one of the witnesses, Mr. Drahotsky made certain comments with regard to aspects of this bill. He is a senior official of the department which the minister at times heads up, though at times I wonder.

Mr. Pepin: Ha, ha!

Mr. Horner: Well, the minister can laugh. I have laughed at a lot of his rationalizations, too, and I will laugh further today. At any rate this is what Mr. Drahotsky said at page 14 of committee proceedings, No. 15:

> Clause 18 on page 8 lists a number of factors which the Board is asked to take into consideration in examining the plans and making a report to the Minister. I believe that among these factors are most of those which Mr. Lambert has mentioned. They may not be spelled out in the detail that Mr. Lambert would like to see, but among the factors there is a mention of regional consideration, consumer interest, Canada's relevant international agreements and the conditions prevailing in international trade. I believe all the factors that you have alluded to, sir, are covered, perhaps in a broad sense, admittedly, in clause 18.

Clause 18 is a very detailed clause setting out the matters which the board should take into consideration. One of the members of the committee, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), gave an indication of what he thought clause 18 really implied. His remarks are recorded at page 23 of report No. 20 of the committee proceedings. Addressing one of the witnesses, Mr. Armstrong, president of the Canadian Textiles Institute, he said:

> I presume that "becoming internationally competitive" implies competition against Taiwan, Japan, and countries of that nature and not necessarily Britain or the United States or European countries. With that kind of provision which is mentioned not only here but elsewhere, I had in the beginning the impression that very little protection would be provided in view of that particular position which the board is asking us to take into consideration.

Mr. Armstrong replied:

> I think your interpretation, Mr. Cafik, of what Clause 18 says is quite right. These are difficult things to try to make a decision on now. Most foreign markets, for example, are closed to us for all practical purposes. At least, many of them are. The day will come, I hope, when through a general agreement on tariffs and trade or by some other method we will get better access to these markets.

He went on to say that this situation had been produced by the low cost at which goods could be produced in some areas, and added:

> It is too early to say whether or not we shall ever be competitive with Taiwan.

This is the point which concerns western Canada. Will the trade of western Canada be harmed as a result of restrictive measures instituted by this board? I would point out that Japan is fast becoming one of our most important trading partners. At the present time, Japan is our third best customer. Figures have been placed on the record to show that Korea, China and Hong Kong are taking considerably more of our products. Sales to Japan alone now total almost $1,500 million dollars. It is true that the smaller countries buy much less, but we have to begin by acknowledging that trade is a two-way street.

The minister tells us that the whole purpose of this bill is to bring about a rationalization of the industry, rather than to restrict—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened to the hon. member with interest, but it occurs to me that he might now be straying somewhat far from the motion before the House. If I am wrong, the hon. member might indicate the grounds for his disagreement but I think that at this stage of our proceedings the debate should be confined as closely as possible to the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I was explaining why it was necessary to make provision for regional representation on the board. I was pointing out that if action was taken to protect an industry which is centred largely in Quebec, the consequences might be detrimental to the exports of western Canada. The board should include regional representatives in order that consideration could be given to this question. I am well aware that the textile industry employs some 200,000 people. Sixty per cent of the industry, though, is located in Quebec, thirty per cent is in Ontario and 10 per cent in the rest of the country. At one time 1,350 were employed in the western provinces—I say "were". If imports are restricted without consideration being given to the possible harmful effects on other regions in Canada we might be taking action which, in the long run, would be detrimental to Canada's development.

In defence of his rationalization concept, the minister says we must build a textile industry which will be viable on the international scene. The whole purpose of the board is to assist in the rationalization process, he tells us. The minister then goes on to say that in assisting in this process the board must bear in mind that we can become competitive with countries which are dealing with Europe, the United States and Britain or, rather, that we can become competitive with countries which are using highly sophisticated products from the textile industry. As reported on page 6 of committee proceedings No. 16, the parliamentary secretary read from a speech which the minister had made pointing out that at a trade fair in Frankfurt, Germany, Canadian manufacturers of textiles had received on the spot orders for goods worth $3.2 millions with prospects of further orders valued at another $20 million as a result of this single effort. He went on to make the point that it is possible to create a viable textile industry, adding: "We are therefore not presiding over the demise of a sick and ailing industry."

The point I wish to make is that a great deal of our trade in western Canada is conducted with the Pacific rim countries. We are told that these countries are the ones which are exporting textiles in quantity to Canada, and they are the very countries against which it is desired to set up protective barriers. The Pacific rim countries producer textiles and goods of low sophistication. I am wondering how the rationalization program can stand up.

First of all, we are to produce an industry which is viable on the international scene in competition with Europe, the United States and Great Britain. These countries produce highly sophisticated goods. But we are also to bring in protective measures against countries which, to use the minister's words, have a low cost of production. These countries against which we are to bring in protective measures are the countries which produce the low sophistication textile products, and the minister says we cannot possibly hope to survive on the international market if we continue to produce products of that nature. So, his rationalization falls completely flat.

On March 11, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) asked why a highly skilled textile industry which had just laid off 350 men could not receive some help from the Department of Trade and Commerce and the minister replied that conversations had taken place and a full explanation was provided. The minister went on to say that it is not government policy to prevent the closure of a company when this is necessitated by factors of international trade, as in the present case. These were highly sophisticated companies which had tried to sell on the international market, but because they were not large enough the minister said they did not need the protection or assistance of the government and would have to close up.

Mr. Pepin: You are all mixed up.

An hon. Member: The minister is just as mixed up as he was in respect of the grain trade.

Mr. Horner: I would be delighted to hear the minister explain the rationalization of the program. I do not accept the philosophy put forward by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) on many occasions, and certainly not on this occasion. This is a country which stretches 4,500 miles from sea to sea. Trade is a two-way street, so we cannot have a policy in which recommendations will be made concerning protective tariffs when there has not been representation from every part of Canada.

We cannot have a federal government which looks at only one part of Canada and hopes that the country will survive. We must remember that in the last two or three elections unity has been the slogan. How can we have unity when a textile board, which will bring in restrictive measures which may be harmful to certain parts of Canada, will not be comprised of representatives from all regions of Canada. I do not believe the minister is working toward unity if he does not want to give all the regions of Canada an opportunity to take part in the decisions this board will make. The minister's parliamentary secretary must find all this very ironic because he comes from an area which has been severely hurt because of a lack of tariff protection. There was a board in respect of the fruit and vegetable industry which operated under a clause similar to clause 8 whereby inquiries could be set up and action taken to protect a failing industry. It is a little ironic that the parliamentary secretary would have to listen to this discussion and yet not be able to get protection of the type provided in this bill for his own constituents.

Where is the free trade aspect about which the Liberal party has been speaking for a century or at least during the 1900's? Where has this all gone? The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) said during the committee proceedings that this is a radical new approach. It may be the first step and the shoe industry might be the next. I see he shakes his head. I will read the evidence to him before this debate finishes. Then, the electronic industry might be the next. If we are to have a board on which there is not regional representation, and in respect of which all regions of Canada will not have an opportunity to take part in counselling on action which might be detrimental to the livelihood of the people in those regions, then the cry of "unity" will not be enough to hold us together. All regions must have an opportunity to be involved in presenting their ideas.

The three members of this board will basically be regional in their representation. The region is what we might call the greater Montreal-Ottawa region. A board with such a narrow concept will be able to implement action which could affect all Canada's trade. The minister can sit there and smile, but this is just one more bill that will do nothing but divide Canada, if we are not to be given an opportunity to have some regional representation on the board. There is no point in making speeches in Parliament on a subject after the decision has been made. In a democracy, representations must be made before the decision is taken and not afterward. Here we are to set up a board which would deprive regions of representation. Members of Parliament will rise in this House and say that the decisions taken by this board are harmful to one region or another, but at that time it will be too late.

If unity is an important question in Canada today, I believe we should move very slowly in respect of the establishment of boards which do not provide regional representation when decisions those boards may make may affect the livelihood of thousands of people in the years ahead.

Mr. Forest: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Horner: Yes.

Mr. Forest: Would the hon. member favour similar representation on other federal boards such as the Canadian Wheat Board, the Grain Commission and others.

Mr. Horner: Yes.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words on the proposed amendment. I will refrain from commenting on arguments pertaining to other aspects of the bill brought into the debate.

What should be said about the amendment, and what was just implied in the question asked by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), is that such an amendment which would give regional or provincial representation on the board would constitute a major precedent in the constitution of federal boards in the future. In fact, the acts establishing the Tariff Board, the National Energy Board, the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, the Wheat Board and other boards would likely have to be amended to reflect the same principle.

In addition, it would seem to me that such a move would be an abdication on the part of the federal government of its responsibility in trade matters. On a number of occasions, many provinces have said to us that the responsibility for textiles, because of the importance of imports and exports to the industry, is that of the federal government. Were I to go back to Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes or other provinces at this time to ask them to kindly nominate members on the textile and clothing board, they could very well say "mind your own business, this is your responsibility".

On a number of occasions also members on both sides of the House have expressed regret at the deterioration of the federal power in matters of international and interprovincial trade. Counting on the provinces to nominate members to our boards would be a step backward in the assessment of our responsibility in these matters of international and interprovincial trade.

Mr. Horner: Would the minister permit a question? This board will carry on inquiries and recommend certain things. Surely, to ask provinces to appoint somebody to a board to make recommendations or carry out inquiries would further the whole program of decision making and further federal-provincial co-operation.

Mr. Pepin: My argument was, first, to indicate that this would be a major precedent and would necessitate changes in other federal government boards. I suggested that this would not be in the interests of Canada.

My second point is that we have refrained in the selection of members to the textile and clothing board, from appointing people with set opinions on these matters because they were from a certain sector of the industry or from a certain region.

Mr. Horner: Such as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), with set political opinions.

Mr. Pepin: To mention one member of the board, Mr. Annis, who is president of the board and who is well known to members of the House as having been associated for a long time with the federal administration, I would not know what interest or region one might accuse him of representing on that board. We have gone out of our way to select people on the basis of their qualifications and judgment rather than on the basis of whether they were associated with one part or another of the country or one sector or another of the industry. We will let the public of Canada judge what we have done. I, myself, am very proud of the balanced bill we have brought in and of the category of people we have attracted to this board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: My last point is to agree with something said by the hon. member for Crowfoot. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) seems to forget at this moment that in matters of protection or non-protection the textile and clothing board only makes recommendations to the government. It should be well know to him also, because he was one of the assiduous members of the committee which studied the bill in depth, that the board will be supported by officials in mine and other departments, by knowledge they acquire during inquiries from consumers, producers, importers and so on. The hon. member's arguments imply that officials were doing a better jog than this board will be doing. I cannot go along with his logic, nor can I go along with the logic used by some hon. members in this short debate. I might also remind members on the other side—and I regret the absence of some—that the decisions will be made by the cabinet, and Canadian cabinets are well known for giving representation to all regions of Canada.

Mr. Horner: Not this cabinet.

Mr. Pepin: I give up. I know I will not be able to convince the hon. member for Crowfoot or the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). I welcome their contribution but I fail to understand the logic in their arguments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75 (11) the vote on this amendment stands deferred.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had some discussions with the hon. member for Crowfoot, the minister, and the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). Since I will not be able later to go ahead with two amendments which I have, there seems to be willingness on their part, if the House is willing, that the two amendments which stand in my name, Nos. 6 and 7, might be proceeded with at this time. If that is the feeling of the hon. members, I would like the opportunity to present arguments with respect to motions Nos. 6 and 7.

Mr. Jerome: I can confirm, on behalf of the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin, that he was consulted and that he is agreeable to defer dealing with his amendment No. 5 in favour of dealing with amendments Nos. 6 and 7.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I also am in agreement with this procedure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By agreement, the House will now proceed to the consideration of the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I move:

That Bill C-215, an act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting lines 38 and 39 on page 11 thereof and lines 1 to 27 at page 12 thereof and substituting therefor:

"(2) Where at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council, on a report of the minister made pursuant to an inquiry made by the Textile and Clothing Board with respect to the importation of any textile and clothing goods or on any other matter or thing in relation to textile and clothing goods within the meaning of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, that goods of any kind are being imported or are likely to be imported into Canada at such prices, in such quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers, any goods of the same kind may, by order of the Governor in Council, be included on the Import Control List in order to limit the importation of such goods to the extent and for the period that, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, is necessary to prevent or remedy the injury".

I will be very brief, having in mind the importance of the subject matter. I simply make the point that my amendment seeks to strike down what I think is an intention in the bill to take it far beyond the original limitations which, of course, should be textiles and clothing. The bill is entitled:

• (4:40 p.m.)

An Act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof.

The recommendation from His Excellency is also limited to those particular terms. An examination of the interpretation clause shows quite plainly the bill is intended to deal with the question of textiles and clothing. To that extent we have moved amendments, one of which has been debated. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) will be moving some more, and I will be supporting them. But what I intend to show to the House is that two of the clauses I am dealing with, and particularly the one now before the House, clause 26, go far beyond what was the intention.

Whether the minister was aware of what he was doing, and whether he intended to do it, I do not know. I think he did. He is a very bright minister. I think he must be aware of what he is trying to do. I think the House should be aware of what it is asked to do before it passes this bill.

Let us look at clause 26 as it now stands, which is the one I propose to amend. It reads:

Section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) Where at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council on a report of the Minister made pursuant to

(a) an inquiry made by the Textile and Clothing Board with respect to the importation of any textile and clothing goods within the meaning of the Textile and Clothing Board Act—

That is perfectly all right. If the minister stopped there, I would accept it. I may have some disagreement with him on the question of the philosophy, but he is keeping himself fairly and squarely within the intention of the bill up to that point. But what comes under proposed subparagraph (b)? It reads:

—an inquiry made under section 16A of the Anti-Dumping Act by the Anti-dumping Tribunal in respect of any goods other than textile and clothing goods within the meaning of the Textile and Clothing Board Act.

That is introducing into the restrictive and qualifying provisions of this current legislation certain provisions which deal with goods which are not textiles and clothing. Then, the clause goes on:

—that goods of any kind—

Not clothing and textiles

—goods of any kind are being imported or are likely to be imported into Canada at such prices, in such quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers—

Without looking for the moment at the Export and Import Permits Act, which we must do later because that is brought into this legislation, we find that by clause 26 the minister is asking this House to extend restrictive and qualifying conditions with respect to the importation of goods which are in no way related to textiles and clothing.

There may be a case for that. It may be just. The government may have a reason to want to introduce legislation of that kind and let this House debate it. But, Mr. Speaker, to attempt to do it by giving the government vast and wide powers so far as clothing and textiles are concerned and letting these powers apply to any goods at all, is something which this House should not be asked to do in connection with legislation limited to clothing and textiles.

I think there is a very good case to argue, and we might well yet do it on third reading, that these clauses are not pertinent, and are out of order in that they go far beyond the recommendation of His Excellency. They should therefore, be struck down. But I am not going to make that argument at this time because now we are going to argue the merits of my amendment. However, I am telling the minister that he might well expect a motion or a point of order on third reading to strike out these paragraphs because they exceed the qualifications established in the recommendation of the Governor General.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

What is in the Export and Import Permits Act which is being amended by this legislation? Section 3 of that act provides:

The Governor in Council may establish a list of goods, to be called an Export Control List, including therein any article the export of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes—

The purposes are then specified. They are:

—to ensure that arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war . . . capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof or otherwise having a strategic nature or value will not be made available to any destination wherein their use might be detrimental to the security of Canada;

(b) to implement an intergovernmental arrangement . . .

(c) to ensure that there is an adequate supply and distribution of such article in Canada for defence or other needs.

Those are the very limited purposes established by section 3 of that act. We all know why it was introduced, and I think there is a good case to be made for it. But certainly, Mr. Speaker, it has no relationship whatsoever to textiles and clothing.

Then section 5 which is the section referred to in clause 26 of this bill, reads:

The Governor in Council may establish a list of goods, to be called an Import Control List, including therein any article the import of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes, namely,

(a) to ensure, in accordance with the needs of Canada, the best possible supply and distribution of an article that is scarce in world markets or is subject to governmental controls in the countries of origin or to allocation by intergovernmental arrangement;

That is quite plain, and we understand why it is in the Export and Import Permits Act. I, for one, would go along with it. But then we go to subparagraph (b):

—to implement any action taken under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act—

And there is listed a number of other Acts of Parliament

—to support the price of the article—produced by the particular industry involved. And then finally, it reads:

—to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment.

When those goods are included in an import control list, there are certain consequences which follow and it is possible for the government by an order in council to prohibit, or interfere with, or limit the importation of those goods into the country. But, Mr. Speaker, the purposes set out in section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act are purposes entirely foreign to the purpose of the bill we are now considering, which is "to establish the Textile and Clothing Board." There is no relationship whatsoever.

If I could I would argue that point alone, that this is not the way for the government to exercise its prohibiting power so far as goods coming into the country are concerned. But when the government goes beyond that and uses clause 26 of this present bill to say, as it does say in subparagraph (b):

—that goods of any kind are being imported or are likely to be imported into Canada at such prices, in such quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers of like or directly competitive goods, any goods of the same kind may, by order of the Governor in Council, be included on the Import Control List—

I simply must register my objection. I point out that this was not discussed in the committee. There was a very brief explanation by the minister on an irrelevant aspect of it. I am quite sure the members of this House agree that, being asked as they are now asked to give the power to the government to place on the import control list not just imports of clothing and textiles, but any articles at all, is going too far. There is absolutely no qualifying restriction with respect to the type of goods which this Parliament is being asked to put under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act.

It is true of course that there is an inquiry made by the textile and clothing board, and then there can be an inquiry made under section 16A of the Anti-dumping Act. The Anti-dumping Act at the present time is available for the purpose of permitting the government to impose certain penalties in connection with a case where there apparently has been an infringement of intergovernmental arrangements. The antidumping board might hold that this has been the case and the government might then intervene and impose certain penalties.

I am sure it was never intended that this government should be given power, which it had not held before, to extend the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act so that, at the whim of the government, goods of any kind could be placed on the restricted list. The minister may have an answer, although he has not given it yet and did not give it on second reading. When this situation was first called to my attention, I did not believe that the government was seeking these extraordinary powers.

I am not going to infringe upon the courtesy of the House which gave me permission to proceed now. I raised the issue and will have a chance to develop it on the next motion. It is for the minister to say why, in a bill limited to textiles and clothing, the government is taking these extraordinary powers to prohibit the importation into this country of goods of any kind. It is an issue which is irrelevant and foreign to the legislation we are now considering.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I first say that we are not trying to hide anything. The title of the bill is quite clear, "An act to establish the textile and clothing board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof".

My second point is that this sort of thing is done regularly with bills such as this one which covers a certain sector but also affects a number of other existing bills. In these circumstances, it is quite all right to incorporate changes in the bill which will affect other bills. This is not undemocratic or unparliamentary. We have consolidated versions of existing acts. I fail to see, on the basis of pure legislative process why the bill would be faulty.

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want to make it plain that I have never had any cause to suspect the purity of the government.

Mr. Pepin: And I have never had any cause to suspect the lack of intellectual virginity of my hon. friend!

We come to the three changes that the amendment would make. The first change would be "any other matter or thing in relation to textile and clothing goods". I fail to understand that. Perhaps my hon. friend will agree to push it aside unless it has a hidden meaning which escapes me.

The second point is one of substance and refers to approval of the extension of the bill to goods other than textiles and clothing. As this is the main point, I think we should deal with it now.

First of all, I am surprised to see such an amendment coming from the party which argued for more effective use of import-export permits. I can recall hon. members on the other side saying that we were not making enough use of this act. I can also recall a speech made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) when he said that the power of unilateral action was already available in the Export-Imports Act.

Mr. Horner: Oh, that is a very weak argument.

Mr. Pepin: Let us try another one, then. I wish my hon. friend has as many good ones as I have. Maybe I do not understand the full substance of the argument, but the way I heard it the implication was that this extension should simply not be there. But why not?

Mr. Horner: From a free trade party—

Mr. Baldwin: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister not agree that he could probably secure, without too much trouble, an extension of the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act on clothing and textiles alone to bring them into this legislation? When, in addition to textiles and clothing, he says any other goods at all, does he not think there is valid cause for complaint?

Mr. Pepin: I don't see why. The implication would be that each time the government brings in new legislation covering, for example, a certain industry it would have to bring in bills covering all existing acts affected by the legislation, perhaps as many as ten. I think this is an excessive preoccupation with form.

Mr. Horner: It is a preoccupation in democracy.

Mr. Pepin: I think the spirit is more important than the form. The extension to other goods is clearly identified. When hon. members pass this article they will know what they are doing. I might say that safeguards have been written into the bill to ensure that it can only be used under extreme and stringent conditions. Serious injury must be demonstrated. The bill can only be used and is limited to the period necessary for removal of the injury. Another part of the amendment—

Mr. Horner: Five o'clock.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF STUDIES RELATING TO CONVERTING PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT INTO CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all studies, reviews, etc., that have been undertaken by the Government of Canada regarding the consideration being given to converting the Public Works Department into a Crown corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on November 4, last year, I brought forward my notice of motion for the production of papers asking that an order of the House do issue for copies of all studies, reviews, etc., undertaken by the government of Canada regarding the consideration being given to converting the Public Works Department into a Crown corporation. I did so because, in December, 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the appointment of John MacDonald as Deputy Minister of Public Works. He was replacing Lucien Lalonde.

The Prime Minister said that new concepts of administration had to be brought to the area of public works. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) was ready to introduce them. He also said that we must consider new concepts in land and building management, and that it could mean the setting up of a Crown corporation "for some facets". This would be a fundamental reform.

It should also be noted that the Prime Minister said that the Glassco Commission had recommended a Crown corporation to be active in land management. The government was the largest land owner in Canada and the largest tenant of space. It was also suggested that a Crown corporation might be the agency for federal government construction. These suggestions were made in December, 1969. The appointment of John MacDonald as deputy minister was effective on January 15. In February, 1970, Mr. MacDonald made a statement to the press which indicated that serious consideration was being given to converting the Department of Public Works into a Crown corporation with assets of between $10 billion and $20 billion. This shows that public works essentially is a large business. He also said that, unlike other departments, that department is a service organization. It has no policy other than that of meeting the needs of other departments. He cited an example of what he meant. He said that the use of high priced real estate for post offices and other government buildings indicated an inefficient use of government property. He also said, while speaking at Edmonton, that if the new concept were followed the department would have two arms. One arm would do the building for all the other departments, and the second arm would control and manage most of the government's land and property. In other words, he set forth a revolutionary concept because, as he said, in the field of land and property this government department is one of the largest businesses in the country.

Then he made a revealing statement. He said that it has been estimated that the government could save $250 million annually through a Crown corporation, because it would eliminate redundancy and get the optimum return from government land. That figure of $250 million is most striking and interests hon. members of this House. Considering that the government is planning to spend a total of $57 million to employ students across the country during the summer months, and considering that the deputy minister has said that we could save over $200 million annually if we converted the department into a Crown corporation, a move that would eliminate redundancy and get the optimum return from government land, it seems clear that the government could give four or five times more than the amount of assistance to the summer student employment program it now contemplates. As I said, that speech by the deputy minister was made in February, 1970. You will note that my notice of motion is dated November 4, 1970. We were becoming anxious about what was happening with regard to that particular department.

In December, 1970, the Ottawa Citizen reported that a plan for a leaner, more businesslike Department of Public Works had reached the very active stage. It also said that the department would become the central agency responsible for the estimated $20 billion in real estate owned by the federal government. Also, the Department of Public Works would manage more than $800 million a year in government construction as the federal supercontractor. The article also says that leasing arrangements would generate money while keeping the land for government use decades and even a century later. In building highways, marine works and buildings, and in repairing existing properties, the Department of Public Works would continue its policy of calling for bids. Very likely it would do more project management—taking the place of the general contractor—on huge, long term projects to combat the problems caused by unpredictable cost price increases in the construction business.

So, Mr. Speaker, you now have the picture. In December, 1969, the Prime Minister announced that a Crown corporation might take over some of the facets of the Department of Public Works. In February, 1970, the new deputy minister, John MacDonald, spoke about new policies and new concepts. I brought in my motion in November, 1970, and a further article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen in December, 1970. This shows how important it is for the government to consult all opposition members with regard to its plans for setting up this Crown corporation.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we have seen excellent examples of what the government does when it considers setting up Crown corporations. Recently, we debated the Canada Development Corporation bill. The original idea propounded by Walter Gordon and some others, including members of our party, who thought that the CDC would be one of the investing arms for Canadian capital and, as well, take into account the social policies required in the directing of business, has been emasculated. As I say, that idea which was brought forward some years ago has been emasculated. I should not like to see the emasculation of a Crown corporation which would deal with assets as big as those of the Department of Public Works. I hope this government will not emasculate such a corporation. It would be an excellent idea to set up a special committee and invite the Minister of Public Works, who has had wide experience in this field, to come before it. Actually, I think at his stage in life the minister could really be considered as a caretaker minister of public works. He may not be applying the initiative that may be necessary for the operations of the department and he may not consider that this matter is urgent.

We could ask the Minister of Public Works and the deputy minister, who has undertaken some detailed study, to explain this so-called revolutionary concept. The members of the committee could then make a report to the House which would be very useful. I hope that legislation would then emanate from that report.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Hon. members opposite may say that opposition members will have the opportunity to ask questions, when the estimates are before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. However, may I suggest that members of the opposition would not have the detailed knowledge that is within the purview of the government and it would take a great deal of time to set it forth. One of the problems with the estimates is the tendency to hurry them. Many members on the government side are not taking the right attitude with regard to making the minister answer questions relating to his particular department. I fear that if one of the members of the government suggest that we deal with this proposal in the estimates committee, it will not receive the proper consideration which would enable us to understand this important concept.

This is a step forward with regard to the Department of Public Works. In the past, the Department of Public Works has been considered the great patronage department of the government. It can be said that large amounts of money have been unwisely spent with regard to government contracts in order to benefit some of the friends of and contributors to the party in power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: I am very happy that I have the attention of members opposite. They are now listening intensely. Recently, a new concept has been developing. The political patronage concept is being reduced. I have this feeling, Mr. Speaker. With the development of a crown corporation, it may be that we will have an almost total reduction with regard to political patronage and contributors. This is why we are anxious to know what the government has in mind with regard to this crown corporation. We want to see to it that they do not emasculate this excellent idea in the way that they emasculated the idea of the Canada Development Corporation.

I am only speaking for 10 minutes on this important motion because I am sure that the members supporting the government will see the possibility of this motion being carried quickly with the recommendation that it be sent to an appropriate committee where it could be studied in dept and a report made to the House. As a result of this report legislation could be drafted to establish a Crown corporation.

Mr. Boulanger: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just mentioned patronage by the party in power. Could he give one or two examples of such patronage in the Department of Public Works? I ask him to be very clear about it and not a sissy.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question indicates that he is quite sensitive to this patronage. He has a right to be sensitive because his party has been one of the foremost recipients of patronage from construction companies across the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: There is no doubt about it. If the hon. member were to read the report on election expenses, he would see the tremendous amount of money received by his party for election purposes with no indication from where it was received. Where did it come from? I thought the hon. member would know, Mr. Speaker, but seemingly he does not. I recommend that he contact the right sources within his party to indicate where these moneys came from.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I humbly but strongly suggest that this type of discussion on either side will not solve the problem of whether the Department of Public Works should be a Crown corporation. If it might clean up the Department of Public Works, it would not make it a Crown corporation.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I humbly suggest that the question is not the discussion that may take place between two members. The hon. member has made charges. He has a responsibility to inform the House of his knowledge so that the matter can be properly investigated. To make raw statements and charges is only wishful thinking. It is only talking for the sake of talk.

Mr. Gilbert: If I may reply, Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that a backbencher has not read the report on election expenses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. If hon. members are not satisfied with the ruling of the Chair and, in particular, are not satisfied with the conduct of an hon. member, they should follow the proper procedures and deal with the matter in another manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, if I understood correctly the motion presented by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), he wanted, first of all, the production of copies of all studies that have been undertaken by the government regarding the consideration being given to converting the Public Works Department into a Crown Corporation. Now, we know that, on November 4, 1970, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) refused to produce such documents because he considered them, and still does, of a confidential nature.

The mover then asked that the motion be transferred for debate.

There are two important aspects to be considered in this motion: first, the possibility of reorganizing or transforming the Department of Public Works into a Crown corporation, secondly, the confidential nature of the documents mentioned by the mover of the motion. As a matter of fact, I was under the impression that the purpose of the debate would be to discuss the reasons which had prompted the minister to consider these documents as confidential.

I was surprised and disappointed also to see that the mover of the motion, perhaps inadvertently, has brought the House to discuss very minor questions which never reflect credit on Parliament, an institution upon which the eyes of all Canadians are focused.

If we are convinced that we have a serious part to play in the House, we should forget about these petty questions which make us waste our time. That is one of the most serious charges that our fellow citizens utter daily, concerning delays and waste of time to which we sometimes fall victims.

And since the hon. member has levelled certain charges against members of the Liberal party, he cannot accuse them of needlessly delaying debates, on minor and unimportant matters. I think that he himself, and perhaps some of his colleagues—with all due respect—ought to examine their conscience every night, concerning those questions of delay and waste of time on useless details which have nothing to do with the development of our country. They discuss trifles and afterwards they speak of truly important issues such as unemployment and other similar questions.

At any rate, the hon. member spoke long enough about the present and future management of the Department of Public Works. Let us say that it is as a result of a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he realized that studies could be made to alter the present status of the Department of Public Works which would become a Crown corporation.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I respect his opinion that this department should become a corporation. Although I am not an expert in this field, he will none the less allow me to express my opinion that we should always be very cautious about promoting a project to change a government structure into a Crown corporation.

I was impressed, among other things, by the fact that in the motion the hon. member accuses government members of not taking the necessary steps to convince the minister to table the documents concerned.

But since the department alleges that the documents are of a confidential nature, I believe that documents of the public administration in general are the property of the public and if necessary, Canadian citizens and most of all members of Parliament should be able to consult them. On the other hand, he will no doubt admit that some documents must remain confidential to ensure proper administration and public protection.

The documents of the administration belong to the public, not only in Canada but throughout the world. However, governments have kept some documents secret and the propriety of such action has often been challenged by experts and other citizens who needed the information.

If we study what has been done in this regard in other countries, we find that they passed laws on information and production of public documents.

It is reported that in Sweden, since long ago, all documents can be made public. On the other hand, there are many exceptions particularly with reference to national defence, foreign policy or internal administration of certain departments.

In the United States, the Freedom of Information Act was enacted in 1967. Although a great deal of freedom of information has been granted to American citizens under this Act, it can be said that many classes of documents are exempt from the Act.

In Canada the situation is reportedly less clear, for there would be no statutory provision on the publication of that kind of documents, except the Official Secrets Act.

There remains for us to rely on custom which has proven its worth in many areas including possibly this one. Governmental departments must examine each request before reaching a decision. It can be assumed that publication of documents is conducive to good administration. We have only to remember some of the good results derived from the publication of certain documents. Indeed the parties' interest is thus made public through publication of certain documents and this may sometimes be useful. It invites reactions from public opinion so that a good administration may ensue. It provides information each time the activities of the administration are discussed or criticized and in such cases where it can be regarded as a means of control.

Documents should normally be publicized but officers are not legally bound to provide information other than the official account, neither on their own authority nor on request. It could occur however that authorities will refuse to reveal what could be detrimental to public interest. This is where we could say that some documents must really be and remain confidential, not only for those who prepared them, who have not finished them, but also to protect the public at large.

In my humble opinion, the fact remains that we should rightly be concerned with suggestions for liberalizing access to official papers. I believe that knowing that any memorandum could be made public could exert a negative influence which might slow down or put a stop to a movement an enthusiasm or an interest. This would have an adverse effect on the conduct of certain public affairs.

I believe that for the development of a policy the mind should be given free play. There must be dedication to the task, and special favourable conditions. All alternative means of achieving the purpose must be explored at length and there must be wide-ranging studies, as in the case mentioned by the mover on matters of comparison between the Department of Public Works and a Crown corporation. It would, in my opinion, be stupid or undesirable to subject some of the solutions envisaged to general scrutiny.

Emphasis on every activity of administration being made public would, in my opinion, hinder the smooth running of discussions and deliberations which are necessary for judicious administration.

If officials of the Department of Public Works, or others, have now been conducting in-depth studies over months, perhaps even years, with the prospect of transforming the Department of Public Works into a Crown Corporation, it is normal that these studies be published only after they are finished. Some points are being examined, the opinions of experts, engineers, public servants are being discussed and it would not be advisable at all to make these studies, these plans available to the public, even to hon. members. Hon. members are entitled to information, but only when everything is finished and has become official. In Canada bureaucracy is not so gigantic, whatever might be said sometimes.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The number of competent researchers is rather limited.

I think it might be possible to set up a better system to publish specific documents or files, in order to satisfy legitimate requests from researchers.

If there is any gap in the official policy with regard to information in the field of administration, and if these gaps constitute a serious handicap either to historical research or other types of research, or to the activity of members of Parliament, instead of introducing the same motions in each session and wasting efforts, it might be more logical, more sensible and more efficient to propose the drafting of regulations or legislation that would clearly state what category of document could, in the future, be considered confidential or not.

This is why, considering the case in point, and assuming that studies have been launched in order to draw a comparison between the future of the Department of Public Works and the efficiency or the use of a Crown corporation, I can only approve the attitude of the Minister of Public Works who decided, pursuant to the established practice, to consider these documents as being confidential, as he is responsible for them in the final analysis, and as it is his duty to refuse to produce the documents requested by the hon. member for Broadview.

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, from reading over the notice of motion we are now debating, and before I heard the hon. member speak, I drew the inference that the mover of the motion is among those who favour the proliferation of Crown corporations and he is curious to know whether we can soon expect so see a new one rising over the horizon. Having heard the hon. member, it would appear that is his point of view. I cannot entirely agree with him.

Mr. Gilbert: It has been expressed by the deputy minister. All I did was express his opinion.

Mr. Penner: It may have been expressed by the deputy minister, and probably has been studied. It is my understanding, however—and I do not know how reliable my grapevine is—that now the idea has been discarded. If that in fact is the case, I would applaud it. This leaves me to consider briefly the whole question of government and its many agencies in relation to society as a whole. If I may be permitted to do so in the few minutes left, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue that theme.

Recently I had occasion to read once again the interesting and thought-provoking book by Peter F. Drucker entitled "The Age of Discontinuity," which was written in 1968. In this book there is a chapter entitled "The Sickness of Government". I would recommend the reading of this chapter to the hon. member who introduced the motion and to the members of his party. They probably are already familiar with it. Mr. Drucker makes the point that government surely has never been more prominent than it is today. He says it is, in short, all pervasive. There is mounting evidence, he states, that government is big, rather than strong; that it is fat and flabby, rather than powerful; that it costs a great deal but does not achieve much.

Mr. Gilbert: That is the Liberal party you are describing.

Mr. Penner: It is any government. It is your party in Manitoba as well. It is no particular party, no particular province and no particular country. Drucker is not writing a partisan treatise, such as my hon. friend is used to reading. He is writing a book which deals in depth with the theoretical consideration of important political and social questions.

• (5:40 p.m.)

If you want a point in fact—this is true of government in general—that point has been made, but in Canada it is true of our Crown corporations in particular. They are costly, but often they achieve very little. We need only look at the CBC and the CNR as two cases in point. These Crown corporations have been criticized frequently in the House. The last analysis I read on the CBC, for example, showed that this Crown corporation spends at least twice the amount the privately-owned CTV does in producing similar programs.

Over the years, many parliamentarians have expressed concern about the cost of CBC to Canadian taxpayers. The proposal has often been made that it should be carved up and sold, leaving the fate of Canadian culture in the hands of private broadcasters. I think that suggestion was even made at one conference of the party to which the hon. member belongs.

Mr. Gilbert: What is this?

Mr. Penner: One thing is certain. There is growing disenchantment with government, and citizens everywhere are beginning to balk at paying for bigger government, although conversely these same people still want what government promises to give them. In the years from about 1890 to 1960, mankind, especially in the developed countries, seemed hypnotized by government. The Fabians in Great Britain, and the German Social Democrats started their love affair with government before 1900. It became more general with World War I when government, using taxation and the printing press, mobilized social resources away beyond what anyone earlier would have thought was possible.

When the Great Depression hit a decade later, everybody immediately turned to government as the saviour, and it is rather pathetic to recall the naïve belief that prevailed in the late thirties, such as, for instance, what was preached in one of the best-sellers of the depression years, a book called "To plan or not to plan" by the British Labour economist Barbara Wooton. One critic has described this book as a fervent love letter to government, full of messianic innocence. All it says—and it says it over and over again on almost every page, in different words—is that Utopia is here; all that is needed is to take everything away from the wicked, selfish private interests and turn it over to government. We have done a great deal of that and we have many programs trying to do many things for citizens. These programs have frequently not succeeded in what they were intended to do. So what have we done? We have revised these unsuccessful government programs, not once but over and over again, and we have asserted that nothing is basically wrong with them that a change in procedures or a more competent administration will not cure. I hope it will not be construed that I am arguing for weaker government.

Mr. Gilbert: It is weak enough now.

Mr. Penner: What I am arguing for is strong, effective and truly performing government which has never been more needed. We need government as the central institution in a society of organizations. We need an organ that expresses the common will and the common vision and enables each organization in society to make its own best contribution to that society and to its citizens. Yet that same central institution, the government, must express common beliefs and common values. Unfortunately, government is not very good at innovation. By design it is a protective institution. It cannot really abandon anything that it once starts. The moment government undertakes anything, that undertaking becomes entrenched and permanent.

Generally, government is not an effective doer. Business management knows this about government but it also knows that you must always separate the decision-maker from the doer—that is, if you are interested in efficiency of operation. If this lesson were applied to government, the other institutions of society would rightly and properly become the doers. A good analogy, perhaps, is that of an orchestra. Analogies are always a little silly, but this one may serve the purpose. Government ought properly to be the conductor of the orchestra, but those who produce the sounds—the musicians—would liken to the other non-governmental institutions of society, institutions in a society of many organizations. I think that this theme has been adequately developed in the time that is available to me. I conclude by quoting two paragraphs from Mr. Drucker's book, to help sum up the argument. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> If we want a really strong and effective government, therefore, we should want businesses that are not owned by government. We should want businesses in which private investors, motivated by their own self interest and deciding on the basis of their own best judgment, take the risk of failure. The strongest argument for "private enterprise" is not the function of profit. The strongest argument is the function of loss. Because of it, business is the most adaptable and the most flexible of the institutions around. It is the one that has a clear, even though limited, performance test. It is the one that has a yardstick.

The other paragraph reads:

—we are disenchanted with government, primarily because it does not perform. We can say that we need, in pluralist society, a government that can and does govern.

Mr. Gilbert: You are on our side, Keith.

Mr. Penner: A long way down the Chamber, though. The paragraph continues:

This is not a government that "does"; it is not a government that "administers"; it is a government that governs.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Penner: I would be delighted to entertain the hon. member's question.

Mr. Gilbert: I have always found the hon. member to be a delightful, courteous and kind fellow. I ask him whether we should give serious consideration to the statement of the deputy minister, which I quoted in my speech, that by setting up a Crown corporation Canadians would save $200 million. It seems to me that we should give serious study to that proposition. Would the hon. member agree with that statement, and does he agree that on that basis alone the document should be shown to members?

Mr. Penner: I believe that we should give serious consideration to every recommendation by every deputy minister, but that we should not necessarily follow what they recommend.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I was frankly surprised that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) did not see fit to accept the explanation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), who gave the reasons why these papers should not be produced. I was surprised because until I heard some of the comments in his most recent address I had found him to be a fairly responsible and reasonable member of this Chamber.

There comes a time when leaders in government have to make decisions that the uninitiated, those who have never been members of the cabinet and who possibly never will be, would find it difficult to accept. There comes a time when a government must weigh all the evidence and ultimately make a decision. And when the hon. member received a most reasonable response from the Minister of Public Works, I would have thought he would have seen fit to accept it.

I was a little surprised at the somewhat bootlegged, unkind comment that the Minister of Public Works might be considered a caretaker in that position. As one who has had close association with the minister because of area responsibilities and works that have had to be carried out in my riding, I have found him to be anything but a caretaker minister. Frankly, he is dedicated to the job which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has asked him to undertake. I would like to give a small example of this. The minister came to the Sarnia riding, ostensibly to unveil a monument to the first Liberal Prime Minister of Canada, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie.

It would have been a fairly easy task to perform, just to come into the riding and make the appropriate speech. He did make an appropriate speech, off the cuff, filled with Canadiana and much sense. Others might say that having performed that particular function, he would have been happy to attend a party function and return to Ottawa. But not this particular minister, because he knew that a group of Indians were having trouble from erosion of the St. Clair River banks caused by ships going up and down the St. Clair. The minister made an on-site inspection and took notes. On his return to Ottawa he took up the matter with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and as a result a portion of a seawall has been built in the most affected area. There is something to be said for maturity in cabinet ministers, just as there is something to be said for maturity in Members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I notice the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is clapping loud and long at that remark, but I think he had better look behind him because his colleague from Broadview does not seem to share that opinion. However, I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I may be able to convince him that there is a place for mature members of this establishment.

I had not intended to participate in this debate because I knew that the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. LeBlanc) and the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), who preceded me, would give the hon. member for Broadview all the reasons and answers he needed. However, I was a little surprised at the unkind comments of the hon. member for Thunder Bay about government in general, because there is a tendency to be parochial and to feel that decisions such as the one made by the Minister of Public Works in this instance might not fit in with the Drucker theories. It is a bit unkind to condemn all governments. Governments have a responsibility to the people, and they have to operate within the ground rules that are established. I think the present government has endeavoured to do all it can, with a somewhat unwieldy machine, to give this country the best government it has ever had.

This is not an opinion that will always be shared by the opposition, but by and large I would say we have had pretty good leadership from the government and this party, bearing in mind that over the past 100 years it has been leading our country to the point where people who want to maintain Canadiana and Canada as we understand it today would see fit to change the way in which the ground rules are established.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay saw fit to attack one of our Crown corporations. I think the CBC is probably everybody's favourite whipping-boy. There are some things in Crown corporations that warrant attack. I happen to be privileged in that Polymer, one of the jewels of Crown corporations, is in my riding and is carrying out its duties exceedingly well. This morning at a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee we had the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications group appearing. This is another Crown corporation that is doing a good job, probably as good as any private industry would do it.

There will come a time when the Minister of Public Works will have to decide whether there are areas in public works that could be better handled by Crown corporations or whether they should remain under the ministry as is now the case. For that reason, all kinds of studies are made and all kinds of suggestions will be made to him in his capacity as minister. If an individual is making a recommendation to the ministry, he should have the protection of the privilege that he quite rightly would expect to be attached to it, namely, that it will not be made a public document unless it is considered in concert with all other documents.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that another of my colleagues wishes to speak on this motion, so I shall not talk until six o'clock.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for giving me about a minute and a half. When I talk about the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and his Socialist party, I have so much to say that I will say it in English, because that way I will go a little faster. When I read this Socialist party motion—

Mr. Gilbert: New Democratic Party.

Mr. Boulanger: I would rather call you Socialist because I do not know whether you are of the very far left or only half left. When I see a motion like this I know that the hon. member is still playing politics in this House, just as he does in his riding. He will never be in power in this House and therefore he need not be disappointed whether or not we pass this motion. But I doubt that we will pass it.

In his remarks the hon. member for Broadview talked about patronage, which he claimed was pretty high, but then he came down a little. However, Mr. Speaker, he forgot to mention how they get their money and how they make it—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair.

[English]

I am sure that some hon. members who read this debate will feel that they should have been present with us. I would like to make one comment. This has been the twenty-sixth hour of private members' business in this session. I have listened to every debate during private members' hours, and all have been attended by a small number of members. I do not want to comment on the sum total of accomplishments during these 26 hours, which are the equivalent of 1½ weeks of government business, except to suggest that it might be worth while for some hon. members to get together to revise the rules.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Cullen.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ADJUSTMENTS ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I tried to rebut the amendment presented by the charming but sometimes bellicose hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Never!

Mr. Pepin: The amendment implies that the hon. member does not agree with the contents of clause 26 which amends the Export and Import Permits Act and provides that unilateral action to control imports taken with regard to textiles and clothing goods might also extend to other goods.

Mr. Baldwin: I admire the minister's perspicacity.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Thank you very much. As I said this afternoon, we are not trying to hide anything. The title of the bill indicates that. I alluded to that on a number of occasions in my speeches in the House and in my answers to the committee. I was surprised that the opposition members of the committee did not give it more importance. Basing myself on comments that were made previously by members of the opposition, I assumed that this was acceptable and that they had no intention of opposing it. I think that was a logical conclusion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It could have been raised by your own members.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, indeed. The principle that one should not amend other bills in a bill is new to me. Possibly the hon. member has some learned references to offer in support of his contention. As far as I know, it has been done before. It has been done in the present instance for everyone to see. I suggest it will also be done in the future. I cannot see how a major taxation bill, for example, could be introduced without making amendments to other existing bills. The practice seemed to be quite acceptable previously. I suggest that the amendment should be defeated, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): On this point, Mr. Speaker, I can understand why my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), has raised this point. The minister will readily understand. I think one has to say, in defence of the report, that it is available to hon. members. I think the minister is forgetting that. Because of the way the committee system functions it is not possible for all hon. members to attend the deliberations in committee with regard to any particular bill. On the basis of the evidence that is presented, they too have a right. A committee does not have the exclusive right to determine any particular provision of a bill referred to them. It is the House that makes the final determination. That is why a bill is brought back at the report stage. I share part of the concern of hon. members with regard to these sections. That is their right.

If members of the opposition raise points not previously raised by members of the committee, the minister should not point the finger. Today government members were tossing the ball back and forth, not quite in keeping with the position of the government.

Mr. Béchard: Freedom.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard) says "Freedom". Let's attribute that freedom to the opposition as well as to members on the government side. I wish to ask the minister one question. Unfortunately, I do not have the Customs Act before me. Can the minister state whether action under clause 26(2)(a) of the bill is subject to further review by Parliament? Last summer the government took action with regard to certain types of textiles. Within six months the government must come to Parliament for a resolution of this House to have it confirmed or extended, or it dies. The action taken could be done under the powers granted by this amended section.

Will there be a review by Parliament within a specific period, or are we giving the Governor in Council the power carte blanche to act as they see fit, without Parliament having the right to discuss within a stated period the action taken following executive decision? This is the point I want to raise.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member is referring to the surtax. In the case of a surtax, after 180 days I have to come to Parliament for approval of a resolution for an extension of that surtax for a period of time. We did that recently.

Mr. Baldwin: You may not be here in 180 days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: No one may be here in 180 days.

Mr. Forrestall: Is that an indication?

Mr. Pepin: No, just a spiritual reflection. The inclusion of a certain item, textile or other, on the list of controls under the Import and Export Permits Act is something we will have to justify while it continues. This is contained in clause 26. As far as I know, it is not the subject of a resolution presented to the House if the minister wants to extend it in the same way as the surtax.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am wondering how the minister can justify this particular action, because in this amendment at line 31 on page 12 of the bill there is the following phraseology:

—"or otherwise regulate the entry of goods to which the arrangement or commitment between Canada and that country relates."

Surely a surtax is a means of regulating the entry of goods.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, a surtax is imposed through another bill; it is not imposed under the bill presently under discussion. I fail to understand the argument. Is the hon. member saying that in this bill as in the case of a surtax, after 180 days we should bring the decision to include a commodity listed on the Export and Import Permits Act back to the House? Is that what he is suggesting? If so, I will answer in the following way: In order to put it there I have to go through all the formalities described in the present bill. Under clause 26, in respect of the Export and Import Permits Act I have to report to the House at the end of the year that the commodity has been added to the list. I presumably have to constantly defend in debate in the House or in the question period why a particular commodity is maintained on the list. I suggest there is no provision here similar to what exists with respect to the surtax.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I rise on a point of order. With the greatest deference to the minister, clause 27 is not an amendment to the Export and Import Permits Act but is an amendment to the Customs Act. It is under the Customs Act that the minister has authority to impose a surtax.

Mr. Pepin: I suggest the hon. member is dealing with the next amendment. We are now talking about the first amendment of the hon. member for Peace River, an amendment to clause 26, not 27.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am on clause 27.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The question is on motion No. 6 standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Textile and Clothing Board Act

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved motion No. 7:

That Bill C-215, an act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting clause 27 thereof at page 12.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Baldwin: No, Mr. Speaker. I would have been ready for the question had I not observed a slight measure of doubt over there. I hope I may be articulate enough to persuade hon. members on the other side of the House to accept this motion. However, that remains to be seen.

This motion follows the one which has already been put to the House, except for some differences. It does enable me to rebut the weak and specious arguments put forward by the minister. The first argument he used is one he will no doubt try to apply to this motion and I intend to anticipate it now. My objection is not one as to legality; it is an objection as to morality. It is not a very moral system which enables the government to try to persuade the House that it is dealing only with textiles and clothing and then to bring in by subterfuge—yes, I will use that word—and certainly without notice being given, clauses which deal with a great variety of goods.

The minister defends himself, as I suppose he will defend himself against my proper criticism now, by saying that the title covers such action. Read the title—"An act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof." That is, in consequence of establishing the textile and clothing board. For the minister to bring in legislation which in effect varies and amends to a substantial degree other legislation on such a pretext amounts, in my opinion, to legislative immorality and I have no hesitation in designating it as such.

What does clause 27, to which I am objecting, attempt to do? It is an attempt on the part of the government to change the Customs Act by providing as follows, and I am reading from clause 27(2a):

Notwithstanding subsection (1), where it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council on a report from the minister that the goods—

This clause refers to "goods", and under the Customs Act the definition is wide enough to include any goods at all—oranges, elephants, potatoes, what have you.

Mr. Howe: Orang-outangs?

Mr. Baldwin:

—where it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council on a report from the minister that the goods, the export of which from any country is the subject of an arrangement or commitment between the government of Canada and the government of that country, are being imported into Canada in a manner which circumvents such arrangement or commitment—

It goes on to say that the Governor in Council may by regulation prohibit the entry of those goods. Mr. Speaker, there is no more connection between that clause and the inherent principles of the bill we are dealing with than there is between rapeseed and immorality, and you should know that.

On second reading of this bill we directed our attention to textiles and clothing and this House, after a very good debate, gave its approval on the question of principle to the extent to which principle is still an element in second reading. Hon. members approved the bill as far as it dealt with textiles and clothing. There was a further discussion during the committee stage and some amendments were proposed at that time, as amendments have been proposed now. Those amendments did not go to the root of the bill itself; they dealt with procedure. We directed our attention in this House to the question of textiles and clothing, and now we find that all along this was a very small part of the bill. What we are being asked to do by clauses 26 and 27 is give authority to the government with respect to goods of any description to prohibit or restrict their entry into this country.

The minister may have a good case; the government may have a good case. The government may find it necessary for the purpose of protecting people and industries to say, all right we are going to deal with potatoes, we are going to deal with electric razors, we are going to deal with other commodities and we will ask the House to pass legislation which is comparable to the bill we are now dealing with, Bill C-215 having to do with textiles and clothing. And if Parliament is of the opinion that the minister has made a good case, as he obviously did in connection with this bill, it will pass that legislation. But here, under the guise of dealing with textiles and clothing the minister is asking us to give blanket approval to changes which would permit the government, a government which likes to exercise arbitrary authority and which exercises it improperly over and over again, without providing opportunity for debate on this issue to restrict the importation of any kind of goods it pleases.

The minister talks about principle. We talk about principle on second reading. What is the principle to which we agreed on second reading of this bill? Was it with regard to textiles and clothing? Was it with regard to any other variety of goods under the Customs Act? Was it in regard to the right of the government to establish by Order in Council an import control list which might include any articles at all? Three entirely different principles are involved there. We have given our approval in principle to a board. We have agreed to give that board and the Governor in Council certain powers. We have accepted this principle without objection.

The minister himself is a very honourable man and I know he would not do this on his own. But in a political sense it is a dubious strategy to invest the government with authority which it is not entitled to possess unless and until it has brought down specific legislation, debated the issue, taken it to committee, and so on. This is the basis for my objection. I only hope I shall be supported by all those who believe that parliamentary government should proceed along well conducted and orderly lines.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to put into their proper place the remarks I made when we were considering the previous amendment. I shall not repeat them, but I feel this is the first question I must raise with regard to clause 27.

Mr. Pepin: Would the hon. member kindly repeat the argument he made previously? I was searching my mind in an effort to understand it and became somewhat confused in the process before finding out that he was speaking on the wrong amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Very well. Briefly it is this. We are dealing with clause 27, an amendment to the Customs Act. It allows the government to take certain action to exclude from the country or, shall we say, by regulation prohibit or otherwise regulate the entry of goods to which an arrangement or commitment between Canada and any country relates.

I was asking whether the power given by this proposed amendment would be subject to parliamentary review, say in a period of 180 days as was the case in respect of the surtax applied by the minister under the authority of the Customs Act, which says that unless the Order in Council is confirmed by the House, it shall expire. In other words, executive action taken by the Governor in Council is subject to review by Parliament.

I was asking whether the action envisaged in this clause is subject to such a review. That is my first question. Secondly, I wish to reinforce the arguments made by my colleague from Peace River. I would ask all members of the finance committee, with the exception of the minister's parliamentary secretary, whether their attention was directed to the fact that this amendment touched goods other than textiles. As recorded at page 15:6 of issue No. 15 of the proceedings of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, the parliamentary secretary made this statement:

> Mr. Chairman, in addition to these principal points with which I have dealt, there are a number of consequential amendments necessary which I believe we will deal with in our detailed discussions of the bill.

Up to this point the parliamentary secretary had been dealing with textiles. There is very cursory mention of clause 27 dealing with textiles. I am sorry the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) is not here, because he is one member on the government side who has been most penetrating in his examination and frankly critical of many of the features of this bill. I am sure he would share the opinion of the rest of the members of the committee that they were dealing with textiles.

My colleague from Peace River, who on perhaps more mature reflection has examined the exact wording of this consequential amendment, sees that it goes from apples to peanuts to zebras in respect of what commodities may be excluded. It goes far beyond textiles. It is one thing for the government to advance arguments, through the statements of the minister and his parliamentary secretary in the House and in the committee, concerning the need to give formal approval to a textile advisory board, but then it comes in with an amendment to the Customs Act which says that if there is an agreement of any kind covering any type of goods, the government can propose a further amendment to the Customs Act and there can be action to either prohibit or otherwise regulate the entry into the country of any commodity.

It is at this point that I say I do not think the government has come forward with clean hands. I do not believe it has necessarily actively suppressed any item, but nowhere is there an indication why the government wants additional power to limit the import of all types of commodities or goods which, incidentally, unless the minister can give an affirmative answer to my first question, means the Governor in Council can do it and it is not subject to review by anyone. One cannot within a statutory instrument merely change what it covers. It can merely say whether it affects the rights of individuals or is retroactive or deficient in itself—but not within the ambit of the power that is being asked in this amendment. Even at this late date I join my colleague from Peace River and say this clause goes far beyond the power that the government indicated to the House it was asking us to give.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us, which proposes to delete clause 27, is very significant. This provision pertains specifically to the Customs Act. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said, there is in this clause wide power to use the legislation to prohibit any and all manner of imports into Canada. When one sees the many areas covered by the bill and the protection it affords one specific industry, as well as the powers granted under it in respect of other areas of imports, one understands the troubles it could create in respect of our trading relations with other countries.

One of the briefs submitted to the committee by, I believe, the Canadian Importers' Association pointed out the difficult situation that could arise in respect of trading relations and so far as importers are concerned. I believe we must look at the far reaching effects of this legislation as it applies to international trade in general.

• (8:40 p.m.)

As I pointed out earlier today, we have had good trading relations with the Pacific rim countries. Trade relations and trade prospects there are very difficult to assess. It is difficult to assess the scope of these trade relations and the business that may accrue from them in the future.

Mr. Pepin: You said all that this afternoon.

Mr. Downey: It would seem that with the European Common Market countries tending to become dependent upon each other and to be more restricted to that area, it becomes imperative that the general attitude which we present to our trading partners in the Pacific rim grow in importance as the years go by. There was an article in one of the newspapers recently about the possibility of trading relations between Pacific rim countries and the United States breaking down where they have been able to establish voluntary quotas.

Mr. Pepin: What papers do you read?

Mr. Downey: Controls may now become mandatory, and I suggest that we must at all times maintain a strong trading relationship with these countries. With regard to clause 27 of the bill and the import controls which could be exercised under it, I can only say that it has nothing to do with the textile board or protection of the textile industry. In fact, the textile industry could be specifically named. I do not believe in the type of restriction that is imposed here with regard to imports. I say they should be more specific, that it is almost impossible to accept a clause with such a broad range.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) should be the first to understand the implications of a clause of this nature. We had before the committee Mr. Dixon of the Canadian Importers' Association. I would like to read a section of their brief in which he tried to make a point in regard to the statements I have just made. In his brief, presented to the committee on February 16, he said that the tragedy of the proposed legislation is that it will seriously offend the majority of Canada's overseas customers. He said that all Canadian agricultural producers, primary resource producers, exporters of Canadian manufactured merchandise and, above all, the Canadian consumer will be affected.

The Consumers' Association of Canada was before the committee and expressed their fears that they would have to pay a higher price for textile commodities that are normally imported into Canada. They said this could tend to drive up the price of goods in other areas as our relationship with other countries deteriorated. As trade relationships with other countries deteriorate, we will find them cutting off Canadian imports; and I would point out that many of these countries are importers of Canadian raw materials. Again I state that we must look at this question from the western point of view and we might run into a situation where retaliation may come in the form of cutting off the importation of our raw materials, many of which come from western Canada.

I say to the minister again that I hope he appreciates the importance of maintaining good will in the area of international trade, and I hope he will take these matters into consideration before opposing the amendment before us.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should like to comment on one or two of the points that have been made, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary would address the Chair from his seat in the House. He realizes that we are not in committee and that he should address the House from his seat.

Mr. Horner: He will have to speak without the help of your minister's knowledge.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): In my enthusiasm to enlighten the House, I rose in the wrong place.

Mr. Horner: It is not the first time.

[Mr. Downey.]

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I want to say a word or two, first of all, about the concern that has been expressed by some hon. members this evening which implies that a reference to other goods was somehow slipped into this bill so that hon. members would not be aware of it; that their attention was not drawn to it and that they were ignorant of the fact. There was no reason for them to be ignorant of the fact.

Perhaps the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who was not present in the committee, would not have had an opportunity to take part in all the discussions, but other hon. members who have spoken this evening were present at a number of the committee's sessions when we went over each clause carefully and discussed all aspects of the bill. I would have thought they would have picked up that point somewhere along the way. If they did not, the minister in a speech on second reading of the bill mentioned this point specifically. I will quote it to remind hon. members of what was said at the time. The following is a short section from that speech:

> The new textile policy envisages the application of a unilateral measure including import quotas, in cases where a negotiated solution, such as a restraint agreement, cannot be reached ... The amendment in the bill would enable the government to do this. However, the new subclause could be invoked only after a formal determination of injury by the textile and clothing board in the case of textiles and clothing and by the anti-dumping tribunal in the case of all other goods.

I repeat, "in the case of all other goods".

Mr. Horner: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): This was said by the minister in his speech on second reading. Mr. Speaker, I feel that if members of the Official Opposition, who apparently are opposing the bill this evening—

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has no right to say that we are opposing it. We are opposing certain very bad, repugnant provisions in the bill, not the bill itself.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): It is very difficult to tell that from the comments made by a number of hon. members. I was under the impression that many of them were opposing the bill quite strenuously. Perhaps they are not too sure of their own position on this matter. I want to comment on the statements made by the hon. member for Peace River concerning clause 27. I point out that this clause deals very specifically with the purpose of the bill. I shall read some of the comments made during second reading. In his opening remarks on second reading the minister referred specifically to this section in the Customs Act and said:

> There have been cases in the past where countries agreed to restrain their exports in order to prevent a serious disruption of the Canadian market but were unable to do so effectively ... the new policy envisages continued reliance on negotiated restraint as the principal means of protecting against disruptive imports. However, such an approach can only work if the agreed restraint levels are effectively enforced. The proposed amendment to the Customs Act will enable the government to assist the exporting countries in fulfilling their commitments.

Cases have arisen in the past where exporting countries which made commitments to restrain exports of a certain nature to certain quantities were unable to do so because they found they did not have the means with which to accomplish this objective. So if the policy is to be enforced at all it will have to be enforced by this government in Canada, and the Customs Act is the means by which these objectives can be brought about.

I mentioned earlier that the new policy envisages continued reliance on negotiated restraints as the principal means of protection against disruptive imports. We do not need to change from that policy, but it has to be effectively enforced. That is the reason for including this clause in the bill, to ensure that if necessary, and when necessary, it is possible to invoke the Customs Act in order that voluntary restraints may be effected. Many countries are not too happy about voluntary restraints, but they accept them and are happy to have our assistance in enforcing them. In fact, there have been instances where such countries have come to us and asked us to invoke the powers we have under the Customs Act. That is all I shall say on the clause that is before the House. I believe the minister wants to make some additional comments in regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The hon. member is wondering whether, in the case of action taken by the government by order in council published in the Canada Gazette, as my Parliamentary Secretary has just explained, the government would be obliged as in the case of a surtax, to ask the House for agreement to take or extend such action. The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

But, as explained by my Parliamentary Secretary, it is clear that clause 27 will be applied only after consultation with the country which has agreed to voluntarily restraints of its exports, after full exploration of all possible and available means to have the voluntary agreement enforced by that country itself.

I would like to emphasize that it would be rather dishonest on the part of the government of Canada to allow a country which has accepted to limit its exports to violate its own agreements and to export more than its quotas to Canada while other countries which have accepted voluntary restraints would respect their commitments.

I think it is good policy not to make any exception for those that do not accept to fulfill their commitments or cannot do so. Therefore, I do not see why, to reply to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the government should come back to the House to seek authority to do what is, after all, quite normal and desirable.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I want to speak on this clause for only a couple of minutes, Mr. Speaker. I really want to deal with some of the implications, as I see them, of the last two clauses and the amendments thereto which we have been discussing. Before doing so I would like to note that it would considerably facilitate discussion of these bills, whether in the House or in committee, if relevant references were included in bills' explanatory notes. There is an increasing tendency by the government to omit explanatory notes completely. It seems to me perfectly reasonable that when an amendment refers to another section of an act now in force, it should be included in the explanatory notes.

It would seem that there are serious implications in the provisions of clauses 26 and 27. It would appear that through these clauses the government is arming itself with extra weapons with which to carry on its trading relationships throughout the world. Perhaps these powers are needed by the government. There are indications that from time to time they will be needed in carrying on our trading relations. At the same time, I am sure it would be acknowledged by the government that they are restrictive in nature and, as such, carry ominous portents in terms of what may be coming in our trading relations. I only hope that the passage of clauses such as these will not contribute to a trend toward restrictive trading practices throughout the world.

We have some serious problems in our trading relations, but I hope everything possible will be done to prevent clauses such as these being interpreted in a way which would indicate that Canada may be contributing to a more restrictive and protective pattern of trading practices throughout the world. As I said, the powers which are contained in these clauses may indeed be needed by the government in dealing with certain situations. Their wording is quite clear. Nevertheless, a word of caution should be sounded that this is not the type of trend we want to see in our trading relations. It would be contrary to Canada's interests if it were found necessary to proceed in this direction.

Mr. Pepin: On this point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has already spoken and can reply to the hon. member only with the consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pepin: This will take just one minute. First of all, there is an explanatory note in the original version of the bill which was used in the committee study. Secondly, I have listened to hon. members on the opposite side cautioning me against protectionism and, since I have the memory of an elephant, I can remember some of the things that were said on the subject of the use of the Export and Import Permits Act. As recorded at page 5320 of Hansard for February 10, 1969, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) said:

> Speaking for this party I would say we are not only in favour of this legislation—

That is the Export and Import Permits Act

> —being renewed but that we are strongly in favour of it being used more effectively than has been the case in the past several years.

Textile and Clothing Board Act

● (9:00 p.m.)

We heard from the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), and he seemed to contradict the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton). I know all hon. members speak independently; nevertheless, when a member speaks on behalf of his party, that should mean something. The hon. member for Waterloo said, as reported at page 5329 of Hansard for February 10, 1969:

> This is very important. But on occasion some of our major industries that are large employers of labour are seriously jeopardized, and I can foresee the necessity for the government to take immediate action.

How can you take immediate action if there is not the legislation which will permit you to do so? He went on to say:

> When such an occasion arises is not the time to start thinking about legislation. The legislation should be in existence and ready for implementation. Therefore we would like to see such blanket powers included in this bill.

Either they were joking or they meant it. I thought they meant it.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? Does he not realize, as is quite obvious from what was read, that hon. members were referring to the use of this legislation with regard to textiles and clothing. That is what they had in mind. The minister knows that and he cannot deceive us in that way. Will the minister not agree with me when I put that proposition to him?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I understand the point raised by the hon. member and I am not without sympathy. I said a moment ago that this has been done in the past and, I suggest, it will be done in the future. The hon. member stands on legalistic virginity. That is his right. But I live here, in the world and in Canada in 1971 and I must try to cope with the instruments at hand. The hon. member will see the quotations that I have read into the record; he will read them tomorrow. The quotations are there and they show that hon. members on the opposition side have requested us to open up this legislation with regard to control on disruptive imports.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pepin: I submit that they have clearly said that, and the record will demonstrate it.

Mr. Baldwin: They were only dealing with the clothing and textile industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) seeking the floor to ask a question?

Mr. Burton: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister if he listened to my remarks.

Mr. Pepin: I did.

Mr. Burton: If he listened, he would know very well that I indicated that those powers might very well be necessary. I simply entered a word of caution about their use. My words in no way contradicted what was put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman).

Mr. Pepin: I am pleased to receive that caution, although there is a limit as to how other hon. members may repeat what we heard earlier. Some hon. members are repeating the speeches they made this afternoon, cautioning the government against protectionism. However, I was very impressed when they told us a few months ago, on another occasion, not to be as cautious as we have been in the past. That was the point I was trying to raise and I think it is well to recall today what was said at that time.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for a moment or two—

An hon. Member: Or three or four.

Mr. Horner: —on the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which seek to amend clause 26 and delete clause 27. If one examines clauses 26 and 27 one can readily understand why the title of the bill, "An act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof", takes on a very potent meaning. When I spoke on the bill this afternoon I commented on some remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which dealt with this whole matter. In committee proceedings No. 15, at page 5 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce used words which are very important because they pertain to the broad aspect of the amendments in clauses 26 and 27.

Speaking about the bill, he said that it heralds a marked change in Canada's assistance to manufacturing industry.

I will be the first to admit that I did not quote him verbatim this afternoon; I recalled what he said from memory. If one checks Hansard for this afternoon and compares it with what I have said this evening, one will readily see that clauses 26 and 27 broaden the scope of a textile and clothing board. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary said that this measure marks a change in Canada's assistance to manufacturing industry and it heralds a marked change. To me, this means that this measure constitutes a marked change toward protectionism, a concept that has long plagued the Liberal party.

Ever since the 1911 election the Liberal party has advocated free trade. In the provinces of western Canada particularly, they have repeatedly said that their party stands for free trade. That is why the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Peace River are very important. Clause 26 refers to "any goods" and clause 27 provides that any goods may be protected if that protection is justified. It is ironic that the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, who comes from the apple industry area of British Columbia which long has lacked protection, should attempt to pilot this legislation through the committee and the House. It is ironic because the bill and the amendment to clause 27 deals specifically with manufactured goods. Would processed apples that are used in making apple juice qualify as manufactured goods? I do not think they would.

I point out that this federal government offered the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, which is a co-operative growers association, something like $400,000 if they would just forget certain of their problems. That offer would have cost the organization money. The B.C. Fruit Growers' Association stated that they could not accept the offer because it would have cost them $700,000. It is ironic, also, that the minister who ought to pilot this bill through the House has left the Chamber.

Mr. Pepin: I am here.

Mr. Horner: I apologize to the minister. He has seen fit to sit with an hon. member on this side of the House, and I overlooked him.

Some hon. Members: Order.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: I thought the hon. member would see the light and join a free trade party in the right sense, a party determined to forward Canadian interests, which would lead him to improving our society economics. However, we are blindly asked to protect whatever manufacturing industry might foreseeably need protection in the future.

I grew up in the west. Throughout the years farm organizations have stated that periodically they have to protect the large manufacturing industries in the east without receiving any protection themselves. On every occasion when manufacturing industries have put forward their case it has been made public. However, under clauses 26 and 27 of this bill it does not have to be made public. The minister is nodding his head in the affirmative. I take it he agrees that this protection does not have to be made public. That is not right.

Bill C-215 is entitled "An act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board". Tied on as a rider is the following:

—and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof

Is the shoe industry "in consequence thereof"? Is a whole host of other industry "in consequence thereof" and may it be brought in under clauses 26 and 27 unknown to the public, as pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River? That is not correct, Mr. Speaker. It may be correct in a legalistic and Parliamentary sense. However, in a country that is striving to protect our solidity and forces are working to unite us, it is not correct. If unity is the question, it is not morally correct.

Mr. Pepin: You made that speech this afternoon.

Mr. Horner: I hear some comments from the minister. I appreciate them. I do not care how many times I make the speech. What is important is how many times the speech registers in the mind of the minister.

Mr. Pepin: It obviously has, if I can recall it.

Mr. Horner: The minister says it obviously has. In addition to registering in the mind of the minister, I want it to register in the minds of the Canadian public.

Mr. Pepin: They are all as intelligent as I am.

Mr. Horner: I believe in democracy. The Canadian people must know what their government is doing. If the government is dealing in secret or unknown to the public, there is no difference between that kind of government and a dictatorship. By including everything within the scope of clause 27 the government is attempting to hide something from the public. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary sits here without commenting. He said in committee that this heralds a marked change. He acknowledges the fact that this heralds a marked change in Canada's assistance to manufacturing industries.

Where are we going, Mr. Speaker? Are we going to create a climate in which the manufacturing industry in central Canada will have more protection than the part of the country which is rich in raw materials? The country is regionally divided so that some areas have little or limited manufacturing industry. Are we prepared to sacrifice the raw materials in those areas for the manufacturing industries of other areas? The minister is making light of this argument.

Mr. Pepin: I am admiring your histrionics.

Mr. Horner: The minister is making light of this.

An hon. Member: It is too big a word for him.

Mr. Horner: Histrionics is not too big a word for me. I heard it but I paid no attention to it. The minister made light of the argument I was putting forward. That will not endear him to western Canada. The regions of this country are divided. Western Canada is rich in raw materials and eastern Canada is rich in manufactured goods. As a representative of western Canada, I say that clause 27 will provide protection for any and all manufactured goods.

The minister went to great lengths this afternoon to explain the textile board. He is not necessarily knowledgeable on textiles and many other things. After the full explanation on all aspects of the bill, clauses 26 and 27—in particular, by the hon. member for Peace River, I know why there will be the appointment of three persons who are not necessarily knowledgeable on textiles but are knowledgeable on all manfactured goods. This is a radical change in the Liberal party. Up until this time the Liberal party has been able to successfully advocate in western Canada that they are the party of free trade. After the passage of this bill, the government will never be able to convince me or anyone within the sound of my voice—

An hon. Member: That is quite a distance.

Mr. Horner: —that they are the party of free trade. No member of the Liberal party can successfully argue that clause 27 should include all goods other than textiles and clothing. No person can successfully argue that point unless he is prepared to say that manufactured goods need more protection.

Mr. Francis: Yes.

Mr. Horner: Numerous ministers, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), have stated in this House that our trade balance is good. If one studied the level of exports he would be proud of the growth of the export of manufactured goods in recent years.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Hees says the opposite.

Mr. Horner: My hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) is talking about total trade.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Horner: I am talking about manufacturing industries. We can be proud of the increase—

Mr. Pepin: I will show him your speech tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: We can be proud of the increase in manufactured goods that we have exported in the last ten years. I see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce nodding his head in approval. I appreciate his nodding because it shows he follows my line of argument and agrees with it. Why, in these circumstances, is it necesary to include in this bill a mechanism which would give the government power, unknown to the public in the majority of cases, to cut off imports which a great many people might find desirable? If we look at the record of the textile industry we find that between 1965 and 1970 it grew at the rate of 3 per cent a year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I have to interrupt the hon. member to bring to his attention the fact that his time has expired. He can continue only with the consent of the House.

An hon. Member: One minute.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me additional time. The point I am attempting to make is that in the past 10 years growth of employment in Canada has been largely in the service industries. Growth in employment in the manufacturing industries has been limited. By comparison with other industries, the textile industry has grown favourably and at a comparable rate. If one analyses the industry one finds that changes have been made within it. The industry has seen a marked growth in employment, in the dollar value of its sales, in the value of its products and in its efficiency, that is to say, the number of people employed in the industry in relation to the value of production.

While there has been a diminished return to the cotton section of the textile industry, there has been rapid growth in the man-made fibres section. Thus overall the textile industry has enjoyed a relatively good rate of growth by comparison with other manufacturing industries, and from this standpoint legislation of the kind now before us can only have the effect of narrowing the horizon for all those who want greater opportunities to exist within Canada.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The parliamentary secretary has, of course, already spoken. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are not now in committee and hon. members cannot speak more than once without the unanimous consent of the House. I suggest, too, that if ministers and parliamentary secretaries speak more than once, the debate might well continue for quite a while.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75(11), the recorded vote on motion No. 7 stands deferred.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved motion No. 2:

That Bill C-215, an act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be amended by renumbering clause 8 in line 11 at page 4 as subclause 8(1) and by adding immediately after line 20 thereof the following:

"(2) The board, on receiving notice of a complaint, shall immediately notify the person or persons involved in the importation of the alleged textile and clothing goods so that the person or persons could put forward reasons as to why the importation was not injurious to Canadian production."

He said: Mr. Speaker, in support of my amendment to clause 8, I should like to point out that in my view we are dealing here with the crux of democracy.

An hon. Member: Ah!

Mr. Horner: I heard some sad moans. I hope they did not come from the minister, because he holds a responsible position and as a member of a responsible government he must be prepared to adhere to the principles of democracy. Clause 8 sets out the duties of the board and relates to the filing of petitions by those whom imports affect. I attended as many of the committee proceedings as I could and I was especially concerned about the proceedings which are the subject of report No. 19. I heard evidence on that occasion which convinced me that this bill creates more uncertainty within importing industries in Canada than is now the case with a country such as Russia.

I do not intend to quote from the committee report because I am hypersensitive to charges of holding up legislation around this House, particularly today. Therefore, I shall not quote from committee proceedings No. 19. But witnesses did state that because of this bill they would be better off if they were in the importing business in a country such as Russia, because they would know exactly what goods they could import and what goods they could not import. Within Canada, after this bill passes, they stated they would not know with any certainly what goods they could or could not import. They say this bill would give the textile board the power to convince the minister that importation embargos should be placed on the importation of any goods which under section 8 could be said to be injurious to Canadian manufacturing industry.

From reading the committee proceedings one could convince oneself about the length of time for which goods could be curtailed from importation. In Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 15 the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) asked a number of questions about the meaning of the word "duration". On the same page the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) said that the policy is not to spell out a specific period of time and that clause 18 (d) deals with prospects for the industry to become internationally competitive. We return to the argument I made this afternoon which has not been disputed by the minister or by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. At this point the chairman interjected and asked whether the question was in respect of clause 17 (3) and the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin said:

> It is clause 17(3) that I am questioning on, Mr. Chairman. The word "duration" is there: "the board . . . shall specify the recommended scope and duration."

I shall omit a few words of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary which are inconsequential at this point. Then Mr. Drahotsky, general director, office of industrial policy, stated:

> The intention, really, is to leave this to the discretion of the board. In some instances, it might indeed specify a definite period; in other cases, it may simply recommend that the situation be reviewed from time to time.

These are the words I want to emphasize—that the situation may be revised from time to time. In other words, if a person feels he is being injured under clause 8, of this bill he may file a complaint and a board of inquiry could be held which might recommend to the minister that importation of a commodity be cut off until the inquiry was completed or until the injurious effect of the importation had in fact ended. Mr. Drahotsky at page 8 states that it may simply recommend that the situation be reviewed from time to time.

We have seen governments which have the ability to stall the most normal things from time to time, but here we have a situation in which an importer may have a number of dollars worth of imported goods on the high seas or he may have made a purchase in a foreign country; the importer need not be notified, under clause 8, that the board has received a complaint which has been filed in respect of the importation of those goods. Then suddenly the importer learns that his goods will not be allowed into Canada, he is out "X" number of dollars and Canadians will be deprived of whatever it was that the importer thought he could sell on this market.

My amendment specifically asks for a democratic right in a democratic country. If the government is about to take action in respect of a specific imported commodity, the importer should be notified and have an opportunity to present evidence. We have the Bill of Rights which spells out that no man shall be judged without having his day in court. This bill, however, in essence provides that an importer may be tried without being notified.

Mr. Pepin: Read clause 12. It is all there.

Mr. Horner: The minister suggests that I read clause 12. I suggest that the minister read committee proceedings No. 19. He was not present at those hearings. At those hearings the importers clearly stated there is no provision in the bill that the board would have to notify the importer that his goods were subject to an inquiry because they were considered to be injurious to the products of an established company producing similar or like goods.

Mr. Pepin: Answers were provided.

Mr. Horner: The minister says answers were provided. I would inform him that when I attended the meetings of the committee on that particular occasion the answers were not provided to my satisfaction or to the satisfaction of the importers. The minister refers to clause 12, but that clause does not specifically apply in this case. It applies only once the decision is made by the board.

Mr. Pepin: No.

Mr. Horner: The minister says no.

Mr. Pepin: The decision to hold.

Mr. Horner: I have listened patiently to the minister. Clause 12 specifically spells out that the board may in a manner specified by its rules receive evidence submitted to it by interested parties. It does not say the board shall notify the interested parties and that the interested parties shall have the opportunity to submit evidence whenever a complaint is made against the importation of a particular product. If the minister would like me to move an amendment—

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Oh, no.

Mr. Horner: —or if I could have the unanimous consent of the House, I would move an amendment that under clause 12 "may" be changed to "shall", so that it would read, "the board shall, in the manner specified by its rules" receive evidence. The minister nods his head in approval of the suggestion I am making. I appreciate his acknowledgement of the point I am making. The amendment which I am proposing is that the board, on receiving notice of a complaint, shall notify the person or persons involved in the importation of the textile and clothing goods. Knowing now, as I do, the full import of clauses 26 and 27, I should have added after "textile and clothing goods" "and other goods", so that the importers could put forward reasons why the importation was not injurious to Canadian production.

The only criticism I have of the amendment is that owing to my busy schedule I did not fully realize the importance of clause 27 and I should have added after the words "clothing goods" "and other goods". But not having done that, the amendment stands as it is. Clause 12 clearly states that the board may receive evidence if it so decides. If they want to rule autocratically and bureaucratically they may decide that they do not want to hear any further evidence. We must bear in mind that this is a protectionist bill. The Liberal party has become a protectionist party for the Canadian manufacturing industry. They have cast western Canada and its free trade aspirations to the wolves.

Mr. Pepin: Try to import wheat into Canada.

Mr. Horner: The minister suggests we should import wheat into Canada. I have always felt that that is the true feeling of the Canadian government. They do not want to sell wheat; they want to import it. But we have a surplus of wheat in this country.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Horner: What kind of poppycock is this? Of all the nonsensical positions that they may take, this is the most nonsensical. I have established this afternoon that the main purpose of this bill is to rationalize the textile industry. To this I have no objection. The rationalization of the textile industry first of all establishes the principle that we shall not build the textile industry solely for the Canadian market but that we should do so for the international market. The minister has admitted that in building the textile industry for the international market we must compete in sophisticated textile goods. He also said that we must protect the industry. This is where his rationalization and his logic fall down.

The minister said we must protect existing textile industries from low-cost production areas of the world such as the Pacific rim countries, which are our greatest customers. One of those countries is Korea. The Speaker of the parliament of Korea was present in the House. A reception was held in his honour. It is interesting to note that we export around $18 million worth of goods to that small country and we buy $15 million worth of goods from them. Most of the goods we buy are of low standard so far as the textile industry is concerned. We cannot compete with their price in the international market. But most of the goods which we sell to Korea come from western Canada.

It is interesting to note that so far as the rationalization program is concerned, the minister's logic falls down because we cannot build a viable textile industry within Canada to compete with low-cost textile producing areas. We can compete best with highly sophisticated textiles of countries such as Great Britain and the United States. It is also interesting to note that in our production of highly sophisticated textile goods we require more man-made fibres. The most rapid growth in the Canadian textile industry has been with man-made fibres. In fact, 46 per cent of the textile industry in Canada is concerned with man-made fibres. Supposedly, this bill protects the industry, but clause 8 of the bill rules out the hearing of any person who may be injured by the actions of the board.

It is interesting to note that in Canada, where many people are concerned about buying back Canadian industry, we find the Canadian government prepared to protect an industry which is completely foreign-owned. The section of the textile industry involved with man-made fibres is completely foreign-owned. It is owned by five foreign companies—and that section of the industry has the greatest growth potential. Let us consider the rapid growth of the carpet industry alone. The market for carpets in Canada has rapidly increased; carpets are being used in schools, municipal buildings and many other places.

Mr. Pepin: Mostly red carpets!

Mr. Horner: I do not understand the purport of the minister's comment. If there is any significance in the colour red, I would like him to know that I like red cattle. I do not know what he means by red carpets. Maybe he means Red China. Perhaps he is referring to Tories who call themselves red Tories. I have no appreciation of red Tories. I like red cattle. In any case, the point I am making is that when one looks at the growth potential of the textile industry in Canada one cannot exclude the rapid growth of the man-made fibres sector of the industry.

In 1950 man-made fibres constituted about 19 per cent of the textile industry in Canada. By 1970 or 1971 man-made fibres accounted for 46 per cent of the textile industry. The carpet sector is growing by leaps and bounds and the last five years have seen an increase of 25 per cent in this area of the industry. The prospects for this sector of the industry are unlimited. If the purport of this bill is protection for a viable industry, one able to compete in the international market, there must first be a high degree of sophistication, which automatically requires a high degree of man-made fibres.

The government makes great claims about Canadian ownership. It has made the bold boast that it will buy Home Oil purely for the sake of Canadian ownership. But now it introduces a protectionist piece of legislation. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, openly and perhaps proudly—I did not attend the committee that day so I cannot say how proud he was—stated that this new legislation heralded a marked change in Canadian assistance to manufacturing industries. I say that the man-made fibre sector of the textile industry has great potential, but in Canada it is completely foreign-owned. If the minister or his parliamentary secretary would like me to read the evidence which supports that claim, I will do so. During the committee proceedings the parliamentary secretary said that basically five companies own it all. Mr. Speaker, it is completely foreign-owned.

This is a protectionist piece of legislation. It may well be passed at the expense of those regions of Canada which produce raw materials. This minister purports to be a minister of trade and commerce. I say he is a minister of protectionism. If I were to use an old western expression, I would say he is a minister of protectionism of the first water. We in western Canada ever since the turn of the century have advocated that free trade is the essence of growth. I would like to quote a former Prime Minister's verbiage in this House when he said that the Liberal Party stands for free trade. That Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, the former member for Leeds who was later appointed a judge, stated in this House that protectionism would lead us to stagnation.

Where does the Liberal party lead us with this bill? They lead us to an undemocratic situation, because under clause 8 the accused is not given the right to be heard. I know the minister points to clause 12, but clause 12 says that the board "may receive evidence." I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes I have wished that I had become a lawyer and sometimes I am thankful that I did not. But I do know the meaning of the words "shall" and "may". "May" means that discretion lies with the board; it "may" decide to hear evidence from a person accused of importing textiles or other goods that are injurious to a Canadian manufacturing company.

If this board were set up as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) suggested, with every region represented, I would put some faith in it. I think there would always be one or two of its members who would advocate that the accused be heard, that he be given his day in court. My amendment clearly provides:

The board, on receiving notice of a complaint, shall—

I emphasize the word "shall".

—immediately notify the person or persons involved in the importation of the alleged textile and clothing goods—

I emphasize again that I should have included the words "and other goods." All members of this House must believe in democracy. They must believed that an accused is entitled to his day in court. But the word used in clause 12 is "may." I say that if we truly believe in democracy we should stipulate that the accused shall have his day in court. On that point I rest my argument.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—TIME OF PAYMENTS TO FARMERS UNDER STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I asked permission to discuss this matter tonight in order to find out from the responsible minister when it is proposed to make payment of the funds which the government has decided to make available to western grain growers, and to stress the urgency of the matter. I point out to the minister that in his statement on "Proposals for a production and grain receipts policy for the western grains industry" he said that Prairie farm cash receipts from the six major grains, wheat, oats, barley, rapeseed, flaxseed and rye were $878 million in the 1969-70 crop year, down $270 million from the figure of $1,148 million for the preceding five years.

I think the minister himself established beyond question the urgency of the income situation in western Canada. It was this that led me to ask, on February 22, when the payments would be made. Answering my question, the minister said—and he was referring to whether payments would be made before seeding time, or June 1:

• (10:00 p.m.)

I would envisage that it would depend on the specific provisions of the legislation, which of course is not yet before the House. Therefore I doubt that there would be any possibility of this happening before seeding.

Earlier, on February 10, 1971, I had again asked the minister how soon that legislation would be brought forward. In part he replied:

We are conscious, of course, of the desirability of having this money in the hands of the grain producers as soon as possible, and I hope that as the legislation comes forward it may secure speedy passage so that this can be accomplished.

I emphasize the minister's saying that it is desirable that this be done as soon as possible. The point I wish to make tonight is this. Following certain decisions the minister has made, it is no longer necessary for him to wait until the legislation is brought down to take action on the distribution of these moneys. He has decided on the method. He has said that it is to be an acreage payment. He has stated the amounts, approximately, that will be paid on each acre and the total acreage upon which the payments will be made.

The method is not in any way tied to the details of the plan he has set out, because under the stabilization plan the idea was that the payments would be made out of funds to be raised under the plan and they were tied to payments that would be made on the grains as they were marketed in current crop years. I would point out to the minister that the legislation which he proposes to introduce will probably be discussed in committee and in the House. In that connection I wish to read a paragraph from the March 16, 1971, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool News:

The pool's board of directors also contended that two per cent of gross receipts producers are being asked to contribute is too high in relation to the plan's benefits. Also it said the plan should include features to take care of steadily rising costs of operation.

I urge the minister, since the plan has been made and since this matter is not tied in specifically any more to deductions under the plan, in the interests of the farmers to take action, to release this money and to put the machinery in motion for paying it out. I urge him to proceed as soon as possible, bearing in mind the short fall in income which I have described and the need of the farmers in the area. I am sure he has received letters similar to those I have received, setting out the extreme hardships which many farmers are facing at this time of year, and now the costs of putting in a crop will be added to their ordinary living costs. That is why I asked the minister when he would make these payments and that is why tonight I urge him to take action as soon as possible.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, from the earlier discussions to which the hon. member referred it was clearly part of our thinking that it might be possible to secure somewhat earlier payment than had originally been intended, if the payment was not tied to the calculation of receipts for the crop year. This has now been determined, both in order to allow a somewhat earlier payment and also because the base for payment would have been a little difficult in this particular year if crop receipts had been the guide. The plan of payment is none the less very much tied to the whole series of proposals.

The hon. member referred to a number of things which were said when the plan was announced the other day. He did not mention that it was specifically indicated that this was in the nature of a transitional payment, recognizing the proposed phase-out of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the fact that the stabilization plan in its more formal fashion will begin a year from now. This is very much a fact. While we have done certain things, such as the $10 million market development every year and the announcement of the $40 million market forage program, this is a group of things that would be best dealt with together. I will be seeking the hon. member's co-operation in moving the legislation speedily forward so that payments can be made. I know how much it will be welcomed in the Prairie region.

The money is important. It is also important—I think the hon. member appreciates this—that we should not mislead eastern or central Canada into thinking this is some kind of handout, which could happen if it were separated from the rest of the proposals in the plan. It is very much a part of the over-all stabilization plan and a phase-out of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. It is important that it be kept as one package. There is already far too much misunderstanding in parts of the country about the needs and justice of the case of the prairie farmer for this kind of assistance.

FISHERIES—CONVENING OF INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CONSERVATION OF MARINE RESOURCES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on February 23 I directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) inquiring what action had been taken by his department to convene an international conference on the conservation of our marine resources. The minister replied that the fisheries of the north Atlantic came under the scrutiny of the International Commission for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries which would be meeting in Halifax in June.

My colleagues agree that the government has a very serious obligation to take the necessary initiatives to convene an international conference of the fishing nations of the world for the specific purpose of reaching agreement on an effective method to conserve and manage our marine resources. We believe that this matter is important and urgent enough to demand, if agreement among all nations is impossible, this government to take unilateral action to protect and conserve this vital resource.

Canada has become the laughing stock of the fishing nations of the world. It has adopted a jellyfish-type policy. While the minister and the government sit around and play the traditional role of being nice fellows, the Russians, East Germans and other foreign fishing countries are plundering our marine resource right under our noses. We are being raped without even as much as a mild protest. Our inshore fishermen in Newfoundland have had their catches reduced to half what they were ten years ago. In the same period, the total catch in the northwest Atlantic by member nations of the International Commission of the North Atlantic Fishery has increased from two million tons to four million tons. The catch of the Soviet Union in that area in the same period has increased from 117,000 tons to 741,000 tons. What more evidence does this government require to recognize the serious danger of depletion that is facing the fishing industry in eastern Canada?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is too concerned about upsetting the cocktail circuit in Europe. He does not want to upset the cocktail circuit by imposing regulations which might cause some offence. He would prefer to see our fishermen lose their nets and continue to be at the mercy of foreign trawlers and draggers than take action along with the Minister of Fisheries to put an end to this plunder.

There are a number of difficulties facing the east coast fisheries, not the least of which is the question of the 12-mile limit. I recognize it might be impossible at this point to enforce regulations beyond the 12-mile limit but I contend that the government has a serious obligation to proclaim a 12-mile limit right around the coast. I know they have done so to an extent, after a great deal of urging on the part of my hon. friends and myself. The 12-mile limit has been proclaimed around part of the coast of Newfoundland, but I maintain that all our coast should be protected.

How would any hon. member feel if he were to go into his driveway and find, two or three times a year, that his car had been demolished or damaged by an outsider and that he was unable to do anything about it? How would any hon. member feel if his home were damaged or his lawn destroyed by an outside force? The fishing nets and other gear of fishermen on our east coast are being destroyed almost daily by foreign ships which move in and play havoc without regard for other people's property. When a fisherman tries to prove that they have a responsibility for the damage they have done, they laugh and treat it as a big joke. Canada is becoming a laughing stock among the fishing nations of the world and the captains of the foreign fishing vessels.

I urge the government, the Minister of Fisheries and in particular the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to take action to convene an international conference on fish conservation. Second, I urge them to give protection to the other parts of the coast of Newfoundland by proclaiming the 12-mile limit in parts of my riding including Placentia Bay, the southern shore and St. John's where almost weekly fishermen are subjected to the depradation of foreign ships which destroy their gear without regard for its cost or anything else.

I hope the parliamentary secretary, who I understand will be replying to me, will impress upon his minister the extent of the problem facing east coast fishermen and the need for the speedy imposition of regulations which will give our fishermen the protection they deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we, on the government side, readily accept the challenge offered by the late show to explain the position of the government on such a pertinent and important matter as that of the conservation of our marine resources which, by the way, has given rise to many questions since the beginning of the current session, both from the hon. member and from his colleagues.

[English]

However, the conservation and better management of our marine resources is also one of the top priorities of the Minister of Fisheries and of the government. The Minister of Fisheries has stated in the House on a number of occasions that in order to exercise proper conservation measures Canada must manage the fisheries resource not only in our own exclusive inshore zone but over our large continental shelf. The government of Canada has established exclusive fishing zones and has also established exclusive management responsibilities over wider areas. This is a fact.

I believe the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) through various efforts has made significant progress in a little over two years. This has been widely recognized and acknowledged by many members opposite. Only recently, on March 5, he announced the phasing out of foreign fishing operations on Canada's east coast. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) referred to the announcement as a very specific move. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) on that occasion urged hon. members to support the action taken by the government. This is good, but we are not satisfied with this. My minister is hopeful that continued and greater advances will be accomplished within the next few years if not within the coming months. In order to more effectively secure international co-operation on the conservation of marine resources, Canada participates in nine international fisheries commissions.

One of the most important and most successful commissions has been the International Commission for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. All countries fishing in the northwest Atlantic are members of this commission. Canada will continue to exert every effort within the commission toward better conservation and management of our east coast fishing resources. The next annual meeting of the commission will be held in Halifax from May 27 to June 5 next, at which time we will again press for multilateral agreement on a number of Canadian proposals on the conservation of our Atlantic fishing resource.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF CANEX STORE AT KINGSTON BASE—EFFECT ON MERCHANTS

Mr. Desmond Code (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, on March 16th, I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) whether or not his department was planning to establish Canex stores in the Kingston area for the use of armed forces personnel and their dependents, and in direct competition with civilian merchants in the area. At that time the Chair ruled that my question might be considered in the adjournment debate.

I welcome this opportunity to point up the seriousness and the urgency of my inquiries, Mr. Speaker, and to provide hom. members with some background on the Canex system. It is not my intention to question Canex as a concept or to suggest that our armed forces are not entitled to such services. My intention is simply to question the wisdom and the ethics of establishing Canex stores in the areas where military installations are adequately served by civilian merchants and tradespeople.

Canex is an acronym for Canadian Armed Forces Exchange System and, as the name implies, this service is designed to provide armed forces installations with shopping facilities. The range of services provided is very broad and includes such things as groceries, dry goods, clothing, luxury items and other commodities designed to improve the living conditions of military personnel and their families. Mr. Speaker, if it were not for Canex the military personnel serving in remote areas of the country would be denied goods and services to which they are entitled, and their lives would be considerably less interesting and less bearable.

There is another aspect of the Canex system that is worthy of note, Mr. Speaker, and that is the service that the system provides for our military personnel and families serving in foreign countries such as Germany and Cyprus. In such situations our people are able to purchase foods and other goods that are common to their own country, goods that are in many cases unavailable in the markets of the countries in which they are serving. This is a good thing, Mr. Speaker, and I commend those who designed the system initially and also those presently employed in the Canex system. They are doing a very worthwhile job.

However, Mr. Speaker, I return to my original question as to whether Kingston, Ontario, qualifies as either a foreign installation or a remote station where foods, dry goods and comfort items are not readily available. I think we can all agree that exactly the opposite is the case. Kingston has been a military area of some consequence since long before confederation. The people and the merchants of the area long ago became accustomed to living and working with military personnel and families and serving their needs. Our armed forces are justifiably proud of the contributions they have made to Kingston's social and economic communities and the citizens of the area have done much to integrate the lives of the military people with their own. In short, there is not a situation in Kingston that would justify the armed forces taking extreme measures to provide basic shopping services to the military personnel in the area.

One might argue that the lower prices involved would justify the establishment of Canex stores in the vicinity of any armed forces station in view of the fact that our military personnel are poorly paid. This might have been an argument a few years ago when military salaries started at about $45 or $50 a month, but that has changed drastically in recent years. Now our armed forces are among the highest paid in the world, and while they might feel that they deserve more at least they are making a good living.

There is one more aspect of the Canex question that deserves our full attention, and that is the aspect of unfair competition to the established merchants in Kingston if a Canex store should be established in or near the community. The merchants of Kingston, like merchants in any other community, have invested in businesses to the extent of the local requirement. In the case of Kingston this has meant investing in facilities that would serve the needs of military as well as civilian clientele. If you take the traditional military customers away from Kingston businesses, it is obvious that the loss would be quite considerable and in many cases it would be sufficient to destroy businesses in the city and vicinity.

Needless to say, merchants, merchants' associations and city officials have all joined forces in protest against the planned establishment of Canex stores in Kingston. It may well be that the Kingston situation will establish guidelines for the government with regard to opening Canex stores in other areas across Canada. If they do succeed in opening a Canex store in Kingston, the door will be opened to similar installations in towns where the financial loss to local merchants could be disastrous.

I urge the Minister of National Defence to consult with city officials and merchants' associations in Kingston before the Canex store is approved. There are both short-range and long-range implications in such a policy that should not, and must not, be ignored.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member had come here to bury Canex, but instead he appears to have come to praise it. However, I am glad to have the opportunity to put on the record certain facts to inform both the hon. member and the Kingston area about the operation of the Canex system.

The policy of the Department of National Defence is to provide through non-public funds, that is to say non-tax funds, resale outlets on all defence establishments whether they be located in urban areas, in remote areas or overseas. The purpose of this policy is twofold: first, to provide a convenience and benefit to the members of the forces no matter where they are directed to serve and, second, to generate the profits required to permit recreational, welfare and morale programs to be maintained at optimum levels.

The hon. member said that there should not be such stores in more settled areas. But I think it must be quite clear that without the inclusion of resale activities at large defence installations within the exchange system, such as those at Canadian Forces Base Kingston or Petawawa, it is doubtful that support could be provided to our remote and overseas installations such as at Inuvik, Chibougamau or Lahr.

I should point out to the hon. member and to Kingston residents that the exchange system is subject to all federal and provincial sales taxes on goods offered for resale. In addition, overhead costs of heat and electricity are gradually being assumed by the exchange system. Insurance on plant and inventory is a responsibility of the exchange system and not the Crown, and I emphasize again that these are not public funds. Except for the base exchange officer, that is to say one employee, all payroll expenses are met by the exchange system. I would argue that the Canex system is not unfair competition with local merchants. In particular, it caters to authorized patrons only, that is, to service families and to civilians employed on the base, while local merchants have the entire population to serve. On the contrary, I would suggest that the increase in population that comes along with a Canadian Forces Base is very much to the benefit of local merchants.

But perhaps the best argument in favour of Canex is an experience I had at Petawawa during the fall emergency. The residents of Pembroke emphasized to me that because the troops were away from the base, local sales had gone down. What better illustration could one have for the proposition that the establishment of a forces base in an area is good for the local business merchants? I thank the hon. member for providing me the opportunity to put on the record once again the facts of the Canex operation.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PILOTAGE

TABLING OF PART IV OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): In accordance with Standing Order 41 (2) I wish to table in the two official languages part IV of the report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage by Mr. Justice Yves Bernier.

An hon. Member: Is that the last volume?

Mr. Jamieson: One more to come.

Mr. Greene: A momentous day.

[Later:]

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Is there any possible way we could mark today as a special red letter day to celebrate the fact that this week the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism and the Royal Commission on Pilotage, two of the longest and most expensive commissions in Canada's history, have concluded their work?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that the hon. member's proposition is premature. There is still another volume to come on pilotage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I need the unanimous consent of the House in reference to a bill dealing with air piracy. The bill is on the notice paper but does not appear on the order paper because I had not filed it in time. I have spoken to the house leaders of the various parties and am assured that there would be unanimous consent if you would ask for it on my behalf.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House in order to obtain leave to introduce a bill. Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING AIR PIRACY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-231, to amend the Criminal Code (air piracy).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I can be very brief. There have been two incidents of air piracy in Canada recently, one that did not amount to a crime because the party in question changed his mind. This bill would apply where an aircraft is unlawfully seized in Canada and sets down in a foreign country, or is unlawfully seized in a foreign country and sets down in Canada. There are other terms and conditions set out in the bill, but its purpose is to amend the Criminal Code in reference to hijacking or air piracy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my questions were intended for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is supposed to be here today, but I am sure the Minister of Finance will be able to answer them in any event since they come within his general area of concern. Is the government directly, or through the Prices and Incomes Commission, reinstituting any efforts to achieve a program of voluntary wage and price restraints or have such efforts been abandoned?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to refer this question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, when we recently met with the Canadian Labour Congress I indicated that in future as the economy moves upward, and it is starting to move upward now, we would have to worry about the problem of inflation arising again and the economy getting overheated, and I invited members of the CLC to submit any ideas they might have with respect to co-operation between labour, government and management.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the government preparing a plan involving wage and price controls, either selectively or generally, to be introduced in the event of inflation continuing at an unacceptable rate?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, the government is studying and has been studying for quite some time the matter of voluntary or compulsory controls in case they might have to be used at some time in the future. No conclusions have been reached up to this time.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister has said that the government is conducting studies. Would he be prepared to table any such studies conducted by his department or to request that any study conducted by the Prices and Incomes Commission in the area of compulsory wage and price controls be tabled?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would have to consider the matter.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the oft-stated responsibility of the provinces in this matter I should like to know whether there are continuing discussions with the provinces of proposals with regard to wage and price controls and, in view of the importance of such discussions, whether the minister will make a statement on them or perhaps release any studies as requested by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, we have not yet reached the point where I think it would be useful to have discussions with the provinces directly, although the general problem of future inflation and the efforts that must be made by all governments in order to make sure that there are no serious ups and downs in the economy are discussed with the provinces every time I meet with them.

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DISCUSSIONS WITH COMPANY PRESIDENTS—OWNERSHIP—DETERMINATION OF RATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising out of the press statement that the minister is planning to meet the presidents of the seven companies involved in the Alyeska project to discuss an alternative Canadian route. Is the minister going to meet this group and is the Canadian government actively promoting the construction of a pipeline from Alaska through the Canadian Arctic and Canadian midwest to the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, next week my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I will meet here in Ottawa the people most directly involved in Prudhoe Bay oil reserves for preliminary discussion of the alternative solution for routing Alaska oil through the Mackenzie valley. The government therefore does not intend to make concrete proposals.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: In view of the minister's statement recently that certain guidelines have been laid down and in view of the discussions which are about to take place I should like to ask either of the ministers concerned whether, if such a pipeline is constructed, it will be entirely under American ownership or will there be some Canadian participation? Will there be participation by the Canadian government in the ownership of such a pipeline from Alaska to the United States through Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: There has been as yet no definite decision, Mr. Speaker, but if the hon. member reads the guidelines carefully, he will see that we intend to protect Canadian interests and ensure that Canadians will have the opportunity to participate, if they want to do so.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: I have read the guidelines, and the minister said the other day that one of the guidelines was that such a pipeline would be a common carrier. I should like to ask either of the ministers, who will determine the rates for such a common carrier and, particularly, who will determine the rates for Canadian input or output in such a line? Would this be under Canadian jurisdiction and, if so, what minister or agency would be responsible?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, negotiations have not yet begun on this matter, so it would be premature to discuss it.

We say in the guidelines, that it should be a common carrier, as the hon. member said, and we shall be discussing this in the future. We do not have a definitive policy on this matter; however, there will be no pipeline if development of Canadian resources is not allowed.

[English]

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECOLOGICAL STUDIES—PUBLICATION OF RESULTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government invited the Science Council to participate in the ecological studies and will the minister make known the results of these studies before taking a formal stand on this pipeline?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as early as 1969 an interdepartmental task force was formed and one of the subcommittees under that task force was set up specifically to study ecological questions which they have been doing very comprehensively, as have various government departments, agencies and the private sector itself. Whether or not these studies should be made public at this time or at the time an application to construct a pipeline is made is something we will have to take under advisement.

Mr. Comeau: Since the minister is meeting with these people on Monday, will he be taking a formal stand with the industries or people concerned, and will he have the reports on the ecological studies before making a decision on the pipeline proposals?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, of course the two decision-making bodies on the question of the safety of the ecology are the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which has the primary responsibility, and the National Energy Board which has an equal responsibility in approving or disapproving a pipeline application. Whether or not it is in the public interest to make the various studies public before such an application is made is something we will consider.

DELAYING OF CONSTRUCTION START ON TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE PENDING FURTHER NEGOTIATIONS ON MACKENZIE VALLEY ROUTE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can either of the ministers responsible advise whether they now have a definite assurance from the United States that the Prudhoe Bay to Valdez pipeline will not be undertaken until negotiations have been continued and furthered in relation to the Mackenzie Valley route?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any such assurance. This is an internal matter for the United States of America. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made Canadian concerns known in regard to marine shipping off the British Columbia coast. I thing all authorities in Washington are aware that we should like consideration to be given to the Mackenzie Valley route, subject to Canadian rules and Canadian decisions, before the Valdez decision is made, but certainly we cannot bind the United States government to await that decision.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REPORTED POTENTIAL LOSS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In connection with the meetings he is to have with American oil interests and prior to the conclusion of those negotiations, would he seek from his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, for his information and for the information of the House an assessment of the report emanating from the United States Department of Commerce that an oil tanker route off the west coast of Canada would result in a loss of $100 million per year to the west coast fishing industry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague has said, this is team work and we are in constant contact with the Department of Fisheries and Forestry which supplies us with certain technical data concerning fishing in the Mackenzie River as well as in the Pacific Ocean.

I believe that Department is now studying the report of the U.S. Department of Commerce on how the establishment of a maritime route between Valdez and the United States might affect fisheries in the future.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North on a supplementary question and then we will move to another subject.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—SUBMISSION OF ECOLOGICAL GUIDELINES TO COMPANY PRESIDENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. When the minister and his colleague meet the representatives of the oil companies on Monday to discuss the possibility of an oil pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley, would they take with them whatever guidelines, preliminary or advanced, that the officials working on guidelines to protect the environment have prepared so that the companies will know that if they are interested in building a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley they will have, at least, to meet the standards which have been worked out at the present time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we intend to do that. I have said many times that we need another summer of research on the tundra to determine the effect of a pipeline on the permafrost.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Chrétien: I have said that many times.

Mr. Douglas: The minister should have taken an interest long ago.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member is just becoming interested in this matter now. We have been interested in it for two years and next year will be the third year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but I suggest that perhaps we are entering the field of debate. I will, of course, allow the minister to complete his answer. As I said a moment ago, we will proceed to the next subject after the minister has completed his reply. I take it that the minister has completed his answer.

MINING—MEASURES TO ASSIST NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

In view of the difficult situation in which the northwestern area of Quebec finds itself, where mines have stopped operating thus creating an alarming unemployment rate, does the government intend to take steps so as to help find immediate solutions to this serious problem, and is it presently conducting discussions with the provincial authorities so as to help this region?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have not been approached by the province of Quebec in this regard.

SHIPPING

CONSULTATIONS WITH INSURANCE UNDERWRITERS RESPECTING ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND HUDSON BAY ROUTES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In reply to a question from the hon. member for Mackenzie on Tuesday, the minister mentioned that some of the top people in the insurance fraternity from the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada would be touring the St. Lawrence seaway. He also mentioned they would be thoroughly briefed with regard to the Hudson Bay shipping route. Can the minister say how long these people will be in Canada and whether those interested or involved in shipping through the St. Lawrence seaway have been given an opportunity to speak to these people?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, other than the representatives of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Department, I am not at all certain just how many others have actually met with the group. I know that they spent the last two days on an icebreaker in the St. Lawrence. I will be meeting with them at lunch hour today. I have not yet met these gentlemen. I hope they will return later this year for a firsthand look at the Arctic, but in the meantime we are briefing them fully on it. As far as I am aware, in the first instance their schedule does not permit exhaustive discussions with private parties, nor can we require them to do so. Nevertheless I feel they will get a very thorough and comprehensive awareness of the exact situation.

Mr. Simpson: The minister also mentioned that these people will be invited back later to have a look at shipping through Churchill. Will the minister make every possible effort to see that the officials of the Hudson Bay Route Association and the officials of the Port of Churchill Commission have an opportunity to meet with these people?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to do that. The reason it is not being done at this time, as I am sure the hon. member knows, is that there is not much point in having a firsthand look at the Arctic at this time of the year. We have to wait until shipping actually starts.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I wish to ask the minister whether the information garnered from the trip of the Louis St. Laurent into Hudson Bay in December and also the trip of the Manhattan into Arctic waters will be turned over to these companies for their analysis?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have indicated we will make available to them whatever data we have to convince them that there is not what might be described as extreme or extraordinary hazard involved in ice navigation with the assistance we can now render. Our argument is that rates should be substantially lower on that account.

INCOME TAX

REPRESENTATIONS BY PREMIER BOURASSA RESPECTING ABANDONING OF PRINCIPLE OF INTEGRATION IN FORTHCOMING LEGISLATION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): My question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received representations from Premier Bourassa within the past week or ten days urging that the government of Canada abandon the principle of integration in the forthcoming tax legislation? If so, what was his reply?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have received any such representations in the past 10 or 15 days, although the matter was raised by Premier Bourassa at the first ministers' conference when speaking to me.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS ON ACHIEVING OF AGREEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the perilous situation in the Middle East which has worsened in the last few days. Would the Acting Prime Minister tell us what representations Canada is making, or has made, particularly to Egypt but also to Israel with a view to bringing about some agreement?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to a minister and I have the right to be answered by a minister and not by a parliamentary secretary. If the minister cannot answer me, he can give an answer next week. Parliamentary secretaries are not for the purpose of answering questions that deserve the attention of ministers who travel all over Africa profligately spending Canadian money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President—

Mr. Ouellet: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the member for Joliette. The Parliamentary Secretary is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, there is no provision in the Standing Orders which prevents a parliamentary secretary from answering members of the opposition.

I would have been in a position to reply to the right hon. member, but if he wishes to await the minister's return from a very successful trip to Africa, the latter will be here on Monday and in a position to answer the right hon. member if he really cares to get an answer.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want responsible answers from ministers, not from unresponsible secretaries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

FINAL REPORTS OF COMMISSION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

I shall refer to the letter of Messrs. Dunton and Gagnon of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism in which this is clearly stated:

> We hope the government will be in a position to encourage the continuation of studies on fundamental problems of the Canadian duality.

Can the minister say today whether the government intends to make arrangements for the continuation of those studies and for the presentation of a report to the House?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have not reached any final decision up to now, but the hon. member may rest assured that any decision will be announced in this House.

[English]

DEFINITION OF TERMS "FRANCOPHONE" AND "ANGLOPHONE" AS APPLIED TO PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question on this subject which should perhaps be addressed to the President of the Treasury Board or Acting Prime Minister. In view of the conflicting statements yesterday in connection with the definition of "Francophone", the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House on February 2, who said it was not based on racial origin, and the statement by the Secretary of State, who has the responsibility for implementing the government's policy, that it does depend on the mother tongue, would the Acting Prime Minister be prepared to tell us what the policy of the government is on this very interesting and topical subject?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): I would prefer, given a preference, that this debate be conducted in the committee rather than on the floor of the House, but I think it is well understood that the term "Francophone" or "Anglophone" refers to the origin of the mother tongue of members of the two large linguistic communities in the country.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the minister whether the policy aimed at creating a balance between Francophones and Anglophones in the public service in the next few years has been suggested, in view of the reports of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, in all policy-making, we have taken into account the recommendations of that Commission.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should go on to another subject. If the hon. member for Annapolis Valley has a further supplementary he will be recognized, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was not able to ask my supplementary earlier because my colleague had one. Is there any relationship between the decision of the commissioners of the B and B Commission not to proceed with the fourth and fifth volumes of their report and certain remarks by Premier Bourassa at the conclusion of the last federal-provincial conference which would indicate there may be a move away from the original basic principle of the whole B and B concept?

Mr. Drury: I am not familiar with the motivation of the commissioners on this subject, but if it interests the hon. member I will inquire of them.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

LEVEL OF ACCOMMODATION ON PASSENGER TRAIN, THE CANADIAN, DURING SUMMER MONTHS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that Canadian Pacific officials have admitted that even on the basis of a greatly extended passenger train they cannot meet the effective demand for places on the Canadian in the summer months, and given the fact that the CPR has announced that it intends to operate a train of limited size this coming summer, can the minister tell us how the government intends to move Canadians who are being urged to travel this summer by every means possible?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): That is much too complicated a question for me to try to answer in a few words. I will take it as notice and try to answer the hon. member later.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps the question should be asked in a different way? He might inquire of the minister whether a statement will be made. I agree with the minister that it would not be in order for him to make that kind of general statement at this time.

Mr. Skoberg: Very well, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell the House whether he will make representations to the Canadian Pacific to have this train remain as it is at present operated?

Mr. Jamieson: It would seem to me that the basic requirement is that there should be facilities offered commensurate with the traffic offering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: If there is traffic offering, obviously the way in which it should be accommodated would be to provide adequate service.

PUBLIC SERVICE

NUMBER OF STUDENTS TO BE EMPLOYED THIS SUMMER—APPLICATION DEADLINES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): My question is to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as President of the Treasury Board responsible for the Public Service Commission. As the press release by the Public Service Commission on March 15 was unclear in two specific areas, would the minister tell us approximately how many students will be employed directly by the Public Service this summer and, second, what will be the deadline dates for applications for career-oriented positions and for non-career-oriented positions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I should like to correct one slight misapprehension. The President of the Treasury Board is not responsible for the Public Service Commission nor does the commission report to Parliament through the Treasury Board. This is a responsibility of the Secretary of State. To answer the two specific questions which were asked, as announced by the Secretary of State on Tuesday, it is anticipated that federal Public Service hiring will be at approximately the same level as in 1970, that is, about 23,500 students. With respect to the distinction between career-oriented and non-career-oriented jobs, the Public Service Commission issued a poster in late December, 1970, to all universities, community colleges and CGEPS outlining the procedure the students should follow in seeking summer employment. This poster stated that the deadline—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the minister, while giving important and relevant information to the House, is making the kind of statement which should normally be made on motions. It seems to me the minister is going beyond the requirements of the question put to him by the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Cafik: Would the minister state specifically what are the deadline dates for those two types of position?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker. For the career-oriented programs the poster announced a deadline of February 12, 1971, but the commission is still accepting applications in this field and will do so until March 26, 1971. With respect to the non-career-oriented jobs, there is no deadline.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT AND ACTIVITIES PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO ISSUING OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PLAN GUIDELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Can the hon. gentleman tell us when we may expect, and when the students may expect, to receive the further release the government proposes in connection with the Opportunities for Youth program which was announced only in a general way and at a very late date in any event? When can we expect the guidelines so that students and local associations will know how to apply and what they may apply for?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Secretary of State is working intensively on this and I would hope the guidelines would be available very soon.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PROPOSAL BY BRITISH NEWFOUNDLAND CORPORATION TO BUILD URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT—GOVERNMENT POLICY DECISION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister received an application from the British Newfoundland Corporation to build an uranium enriching plant in Canada and is the government, in view of the job potential of such a project, prepared to expedite the necessary policy decision?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I have received an application but I note from press reports that the Prime Minister's office has been notified of the interest of that company in uranium enrichment. As early as last December I indicated the government's interest in this question. There is, of course, no technology available outside the United States at the present time. We will certainly consider the Brinco representations along with any others, and whether if Canada should go into the field of uranium enrichment it should be done in partnership with some agency. Eldorado Nuclear a government-owned company, and other proposals would be considered and we would go into the matter in such a manner as would be in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's answer which indicated that a policy has been formulated on this subject, is the minister prepared to direct Eldorado to enter into discussions with Brinco with a view to facilitating their application?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, we are willing to enter into discussions with anyone. As I said before, I point out that no one actually has the technology. It is available only in the United States. In so far as the government having a policy is concerned, we of course have indicated our interest but there can be no clear policy when there is no technology available to Canada at the present time.

[Later:]

PROPOSAL BY BRITISH NEWFOUNDLAND CORPORATION TO BUILD URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT—GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to previous questions concerning the Brinco proposal. Since $950 million would be involved, which is a lot of money, and since it appears foreign companies might enter into the project because it is likely foreign capital would be needed, I should like to ask the minister what the guidelines are at the present time in reference to such a project or is another decision to be made on an ad hoc basis as in the case of Home Oil?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the minister should be allowed to cite the guidelines to which the hon. member has referred unless he can do so very quickly. I have some apprehension about this. I would think that normally this kind of a question should be answered by way of a statement, but if the minister can give a brief reply we might hear it and then go on to another subject.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are no guidelines as such because, as I said, there is no technology available. Each application would have to be considered on its merits, with the maximum of good to Canada and the maximum of Canadian content as clear criteria.

PROPOSAL BY BRITISH NEWFOUNDLAND CORPORATION TO BUILD URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT—PARALLEL DEVELOPMENT OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will he give consideration to the possible parallel development of Fundy tidal power in view of the fact that this plant could be constructed in approximately the same period of time and on completion it would require two million kilowatts of electric power?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any comparison has been made to date of these various projects but certainly, as I believe I have indicated to my hon. friend, my instructions are that despite the increasing cost of energy globally and domestically, the fact is that the Fundy power project is still not economically feasible and it would not be in the interest of the Maritimes to foist expensive energy on them. But we are prepared to continue reviewing the study with the provinces, as I have indicated to my hon. friend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—TERMS OF JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES FOREIGN AID SCHEME

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister which he may wish to take as notice. Is Canada involved in a foreign aid scheme with Argentina in concert with the United States, is Canada paying a substantial portion of the cost of this project and is one of the terms of the project that all the machinery and equipment concerning the project must be purchased in the United States?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will accept the invitation of the hon. member.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ACTION TO IMPROVE COMPETITIVE POSITION IN SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the difficulties Canada has had in selling nuclear reactors, would the minister tell us what steps the government is taking to improve our competitive position?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the sale of Candu reactors of course has been going extremely well in the domestic market and we have sold a test reactor to Taiwan, but certainly sales in world markets have been difficult, not because of the capability of our product but because of ancillary benefits given by our competitors. This whole question certainly is one which will shortly require review.

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF BUDGET—SEPARATION FROM TAX CHANGES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance in respect of the presentation of a budget and a financial review. Has the minister made up his mind yet whether he will present a budget in the normal way, what will be its timing and will this budget be divorced entirely from the massive tax changes he intends to propose?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. The timing has not been decided at the present time. The answer to the second part of the question is that this has not yet been determined.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF DIPLOMATIC MISSION IN ZAMBIA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. The other day in answer to a question regarding the opening of a diplomatic mission in Zambia the Secretary of State for External Affairs advised that such a project was on his list and he hoped it was on the list of the Treasury Board too. May I now ask the President of the Treasury Board if Zambia has not made it and only Algeria has?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman would not want me to anticipate announcements which should properly be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CAPE BRETON—SUGGESTED PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but in his absence and because of the urgency perhaps I might direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very large-scale unemployment on Cape Breton Island, would the minister consider having the Cape Breton Development Corporation embark on a major program, thus providing an infrastructure in conjunction with the municipalities, and also a program of pollution control measures in Sydney Harbour, which would have the double-barrelled effect of creating employment and solving a severe and continuing problem?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to pass on this representation to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Acting Prime Minister for his reply. I have a supplementary question. In light of the concern expressed by the Metro Alliance for Development at Sydney and the Catholic Social Services Commission at Halifax who have sent an open letter to the Prime Minister regarding the unemployment situation in Cape Breton, and in view of the statement by the Prime Minister in the House yesterday that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is constantly considering new initiatives, would the Acting Prime Minister and the cabinet give immediate priority to this most serious problem as unemployment in Cape Breton is at least twice the national average?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman the cabinet will be giving the consideration to the unemployment problem which it unquestionably merits.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INCARCERATION OF BOY OF 14 IN BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Solicitor General. My question relates to a young lad of 14 years of age who only a couple of days ago was fed into the educational system for criminality, namely, the British Columbia Penitentiary. I should like to ask the minister what plans exist for the salvation and rehabilitation of that young fellow?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly look into the matter which strikes me as rather odd in view of the young prisoner's age.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I too am astounded both by this case and the fact that the minister did not know about it. May I ask the minister whether there exists in a general sense, and whether it would apply in this particular case, a liaison with the provincial governments to ensure that people of this age are not sent to penitentiaries regardless of the circumstances?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, we will first have to check and see whether a competent tribunal applied the law. If so, we surely cannot intervene in contradiction with it.

Still, if that young man is in prison, we are dealing with a concrete case, and we will certainly consider what steps can be taken for his rehabilitation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUBMISSION TO PARLIAMENT OF TREATIES MADE PRIOR TO 1867

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question and at the same time commend him for his announcement that from now on Indians will be consulted and not have policies imposed upon them without their consent. In view of the new policy which has been adopted by him I should like to ask him whether he intends to place the treaties with Indians made prior to 1867 before Parliament so as to legalize their effect, the Supreme Court of Canada having decided some years ago that those treaties are not binding and have not been binding since 1867 on successive governments?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this is a technical problem which I shall be pleased to study. I will see whether this treaty should be tabled in the House. I should like to study every aspect of the question before giving the right hon. member an answer.

TRANSPORT

DISCUSSION OF WESTERN CANADA RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. My question refers to the recent study and consultations conducted by the minister and his officials with the premiers and officials of the Prairie provinces with regard to the excessively high freight rates prevailing in that region. Can the minister advise the House what, if any, positive results have been achieved through these consultations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Only that the negotiations or talks are continuing. I think I can say that progress has been made. I outlined earlier that the technique decided upon was to look at isolated and specific industries or products that were being affected, and this work is now being done. I will report when there is something definitive to pass on to the House.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR SUBMARINES TO PATROL ARCTIC

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is for the Minister of National Defence and arises out of a statement by the maritime commander in Montreal. Does the department intend to acquire nuclear submarines for the purpose of patrolling the Arctic?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Not at present, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

APPLICATION OF PREFERENTIAL INTEREST RATE TO LOW-INCOME FAMILY HOUSING REGARDLESS OF NUMBER OF UNITS BUILT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. Can the minister tell the House whether the government will accept the proposal made by the Canadian Construction Association that the preferential rate of 7⅞ per cent be applied automatically in the case of low income family housing independent of the number of units being built?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The lower interest rate to which the hon. member refers is applicable to sections 16 and 35 of the Act. One is public housing and the other is so-called limited dividend housing, and the rate applied is now 7½ per cent. I am not sure whether the hon. member is implying that a further extension of that application be made to other methods of home acquisition.

Mr. Carter: Will the minister say whether the government would consider reducing interest rates and giving a preferred rate to individual home builders in the low income bracket?

Mr. Andras: We did some experimental projects last year along that line, so obviously we are taking a look at it.

POST OFFICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW MAIL CODES—DISCUSSION WITH UNIONS OF EFFECT ON NUMBER OF PERSONNEL AND WORKING CONDITIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Post Office. With regard to the announcement that new postal codes will be implemented which will result in the elimination of about 75 per cent of manual mail sorting by the Post Office, have the employees and their unions been advised of the details of the program and will any possible reductions in personnel or changes in working conditions be discussed with the employees and their unions well before the changes are implemented?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): I thank the hon. member for asking me this question because it gives me the opportunity to clarify the press release in which it was said that 75 per cent of the sorting would be eliminated by the machines. What the director of mechanization said exactly is that these letter machines will be able to sort only 75 per cent of the letter mail.

INDUSTRY

CHEMICALS—DEVELOPMENT OF PROGRAM TO OVERCOME PROBLEMS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce relating to the chemical industry and in particular to the minister's response to a question which I directed to him on March 11 wherein he indicated that the government was working on the problems affecting the Canadian chemical industry. Is the minister prepared to advise the House whether in fact a program is being developed to overcome the problems of the Canadian chemical industry and whether the details of such program will be announced in a statement on motions?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): There is such a study going on. That is well known to that industry and I will report on it in due course.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister indicate to the House when he may be prepared to make a statement on motions with respect to the type of program that is envisaged in this study?

Mr. Pepin: I cannot do so at this time, but the purpose of the study would be to try to remedy the basic reason for the difficulties we have been experiencing in the chemical industry, that is, a lack of wider markets which makes it very difficult to be internationally competitive from Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME LIMIT ON SPEECHES IN BUSINESS OF SUPPLY MOTION

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you will find that there has been an agreement among the four parties with respect to the length of speeches in today's debate. The agreement is to the effect that the first or principal spokesman for each party be allowed 30 minutes but that all other speakers be limited to 15 minutes. You will also find that the four House leaders or whips are in agreement that no member should ask for extended time in view of the large number of those who wish to speak today.

Mr. Francis: I wish to confirm that this is the understanding. There is a number of members on this side who hope to participate, and we particularly welcome the comments of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO INSTITUTE ECONOMIC PLANNING TO PROVIDE ECONOMIC GROWTH AND FULL EMPLOYMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) moved:

That this House condemns the government's failure to institute the economic planning necessary to bring about economic growth, full employment and price stability, and particularly its failure to present adequate programs to provide jobs for those bearing a disproportionate share of the current mass unemployment, such as young people seeking permanent work and students who will be seeking summer employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the economy of this country is in an unholy mess. The government's restrictive monetary and fiscal policies have produced a veritable nightmare of high unemployment accompanied by rising prices. To verify this statement, one has only to look at figures which were published yesterday by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics with respect to the current unemployment situation. In the month of February this year, the actual rate of unemployment was 8.1 per cent or 675,000 persons out of work. I think even these figures are suspect. The estimate is that the number of persons in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits and claiming benefits is in the neighbourhood of 782,000 persons, and I have never been able to accept the government's argument that the number of persons in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits does not represent the number of unemployed persons. As a matter of fact, there are more unemployed than those in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits because there are many persons who are not eligible to receive such benefits.

But whether one takes the figure of 675,000 or 782,000, one still has to add the 70,000 to 100,000 unemployed persons who are taking training under manpower training programs, so that we are talking about a figure of somewhere between 750,000 and 850,000 persons in this country who are without work at the present time. The significant thing is that despite the measures which were introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in March, 1970, the actual rate of the unemployment in February of this year is 149,000 higher than it was in February a year ago. The unemployment rate in February 1970, was 6.5 per cent and it has risen to 8.1 per cent in February, 1971. The seasonally adjusted figure has risen over the same period from 4.8 per cent to 6.2 per cent. What is most significant of all is that in terms of the number of persons unemployed, the figure in February this year is the highest since March, 1961, and the rate of unemployment is the highest since March, 1963.

I am not interested in playing the numbers game as to whether unemployment only went up one tenth of a point whereas, if it had not been for the government's programs, it might have gone up two tenths of a point. I am not interested in arguing whether the corner has been turned and whether unemployment is not going to continue to rise. What this House has to be concerned about is that unemployment in this country is not responding to the policies which the government initiated with a view to curing the unemployment situation, and the government seems to be taking this for granted. There is no concern on the government's part that unemployment, seasonally adjusted, stays at around 6.2 per cent, or that the actual figure is in excess of 8 per cent.

In the Toronto Star of February 24, 1971, there was a report that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), addressing a $50 a plate fund raising dinner in the city of Montreal, said:

> Unemployment is something Canadians will just have to learn to live with.

Of course, I presume he was speaking of other Canadians, not of the ones who had paid $50 a plate to hear him make his speech. Mr. Speaker, those individuals are not likely to be concerned about unemployment. It is not likely that they will suffer the privation, the humiliation, and the hardship of unemployment. It may even be that some of the Prime Minister's friends are not averse to seeing a considerable amount of unemployment because they view the situation with some equanimity. There is some advantage for them if the people who work in their plants know there are two or three unemployed persons out at the gate who would like to get their jobs. This helps to keep the labour force more docile.

At the beginning of the government's attack on the problem of inflation, the Prime Minister said that the government would be prepared to accept 6 per cent unemployment. What disturbs those of us who are in this party is that the government is coming to accept an unemployment figure of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent as a permanent condition in this country. What ought to be the concern of this House is not just what the unemployment figures are from month to month, but what are the long-term prospects of substantially reducing unemployment and attaining full employment for the people of Canada.

Dr. Arthur J. R. Smith, the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, has pointed out that if we want to reduce unemployment to 4 per cent in one year—and may I interject that is a higher figure than the Economic Council itself has said would be acceptable, because it put the figure at a maximum of 3 per cent—we would require an economic growth rate in constant dollars of 10 per cent; that to reduce unemployment to 4 per cent over a two year period would require a growth in real output of 7½ per cent; and that to get unemployment down to 4 per cent in three years would require a growth in real output of 6¾ per cent.

I have asked the Minister of Finance to say what he estimates our growth rate will be this year. He has refused to say. He says he will make some estimate in his budget. We will await that with great interest. The fact remains that none of the economists whose predictions I have read indicate we are likely to have a growth rate in real terms of 6¾ per cent this year or during the next three years. I notice that the Bank of Montreal is predicting that unemployment will remain close to 6 per cent in 1971. This estimate is based on its projection of an increase in real output of 5 per cent. The Institute for Quantitative Analysis of Social and Economic Policy at the University of Toronto has forecast a 6 per cent growth in real terms, but with unemployment averaging over 6 per cent for this coming year. Mr. Douglas Peters, the Chief Economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, has forecast a slight decline in unemployment, but says, "It is not likely to average less than 6 per cent in 1971."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, what this House has to face up to is whether or not we are going to be satisfied to settle down in Canada to an unemployment figure in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent. One of the dismaying figures presented yesterday in the report of the DBS is the growing number of unemployed persons who have been unemployed for a considerable period of time.

We are developing a hard core of unemployed. Of those who have been unemployed from four to six months the number is up 29,000 between January and February of this year, and up 48,000 from February of 1970. For those who have been unemployed for over six months this number is up 9,000 between January and February of this year, and is up 56,000 from February of 1970. This is the group that constitutes a hard core of unemployed who could become permanently unemployed unless remedial action is taken.

Another disturbing feature in the figures which were produced yesterday shows that the number of young people under 25 years of age who were unemployed in February of this year reached the astounding figure of 318,000. The number in this category is up 113,000 from the same month in the previous year. Mr. Speaker, I submit that any country with 318,000 of its young people unemployed—almost half the unemployed are under 25 years of age—is headed for trouble. People of my generation remember that in the depression of the thirties young people put up with a good deal of unemployment and deprivation. I do not think that this generation will be as patient and I am not prepared to ask them to be patient if the government is not going to do anything about the fact that almost half of the unemployed in this country are under 25 years of age.

The government has brought down a program for these young people but it is a paste and scissors job, ill conceived and ill considered. Some parts of the program are fine for looking after young people—hostels and kiosks to keep a register of hitchhikers, trips overseas and trips across Canada. There is nothing wrong with such projects, but they will do nothing to provide jobs for young people who have to earn money in order to go back to school or university next year. Neither will they do anything to provide jobs for the young people who are seeking permanent employment.

The economic morass in which we find ourselves is the price we are paying for the government's bungled attempt to wage war against inflation. All of us agreed that inflation had to be stopped but the government consistently refused to take the necessary measures. We in this party advocated such things as a redistribution of income, expansionist policies to use to full potential the output of our economy, and investment controls to see that investment went into job creating projects and undertakings with a high social priority. We advocated a prices review board to see whether price increases were being artificially stimulated or were the result of genuine economic pressures. We said that if the prices review board was not adequate, we were prepared to support mandatory selective controls provided these were applied to all forms of income and not merely to wages and salaries. The only minister who has said that something like this has to be done has been the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). In this House he said that some other way must be found to cope with inflation than deliberately creating unemployment.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that despite the price we are paying for the fight against inflation, we have not stopped it; inflation has not gone away. I should like to quote a sentence used by the Prime Minister as reported in the Globe and Mail of December 24, 1970, because I am sure it will go down in history as one of the gems of Canadian parliamentary wisdom. He said, "inflation no longer exists in Canada".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: Inflation has not gone away Mr. Speaker. Inflation is only simmering for a while. The rising cost of living was temporarily forestalled largely because of the unpegging of the Canadian dollar but it is simmering and is beginning to boil again. The cost of living rose in January and February, and if it continues to rise at the same rate for the rest of the year there will be an increase in our cost of living of 5 per cent. The fact is that the government is caught in a dilemma, a dilemma which is inherent in an unplanned economy. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have constantly warned the House, as they warned the Canadian Labour Congress, that too great an expansion of the economy could result in further inflation.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, has just issued his report to Parliament in which he says the same thing. He has warned the government against setting an unrealistic target for economic recovery and over-heating the economy again in the process. Mr. Speaker, those who accept the idea of an unplanned economy are asking the people of Canada to accept one of two alternatives; either we have full employment with inflation or we have price stability and unemployment. This is a horrible choice to ask the Canadian people to make. As a matter of fact, because of the half-hearted measures which the government has implemented we now have both unemployment and rising prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The New Democratic Party contends that we do not need to accept either alternative, that it is not necessary to have inflation because we have full employment nor is it necessary to accept unemployment as the price of price stability.

[Mr. Douglas.]

In its first annual review, the Economic Council of Canada set forth goals for the Canadian economy. They said it should be possible to maintain an annual growth rate in terms of 5½ to 6 per cent per year, that it should be possible to keep unemployment at 3 per cent or less and it should be possible to keep price increases at 2 per cent or less. The Economic Council of Canada was not only setting forth desirable goals, Mr. Speaker, it was setting forth possible goals. I want to say to the government that they would do well to listen to the recommendations made by Dr. Arthur Smith and the Economic Council of Canada rather than the conventional wisdom of Mr. Rasminsky, the Governor of the Bank of Canada. In referring to the desirability of having growth and full economic potential without inflation, Mr. Rasminsky says that this is an extremely ambitious goal, and that it is not realistic. If the government accepts that advice, they will have to oscillate constantly between periods of economic slack and unemployment on the one hand, and periods of full employment and galloping inflation on the other. This would take us through a constant series of booms and busts with the booms getting shorter and the busts getting longer.

I hope the government will listen to the recommendations made by Dr. Smith, because he has set forth programs by which it is possible to use our full economic potential to provide reasonably full employment with, at the same time, relative price stability. The government's failure to accept these recommendations and to implement such a program is the reason that Canada is in the unholy economic mess that it is today.

We, in the New Democratic Party, have contended from the beginning that we must plan the Canadian economy; that people were not made for the economy but that the economy was made to supply human needs. We contend that we dare not leave the direction and manipulation of the economy entirely in the hands of those whose sole aim is the maximization of profits. This road leads to disaster, as we have already discovered. It is completely wrong to assume that, left to its own devices, the corporate structure will produce the results which we want. We have put forward from time to time a number of proposals by which it would be possible to have in this country relatively full employment and, at the same time, reasonable price stability. We have urged the government to introduce an expansionist program. If inflation is too much money chasing too few goods, we ought to be using our productive capacity to produce more goods instead of artificially creating a slack in the economy.

We have called for a redistribution of incomes. It is perfectly apparent that since 20 per cent of the people of Canada live below the poverty line and another 20 per cent live in a state of deprivation, the best way to stimulate the economy and provide full employment would be to create purchasing power in that segment of the economy. Dr. Smith of the Economic Council has constantly urged on the government the need to use mechanisms for creating effective demand. The government has ignored this advice again and again. The government seems to think that it will stimulate the economy if it keeps making grants to corporations, two-thirds of them American controlled. What we really need is to put money into the pockets of low income groups of this country, so that they have money with which to buy goods. When they are able to buy goods, industry will expand its plant to meet the effective demand of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We have called for greater Canadian control of the economy. We believe that unless we exercise a greater measure of control over the economic decisions that affect the welfare of the people of Canada, it will not be possible to plan our economy in the way that is necessary. We have said that if inflation threatens, there are mechanisms that can be set up by which we can make sure that inflation will not take its toll from the people of this country who live on fixed incomes. Always, the Minister of Finance says, "Where are you going to get the money?" Again, Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council has pointed out that this country, because of the slack in our economy, is failing to avail itself of $5 billion a year of potential production which we are capable of creating. Dr. Smith said that we are losing roughly $100 million a week in production which is not being created as a result of the government's policies.

I say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that some of us have gone through this traumatic experience before. In the 1930's in this country we had large scale unemployment, unused productive capacity, an economy that was stagnant and a populace that was suffering. In those days we heard the same story from the government of the day, which was a Liberal government. The argument was that we lacked the money. We could not interfere through the public sector. It was up to the corporate structure to create jobs. We argued that if Canada ever went to war, we should not only find the money to stimulate the economy, but that we should do the necessary economic planning to give the economy direction. That is what happened. Many Canadians forget what happened. They ought not to forget.

They should remember with pride that when Canada entered the war, the economy that had been entirely stagnant became dynamic. We not only put a million men and women into uniform, fed them, clothed them and armed them, but we produced goods we had never produced before. We expanded our economy. We built the third largest merchant marine in the world, and manned it. We not only fed, clothed and housed our own people; we fed and equipped our allies. To prevent profiteering and inflation, we imposed price controls. We did all this without borrowing one dollar outside Canada. We did it with the efforts, the labour and toil of the Canadian people, because we planned our economy.

The New Democratic Party is saying to the government that if we could plan the economy in time of war, when a large part of our production was not going into non-consumer goods, it would be much easier now to plan the economy in a war against poverty and unemployment in order to provide jobs for our people and a high standard of living for all Canadians. This country, Mr. Speaker has tremendous potential. Canada is like a great, blinded giant that has been handcuffed and bound. What it needs now is leadership. That leadership has not been forthcoming, and for that this government can be justly condemned.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, once again during the present session we are discussing the economic and social policies of this government. We are doing so at an appropriate time, that is to say, very shortly after the appearance of the statistical reports that give us some knowledge of the results of the government's policies in fields in which it claims at least to be interested and at a time when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and his associates are considering, presumably, the forthcoming budget.

Yesterday we heard figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics concerning the unemployment situation in February. Those figures were reviewed a few moments ago by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. They show that whereas one year unemployment in Canada had reached the already unacceptable level of about 6.5 per cent, this year the figure had climbed to a level of 8.1 per cent. Notably included within this total mass and massive unemployment which government policies have created is that group of Canadians referred to in the motion we are considering today, the young people of Canada.

That unemployment among those under the age of 25 should be raging at a rate of over 13 per cent is a continuing sad state of affairs. That it is running this high at a time when the student youth of the country are about to flood onto the market seeking summer work is nothing short of a tragedy. Repeated attempts have been made by the opposition to persuade the government to come to grips with the problems of both elements in the youth group, the student element and the regular labour force element. The students finally have received the announcement of the government's plans for them. There are aspects of these plans that have merit. I must certainly take issue, however, with the long delay that the government indulged in before making its announcement. Even now, we do not have any details, any terms of reference or any guidelines about the major elements in the government's proposals for student employment, its opportunities for youth program.

Most of the announced programs simply repeat what has already been done in previous years. No thoughtful person can begin to understand why it took the government so long to do little more than produce a copy of previous programs. Certainly, participation in the programs will be less because of this delay. The consequences and results of that participation will be much less effective. For the non-student jobless youth of Canada, the government's response is so far consistent with the response it has been giving all the other employed in Canada, a sickening, deafening silence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The figures released yesterday show that the number of men and women who have been unsuccessfully seeking work for more than four months has jumped from 225,000 in January to 263,000 in February, a 17 per cent increase in one month. This is hardly something of which we can be proud. These people are sometimes called the hard core unemployed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used that expression yesterday when he tried to suggest that a seasonally adjusted improvement had taken place with regard to the hard core unemployed. That performance by the Prime Minister was a strange kind of intellectual exercise. It may have created some confusion, and it certainly carried no conviction. I sometimes wonder where the Prime Minister gets his statistics. Can it be the same place where he gets his policies? The statistics are as accurate as the policies are effective. That is not saying very much for either one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In short, they are god-awful. They are both examples of the incompetence that has become the trademark of this government. I am digressing, Mr. Speaker.

I was saying that the term "hard core unemployed" is often used to describe men and women who have been without a job for four months or more. Personally, I do not like to use that term. I think it is a degrading and inhumane way to sum up a great deal of human misery. I do not like to use it because it is somewhat reminiscent of the term hard core criminal. I suspect that some people who use the term hard core unemployed do so to relieve their own consciences.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pepin: Come on.

Mr. Stanfield: Like habitual drunkards or habitual criminals, these are people whom we can slough off, people who must shoulder the blame for their condition of joblessness. In the vast majority of cases, I do not accept that description of those who have been looking for work in Canada for four months or more. We are talking about the destruction of human dignity resulting from conscious economic policies on the part of this government.

That is why I did not cry "hosanna" when the February figures showed a jump of 7,000 over those of the previous month. That may not be very many, but it is 7,000 too many when we consider that there were already 668,000 Canadians looking for work before. There are now 675,000 in the same boat.

Mr. Pepin: Could I respectfully ask when there was a reference to 7,000?

Mr. Stanfield: The reference was to the increased number of unemployed Canadians reported by DBS for the month of February compared to the month of January.

Mr. Pepin: Will the hon. member tell me what the figure was for 1969, the average for the past three, five or ten years?

Mr. Stanfield: I will be happy to refer to the report of the DBS. The increase in the absolute number of unemployed is reported to be somewhat less than has been usual for the past number of years. I do not make any secret of that any more than I make a secret of the fact that the increase between December and January in absolute numbers was substantially larger than usual. As a matter of fact, according to DBS the seasonally adjusted rate has remained the same.

Mr. Pepin: If I can continue my questioning—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister or the hon. gentleman, but I must bring to the attention of the minister that we have agreed on a time limit for speeches. Perhaps we should allow the hon. gentleman to complete his speech.

Mr. Douglas: The minister will have lots of chances to make his speech.

Mr. Bell: The minister thinks he is back in school.

Mr. Stanfield: I am very happy to debate these questions with the minister on very factual terms. I hope this is the basis on which they will be discussed by the other side of the House. This unemployment is hardly a matter for pride. It is hardly a matter for complacency. I have already stressed the human side and I have also stressed the economic aspects. This country cannot afford mass unemployment. Mass unemployment is a sign of economic sickness as well as of human misery. It weakens the will to fight inflation. It is about time this government recognized that fact.

The simple fact is that yesterday's unemployment figures show that a full year after this government claims to have embarked on a course of economic expansion, the unemployment situation is substantially worse. Certainly, there has been some growth and there will be more. In the face of growth in other developed countries, especially Japan and western Europe, and with the resulting increase in our exports, it would take a government of staggering incompetence to achieve total stagnation in this country.

There is no indication whatsoever that the modest growth we have been experiencing, as well as what is forecast, will substantially reduce the mass unemployment that exists in this country beyond the normal seasonal decline that happens every spring and summer. As the leader of the New Democratic Party reminded us, we need a 5 per cent rate of real growth each year simply to hold our own and to prevent unemployment from getting worse.

To put the icing on the cake, the government cannot now even claim that it has succeeded in the only domain in which it was for a while claiming to have achieved something. As the leader of the New Democratic Party mentioned, the Prime Minister told us on December 23 that inflation had been licked. It no longer existed in Canada. We have also been properly reminded that the figures for the first two months of 1971, if extrapolated and continued for the year, will indicate a 5 per cent rate of inflation for this year. In other words, the balance sheet of the government right now involves the worst of both worlds, sustained mass unemployment and renewed inflation. We must ask ourselves whether all the suffering among the unemployed, brought on deliberately by the government as part of its fight against inflation, has been in vain.

This government's economic policies have failed. I suggest it is high time to face up to that fact. I do not wish to be immodest, but as Leader of the official Opposition in this House, I have the right and duty to remind Your Honour of the appeals that I have made to this government here and all over Canada. I have urged this government to use any pause in the inflationary spiral, any temporary truce, to mount an appropriate defence against the inroads of inflation. I have urged this government to use any period of grace to bring Canadians together to consider methods of controlling the vicious spiral that faces us. This is also the view of the Prices and Incomes Commission and, as I read his report, the view of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

This government made a half-hearted attempt to achieve a program of voluntary restraint at precisely the time of greatest inflationary pressure, a time when such an effort could least likely succeed. When it did get a temporary respite in inflationary pressure, as a result of the massive slowdown and the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar, it abandoned its efforts to achieve any such policy. We are now seeing the results. As far as unemployment is concerned, I have urged the government to use its enormous powers to encourage expansion of the economy and the creation of jobs in order to avoid the human suffering that is taking place. This is sapping the will of the people of this country to continue to fight inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In its questionable wisdom, the government rejected this suggestion as well. In short, this government has done neither of the things I have urged. Neither has it suggested guidelines at a time when there might have been a chance of their acceptance, nor has it effectively used its power to curb mass unemployment. In other words, it has failed.

• (12:40 p.m.)

If I believed in plots, Mr. Speaker, I might say that this government has done its best to strangle the Canadian economy in the interests of God-knows-what bureaucratic plan. But I shall be kind. I will simply say that the present mess is a result of incompetence at high levels—incompetence, lack of foresight and lack of imagination. The government must at least plead guilty to this unholy trinity of mistakes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: A major factor in the government's failure has been its stubborn refusal to take steps to allow the private sector to participate effectively in the process of getting the economy moving swiftly again. I will mention two examples of this failure. By creating and maintaining a climate of uncertainty in the field of taxation, it has discouraged investment decisions. By refusing all demands to stimulate the economy by cutting taxes, it has kept the economy in a government-issue straitjacket. Its policy of trying to channel recovery almost exclusively through government expenditures has neither reduced unemployment nor stopped inflation. All it has done has been to restrict economic growth and increase the tax load. Its insistence, despite earlier promises, on re-imposing the 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate income is an example of both these aspects of government policy.

Inflation is a continuing problem; that is clear. But the war against inflation will not be won by curbing economic growth. On the contrary, it is only in a healthy, growing economy that inflation can be properly fought or that there will be the will to fight it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Selective tax reductions would stimulate the production of goods and services; they would encourage employment and would therefore cut down on unproductive welfare costs. Doing all these things would, in present circumstances, constitute positive measures both in the fight against unemployment and in the fight against inflation.

Specifically, selective personal income tax cuts at this time would have an anti-inflationary effect. This is because allowing wage-earners to retain a larger net proportion of their salaries would help to relieve pressures resulting from excessively high demands for wage increases and also because reduced unemployment would relieve pressures on government expenditure and, therefore, on government taxes at other levels. Surely, even this government must see that this approach would be anti-inflationary. Does it not see where its policies lead? Is it not clear that the mushrooming welfare costs which result from high unemployment drive up the level of municipal and provincial taxes? Is it not obvious that one effect is greater wage demands from people who want to at least stay even in net terms? Meanwhile, those on fixed incomes—the little people the government always talks about helping—are worse off again.

Let the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) try to argue against that as a fact of life, one which his own policies have produced. The Minister of Finance is not here today but he has expressed interest in my speeches on other occasions and I am sure he will read this one. He has attacked the opposition for making proposals, which he claims are unrealistic. Perhaps he should look closer to home. Our policies have not been proven correct or incorrect, because they have not yet been tried in Canada. The minister's policies have been tried and they have been found wanting. Our policies may have not been proven, but his policies have already been disproven. Perhaps he should now begin to look elsewhere; or, if he doesn't want to, someone in the government had better start looking, and soon.

This is a government which likes to develop a reputation for crisis management. First, develop your crisis, then play the role of the White Knight. For example, neglect to use the period of reduced inflationary pressures to properly mount a campaign of voluntary defences against renewed inflation. That is called "letting the crisis build". The next scene in the manufactured melodrama will feature a reluctant, but obviously needed move toward wage and price controls. Then, after blaming everyone else for their own shortcomings, they set up a bureaucratic jungle in which they can hide indefinitely. Make no mistake about it. The word "control" may have a nice, simple ring to it, but it hides a forest of arbitrary decision and potential injustice that should give pause to any realistic administrator.

Mr. Pepin: I thought you were in favour of it at the beginning of your speech.

Mr. Stanfield: If the minister will follow me carefully, he will have no difficulty. I say that no group in Canada would be unhappier about the imposition of controls than would organized labour. I have said this to the leaders of organized labour and suggested to them and others that it is most important to labour that we achieve voluntary restraint based upon consultation and co-operation. I say the same thing to those in business. We should at this time be giving voluntary restraint a good try in order to avoid the necessity of resorting to compulsion.

• (12:50 p.m.)

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, has issued a warning against overheating the economy. With great respect, it seems to me the economy is a long distance from being overheated. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has also said, as reported in the press, that the task of maintaining full employment without inflation is an extremely ambitious one. The report in today's Globe and Mail continues:

> Indeed, it is not realistic, "to suppose that general financial policies are capable of being so finely tuned that there will always be precisely the minimum amount of slack in the system necessary to keep inflationary pressures in check, never more and never less."

When he refers to it as an extremely ambitious task, and unrealistic, I would agree. One does not expect perfection, but I say there is a great difference between missing a bid to achieve perfection and one's judgment in respect of the kind of massive unemployment we have today. The discontent with the present policies of the government are not confined to me. I notice that in the other place a resolution has been adopted asking for an investigation. A Senator, in sponsoring the resolution, if I might quote his words, said this:

> I might say that our potential is probably one of the highest of the countries in the free world. However, in exercising fiscal and monetary policy in the past while attempting to achieve the potential growth of the country, we have found ourselves bouncing between high inflation on the one hand and unacceptable unemployment on the other. We agree that these extremes are bad in themselves but, what is worse, they affect the very potential itself.

Presumably those sponsoring an examination in committee hope they can give the government some proper advice. As I said earlier, I do not believe we could achieve our objectives just through monetary and fiscal policies. I believe my view is supported by the Governor of the Bank of Canada when he urged further discussions between government, business and labour to examine the close relationships between prices and incomes and of the role open to each group in exercising restraint. I hope the ministers present will bear in mind the remarks of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in that regard because compulsory wage and price controls would present a host of new problems.

Yet I think this is clearly the way this government is heading, despite the lessons of the past. But what else can one expect from an administration that looks on tinkering from on high as the answer to every problem. What else can one expect from a government that has adopted a policy, for example, of manipulating the economy in a way that has it operating at $80 million a week below its potential. That kind of old fashioned simplistic manipulation has led us to the point where one of the most serious problems in the country's economy today is a widespread loss of confidence in the ability of the present government to solve, in any human or competent way, the problems of the Canadian economy. Any satisfactory improvement in the unemployment picture will occur only when the private sector feels confident enough to adopt expansionary measures of its own. That confidence can be generated only in a climate of reasonable economic certainty and good faith.

My colleagues and I during the past year have spoken volumes urging this government to change its attitude and remove the uncertainties that militate against the creation of such a climate. We have been joined in this urging by a growing chorus, representing virtually every reputable independent body of economic opinion in the country. In response, the government has not made one effective move. Another budget is due shortly. After the ineffective document that went under that name last fall, the Minister of Finance has another opportunity to do something constructive. He has an opportunity to show us whether he plans to change his present complacent course or whether he plans to continue it even further. This coming budget is of vital importance because it will set the tone of the economy for the next year. It must, therefore, be a budget that will result in stimulated activity and stimulated confidence within the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, we are not so much asking the government to stimulate the economy as we are asking this government to adopt policies that will permit the Canadian economy to live up to its own potential, which it has not been doing precisely because of policies that have deliberately made it run at a slow and halting pace. It is time now for this government to give some indication it has some confidence in the Canadian economy. It is time for this government to halt its go-it-alone approach and allow the economy to show what it can do. It is time for this government to get off the backs of the Canadian people and let them get on with the job. This, in turn, might allow the government to regain some of the confidence it has forfeited by its refusal to encourage industry to participate in economic recovery.

Now more than ever, I call on this government to follow a policy of selective tax reductions in the personal and corporate field. Now more than ever, I call on it to reduce or eliminate the 11 per cent tax on building materials. Now more than ever, I call on it to do away once and for all with uncertainty in the tax field. And I call on it to do this by adopting a reform that restores economic incentive, a reform that is a positive response to the expansionary mood in the country. I have said before that time is short. I say it now more urgently than ever. There are already predictions that next fall and winter will rival the period that is now ending in terms of economic hardship. That cannot be allowed to happen. If the government fails again in its upcoming budget, if it fails again to adopt effective policies that will both show and produce confidence in the Canadian economy, then it will once again have failed the Canadian people and will have done so at a crucial time.

This country cannot afford another winter like the present one. Now is the time to take steps to ensure that this does not happen. If this government has learned anything from its past mistakes, it must take these steps. If this government has learned anything from its mistakes, it will act to clear away the confusion over its economic policies in general, its tax policies in particular, and get off the backs of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I now leave the Chair. The House will resume at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in the debate on the important matter now before us and this for several reasons which I will endeavour to explain as clearly as possible.

I think all members will agree that our idealistic young Canadians should be given the means to reach their legitimate objectives.

The fact that a small number of young people were led to take part in various demonstrations, at times noisy ones, often gives us a bad impression. Today's young are not revolutionaries but more determined than those of previous generations. That comes from the advantages they derive from information media, which make them more conscious than previous generations of the problems awaiting them. The main concern of most young people is to know in what kind of a world they will live as adults.

From 1929 to 1939 particularly, our politicians succeeded in making the people accept their administrative blunders and in bringing the generation of that time to resign themselves in spite of a situation they called a world wide economic crisis. However, the people realized that it was rather a crisis created by the financiers. Nobody can deny that at the origin of such a crisis was the behaviour of the directors of the stock market in the United States, with the result that the only thing the people in power could tell those who wanted work and wages was: We have no money.

Yet we know what happened in 1939. All the necessary money was put in circulation. We had to have a war to get things going. That example should have been sufficient to show the deficiencies of the financial system that has the power to launch wars and crises as it wants.

In economics as well as in internal economy, goods are the property of the state or of the individual as the case may be, provided there is no outside interference. As soon as financiers interfere in a transaction, the state or the individual's property right becomes illusory. For instance, the state borrows in order to develop or establish such or such public service, of which the financing and lending people will be the first masters, as they are, anyway, of the individual who borrows to buy a property or some goods.

So as to progress, our governments must take actions to benefit the people. But such actions turn against the people because instead of financing these beneficial actions themselves, the governments have to borrow where they can and then tax and even overtax their people to pay back capital and interest.

I am alluding to the industrialists who live from their profits, to the shareholders who receive dividends, to the professionals who receive fees, and to the workers who earn a salary. They are all hit hard by taxes levied by the government which is itself at the mercy of the financial system. So, in order to survive, the industrialist increases his profits, the shareholder asks for higher dividends, the professional increases his fees and the worker asks for a higher salary to compensate for the increasing prices of consumer goods or professional services.

Why is the financial system in the hands of a few individuals who control the economic life? Such control should be in the hands of the state who would then be able to claim it is the master in the country and not the slave of such a system. The individual is the victim of this financial slavery, but since he is kept unaware of it, he does not protest too much.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Also we unfortunately find that economists consider normal a financial system which keeps plunging countries and individuals deeper and deeper into the red, while militants prone to denounce anything, fail to blame that financial system which is at the very root of the crises, wars and unemployment that we now exeprience.

Up to now, protest has too often been unproductive. Protest should be aimed at our financial system if we want order to prevail.

The Canadian people live in a country where each citizen could at all times be comfortably off. But by reason of an inadequate financial system, Canada is constantly facing various crises. Because the funds necessary for full development of the country are lacking, on account of the sort of blockade imposed by our present monetary system, unemployment, surtax, strikes, inflation, designated zones and slums are the misfortunes, to name but a few, befalling the Canadian people.

I have here an article that was published in the newspaper Montréal-Matin on December 14, 1970, written by Mr. Maurice Huot and entitled "From taxes to genius". Referring to notes dating back to 1962, the writer established that Mr. Graham Towers, former governor of the Bank of Canada, had stated, and I quote —that the burden of taxes imposed on Canadians by all levels of government is too heavy.

We have now reached the end of 1970 and can it be said that, in that respect things have changed very much?

In 1962, Mr. Towers remarked that the Canadian gross national revenue from taxes at all levels of government amounted to about 26 per cent of the total money supply, that is approximately the same as in the United States, which meant that the Canadian people, with a much smaller population than in the neighbouring country, paid ever so much more taxes.

Nobody anticipates in Canada a significant tax decrease in the near future for citizens in general—

—All experts agree that one way to reduce unemployment is obviously to foster the establishment of secondary industries able to create employment. But unless they enjoy a series of exemptions, industrialists are not encouraged to establish or develop industries whose taxes will erode profits—

Jobs will only result from an economy where profit is promoted in terms of investments and risks. Nobody wants to work for the sole purpose of paying more taxes to the country. For leaders to find all the solutions to economic problems by always levying more taxes shows neither much imagination nor know-how, but to boost the economy without additional charges would prove that talent, if not genius, has entered Parliament and that is what one is entitled to expect from our leaders—

Regarding the problem of unemployment, our leaders will have to show better proof of administrative wisdom in order to clarify a situation which is sometimes unclear in the area of immigration.

Before inviting immigrants to come and harvest crops, the Department of Manpower should ascertain the number of available Canadian workers. By offering them the same advantages, we could lower the rate of unemployment at home and provide income to the students and the unemployed.

[Mr. Dionne.]

I appreciate that many supporters of the present financial system see an increase in population as a means of taxing a greater number of citizens. One does not need to have a diploma however to understand that a country where thousands of workers are unemployed cannot solve this problem by increasing its population through immigration. This is not the only instance of the absurdity of the regime, but in view of present circumstances, this policy is highly detrimental.

We should also mention the question of distribution of employment notices to students in Canada. These notices should be posted in every Canadian university and distributed to all Canadian students in the United States.

At present, in Canada as well as in the United States, a student has to seek a job on the American labour market. I have here the photostat of an American newspaper where you can see advertisements for vacant positions for science and anthropology professors in Canada. Many Canadian students, uninformed about openings in their own country, are replaced by American students in important positions.

The following appeared in the Montreal newspaper La Presse of January 21, 1970:

So many American university professors immigrated to Canada in the late sixties that in one year only they have taken 84 per cent of the jobs in Canadian universities.

This problem is becoming increasingly serious. I am for a good neighbour policy towards our friends in the south, but it seems to me that we should provide Canadian students and graduates with every opportunity of getting the best positions in their own country so as to stop the migration from Canada which sometimes does take place. I emphasize this because I have been told that it will be very difficult for Canadian students, even those who are studying in the United States, to be informed of all job opportunities in their country. They often have to seek them on the American labour market through either professional associations or professional journals.

Such information should be made available to students in social sciences or other scientific fields before winter sets in and job offers should be more effectively advertised throughout Canada. University administrations should be urged to have these job offers distributed all over the country and also in the United States. The Canadian government could set up an agency responsible for supervising this distribution of job opportunity notices.

There is also much to be done in the field of physical education. Its sphere of action cannot be limited to sports and similar endeavours. Research is needed to improve living conditions. The human character in the individual must be safeguarded. Good tools are required to prepare the next generation and future civilization. Physical education must take its place in the field of training.

I am not unmindful of the efforts made by various departments recently in calling the attention of the people and the members of Parliament on a variety of programs for employment and trips for students. It is fitting to commend those who are responsible for these initiatives. However, while recognizing the merits of these various programs, we have to come to the conclusion that they are palliatives and I hope that we will continue by all means possible to improve the situation.

La Presse of Thursday, January 28, 1971, featured an article by Mr. Maurice Giroux, which says:

The Liberals will study a crash anti-unemployment program.

Three main items were supposed to be on the agenda of the meeting scheduled for February 5, 6, 7 and 8, 1971 in Quebec City. They are the following:

—an immediate decrease in personal income tax;

—a decrease in corporate income tax in return for job-creating projects;

—a step-up in major federal and provincial projects.

These crash recommendations were made by economist André Raynauld, a Université de Montréal professor who will be the special guest of the Liberal party during this important convention before the 1972 general election.

From the government order respecting the Income Tax Act, i.e. Bill C-225 which was recently debated in the House, I take it that the economist's recommendations concerning the elimination of the provisional 3 per cent surcharge have not been considered, since the situation is still the same.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The motion moved today concerns a current concrete problem, since the latest statistics prove that the spectacular unemployment rate among the young is practically twice as high as that for workers aged 25 or more.

This problem is all the more important as unemployment among the young is one of the deepest causes for dissatisfaction, because it challenges the government policy which for years has been incessantly emphasizing the need for a more educated labour force, better qualified for the tasks which are awaiting them in today's world-wide competitive system.

Now, today's youth surely realize that the promises of a better life, a stronger economy, higher salaries, more reasonable consumer prices, greater affluence and prosperity were merely electoral promises destined to remain unfulfilled, and made solely to ensure votes.

That is why I believe that the utmost consideration should be given to this very alarming situation of the educated young who cannot make use of their energies, capabilities and skills. Means should be found to amend government policies, which are now leading to chaos.

It has always been stated and rightly so, and I say it again, that economic growth is greatly influenced by the degree of general education of a population and by the degree of technical and vocational training of labour.

As early as June 1, 1910, on the initiative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the then federal Minister of Labour, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, proposed to the governor in council the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the industrial and technical training institutions and into those that should be established for the same purpose, as wel as on methods of technical training used in other countries.

Economic Growth and Employment Situation

The inquiry took the Commission to all Canadian centers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, where some form of industrial teaching was carried out, as well as to the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Germany and other European countries. The Commission first submitted a temporary report on March 28, 1911, that it finally completed in 1913 with a four volume report totalling 2,551 pages. Unfortunately, there was no follow-through.

Regarding education, the Commission has made no specific recommandations, no doubt because it obviously considered the problem as one under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

However, the commissioners could not hide their enthusiasm and they commented favorably on measures adopted in certain countries to extend schooling or, at least, to force young people who drop out of public school to attend vocational training institutions.

The commissioners report states, among other things, that in four fifths of German states, that is in all cities of more than 10,000 people, attendance at a school of vocational training is compulsory for young people between the ages of 14 and 17. The commissioners note: "We are surprised to see no young people of either sex idling about on street corners or wandering aimlessly on the sidewalks in the evening". Those suggestions could have been put into practice.

Let us remember that it is not by mere chance or by a stroke of fate that Germany has become one of the most industrialized powers of the world, that its workers, technicians and scientists have succeeded in building the economic and military power that democracies had to fight on two occasions.

In Germany, as I stated a while ago, the imperial government, before the First World War, compelled young people not yet 17 to attend professional training schools. The lectures were given most of the time in the evening and as for organized trades, they came under the responsibility of the guilds.

Great Britain was lagging behind Germany, but public opinion was warned. In the Manchester area, in 1907 and 1908, out of a population of 3,974,000 inhabitants, 105,503 were attending night school. But this did not seem sufficient because an advisory committee which has analyzed the situation made the following recommendations: Each employer who has young employees under 17 years of age should be compelled, under the law, to allow them to attend refresher courses during the periods set under the regulations of the local authorities of the area in which those young people are living or working; to supply, on request, to the local authorities, the names of those employees.

In addition, to ensure regular attendance of the students at the vocational schools, in those areas where attendance is compulsory, it should be forbidden, under penalty of a fine, for any employer, in the trades concerned by the regulations applying to the area, to employ or continue employing any young boy or girl who does not periodically produce a card bearing witness to the fact that he or she has attended the training course in accordance with the local regulation.

The report of the Royal Commission of 1910 also mentions the existence of similar laws in certain states of Germany where vocational schools must be set up in every community where more than 40 boys from 14 to 17 are working in industry or commerce. Those schools are either industrial or commercial, or both, depending on the needs of the community. Every youth between the ages of 14 and 17 is required to attend school and local authorities may require him or her to attend vocational school till age 18 if he has not reached a sufficient level of education or training when he reaches age 17.

This is a good way to educate the young to ready them for the labour market. From this survey—which surely involved the spending of several thousands of dollars—our administrators should have reached the greatest possible number of agreements with Canadian manufacturers, thus compounding theory with practice.

There would thus be a higher percentage of our young people who would be quite readily accepted on the labour market since they would be in a position to demonstrate that they have acquired, in the course of their education, a sufficient experience and that their services will be appreciated.

This method would have yielded much better results than advertising open positions abroad and encouraging immigration to Canada, since we would have had a good supply of skilled manpower right here at home to meet the needs of our industries.

In the past, when a student left school after seven or eight years of learning, he was readying himself to face the unknown. He knew that once he had found a job, which was not always easy, he would have to work hard to make his way. He knew particularly that there would still be many things to learn in order to attain an enviable position.

Now, it is different. After about fifteen or more years of learning, our young people leave education institutions with impressive diplomas and an edifying stock of knowledge. They expect that we will welcome them with open arms. But frequently, a Ph.D. and a master's degree open no doors.

And especially these last few years, a number of new faculties have been created, but apparently we have failed to ensure that those branches of learning would provide a living to the students. For instance, what would be the purpose of having young people take history, sociology or any other science, if the most brilliant graduates have to be content with jobs completely removed from their qualifications and knowledge?

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that government autorities will finally take the proper attitude in the circumstances, in order to provide young people with job opportunities consistent with their education.

• (2:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) for yet another opportunity to report, in a play-by-play fashion, on the growth of the Canadian economy, its strength and its relatively superior performance as compared to the performance of other free industrial nations during the past couple of years, superior growth, strength and performance which continue to this day and show every sign of continuing at increasing rates throughout the year. This has been a play-by-play report because, since the finance minister's December 3 budget, there have been 61 sitting days. During that period, we have had a number of opportunities to discuss the economy during private members' hour and the adjournment debate. We have had a six-day budget debate; we have had a better than three-day pseudo budget debate during the committee of the whole and third reading stage of Bill C-225, the budget bill; and this is the fourth of seven allotted days that opposition parties have given over to debating the state of the economy. In all, about 14 days has been spent on this subject, a figure approached in this session only by the 11 full days so far devoted to the government organization bill.

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Stanbury) responsible for citizenship will deal at length with summer youth employment programs. Incidentally, Sir, I ought to say at this time that he will be the principal spokesman for this side of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member should not downgrade himself.

Mr. Mahoney: This is something that the opposition parties, in spite of the motion, have already neglected. The fact remains that in our free enterprise economy, the basic solutions to economic problems lie in the private sector. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would agree with me when I say there is a limit to the direct results that public sector action can achieve. Optimum results flow from a combination of public and private decisions, public and private action and public and private policies when the public input creates the economic environment within which sound private business decisions can be made. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my remarks to the general economic climate in Canada, to the economic environment in which Canadian business lives now and in which it will for the foreseeable future be making its decisions.

In the first place, as a result of the government's firm leadership last October, Canada will, in the political sense, continue to be a safe and secure place to do business. Indeed, some parts of Canada will be even safer and more secure than have been regarded as being in the recent past.

The obvious question arises: will Canada continue to present itself as not only a safe place but an hospitable place to do business? I suppose that the business community sees two particular areas of concern here, the first in the results of tax reform and the second in the results of the foreign investment review. As to the first, the area of tax reform, there really is little to be said right now. The government's decision will be known within a very few weeks and Canadians, including the business community, will be able to assess its effects. I would remind the House that one of the stated goals of tax reform has been, throughout, "steady economic growth and continuing prosperity." Unless that goal is achieved, the other major goals cannot be achieved. Without economic growth the goal of equity will be defeated, because the sheer weight of taxation could itself become unfair. Without economic growth, a continuing recognition of modern social needs cannot be achieved, because an economic short-fall will limit our means to satisfy existing social needs, much less cope with new or expanding needs.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, in the principal conclusions to its report on the tax reform white paper, expressed its concern in the following terms:

> That preservation of an economic climate favourable to growth must be a central consideration of Canadian tax policy.

This House of Commons committee report is one of the very important inputs in the decisions that the government is presently taking. The government recognizes that when it invited public participation in the tax reform process, it also undertook an obligation to take that participation into account. I am confident that when the income tax amendments are introduced, those who took part in the tax reform process will be satisfied that they have been heard.

The question of foreign investment policy seems, timewise, to be somewhat further from resolution. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has had this matter under specific review for some time. It is a study for the cabinet. Whether the cabinet already has it or, if not, when it will be getting it is not known. Of course, do we know how long the cabinet will take to study it—

Mr. Stanfield: Years.

Mr. Mahoney: —or whether they will choose to implement all or any part of it and, if they do, how long that will take. So, in one sense, the situation with regard to foreign investment policy is not as clear to those seeking answers as is that with regard to tax reform. On the other hand, it is clear from what he said in his television interview in Regina last month, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not falling for the illusory beauties of economic nationalism. We can be confident that the foreign ownership policy will be realistic, geared to the encouragement of economic growth. In addition, foreign ownership policy will be selective, recognizing that, desirable as it is that Canadians own more of their own businesses and resources, we cannot do everything at once. It will be prospective rather than retroactive and will be positive, emphasizing investment by Canadians in Canada rather than discouraging investment by others.

Mr. Stanfield: Those are not the sorts of measures the government has already taken.

Mr. Mahoney: There are simply too many strong, positive and definite economic factors at work in Canada's economy to allow lingering doubts about tax reform and foreign ownership to deter strong, positive and definite business decisions.

Freeing the Canadian dollar from its fixed rate of exchange with the United States dollar has had an adverse effect on some of our export industries, particularly those whose sales contracts expressed their prices in United States dollars. On the other hand, the decision has given us an important measure of independence from the influence of U.S. domestic economic decisions and has been a contributing factor to the superior success of our economic policies during the past year, as compared with those of any other western industrial nation.

Certainly, we have more unemployment than we would wish and this is a perfectly legitimate and respectable point for opposition politicians to take up and trade upon, as long as in so doing they do not undermine confidence in the Canadian economy by convincing anyone that today's unemployment is a national disaster. If they do that, they will have performed a great disservice to Canada and to all Canadians, including our unemployed.

It is, of course, a personal tragedy for those caught up in it and that would be equally true if Canada's unemployment, seasonally adjusted or otherwise, were 1 per cent or less. This element of personal tragedy is real and will always be real, regardless of all the effective measures that governments at all levels have taken to assist the unemployed and to reduce unemployment.

Employment is high, too. While there were some 149,000 more unemployed in Canada at the end of February this year than at the end of February, 1970, there were also about 172,000 more people employed in Canada. This is not a tragedy. Canada's work force is growing faster than the work forces of most other western countries. This growth rate has averaged about 3 per cent per year for the last three years. Last year it was 4 per cent, 321,000. This means that a great many new jobs have to be created in Canada every year just to keep the unemployment figure, in numbers, not percentage, the same. Last year Canada's employment figures, the number of people working, rose faster than those of any other industrialized country, the U.S. among them.

Economists are practically unanimous in making predictions as to Canadian economic prospects. There has been a substantial increase in gross national product this year, most of it real. Last year real economic growth was 3.3 per cent, less than the 5.1 per cent of 1969, but better than that of the U.S. which actually dropped 0.4 per cent. The stage is set for a major increase in real output, and a substantial increase in consumer spending. Wages and salaries went up last year while inflation was held down. About 7 per cent of personal income went in to bank savings accounts which aggregated almost $17 billion at year end. There has been a substantial increase in retail sales. Last year's gain was only 2 per cent. Retail inventories are thin as a result of last year's tight money and consumer restraint. The shoppers are getting ready to buy and merchants are scrambling to increase their inventories. Automobile and other durable sales will promote significantly more business growth than in 1970. There will be a substantial increase in capital plant and equipment outlays. This is the announced intention of Canadian industry, led by steel, a key indicator.

Interest rates, both short and long term, have fallen to acceptable levels. The 10 per cent figure was unquestionably something of a psychological barrier to many users of capital, particularly long term users. There will be a substantial increase in construction, led by housing and pipelines, as lower interest rates combine with personal savings to stimulate the non-public area and as massive government assistance in the low cost housing area continues. There will be some increase in pipeline construction as pipeline systems rush to supplement already overtaxed capacity.

There will be another substantial increase in exports following upon last year's record. Gas and oil exports will be among the pace setters and prices for these exports will be up. Prospects for grain sales reversed themselves during 1970, as the world grain inventory shifted from surplus to shortage. Nickel and coal are other certain leaders. The defeat of the protectionist revival in the U.S., as the misnamed trade expansion act of 1970 died with the last congress, should give exporters a boost in confidence. We have to watch the European economic community carefully, particularly as the U.K. negotiates its admission, but protectionism has had a setback which we can hope signals a change in trend.

An improvement in the mix of our markets is also a positive sign. The U.S. is still our largest market by an overwhelming margin. In 1970, it took 65 per cent of all Canada's exports, but that was down from 71 per cent in 1969. At the same time exports to the U.K. increased by a third, to Japan by a quarter and to the European economic community by 40 per cent in 1970 over 1969. These are very healthy trends. It should be remembered also that the U.S. figure is made up in part by the results of the continental free trade agreement on automobiles and parts. None the less, the U.S. is and will continue for the foreseeable future to be our largest customer by a wide margin. We can rejoice in the fact that geography has placed us next door to the world's largest market and equidistant between the next two largest, western Europe and Japan.

Rapid growth in the labour intensive Canadian-owned service industries will continue. They now account for some 35 per cent of our gross national product and, within 20 years, two thirds of our output will flow from those industries, a fact ignored by economic nationalists in their preoccupation with goods. Canada's is, in fact, a service oriented economy. Public spending by all levels of government will be a positive, expansionary factor in the economy. Federal expenditures are expected to run at 7.5 per cent in fiscal 1971-72 over those in the current year. Provincial budgets all indicate increased outlays. Finally, our price performance will continue to be most favourable when compared with our principal competitors. Canada's relative success in bringing its price inflation under control has been impressive. This is acknowledged by all objective observers, including the OECD and the International Monetary Fund.

The Canadian economy is sound. Our dollar is strong, some would say too strong, but that is perhaps more a commentary on the relative strength of other currencies than our own. In spite of the gloom and doom from some quarters, in spite of the very real personal tragedy of our unemployed, Canadians are confident of that soundness and strength. Their confidence is reflected in a buoyant stock market, in plans for capital expenditures, and in all the other personal and business decisions that Canadians are making today.

In closing, I would like to quote briefly from the lead paragraph of an article that appeared in the February 13, 1971, issue of Business Week:

—Canada is sitting pretty, Ottawa's successful anti-inflation policies and an export boom staved off a U.S. style recession last year and put the Canadian economy in position to take off in 1971.

Canadians are well aware of a very significant difference in the outlook of those whose function is to talk about the economy, mainly journalists and opposition politicians, and those whose function is to do something about it, the business community and government. That difference has been clear throughout the ongoing economic debate. Canadians are firmly on the side of the doers.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the main point at issue is whether we have a viable economy in this country which is able to effectively use the resources and the people who produce the goods. We need an environment and social structure which will be acceptable, not one which is subject to the very severe dislocations which have occurred in this country during the past two or three years. These dislocations are becoming worse. Instead of facing a situation of unemployment and economic dislocation, which might be regarded as temporary, we are facing circumstances which have lasted so long that they are becoming chronic to the point at which we are accepting a continuation of unemployment and discussions centred on the number of people who are unemployed, the percentage level of unemployment and the fraction by which it may decrease or increase. These fractions are not really relevant to the mass of the Canadian people or to the students who are mentioned specifically in the motion before us.

• (2:50 p.m.)

A student from Saskatchewan wrote to me the other day after applying to the regional office of the Public Service Commission in Alberta asking for a job. The officials wrote to him that it was useless for him to apply in Alberta for a job because, under the arrangements which had been made, Alberta was the headquarters for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and there would be no jobs for people from other localities until the people from Alberta had been looked after. I should like to read a few lines from the letter which was written to me on this subject.

In recruiting students for summer employment, positions in a particular locality are filled by students from within that locality, with the exception of positions in the National Capital Region in which case applicants from any region are considered.

I trust this is the information you require.

I shall read only a few phrases from the letter which the student received.

Only if there does not appear to be a sufficient number of qualified students in Alberta will your application be considered.

The Minister without Portfolio may have some comments to make on this point. I take it from these letters—I do not see how I could draw any other conclusion—that the government has balkanized all the regions of Canada, and those who are fortunate enough to be in regions where job opportunities are available can get jobs. However, those who are in regions where there are no job opportunities will never get jobs. I do not wonder that this student from the University of Saskatchewan complained bitterly about the situation. Imagine cutting off many Canadian students from job opportunities with the Public Service Commission in Alberta, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, just because they do not live in the region. This is the way the government runs the country and spreads the misery around. The hon. member who spoke a while ago congratulated us on taking a respectable stand. The best thing the government can hope for is that the people it is abusing and neglecting continue to take a respectable stand. Representatives of the government should tell us at this point what they propose to do to meet the situation.

Ministers talk about private industry, but private industry is not providing the jobs. The government is pumping money into the capital structure of private industry by way of grants and so on, because private industry is no longer willing to take the risk of locating in certain areas. The ultimate is happening in Saskatchewan. Not only are we putting up the money for industry, but the government of the province is preparing to pay half the wages of students if they can find an employer, up to a maximum of $150 per month. I do not know what will happen to the ordinary worker in Saskatchewan under this system. I suppose a business which is offered a student at half price will be glad to use his services if he can swing a pick and shovel or drive a tractor or a "cat" well enough. I can foresee a certain amount of dislocation arising from that situation. But this is the sort of thing we find under a government which is unable to put the economy in order and use the resources of the people we have.

Mr. Stanfield: They don't know how to use the people.

Mr. Gleave: That is absolutely right. Let me tell hon. members what is happening in the grain industry. The government is proposing, under the stabilization plan, to take a 2 per cent cut out of the gross revenue from sales. Here is an industry which is struggling to survive and which will survive, in spite of the government, because it is a viable industry. The government brings out this plan and says it will take 2 per cent of the gross to put into the program. At the very least this will amount to 6 per cent of the net which, in effect, will be a 6 per cent tax on the net returns of an industry which is already working on a very narrow margin.

Economic Growth and Employment Situation

I suppose any economist would say that if we really want to get the economy rolling we should reduce taxes as a means of making more money available to activate the business cycle. But the reaction of the government is in a completely contrary direction. It says: Oh no, we shall take 2 per cent of the gross and sink it into a fund to gather dust; we shall take 2 per cent of the farmer's purchasing power away from him. Then, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board comes along and says: we have been carrying part of the storage charge; we shall stop doing that, and the farmer can pay for those services, too. What is being accomplished? The government is progressively reducing the already limited purchasing power which farmers possess. The government is looking toward a contracting economy, not an expanding economy, and if anything else happens it will be in spite of them and not because of them.

In its decisions and in the carrying out of its policies in the past, the government has stumbled from one mistake to another. The first action it took when the farmers were in trouble was to double the amount which could be received by way of cash advances. As a predictable result, farmers are now, two years later, trying to pay back these cash advances out of a limited income. The last white paper report to the government of Saskatchewan indicated that the average farmer owed between $1,000 and $1,200 which he was trying to pay back at a time when the value of his products had fallen. In short, the government has done the reverse of what it should have done. Hon. members who sit on the treasury benches opposite instituted the Lift program. They pressured farmers into taking acreage out of production and allowing the land to lie idle, as a result of which the production of wealth from grain in the Prairie provinces declined. How in the world anybody but the Liberal government could believe a country could become rich by not producing is beyond my comprehension.

The government has established an extraordinary structure in the grain industry. I do not know how they can find their way around it themselves. There is EXCAN. They have persuaded the three wheatpools and the UGG., to establish an export agency which is supposed to be working to increase sales of grain. There is also the Canada Grains Council which was dreamed up when this government came in. The government is providing a small subsidy and I predict there will be more. This is really a consortium of the grain exchange interests in Winnipeg. This agency makes trips to various parts of the world to seek export opportunities and comes back and reports.

In addition we have the Canadian Wheat Board, which is a grain marketing agency and should be used for this purpose. I do not know why the government created these agencies and divided up the responsibilities. Maybe some day we will be told the reason. I can see that in two or three years from now we might have several agencies overseas, from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as the Canada Grains Council, and then we will try to get these people to appear before the agricultural committee to tell us what they are doing. It will probably take a Philadelphia lawyer to figure it all out.

I have touched briefly on the circumstances with which we are faced in the employment field and in the agricultural field. As I say, instead of moving in a clear direction we seem to have adopted a method of spreading the misery around through a profusion of agencies of government departments and the grain trade so that people fall all over one another's feet and do not even know whose feet they have tripped over. Then there is balkanization in various areas to make sure that somebody from Saskatchewan will not be going to Alberta to take a job away from someone in Alberta who badly needs it. I suppose the same gimmick will be used in Ontario that is being used in Alberta by the regional offices of this government. Mr. Speaker, perhaps some day this government will improve a little or, more fortunately, we might be able to get rid of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister without Portfolio responsible for citizenship.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for his welcome to this debate. I also thank the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) for raising this subject today. I am only disappointed that they did not put forward constructive criticisms concerning the program which was announced this week in the field of summer student employment.

Mr. Stanfield: We are waiting to know what the proposals are.

Mr. Stanbury: The general economic situation has been ably dealt with by my colleague from Calgary. As this House knows full well, the rapid growth of inflation has been arrested and there are indications that our economy is now on an upward swing. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics yesterday reported a very slight and somewhat smaller than usual increase in the number of persons unemployed. While there were 7,000 more persons without jobs—and when anyone is without a job this is to be regretted—there were 9,000 more with jobs.

We all know that the labour force is the largest in our history and, indeed, one of the largest and fastest growing in the world. This fact, combined with inflationary pressure, has presented the government with unique economic problems to solve. I see no indication that anyone in this House could have faced such circumstances more resolutely or imaginatively than this government has. If the growing vigour of the economy was to absorb with reasonable and increasing speed those seeking permanent work of a conventional kind, as I believe it will, it was of the greatest importance that the government should intervene to assist substantially the private economy in the task of absorbing the enormous number of young people who will be seeking employment during the summer months. It was precisely because we wish to allow young and old who are seeking permanent employment—to the extent that that phrase is applicable in the modern world—to be assisted and protected in that search that the government has introduced a great variety of special student programs for the coming summer.

Hon. members are aware that the situation of employment and the attitude toward work and its value has changed since the 1930s. We are aware that the young in this country, as in other countries, for some years have been trying to tell us something about values, purpose and the proper aims of society. We must be aware that it has been the young to a very large extent who have reminded us of the dangers of unbridled pollution, the needs of the poor and deprived, the value of increased participation by individuals in their own affairs and the necessity of moving resolutely toward a just society.

I would remind members of this House, as I have been reminded, of three basic facts. First, there are a great many tasks to be undertaken and accomplished which the private economy does not automatically support. Second, there is a great deal of youthful energy, imagination and determination in this country which is waiting to be unleashed, provided it can choose outlets that seem valuable and deserving and in which pay or remuneration is only a secondary consideration. Third, there are many young people who do need money or do not need as much, and a program of activities had to be found which would provide for a variety of valid personal goals.

This is the meaning of the government's new student employment and activities program for this summer. It offers conventional employment at reasonable rates of remuneration for those who wish it. It provides unconventional employment at reasonable remuneration for those with sufficient imagination and courage to create it. It also provides the way to accomplish a variety of social goals for those whose imagination and devotion to Canada is as important to nourish as are their incomes. In this program we are offering a challenge to the voluntary capacities of our citizens, particularly the younger citizens, that has been unmatched since the general mobilization for war in 1939. If we have been searching, as have many modern societies, for what the American psychologist William James called "the moral equivalent of war", we believe we are taking a substantial step in that direction. New and important goals for Canadians are being matched with the enthusiasm, energy and will to accomplish them.

So that the scope and nature of the summer '71 program will be clearly on record, I should like to review briefly its various components. The Department of National Defence proposes to provide employment for some students who will undertake regular summer militia training of both an elementary and continuing nature, and also for some who will enjoy special training in first aid, hunter safety, bush survival, search and rescue, water safety, watermanship, adventure training, leadership and instructional techniques. I think many will agree that these new and imaginative opportunities offered by our armed forces are most welcome. The Department of National Health and Welfare will provide opportunities for development of young athletes, for studies of drugs abuse and for a very important study by the young of facilities available for athletics in Canada. Native peoples will be encouraged to take part in projects, particularly in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The Department of Manpower and Immigration now has 110 special Canada Manpower centres for students in 83 cities and towns throughout Canada, compared with 23 centres in 66 communities last summer. I can assure the hon. member who just spoke that young people from all parts of the country will have ample access to job opportunities through these centres. Municipalities and interested organizations are co-operating in the establishment of the student centres. They will be manned by 374 specially trained students and will have the effect of relieving the pressure on regular centres which will be engaged in their usual heavy seasonal tasks. As well, the department has negotiated employment for some 3,200 post-secondary students in other countries.

For summer employment in the public service of Canada students are invited to apply directly to the Public Service Commission or through the Canada Manpower centres. The utmost effort is being made to ensure that the positions available will result in the maximum value both to the students occupying them and to the government.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister has limited time, but would he permit a question?

Mr. Stanbury: I will be glad to receive the question at the end of my statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to be rude, but I wonder if the minister, instead of rereading press issues of a few days ago would fill in some of the blanks in the opportunities for youth programs for which we are all waiting and for which some of us have stayed in the House.

Mr. Stanbury: I thank the hon. member for his interest, and I welcome it. Under the direction of the Department of the Secretary of State there are a number of programs, including the Opportunities for Youth Program. For those who intend to travel in Canada individually, as many certainly will do, the government is enlisting voluntary organizations to man small information and service centres. We all know the extent of hitch-hiking in Canada; no one can drive along any highway in the summer without being aware of it. With our program of support for locally sponsored hostels this year and the placing of kiosks at strategic points along the highways, the government hopes to reduce unnecessary risks and anxieties on the part of both the young and their temporary hosts in Canadian communities.

An increased amount is available also for group travel for those who wish a more planned and directed experience organized either by governments, as in the case of the Young Voyageurs Program, or by voluntary organizations. The department will allocate increased sums of money for summer language training on a co-operative basis with provincial governments and universities. Obviously, if we are to live up to our ambitions as a bilingual society, young Canadians need all possible resources to learn a second language as early in their lives as possible.

I would like to stress the fundamental principle of co-operation with other levels of government inherent in these programs. We are not simply providing money for provinces or municipalities to spend on our behalf or on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada; we are establishing an unprecedented degree of co-ordination with these other governments so that the great variety of programs being undertaken this summer and a great variety of sources of initiative may complement one another and contribute a maximum multiplier effect. Consultation has been carried out with all provincial governments at both ministerial and official levels. Administrative arrangements have been established to ensure utmost co-ordination within the federal government as well as with other authorities.

The Youth Opportunities Program, to which we have allotted $15 million, represents a unique challenge to the voluntary sector. The Leader of the Opposition is interested in the criteria on which proposals from voluntary organizations will be evaluated, as I am sure all hon. members are. These have been forwarded to all Canada Manpower centres, to citizenship branch offices and to almost 5,000 voluntary organizations in Canada.

In general, we are directing our attention to involving the young and those associated with them in creating, managing and evaluating their own projects. The value of this approach lies in the fact that young people will not only have an income but will discover the requirements for managing and accomplishing objectives in an organized, responsible manner. This experience will provide young people who take the opportunity with practical work experience but it will also provide for many needed additional services in communities. I am convinced that the new perspectives which young people will bring to situations, coupled with their imagination and energy, will produce many useful and exciting new programs. This program is a vote of confidence in the abilities of Canadian young people.

Projects will be selected and approved on a variety of criteria: first, the number of jobs created and their cost; second, the number of people who might benefit or take part; third, the involvement of young people in planning, carrying out and evaluating projects; fourth, creation of new services, programs or activities. Emphasis will be given to projects in which worth-while and useful jobs are proposed and in which jobs would not have otherwise existed. Because of their need for support to continue their education, emphasis will be placed on providing jobs for post-secondary students and those about to enter post-secondary institutions. The benefits to students in terms of both income and experience will be assessed.

A fair regional distribution of benefit will be attempted, based on regional need. About 100 proposals are already being analysed: for example, a proposal by a group of blind students aided by law students for a study of the rights of blind people in areas in which there might be discrimination against them; a project proposed by a group of young people in a small rural community to develop a recreation and day camp program for children in their area; a proposal from a group of students studying television production at a community college for a series of media workshops which will involve up to 25 additional people in each workshop; a proposal from a group of archeology students to carry out a number of archeological digs, with support and supervision of an archeological society. Also included are proposals by national voluntary agencies for projects of water safety, recreational programs, mental health services and special research projects associated with universities.

As hon. members can see, voluntary organizations in Canada have not waited, and did not feel they had to wait for announcements by the government. Their initiative has been reflected in proposals already received by a number of departments. These proposals are under consideration and within the past two days some 500 further inquiries about the program have been received by the Department of the Secretary of State.

I hope that hon. members, to whom the Opportunities for Youth documentation is being sent, will encourage this kind of voluntary action. I hope that the word will go forth from this House and from other centres of government within Canada to all citizens, to voluntary organizations and to young people in particular, so that they will respond to this challenge and join in the partnership of imagination, energy and achievement that the government hopes to develop with them. It is a challenge to citizen activism of the most constructive kind, the kind that builds nations and strengthens democracy.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister indicate who will decide what projects will be proceeded with? He indicated that this is a matter of students evaluating their own projects.

Mr. Stanbury: A secretariat has been established in the Department of the Secretary of State which, with the advice of an interdepartmental committee, will analyse proposals and process them as rapidly as possible in consultation with provincial and municipal authorities.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask who will make the decisions?

Mr. Stanbury: The decisions will be made by the interdepartmental committee as projects are analysed. That process is already in the course of action.

Mr. Douglas: Could the minister tell us the personnel of the interdepartmental committee and whether or not any applications have been submitted to it?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that there have been 100 or so applications or project proposals received. As a matter of fact, the development of the program arises partly out of the expressed interest of the voluntary organizations in devising and carrying out programs themselves. The interdepartmental committee has representation from the most directly concerned departments. The secretariat of the Department of the Secretary of State also has seconded to it members from other departments.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Mr. Douglas: If the minister does not have the names of the persons on the committee, can he say what departments will be represented? I understand there would be the Department of the Secretary of State, Treasury Board and Citizenship. Can he give us some idea what groups will be represented, if possible the names of the persons who will be on the committee, and tell us whether any of the projects have yet been approved by the committee?

Mr. Stanbury: No projects have yet been approved, Mr. Speaker. I cannot give the hon. member the names of the individuals on the interdepartmental committee, but certainly the departments most directly concerned would include the Department of the Secretary of State, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and Treasury Board.

Mr. Douglas: Who will be the chairman?

Mr. Stanbury: I cannot give the hon. member the name of the chairman but I would be glad to discuss that with him later.

Mr. Stanfield: Could the minister indicate whether or not the interdepartmental committee has yet been established, and when will we receive the criteria governing the Opportunities for Youth Program? Can we receive these today?

Mr. Stanbury: I hope so, Mr. Speaker. The application forms and a memorandum with those forms have gone out to each of some 5,000 voluntary organizations that might be interested in making proposals, and to regional offices of the government. I have asked that similar documentation go to Members of Parliament and I hope this is available to the Leader of the Opposition immediately.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the committee been established?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, the committee has been established.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair notices that the hon. member for Yorton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) have questions and I will recognize them. I think in view of the fact that the minister is the chief government spokesmen, it would be in order to do so. I might mention that we are using the minister's time, because the time allotted to him under the special order made earlier today has not yet expired. It will expire in about three minutes and after that I would not want to recognize any more members on questions.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not mention anything about youth hostels. Could he enlighten us on what plans the government has and whether or not it is consulting municipalities on the use of high school auditoriums?

Mr. Stanbury: I did mention that we were prepared to support local initiative in this field.

Mr. Douglas: No armouries?

Mr. Stanbury: As the hon. member knows, last year in response to demand for emergency federal assistance with hostel accommodation the most readily available federal facilities were offered and staff was organized from Ottawa for these facilities. This year we are adopting quite a different approach. We are prepared to give financial support to local initiative in the supplying of hostel facilities. We feel that there are facilities more appropriate than armouries in most communities, and we already have many indications of interest from municipalities and voluntary organizations which are assessing the facilities in their communities, organizing them and will be receiving some financial assistance from the Department of the Secretary of State. But, Mr. Speaker, the federal government will not be operating hostels.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister under what provision or regulation of the Public Service Commission in Canada—I am quoting him—positions in a particular locality will be filled by students from within that locality? Under what provisions of the Public Service Act will that be done?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I do not presume to answer on behalf of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), but I understand that he has dealt with this question. Perhaps he could deal with it further the next time he is in the House during the question period. I might add that the suggestion on the part of some hon. members in the Conservative party that the government is somehow passing the buck by attempting to respond to citizen initiative seems to me a most unconservative attitude. Rather than this government attemping to impose its ideas of worth-while programs on the young people of Canada, we are attempting this year, really for the first time, to show that a government of Canada can respond to citizen initiative and can recognize that there is a third force in Canadian society, other than government and industry, which provide an important impetus to our society. There is a voluntary citizen force, and we think it can be a much more powerful and productive force in this country if we respond to it.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) the 675,000 Canadians who are without jobs may sleep a little easier tonight, but he is obviously ignorant of the facts and is unwilling to accept the true story of what is happening in Canada. He has either been exposed to his wealthy oilmen friends in Calgary or has come down with a severe case of "Bensonitis". His having been recently appointed as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), I suspect that the latter is true and he is suffering from "Bensonitis".

Mr. Stanfield: That's a fatal disease.

Mr. Carter: Yes, it is fatal. The hon. member and his colleagues talk about economic growth, the strength of the Canadian dollar, how sound the economy is, the end of inflation and the decline in unemployment. Yet while these words are being uttered, more people become unemployed. Indeed, the unemployment rate has been steadily increasing for several months. After battling inflation at the expense of the average wage earner, the poor and unemployed, the government has given up the fight.

• (3:30 p.m.)

At the outset they deliberately created unemployment to beat inflation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted this when they stated that they were quite prepared to allow unemployment to rise to an almost unprecedented high figure in order to wage their so-called war on inflation. They have lost that battle and are unable to respond to either the inflation that has been plaguing the country or the challenge of unemployment. While pretending to be fighting for the little man, in the last two years the government has refused to provide adequate help for him or his family if he is unemployed.

Members of this party have asked for emergency benefits and for reform in the regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The mayors and provinces have followed this lead and made the same request. In its stubborn way, this government has refused to heed the suggestions, as it has refused to heed the problems facing the average Canadian who today finds himself among the 675,000 without jobs.

The bill to increase unemployment insurance benefits now before this House is a reform measure which will have its effects in the long term. It can only be regarded as a rearguard action to cover the Prime Minister's retreat from the battlefields of unemployment and inflation. We have asked for reform of the Canada Assistance Plan, and the provinces and cities have echoed this. In its present form the plan is absolutely insensitive to the difficulties of the different regions of Canada.

The government has argued that the private sector must expand and create new jobs, yet the government has refused to bolster the confidence of the private sector by spelling out its tax reform intentions or by ending its policy of passing the buck to labour and business when it comes to inflation. By refusing to lift any of the present tax burdens, the government is preventing the economy from rising from its present despair. For example, the 3 per cent surtax has been maintained and the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials has also been maintained. The government does not even entertain the idea of selective income cuts for middle and low-income groups.

I think it has become fairly evident to most Canadians, but more especially to the 675,000 unemployed, that the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance refuse to recognize the problems facing the nation. This is particularly true with regard to unemployment and the various statistics published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. They have obviously succeeded in fooling themselves. I should like to inform them, however, that they are not fooling the Canadian public in general nor the large number of people out of work. I can certainly tell them that they are not fooling the 15.2 per cent of the workers in my province of Newfoundland who find themselves looking for jobs. Those people are not being fooled nor are their families, some of whom will probably go to bed hungry tonight.

The more we reflect upon what is happening in Canada, Mr. Speaker, the more we realize what a strange twist fate has taken with regard to this government. The Prime Minister and his colleagues campaigned vigorously in 1968 on the promise of a just society and an end to regional disparity. It is strange indeed that a government which campaigned on these promises should have taken the opposite course.

Mr. Stanfield: Equal poverty for all!

Mr. Carter: It has taken off in the opposite direction. It is a known fact to all but the Liberals, who are unwilling to admit to anything which might reflect on their leader or their party, that the economy is amiss. This government finds itself in a tailspin from which it is impossible to recover. In light of the arrogance and the stupid determination of the Minister of Finance and his leader to create unemployment in order to battle inflation, and in light of the consequent suffering and misery of a large number of Canadians through illogical and insane policies, I feel that the minister would do the Canadian public a great favour if he would offer his resignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Carter: As a matter of fact, I will go a step farther and make the same suggestion to the government and to the Prime Minister. If they have any sense of decency left, or any concern for the plight of the Canadian people, they should step down and let somebody else fill the breach—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Who could that be?

Mr. Stanfield: That's what they asked in 1957.

Mr. Carter: —and let them do the job of which the government is obviously incapable.

An hon. Member: Don't worry McBride; you won't get the chance.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, this government and its leaders are bluffing themselves. They are being dishonest with themselves, with the Canadian people and with the House of Commons.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Carter: I represent a part of Canada known as an economically depressed area, one of the have-not provinces of this nation. Today we have reported unemployment of 15.2 per cent and I would suggest that at least another 5 per cent could be added to that figure because of the way this government has been juggling and gerrymandering the figures to cover their mistakes. It is impossible to take the figure given by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics without a grain of salt, so I say that although my province is reported to have 15.2 per cent unemployment I think it is reasonably safe to say it is probably closer to 20 or 22 per cent.

This is a sad commentary on a nation supposed to have one of the highest standards of living in the world. It is also a sad reflection on a government that campaigned on and boasted of its desire and ability to give a just society to all Canadians and to end regional disparity. The unfortunate thing is that the people being hurt by these policies are the poor, the average man, the man who earns a living with his hands and eats his lunch from a lunch-basket instead of some posh restaurant. The fishermen, the miners, the factory workers, farmers and the ordinary man on the street suffer from this government's illogical and insane policy.

I contend that if the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have any concern left for the Canadian people they should tender their resignations and let somebody take over who can do the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the Minister without Portfolio in charge of kids outline his summer program for students. I have read all the stuff he has put forward and, frankly, do not understand it. I am not sure how one would go about applying for these benefits: I am expected to tell the young people and I am not sure myself how to go about it. Having listened to the minister say that there is to be set up another cabinet committee, that people will be hired to undertake studies, that agencies will be set up and that eventually they will tell us how to go about filling out forms, and so on, it looks as though we are making this a long-term project and that the kids will be drawing their old age pensions before we solve the problem.

Would it not be nice—if the government is really interested in cleaning up the environment—if it permitted the young people, in conjunction with municipalities all over the country, to undertake clean-up projects? I am not prepared to say what those projects should be. What about cleaning up the Ottawa River? Surely we could allow the kids to clean up the Rideau and Ottawa Rivers. That would give them something to do. They could pump it out, dig it out or shovel it out. The way things are going, pretty soon we will be able to shovel out the Rideau River anyway.

Surely we could help our students to work in conjunction with the municipalities and do something constructive and worth while. Not long ago I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), who has some responsibility in this area, what a certain committee set up several years ago to deal with this matter had done. He was not sure what committee I meant and did not know what it had done. I was referring to an agreement between Quebec and Ontario regarding the Ottawa River.

Several years ago a bunch of young people came to my office. One of them was the daughter of a deputy minister whom I knew. She was a very nice young lady and led one of the university groups in this country. She wanted to get some money to take a number of students to Mexico. For some reason they had not been taken into CUSO. They wanted to go on a project in Mexico and provide sewage and water services for an Indian village. How they heard about the Indian village, I do not know. How they thought they knew anything about sewage and plumbing, I also do not know; but they had an idea about it. They asked for help and I was influential in getting that help. It was not from the government. The government would have said, "We belong to the international organization that supports CUSO: If we were to support this other organization the Mexican government would say we were interfering in their affairs. They did not ask us, and we cannot help."

Mr. Pepin: Maybe somebody asked them, "Do you know anything about sewage?"

Mr. Peters: Maybe. In any event, the Canadian government did not help them. These young people displayed initiative and I was influential in helping them to obtain assistance from the Colonial Coach Company which supplied a bus and took them to Mexico. Before going they went around Ottawa and scrounged plastic pipes, pumps and what have you from merchants. They went down. When they came back they looked as if they had been to hell and back. Most of them had a tropical disease. Most of them went down there and suffered severely. The young lady I was interested in and who made the original request came back and spent several months in hospital. She had picked up all sorts of germs while working on the project. The point is that these young kids were willing to live in huts and in primitive conditions among the Indians of Mexico. If they could do that, surely they could help in our municipalities. Surely our municipalities make use of them. In that way our kids could clean up our environment.

It may be sad that some airports were built under make-work programs, but they are still there. We built them by paying a wage of ten cents a day, a package of tobacco a week and a pair of jeans and sometimes a shirt every two months. It is true that these were make-work programs. Some might say they were degrading. But at least the people accomplished something. Look at what was accomplished with the Tennessee Valley Authority. Look at the dam that was built. Sure the people were living on welfare; sure, it was a make-work program—but the people were able to do something and so maintain their dignity. Many young people today have not had the opportunity of working. Maybe they don't want to work. I suggest that at least we should give them the opportunity to do something worth while. The good they will be doing will benefit them in the future and we too will benefit.

The minister should become familiar with such programs. Sure, we can send kids down to Manpower centres. That is where you get the big runaround, although they are supposed to handle your problem. A young fellow went to a Manpower centre in my area and they said to him, "Come back next week." He said, "I can't; I live in Kirkland Lake." They said, "Oh, you are from out of town. You can go to the data centre and get two weeks' work." This year I managed to get four job opportunities for him and he is having a hard time deciding which one to take.

Mr. Stanbury: Things must be looking up.

Mr. Peters: The Manpower offices are not the place to send these people. They cure nothing. I sometimes wonder how in the world they help young people at all. In the final analysis, many of our young people will have to create their own jobs and decide to solve their own problems. All I am asking is this: If the young people get together with the municipalities and decide on undertaking some pollution control, will the government provide the necessary money to the municipalities? We could put all the students in the country to work along the Rideau River. If we do not do something soon and spend some money, we shall be able to scoop it out by hand. If it were cleaned up the Rideau could be a waterway that would be a credit to Canada. Basically, it would take a small amount of money. Employing young people in that way is better than seeing them travel across the country.

Does it not strike you as disgraceful that 3,000 young people will agree to make milk stools in Toronto that nobody will buy? True, they are being given the job—and they are taking dope as well. Nevertheless, youngsters who take dope do not begin as addicts. They have been making milk stools which will not be sold to anybody. These young people are not stupid; they are not from mental hospitals; they are not incapable. Many of them have come from universities—and they are to make milk stools for cows that are not milked by hand. Isn't that a sad commentary on what we as adults have tried to do for our young people? Is this considered a worthy project for young people to undertake?

Mr. Stanfield: It reflects the government's interest in young people.

Mr. Peters: I shall read the minister's speech. I am awaiting the next edition of his remarks, because without question there will be another edition. After that I shall speak and we shall tell the kids what their responsibilities are. I shall probably be able to carry on with the next chapter of my dissertation after that edition.

About a week ago the CBC presented a television program that was criticized by many people in my area. The program pointed out that one-fifth of Canada's people are being deprived of the necessities of life; they face a situation in which there is no hope, no future and no solution. The only solution for these people is welfare. The program was concerned with Mr. Rohmer's concept of the mid-Canada line. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) and others can scream bloody murder and claim that the CBC program was a misrepresentation.

I am not arguing that CBC should not have presented that program. I am only complaining that the corporation did not suggest a future for these people. In its presentation it did not have the courage to suggest what the alternatives ought to be. It did not even present concepts involving pie in the sky, if you like, or Utopian ideals which at least would have pointed the way to the solution of the problems of the area. The CBC is not doing a job if it portrays over television to the other four-fifths of Canada how poorly we live in the mid-Canada area. We have been exploited, abused and disadvantaged over the years and no solution has been offered.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I picked off my desk a copy of the regional disparity program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which is supposed to solve this problem. Two of the programs were in Granby and Drummondville. Does Your Honour agree that those are the disadvantaged areas of Canada? I have visited Granby. That area has a viable agricultural industry; the people in the area are not seriously disadvantaged. I do not say they do not need this program. I am not opposed to it. However, I suggest this kind of project cannot take place in only one-fifth of Canada, the mid-Canada corridor.

Mr. Pepin: Why not?

Mr. Peters: Because there is no one to support it. We have allowed the exploitation of that area by the mining and forest industries. There is nothing left. They have taken their marbles and gone somewhere else to play. This is the point I am trying to make. The television program showed the tarpaper shacks and run-down businesses. These businesses existed as a result of the mining industry for 40 years. My objection is that we are not offering them any hope. The minister is not prepared to attract industry to that area. We are losing millions of dollars every year. The minister is not prepared to have a pulp mill established in the area which would employ 500 or 600 people as well as an additional 500 in the bush. This would pay. I am sure it would not be a losing industry, otherwise I would not suggest it.

There are 500 to 600 miners in that area. The television program also showed Cobalt with its shacks. There has not been a substantial amount of money since they owned the Canadian hockey team, the Habitants. There are 20,000 to 30,000 people in that area. No real future is being offered to the many who have remained there. We are now losing a smelter for the reasons which I have already outlined. The federal and provincial governments have not indicated that a smelter will be installed in that area. This would employ 400 to 500 silver miners and keep the mines in operation. The CBC pointed out that this area is and will remain devastated. It was suggested that the people can move from the area. The farmers and miners do not want to move. People who have lived there for several generations do not want to move away from the forest industry.

I suggest that the program is a disservice to Canada because it does not provide an alternative for the disadvantaged people of that area. Many of the hard-core unemployed live there. Welfare recipients in the area are capable of and willing to work but refuse to do so because of the policies of this government and its neglect of the mid-Canada area.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to follow the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), with his series of half-baked ideas, because I would like to submit a half-baked idea of my own for the consideration of hon. members.

Mr. Douglas: Which half is baked?

Mr. Kaplan: I say half-baked because I am not certain of the full implications of the problem on which I intend to focus. I confess it has shaken some of my own thinking about the dynamics of economic growth and the kind of economic strategy we need to achieve full employment. Let me begin by noting the achievement of a "hard dollar" as evidenced by the government's inability to hold it at the discount which was established over eight years ago. I fully agree that the dollar fixed at 92.5 cents U.S. had to be abandoned. The government could not afford to hold the dollar at so substantial a discount. It had over $4 billion invested in maintaining the discount. It was a subsidy to our export industries which Canada could not afford to maintain, under growing pressure, however worthwhile it seemed.

The government likes to refer to the upward movement of the dollar as evidence of the confidence of the world in our economy. Of course it is a vote of confidence. This movement was not achieved by accident. It was the result of doing the so-called "right things" and I agree that they are the right things: first, fighting inflation and achieving better results therefrom than our trading partners; second, stressing exports and, third, attracting capital to invest here. None of these things are easy to do. All are worth doing. The government and private sector achieved them together and did them well.

The question I am asking is whether the sum total of these three admittedly good things can be a bad thing for the economy. I submit that in the aggregate it has become a bad thing, or at least new measures are necessary to make this aggregate a good thing. Let us consider for a moment the international monetary transactions which are creating the hard dollar. All these transactions, private and public, are totalled in our balance of payments.

Our balance of payments account is made up of three general categories, trade accounts, capital accounts and invisibles. Throughout our recent history we have had a net negative balance of trade, that is to say, we have imported more than we have exported—so this account has always been in deficit. It should be noted, also, that there is an important difference between the goods we export and the goods we import. Unlike the United States, Japan and France, to take three examples, the goods we export have tended to be primary products with a low labour content, while our imports have been manufactured goods with a high labour content. We ourselves are not able to consume the sort of goods which generally we export.

If trade had made up the total of our international payments accounts we would have had, as a result of the annual deficit, a dollar which steadily declined in value. This would have made Canadian goods cheaper in world markets, and imports into Canada more costly, so that currency market forces would have driven us to import fewer consumer goods. In such a condition our standard of living would have been adversely affected. If we had begun to produce for ourselves the goods which we were importing, their cost would have been greater because we lack the national market to achieve economies of production on an economic scale. We might have achieved such economies of scale by finding international markets for our manufactured goods, but this would have been difficult because of the international protectionism of the high tariff walls which have existed to protect foreign domestic markets from manufactured goods.

We might have scaled these walls, but only if our consumer goods production costs, which are largely labour in the final analysis, had been kept low. The problem, as you can see, becomes a circle and supports my original view that such a situation would have meant a lower standard of living for Canada. Fortunately, Canada never had to face this economic scene because our balance of payments was not made up only of the trade account. There was the capital account as well, which historically always offset our trade deficit. This account reflects the balance of capital inflows and capital outflows. Here we always had a positive balance to offset the negative trade balance. This account reflected the willingness of the outside world to lend money to Canada and to buy and invest in Canadian assets and businesses. This capital inflow has developed our economy, brought resources to market and put Canadians to work. Of course, foreign capital has been supplemented by a growing contribution of Canadian capital.

Much is being said these days about foreign capital versus local capital. Political careers are being built on this issue, and judging from the experience of Hon. Stan Randall, the former minister of trade and development in Ontario, careers are also being destroyed over it. I do not want to take time in this debate to repeat my own position, which I have already put on record in Hansard, but for this monetary argument I have to note that no one I have heard speak on the subject, from the most fervent ideological continentalist to the most desperate provincial premier representing a depressed region and seeking only to produce work opportunities for his province, feels it is better to use foreign capital than to use local capital.

The sum of what is said at the extreme right of the spectrum of opinions is that there is no difference between foreign and domestic capital, or that if there may be a difference we need foreign capital anyway because we do not have enough domestic capital to produce economic growth. The point which I am trying to develop is that there is indeed a difference between foreign and domestic capital, an extremely important monetary difference and one which is quite apart from any arguments based on nationalism.

Economic Growth and Employment Situation

Getting back to my review of the three elements which make up our balance of payments, there is, thirdly, the invisibles account. This reflects international travel and shipping costs, but for Canada it is largely made up of interest payments, dividends, royalties and management charges. Here the balance has always been negative. That is to say, we pay out more than we receive from abroad. Fortunately, because of our continuous economic growth invisibles never fully offset our positive capital balance. Foreign capital has continued to flow into Canada at a far greater rate than the return paid on capital already invested here. Contrast our position with some Latin American countries where foreign debt service alone exceeds all other international transactions. In summary, the invisibles account represents a small offset to the positive balance in our capital account.

Summing up so far, the Canadian dollar did not constantly fall in response to our trade deficit because of the capital account positive balance. It was the continuous capital inflow which permitted us to pay for our imports which, I noted, have tended to be largely consumer goods for which our own production could not be economically substituted.

The remarkable development which has occurred in the last two years has been the disappearance of the traditional Canadian formula for balancing payments. I believe that few people in Canada recognize the implication of our new situation. I suggest that the government has not yet adequately come to grips with it. The new situation has been referred to as a "reverse exchange" crisis. The source of this crisis is that our balance of trade has finally become positive, an event which any eighteenth century mercantilist would regard as an absolutely good thing. The business community is proud of it and the government is very proud of it.

Judging from market predictions for our natural resources in world markets, there will continue to be a positive balance into the future so long as we want one. But in coming to this point we have run up against an inexorable monetary law. When the balance of payments is positive in capital and trade, and not fully offset by invisibles, the Canadian dollar goes up. We are today in exactly the position we were in when the dollar was released from 92.5 cents Canadian. The government has, again, a $5 billion investment in keeping our dollar below U.S. parity. This investment is a subsidy to exporters and to domestic manufacturers of goods which compete with imports. But I do not see how the government can hold the tide of pressure caused by the net inflow.

There was an article this morning in the Globe and Mail which called for the dollar to be pegged at somewhere close to 92.5 cents. This request is sadly naïve. It is asking the government of this small country, in effect, to risk all our resources to support the United States dollar. It would make our dollar the biggest bargain in the world, and foreign speculators would descend in hordes to take advantage of the government subsidy. It is impossible to fight the fundamental, long-term prospect of disequilibrium with a subsidized dollar.

I propose to the government an approach toward solving this disequilibrium crisis based on the analysis I have just made. But before I do that I wish to review why it is a bad thing to have our dollar shooting upward. In general terms, the answer is obvious. Ask the producers of primary products. They sell in world markets and in U.S. dollars. The disappearance of the discount has cost them between 6 and 7 per cent in gross sales revenues which is, of course, serious. But, where it really hurts is in our secondary manufacturing industry. It hurts, first, because the dollar climb makes imports cheaper in our domestic market and, second, because it makes our exports less and less competitive in foreign markets. In this connection, I believe the dollar movement is a great factor in the current unemployment situation in the Canadian manufacturing sector, the closing of branch plants and the general deceleration of domestic production than any other factor, including the government's past restraint policies.

The irony of it all is that the very inflow of investment dollars which provides some opportunities and jobs in Canada is helping to tip the balance further against the industries which have the best hope of offering employment to our growing population: or at least—and this is an important qualification—some of the foreign inflow has this effect.

The argument of those who feel that capital has no nationality is rebutted by the simple fact that when foreign capital inflows push up the dollar, as they do when there is a trade surplus—as there is now—a domestic dollar invested in Canada is indeed better than a foreign dollar investment, because the domestic dollar invested provides jobs and production without putting upward pressure on our dollar, while the foreign investment dollar, under present circumstances, does press our dollar upward and helps destroy markets, domestic and foreign, for Canadian manufactured goods, thereby adversely affecting job prospects. The same irony exists in connection with our export trade surplus, based as it is on primary products and given our positive balance in capital accounts. In effect, the mercantilist conventional wisdom is reversed.

Let me ask and answer the question: What good does it do us to sell so many primary products abroad if all we get is foreign dollars which push up the value of the Canadian dollar and close our factories because foreign-manufactured goods become, thereby, much more attractive to us? It is possible for us to achieve a viable economy based on such an economic strategy, that is, one based on the export of foreign natural resources? Such an economy can mean prosperity for our country but it is a prosperity based on sharing revenues which are earned by only a minimum of labour.

So long as the resources last, a small population in Canada could receive the revenues and buy goods from abroad, more or less like the royal family of Kuwait living on some kind of gilt-edged welfare plan. But we could not provide employment for a growing population or long-term economic stability. And Canadians do not project for themselves a future as a small country, living on depleting natural resources, exporting population and primary products.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

An hon. Member: Time up!

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Kaplan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the House in order to conclude my remarks. I have almost finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member does not have unanimous consent. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with the motion introduced by the New Democratic Party regarding the unemployment problem which concerns all members of this House. It is not the first time that the opposition parties have introduced a motion on this evil of modern times.

In view of the adverse effects of this situation, it is of course difficult to remain silent when we have an opportunity of expressing certain constructive views. I should like above all to convince our honourable friends, the government members.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Where was the hon. member yesterday when we were discussing the matter of textile products?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is asking whether I was in the House yesterday during the debate on textile products. I am a member of a committee which for the last three weeks has been studying a bill which is just as important, Bill C-176, and owing to its significance for my constituency, I want to tell the minister that I was not wasting my time.

Mr. Pepin: See you on Monday, then!

Mr. La Salle: I will certainly discuss the matter if I have an opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the current situation and of the various opinions which have been expressed, and recognizing the evil that unemployment is, I must point out the failure of the government to solve this problem.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the government has not done anything but we know for sure that it has not done enough.

Of course, members of the opposition are taken to task for their failure to make positive suggestions. All opposition parties made very good suggestions in the House. We regret, of course, that the government too often turns a deaf ear to our proposals.

Mr. Pepin: Go on. Give us a brief summary of that.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity, like several others, to deplore the failure of this government to deal with unemployment. Under the pretext of fighting inflation, they have deliberately created that situation. I will refrain from quoting figures since we can see them daily in the press and in Hansard. However, I still believe a responsible government should create a human, receptive, safe atmosphere that encourages investment—something which has been lacking these past six years because it has not been fostered.

Does the full blame rest with the government? Is this situation due to present economic conditions not only in Canada but throughout the world? One thing is certain, the situation is getting worse instead of improving.

For my part, I asked a couple of ministers as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether it would not be possible to call an emergency meeting of all those in Canada involved in the economy, i.e. representatives of unions, of industry, provincial governments and federal government. Such a meeting is obviously necessary. The reply I received was merely that they did not see the necessity for it. But the government which says it is responsible should at least have the courage to recognize that it has not found the answer. Does anyone know the magic solution? Maybe not, but I think that we would at least have a chance of finding a valuable and profitable one for all society if we were to call a meeting of all those interested in the economy.

Thus we could prove that it is in the interest of financiers, of the responsible people both at the labour and employer levels to meet and try to find a solution. Management, faced with the good faith of the government—which has yet to be demonstrated—would invite everyone to co-operate more directly with the government; they would certainly be pleased to offer their co-operation and to advise the government on labour matters, because it seems that the government needs such counselling. In fact, I think that industrialists, financiers and union experts might advantageously give advice to the government.

This is why I suggested some time ago that the government should seriously contemplate the establishment of the old age pension at 60. As thousands of workers are in the 60 to 65 age bracket, I think it would be profitable to contemplate seriously this possibility which, at the same time, would open job opportunities to thousands of young people since 40 per cent of the Canadian unemployed are under 25. It would be normal, humane, and just, I think, to allow some 300,000 workers—this total represents the number of workers aged 60 to 65—to retire so that the young might find jobs, because they at least want to work. The older workers deserve a rest and an increase in the old age pension.

Who would pay for this? That is the question we shall be asked. At the present time, a person who lives on unemployment insurance benefits and social welfare allowances costs approximately $100 per week to the taxpayer. This amount could be paid to those entitled to the old age pension and this would be less expensive than to grant social welfare allowances to 700,000 or 800,000 unemployed people, as is now the case. Then I imagine that this measure could partially settle the present unemployment problem.

I hope that the government will seriously consider this proposal and that there will be an end to the charges that our remarks are nothing but negative criticism. I believe that this policy should be seriously studied and applied if we are sincere when we say we wish to solve the unemployment issue, as this policy could create a favourable social climate. In fact, it would permit our citizens to retire at 60 on a decent income.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to deal for a few minutes with the program put forward this week regarding students. The minister deplored earlier that the hon. members did not dare approve this program. Of course, I readily recognize that this program is desirable. But is it enough? No, unfortunately, considering that almost one million students will be seeking employment this summer and that the plan provides opportunities for 500,000 students only, since our budget is approximately $14 billion and the money allotted to these programs amounts to approximately $57 per student. We might have done better.

Mr. Pepin: Private enterprise will have to pitch in.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, we will surely need private enterprise, and that is why I thought the government would call as soon as possible a meeting of business leaders who could advise the authorities quite objectively, thus enabling them to get good results.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is up to the government to provide jobs for students next summer.

I deplored recently the government's failure to give an objective answer to the resolution passed by the Young Liberals Convention concerning the creation of a civil corps which would have enabled those young people to find employment, a responsibility which, besides, rests with the government.

Then, the refusal to seriously consider this resolution is unfortunate and surely alarming for the students. This civil corps would have allowed the government to put a certain number of young people at the disposal of municipalities where they are urgently needed.

For instance, this summer, some small municipalities will need young people of both sexes as counsellors at playgrounds and summer camps. All they can do is hire one or two counsellors for 500, 600 or 1,000 school-children, and that is not enough.

I think that as members of Parliament, it is our duty to ask the government to set up such services.

Mr. Pepin: Why not vergers?

Mr. La Salle: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not serious, which is unfortunate because I feel this debate should be really serious.

Mr. Pepin: While we are at it—

Mr. La Salle: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I am also thinking of all that could be done to fight pollution.

Economic Growth and Employment Situation

A while ago, a member of the New Democratic Party mentioned very simple work in conjunction with the development of our land, our rivers, our towns and cities.

Some of our streams could be developed in order to attract the tourist trade, and with most interesting financial results. Should the matter be fully looked into and the required facilities be provided in order to promote such projects?

I sincerely hope that my brief remarks will prompt the government to take constructive action. I am not one of those who only make negative criticism. On the contrary, it is my responsibility to suggest certain measures but it is up to the government to listen to us and take action. In this case, we might hope that the Canadian people will regain their confidence in their governments, because at present, that confidence seems to have lessened. Of course, up to a certain point, governments are right but, in my opinion, members of the opposition must keep challenging the government if they want it to have a better understanding of its responsibilities. The members' participation in the drafting of legislation would result in a better quality of life and in a better climate for all Canadians.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. First of all, as it is the day of the New Democratic Party and that they were very nice when they let us discuss our motion last Tuesday, I will try to be as brief as possible.

I wish to commend the New Democratic Party for the motion it has introduced today. It supplements somewhat the statement made on March 16, 1971 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he announced his employment and activities program for students.

When listening to the Prime Minister making his announcement, I immediately understood that it was a statement well structured and oriented towards an ideal to be achieved. Besides, he said in his statement that everyone must have an ideal, but that the problem lies in achieving it. I wish to draw hon. members' attention on these points today. The problem we are dealing with, Mr. Speaker, is very important since it affects the young generation. No one in this House could remain irreceptive to its implications.

We understand the government's difficulties with unemployment. There are approximately 700,000 unemployed and thousands of people on welfare. Soon, nearly 990,000 of the 1,800,000 students from our schools will be unable to find employment. We recognize that this is a very serious problem for the government.

This problem must be faced and all members of this House should partake in a collective effort to solve it in the best possible way.

I take exception to the fact that the government once more is late this year in applying his programs. I am afraid our conclusions might be the same as last year. The programs had been introduced too late and approximately 60 per cent of the students, during their holidays—at least in my area—kept looking for work, with the result that by the end of their holidays, they were nowhere near their goal. They could earn absolutely nothing. This is the situation I dread again this year, on account of this delay.

Right after the statement from the Prime Minister, three students from the University of Ottawa happened to be in my office. I told them: According to the Prime Minister's statement, you have to inquire from the departments, since there is nothing definite; he only told us that four departments would look after the operation of the program and that eight or nine categories of jobs would be created.

At that point we started phoning the Departments of the Secretary of State, National Health and Welfare, Manpower and Immigration. We were referred back from one department to the other. They said: At the present time there is nothing definite or clear. Call the Manpower office.

So I did. At both Manpower offices in my area, they replied: Mr. Gauthier, we know no more than you do about it. Whatever we know we learned through the newspapers.

We would be justified in asking ourselves some important questions. This is why Information Canada has today forwarded to me a synopsis of programs set up by the four ministers who will be concerned with providing jobs to students.

The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) will be able to spend approximately $29 million for the implementation of four separate programs: Opportunities for youth, Transient youth service, Group travel and Language training. The same will apply to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who will seek to establish training camps for athlete-students and to the manpower offices where youth centres will eventually be established.

I contacted the offices in my riding and was told that a student had been asked to handle qualified candidates and they are still wondering whether they will find any.

I believe that we will have to contact these offices immediately in order to staff them adequately. I think that in the riding of Roberval which is fairly large, there are only two manpower centres. Five students per office would not be too many to try and administer the proposed program.

Hon. members will note that I am not criticizing the program directly; I am simply criticizing the delay in its introduction and at the end we will know whether it is effective or not.

Such a program should have been introduced, as some professors believe, at the beginning of January so as to enable school authorities to let the students know about it so that they would be well-informed at the end of the school year.

Unfortunately, everything will be done quickly, everybody will run and people will realize that no organization was selected to find employment, to organize groups of workers, which will be the cause of great difficulties.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned with pollution and drugs. I had thought of two or three organizations that could investigate the drug problem, for instance, in my constituency. An inquiry could also be made on pollution. That would be of interest for the groups of young people entering the community, who would find an opportunity to do useful work.

I have here the publication of the Public Service Commission. I should like to have certain things clarified, especially that part of the publication where it is said:

Students from universities, CEGEPS and community colleges in provinces other than Quebec can choose between two methods to apply for summer employment in the Civil Service of Canada.

—either through the Civil Service or the Manpower Department.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the minister to the use of the words "in provinces other than Quebec". I am wondering what we can tell our young people if Quebec is excluded. I would not know if this means that Quebec has its own organization. Perhaps there are university centres in Ontario as well as in Quebec, but I should like to have this matter cleared up, namely, where should our young people be told to direct their applications?

In fact, I intend indeed to try and find out, in my own region, everything that might help the young in order to implement this program, as I have already started to do. Every home, every board of trade and every municipality will receive, during these coming days, a copy of this publication in order to give our region a chance and publicize the programs made available to people by the department. I think that such is the work of a House member, and this is why I shall probably have discussions with the hon. minister in order to insure the implementation of this program.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up the time of the House, because I know that several other hon. members have also remarks to make. I would like simply to say, in conclusion, that we are satisfied with this plan, because it will enable us to call upon all young people so that they may take part in a constructive endeavour instead of being allowed to wander about throughout their holidays, not knowing what to do with their hands.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan). Because of the firm agreement which we had on time limitation, he was not able to complete his speech. But knowing the interest of other hon. members I shall try to anticipate what he might have said had he been able to complete his speech, and if I make extensive use of some notes I hope this will be overlooked by hon. members opposite.

Mr. McGrath: This is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. Bell: Where did the speech come from originally?

Mr. Francis: The hon. member for Don Valley is capable of producing original speeches himself, and this is one he produced this afternoon. The hon. member said that Canadians want an increase in population and a sophisticated manufacturing economy with which we can express a distinctive life-style and generate economic autonomy. We do not want, therefore, to be locked into a natural resource export situation. Then he might have gone on to state the dilemma which our economic strategists—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I have no objection to the hon. member reading a speech, but I am sure he would not want to attribute the whole of his speech to somebody else.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I am just trying to complete a few remarks that were being made by the hon. member for Don Valley and which will be the basis of my personal comment. I hope there will be no objection to my doing this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hon. member may proceed provided he follows these remarks with his own comments.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member was stating the dilemma which our economic strategists must face. We know that the export of primary products and the import of foreign capital each separately create job opportunities, but operating together they are pushing up the cost of our exports in foreign dollar terms and closing down our manufacturing economy. In this context, the problem is how to achieve the most important goal of all—the growth of job opportunities. Four solutions have been suggested. Two steps in solving the problem are obvious, if not necessarily easy to apply, and the government already is working toward them. First, we must try to achieve better utilization of our own capital. Remember that when we invest our own capital to create jobs and products, we do so without hardening our dollar. This is one of the main focuses of the work of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is also a justification for the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation and for the negotiations to keep Home Oil Canadian.

Second, we have to try to get dollars out of Canada, if this can be done without affecting job opportunities here. This part of the reasoning, which presumably, lies behind the recent lowering of the rediscount rate of the Bank of Canada and the fairly rapid response of the private banks in lowering their rates, indicates indeed that some shift-out of Canada of short-term capital was justifiable. This has taken some pressure off our dollar, but there is a limit to how far we can go and the disequilibrium is by no means corrected.

Third, and this is something not yet adequately understood by the government, we could try to impose a higher labour content in our exports. We are making some headway in this area but more will be needed especially if we are to satisfy the less-developed regions of Canada that the struggle to provide job opportunities will not be confined to urban manufacturing but will be fostered on-site or close-to-site in respect of areas concerned with primary production. This is surely a condition of viable federalism.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Fourth, we need a policy to assure that the foreign capital which comes to Canada will not just add to the hardening of our dollar but will provide a high prospect of productive employment for Canadians. There are, of course, other dimensions to a policy on foreign investment which I and others have raised before in this House and will not refer to today. What I have tried to show here is that there is even a monetary reason for a foreign investment policy.

So far as we know, the government has proposed no comprehensive policy on foreign investment, but I am also impressed with the complexity of the problem and the necessity to think through all the implications before assuming responsibility as a government. I look forward to the policy being put forward by the government as soon as possible. Meanwhile, considering our reverse exchange crisis, I think it would be highly desirable to establish an interim foreign exchange control system which could be administered by the government or the Bank of Canada and which could have the effect of taking some of the pressure off the Canadian dollar; that is, the pressure which has been created by the movement into a positive balance of payments position.

It would be the job of the administrators of the control system to give and withhold approvals of currency exchange conversions based on the considerations which I have enumerated this afternoon—to keep domestic borrowers from going abroad for funds to achieve only marginal savings when there would be undesirable balance of payment effects, to retain foreign takeovers, which offer substitution of ownership only, but to permit foreign investments which meet positive growth criteria.

This is an interesting point of view, Mr. Speaker. I followed the hon. member's contribution to this debate. In a previous statement he indicated that he favoured a system of wage and price controls. Today he has added the suggestion of foreign exchange controls because of the strength of the Canadian dollar, and that its adverse affects should be considered. The language of the motion before us is interesting. It attempts to condemn the government for failing to institute the economic planning necessary to bring about economic growth, full employment and price stability. In framing this motion, members of the opposition have added the failure to achieve stable exchange rates and a stable balance of payments situation. These are elements which economists try to study in order to give guidance to public authorities. The problem of Canada today is to balance these multiple objectives. To the extent to which a government achieves one, it frequently sacrifices another. In the point of view of the official opposition and the mover of this motion, this is quite easy. To the extent that government achieves price stability, it can be condemned in respect of the unemployment question, and vice versa.

The thought that I would like to leave with hon. members this afternoon is that this problem is not unique to Canada. It is one which is a challenge to conventional economic wisdom throughout western society. There is no clear guidance given by economists on how to achieve these goals. Government has to take responsibility for policy. It cannot retreat through a maze of mathematical calculations. The government has to live with the elements of instability.

Mr. Speaker, I am one who does not believe that the solution lies in the direction of expanding controls. I am a little older than the hon. member for Don Valley and I remember World War II very well. I remember the control systems devised in that period. I know that although we had rent controls we had to pay money for the key to an apartment. I know we wanted for many things, and we had ration books. These things caused problems in the marketplace. I know that society can make controls work, but at a price. In many ways the nature of society is altered. This problem is not to be considered lightly, and I feel that we still have the challenge of trying to work things out within the framework of institutions that have done very well, before undertaking alternatives as drastic as those proposed by my colleague.

This government has acted within the framework of conventional economic wisdom and has tried to do the right thing. We have tackled the problem of price stability, but the difficulty is that when we do the right thing we suffer the consequences. By maintaining stable prices and a reputation as a good place for investors we have created an unstable exchange situation. To the extent to which we create upward pressure on our dollar, we create a situation where it is difficult to achieve regular employment objectives. By following policy we have achieved certain objectives, but have created a situation where we cannot achieve others.

To the dimension in which my generation studied economics has to be added the dimensions of a new generation which may be different. We were greatly impressed by the eminent economist Keynes; the word "Keynesian" meant a great deal to us. The government must follow monetary and fiscal policies, and to this we have now to add another dimension—it must have economic intelligence. We have to guess what our major trading partners will do, and we have to arrange our monetary and fiscal policy so that we will do a little better—but not that much better—in the way of price stability than our trading partners. The problem of controlling inflation, creating high levels of unemployment, stable exchange rates and desirable rates of economic growth is a challenge to western society. Indeed, today western Europe is showing symptoms of this kind of malaise.

The government has done many things to attempt to deal with the problem which is the specific issue of the motion—unemployment. I could enumerate the measures which have been announced. On March 17 the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) announced in this House a series of contracts for Canadian shipbuilders. This was the result of a program, instituted by the government last fall, of subsidy for vessels of foreign ownership as well as Canadian. This program involved contracts of $64 million for ships to be built, two at the Port Weller drydocks in St. Catharines, three in Quebec and others in Saint John, New Brunswick. This program will provide a great deal of employment and is the result of a very specific policy to achieve this end.

As described by the previous speaker, we have announced a number of programs to assist students this summer. There have been a number of specific measures proposed, but time limits me from going into detail. This is a result of the wisdom of conventional advice being put forward by those who have special responsibility in this matter, Mr. Speaker. I look to the economists in the universities and elsewhere in Canadian society who are free to assess the problem and give advice. They have a great job to do, and the challenge is as much with them as with anybody else.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): After listening to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), Mr. Speaker, I have the impression that we do not have many problems in this country. When we solve one problem we go ahead and create another one. He seemed to say that in order to solve the problem of high costs and inflation we have to create unemployment, and then to solve the problem of unemployment we have to create higher costs and more inflation. This is the type of conventional wisdom with which many people are becoming fed up. It is smug, upper middle-class Liberal rhetoric and is not helping the poor or the unemployed, the people on fixed incomes or old age pensioners.

• (4:50 p.m.)

It is very easy for us in this House to pat ourselves on the back. I think that too often many who sit in the seats of power do not know what the world is like outside. How many of these people have been out there? How many know what it is to go hungry and not have enough money to buy clothes for their children or live in a decent house? I do not think they know about these things. It is very easy to treat people as statistics, ledgers or files. It is easy to look at this country and the world in terms of gross national product and unemployment rates going up or down half of 1 per cent. We seem to forget the human element of society, and the hon. member for Ottawa West has once again demonstrated this.

Yesterday the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), a Liberal member, was talking about some of these things. I think he knows about these matters better than some of us on this side of the House, because he sits in the Liberal caucus. That Member of Parliament claims that he is being shoved aside by the establishment on the government side of the House.

Mr. McGrath: Shame!

Mr. Nystrom: He says he has been informed that the government is removing him from membership of the joint parliamentary committee that is to investigate pollution in the Arctic and elsewhere. He says that all they want around here are people who will stay in line, who will lick boots and who will keep their noses clean. I think that just about sums up what many people are starting to think about the government of Canada. It is very smug, very complacent and somewhere up in the clouds.

Economic Growth and Employment Situation

Yesterday the unemployment figures were released for the month of February. I notice that many government members seemed to take great satisfaction from the fact that unemployment went up by only a few thousand as compared with the previous month. Yet still over 8.1 per cent of the Canadian people are unemployed: there are 675,000 people registered as unemployed. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the complete story, that thousands of people in Canada are unemployed but are not registered in the unemployment figures. Many of these people have families. If you were to add them all up, I am sure you would find that over two million people in Canada are affected one way or another because of our high rate of unemployment.

Let us look at two or three instances of unemployment in the country. We find that unemployment has gone up in Quebec; it now stands at 10.4 per cent of the labour force. In Atlantic Canada it stands at 11 per cent of the labour force. You can talk about national unity and about one country, but I suggest that if this country is to stay together, all regions must be equal partners within confederation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberal party have talked much about cures, about ridding Canada of regional disparities and of making this country united. That government has done more to destroy unity in this country and to set one region against another than any government in our history. Factors like the 10 per cent unemployment rate in Quebec are causing this disunity. Is it any wonder that many Quebeckers are saying today, "Maybe we should consider getting out of confederation".

Mr. McGrath: The unemployment rate is 15.2 per cent in Newfoundland.

Mr. Nystrom: My hon. friend says that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is 15.2 per cent. It stands at 11 per cent in the Maritimes generally. That is completely unforgivable—the Canadian people should not forgive this government for deliberately creating unemployment as a means of fighting inflation. It has done so deliberately. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) boasted in this House on January 20 that the government has created unemployment. He said, as recorded at page 2507 of Hansard:

> It takes courage sometimes to create unemployment. We have created unemployment in the textile industry and we will probably create it temporarily in other industries—

Mr. Douglas: It also takes a lot of stupidity.

Mr. Nystrom: My leader says that it also takes a lot of stupidity. Economists have said we have probably lost $5 billion in production as a result of high unemployment in Canada. This means that governments in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, have lost between $1 billion and $1.5 billion in tax revenue. They would have gained that revenue if the people had been working and producing. The people of Canada do not want handouts; they do not want welfare. They want opportunities to work.

Since I have only a few moments left, may I say a few words about another group of people which is taking the brunt of the government's unemployment policies, the young people of Canada. We have discovered that almost half the unemployed are under 25. They are the ones who are supposed to be building the country for tomorrow and who will be tomorrow's leaders. If they cannot find work, is it any wonder that many of them are turning to what we call an undemocratic way of changing society? Is it any wonder that some of them are questioning the contemporary ways that the hon. member for Ottawa West talked about so proudly a few moments ago?

We have to find work for these people. There is no reason why we cannot do so. We have all the resources we need, all the technology, all the educational skills and all the educational know-how. We need government priorities and programs that will put people first. The government has announced a policy under which it will employ young people. According to the government, nearly one million students will be joining the labour force between now and the end of June. What will happen when all these people join the labour force? Even more will be unemployed. Even more will be frustrated because they will not have the chance to make a few dollars in Canada and make a contribution to this country.

The program that the government announced contained a few points that were good. But why was the program not announced earlier so that community organizations and others could undertake planning and participation? It seems to me that the program announced by the Prime Minister is to be administered on a completely ad hoc basis. It has come too late and will do too little. I think much of it is mere tokenism, for the benefit of the young people of this country. The time will come when the young people will demand action and results.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Nystrom: I could say many more things, Mr. Speaker, but my time has almost expired. I conclude by saying that it is very easy to sit around here and be complacent, to say what great people we are, what a great government this is and what great members we are. It is about time people who said that came down from their ivory towers into the real world that is outside this chamber.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. As it is five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the debate on the motion before us is deemed to have come to an end.

[English]

I wish hon. members an enjoyable weekend. Sunday, for sure, is the first day of spring—March 21. This should gladden hon. members' hearts. However, having followed the weather forecast, I say "Beware the Ides of March," keep warm, keep home, enjoy a pleasant weekend.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
